With "La goccia d'acqua," Mario Bava concluded I tre volti della paura with one of the most disturbing closing images in cinema: a slow, unflinching zoom into the cold, lifeless, cross-eyed stare of Miss Chester. When the film arrived at AIP, Sam Arkoff and Jim Nicholson were expecting anything but a movie that left audiences staring Death in the face.[21]

"On the last day of filming, a telegram arrived from America telling us to do something to tone the movie down because it was too frightening," Bava recalled. "What can you possibly do on the last day? Things like that usually take a month to figure out!"[22]

Bava ultimately responded to the cable with delicious irony. The last day of filming had been devoted, in part, to shots of Karloff (as Gorka) riding on horseback, carrying his little grandson away from the world of the living. The sets had been dismantled; only the prop horse remained. What to do?

Bava thought of something, purely out of desperation, but according to his son, the idea was not readily embraced by his co-workers. "His ideas came to him quickly, simply and clearly," Lamberto Bava recalls. "My father was usually able to obtain a desired response with no more than a smile or a simple request, but sometimes his crew would rebel, saying, 'No! What you ask is not possible—it's ridiculous!' He could be quite obstinate, though, and the end results usually proved him correct. In fact, it was often these 'ridiculous' moments which his audience liked best. It was in just this way that almost everyone objected to him putting Boris Karloff on a wooden horse at the end of I tre volti della paura."[23]

Bava's crew may have been put off by the illusion-puncturing aspects of Bava's brainstorm, but there was also the more practical matter of Boris Karloff's health to consider. Bava was aware of the actor's long-standing arthritic condition, which had bowed his right leg to the extent that a steel brace was compulsory, and he had organized the actor's daily schedule so that he never had to work longer than four hours per day. Then 76, Karloff had been put up in a freezing Roman hotel, and he had already spent more time than his health advised under the output of the studio fans, which ruffled his hood to lend his horseback ride the illusion of forward movement. When Bava hesitantly conveyed his idea for a new finale to Karloff, he was taken aback by the actor's enthusiasm.

"Karloff embraced me," Bava recalled, "and said that, in the midst of so many fans, he would surely catch pneumonia—perhaps even die—but that he didn't care, because it was the first time in his life he'd had so much fun!"

And so it came to be. I tre volti della paura ends—at least the Italian prints do—with a medium close shot of Gorka riding horseback, alone, through a forest of dead branches. The entire scene unfolds in a single take. Gorka slows the horse to a halt with a lusty "Whoa!" then speaks directly to the audience. What follows is a translation of the Italian dialogue heard in the film:

So there you have it! Did you see the end coming? You shouldn't fool around with ghosts, because they'll take revenge! Well, we've come to the end of our stories so, sadly, I must leave you now. [The horse begins to move away, as if taking Gorka at his word.] Whoa . . . [Double-take, smiles.] But be careful as you make your way home: Look around you! Look behind you! Be careful when you enter your home—and don't go in without turning on a light! [Blows a kiss.] Dream about me! [Horse begins to move, Karloff salutes, laughs.] We'll meet again!

This, however, is not exactly what Karloff said on-set as the camera rolled. By reading the actor's lips, we get this:

Well, now! Wasn't that a wonderful sight? Just one great big happy family! But alas, there are no more stories to tell, and I'm afraid I must leave you now. [Horse begins to move away, as if taking Karloff at his word.] Whoa! [Double-take, smiles.] But be careful as you make your way home! In the night, behind you, there may be more vampires . . . and death! [Blows a kiss.] Happy dreams! [Horse begins to move, Karloff salutes, laughs.] The End!

This coda was originally intended to appear only in the American version, to ameliorate the film's climactic horrors and to ensure that AIP's matinee audiences would not be overly traumatized. Bava was unaware at the time of AIP's intention to rearrange the sequencing of the episodes; Karloff's reference to "one big happy family" ventures direct, tongue-in-cheek comment on the closing shots of "The Wurdalak," and indeed, the fact that he's wearing Gorka's makeup—and not appearing as himself, as he did at the beginning of the picture—implies a fluid continuation of the closing episode from horror into comedy.

GORKA and Ivan gallop along astride the stuffed nag so memorably unveiled at the end of I TRE VOLTI DELLA PAURA.

Karloff's words are reminiscent of the legendary "curtain call" speech delivered by Edward Van Sloan at the end of the original 1931 release prints of Tod Browning's Dracula:

"Just a moment, ladies and gentlemen! Just a word before you go. We hope the memories of Dracula and Renfield won't give you bad dreams, so just a word of reassurance. When you go home tonight and the lights have been turned out and you are afraid to look behind the curtains and you dread to see a face appear at the window—why, just pull yourself together and remember that, after all . . . there are such things!"

According to David J. Skal's book Hollywood Gothic, this coda disappeared from all subsequent release prints of Dracula, and the only known surviving copy (excerpted on Universal's 1999 DVD of the film) is badly deteriorated. It is possible that the Dracula coda may have survived a bit longer in Italy, and had been seen by Bava, but it is also possible—as the actor and director brainstormed together in the last hours of filming—that Karloff discussed with his director how his old studio Universal had once responded to the worry that they might have frightened their audience too much.

But the Karloff coda doesn't end here. As the actor waves his merry farewell, the camera dollies back from his galloping "steed," through the forest, to reveal the full range of ludicrous falsity that haunts the edges of every image ever captured by a motion picture camera. As the score swells with raucous, rinky-tink piano, we see that Karloff is bouncing astride a stuffed nag on springs, rocked by a technician squatting on the floor below its rump; that the wind is coming from a studio fan; that the passing clouds are projected from a rotating stencilled cyclodrum with an illuminated hub; that the "forest" is actually a group of middle-aged Italian men running in haggard circles around a small, primitive 35 mm camera, with pine branches held over their ducked heads! Fade to black.

This astounding coda is remarkable for several reasons. First of all, it has a distinctly Italian touch referring specifically to the 20th century dramatic innovations of Sicilian novelist and playwright Luigi Pirandello (1867–1936). Pirandello's 1921 play Sei personaggi in cerca d'autore/Six 21 The shot is retained in the AIP version, of course, but it fades to black much quicker than in the Italian cut.

22 Abruzzese.

23 Lamberto Bava interview, "Mario Bava, Mio Padre" in Luigi Cozzi, Il Cinema Gotico e Fantastico Italiano Vol 1—Mario Bava, I Mille Volti Della Paura (Rome, Italy: Mondo Ignoto/Profondo Rosso, 2001), 149–56.

BAVA shatters the illusion of the wurdalak's ride through the forest in this frame enlargement from the film's finale.

Characters in Search of an Author builds to a murder, followed by its characters drawing attention to their status as figures on stage, ordering the theater lights to be brought on and crossing the proscenium into the audience. One of the main themes of Pirandello's work as a whole is the ambiguous nature of art and reality. Bava's invocation of his work is especially momentous in this context because no film genre is quite as dependent on the suspension of disbelief as the horror film. Each of the film's preceding three stories has been wholly involving, despite their serial interruption, and remarkably, our suspension of disbelief continues unabated even as Karloff/Gorka breaks the "fourth wall" by addressing us, the audience, directly—as he also did at the beginning of the film. He taunts us with suggestions of things like ghosts and vampires, in which we naturally do not believe, yet he provokes a chill by speculating they might be walking a few steps behind us as we walk home from the movie theater. (Naturally, the scene loses some of its effectiveness on video, where there is no "walk home" involved.) Once this coda has planted its seeds of unease, it gallops on to its last laugh, merrily dismantling the fragile illusion in which we have placed our entire belief over the last 90 minutes—the illusion of cinema.

Thus, the coda is nothing less than Bava's unmasking of himself: a man who became a cameraman in order to be unobtrusive as an artist, a man who disliked being photographed, a man whose chosen field of endeavor was the once-invisible art of trick photography. A man of Bava's character could have conceived such a finale for only one reason: he had finally achieved something of which he could be proud, something warranting his full disclosure.

On a broader scale, the finale is also remarkable for the way it prefigures Karloff's later role in Peter Bogdanovich's Targets (1968). Usually acclaimed as the actor's last great performance, Karloff's role as horror star Byron Orlock offered his audience a similar glimpse of the man behind the screen's most legendary monsters. Given the Pirandello-like nature of the Italian ending, it is actually Mario Bava who deserves credit for being the first director to present Karloff on the screen as he really was.[24]

Needless to say, when they got a look at Bava's method of toning down the chills, Arkoff and Nicholson had kittens. They responded by concocting a finale of their own—using an outtake of Gorka's horse rearing, coming loose from its tether and galloping away, in concert with a new closing theme by Baxter, which replaced the rinky-tink piano of Nicolosi's original with pennywhistles and pratfalling trombones.

"It was a most amusing ending, really," Karloff told Castle of Frankenstein magazine in a diplomatic 1966 interview. "Sort of getting on this rocking horse and everything. The producers in Hollywood didn't like it, and they had a very valid point. If there had been any suggestion of comedy in any of the three stories, then this would have tied-in. But there was no suggestion whatsoever, and this would have come as such a shock that [they believed] it would have destroyed the film. I don't know if they were right . . . [but] they know their market, they know their field very well, and they've been extremely considerate to me. I'm grateful to them."[25]

It is obvious from his comments that Karloff loved the ending, and Bava did too—so when AIP decided to reject it, Bava and editor Mario Serandrei exercised their right to include it in the Italian version, rather than see it vanish into oblivion. For this version, Karloff's "one big happy family" reference was rewritten in the Italian dubbing to make reference to vengeful ghosts, thus venturing direct comment on the Italian version's closing episode, "La goccia d'acqua." [26]

True to Karloff's concerns, he did contract pneumonia before leaving Rome, after spending his last day on an already freezing set bombarded by the chill winds sent out from a large studio fan. For this reason, the Bava film was never a favorite topic of Karloff's widow, Evelyn. But, in fact, Karloff had arrived in Rome not in the best of health; he had just completed The Terror (1963) for Roger Corman, who had ordered the 75-year-old actor to spend most of his last day on that film performing his own stunts under a tumult of cold water in a flood sequence. Bava had been fond of Karloff and never stopped blaming himself—not only for Karloff's pneumonia but for his subsequent death from emphysema several years later, on February 2, 1969.

"I destroyed Karloff's health," Bava was still lamenting in 1980, the year of his own death. "I guess I wasn't a very good nursemaid." [27]

For his part, throughout the remaining six years of his life, Boris Karloff always spoke of Mario Bava and their collaboration with the highest regard.

According to Christopher Lee, "I remember Boris, who did not praise lightly or easily, saying, 'I would do anything for Mario Bava—I love him!'" [28] With Gorka, Bava provided Karloff with his last great horror characterization. A personality evenly shaded with the warmth of the man he once was and the icy horror of the thing he has become, the vulturish Gorka hobbles into the pantheon of Karloff classics.

Release

Though filmed under the working title of La paura, Bava changed the name of his movie during production to I tre volti della paura—which mocked the title of an anthology film that was being concurrently filmed at Cinecittà: I tre volti (1964), a Dino De Laurentiis production with episodes directed by Michelangelo Antonioni, Mauro Bolognini, and Franco Indovina. The film starred Soraya (Esfandiary, the former wife of the Shah of Iran, Mohammed Reza Pahlavi) in three different stories and three different roles, opposite Richard Harris, Alberto Sordi, and Ivano Davoli. Again, horror performed poorly at the Italian boxoffice, with I tre volti della paura earning only 103.5 million lire [$65,000] in its initial release. Business may have been affected by negative publicity, as Alberto Bevilacqua recalls that "some bad accident happened . . . someone had a miscarriage while watching it, or some other upsetting thing happened," though his recollection is that it was "a big hit." It certainly was in other countries around the world, particularly America, where AIP's retitling—Black Sabbath—underscored the movie's shared paternity with the earlier blockbuster, Black Sunday. Much moreso than its predecessor, Black Sabbath seemed to have everything going for it—it had the world's greatest horror star in one of his greatest horror roles, American star Mark Damon, some of Europe's loveliest actresses, and it was twice as scary in color—but

US insert poster, art by Reynold Brown. AIP opted to make the image of Gorka's severed head less gruesome by re-painting the bloody stump of his neck a light shade of yellow.

24 The first time on the screen, but not the first time ever. A 1962 episode of the CBS-TV series Route 66 ("Lizard's Leg and Owlet's Wing") featured Karloff, Peter Lorre and Lon Chaney as three aging horror stars. Chaney appeared as the Hunchback, the Mummy, and the Wolf Man, and Karloff made the moment complete by donning the Frankenstein Monster makeup for the first time since 1939.

25 Mike Parry, Mike and Harry Nadler, "CoF Interviews Boris Karloff," Castle of Frankenstein 9, 1966, 16. As it happens, Karloff's remarks about the ending's greater relevance to a comedic setting were prophetic. One year later, Jerry Lewis would conclude his show-business comedy The Patsy (1964) with a similar, backtracking exposure shot. Coincidence? Or might Lewis have heard about the scrapped Karloff ending from Patsy cast member Peter Lorre, who had made The Comedy of Terrors with Karloff in the interim between the two productions and possibly told an anecdote about the situation?

26 Though it has yet to be shown in America, an alternate version of I tre volti della paura has been broadcast on French television, copyrighted 2002 by the Alfredo Leone Trust. This version features re-photographed main titles which shorten the name of the film to "Tre volti della paura" and credit no less than three musicians (Roberto Nicolosi, Les Baxter and Stelvio Cipriani) with its score, indicating some extreme monkeying with the soundtrack. Most damaging of all, the Karloff coda fades to black before the film's final illusions are shattered.

27 Louis Sabad, posthumously quoted in "Un cinéaste d'outre-tombe" in Libération, May 7, 1980.

28 Christopher Lee as quoted in Bill Kelley, "Mario Bava died without giving full rein to his talents," Ft. Lauderdale Sun-Sentinel, May 30, 1980, 4SS.

US one-sheet, art by Reynold Brown.

the film would earn only $419,000 in domestic rentals, an inexplicable drop in profit compared to the earlier film.

How a film of Black Sabbath's unquestionable quality could have stumbled at the boxoffice is a mystery, but perhaps advertising was at fault. One of the more bewildering aspects of the film's release—all around the world—is that Boris Karloff himself was pictured in almost none of its paper advertising—an incredible omission, considering his then-current rise in popularity among the young, thanks to Thriller and Shock Theatre presentations of his classic Universal horror films. He did not even appear on AIP's one-sheet poster design, a magnificent Reynold Brown painting of four beautiful young women cowering from the apparition of a headless horseman. Brown's alternative campaign—which did feature Karloff, as a green-skinned severed head . . . sort of Gorka "as" Olibek—was apparently too graphic for AIP's tastes (or newspaper reproduction), although they did sanction its use as an insert-sized poster, with the bloody sliver at the base of the head's neck painted over with yellow! Elsewhere, only one of the Italian due-foglia designs featured Karloff, in a heavily cropped photographic shot of the actor as Gorka. The most beautiful of all the poster art that exists for the film accompanied its French release as Les Trois Visages de la Peur, a painting of the film's three lead actresses—Michèle Mercier, Susy Andersen, and Jacqueline Pierreux—framed by two silhouetted strangler's hands.

While the comments made by the unnamed critic at Monthly Film Bulletin are hardly worth repeating ("Leaving something to the audience's imagination is not an bad policy in this kind of film" [29]), the British release of Black Sabbath resulted in Bava finding a new champion in Films & Filming's Peter Cowie. "Mario Bava's latest film . . . is a good deal better and more thoughtfully worked out than most horror films, and the final story of the three is the best thing of its type since Black Sunday," he enthused. "The serpentine convolutions of Bava's camera are just right for the eerie, grotesque and always sensual nature of the stories. His apprenticeship under directors like Soldati, Emmer and Walsh has taught him the value of color and sound . . . See Black Sabbath, if only for the final story. Horror films are usually hideous, but Bava succeeds in making 'The Wurdalak' beautiful!" [30]

Commentary

In its original form, I tre volti della paura ranks with Masaki Kobayashi's Kaidan/Kwaidan (1964, based on several stories by Lafcadio Hearn) as one of the finest examples of the horror anthology feature. Each segment is beautifully crafted in its own right, and carefully placed to contribute to the forward momentum and cumulative impact of the whole. Of the other acknowledged classics of anthology horror—Flesh and Fantasy (1943), Dead of Night (1945), Three Cases of Murder (1954), as well as Corman's Tales of Terror and the myriad Amicus Productions which adopted this format—each contains outstanding segments, but they collectively succumb to the gravity imposed on them by their weakest links, and their failure to gel into a singular statement. This failure is also apparent in AIP's Black Sabbath, but the original I tre volti della paura is a nearly perfect work. It is also the film that Mario Bava himself singled out most often as his personal favorite.

Visually, I tre volti della paura and Kwaidan have a great deal in common, which is remarkable considering that they were made at approximately the same time and sprang from two very different cultures. Both films conjure atmospheres of exquisite terror by exaggerating the beauty of their settings; Kobayashi's film does this by accentuating the theatrical unreality of his scenes and settings, some of which are staged before elaborate, impressionistically painted backdrops, whereas Bava's film achieves an atmosphere of otherness entirely through its inventive uses of color and light. Viewed in black-and-white, I tre volti della paura is almost stylistically indistinguishable from La maschera del demonio and La ragazza che sapeva troppo, but when viewed properly in an original Technicolor print, the film embodies a quantum leap of visual imagination by transferring the fantasmagorical color schemes of Ercole al centro della terra to otherwise realistic 18th, 19th, and 20th century settings. Consequently, color—applied luminously and often irrationally—suggests the flaring presence of madness or the supernatural. Unfortunately, some of this effect was lost in the AIP version, processed at Pathé Color; these prints were chalky and had a tendency to compromise the quality of the black levels and to translate flaring reds into harsh, noisy oranges.

The inspiration behind the approach taken by both films, color-wise, may have been Vincent van Gogh, in whose paintings color intensifies apace with the artist's own derangement. In Kwaidan, the sky can be a mass of stationary flame or a starry starry night with what appear to be eyes peering out from whorls of cloud. Bava does not go quite so far; instead, as Gorka ambles behind a wall of vines, there is a spot of intense red light on one of them—for which no plausible explanation exists in nature. Likewise, as his characters move through darkened rooms or under darkened skies, the light falling on their faces might be amber, lavender, green or a seething, incendiary red, depending not on natural light sources, but on the emotional tonality Bava wished to interject at that precise moment. Ercole al centro della terra had given Bava the opportunity to interpret Hell, but I tre volti della paura unleashed those colors on the surface world.

Despite the commercial success of Hammer's Dracula and Frankenstein films and American International's Poe films, which had been photographed in color, black-and-white was still the most common palate for horror films at the time I tre volti della paura was produced. In early 1963. Hammer's principal cameraman Jack Asher (1916–91) and Roger Corman's veteran D.P. Floyd Crosby (1899–1985) were both accomplished artists and technicians, and one would be tempted to say that Bava and Ubaldo Terzano had studied their work well, incorporating into their shared arsenal Asher's soft, velvety lighting and propensity for shocks of color, and also Crosby's psychological approach to color—if Bava had not "been there first" with earlier examples like Mio figlio Nerone or the embalming chamber scene of Ercole e la regina di Lidia. Furthermore, neither Asher nor Crosby ever allowed the visual element to dominate unless in the context of a dream, flashback or delirium sequence (as in Corman's Poe films, particularly). Like the contents of a Pandora's Box, Bava released a veritable rainbow of the unexpected—all the colors of the dark—into the waking lives of his characters, as they were made to grapple with the outward manifestations of their inner fears.

Therefore, I tre volti della paura is significant because it innovated a new approach to photographing horror films in color, a method of lighting that seemed to acknowledge in all scenes and situations the presence of the Unknown as well as the Known. It is this technique, moreso than the Gothic monochrome of La maschera del demonio, that is now most commonly recognized as the signature style of Mario Bava, who, with this film, achieved his childhood dream of becoming a great painter. And in so doing, he accomplished something far more prophetic in the grand scheme of things: he made one of the earliest commercial films to emphasize visual gratification over narrative, over logic, even over consecutive storytelling. Quentin Tarantino has credited the American version of the film, Black Sabbath, with inspiring his unorthodox structural approach to his contemporary classic Pulp Fiction (1994). "I decided to write an anthology of film noir stories," he said. "What Mario Bava did for horror films, I would do for film noir."

After I tre volti della paura, Mario Bava put in his bid to continue the H. P. Lovecraft franchise that AIP had begun with Roger Corman's The Haunted Palace, released in August of 1963. The story he was most interested in filming was The Dunwich Horror, which would have allowed him to reprise and improve upon some of the special effects he had devised earlier for Caltiki il mostro immortale. Later in the year, on October 18, The Hollywood Reporter filed a news story announcing that Italian International president Fulvio Lucisano had flown into Los Angeles to meet with Arkoff and Nicholson regarding two upcoming projects: a television biography that would star Vincent Price as Michelangelo, and The Dunwich Horror, which was set to begin filming in Rome in January 1964. A script had been commissioned from Ray Russell (who had written the pleasingly metaphysical The Premature Burial and "X" The Man With X-Ray Eyes for Roger Corman), but the result was not acceptable to its intended star, Boris Karloff—perhaps for reasons having more to do with the thought of spending another winter in Rome than with the script itself. The recuperating Karloff made certain that his next two pictures for AIP would be shot in sunny California: The Comedy of Terrors and Bikini Beach (1964). By the time the next winter rolled around, Karloff was no closer to being happy with the Dunwich script—now retitled Scarlet Friday to accentuate Bava's participation for the American market—but he was bound for Lovecraft's Arkham anyway. The following December would find him in and about Shepperton Studios in Surrey, filming an adaptation of "The Colour Out of Space" eventually titled Die, Monster! Die! (1965). As for Bava, he would make other films for AIP but his next few features would be for other producers.

I tre volti della paura proved to be Bava's last official assignment for Nello Santi's Galatea S.p.A., the company that launched his directorial career in 1960. Galatea had been funded by Santi's wife, Franca Invernizi, the heiress of the Bel Paese cheese fortune, who (according to the late Harriet Medin) divorced the producer of Divorzio all'italiana in the mid-1960s after learning of his affair with actress Daniela Rocca.

Before vanishing from the scene, Galatea produced one last genre film, which includes some special effects highlights that betray Bava's uncredited hand.

29 "I tre volti della paura (Black Sabbath)," Monthly Film Bulletin 31:371, December 1964, 179-80.

30 Peter Cowie, "Black Sabbath" reviewed in Films & Filming, 11:4, January 1965, 32–33.

ITALIAN two-sheet, art by Dante Manno.

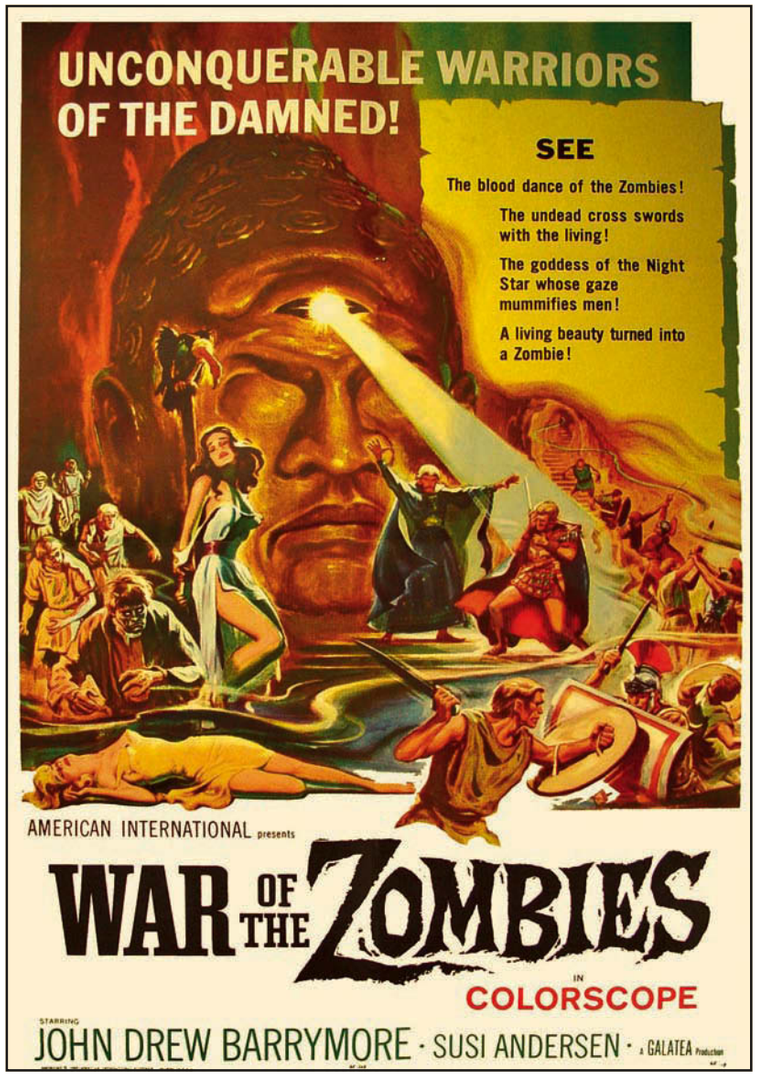
Roma contro Roma

War of the Zombies

GALATEA'S FINAL two productions were both anachronistic gestures to the past glories of Italian cinema. Their final project, the French-Italian co-production Allarme dal cielo/Sky Above Heaven (1965, directed by Yves Ciampi) offered a very thin science fiction premise under cover of a documentary about life aboard an aircraft carrier—an imitation, and perhaps an hommage, to the films of Francesco De Robertis. The company's final thoroughly dramatic offering, Giuseppe Vari's Roma contro Roma, effectively represents the end of the peplum cycle—a victim of the burgeoning "Spaghetti Western" movement—while also celebrating its roots in Italy's historical silent cinema. Even the film's title recalls such early works as Maciste contro Maciste (1923) and Galaor contro Galaor (1924), which Vari saw as a boy.

An army of Roman soldiers are bringing a fabulous treasure, a spoil of battle, back to Rome from Asia Minor when they are attacked in the country of Salmatia by a pack of wild, subhuman creatures. The monsters overcome the soldiers, looting them of their treasure, their gold—everything of value—and branding their flesh with the likeness of a one-eyed divinity. In Rome, the senate (led by an unbilled Andrea Checchi) is outraged by what is apparently a vile breaking of the rules of war by the Salmatians. The centurion Gaius (Ettore Manni) is sent to Salmatia to meet with the consul Lutitius (Mino Doro) about a retaliation.

Truly responsible for the attack on the Romans is Aderbad (John Drew Barrymore), an evil sorcerer who rules over the subhuman creatures and insists upon virginal sacrifices to honor a great cyclopean sculpture representing the goddess Elektra, daughter of Osiris. He also exacts control over the generals of the Salmatian army by demanding offerings of their blood, which he drinks. Only one of the generals, Azer (Philippe Hersent), refuses to participate in the obscene ritual, returning to his encampment. There he meets Gaius and his comrade Satirus, whom have been captured by his soldiers. Now disgusted by the ways of war, he insists the Romans be freed. Continuing toward the palace of Lutitius through a forest, Gaius is smitten by the sight of a beautiful woman, Rhama (Ida Galli), with a face "like ice," walking through the woods as though under a spell. She seems to disappear into thin air, Gaius not noticing that she has passed through a portal secreted in the trunk of a vast oak tree.



When Gaius arrives at the consul's palace, he finds Lutitius an ignoble man, exacting what tributes he can from the local poor and threatening to whip an old man for his insolence. Gaius puts a stop to this, a demonstration of greater power that inspires the consul's young and ambitious wife Tullia (Susy Andersen)—for whom Rhama serves as lady in waiting—to form a deadly infatuation for the centurion. Lutitius is concerned that Gaius will divest him of his power, but Tullia promises her husband that she will do her best to render the centurion docile.

Later, in the woods, Gaius sees Rhama a second time and dares to speak to her. She is under the hypnotic command of Aderbad and confesses to Gaius that her will is not her own; when Gaius admits to being attracted to her, Rhama responds strangely, slapping him and then kissing him, and then cutting an oracular design into his forearm. He pursues her as she leaves and, this time, sees her disappear into the trunk of an immense oak tree; he follows her into the subterranean lair of Aderbad—who anticipates his visit and drops a steel cage on him. Aderbad reveals that Rhama is a high priestess of the Goddess to whom he is High Priest. He boasts of having bought Lutitius with the Salmatian treasure, and demonstrates his unimaginable power by drinking blood and reviving the corpse of a dead Roman soldier. He summons a beam from the jeweled orb of the Goddess, which strips the flesh from the soldier and leaves him a skeleton. When the same ray is turned on Gaius, he finds himself impervious to its force—the symbol cut into his arm protects him!

Aderbad grants Tullia her wish for control by promising her Gaius, and he gives her a voodoo doll that she may use to gain the upper hand over the centurion, should she need it. Meanwhile, Rhama has freed Gaius and he takes her to Azer's camp and is given the Salmatian general's promise that he will look after her. Gaius then goes to Lutitius and strips him of his authority, demanding that he return to Rome and confess his crimes before the Senate. Suddenly, Lutitius' second-in-command Sirion (Ivano Staccioli) hurls a dagger into the consul's back . . . Tullia appears and smiles . . . and then calls for the guards, accusing Gaius of murder.

The Roman general Lucilius arrives to take charge. Gaius explains what is going on, but his story is so far-fetched that it is easier for him to accept the word of Tullia. He demands that Gaius disarm and submit to arrest. As Gaius is sent to prison in a Roman jail, Aderbad prepares his ultimate bid for power by weakening Rome's military strength with snow and turning things even colder by reviving Rome's own military dead to rise up from their burial places and fight against their homeland on behalf of the Goddess. As the living cross swords with the dead, Gaius is freed and rides out to Aderbad's lair for a final confrontation. Aderbad is ready and thwarts him with the protections of black magic, until Gaius remembers Rhama's instruction about the power of the Goddess residing in her jeweled eye. Gaius shatters the jewel and Aderbad is stricken blind. The sorcerer stabs Tullia to death in his confusion, soon perishing himself. The army of ghosts is likewise vanquished.

Gaius finds Rhama on the battlefield, caring for the wounded Satirus. As Lucilius arrives and commends Gaius for his great service to Rome, the centurion enfolds Rhama in his arms.

US one-sheet, art by Reynold Brown.

Roma contro Roma is a difficult film to gauge critically, at least from its English language versions. The original English export print, titled Rome Against Rome, was dubbed under the direction of actor Tony Russel (later the president of the English Language Dubbers Association [ELDA]), who dubbed the roles of Gaius and Aderbad. One of Russel's earliest jobs of this sort, the soundtrack is at times a chaotic mess, with the early Senate meeting (which explains the basic setup) a disorienting hodge-podge—not least of all because we find an uncredited Andrea Checchi presiding over it. To make matters worse, the film was cut for foreign release, with the original 110-minute film cut to 97 minutes for its British release as Rome Against Rome (which features the curious transition cut of a scene set in Rome followed by a scene preceded by the title card designation "Rome") and further cut to 86 minutes for its American AIP release as War of the Zombies.

For all its rough handling, the film collects some compelling ingredients, notably John Drew Barrymore's trippy performance as the wicked Aderbad and the even more psychedelic handling of the undead army sequences, which are awash in optical swirls and whorls of blue, red, white, black and

Roma contro Roma

"Rome Against Rome"
Filmed at Cinecittà and on location
Fall 1963
First released: February 13, 1964
Eastmancolor, Totalscope, 2.35:1, 110 minutes

Production: Galatea (Milan). Distributor: Cineriz

Canada: War of the Zombies, Astral Films, 1965
UK: War of the Zombies, Panton Film Distributors Ltd., 12/65, 96m 43s.
DVD: Rome Against Rome, 82m
US: War of the Zombies, American International Pictures, 3/65, "Colorscope," 93m. TV: Night Star—Goddess of Elektra (AIP-TV) violet. The picture also benefits from the customarily superb art direction of Giorgio Giovannini, who brings a sense of Flavio Mogherini splendor to the lair of Aderbad, dominated as it is by the immense one-eyed visage of the Goddess. In its formal precision and compositional sense, Gábor Pogány's camerawork confirms his standing as the true visual artisan behind Freda's Spartaco and Teodora, though the film's sense of color is very much unlike him. In its engorged sense of color gel lighting, Roma contro Roma suggests that either Pogány was following the examples of Bava's work in the genre, or that Bava was present onset as an uncredited lighting director. Bava's influence doesn't end with the lighting; it can also be felt on the level of atmosphere, with low rolling fog often introduced (and sometimes treated with throbbing color) to imbue Pogány's static compositions with a sense of otherworldly life.

BAVA's glass matte of the enormous tree concealing the entrance to Aderbad's domain.

The film's special effects are credited to Ugo Amadoro, a former assistant director to Carlo Campogalliani and Vittorio De Sica, who was credited as an "artistic consultant" on the short omnibus film Il cinema di meraviglie (1945, directed in part by Pietro Francisci). That film featured some animation, so it is possible that Amadoro was responsible for the inventive clay animation transformation effects in Anton Giulio Majano's Seddok (L'erede di Satana)/Atom Age Vampire (1960)—his only prior special effects credit, and a film often mistaken for a work by Mario Bava. As usual, there are special effects in Roma contro Roma that would not been Bava's particular province (fire effects and pyrotechnics, for example), but the film also features some optical effects that don't quite look like his work (e.g., the skeletonizing of the soldier when the ray of the Goddess is turned on him). Bava's contributions to the film are, as always, distinctive. These include a magnificent glass matte painting of the ancient oak tree concealing the entrance to Aderbad's domain (shown in daylight and by night, it recalls the enormous tree trunk dominating the setting of the lovers' ceremonial sacrifice in Gli invasori); various hanging maquettes and glass paintings of ancient Roman skylines; a trick shot of dozens and dozens of soldiers galloping across an ancient Roman bridge; and, of course, the ghostly apparitions of the Roman dead. This last effect is particularly like Bava's work as the silently charging horses of the dead recall the spectral coach of La maschera del demonio, while the execution of the transparency effect itself looks forward to Bava's handling of the scene of Ulysses meeting the ghost of his dead mother in Odissea/The Adventures of Ulysses (1968).

IDA GALLI, John Drew Barrymore, and Susy Andersen adorn a resplendently atmospheric set in ROMA CONTRO ROMA.

With the dissolution of Galatea, an era came to an end, as Mario Bava had always warned the younger members of his crew would happen. Nello Santi stayed in the business, working for a while as an independent producer. His first endeavor was Giuseppe De Santis' memorable WWII drama Italiani brava gente/Attack and Retreat in 1965, but it stood alone until Santi briefly returned to producing with Mario Caiano's fine giallo thriller L'occhio nel labirinto/Eye in the Labyrinth (1971). He became the president of Cinecittà in 1972, a position he held until 1977. From 1982–89, he worked as an active partner at Cinefin, a television production company. After a long and undisclosed illness, Lionello "Nello" Santi—the man who made Mario Bava a director—passed away on December 10, 1995.

ORIGINAL art by Mario Piovano used in the Italian poster campaign for LA FRUSTA E IL CORPO.

La frusta e il corpo

The Whip and the Body

MARIO BAVA'S NEXT feature, La frusta e il corpo, was produced under circumstances quite different to those of I tre volti della paura or any other picture he had directed thus far. The project was conceived, scripted, and tentatively cast—long before Bava was approached to participate—by a consortium of friends that included producers Luciano Martino and Elio Scardamaglia, veteran screenwriter Ugo Guerra, and screenwriter Ernesto Gastaldi, who (like Martino) had been one of Guerra's former students from the Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografia. La frusta e il corpo is one of Bava's finest films, and certainly his most romantic, but before his specific contribution to the film can be discussed, it is essential to discuss in greater detail the background of Ernesto Gastaldi, who is in many ways the film's true auteur.

The first Italian screenwriter to specialize in horror films and thrillers, Ernesto Gastaldi was born on September 30, 1934, in Graglia, Vercelli. As mentioned earlier, his CSC graduate film, La strada che portana lontano ("The Road to a Distant Door," 1954)—shot without sound and dubbed "live" from behind the screen at each screening—was the first Italian film to be directly inspired by the Mondadori giallo paperback thrillers. At the age of 26, Gastaldi was hired to script L'amante del vampiro/The Vampire and the Ballerina, filmed at the end of 1959 under the direction of Renato Polselli. Released on May 23, 1960, it became the first Italian-made horror film to achieve boxoffice success. A quick and imaginative scenarist, Gastaldi proceeded to master all popular movie genres: horror, pepla, Western, fantascienza, espionage, and thrillers. In just a couple of years, he managed to rack up an impressive list of cult cinema credits, including Paolo Heusch's Lycanthropus/Werewolf in a Girl's Dormitory (1961), Renato Polselli's Il mostro dell'opera/The Vampire of the Opera (1961), Riccardo Freda's L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock/The Horrible Dr. Hichcock (1962), and as previously discussed, Alberto de Martino's Perseo l'invincibile (1963).

SCREENWRITER Ernesto Gastaldi photographed during a recent Hawaiian vacation.

Gastaldi broke into the Italian film industry the way all screenwriters of the period did: by ghost-writing scripts for established, overextended screenwriters. In Gastaldi's case, his earliest scripts were signed by his mentor (and former CSC instructor), Ugo Guerra. This so-called "black" period lasted for a few years, after which he began to share screen credit with Guerra for scripts he had actually written in their entirety. La frusta e il corpo was written during this early period, and Gastaldi was obliged to share credit for his work with Guerra and Luciano Martino, neither of whom actually wrote anything.

"I was the sole author of the script," Gastaldi says of La frusta e il corpo, "but Luciano wanted his name to appear in the credits, as well. I wrote a lot of films for Luciano and many times he shared credit as co-writer. Actually, we would speak about the story for one or two days, after which I wrote the first draft. Then he would read it and make his observations. If I agreed with him, I would make the changes as needed."

La frusta e il corpo was conceived as a faux British horror film, a deliberate imitation of the English/American style, to be produced exclusively for the Italian and continental market. No overseas distribution was seriously considered in advance of production, because (in an inversion of the Italian reception of I vampiri in 1957), the producers felt that British and American audiences would laugh at a film of such brazenly falsified nationality.

"In those days," Gastaldi explains, "the American market wasn't so important for us. It was easy to earn back our investment with the Italian market only." This is quite understandable considering that (according to Gastaldi), the entire production budget of La frusta e il corpo amounted to less than 150 million lire (in today's terms, about 200 million lire)—which translates, incredibly, to roughly $94,000 American at the time, with a contemporary value of just under $125,000. It's a testament to Bava's genius that the final result suggests he had many times that amount at his disposal.

To effect a counterfeit British appearance, Martino decided that all of the Italians working on the picture would be credited with English pseudonyms. "Italian producers were absolutely sure that English names were the best way to ensure the success of this kind of movie," Gastaldi remembers. "I once wrote a very good thriller script located in Rome and all the producers said to me, 'In Rome, it's so unbelievable . . . we'll set it in London!'"

Consequently, the pseudonymous script of La frusta e il corpo (never mind the Italian title!) was credited to Robert Hugo (Guerra), Martin Hardy (Martino), and Julian (misspelled onscreen as "Julyan") Berry (Gastaldi). Gastaldi explains his choice of alias: "In 1957, I wrote my first science fiction novel and my publisher wanted an English name on the cover page. At the time, I was sharing a little apartment with an Anglo-Italian named Julian Birri, who worked as an advertising copywriter. As a joke, I used his name, because the book made some sly uses of some advertising slogans he had dreamed up. Well, it so happened that he almost lost his job, because his boss refused to believe that he wasn't the real author! 'Martin Hardy' was another joke, because Luciano Martino was fat and robusto [like Oliver Hardy], but that name wasn't my idea."

Although he wasn't permitted to use his own name, Gastaldi was otherwise granted free rein with his scenario. His producers made only one provisional request: "They showed me an Italian print of [Roger Corman's] Pit and the Pendulum before I started writing it. 'Give us something like this,' they said. In those happier days of the Italian cinema, it could happen that a producer called you and said, 'Look, my wife bought a wonderful bag made of crocodile skin . . . Why don't you write a nice script about crocodiles?'"

Released in Italy in early 1963, Corman's Il pozzo e il pendolo was an enormous hit—proving that there now existed an avid local market for the right kind of horror film. Its great success would inspire several attempts to recapture its winning formula among Italian producers, much as Hammer's Dracula il vampiro (Horror of Dracula) had done in 1960. The story of a sweet-natured Spanish nobleman

La frusta e il corpo

"The Whip and the Body"
Working titles: La lama nel corpo, Spectral
Filmed on location
May – July 1963
First released: August 29, 1963
Technicolor, 1.85:1, 92 minutes

Production: Francinor-PIP (Paris), Vox Film, Leone Film (Rome). Producer: John Oscar [Elio Scardamaglia]. Director: John M. Old [Mario Bava]. Assistant director: Julyan Berry [Ernesto Gastaldi]. Screenplay: Julyan Berry, Robert Hugo [Ugo Guerra], and Martin Hardy [Luciano Martino]. Director of photography: David Hamilton [Ubaldo Terzano]. Art direction: Dick Grey [Ottavio Scotti]. Set decoration: Gus Marrow [Riccardo Dominici]. Wardrobe: Peg Fax [Anna-Maria Palleri]. Makeup: Frank Field [Franco Freda]. Editor: Bob King [Roberto Cinquini]. Music: Jim Murphy [Carlo Rustichelli]. Distributor: Titanus.

Daliah Lavi (Nevenka), Christopher Lee (Kurt Menliff), Tony Kendall [Luciano Stella] (Christian Menliff), Isli Oberon [Ida Galli] (Katia), Harriet White Medin (Georgia), Dean Ardow [Gustavo De Nardo] (Count Vladimir Menliff), Alan Collins [Luciano Pigozzi] (Losat), Jacques Herlin (priest).

Additional credits: English version directed by Mel Welles. Dubbing cast: Dan Sturkie (Kurt), Carolyn De Fonseca (Nevenka), Ted Rusoff (Christian), Mel Welles (Count Vladimir).

Belgium: Het Gegeseld Lichaam, Cosmopolis Films
Canada: The Whip and the Flesh, Cinépix Film Properties Inc., 1967
Denmark: Pisken og Kroppen, 11/26/64
France: Le Corps et le Fouet, Les Films Marbeauf, 1/26/66, 85m
Germany: Der Dämon und die Jungfrau, "The Demon and the Virgin," Constantin Film, 6/9/67, 86m; Der Mörder von Schloss Menliff, "The Murderer of Castle Menliff," TV
UK: Night Is the Phantom, Regal International Films, 2/65, 77m 35s, Certificate "X," passed with cuts [originally 78m 5s]
US: What, Futuramic Releasing, 4/65, 86m. TV: Thunderbird Films, 5/65, 78m

(Vincent Price) whose sanity is undone by ghostly hauntings staged by a duplicitous wife (Barbara Steele) who has faked her own death, prompting him to assume the twisted personality of his own dead father, the chief torturer of the Spanish Inquisition, Pit and the Pendulum was not an Italian film—not in nationality, nor in terms of its fictional setting. Nevertheless, many aspects of the Richard Matheson-scripted film—its stormy seaside setting, its historic dislocation from the present and recent past, its marital intrigue, the presence of Barbara Steele in her first horror film since La maschera del demonio—seem archetypally Italian in retrospect. The film resonated with Italian audiences, and its influence on the Italian horror film, particularly in terms of linking deranged adult behavior to specific childhood traumas, would be profound. Alfred Hitchcock may have been the first to open this door in Spellbound (1945), with Gregory Peck's flashback to an accidental childhood murder, but Corman's film became the catalyst behind decades of similarly haunted characters in Italian horror, including John Harrington (Stephen Forsyth) in Bava's Il rosso segno della follia/Hatchet for the Honeymoon (1970) and the killer of Dario Argento's Profondo rosso/Deep Red (1975), whose trauma is shown as a pre-credits sequence and left unexplained until late in the picture, giving the viewer only time enough to be shocked by it, and to examine it incompletely, before the continuing narrative pushes it into the viewer's subconscious, where it belongs. Even Steele's spectral calling of "Nicholas . . . Nicholas" would demonstrate its lasting grip by being reprised, decades later, by Piper Laurie in Argento's 1993 film Trauma.

That the Italian horror film was so deeply influenced by Corman's movie is fascinating because, in some ways, Pit and the Pendulum was America's response to the Italian horror film: Barbara Steele was cast in the picture owing to AIP's great success with Bava's Black Sunday.

After screening Il pozzo e il pendolo, Ernesto Gastaldi proceeded to work.

ITALIAN fotobusta for Roger Corman's influential PIT AND THE PENDULUM.

He signed his contract to write the picture on December 13, 1962, and delivered the finished script—entitled La lama nel corpo ("The Knife in the Body")—five weeks later, on January 31, 1963.

Synopsis

Nineteenth century, Russia.[1] Shadows of guilt and remorse hang over the seaside manor of Count Vladimir Menliff. The family maid, Georgia, weeps over an enshrined ancestral dagger used by her daughter Tania, years before, to commit suicide after being seduced and abandoned by the Count's eldest son, Kurt. Georgia swears that she will not rest until she sees the dagger plunged in his throat. Under pressure from the Count, his youngest son Christian has agreed to marry Nevenka—another young woman formerly abused by Kurt—despite his avowed love for Katia, a jealous cousin residing in the manor.

Banished from the manor since Tania's suicide, Kurt returns unannounced to insincerely congratulate the betrothed couple and ask forgiveness. Finding his relatives hostile to his return, Kurt follows Nevenka to the beach, where they resume their sado-masochistic affair with a lusty flogging. Kurt returns alone to the manor. While his family is searching for Nevenka, who has not come back, Kurt is beckoned by a female voice—Nevenka's? Tania's? Georgia's?—to a room, where he is stabbed to death by an unseen assailant hiding behind a curtain. The comatose Nevenka is later found outdoors by the family domestic Losat, not far from the beach, her clothing whipped to shreds. After seeing her safely back to the castle, the others find Kurt dead on the floor of his room, a knife sunk deep in his throat. Georgia breaks down, praying to God in gratitude for His avenging of her daughter's mistreatment.

After Kurt's burial, Christian admits to his father that he suspects him of the murder, an accusation that angers the ailing Count. That night, Nevenka is haunted by whipping sounds that lure her to Kurt's room, where she discovers sheeted furniture and an open window, where storm winds are causing a vine to lash in and out of the room. Overheard stories of lights in the windows of the family crypt excite Nevenka's imagination and, one night at the piano, she sees an apparition of Kurt at the window, his throat swathed in a bloody bandage. He comes to her room that night in muddy boots and rips her nightgown in prelude to another flogging, but Christian finds Nevenka alone when he races to her bedside in answer to her cries.

Nevenka later overhears Christian and Katia professing their love for one another and feels jealousy and anger, provoking another visitation from Kurt. She threatens to call Christian and Kurt dares her: "Call him—and tell him you've always been mine!" The next morning, Count Vladimir is found stabbed to death in his bed, an act which Nevenka balefully describes as Kurt's "revenge." The dagger is missing from the place where Losat concealed it, but Georgia finds it hidden under Katia's mattress. Katia denies killing the Count so that she and Christian might marry. Nevenka overhears this exchange, and notifies her fiance, who refuses to believe it and accuses her of having been in love with Kurt. She insists that she felt only hate for him, and runs away.

1 This according to Ernesto Gastaldi: the film itself specifies neither the time nor place of the story it tells.

CHRISTOPHER LEE and Daliah Lavi await direction from Mario Bava as he plans the flogging scene on the beach at Tor Caldara. This was the first photograph of Bava to appear in genre film magazines, first in MIDI-MINUIT FANTASTIQUE and then in CASTLE OF FRANKENSTEIN.

That night, a scream leads Christian and Losat to the family crypt, where Nevenka is found inside Kurt's tomb, unconscious, her clothing once again in tatters. Given this evidence, Christian begins to believe that—somehow—Kurt must still be alive and hiding somewhere in the manor house. To put their suspicions to rest, Christian decides to open Kurt's coffin, which is found to contain his brother's decomposing body. Noticing a caped silhouette observing the exhumation from a distance, Christian pursues the phantom figure, who laughs like his dead brother and leads him to Kurt's old room. There he finds a pair of empty muddied boots and is attacked in the dark by a maddened, dagger-wielding Nevenka. After stabbing Christian, Nevenka races back to the crypt through a secret passageway and sees Kurt's burning corpse. His ghost reappears to her and extends an invitation to "come away with me." Hysterical, she finally breaks down and confesses her love while poising the dagger behind his neck to join them in death once and for all. With Losat, a wounded Christian returns in time to see Nevenka embrace the empty air where she perceives Kurt and plunge the dagger one last time—into herself. As she breathes her last, Christian weeps, "Let's hope she's free of him forever."

Preproduction & Cast

The title of the film remained La lama nel corpo until June 13, when according to a dated contract, it was changed to the "more English-sounding" Spectral.[2] Gastaldi borrowed the new title from a ghost story published by Mondadori, which producer Luigi Carpentieri had given him as inspiration while he was scripting L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock in 1962. Spectral was later changed, presumably to avoid confusion with Riccardo Freda's Lo spettro/The Ghost, which was released in February 1963—and produced by none other than Luigi Carpentieri!

Mario Bava joined the production shortly after the completion of I tre volti della paura, in March or April of 1963. "Bava was chosen as director well after the script was finished," Gastaldi confirms. "He was invited to direct by Ugo Guerra; they were good friends. I remember Ugo saying, 'Mario can be both photographer and director. That will be convenient for us.'" As a visitor to the location shooting of La battaglia di Maratona in the summer of 1959, Gastaldi had been impressed by Bava's facility with in-camera effects, and he was delighted by the news of his hiring; he looked forward to collaborating with Italy's greatest horror director on another draft of the script. Unfortunately, Bava would disappoint his screenwriter in this regard.

"In the horror genre, Bava was the best," appraises Gastaldi. "The second best was Freda, and the third was Antonio Margheriti. And all three of them were more concerned with images than with characters and stories! I had very few meetings with Bava, because, while Mario was a really good director—his images were wonderful, his special effects were the best of their time, and he also had a gift for suspense—he wasn't at all interested in writing."

Despite the lack of a formalized collaboration on the script, Bava had sufficient respect for Gastaldi's writing to film his script almost exactly as it was written. "Bava didn't make any changes to the dialogue, the plot, or the characters," notes Gastaldi. "He changed some special effects described in the script, but he didn't require my approval for this, nor anyone else's, because he was a master of such things."

Though Bava had experienced worldwide success and acclaim as the director of La maschera del demonio, and had worked with such international stars of horror as Boris Karloff and Christopher Lee, he was well aware that he had been hired to work incognito on a film aimed squarely at the Italian market. In order to perpetuate the illusion of a British production for a limited, provincial audience, even he was obliged to work pseudonymously. "Bava had to play along like the rest of us," Gastaldi says. "His real name was unacceptable to the Italian distributors." He selected the unlikely alias John M. Old, which (according to Lamberto Bava) Mario dreamed up when Luciano Martino asked him to choose "an old American name." (Bava himself later claimed to have settled on this moniker "because I already felt old when I was 40" but he was, in fact, nearing 50.) The beard might have passed muster with Italian matinee crowds of the day, but in America, even John Del Vecchio would have been a more convincing "old American name."

Regardless of his official anonymity, the hiring of Mario Bava helped to raise La frusta e il corpo above and beyond its producers' initial humble plans. Immediately, he attracted a better class of talent to the picture. According to a surviving production contract between Francinor and Vox, Gianni Garko and Giulia Rubini were originally cast in the supporting roles of Christian and Katia, but when Bava signed on as director, they were promptly replaced by Luciano Stella and Ida Galli (Persephone in Ercole al centro della terra), who would be credited, respectively, as "Tony Kendall" and "Isli Oberon." After completing La frusta, Galli began to work in Spain, where she would make many pictures during the next two decades. For these productions, she often adopted the nom d'ecran "Evelyn Stewart." She appeared mostly in Spaghetti (and Paella) Westerns during the remainder of the 1960s, before becoming the sacrificial lamb of such post-Argento gialli as Michele Lupo's Concerto per pistola solista/The Weekend Murders (1970) and Lucio Fulci's Sette notti in nero/The Psychic (1977).

Tony Kendall was born Luciano Stella in Rome on August 22, 1936. He came to acting through a career in modelling and made his first movies in 1957. The highlights of his career include the interesting horror thriller La jena di Londra/The Hyena of London (1964), several "Kommissar X" spy thrillers, El Ataque de los Muertos sin Ojos/Return of the Evil Dead (1973, the second of Amando de Ossorio's "Blind Dead" series), the apocalyptic Paul Naschy thriller Planeto Ciego/People That Own the Dark (1975), and another horror film for Ossorio, Las Garras de Lorelei/Grasp of the Lorelei a.k.a. When the Screaming Starts! (1976). He continues to work in films today, a recent example being Damiano Damiani's Alex l'ariete (2000), scripted by Reazione a catena screenwriter Dardano Sacchetti.

MARIO BAVA, Ida Galli, and Daliah Lavi waiting to film Kurt's funeral scene.

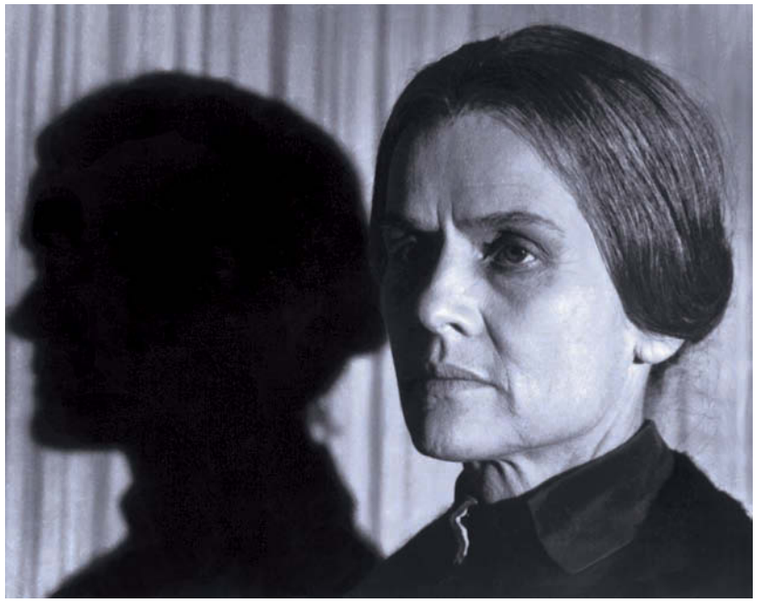
Harriet White Medin, cast as the housekeeper Georgia, had won Bava over with her brief performance in I tre volti della paura, and had also made an impression as sinister housekeepers in Riccardo Freda's L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock and Lo spettro, which had since premiered on Italian screens. Medin recalls that the movie was still being called La lama nel corpo ("Oh! Dreadful title!") at the time she joined the company. (She would also appear in the 1966 movie of that name.) As an American-born actress fluent in Italian, who was also an experienced dialogue coach, Medin was worth her weight in gold to any Italian production trying to fake its nationality, as the two Freda films had also done. "I got the role because I was an English-speaking actress," she explained unaffectedly. "I was often told by the Italians that my Boston accent made my brand of spoken English sound more English than American."



Bava was also likely responsible for the casting of Gustavo De Nardo (as Count Menliff), who had made a small, unbilled appearance in La ragazza che sapeva troppo, and who would eventually appear in more Bava films than any other actor. Apparently determined to have his participation known one way or another, De Nardo was billed in La frusta e il corpo as Dean Ardow.

Christopher Lee—a vital ingredient in creating the illusion of a British

2 In 1966, Gastaldi would use the rejected title on another script for producer Elio Scardamaglia; in this later incarnation, La lama nel corpo became a turn-of-the-century giallo, directed by "Michael Hamilton" (Lionello De Felice) and known in English-speaking countries as The Murder Clinic.

CHRISTIAN ("Tony Kendall" a.k.a. Luciano Stella) comforts his true love Katia ("Isli Oberon" a.k.a. Ida Galli).

HARRIET WHITE MEDIN as she appeared in L'ORRIBILE SEGRETO DEL DR. HICHCOCK, the first of her many "sinister housekeeper" roles.

horror picture—had initially turned down the role of Kurt Menliff when first approached by Martino's company, but changed his tune when Bava came aboard. "He wasn't free when the project started," recalls Gastaldi, "but afterwards, he became free. His name helped the producers to secure a good minimum guarantee from the distributors. Maybe Bava helped [the producers] to contact him." Lee had greatly enjoyed working with Bava on Ercole al centro della terra, and he looked forward to their second collaboration with a sense of excitement. He grew even more excited when he found out who his leading lady would be.

The casting of the lead role of Nevenka would be critical to the film's success, and the producers' first choice for the role was almost certainly Barbara Steele—not because of the international success she had with Bava's La maschera del demonio, but because she was British, had been prominently featured in Pit and the Pendulum, and was currently living and working in Rome. However, if the producers approached Steele through her agency, they would have been informed that the actress—who had just played a memorable, if marginal, role in Federico Fellini's Otto e mezzo/8½—was no longer accepting roles in horror movies.

Years later, Bava voiced an opinion that may support this speculation: "Barbara Steele had the perfect face for my films, but Fellini destroyed her. As a result of her role in Otto e mezzo, she got it into her head that she would appear only in intellectual films, but no one offered them to her."[3] In a subsequent interview, he allowed still more bitterness to show when he characterized the actress as he had observed her on the Via Veneto, "always sitting there, with her glasses and intellectual book, side by side with [Alberto] Moravia." After Otto e mezzo, Steele did not make another horror film until Mario Caiano's L'Amante d'oltre-tomba/Nightmare Castle (1965).

Fortunately, Steele was not the only option. Some months before La frusta e il corpo entered preproduction, Luciano Martino's Vox Film had coproduced (with Titanus) the directorial debut of Fellini's longtime assistant director, Brunello Rondi. Entitled Il demonio (filmed 1962, released 1964), it was based on the true story of a young Italian peasant girl whose unruly behavior, aggravated by her abandonment by a man (Frank Wolff) who took sexual advantage of her, was interpreted by superstitious locals as signs of demonic possession.[4] Giving an extraordinary, feral performance in the lead role of this pseudo-documentary, black-and-white film was Israeli actress Daliah Lavi, who first came to Rome in 1962 to play a supporting role in Vincente Minnelli's Two Weeks in Another Town.

Lavi (the name is accented on its second syllable) was born Daliah Lewinbook (not "Levenbuch," as reported in many sources) in the kibbutz-like community of Shavei Zion, Israel, on October 12, 1942. A self-described "wild child," Daliah (and other neighborhood children) spent the summer of 1953 stealing swims in the pool at The Dolphin House, a local hotel, where the cast of the Hollywood film The Juggler happened to be staying. When the hotel staff was on the point of having the children thrown out, the film's cast and crew—including actors Kirk Douglas, John Banner, and Alf Kjellin—interceded on their behalf, and Daliah was adopted by the production as a kind of mascot. As the filming ended, the crew learned of Daliah's wish to become a dancer and arranged for her a scholarship to study dance at the Royal Opera in Stockholm. When high blood pressure forced her to surrender her dream of becoming a ballerina, she began modelling and married her first husband, a French clothier, who had acquaintances in the French film community. After making several films in France for the likes of Abel Gance and Michel Boisrond, she divorced her husband and went to Rome, where she was discovered on the Via Veneto and invited to appear in Two Weeks in Another Town, in which she was cast as the lover of her former mentor, Kirk Douglas. She kept her true identity a secret from the actor until the wrap party for the Italian unit, where Douglas was staggered by the revelation of how much that 1953 scholarship had made possible in the life of little Daliah Lewinbook.

Lavi accompanied the production back to Hollywood for additional studio photography, but despite the urgings of her co-stars, she chose not to stay. "I hated Hollywood," she says. "I was very unhappy there. No one walks in the streets in Hollywood; everyone sits in their own houses, stays in their own cliques. There's no life! So I went back to Italy—it was the height of Rome in those days. Everyone was coming there to make movies—Cleopatra, all those Westerns with Clint Eastwood—the studios were always packed! Rome was bustling with life. No one ever went to sleep there! The Via Veneto was the center of everything; it later moved away from there, but at the time, you could see people sitting there with a cup of coffee—for seven hours! For a young person, it was Heaven."

After making Il demonio, Lavi was cast opposite Peter O'Toole in Richard Brooks' Lord Jim, which would finally be released in 1965, after more than two years in the making. For her part, Lavi spent seven months in Cambodia playing the role of "The Girl" (which would later land her the cover of The Saturday Evening Post), after which she followed the crew back to London and fell in love with the film's assistant director, John Sullivan. It was in London that she received a call from Vox Film inviting her to play Nevenka in La frusta e il corpo. Luciano Martino, who had co-produced Il demonio, may have been persuaded to use Lavi again by the attention she was receiving from Lord Jim, but consciously or unconsciously, he may have also understood that Nevenka and the girl in Il demonio were essentially the same character—women who inflict pain on themselves to sustain the pain inflicted on them by lost loves.

DALIAH LAVI sees nearly eye-to-eye with 6' 6" leading man, Christopher Lee.

Lavi accepted Martino's invitation, attracted to the character of Nevenka and also to the opportunity to act opposite Christopher Lee, whom she and Sullivan had met at some film circle parties in London.

"We were not great friends, but we had met him and his wife at some parties," Lavi recalls. "He was a very nice man, very well-educated, very well-read. He spoke beautifully. I could never understand why he didn't play more leading roles as a lover; he was a very handsome man and had the look of a real aristocrat—the way he walks and talks and uses his hands. He was like a real lord, which really impressed me, coming from a kibbutz!" Lavi underestimates her own noble bearing, instilled in her by ballet training, which makes the co-stars look very well-paired onscreen.

Lee was equally delighted with Lavi's casting and clearly relished this rare opportunity to play a romantic role opposite one of the world's most glamorous actresses. At the time of filming, his wife Gitte was pregnant with their first and only child, Christina, and reportedly a little nervous about the erotically charged love scenes in which her husband would be participating. "She had nothing to worry about," chuckles Lavi, who remembers the production today mostly as a series of flights (and waits for flights) in and out of Rome, back to London, where she spent every weekend with her fiance.

Another important addition to the cast was Luciano Pigozzi—"the Italian Peter Lorre"—who, for the first time ever, was credited as "Alan Collins," a screen name he would use for the rest of his career. Born in Rome on January 10, 1927, Pigozzi made his acting debut in Alberto Lattuada's Scuola elementare ("Elementary School," 1954), in which he played a minor supporting role as a teacher. After an intermediary role in Roberto Rossellini's Il Generale della Rovere (1959), he received his first major supporting role as the Nazi soldier whom Sophia Loren calls "Scimmioto" ("Monkeyface") in Vittorio De Sica's Oscar-winning adaptation of Alberto Moravia's La ciociara/Two Women (1960). Pigozzi's striking resemblance to Hungarian actor Peter Lorre was first exploited in the film Lycanthropus/Werewolf in a Girl's Dormitory (1961), also written by Ernesto Gastaldi and directed by La morte viene dallo spazio's Paolo Heusch under the name "Richard Benson." In this film, Pigozzi played Walter, the groundskeeper at a correctional institution for young women who spies on the student body and blackmails them into sexual assignations. Pigozzi's large eyes often got him cast as a Peeping Tom, but his character of the lame and innocent Losat in La frusta e il corpo is one of his best and most sympathetic portrayals.

"Bava contacted me through my agent," Pigozzi explains. "He found me in a directory of character actors, called up and said, 'I want this guy.' When we spoke, he asked me which was the first film I made that was important, I told him, and he went away to watch it. After he saw it, he called again and told me, 'I like you very much, so now you're going to come and work with us. Go to the tailor, go to the makeup . . .' In time, we became friends. Every day after lunch we would sit together and play cards—bazzica scopa!—but I always let Bava win . . . If he didn't win, I thought maybe he wouldn't hire me again!"

Cast as the bearded priest presiding over the funeral of Kurt Menliff was French actor Jacques Herlin. Born in Toulon in 1927, Herlin was discovered by the comedian Pierre Fresnay and played his first roles on

3 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

4 Though it was filmed before La frusta e il corpo in the early winter months of 1962, Il demonio encountered censorship problems that held it back from release in Italy until January 1964.

KATIA is startled by the surprise appearance of Losat (Luciano Pigozzi).

the French stage. In the early 1960s, he travelled to Italy with a touring company of Eugene Ionesco's Tueurs sans gages, and while in Rome, caught the eye of some casting directors. In addition to La frusta e il corpo, he appeared in another Leone Film co-production of 1963: Michele Lupo's Maciste l'eroe piu grande del mondo/Goliath and the Sins of Babylon. Herlin's most visible roles occur in Elio Petri's La decima vittima (1966, in which he addresses the audience at the beginning of the film, explaining the rules of "The Big Hunt") and in Roberto Montero's Le due facce del dollaro/Two Sides of the Dollar (1967, in which he is billed directly below star "Monty Greenwood" [Maurice Poli] and cast as a gold-crazed mathematics professor). His late '60s/early '70s work was primarily in Westerns, his name appearing near the bottom of the cast lists of Giorgio Ferroni's Per pochi dollari ancora/Fort Yuma Gold (1966), Mario Caiano's Adios, hombre (1966), Tinto Brass' Yankee, l'Americano/Yankee (1967), and others. After playing the Pharaoh's magician in the miniseries Moses the Lawgiver (1975, for which Mario Bava designed the special effects), Herlin left Rome when the Italian cinema crisis of the 1980s compelled him to relocate to Paris in 1982. When interviewed in 1997 by French writer Pascal Françaix, Herlin had no recollection of his day's work for Mario Bava in La frusta e il corpo.

Production & Special Effects

Filmed during an unseasonably cool Roman summer, La frusta e il corpo had a shooting schedule of exactly seven weeks—six for production, and the final week devoted to special effects photography. Most of the interior scenes were filmed in an actual castello, a disused property which—with different wallpaper and furnishings—had also provided the interiors for the Gastaldi-scripted Lycanthropus, two years earlier. [5]

"The castle was a ruins that was not nearly so beautiful or as comfortable as it looks in the movie," recalls Daliah Lavi. "The furniture that you see was only put in for the scenes we did; I don't remember the castle having any furniture of its own, at all. Everything there was a prop, and the building itself was very cold."

Some interior scenes were filmed on sets in a studio, notably those in the father's bedroom with its trick fireplace, and in the family crypt. Given the unseasonably cool weather, the cast did not object at all to wearing heavy period clothing, none of which was made expressly for the picture. Instead, everything was culled from various Italian wardrobe departments and had seen service before in dozens of other movies set in different countries and historical eras. One of the fascinating aspects of the film is its ambiguity of time and place; it might all exist in a dream. Gastaldi wrote the film with a 19th century setting in mind, but as he says, "Bava (or maybe it was one of the producers, I can't remember) preferred to be unspecific. Someone said, 'No time, no place means no problems about what kind of castle, dresses, etc.'" Indeed, while Nevenka's name conveys the flavor of Russia, the funereal garb she wears to Kurt's funeral looks Spanish, yet more than one critic has commented on the film's visual debt to the paintings of Thomas Gainsborough and the writings of Emily Brönte. The family name of Menliff is also difficult to assign a place in reality; an Internet search for the name yields only assorted references to La frusta e il corpo.

The beach exteriors were filmed at Bava's beloved Tor Caldara. The Menliff castle was added to the hillside overlooking the beach by affixing to a large sheet of glass a castle clipped from a postcard. Luciano Pigozzi was particularly impressed as he watched Bava bring this illusion to life: "He had a special glass with one postcard on the corner . . . You see this at the beginning, this castle on the beach, and you say, 'Where is this location? It's beautiful!'" For a later night shot requiring the flame of Losat's torch to be visible in the distance as it is carried uphill toward the castle, a moving light source was reflected off the glass from a vantage beside the camera. Bava's use of Tor Caldara in La frusta e il corpo is appropriately romantic and haunting. Whenever the location reappears in later Bava films, such as I coltelli del vendicatore/Knives of the Avenger or 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto/5 Dolls for an August Moon, the scenery always echoes Nevenka's first private meeting with Kurt after his return. These lovers left their mark on Bava's filmography: henceforth, Tor Caldara became to Mario Bava what Monument Valley was to John Ford.

Harriet White Medin shared her impressions of her colleagues on the picture: "I liked Daliah Lavi very much; I found her beautiful and mercurial and very intense. My memories of Christopher Lee are vague; he was pleasant but formal, aloof. His role was also short, and he wasn't with us for the entire production. Bava was very pleasant, very easy to work with. He didn't say anything to his actors, as long as what they were doing was okay. He was very patient with those of us who needed help, who needed to have the context explained or something like that."

Luciano Pigozzi agrees: "He was a very, very good director on that film. All he needed was good actors; if the actors were good, he didn't need to give them any instructions, how to move, how to smile, how to be mad, how to do anything. Once he believed that you understood your role, he didn't disturb you any more. He wasn't like Vittorio De Sica, who always wanted to teach you. Every time I worked with De Sica, he had to show me exactly what he wanted, and then I had to do exactly what he did. But he was also an actor! For Bava, it wasn't possible for him to do that. He wasn't as self-important as De Sica."

Also working on the picture—as a production assistant—was the producer's younger brother Sergio Martino, who was destined to become one of Italy's most accomplished thriller directors of the 1970s. Martino has his own memories of the director: "Bava was a charming person. Since he was quite ambitious with what he did, and was used to working on very small productions with limited budgets, he didn't bother to worry about possible problems caused by others, but simply took care of everything himself. I remember him being almost in the position of a producer, always involved in organizational and financial problems and discussions. Bava had a remarkable charisma. He was a very elegant man who always had a big dog with him on the set."

The film's lead actress remembers Bava rather as Barbara Steele did—as a remote, though creative presence. "He was not very much into the directing of the actors," Daliah Lavi says. "He was more into setting up the angles of the camera. I don't think he directed me at all; I mean, he must have directed me, but he never said, '[Nevenka] is going through here and she is going to do this.' I remember him being very much behind the camera at all times, always trying to get the scenes to look right. And he was very good at that, at getting an atmosphere. I don't remember any bad things; the atmosphere on the set was good for everybody. But Bava was more of a technical guy than an emotional guy."

Being newly in love at the time and mostly looking forward to her weekend liberties, Lavi's other recollections of the filming are mostly vague. Christopher Lee, on the other hand, having worked with Bava before, came to the production with a sense of great anticipation, and spent his time on the set very much in the moment. After the experience of working with Bava on Ercole al centro della terra, which had a tighter schedule and found Bava occasionally short-tempered with his actors, Lee noticed that his director was, this time, in a more manic than depressive state of mind.

"When we were shooting The Whip and the Body . . . with the gorgeous Daliah Lavi and I indulging in the most torrid love scenes on the beach near Rome, Bava would invariably leap into the shot and mug away like crazy before crying 'Cut!' You can imagine what the rushes looked like!" [6]

LA FRUSTA E IL CORPO offered Christopher Lee a rare opportunity to play a romantic lead, as well as a monster, opposite Daliah Lavi.

In personal correspondence, Lee elaborated further: "[Bava] was a natural clown, and reminded me a great deal of the famous Italian comic, Totò. He frequently used to jump into the end of a scene, no matter what had gone before, and convulsed the cast and crew by performing directly at the camera, rather in the style of Groucho Marx! In some cases, I felt the film would have been better if some of Bava's 'material' had been left in!"

Years later, in 1996, when Lee was starring in Lamberto Bava's TV film Sorellina e il principe del sogno, Mario's grandson Roy had the opportunity to hear some of the actor's stories about working with his grandfather: "He had a lot of nice memories of him. He told me that while they were shooting La frusta e il corpo, there was a love scene and he was in bed with Daliah Lavi, and Mario didn't call 'Cut!' They were waiting and waiting till, all of a sudden, they found him crawling toward them from the foot of the bed, saying, 'Mind if I join you?'"

Despite the almost palpable passion and sophistication of Daliah Lavi's performance during the flogging scenes, the actress confesses to playing them in a state of complete naïveté. "I was probably too young to know what I was doing," she laughs. "While we were doing La frusta I don't remember having a sense that we were doing anything daring or provocative. I can see it now—a woman getting pleasure from being hit by this whip—but when I filmed it, I really didn't give it a second thought. I did the movie and I was gone!"

Bava himself did everything possible to subdue the sense of shooting an intimate scene, according to Sergio Martino. "The film had a touch of sadomasochism," he allows. "If you shot this screenplay nowadays, hardly anyone would raise an eyebrow, but at that time it was quite scandalous and daring. I remember the amusing image of Bava [filming this flogging scene and] looking nervously at his watch. The film was shot on such a shoestring budget that it was impossible to shoot additional, improvised material or to repeat takes very often. Bava clocked the length of each take with painful accuracy, to ensure that he would not exceed a running time of about 90 minutes with the completed picture. He gave us the impression that to run one minute, over or under, would result in dire consequences."

5 The year after La frusta e il corpo, the same castello location was used as the principal interior location for Antonio Margheriti's Danza macabra/Castle of Blood (1964).

6 American Cinematheque retrospective notes, 1993.

THE FILM*'s controversial flogging scenes were cleverly and painlessly achieved by filming them in reverse.*

To preserve the illusion of participating in a British production, the actors spoke their lines in English. To her surprise, Harriet White Medin discovered that speaking lines in English no longer came so easily after nearly twenty years of living in Rome: "I remember there was a particularly difficult scene for me. I had this long speech, ending with '. . . but not the old man!' Every time I did the scene, I kept finishing my lines in Italian: '. . . ma il vecchio, no!' There are times when Italian gets to the point very succinctly, moreso than English, which is ridiculous because English is my native tongue, but I knew Italian so well by this point . . . I had learned it, lived it, even married in it. We had to shoot that scene several times, and we never did get it right. Finally, Bava said, 'Let's go on; we can fix it in the dubbing.'" Once it was decided to "fix it in the dubbing," Bava allowed Tony Kendall—who alone was acting phonetically in the midst of a bilingual cast—to give the remainder of his performance in Italian.

Ernesto Gastaldi, busy working on his next script, never visited the set and therefore has no production anecdotes to share. Luciano Pigozzi, however, remembers an occasion when Bava had to summon his father, Eugenio, to the set. "Bava was a great director and a great director of photography," he praises. "But he had a very good teacher, his father. His father was fabulous. Everybody called on him. Whenever a director needed a certain kind of shot, they would always contact the father, who was a great teacher and had worked on many important pictures. During the shooting of a film, if the director needed a certain kind of shot, they would contact the father of Bava. He made a lot of money by doing that. On La frusta e il corpo, Bava found himself in this same situation, so he contacted his father, who brought an old camera."

Pigozzi was unable to elaborate on the nature of Eugenio's miracle work ("I knew the father . . . I saw him and spoke with him, but I didn't see him shooting"), but his reference to an "old camera" suggests that he brought his vintage Mitchell camera to the location, a 1919 handcranked model which Bava admired for its unsurpassed steadiness, which allowed father and son to photograph split screen and other trick shots involving manipulated film speeds, double exposures, and reverse photography.

Pigozzi remembers a surprising example of the latter kind of trick: "When Christopher Lee whipped [Daliah Lavi], Bava cranked the camera in reverse. He put the whip across her back, or around her wrist, and then Christopher pulled the whip away, do you see?"

Daliah Lavi's own most lingering memory of the filming is olfactory. "The one thing I remember about making the movie is the scene of setting the skeleton on fire at the end," she says. "I remember Bava looking down at this very clean skeleton in the coffin and saying, 'We can do better than this.' Right away, he sent some men out to the butcher's to bring back whatever spoiled meat, bones, and grit they could find! When they came back, everyone stood around the coffin for a long time, while Bava very carefully arranged this rancid meat on the skeleton—until it looked just right!" She laughs at the memory. "It was disgusting! Oh, how it smelled . . . like a barbecue, but not a very well-seasoned barbecue! It smelled rotten!"

The production designer, credited as "Dick Grey," was in reality Ottavio Scotti. An inspired choice, Scotti had previously designed such classic period films as Gregory Ratoff's Black Magic, Luchino Visconti's Senso, and John Brahm's The Thief of Venice. Born in 1904 and active in his profession since the 1930s, Scotti was nearing the end of his professional life in 1963, a time when he was working on less distinguished features like Nel segno di Roma and Colossus and the Amazon Queen. As this film shows, he was still capable of tapping into the sumptuous look that characterized his greatest achievements. The crypt set, also, is wonderfully atmospheric and highly evocative of the Gothic, webby, color-splashed crypts designed by Daniel Haller for Roger Corman's Poe pictures.

Daliah Lavi's previous film for producer Luciano Martino, Il demonio, had been edited by Bava's usual collaborator, Mario Serandrei, so there is every indication that he would have been the first choice for this film too, had he been available. However, at the time of filming, Serandrei had embarked on the last great adventure of his career: the editing of Luchino Visconti's epic film Il gattopardo/The Leopard (1963). Hired in his stead was editor Roberto Cinquini—credited as "Bob King"—who was certainly no pinch-hitter. Cinquini had been the editor of I vampiri, and his work on La frusta was also preceded by such major assignments as Rossellini's Viva l'italia!, Germi's Divorzio all'italiana/Divorce Italian Style, and Edgar G. Ulmer's Annibale/Hannibal. One year after cutting this picture, Cinquini would edit the biggest picture of his career: Sergio Leone's Per un pugno di dollari/A Fistful of Dollars.

COMPOSER Carlo Rustichelli.

Music

La frusta e il corpo is graced by what is arguably the finest score ever written for a Mario Bava film. It is certainly the only Bava score capable of standing on its own as a masterpiece of classical music.

Though the film's veil of pseudonymity caused this splendid music to be credited to "Jim Murphy," the composer was in fact Carlo Rustichelli, who had previously scored Bava's La morte viene dallo spazio in 1958, and also the Bava-related Il ladro di Bagdad in 1961. In this stirring yet elegiac score, the listener can hear echoes of almost everything the film has to offer visually: the turbulent waters rushing into the beach, the hammering of horses' hooves along the shore, the air of loss and lamentation, the eerie washes of suspense, danger, fear, and death, but above all, the tearful undertows of fervid romantic obsession. Rustichelli's score must be paid the ultimate compliment that La frusta e il corpo is unimaginable without it.

"Bava was a good director, very thorough, and he was also very interested in music," Rustichelli said. "As a person, he was always cheerful, very talkative, and told a lot of jokes—but he could get away with it, because he was very good at what he did."

Rustichelli remembered his music for La frusta e il corpo very fondly, and he was able to play the film's main theme from memory almost forty years after writing it. "I composed that music almost as a concerto for piano and orchestra," he explained. "Since I had already done many important films, Bava respected my ideas. I've always been very open about my music. If I was composing at home, working on very important themes, if the housemaid was around, I would play it for her and ask if she liked it. I'm very open-minded, because it's not necessary that I like my music, but it is necessary that people like it. The subject of La frusta e il corpo was very romantic and tragic, so maybe this is why my music turned out that way.

"Generally, Bava and I worked this way: I read the script, and then I began to develop my themes. As the scenes were shot, we would look at them on a Movieola. Bava would come to my house and listen while I wrote at the piano. I had found a way—it wasn't usual at the time—to put a piano and a Movieola together, and as we watched the scenes, I would adapt my themes to the rhythms of the images. The music was always recorded after the film was finished, unless it had to be contemporary with the shooting, as when there are romanzas, ballets, songs. These have to be recorded first and filmed to playback. For me, it's almost a physiological phenomenon, what happens between my music and what's happening on the screen, and that's the reason one can get the impression that the music was recorded first and played on the set during the shooting."

HARRIET WHITE MEDIN screams "Oh! Il vecchio, no!" on discovering the murdered Count Vladimir ("Dean Ardow" a.k.a. Gustavo De Nardo).

At the time of the film's release in Italy, CAM released a 45 rpm single of the film's main theme, with a picture sleeve properly crediting the music to Carlo Rustichelli, in a very limited edition of 1,000 copies or less. Inexplicably titled "The Winsor Concerto," the record consisted of a single piece of music for piano and orchestra, 8:40 in length, which faded out at the end of Side 1 and faded in at the beginning of Side 2. It is such a rare item today that Rustichelli himself did not own a copy at the time he was interviewed for this book. He was also aware of other merchandise related to the score.

"As for La frusta e il corpo, I have nothing of it," he lamented. "I know that, in England, someone once printed a score with all my music for piano, with a drawing and a title on the cover. I would love to have a copy."

In 2001, CAM released Ritrato di un Autore, a single-disc overview of Rustichelli's career in film music, which included the entire "Winsor Concerto" recording—presented for the first time without fades. The disc was programmed by the composer himself from pieces written for the cinema over more than half a century, so the inclusion of this music is indicative of Rustichelli's exceptionally high regard for it.

"Of course, I am very proud of it," he enthused, "because I think it is very beautiful. Until then, I had never written music so successful as it was in La frusta e il corpo—music of such lyricism, such romanticism, pushed to the extreme."[7]

KURT*'s remains are incinerated in a sickening studio barbecue forever burned into Daliah Lavi's memory.*

Bava never spoke on the record about his working relationship with Rustichelli, but there is no doubt that "the Italian Hitchcock" had finally found his Bernard Herrmann. After this film, he never looked back, never worked with Roberto Nicolosi again. Bava's regard for this score was so great that he actually recycled some specific, non-romantic cues in other movies, also scored by Rustichelli, because he felt they were so perfectly evocative of the uncanny moods he wished to create—and continually create.

"We used a lot of the music from La frusta e il corpo in two other movies [Sei donne per l'assassino and Operazione paura] we did together," Rustichelli confirmed. "He actually asked for that music because . . . well, because he was very happy with the music I had written."[8]

A snippet of "The Winsor Concerto" later found its way into the soundtrack of Carlos Aured's Spanish horror film La Venganza de la Momia/The Mummy's Revenge (1973), starring Paul Naschy. The entire La frusta e il corpo soundtrack was issued on CD by Digitmovies in 2005.

Commentary

La frusta e il corpo differs from the other films Bava had directed up to this point, because it was approached purely as a work-for-hire proposition. The script was completed by the time he signed on, and he did very little to change it, even as the production wore on, though he usually tinkered with scripts to keep himself spontaneous and interested. Bava's own name does not appear in the credits and yet, despite its seeming impersonality, La frusta e il corpo stands out as an unusually passionate and heart-felt statement by its director, who was perhaps emboldened by his anonymity to put aside his usual defenses of humor and irony and wear his heart on his sleeve.

THIS STUNNING portrait shot of Daliah Lavi provided the basis for the film's Italian poster art.

For anyone familiar with Ernesto Gastaldi's other work, it is obvious that he must be acknowledged as the film's true auteur. The story is well-stocked with archetypes found in his other pictures, as well as recurring themes and situations. Like his later gialli for Sergio Martino—notably Lo strano vizio della signora Wardh/Next! and Tutti i colori del buio/They're Coming to Get You, both of which starred Edwige Fenech—La frusta is built around the erotic hallucinations of a central female character haunted by her past relationship with a menacing male, presumed dead, and the question of whether or not her encounters are real. The element of sadomasochism is another Gastaldi signature point, as many of his thrillers involve romantic relationships involving some element of sexual kink: necrophilia (L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock), blood fetishism (Lo strano vizio della signora Wardh), Satanism (Tutti i colori del buio). Even the werewolf of his Lycanthropus is revealed to be the shackled sex slave of a school mistress.

La frusta also contains some reprises of scenes and variations on themes found in Gastaldi's other movies. One of the film's dramatic highlights—the moment when Nevenka overhears Georgia's comment to the Count that Losat has observed lights and movements in the chapel, indicating that Kurt may still be alive—reprises the moment in Riccardo Freda's L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock when the good doctor (played by Robert Flemyng) discovers that his supposedly dead, overdosed wife may still be alive and available for their own particular brand of kinky sex (in this case, a form of narcotically faked necrophilia); the scenes also share in common a sudden thunderstorm, as well as the image of a man's face distorted by rain against a window pane.

The character of Georgia is a perpetuation of Hichcock's sinister housekeeper character, based on the character of Mrs. Danvers as played by Judith Anderson in Alfred Hitchcock's Rebecca (1940); indeed, both roles were played by Harriet White Medin, who would reprise the archetype once again in the Gastaldi-scripted La lama nel corpo/The Murder Clinic (1966). Even the name "Nevenka" had its origin in an earlier Gastaldi script. "Four months before I wrote this film, I wrote a very good treatment with Ugo Guerra entitled La Spia ["The Spies"]," he recalls. "It was probably the best-constructed thriller machine I ever devised, but it was never filmed. It was set in Eastern Europe and the lead character was named Nevenka; I liked this name, and decided to reuse it."

Although Bava refrained from making any significant changes to Gastaldi's script, La frusta contains many elements suggestive of his creative input. The most obvious cases are the talismanic use of the beach at Tor Caldara and the reprise of the secret passage within the fireplace from La maschera del demonio, which allows the murderer of Count Vladimir to make a getaway undetected. Most significantly, the finale—in which Nevenka is first shown subjectively (in the reality she inhabits) kissing Kurt, then shown objectively (in the reality inhabited by two onlookers) embracing emptiness and driving the knife into her own heart—reprises the finale of "La goccia d'acqua" in I tre volti della paura, in which Jacqueline Pierreux strangles herself as she is approached (she believes) by a ghost.

La frusta e il corpo can also be viewed as a reprise of, or thematic sequel-of-sorts to I tre volti della paura's*"I wurdalak."* The character names and associations in the two films are curiously similar: each story has its own Vladimir, one young and strong, the other old and infirm; Sdenka, the heroine who succumbs to the loving pull of the dead, becomes *Nev*enka; and Giorgio, the husband slain by his wife's dagger, is reflected in the housemaid Georgi*a*, who has literally enshrined the dagger used by her daughter to commit suicide. The houses of Gorka and Menliff are both overshadowed, as we first enter them, by the oppressive absence of a larger-than-life personality (Gorka and, here, Kurt) and both films chronicle the fulfillment of fears based on the respective returns of these dreaded wanderers. Though extensive, these similarities must be coincidental as Gastaldi could not have seen I tre volti della paura at the time he scripted La frusta.

Bava once said that he accepted every script he was ever offered, but certainly he accepted this one because it provided him with a creative arena in which to further explore topics that were already of keen interest to him. The nature of Nevenka's haunting gave him the opportunity to play with subjective camera, hallucination, and ambiguity, all touchstones of his earlier work. These themes had first blossomed in Ercole al centro della terra, in which Hercules had to navigate a

AS NEVENKA fondles herself in solitude, her pleasure evokes the ghostly presence of Kurt.

7 Carlo Rustichelli, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, unused, 2000.

8 Ibid.

KURT flogs Nevenka in the sequence most heavily censored around the world.

path through Hades while disregarding the information processed by his senses, but had evolved to such an extent that "La goccia d'acqua" could pass for a rough draft of Nevenka's plight.

A tragedy in the classical sense, La frusta e il corpo shows what Mario Bava was capable of achieving when presented with a script that didn't encourage his nervous meddling. Here, Bava was not only anchored by the quality of Gastaldi's writing, but also by a resourceful acting ensemble headed by Christopher Lee—clearly aiming for, and deserving, a more substantial career as a leading man—and the stunning Daliah Lavi. These dependable ingredients gave Bava the freedom to lavish his attentions almost entirely on matters of lighting, camera movement, and atmosphere. If I tre volti della paura is the cinematic equivalent of a sketchpad—a series of short experiments in which Bava divined how to photograph a variety of horror stories in color without forfeiting the expressionistic values of black-and-white—La frusta e il corpo is his first attempt to adapt his newfound signature style to a full-sized canvas.

Working again in Technicolor, Bava created a film whose color is rich and confectionary as a Douglas Sirk melodrama of the 1950s—which is appropriate because, like Sirk's All That Heaven Allows (for instance), La frusta e il corpo is a highly romantic story that explores the internal conflicts of a woman torn between a love that validates her existence and the social customs that forbids her to embrace it. The film also has much in common, visually, with Bava's 1954 assignment Graziella (directed by Giorgio Bianchi)—another period romance with tragic consequences, set near the sea.

Using the style he had formalized in I tre volti della paura, Bava uses Technicolor here to heighten the beauty of his images from the outset. Initially, he limits its applications to enhancing sources of natural beauty—the sunset on the beach, the robust health of skin tones, the colors and textures of fabrics and furnishings. But whereas other directors of photography used Technicolor to exaggerate the values of natural color, Bava goes further, adapting Technicolor to delirious ends by using irrational color accents, in an expressionistic, painterly way, to suggest the presence of the supernatural—or in this case, an outward projection of disturbed human emotions.

Perhaps even more daring than its use of color is the film's all-enveloping use of black, which at times gives the film the uncanny texture of a velvet painting and—especially when viewed on a big screen in a darkened theater—a palpable sense of intimate contact with the veil separating life from death. Interviewed in 2001, another cameraman-turned-director—Ernest Dickerson—singled out La frusta e il corpo for particular praise in this regard: "One of my heroes is Mario Bava . . . The Whip and the Body really uses darkness. I mean, there are scenes which are beautifully lit and it's all black with just a little highlight—which, photographically, is a pretty ballsy thing to do."[9]

Just as Ernesto Gastaldi's script for Freda's L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock paid hommage to its namesake with various references to the likes of Rebecca and Under Capricorn, La frusta e il corpo shows not only the influence of Corman's Pit and the Pendulum but that of Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho, as well. The first Psycho-inspired concept is the unexpected murder of Kurt Menliff, played by the apparent male lead: Christopher Lee. On a stormy night, while readying himself for bed, Kurt is fatally stabbed in the throat by the same knife used by Tania to commit suicide. (Note again the importance of backstory to the story's construction.) In Gastaldi's script, Kurt was stabbed by someone behind a curtain in his room; Bava filmed the scene in a deliberately ambiguous manner, so that it is not apparent whether or not the murder was committed by Nevenka, by one of the other residents, by the ghost of Tania, or indeed by the curtain itself.

Gastaldi (or perhaps Bava, in blocking the scene) may have modelled the murder's mise-en-scène on a sequence in Fritz Lang's little-seen thriller House By the River (1950). Lotte H. Eisner's book Fritz Lang quotes the relevant paragraphs of Mel Dinelli's script:

> Stephen seems to witness—an apparition. John appears dripping wet and matted with blood on one side of his head, he is haggard, muddy to his knees.
>
> Stephen's grip slackens—full of horror he believes to see his brother's ghost. He lets Marjorie drop, dashes into the corridor, runs toward the staircase. The bathroom door opens slowly and the draught blows the long white curtains out. Viewed by the single dim gaslight, it is ghostly and weird.

> With an expression of extreme horror, he stares in the direction of the bathroom door. The billowing curtains stream out with the draught, Stephen thinks he can see a white body—Emily with floating hair.
>
> With this second apparition, his brain cracks completely, he rushes toward the staircase, but now the heavy curtains from the balcony are blown out towards him, they appear to entangle him . . . There is an agonized scream. [10]

In La frusta e il corpo, the bearing of Lang's film is borne out not only by the way the curtains seem to reach out to entangle Kurt, but also by the later recurring shots of muddy boots, which herald John's and Kurt's respective returns from the grave. But whereas Stephen (Louis Hayward) is clearly the victim of his own conscience, in the manner of Miss Chester and some future Bava heroines, Kurt is depicted as a man without a conscience. Therefore, the question becomes: Who (or what) was behind the curtain when Kurt was killed?

The mystery is compounded by a healthy assortment of red herrings introduced prior to Kurt's death. It occurs almost immediately following the scene on the beach, giving Nevenka excellent reason to want Kurt dead—but alone of all the suspects, only Nevenka is given an excuse, as her beaten, comatose body is later discovered by Losat on the beach, where she has presumably been since her violent tryst. Just prior to the murder, Kurt's supposedly infirm father is shown rising furtively from his sickbed and passing through the secret panel in his fireplace, previously established as the entrance to a hidden passage communicating with Kurt's room; his earlier argument with Kurt also designates him as a suspect. Georgia, the housekeeper, has already stated her desire to see Kurt die eactly as her daughter did, making her culpability equally likely. After Kurt's murder, the dagger is found hidden in the bedroom of Katia, whom Kurt has taunted since his return with his awareness of her secret love for Christian—perhaps she has committed the murder to keep her love a secret? Or, to take the inquiry to another level, might the blade have been wielded by the vengeful spirit of Tania?

Because La frusta e il corpo encountered censorship problems in so many different countries upon its release, it was often shown in heavily cut versions that left the viewer pondering the question of "Who killed Kurt?" well after Bava and Gastaldi had answered it. Today, with the uncut version now dominant in circulation, the movie's bottom-line is unmistakable: Nevenka used the dagger to kill Kurt in a schizophrenic rage. Hateful of Kurt for seducing and abandoning her, and causing her to enter into an unloving marriage (pregnancy with Kurt's child is never mentioned, but it is certainly one plausible reason behind these forced nuptials), Nevenka is also fundamentally unable to admit her very real love for her lover/abuser, the only man to discover the secret of how to satisfy her sexually. After the hateful side of Nevenka slays Kurt, the loving side is left with no recourse but to "reinvent" Kurt, a ghost that deals pleasure to her and vengeance to the Count who has sold her into marital bondage. As we ultimately learn, Nevenka does this by imagining his nightly visitations (presumably, while masturbating), and by donning his clothes, speaking in his voice, and settling his accounts—giving half of herself over to him, much in the manner that Norman Bates kept his dead mother "alive" in Hitchcock's Psycho.

The scene of Kurt's murder is one of Bava's finest set pieces, yet according to the actor at the center of it, it was filmed in such a way that it was not made to happen, but allowed to happen. "As I recall, there was virtually no blocking or specific coaching by the director with regard to this scene," explains Christopher Lee. "Bava told me what he intended to do, and more or less left it to me to produce the required result. It was not an easy scene to play, for obvious reasons. I played the scene in a straightforward manner, to give the impression that there was indeed someone behind the curtain besides myself."

The impression is wholly illusory. On the set, there was no one else behind the curtain; the dagger was sheathed on the reverse side of the curtain, and the illusion relied entirely on Lee's pantomimic ability to be engulfed by the curtain, find the bloodied knife and suggest that it had been embedded in his neck.

Lee acknowledges that the true identity of the killer was never in doubt during the filming. "Clearly, we had to rely on as many red herrings as possible, but the solution in the script was quite clear: Nevenka was responsible for the death of Kurt." [11]

With Kurt's murder, the cinematography takes a turn toward the unreal; the scene is bathed in ultra-blue light, a color that will haunt Nevenka for the rest of the film—memorably, it bathes the wall behind her at the piano just before her first sighting of Kurt's

AFTER the pain comes pleasure as Kurt touches the punished flesh of Nevenka.

9 Ernest Dickerson, interviewed in the documentary short "Urban Gothic: Bones and Its Influences," on the New Line Cinema DVD of Bones (2001).

10 Lotte H. Eisner, Fritz Lang (New York NY: Da Capo Press, 1976), 291–93.

11 Michael Parry, "CoF Interviews Christopher Lee, Part 3" in Castle of Frankenstein 12, 1968, 30-31.

KURT*'s death scene, a remarkable piece of pantomime on the part of Christopher Lee.*

ghost. After this initial confirmation of her greatest hopes and fears, Bava allows the wonder and strangeness of color to seep into the ambient lighting, so that the long corridor separating Nevenka's and Kurt's respective rooms becomes a passage through—literally—all the colors of the dark. Later, as the spirit of Kurt is summoned to her room by the force of her desire, Bava shows his face descending toward hers (i.e., the camera) in a kiss, passing through similar stratas of green, blue, and finally red—which, in Bava's chromatic vocabulary, suggests a progression from fear to longing to the full blush of passion.

Of the various characters in the film, Nevenka is the most quiet, yet she is the central protagonist—and, as we later learn, antagonist. In the opening scene of Kurt's homecoming, she is consigned to the background as emotions flare between the returning son and his family, though the scene makes it quite clear that an unspoken bond exists between Kurt and his brother's fiancee. Our first clue to the nature of their relationship occurs soon after, as Nevenka rides to the beach to trace her thoughts in solitude. She uses her riding crop to muse in the sand, and as her thoughts drift away, the limp lash of the crop grows taut—held in place under Kurt's boot. Like Nevenka, we neither see nor hear Kurt's approach; we can almost believe that she has conjured him up, just by thinking about him. Their subsequent actions are also telling: Kurt does not approach Nevenka as a menace; indeed, she is the first to use her whip as a weapon, presumably in retaliation for his earlier abandonment of her, which forced her to enter into an arranged marriage with his brother. Nevenka says almost nothing during the encounter, and a casual observer might well mistake her as Kurt's victim. However, on closer examination, Nevenka appears to be in passive control of Kurt's actions, and this may well be a familiar ritual for them, as she denies her interest until Kurt forces her responses to the surface in a tried-and-true manner. "You always loved violence," he says—and he deals it out to her (thirteen lashes, incidentally), not as an end in itself, but as a prelude to impassioned lovemaking.

Such a complex role as Nevenka requires the performance of an actress capable of revealing a spectrum of emotion as the film's principal character, under close scrutiny, without prematurely revealing the whole truth of that character. Bava's films are not often noted for their emotional content but, as Nevenka, Daliah Lavi gives possibly the most absorbing and feeling performance found in any of his movies. Much of the very human impression she makes is due to her unusual ability to abstract herself and act in perfect concert with Bava's lighting and camera movements. A production photo exists that shows Bava directing Lavi and Lee prior to the filming of the encounter on the beach, and their respective poses are revealing: Bava, holding the whip, is rubbing his jaw thoughtfully as though trying to visualize the scene; Lee, more than a head taller than his co-workers, stands off to the side, squinting in determination to understand and comply with his director's vision; and Lavi stands between the two men, hands folded before her, her face beaming with girlish delight and anticipation, as she looks forward to playing the scene.

Nevenka is given very little dialogue, requiring Lavi to restrict much of her performance to the visual plane, with Bava's lighting and mise-en-scène carrying an equal share of responsibility for conveying her innermost thoughts. Their collaboration is best illustrated by the sequence that begins as Georgia reports to Count Vladimir that lights have been observed at night in the family chapel where Kurt is buried. Prior to this announcement, Nevenka has been seated at the piano, playing the romantic theme first heard during her scene with Kurt on the beach, as the Count sits off at a distance, pondering the flames in the fireplace—a setting that essentially reprises the introduction of Prince Vajda in La maschera del demonio, with Princess Katia at the piano. As Nevenka overhears Georgia's words, her secret yearnings are finally given the hope they need to be galvanized into flesh, or at least into illusion—her blank expression turns thunderstruck as she leans forward on the piano, sounding an appropriately thunderous chord. (Had Nevenka been established as a more verbal character, had the mood of the establishing footage been more realistic, had the chord been sounded with less subtlety, her response might have seemed almost comic, but Lavi's actions are perfectly measured.) The Count shrugs off Georgia's gossip, explaining that it was probably nothing but moonlight reflected on a window of the chapel. (How like Bava to explain such a phenomenon as an optical illusion!) A whipcrack of thunder then draws Nevenka's attention to a rain-streaked window, where she sees the grim visage of Kurt—blue-skinned, his neck swathed in a bloody bandage; as she screams from the shock, she grabs her own throat in a sympathetic response. (Here is the first indication of Nevenka "sharing" Kurt's feelings, giving a portion of her life in compensation for the one she has taken.)

In the next scene, Bava follows Nevenka's train of thought by showing her, later that night, reassuring herself by tracing the light at play on the chapel window back to the movements of dark clouds across the face of a full moon. To a sane mind, this would resolve the matter, but Bava executes a match-dissolve from the cloud-swept moon to a rhyming shot of Nevenka's black hair swept across the face of a pillow. The camera then moves laterally to a tight-shot of Nevenka's eyes, open in the dark, sleepless and troubled. After this, the shots become fragmented, mosaical, their framing remarking on a literal breakdown. As the sequence plays out, Kurt materializes from the shadows of her room, but he disappears at the moment she shows fear—but worse than being haunted is being without this man she loves, and her immediate regret brings him back. As Kurt's looming hand tears the back of her nightgown for a taste of his whip, Nevenka's terror once again overwhelms her receptive feelings and she cries out to Christian for help. It may seem odd that she would turn to Christian in this instance, but while theirs is a loveless marriage, Nevenka has yet to admit her love for Kurt even to herself; indeed, her haunting may well be predicated on her inability to admit her true feelings for the man she has killed, just as she has repressed the memory of killing him. At this point, Nevenka is still dependent on her husband to see her through this nightmare; he is her last tie to reality—which also explains her strangely jealous response to overhearing his declaration of love to Katia, later in the picture.

The character of Nevenka—and the nature of her story—anticipates Catherine Deneuve's role of Severine in Luís Buñuel's celebrated film Belle de Jour (1967) and actually goes much further. Belle de Jour allows its audience to eavesdrop on the sadomasochistic fantasies of its bourgeois housewife heroine, but it promptly confirms her fantasies as what they are, so that the boundaries of reality and fantasy are always clearly drawn. Also, given the cool reserve of Deneuve's performance, we never quite get under the skin of her character as an audience, the way Lavi's warm-blooded acting allows us to do. In retrospect, Belle de Jour may have seemed groundbreaking at the time of its release only because La frusta e il corpo had been ghettoized as a horror film, of which the "serious" press took no notice.

ITALIAN manifesto featuring Losat's discovery of the dead Kurt.

Lavi herself (a vivacious, humorous and down-to-earth woman in real life) is very critical of her performance in La frusta e il corpo, which she somehow managed to avoid seeing until November 2000, when I provided her with a videotape in advance of our interview. "I thought I could have been much better," she told me. "I kept catching myself repeating the same facial expressions, and when I was supposed to look like I was seeing a ghost, I didn't look the way I would look if I was really seeing a ghost, you know? Bava was very focused on the camera and the lighting, and in that regard, there are some very good scenes. I liked the scene where he introduces me at the piano. I look outside the action, abstract, from the beginning; I liked that. But other parts of the movie I found very slow and, well, melodramatic at times." When I said something in defense of the film's elegiac pacing, this spirited woman laughed and said, "Well, that's what makes horse races!"

Lavi later elaborated on her criticism: "I didn't really like myself because I thought I was being very melodramatic. I was acting . . . quite the opposite of what I had done in Il demonio. I was acting scared, like they do in silent movies, with everything exaggerated. That's how I see myself in it. I was telling this to my son, and he said, 'But that's the way it's supposed to be! In horror movies, you're supposed to act like that!' My acting in this movie is like an actress in a silent movie—that's what I think. But maybe it's just me!"

NEVENKA cries out to Christian for help after the ghost of Kurt pays a visit to her room.

Theoretically, Bava was using Lavi less to obtain a realistic performance than to present a tableau vivant; the very stillness of her performance works to emphasize the fact that she has made the adjustment to living internally, after the death of Kurt, rather than internally—and the exaggeration of her performance in other scenes works to support how deranged she truly has become.

As Lavi's comments reveal, her personal response to La frusta e il corpo is colored by her greater enthusiasm for her work in Il demonio, which she rightly considers to be the best performance she gave in the course of her generally disappointing film career. ("Most of the movies I made were garbage," she says candidly.) As mentioned above, the two characters have a great deal in common. In Il demonio, Lavi's character has a history of inflicting wounds upon herself; in La frusta, if we subtract the imagined element of Kurt, Nevenka is abusing herself the same way. In both movies, the woman is rejected by her lover with violent results that may or may not qualify as a form of possession. When Bava's film was released in Germany, the distributors underlined the similarity between the two pictures by retitling the film Der Dämon und die Jungfrau ("The Demon and the Virgin").

CHRISTIAN steadies the old Count as Kurt makes his unexpected return.

LOSAT finds the inert body of Nevenka in tattered clothes near the beach after nightfall.

"The difference between Il demonio and La frusta e il corpo," explains Lavi, "is that the girl in Il demonio was superstitious to begin with, and her relationship with this man intensified it, so that she became even more crazy when she couldn't have him. At the time, my interpretation was that he was the first man she ever had; that's why she couldn't let go of him—because, in her mind, he belonged to her. Nevenka was the same, a schizophrenic—maybe she went in and out of it. She was in love with Kurt and they had an affair; maybe he took advantage of her too, because she was susceptible to different personalities. There is no other way to explain women who are beaten by ghosts. They do it to themselves."

The character of Nevenka is so central, and Lavi's performance is so intense, that it is perhaps too easy to overlook the artistry that Christopher Lee brings to his performance as Kurt. As in Fisher's Horror of Dracula, in which he actually appears for less than eight minutes, Lee makes such an impression in his scant onscreen time that his presence is felt throughout the picture, kept alive by Nevenka's yearnings. Of all his early screen roles, this one hints most persuasively at the kind of career he might have had, had he not made his initial success in horror pictures.

Throughout the picture, Bava uses red roses to symbolize the commingling pain and pleasure of romantic love. In the opening scene, we see roses adorning the base of the display case that enshrines Tania's tragic dagger; we see them next as Katia arranges a vase of roses while Kurt taunts her in regard to her secret, thwarted love for his brother; and after Kurt's death, Nevenka is shown taking a single rose to his crypt as a tribute, as the thrashing sounds of their sadomasochistic encounters resonate through her consciousness. When Kurt's ghost first appears to Nevenka, his neck is swathed in a bandage blotted with blood where he was stabbed, the stain very much in the configuration of a rose. In a later dialogue scene between Katia and Christian, Bava returns to the vase of roses to illustrate how the presence of absent people can be felt through the objects we associate with them. As the chaste lovers comfort one another, Bava uses the vase as the fulcrum of an elegant camera movement, so that the gliding of the camera reinterprets this background object as a foreground element. Just as Nevenka associated these flowers with Kurt, we now associate it with her, and she inhabits the scene as palpably as if she stood there.

The artist responsible for the film's Italian poster brilliantly rendered the significance of the rose in the film, though in a way never specifically portrayed in the film itself. In the foreground, Nevenka holds a rose to her nose as its thorns prick her fingers, its fragrance summoning a green-faced vision of Kurt, a hellion poised behind her with his whip ready to crash down.

Flora is also at the center of the film's most inexplicable moment, which nevertheless gives Bava an opportunity to do something only he could do so well. Shortly after Christian and Losat descend into the family crypt to disinter Kurt and convince themselves of his death, they pause for a moment to peer through a barred partition at a massive tangle of vines. Bava's camera prowls grimly over their unholy profusion, while a strobing red light seems to suffuse them with horrible life and bristling anger. There is no logical meaning for the shot or its content, nor any consequence to explain why the shot is held for so long, but the way Bava and Terzano photograph this jungling, subterranean overgrowth gives it an aura of Lovecraftian evil; these leafy, sinewy cords may be nothing more than an untended effusion of nature running riot, but they might also be the sum of this family's sins, buried out of sight for generations and quietly taking shape in the dark as something hideous, unspeakable, and throbbing with imminent consciousness.

For all its beauty and macabre splendor, La frusta e il corpo is not without fault. It plays so many of its cards subtly that its occasional resorts to cheap shock effects suggest a self-conscious filmmaker wary of straying too far from conventional horror into a brave new world. Bava's direction succumbs more than a couple of times to unworthy, vulgarian tactics: Isli Oberon cannot enter a scene without her hand first reaching ominously into frame to tap the shoulder of some poor, startled person, and the card of the boots "covered with the mud of the grave" is similarly overplayed. When Nevenka follows a lashing sound to Kurt's room (inhabited after his death only by sheeted furniture, one of Bava's tongue-in-cheek means of suggesting a ghostly element), the sudden appearance of a long vine, bursting through a window to snap and recoil like a literal whip, seems much too contrived an explanation. Furthermore, the film's second murder (of Count Vladimir) is not sufficiently supported by the events prior to its commission; it is also revealed as a fait accompli, so that Bava seems to thwart generic convention by denying his audience a second murder scene. Another curious omission is the central event of Nevenka and Christian's wedding. As the story unfolds, we only learn that the marriage has taken place when Nevenka overhears Katia discouraging Christian's declarations of love ("You're married now"). It could be argued that, by excusing these scenes of marriage and murder, Bava was underlining Nevenka's own emotional denial of them. As it is, the film's true wedding occurs in the final reel, as Nevenka weds herself to Kurt by pinning the ghost of him to her heart—with a dagger.

Another problem is that Nevenka's original place within the Menliff family is never explained. True, she is the fiancee and later the wife of Christian, but why was she living at the castle, to be seduced and abandoned by Kurt, prior to their engagement? Is she a ward of the castle, perhaps orphaned and adopted from the lower classes? A family cousin like Katia? Some print sources, dating back to the time of the film's original release, suggest that Nevenka is the mistress of Count Vladimir, but Ernesto Gastaldi denies that such intrigue was ever a part of his original screenplay.

Distribution & Censorship

La frusta e il corpo was a film so ahead of its time, in terms of its sadoerotic frankness and psychological ambiguities, that on November 13, 1963, Variety reported that it was to be "shown in a Roman court to answer charges of 'immorality' against producer Natale Magnaghi, brought by a Roman who had seen pic." (Curiously, Magnaghi's name appears nowhere in the credits, not even pseudonymously.) By February 12 of the following year, the same journal reported that "Producer of The Whip and the Body judged not guilty of obscenity charges on pic by local court."

What was Bava's reaction to the lawsuit?

"He laughed," Gastaldi says, jubilantly. "We all laughed! Two years later, I directed my first film—Libido—and the censor declared it 'Forbidden to Teenagers' because in one scene, my wife Mara Maryl stood in front of a Rubens painting and said, 'Però che culoni dipingevano una volta!' ('What big asses people used to paint!') That's what the times were like!" About the specific censorship problems encountered by La frusta, Gastaldi allows that "there were some problems with the censors, but no cuts were made, with the exception of maybe 8–12 frames in one of the whipping scenes. In Italy, the movie was prohibited to teenagers."

Sergio Martino remembers more specifically that cuts were made to "a whipping sequence on the beach, which was a bit too strong for Italian tastes at that time. However, I am not quite sure whether this scene was only removed for the Italian release, or also for the export version. Bava had some problems, because the final version—after the removal of this 'obscene' material—was too short."

BEAUTIFUL Belgian poster with an unfortunate misspelled credit for the lead actor.

The charges forced upon the film by law may have been laughable, but they had serious consequences. When La frusta e il corpo was released in Italy in late 1963, it collected only 72 million lire [$45,000] at the boxoffice—less than half of its already modest production cost. Thus, the film that many Bava fans consider to be his very best became his second biggest boxoffice disaster in his home country. Though the film had been produced with only a continental release in mind, its producers were understandably delighted when they began to receive signs of interest from English-speaking countries. From the resulting deals, La frusta e il corpo moved quickly from the red into the black.

An English-language version of the picture was prepared by American expatriate actor–director Mel Welles, without any input from the original cast—though most of them, everyone but Christopher Lee and Harriet Medin, had dubbed their own performances for the Italian soundtrack. If there is one sore spot felt about this production by the actors, it is in regard to the English dubbing. Though most of the actors would have been well up to the task, no one was invited to dub their own English performance. Watching the film, one cannot help but imagine what a richer experience it would be with Lee's rich baritone, Lavi's exotically husky voice, and Medin's prim Bostonian accent commingling on the track.

Lee has said on numerous occasions that he would love the opportunity to redub his performance in this picture, so much does the redubbing interfere with his enjoyment of it. "I was rather displeased," he admitted to Michel Parry. "They got an American, I think, by the sound of it, to dub my voice. It was fairly near to my voice, but occasionally he slipped and said, 'maaaaaster' instead of 'master.' Recently, I've had it put in my contract that, if I make a foreign picture and they have an English version, then it is me who does the voice." [12] There was at least some continuity involved, as Lee's performance was dubbed by Dan Sturkie—who had previously dubbed his performance as Lico in Ercole al centro della terra.

CANADIAN one-sheet.

The English-language track also diminishes the film to a degree, in terms of making blatant some aspects that Bava worked hard to keep ambiguous. The classic example of this vulgarization occurs prior to Kurt's murder: in the original version, Kurt is made uneasy by a series of purely natural sounds, kicked-up by the storm raging outside; in the English version, those sounds are downplayed in favor of a voice (clearly Nevenka's, dubbed by Carolyn De Fonseca) calling "Kurrrrrt! Kurrrrrrrrt!" So much for mystery!

The English version received its first release in Great Britain under the senseless title Night Is the Phantom, distributed by Regal International. Perhaps tipped off by the well-publicized obscenity suit, the film was subjected to extensive cuts by John Trevelyan of the British Board of Film Censors. Deleted were Kurt's floggings of Nevenka, her ecstatic knuckle-chewing reactions, and a shot of the heroine standing before a full-length mirror, summoning her lover's ghost from the darkness by caressing her own body. Whereas the uncut version was an exploration of the darkest corners of a woman's heart, libido and subconscious, the 77-minute Night Is the Phantom confronted bewildered audiences with what Christopher Lee described as "a picture of opening and closing doors and shadows and funny footfalls and people spinning around and nobody being there." [13]

"I thought [the British censorship cuts] were ridiculous," the actor railed. "To me, what they cut and what they don't cut these days is absolutely paradoxical. I can't understand the reasons for half the cuts they make. When they talk about sadism and brutality and you see some of the Bond pictures and the things they leave in, it doesn't make sense at all . . . Of course, it was rather a vicious story. But the acting by Daliah Lavi in those sequences was so good—where she was flogged and where she had to imagine things that weren't there—I felt it a great shame that any of it was cut at all . . . They missed so much by cutting it out that it no longer made an intelligible picture. Originally, it was a good one, full of suspense and full of atmosphere." [14]

In the pages of Monthly Film Bulletin, an uncredited reviewer said of Night Is the Phantom: "Another of Italy's prankish simulations of a British horror movie, the film is slow, repetitive, verging on parody. Censor or distributor cuts have rendered much of the plot incomprehensible, though one doubts if it ever made sense entirely. And yet it grows on one in retrospect. Its weird and doom-laden claustrophobia is unfailingly compulsive, mainly because of the redolent Freudian associations . . . The Victorian-Gothic paraphernalia comes equally from Gainsborough (The Man in Grey) and Riccardo Freda. Though Bava copies Freda almost slavishly, he still pulls off some arresting pictorial compositions, notably of Daliah Lavi (outstanding as Nevenka) at the piano in a vast castle hall."

12 Ibid.
13 Ibid.
14 Ibid.

GERMAN two-sheet poster, remarkable for selling images from this black velvet-like film against a bright white background.

In the United States, American International Pictures showed no interest in the picture—perhaps as a result of the obscenity charges filed against it, but even without this, it would have been considered too romantic, too adult, or too slow by their standards. The film was eventually acquired for US distribution in April 1965 by Futuramic Releasing as "A Richard G. Yates Presentation," and retitled What (no exclamation point, as is sometimes mistakenly added). Futuramic rejected the original florid-script-on-red silk main titles and replaced them with footage of Count Vladimir in bed, surprised by the unbidden opening of the secret passage in his fireplace. Emerging from the hearth, instead of his son, is the film's title in odd, ghostly letters that surge forth as they are gasped in voice-over by someone who extends the vowel almost to the breaking point.

Initially, Futuramic prints were virtually intact—running a couple of minutes shorter than the original export version, due to its abbreviated credits sequences—and processed in Technicolor. However, the incoherent US title aptly prophesied the heavily cut television prints that replaced it in circulation almost immediately (in May 1965) from another company, Thunderbird Films. This version was basically identical to the British abortion, and prints were cheaply processed so that the film's all-important color faded quickly.

Although Bava had begun to attain near-celebrity status in France, Le Corps et le Fouet was not acquired for release there until the summer of 1966, and was withheld from release in Germany and Austria until the following year. The French distributor Films Marbeauf had the good sense to inform the contributors to Positif and Midi-Minuit Fantastique that "John M. Old" was in fact Mario Bava, and some of the resulting reviews appearing there offered translations of the English pseudonyms—though "Julyan Berry" was incorrectly unmasked as Franco Prosperi.

As late as the early 1980s, Bava's film was only available for viewing in America in the form of badly truncated (and more badly color-faded) prints bearing the title What. For many years, the picture was considered to be lost until director Joe Dante provided an uncut 35 mm Technicolor print from his personal collection to the 1993 "Haunted Worlds of Mario Bava" retrospective held by the American Cinematheque in Los Angeles. The film is currently in the public domain in America, and in the year 2000, Dante allowed his print to be used in the preparation of a definitive DVD release undertaken by Tulsa-based VCI Home Entertainment, who digitally combined its cleanest portions with those of an Italian-language print owned by another private collector. When the disc was released late that year as The Whip and the Body, it was gratefully received by a new generation of viewers—and by older fans who had never had the opportunity to see the film uncut—who collectively hailed it as one of Bava's finest works, and perhaps his most transcendent of genre.

UK quad poster.

Unfortunately, after this remarkable sole collaboration, Mario Bava would never work again from an Ernesto Gastaldi script. Gastaldi credits this disappointment to Bava's general lack of interest in writing. In the years following La frusta e il corpo, Gastaldi continued to script more important Italian horror and fantasy films than any other Italian screenwriter. Among his many achievements are La cripta e l'incubo/Terror in the Crypt (1964), I lunghi capelli della morte/The Long Hair of Death (1964), La lama nel corpo/The Murder Clinic (1966), La decima vittima/The 10th Victim (1966), and numerous gialli for director Sergio Martino, including Lo strano vizio della signora Wardh/Next! (1971), Il tuo vizio è una stanza chiusa e solo io ne ho la chiave/Gently Before She Dies (1972), Tutti i colori del buio/They're Coming to Get You! a.k.a. Day of the Maniac (1972), and I corpi presentano tracce di violenza carnale/Torso (1973).

To the mutual regret of Mario Bava and Christopher Lee, La frusta e il corpo also marked their final collaboration. Lee considers it his best Italian film—and he made a great many of them, working not only for Bava, but also for Steno, Antonio Margheriti, Camillo Mastrocinque, and others. He offers his estimations of these gentlemen: "The only major difference I noticed in these films was that Bava used a great deal of highly imaginative lighting, as befitted a great cameraman. Steno was more precise and disciplined, and had very definite ideas which were almost always right. [Antonio] Margheriti seemed to have more money to spend and was much more flexible, and certainly used several cameras to cover one shot. Mastrocinque was perhaps more a director of the old school. He told you what he wanted and left you to get on with it. If it was wrong, he was expert at adjusting it correctly. All these directors were delightful, courteous, and very intelligent men, and I had the impression that they spent a great deal of their careers improving material that was not worthy of them." Lee's film for Mastrocinque, incidentally, was La cripta e l'incubo/Terror in the Crypt (1964), a loose adaptation of J. Sheridan Le Fanu's Carmilla, also scripted by Ernesto Gastaldi.

"Whenever I came to Rome I used to talk to Bava on the telephone," Lee says. "We were always going to get together, but somehow it never happened. It is, of course, possible that when the appropriate time arrived, he was under some form of restraint," he adds, alluding to the persistent rumors that Bava divided his time between Cinecittà and a padded cell. "For many years, I heard stories that he was in and out of mental homes, but I had no idea if there was any truth in this. It could have been an invention."

A few years after making La frusta e il corpo, Lee was cast in the lead of Theatre of Death (1966), a British horror thriller which contains a curious allusion to Bava's film. Lee plays Philippe Darvas, a writer and director at Le Theâtre de Mort in Paris, where sadistic plays in the tradition of the Grand Guignol are staged. Dominating the background of this film is a handsome oil portrait of Lee, in character as Kurt Menliff in La frusta e il corpo, which is identified as a portrait of Darvas' father, who also wrote and directed plays on the same stage twenty-five years earlier. In a couple of scenes, Lee is shown hiding behind the wall on which the portrait hangs, spying on the actions of others through the hollow orbs of the painting's eyes.

Lee remained interested in Bava's work and made a point of seeing his films whenever they happened to be screened at one of the fantastic film festivals he frequently attended as a guest of honor, but he grew increasingly disenchanted with their heightened levels of violence. Faced with a film like 1971's Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve, Lee was at once appalled and again concerned for the state of his old friend's mental health.

Mario Bava's next film could only fan the flames of such rumor—a murder mystery, violent and erotic, splashed with all the incendiary qualities of a Van Gogh canvas, so brilliant, so scalding with color that, in the words of one rhapsodizing critic, ". . . it becomes a marvelous Sabbath, this Black Mass, this demonic ceremony that is Sei donne per l'assassino." [15]

15 Alain Doremieux, "Six Femmes pour l'Assassin: Un Rève Fou," Midi-Minuit Fantastique 12, May 1965, 58.

MARY ARDEN as Peggy, the girl with the stolen diary in SEI DONNE PER L'ASSASSINO.

SEI DONNE PER L'ASSASSINO

Blood and Black Lace

"TECHNICOLOR IS INTERESTING," Ernst Lubitsch once told an actor visiting the set of his 1943 film Heaven Can Wait. "[It's] perfect for this kind of picture, wonderful for musicals and comedy. But . . . never shoot a drama or mystery in Technicolor."[1] Mario Bava had disproved this dictum with I tre volti della paura's "Il telefono" and La frusta e il corpo, but with his next picture—Sei donne per l'assassino—he would disprove it with panache.

Before Bava, other directors had also successfully challenged the accepted wisdom that Technicolor was inappropriate for the somber realms of melodrama, mystery, and suspense. In 1945, John M. Stahl made an excellent melodrama in Technicolor, starring one of the leads from Lubitsch's own film: Leave Her to Heaven, which starred Gene Tierney as a beautiful but unbalanced and eventually homicidal young woman. Beginning with Rope in 1948, Alfred Hitchcock embarked on a series of extraordinary color thrillers. Initially, Hitchcock's use of color seemed to serve none but a commercial purpose, with the director deliberately toning-down the garish process to just a few steps removed from monochrome, but by thetime of Vertigo (1958), he had begun to use color to inform his films thematically and psychologically. The conscious or subconscious thoughts of characters could be revealed through the colors they wore, creating associations within the viewer—again, consciously or subconsciously—by selectively using color as shared points of reference within different scenes. Kim Novak didn't have to be present in a scene in order to inhabit it; we could see her reflected in the color of James Stewart's suit or necktie, which happened to match the color of the walls in the restaurant where he first laid eyes on her.

While Sei donne per l'assassino wasn't the first successful—or even the first innovative—color thriller, it did revolutionize the way thrillers were made, and ultimately, it would be remembered as the definitive example of an entirely new kind of thriller: the giallo.

As explained in the chapter on La ragazza che sapeva troppo, Italians use the word giallo (and its plural form gialli) to describe all mystery and thriller fiction; therefore, they also use it to categorize all films of such a nature, not exclusively those made in Italy. The giallo, in its broadest definition, can be traced back to the silent days. In English-speaking countries, however, we already have the words for "mysteries" and "thrillers" and we view these as distinct and somewhat mutually exclusive cinematic archetypes. As the films of Mario Bava, Dario Argento, and Sergio Martino became more familiar to us, we adopted the term "giallo" to mean something quite specific, and somewhat contrary to the Italian definition. To us, a giallo is an unusually decorate and vicious type of thriller viewed, at least in part, through the eyes of a killer; it is a murder mystery that revels in the details of murder rather than the details of deduction and police procedure.

With the arrival of authors like Mickey Spillane and Frederic Brown in the 1950s, detective fiction became more violent and erotic in nature, and these qualities became even more exaggerated when pseudonymous Italian writers began to ape their style of writing in the pages of Mondadori's yellow-jacketed pulp magazines. As with the American paperback market, the covers of these publications also became more lurid and fetishistic, picturing women in provocative poses while being threatened by a terrible weapon—a knife, a gun, or a straight razor—in the grip of a gloved hand, presented in a red circle against a trademark yellow background.

The literary giallo was not merely a brand of escapism, but also a reflection of unpleasant realities that were known to occur in the course of daily Roman life. In his acclaimed non-fiction study The Italians, author Luigi Barzini dissects the Italian psyche in terms that convey the particular atmosphere Bava achieved with Sei donne per l'assassino: "Italians . . . fear sudden and violent death. The vigorous passions of a turbulent and restless people are always ready to flare up unexpectedly like hot coals under the ashes. Italy is a blood-stained country. Almost every day of the year jealous husbands kill their adulterous wives and their lovers; about as many wives kill their adulterous husbands and their mistresses . . . The world of vice also demands its daily victims. Streetwalkers are found dead with silk stockings wound tight round their necks or knives stuck in their ribs, on their unmade beds or in country lanes; fatherly homosexuals are found in public parks with their heads smashed in and their pockets turned out; on deserted beaches, naked call-girls are found at dawn drowned in a few inches of water. Prostitutes kill their pimps, whom they usually primly call 'il mio fidanzato,' my fiance; pimps and dope-peddlers kill each other over territorial disputes . . . Even when violent death is not lurking in the shadows, . . . an Italian must remain on the alert and move with circumspection."[2]

Barzini's words help us to understand why traces of the giallo can be seen in Bava's work as early as I vampiri (with its black-gloved killer of young women found in the River Seine), and indeed even farther back, in the operatically exaggerated murders staged in I pagliacci (amore tragico) and La donna più bella del mondo. Bava began formalizing his interest in such material in La ragazza che sapeva troppo and "Il telefono," the former a tongue-in-cheek tribute to the giallo and its impressionable readership, the second an actual giallo story rendered in perfect miniature. After the work-for-hire detour of La frusta e il corpo, Bava was now ready to tackle a fullscale model.

Working along similar lines—and beating Bava to the punch in a manner of speaking—was director Antonio Margheriti. Born in Rome on September 19, 1930, Margheriti's career had followed a path almost identical to Bava's own. In the 1940s and '50s, Margheriti had learned his first trade—as a special effects technician, specializing in miniatures—at the side of Mario's father Eugenio, at the Istituto LUCE. In 1960, when Bava was filming his own directorial debut La maschera del demonio on a sound stage at Scalera Film, the

Sei donne per l'assassino

"Six Women for the Murderer"
Working title: L'atelier della morte, "The Fashion House of Death"
Filmed at ATC Studios, Villa Sciarra (exteriors), and on location in Rome
November 1963 – January 1964
First released: March 14, 1964
Eastmancolor, 1.66:1, 88 minutes

Production: Emmepi Cinematografici (Rome), George de Beauregard (Paris), Top Film (Munich) and Monachia Film (Monaco). Producers: Massimo Patrizi and Alfredo Mirabile. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant director: Priscilla Contardi. Assistant to the director: Cristina Grieco. Screenplay: Marcello Fondato, with the collaboration of Giuseppe Barilla and Mario Bava. Dialogue coach: Vittorio Trentino. Director of photography: Ubaldo Terzano. Art direction: Arrigo Breschi. Wardrobe: Tina Grani. Costume design for Miss Bartok: Eleanora Garrett. Makeup: Emilio Trani. Hairdresser: Marisa Laganga. Production manager: Armando Govoni. Production administrator: Pietro Speziale. Production inspector: Franco Grifeo. Production secretary: Benito Carifi. Key grip: Mario Mancini. Editor: Mario Serandrei. Assistant editor: Lina Caterini. Music: Carlo Rustichelli. Distributor: Unidis.

Eva Bartok (Countess Cristiana Cuomo/Countess Christina Como), Cameron Mitchell (Massimo Morlacchi/Max Morlan), Thomas Reiner (Ispettore Silvestri/Inspector Sylvester), Ariana Gorini (Nicole), Mary Arden (Peggy), Lea Krugher (Greta), Claude Dantes (Tao-Li), Dante Di Paolo (Franco/Frank), Massimo Righi (Marco/Mark), Franco Ressel (Marquis Riccardo Morelli/Richard Morrell), Alan Collins [Luciano Pigozzi] (Cesare/Caesar), Giuliano Raffaelli (Inspector Zanchin), Francesca Ungaro (Isabella), Harriet White Medin (Clarissa/Clarice), Enzo Cerusico (gas station attendant), Nadia Anty (model).

Additional US credits: English-language version directed by Lou Moss. Title design: Filmation Associates. Dubbing actors include Paul Frees and Dante Di Paolo. Screen adaptation: Kelly Leon. Recording: Pat Somerset.

Austria: Der Würger mit der Maske, "The Strangler with the Mask"
Belgium: 6 Vrouwen voor de Moordenaar, Stellar Film, 1964
Denmark: Jernhanden i Raedselsnatten, "The Iron Hand in the Night of Horror," Trans American Film Corporation, 10/5/73
France: 6 Femmes pour l'Assassin, Les Films Marbeuf, 12/30/64, 87m
Germany: Blutige Seide, "Bloody Velvet," Gloria Film, Technicolor, 11/27/64
Japan: Six Women for the Murdere [sic]
Mexico: 6 Mujeres para el Asesino, Mario J. Dada, 1965
Spain: Seis Mujeres para el Asesino, Seleciónes Capitolino S. Huguet, 1965, 88m
UK: Blood and Black Lace, Gala Film Distributors Ltd., 1/6/66, 84m 1s, Certificate "X," passed with cuts [original length: 88m 11s]
US: Blood and Black Lace, Woolner Brothers via Allied Artists Pictures Corporation, Technicolor, 4/7/65, 88m much-younger Margheriti was filming his directorial debut—Space Men/Assignment Outer Space (1960)—on the stage next door. For years to come, the few critics who cared would refer to Space Men as "the first Italian science fiction film," a distinction that correctly belonged to La morte viene dallo spazio, which Bava had directed with Paolo Heusch in 1958. In August 1963, as Bava was in preproduction on Sei donne per l'assassino, Margheriti released La vergine di Norimberga/Horror Castle, starring Rosanna Podestà and Christopher Lee, which was based on an original novella by "Frank Bogart"[3] that appeared in the December 6, 1960 issue of K.K.K. I classici dell'orrore. Though not derived from a Mondadori publication, La vergine di Norimberga was nevertheless a giallo—the first full-length Italian color thriller to reflect the growing influence of the nation's pulp paperback culture, and it packed all the sleaze and sadism one expected from a gialli. Whether or not Bava felt trumped by Margheriti's film we'll never know, but an enmity between the two men was observed by people in their mutual orbit. As actor Luciano Pigozzi—who worked for both of them—confirms, "They were very jealous of one another."

Besides the growing Italian appetite for pulp fiction, two other major influences on the development of the cinematic giallo must be noted. The first was Alfred Hitchcock's Psycho—arguably the first film to devote as much creative skill to the staging of murders as earlier "whodunits" had devoted to the process of deduction. The second was West Germany's own peculiar brand of cinematic thriller, the krimi. Primarily, these were produced by Artur Brauner's CCC production house—enjoyable black-and-white thrillers based on the works of prodigious English novelist Edgar Wallace (1875–1932), with titles like Der Frosch mit der Maske/The Fellowship of the Frog (1960), Das Gasthaus an der Themse/The Inn by the River (1962), and Der Würger von Schloß Blackmoor/The Strangler of Blackmoor Castle (1963). Initially straightforward thrillers with an accentuated sense of humor and caricature, the Wallace-krimis—under the direction of such flamboyant stylists as Harald Reinl, Alfred Vohrer, and Franz Josef Gottlieb—rapidly evolved into something much like the gialli, featuring outrageous acts of murder (often viewed from the killer's perspective) and an increasingly audacious use of camera and music. The krimis, which enjoyed a certain popularity in Italy, would continue to be photographed in traditional black-and-white until 1966, the year after Bava's Sei donne per l'assassino was released in West Germany as Blutige Seide. It took Bava's fantastic leap of visual imagination to show the Germans how a thriller could be made in color without forfeiting essential menace and atmosphere.

THE COVER of this Italian publicity brochure confirms the film's giallo status by incorporating the yellow-cover, crimson-circle format of the Mondadori paperback covers.

Bava may have learned this lesson himself from an obscure Swedish thriller that predated even the West German krimis. Mannekäng i rött ("Mannequin in Red," 1958) was the second in a series of five films starring Karl-Arne Holmsten and Annalisa Ericson as the husband-and-wife detective team of John and Kajsa Hillman. Based on a series of pulp novels by Folke Mellvig (1913–94), the series began with Damen i svart ("The Lady in Black," also 1958), photographed in black-and-white by Sven Nykvist, in which the Hillmans investigated a series of murders allegedly committed by a ghost. All of Mellvig's novels had the gimmick of including a color in the title, and as director Arne Mattsson (1919–95) prepared to make his second Hillmanthriller (as they are known in Sweden), he took a lead from the title and decided to film Mannekäng i rött in color. Replacing Nykvist as cinematographer was Hilding Bladh (1907–82), whose own biggest prior success had been Ingmar Bergman's Gycklarnas afton/Sawdust and Tinsel (1953). Bladh approached color cinematography very much as Mario Bava did when he photographed Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova: he lit the sets and actors as he would have done were he filming in black-and-white. This, combined with diffused lighting filters and intricate cross-lighting, helped to give Mannekäng i rött a distinctively velvety texture which added greatly to its overall ambiance of luxuriant criminality and sin.

Since Mattsson's film was never widely distributed to other countries, and remains unavailable in English, a thorough account is necessary to this discussion. Like Sei donne per l'assassino, Mannekäng i rött is set in a fashion salon where a series of murders is taking place. The salon, La Femme, is owned and operated by the wheelchair-bound Madame Irina Thyra Lennberg (Lillebil Ibsen, always with a white cat on her lap) and comes to the attention of John Hillman after he uncovers a blackmailing scheme involving Lennberg's troubled foster son Bobby (Bengt Brunskog). When Katja (Elsa Prawitz), one of La Femme's star models, is found dead with a dagger in her back in the salon's picture window, Hillman's wife Kajsa agrees to go undercover, working as a freelance model to keep an eye on things from the inside. The behind-the-scenes atmosphere of the salon is quite the opposite of the image it projects, Kajsa finds, with a great deal of less literal back-stabbing going on as the business prepares for its annual fashion show. Mme. Lennberg's second-in-command, Birgitte "Gitte" Lindell (Anita Björk), plans to model her own original wedding gown design at the show, but she is replaced when the doting Rickard von Hook (Lennart Lindberg) persuades Mme. Lennberg to headline his wife Gabriella (Gio Petré), a local nightclub singer, instead. In time, Mme. Lennberg is seemingly killed when someone disables her elevator and sets her house ablaze, and

1 Ernst Lubitsch, as quoted by Dickie Moore in Scott Eyman, Ernst Lubitsch: Laughter in Paradise (New York NY: Simon & Schuster, 1993), 314.

2 Luigi Barzini, The Italians (New York NY: Bantam Books, 1965), 112–13.

3 The true author is presumed to be Maddelena Guy.

SCENES from Arne Mattsson's influential, pre-giallo thriller MANNEKÄNG I RÖTT.

a mock gallows near the salon that displays a hanging mannequin (in Sweden, an age-old gesture to celebrate the completion of a new building or roof) is found to be hanging Gabriella by the neck. Gitte assumes her position as La Femme's new administrator, but strange occurrences indicate that Mme. Lennberg may yet be alive; one night, the old woman's chauffeur fetches her empty wheelchair and takes it downstairs to her limousine, but only her white cat emerges from the back seat. She is also unsettled by the unexplained appearances of a woman in black (Eivor Landström), who seems to have inherited Mme. Lennberg's cat. Meanwhile, John Hillman's investigation, accompanied by the comic shenanigans of his partner Freddy (Nils Hallberg), leads him to suspect Bobby of the crimes, but they continue even after Bobby is found dead on the stage where the fashion show is to take place, shot by his own hand. One night, as Gitte works late, she hears the unmistakable squeak of Mme. Lennberg's wheelchair and sees her slowly approaching through the darkness. She was not killed in the fire that Gitte set, only badly burned. When Gitte asks how she managed to escape, Mme. Lennberg stands up in her wheelchair and walks toward her, gripping her would-be murderess by the throat. Gitte's lifeless body topples over the edge of the mezzanine and falls at the feet of the Hillmans and Freddy, just as they arrive. To their amazement, Mme. Lennberg descends the stairs, walks past them and phones for the police.

The murders in Mannekäng i rött are not at all graphic, and this fact—combined with the humorous content related to Freddy and his silly girlfriend Sonya (Lena Granhagen)—places Mattsson's film far more in the realm of the West German krimi than the Italian giallo. But the look of the film captures—rather, anticipates—the look of Bava's gialli on a level that even deliberate imitations never have. Even so, Hilding Bladh and art director Bibi Lindström make choices that Bava and Giorgio Giovannini would never have made; for example, although the Mattsson film was shot in Eastmancolor (and presumably developed at Technicolor, as per Bava's preference, judging from the look of it), the basic color template is disappointingly monochromatic. The walls and carpets and furniture at La Femme are cream-colored, and much of the wardrobe worn by the cast is similarly muted in hue—grays, moss greens, and mustards—in order to accentuate its calculated uses of red; Bladh would use much the same approach in the next Hillmanthriller for Mattsson, 1959's Ryttare i blatt ("Horseman in Blue"), which reserved emphasis for the color blue. The heavy use of whites and creams depletes too many shots in Mannekäng i rött of the riper beauty it might have had with a more daring palette, but with its beautiful women, velvet lighting, and prowling, low-angle camera movements through the darkened salon, Mattsson's film remains the most striking approximation of the classic Bava style in the earlier work of another cameraman.

Hilding Bladh may well have been influenced by Bava's earlier color cinematography, but anyone who sees Mannekäng i rött will agree that, somehow, Bava saw the picture and the influence became mutual. But Bava took the concept further, as he also did with the elements he would incorporate into his next film from the West German krimis and Hitchcock's Psycho. As screenwriter Joseph Stefano noted in a recent television interview, "The slasher movie came along because, if Psycho had two of these scenes, think what it will do at the boxoffice if it has three! And then, the next time, you say four . . ."

The Italian title Sei donne per l'assassino ("Six Women for the Murderer") provides the viewer with a literal scorecard for the mayhem ahead, thus qualifying it as the first authentic "body count" movie. Although the title was changed to Blood and Black Lace for the American market, the US sales campaign added to the promise of the original title by trumpeting "The 8 Greatest Shocks Ever Filmed!"[4]

Synopsis

A storm rages outside Cristiana Haute Couture, upsetting the fashion salon's shingle. One of the resident models, Nicole, sneaks outside to confer with her boyfriend, Frank—an antiques dealer, hooked on cocaine, who is angry with another model, Isabella, for taking the last of his supply. Later, as Isabella leaves the salon, she is intercepted by a white-masked marauder in the park, who bashes her to death against a tree trunk, and drags her into the woods. The next day, Isabella's defiled corpse is discovered inside an armoire by the salon's director, Countess Christina

THE KILLER (Freddy Unger) drags the battered body of Isabella (Francesca Ungaro) into the woods outside the salon.

Como, who inherited the business after the death of her husband. Max Morlan, Christina's partner, offers a description of Isabella's carefree lifestyle to Inspector Sylvester, who deduces from her corpse that the killer must be a sex maniac.

The unveiling of the new season's fashions must proceed as planned despite the negative publicity of the murder and the superstitions of the surviving models. It is during the fashion show that Nicole—the only model "cynical" enough to wear the black dress intended for Isabella—discovers a red-leather book . . . Isabella's diary! It is immediately obvious, from her co-workers' reaction to this discovery, that everyone at the salon has reason to fear the secret revelations contained in this book. When Christina makes the gesture of taking possession of it, to turn it over to the police, Nicole insists on doing this herself—as is her right, as the person who found it. Christina agrees. While Nicole is on stage modelling Isabella's dress, her purse—containing the diary—is stolen by unseen hands.

Nearly all of the salon's habitués have reason to want the diary destroyed. Nicole is supplying her lover Frank with drugs; Peggy, another model, is desperate to conceal the fact of an old abortion; Mark, who pops pills on the sly, is suffering from unrequited love for Peggy; another model, Greta, is living out of wedlock with the Marquis Riccardo Morelli, whose title masks his true financial destitution; and the house dresser Caesar is an insatiable eavesdropper, perhaps compiling a diary of his own for fun and profit.

Coming offstage, Nicole finds her purse and breaks away from the fashion show to deliver some cocaine to Frank at his antiques shop, where she is trapped, teased, and brutally murdered by the masked assassin, who slams a medieval spiked glove from a suit of armor onto her face. The killer rifles through her purse, but doesn't find the diary. The diary was actually stolen by Peggy, who tears the abortion-related pages from the diary and, after burning them in her fireplace, decides to commit the entire book to the flames. She is soon visited by the killer, who writes his demand "Where is the diary?" in a pocket notebook, rather than speak in a possibly familiar voice. Refusing to believe that Peggy has destroyed it, the assassin carries her off to a secret lair where he attempts to torture the truth out of her, by pressing her hand—and finally and fatally, her face—against a red-hot stove.

4 This hyperbole was previously used on Allied Artists' campaign for William Castle's 1958 release, House on Haunted Hill.

When Nicole's body is discovered, the police take the salon's male staff into 24-hour custody. During this period, Greta discovers Peggy's cadaver stuffed in the trunk of her sportscar. While hiding the body, she too is attacked by the faceless killer and smothered by a pillow. This incident leaves the police with no choice but to release the men, including Mark, whose dependency on pills is revealed as treatment for his epilepsy. As the men collect their appropriated belongings, the killer's notebook is revealed as the personal property of Max Morlan.

In fact, Max murdered Isabella, Nicole, and Peggy, while his lover Christina provided the alibi necessary for his release by murdering Greta. The secret couple's campaign of murder began with the killing of Christina's husband, necessary for her unencumbered inheritance of the salon and his wealth. Isabella knew the truth of what had happened, and threatened to blackmail Max and Christina. The revelation of Isabella's diary forced them to kill and kill again until the incriminating document was recovered. Max persuades Christina that, although the diary has been destroyed, it would benefit them to commit one last murder, to cement Sylvester's "sex-killer" theory.

PEGGY loans Nicole (Ariana Gorini) the keys to her car so that she can take drugs to her boyfriend.

ISABELLA*'s mutilated corpse is found stuffed inside a closet at the salon.*

Reluctantly, Christina (disguised in Max's white-masked costume) surprises the last of the salon's models—the exotic Tao-Li—in her bathroom, drowning her and slashing her wrists with a straight razor to simulate a suicide. The murderess is then surprised by a sudden "police arrival," faked by Max pounding on the door, which forces her to escape through a window onto a drain pipe, which her lover has taken care to disconnect from its brace. Christina's weight causes the pipe to come loose, and she falls three stories to the ground. Max returns to the salon, happy at the prospect of inheriting his partner's wealth and business, when a bruised and bloodied Christina appears to embrace him, pulling him against a concealed revolver. Together they bleed to death amid the shambles of their plan, as the red receiver of an upset telephone swings in the background.[5]

Production & Cast

Sei donne per l'assassino was written by I tre volti della paura's Marcello Fondato (later a director of Italian A-pictures, including 1969's Certo, certissimo, anzi . . . probabile with Claudia Cardinale) with the collaboration of Bava and (perhaps, as credited) one of the film's producers, Giuseppe Barilla. In addition to the apparent influence of Mannekäng i rött, the plotline about the missing diary owes a debt to Henri-Georges Clouzot's earlier, controversial thriller Le Corbeau

("The Raven," 1943), about a small community terrorized by someone whose eponymously signed letters threaten various citizens with the exposure of their various adulteries, abortions, and crimes.

The original Italian credits list Sei donne per l'assassino as an Italian-French-Monagascan production, while the American credits—which rename almost the entire production crew, with the exception of Bava himself—drop the French partner (Georges de Beauregard) in favor of Top Film, a German company based in Munich.[6]

Top Film, attracted to the marketability of the film as a krimi, is known to have been a partner in the production and was responsible for securing the participation of such German talent as Thomas Reiner, Lea Krugher, and Heidi Stroh.

The movie was shot under the working title L'atelier della morte ("The Fashion House of Death") over a six-week period. Shooting commenced in late November 1963 and continued through the first weeks of January 1964. According to the work diary of Armando Govoni, working for the first time in the capacity of production manager, shooting commenced in late November 1963—a mere three days after the assassination of US President John F. Kennedy in Dallas, Texas—and continued through January 1964. However, this starting date is challenged by the recollections of cast member Mary Arden, who (like all her contemporaries) remembers where she was that fateful day. "I know I had finished my shooting of Blood and Black Lace at the time of the assassination," she insists. "I was in New York City to meet with people on that day, that had been arranged by a director friend of Cameron Mitchell I met when we were shooting."

Nevertheless, the film was certainly in production in the wake of the assassination. It was the first national tragedy to be televised internationally, and for weeks, all around the world, the sting of sudden death and a dark cloud of mourning hung palpably in the air. Bava was perhaps affected by this occasion, and motivated to invest more feeling than usual in his handling of violent scenes, to convey the sense of loss and defilement so seldom acknowledged in movies constructed around acts of murder.

The budget was roughly $100,000–$125,000 in American dollars. The exteriors were filmed at the historic Villa Sciarra on Via Caladrelli, atop Gianicolo—one of the seven hills of Rome. It was there, under the groining arbors of its botanical gardens, that the murder of Isabella was filmed on a cold winter's night. The interiors, according to actress Lea Krugher, were filmed in a separate villa located on Via Pertica.

Bava was not overly fond of actors, but in Sei donne per l'assassino, he makes a point of acknowledging his cast in a remarkable main title sequence, which presents each of the dramatis personæ individually, posed in the manner of a store window mannequin, as their name wipes across the screen. (Mannekäng i rött opens with a similar conceit, as a svelte model in a red evening gown, scarves flowing in an ethereal breeze, stands to the left of a proscenium box, which opens to reveal a scrolling list of the film's credits.) In a business where actors never receive 100% screen credit unless they have reached the summit of their profession, Bava rewards nearly every actor with a speaking part by giving them the entire screen, all to themselves, for a few seconds at the very beginning.

TWO SHOTS of Cameron Mitchell as Max Morlan. The second finds him clowning for the stills photographer with guest corpse Mario Bava.

5 Though Sei donne per l'assassino was a European co-production, it was filmed with the majority of the cast speaking their lines in English, as rewritten on the set by actress Mary Arden. Therefore, although the salon's sign presents Christina's name as Cristiana, as it is given in the dubbed Italian soundtrack, I will refer to the film's characters with their English names, which, apart from this one case, have greater authenticity.

6 The American credits of Blood and Black Lace include the following absurd Americanisms: Herman Tarzana (Ubaldo Terzano), Mark Suran (Mario Serandrei), Harry Brest (Arrigo Breschi), Joe Barilla (Giuseppe Barilla), and Carl Rustic (Carlo Rustichelli).

Top-billed (in most countries, anyway) was Cameron Mitchell, who was delighted to be working with Bava again. "I had remained in touch with Bava, hoping that we would find another project to do together," he reported. In the intervening years between 1961 and 1963, much of Mitchell's screen work had been for lesser Italian directors such as Pino Mercanti and Sergio Bergonzelli, so when Bava wanted him for Sei donne, Mitchell eagerly accepted his invitation, though the role of Max Morlan didn't ask too much more of him than to sit at a desk and smoke cigarettes. "There was a special chemistry between us," Mitchell reasoned. "Bava was one of my favorite people on the planet." Mitchell found Bava to be in a genial mood during the filming, though he too had heard rumors about the nervous breakdown he was alleged to have suffered. "We never talked about it because, in this business, frankly, everybody breaks down. I think it was fairly serious with Mario, however."

Mitchell's co-stars seem to remember him favorably. German actor Thomas Reiner, who played the hardboiled Inspector Sylvester, shared Mitchell's daily taxi ride from the hotel to the villa where they were shooting. "The taxi picked us up at the hotel, and in the car, he always brought up something to talk about," Reiner smiles. "But I never understood him properly because he spoke with such heavy slang. I could never figure out what he was saying, even though my English wasn't bad! I think Bava may have had the same problem, even though his English wasn't bad either, for an Italian." [7]

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by M. Colizzi. Note that this poster places "A Film by Mario Bava" above the title and above the stars' names—a first in Bava's career.

Mitchell also won the respect of "the Italian Peter Lorre," Luciano Pigozzi, especially after he had the experience of working with other American stars. "Mitchell was a very good actor; I saw him in many films—even in a horror film I saw two days ago!—[he was] always good. Everything was very happy, nothing bad. There were no drunk people, you understand. When I made Berlino—appuntamento per le spie/Spy in Your Eye [1966], we had another American actor, Dana Andrews. He would start drinking whiskey in the early morning. Very bad."

Max is eventually unmasked as the film's assassin, but Cameron Mitchell did not play the masked scenes himself. The killer—a faceless brute in a trenchcoat and slouch hat with antecedents in "The Blank" (a.k.a. Frank Redrum), a villain who enlivened Chester Gould's Dick Tracy comic strip in 1937, and also in the white-masked gunman of Edgar Wallace's 1930 novel White Face—was actually played by Italian stuntman Goffredo "Freddy" Unger, a close friend and associate of Bava's since the early 1960s. The son of a travelling circus family, Unger was born to a Spanish father and an Italian mother in Oslo, Norway, on June 6, 1933. In addition to being one of Italy's most in-demand stunt professionals, Unger is well-known within the Italian film industry as the most accomplished student of Italy's postwar Maestro d'armi, Musumuri-Greco.

Supporting Mitchell in Sei donne per l'assassino were several excellent character actors carried over from earlier Bava films, carratteristi for whose faces Mario had a particular simpatia. Harriet White Medin, back for her third Bava film in a row, was cast in the thankless (but amusing) red herring role of Clarice—yet another housekeeper, this one introduced from behind while wearing the same black trenchcoat worn earlier by the killer. Walked from one room of the villa (Peggy's apartment) to another (police headquarters) on a one-day schedule, Medin remembered nothing of the filming and was repelled by the picture's sadistic cruelty.

"I think it's absolutely horrible," she once groaned in my ear after a screening of the picture. We later discussed her response to the movie at length, and she expanded on her thoughts: "When you get to be my age and you begin to accept the fact that you're not going to be around forever, violence on the screen loses whatever entertainment value it may have had when you were younger and thought of yourself as immortal and indestructible. Perhaps I take the film more personally than you do!" When I praised the film's style and technique, she responded, "Technique? Well, I worked in films for over forty years and still don't know the first thing about film technique."

Sei donne would be Medin's last collaboration with Bava. Her marriage to art director Gastone Medin had turned sour and she was looking for a way out. After working as the continuity girl and dialogue coach on John Huston's Reflections in a Golden Eye in 1967, Medin was invited by the film's second unit director Andrew "Bundy" Marton—famous for directing the second unit, and most of the chariot race, of William Wyler's Ben-Hur (1959)—to return to the States with his family and live in the guest house on their Beverly Hills property. On impulse, she accepted at the last minute, leaving behind her husband, most of her possessions, and a sink full of unwashed dishes. In America, she worked primarily on the Los Angeles stage and on television, but she also appeared in bit parts in such films as Schlock! (1972, a non-SAG role that she played under the alias "Enrica Blankey"), Death Race 2000 (1975, in which she played the President of the United States), The Witches of Eastwick (1987), and Things To Do in Denver When You're Dead (1995). She can briefly be seen in James Cameron's The Terminator (1984) as a restaurant customer served by waitress Linda Hamilton, and as a shocked grocery store shopper in The Witches of Eastwick (1987).

Medin's later work was limited to rare series television guest appearances on programs such as Who's the Boss? and The A Team. The most notable examples are her recurring role as Jessie on the science fiction themed My Life and Times (1991), and her performance as Nedra Larkin, an elderly woman willing herself to die, in the 1993 Northern Exposure episode "First Snow." A longtime cancer survivor, Medin suffered from memory loss and senility for much of her last decade and died in Los Angeles of natural causes on May 20, 2005, at the age of 91.

Appearing at a 1993 screening of Blood and Black Lace at the Directors Guild Theater in Los Angeles, Medin told host Joe Dante: "I don't know what Bava saw in me . . . but I'm very grateful to him for thinking of me and giving me all those funny little jobs to do."

Another of Bava's "funny little jobbers" was Franco Ressel, who had previously lent his imperious presence to Le meraviglie di Aladino and Gli invasori, and in Sei donne per l'assassino found his definitive role as the penniless Marquis Richard Morell. It would also be Ressel's final role for Bava, though he continued to appear in miscellaneous Spaghetti Westerns, gialli, and other exploitation fare over the next twenty years, notably Antonio Margheriti's I criminali della galassia/Wild, Wild Planet (1965) and L'inafferabile, invincibile Mr. Invisibile/Mr. Superinvisible (1970), Mario Caiano's L'occhio nel labirinto/Eye of the Labyrinth (1971), and Tonino Ricci's I vivi invidierianno i morti/Panic

CAMERON MITCHELL, Luciano Pigazzi, Giuliano Raffaelli, and Thomas Reiner await Harriet White Medin's opinion on "whodunit."

7 Thomas Reiner interviewed by Uwe Huber, September 2000.

PORTRAIT shot of Mary Arden, a VOGUE cover girl and former June Taylor Dancer who has a date with a red hot stove.

(1976). After completing a role in Federico Fellini's Et la nave va/And the Ship Sails On (1984), Ressel died in 1985 at the age of 60.

Dante Di Paolo, so effective as the mysterious journalist Landini in La ragazza che sapeva troppo, gives another memorable performance as the cocaine-addicted mooch, Frank. "I didn't have any experience being around narcotics to draw on or anything," Di Paolo says, "but, like the other character I played for Bava, this guy was kind of a lone wolf and he was desperate, and that I could understand. I just did my best to become the character, and the makeup person would come around and spritz me once in awhile so I would look sweaty on camera."

Di Paolo disappeared from Italian films after this, divorcing his wife (then known as Nadia Sanders) and returning to Los Angeles. It was there that he noticed an item in the trades announcing that Sei donne per l'assassino was being dubbed into English at a local recording studio to be released by the Woolner Brothers. Di Paolo placed a call to the studio and, having introduced himself as one of the film's stars, was hired for the first and only time to dub one of his own performances.

Some time in the late 1960s, a chance meeting at a red traffic light brought Di Paolo back together with his old flame, Rosemary Clooney, who had divorced José Ferrer in 1967. "I followed her and waited till she got out of her car, then I wrote my name and number in the dust on her windshield," he laughs. "She called me, and we were never apart after that." The couple lived and worked together for a quarter century—Di Paolo functioning as Clooney's tour manager and master of ceremonies at her concerts—before marrying in Clooney's hometown of Augusta, Kentucky, in November 1997. He was widowed when Clooney died of lung cancer on June 30, 2002. Today, Dante Di Paolo lives in Hollywood—an 80-year-old caregiver to his 97-year-old mother, who lives next door—in an apartment that he now shares with his ex-wife, Nadine. "Life is such an amazing adventure, she's become my best friend again," he marvels, "and, at this very moment, she's calling me in to dinner!"

Massimo Righi—who had previously played Pietro, one of Gorka's ill-fated sons in "The Wurdalak"—is also impressive as the pitiful, lovesick epileptic Mark. Righi would work with Bava once again, playing one of the zombified astronauts in Terrore nello spazio/Planet of the Vampires (1965).

Thomas Reiner was a newcomer to Bava's films. Born in Stuttgart, Germany, on October 29, 1926, Reiner reckons that Inspector Sylvester was the biggest part he ever had in a movie; though classically trained, he would spend most of his career as a television and dubbing actor. Reiner's voice is instantly recognizable to the German public from its use in countless cartoon shows and imported movies and TV series; for example, he dubbed the voice of Hayden Rorke's Maj. Bellows in the series I Dream of Jeannie, and because his own speaking voice is very similar to that of Vincent Price, he dubbed Price's performances in a number of German imported features. In the period immediately following Sei donne per l'assassino, Reiner starred in the West German science fiction series Raumpatroille—Die phantastischen Abenteuer des Raumschiffs Orion ("The Fantastic Adventures of the Starship Orion"), which was essentially Star Trek years before there was a Star Trek. He is still active in German dubbing today.

Reiner remembers two things "vividly" about the production: "The first . . . I came from Germany doing television and was used to, let's say, dull camerawork. It was fascinating for me to see the imaginative ways in which a camera could be used. I especially remember the scene in the antiques store. I wasn't in that scene, but I attended the shooting. I think the secret was that there was no direct sound. In Germany, they always spent a lot of time arranging the microphones. Bava didn't have to bother about that, because everything was dubbed in later."

To interrupt for a moment: although Sei donne per l'assassino is one of the most sumptuous-looking Italian films of the 1960s, Cameron Mitchell remembered that the equipment at Bava's disposal was at times preposterously primitive. "Do you remember that wonderful dolly shot through the fashion house? Well, our dolly on that shot was a kid's red wagon! And when we had to do a crane type of shot, we didn't have a crane. They literally took something like a seesaw and counterbalanced the camera by sitting crew people on the other end! But wasn't that elegant? Didn't that film have style?"

Back to Thomas Reiner's other vivid recollection: "Secondly, while shooting this movie, I developed my love for basset hounds. Bava had one, and I loved it. Mario was very happy that he had somebody (me!) who would walk his dog during breaks in the shooting. When I returned to Germany, I immediately bought a basset hound, and my wife and I have always had bassets to this very day!"[8]

Bava liked Reiner's performance and also responded warmly to his obvious affection for his dog, Centi. "Bava said I should stay in Rome, that there would be work for me," Reiner remembers. "But I didn't know anybody there, so I didn't risk it. I returned to Germany, where I had a lot of work in television and the dubbing industry. I have no regrets." Reiner did go back to Italy once again, in 1967, to play a small role in Gianfranco Parolini's wacky superhero fantasy, I fantastici tre supermen/The Three Fantastic Supermen.

Giuliano Raffaelli, who plays Silvestri's burly, trenchcoated partner Inspector Zanchin, was occasionally billed in other movies under the name Jean Rafferty. He isn't given much of an opportunity to shine in Sei donne per l'assassino, but he went on to become a favorite of director Antonio Margheriti, who cast him in four pictures: I lunghi capelli della morte/The Long Hair of Death (1964), the aforementioned I criminali della galassia (1965), Contronatura/The Unnaturals (1968), and the atmospheric Western . . . E Dio disse a Caino/. . . And God Said to Cain (1970).

Seen briefly as a gas station attendant is Enzo Cerusico, who made a stab at American stardom with the short-lived TV series My Friend Tony in 1969. Born in 1937, Cerusico started out as a child actor and graduated to adult roles in Fellini's La dolce vita, in which he played a papparazzo. His other film work includes Romolo e Remo/Duel of the Titans (1961) with Steve Reeves and Gordon Scott, Ercole sfida Sansone/Hercules, Samson and Ulysses (1963), L'Etrusco uccide ancora/The Dead Are Alive! (1972), and two projects for Dario Argento: the historical dramody Le cinque giornate/The Five Days of Milan and the TV thriller Un tram. He died in 1991.

NICOLE falls victim to a lethal spiked glove from a suit of armor.

8 Ibid.

When asked what he remembers best about this production, Luciano Pigozzi laughs, "I remember . . . many women!" All these years later, his voice still conveys a sense of the delight he felt at being surrounded daily by so much feminine beauty—which brings us to the "sei donne."

In the order of their deaths, the first is Francesca Ungaro, who plays the short-lived role of Isabella—whose red-bound diary is the motivation behind the film's mayhem. Ungaro doesn't seem to have had a film career before or after this movie, so there's not much that can be said about her. Although stuntman Freddy Unger is sometimes billed as "Goffredo Ungaro" in Italian films, this actress/model was no relation to him. In fact, considering that a "Via Francesca Ongaro" exists in Rome, the name of this apparent one-time performer may be pseudonymous.

Similarly, little is known about Ariana Gorini, who gets a remarkable amount of screen time as Nicole, the antiques shop murder victim—a strong contender for Bava's greatest setpiece of horror and suspense. She was originally known as Adriana Gorini in the early 1960s, when she was frequently seen on the covers of fashion magazines, and subsequently graduated to television commercials for Pocket Coffee (a brand of chocolate), in which she appeared with Ugo Tognazzi. Gorini appears to have made only one other picture—Alberto Lattuada's L'imprevisto (1961), starring Anouk Aimée and Tomas Milian. Ms. Gorini was recently discovered living in Milan, where she works as a medium. [9]

Fortunately, there is a bounty of information to report about Mary Arden, the cool blonde who plays the role of Peggy. Born Dawne Hoffman on July 30 in St. Louis, Missouri, she was the daughter of a Russian-born concert pianist who was killed in a traffic accident while she was still very young, and raised by her mother with the Arden surname. A working dancer since the age of 9, Arden settled with her widowed mother in Florida, where she found her first international success as one of the legendary June Taylor Dancers, best remembered for their appearances on The Jackie Gleason Show. Once in Europe, she decided to focus on modelling with an eye on furthering her acting career. She was a highly successful fashion model in France and Italy, doing couture collection shows for Yves St. Laurent, Christian Dior, and Karl Lagerfeld, and appearing on the covers of numerous magazines, including Harper's Bazaar, Madamoiselle, and Italian Vogue. Feeling a greater affinity for the Italian people, she relocated from Paris to Rome and began appearing in films, including Gianni Puccini's L'attico (1962), written by La maschera del demonio's Ennio De Concini. Gifted with a natural facility for languages. Arden came to Europe monolingual but quickly added French and Italian to her repertoire. Once she was cast in Sei donne per l'assassino, this talent worked to the advantage of Bava's film.

THIS SHOT of the killer dragging Peggy away from her apartment clearly shows that Mary Arden was not involved in this stunt.

"The Italian guy who wrote the script had no great knowledge of American or English conversation, so the script was full of mistakes," Arden recalls. "Being fluent in three languages, I offered to rewrite the dialogue for Mario while we were filming, so it would make better sense. He was very grateful."

Arden remembers performing the majority of her own stunts in the picture. "When we were doing the fight scene in my apartment, the stagehands were supposed to whip a mattress under me to break my fall every time I got knocked down during the fight—which, you can be sure, was repeated many times. They never got the mattress in the right spot to cushion my fall. They meant well, but I always hit the hard ground. I can assure you I was very bruised in this film!" Though Arden was filmed participating in these stunts, she does not appear in all of the stunts as they are seen in the final cut.

Freddy Unger, who also worked as the film's stunt coordinator, explains that Bava always took a set approach to the filming of important action scenes, because he knew that actors usually fought for the right to do their own stunts, but very few of them were able to really sell a fight (for example) on camera. "Mario had learned a very important lesson from working with Riccardo Freda," Unger explains. "He would shoot his action scenes in their entirety with the stunt men, like me, so that he was completely covered—and then he would bring in the actors to film as much or as little as they liked. If the actors gave him any trouble, he would say, 'That's okay, I have all I need!'" [10]

Therefore, before the violent scenes between Peggy and the killer were filmed with Mary Arden, the same scenes had already been filmed—without the actress' knowledge—using a stuntman in drag. A production still exists that shows Peggy's limp body being dragged upstairs by the masked assassin, and the body certainly does not belong to the glamorous Arden, with its swarthy arms, skinny legs, and ratty blonde wig.

Arden states emphatically that "the most difficult part of my performance was the five days I spent playing a dead

9 Some years ago, I was responsible for spreading the rumor that Gorini was in fact a German actress named Diana Koerner, whom I had seen in the West German Edgar Wallace krimi Die Blaue Hand/Creature With the Blue Hand (1967). Not only did Ms. Koerner greatly resemble Gorini, she was also terrorized in this film by a spiked metal glove, much like the one that brings such a swift and merciless end to Nicole in Sei donne per l'assassino. However, as I was preparing to record my audio commentary for VCI Home Entertainment's Blood and Black Lace DVD, my correspondent Uwe Huber succeeded in speaking to Ms. Koerner, now an actress on a German TV soap opera. She assured him that she had never worked under the name Ariana Gorini, and though she was familiar with Mario Bava by name and reputation, she never had the pleasure of working with him.

10 Freddy Unger interviewed by the author, January 5, 2001.

body." She tells a particularly harrowing story about the filming of the scene in which Peggy's disfigured corpse had to tumble halfway out the boot of Greta's car. According to Arden, Bava rehearsed this scene in advance with Lea Krugher many times, because it was essential to Arden's safety that Krugher flip the trunk lid completely open—that she hear it click—before leaping back in recoil. The reason for this is that the trunk lid was on a very strong spring which caused it to fall back down very rapidly if it was not fully raised and secured. Unfortunately, in her nervousness, Krugher failed to follow Bava's precautions during the actual take and recoiled before ascertaining that the trunk door was fully opened.

GRETA (Lea Krugher) discovers Peggy's mutilated corpse in the boot of her sports car . . . a night of filming that Mary Arden will never forget.

"She jumped back, I rolled out, and the trunk lid hit my face—especially my nose—with tremendous force," Arden describes. "I cannot tell you the pain and agony of that experience! I thought my nose was broken (I still bear a small scar where the lid hit my nose). You have to imagine: we're in the middle of nowhere, in the early hours of the morning, it's freezing cold and there's no medical person on the set. The lock on the car was very sharp and protruded almost four inches downward. It just missed my eye. I was hysterical. I could have lost an eye and been crippled for life. It is a miracle I was not more seriously injured. Mario stopped shooting, packed me in ice, and held me for a long time until I began to regain control. He was very kind to me—but I had also risked my life for him making this film! It was the most dangerous experience I ever had."

Arden's burned features took four hours for makeup artist Emilio Trani to apply on each morning of her five days as a corpse. One night, her day's work left her so exhausted that she couldn't bear the idea of spending another hour or two in the makeup chair having it all removed, so—having an early call the next day—Arden decided to wear it home for the night, covered by a scarf. "My mother happened to be visiting me in Rome at the time, and when came through the door and took off my scarf, it gave her the fright of her life. It really was an excellent makeup."

Shortly after the production of Sei donne per l'assassino, Variety reported that Mario Bava was planning another collaboration with Mary Arden, but this never happened. Instead, Arden moved on—and up—into Fellini's Giulietta degli spiriti/Juliet of the Spirits (1965), in which she played the role of a TV "self-improvement" hostess. Unfortunately, her two-month shooting engagement with Fellini was eventually whittled down to no more than two brief appearances in the final cut. In 1965, Arden married American actor Arthur Hansel, who would star in two minor Italian films, Missione apocalisse and Le dolci signore in 1966–67. It was in 1966 that Arden spent her busiest year in movies, appearing in Master Stroke (a spy picture which reunited her with Luciano Pigozzi), A . . . come Assassino (a screen adaptation of Ernesto Gastaldi's seminal giallo stageplay), and a brief but critical role in Umberto Lenzi's La maschera di Kriminal, based on the violent fumetti strip by Max Bunker.

In the early 1970s, Arden and her husband relocated to Mexico City, where she co-hosted public television programs with Juan Lopez Moctezuma—who began directing a series of his own horror films around this same time, including La mansión de la locura/Dr. Tarr's Torture Dungeon (1972), Alucarda la hija de la tinieblas/Alucarda (1975), and Mary Mary Bloody Mary (1976); Arthur Hansel, whom Arden amicably divorced in 1972, had small roles in the first and third of these. It was also in Mexico City that Arden founded a school for acting, modelling, and self-improvement, where she also taught. Between 1975 and 1979, she worked in Latin America and the Caribbean as general manager of Helena Rubinstein International, and from there she moved to Tokyo, where in the 1990s she developed a business training program to help Japanese executives better communicate with their Western office managers. Today, as Mary Dawne Arden, she's the president of Arden Associates, a New York City marketing communications firm. She serves as a Communications expert for NBC News, in which capacity she has made several appearances on NBC's Weekend Today Show, and as a faculty member of New York University.

PORTRAIT of Lea Krugher.

Greta, the model who "lives in sin" with the impoverished Marquis Richard Morrell, was played by Lea Krugher, who today goes by the name Lea Lander. Born September 5, 1937, in Kiev, Ukraine, Krugher studied acting for five years in Munich before making her first picture. At the time, she already had it in mind to change her name. "I liked the sound—the phonetic effect—of Lea Lander," she explains. "Krugher is very German and very hard and I am not that, as you can see. And Lander, this is the machine that goes to the moon! And I was always very attracted to the moon, and I was thinking 'I can never go to the sun because I would be burned before I got there, but perhaps I will go to the moon.' And I was reading many times 'Lander'—a long time ago—and I said, 'This will be my name.'"

Krugher's choice of name met with resistance from her agent, who thought it would more to her professional advantage to keep her birth name and publicize her family relationship to the popular German actor Hardy Kruger, a "second or third cousin." So it was as "Lea Krugher" that she starred in Mario Caiano's Golia e la schiava ribelle/Goliath and the Rebel Slave (1963) with Gordon Scott, and also Sei donne per l'assassino. Krugher's character name in Sei donne was suggested by Bava himself, because he thought she resembled Greta Garbo. Ten years after playing Greta—the donna smothered by a pillow—she would work again with Bava (under the new screen name of Lea Lander), playing Maria, the principal hostage of his 1975 crime thriller Cani arrabbiati/ Rabid Dogs. In that film, too, the characters remark on her supposed resemblance to Greta Garbo.

LIKE a fashion layout from Death Magazine, the police discover the lifeless bodies of Greta and Peggy in this artful arrangement.

"I moved to Italy to do Sei donne," Lander relates. "I loved the story very much, and I [looked forward to] the opportunity of working with Eva Bartok, a big star. Of all the other actresses, I remember only Mary Arden. I liked her . . . She was my—how do you say it?—my idol. She was very nice and kind, and had a mysterious glamor like an American actress in a Hitchcock film, always very elegant. [11] We were shooting in a beautiful villa on Via Pertica. We arrived there during the day and the house took you away—to another time, another place . . . ! Full of beautiful antiques, neo-classical architecture. I was most impressed by the villa, I loved to explore it—and it was full of ambiance and atmosphere. Mario Bava was always very kind, very optimistic, and keen to solve problems because every day we had to improvise. He was very relaxed and always seemed on top of things. I also remember his son Lamberto, and how respectful he was of his father. He was his second assistant. He watched and followed his father's guidance, and I admired that. It's incredible now, the success of Mario Bava's pictures, as Mario did everything himself and for not very much money. I never realized the commercial impact the film would have."

Undoubtedly cast to exploit her remarkable resemblance to a department store mannequin was Claude Dantes, who had previously given her most widely-seen performance in an uncredited role—as the mother of a baby falsely claimed by another, barren woman in King Vidor's Solomon and Sheba (1959). Dantes' other screen credits include Mario Costa's Rage of the Buccaneers (1961, starring Vincent Price and Ricardo Montalban) and an interesting, but little-known Italian horror film entitled La jena di Londra/ The Hyena of London (1963). Made less than a year before Sei donne per l'assassino, La jena di Londra features a Claude Dantes who bears only the slightest resemblance to the one in Sei donne, being at least forty pounds heavier.

Of all his co-stars, Cameron Mitchell remembered Claude Dantes best: "She told me that she had suffered from a nervous eating disorder and had gone to Paris about a month before the film started. In those days, they'd put you to sleep for three weeks, massage you, give you pills or injections to relax you, and it would help take the weight right off. Obviously, when we did the film, she looked great." Dantes is known to have made only one other movie after working with Bava: L'uomo mascherato/ Goliath and the Masked Avenger (1965), directed by Vertunnio De Angelis.

CLAUDE DANTES as Tao-Li, drowned in a murder scene unusually explicit for its time.

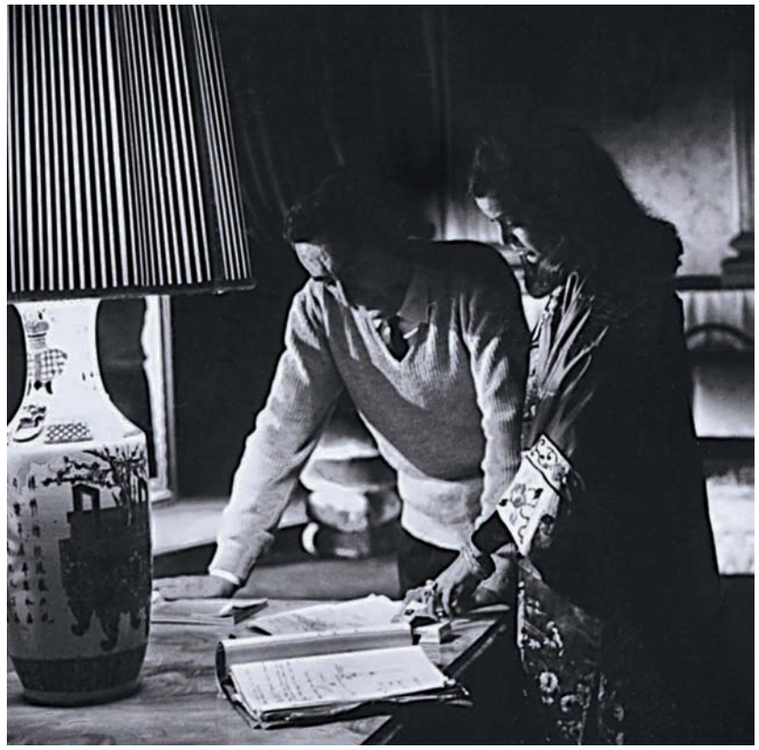
The sixth of the film's "sei donne"—or its first, if you like—was Eva Bartok, its top-billed actress. Born Eva Maria Szoke in 1926, Bartok was only 37 years old at the time of filming but she had already written her autobiography, Worth Living For, published in 1959. In this memoir, she writes movingly about the volatile wartime conditions of her homeland of Kecskemet, Hungary. As a young girl, she shared a house with her widowed mother that was occupied by a Hungarian soldier as her country awaited invasion—not knowing whether it would come from Nazi Germany on the left, or from Russia on the right. She later fell in love with another Hungarian soldier at the age of 15; the diary angle of Sei donne per l'assassino must have had some resonance for her, as she writes that this soldier entrusted her with a candid diary of his war experiences in Russia, making her promise to burn it in the event of invasion. They burned it together one week later as Nazi forces descended on Kecskemet. By the time she was 25 years old, Eva had been married three times. Her first marriage was at age 15 to a Nazi soldier who helped her and her mother to escape from Hungary, raped her on their wedding night, and then confessed, after the war ended, that he wasn't really a German soldier at all; he was promptly arrested as a war criminal by the Hungarian government. Her second marriage was to a chance acquaintance who wed her as a means of gaining her (and her mother's) passage into Paris; it was immediately and amicably annulled. Her third husband was film producer Alexander Paal, who married Eva to repay kindnesses shown to him by her late father, thus making it possible for her to leave Paris for the complete freedom of London. There, she pursued a career in films under the wing of fellow Hungarian Alexander Korda, whom she impressed with clippings of her theatrical successes in their homeland.



11 When told how much Lea Krugher admired her, Mary Dawne Arden laughed and said, "I didn't know that! She was probably just grateful that I didn't kill her for dropping the car's trunk door on my nose!"

While Korda was grooming her for stardom, Bartok often appeared in the British society pages wearing unusual fashions, which she had designed and created herself out of sheer penniless necessity. In 1953, after parting ways with Korda, she was cast in Der Leztze Walzer/The Last Waltz opposite German actor Curd Jurgens. They fell in love, and subsequently married in 1955. Before Sei donne per l'assassino, Bartok starred in such films as Robert Siodmak's The Crimson Pirate (1952), Terence Fisher's Spaceways (1953), John Gilling's The Gamma People (1956), and her only American film, Two Thousand Bedrooms with Dean Martin, which she made after divorcing Jurgens in 1957. After making her US debut, Bartok became the topic of international headlines when it was discovered that she had given birth to a daughter out of wedlock. The child's name, Deana, gave rise to speculation that her father was Bartok's Hollywood co-star, Dean Martin. Years later, after her daughter had reached adulthood, Bartok publicly confessed that her true father was Martin's "Rat Pack" cohort Frank Sinatra, with whom she had a short affair during the production. (The child on the cover of her book looks very much like him.) In later years, Bartok's name was romantically linked to Britain's Marquess of Milford Havens. Her past history as a fashion innovator and hobnobber in British high society, and as the object of international scandal, made Eva Bartok ideal casting for the role of the Countess Christina Como.

Like many of her co-stars in this movie, Eva Bartok was a person of unusual substance, awareness, and intelligence, who preferred life and the company of interesting people to a more visible career. In addition to chronicling the turbulence of her times, her autobiography examines her inner turbulence as well, a deep-seated spiritual unrest—with her since childhood—that she sought to comfort by reading the Bible, the wisdom of Buddha, and the works of Freud, Einstein, and Carl Jung.

EVA BARTOK as Countess Cristina Cuomo, flinching from the discovery of Isabella's body.

MARIO BAVA and Eva Bartok consult the screenplay.

Bartok "found that they all agreed on one thing: that life as we see it is wrong, that life as we live it is wrong, that life as we attempt to describe it does not conform to the inner reality that must exist if there is any sense at all in the universe." She eventually found a path to contentment at the Institute for the Comparative Study of History, Philosophy and the Sciences, founded by J. G. Bennett, a disciple of the mystic George Ivanovich Gurdjieff. Eva found that Bennett's system of arriving at personal clarity through a disciplined routine of physical work and continuous learning helped to instill in her the sense of order, purpose, and alertness which had always eluded her.

Bartok retired from films around 1967, made a brief cameo appearance in one last film in the mid-'70s, and died at age 71 of heart failure in a London hospital on August 4, 1998. The press reported that she died "homeless, penniless, and alone," to which her daughter Deana responded in her August 11 eulogy, "Homeless, because she never appreciated the domestic trappings in life. Penniless, because she didn't really care about money. Alone—she was not! God was with her, I was with her in spirit, and so were many other people." [12]

On the set, Bartok kept her distance from her fellow actors. "I remember that Eva Bartok was very much the diva," laughs Lea Lander. "More often than not, we had to wait for her and I thought to myself, 'These are lessons for you—to teach [you] how to behave when, one day, you are a diva!' She was beautifully dressed and she always looked beautiful. She had her own makeup room with a star on the door. She also had all these male admirers after her."

Bartok's naturally red hair works very well in concert with the film's color scheme, and Bava became very partial to redheads; the female leads of his next several pictures—Jany Clair (La strada per Fort Alamo), Norma Bengell (Terrore nello spazio), and Erika Blanc (Operazione paura), and also the later Claudine Auger (Ecologia del delitto)—all had red or strawberry blonde hair.

THIS BELGIAN affiche incorporates graphic elements from the Italian one-sheet and locandina designs.

Also appearing in the periphery of scenes at Cristiana Haute Couture are Heidi Stroh (who had some hit singles in Germany in the 1970s), Mara Carmosino, and Nadia Anty.

The film's status as an international co-production resulted in unequal revenue for the actors. An experienced hand at the insecurities of Italian film production, Cameron Mitchell was paid in cash from a suitcase that was brought to the set at the beginning of each week. The same was probably also true for Eva Bartok, but many in the supporting cast—like hard-working actress/translator Mary Arden—worked in advance with the understanding that they would be paid in full at the end of production, and never saw their salaries. (Arden estimates that her pay would not have amounted to much more than $500, saying, "I acted to promote myself; I earned my living by modelling.") On the other hand, the West German investors—Top Film—evidently took very good care of the German actors in the cast.

Thomas Reiner was not only paid for his work, but treated to a salaried vacation: "I don't know how big the budget was," he marvels, "but they could afford to send me on holiday for two weeks! After my first day of shooting, the producers—very fine people, unlike some others I know from Germany—came up to me and said, 'You now have two weeks off. Go and see Rome!' The catering was very good, as well."

The same is true of Lea Lander, who confides, "I was paid a small amount by the German producer, Top Film . . . but there have been other pictures here in Italy I have not been paid for."

L'atelier della morte was retitled Sei donne per l'assassino during post-production. The new title was another of Bava's winks at a mainstream success of the day, in this case Leopoldo Torre-Nilsson's Quatre femmes pour un heros ("Four Women for a Hero," 1962), a French import that proved very popular in Italy in 1963, thanks to the star presence of glamorous Alida Valli. Bava's tongue-in-cheek title would prove inspirational in its own right; in later years, many Italian thrillers would proclaim a nominal debt to Sei donne per l'assassino, none more overtly than Stelvio Massi's admittedly cut-rate Cinque donne per l'assassino ("Five Women for the Murderer," 1972).

Bava himself would be the next Italian director to take another stab at the giallo, with a formulaic reworking of Sei donne per l'assassino, entitled Cry Nightmare. Circumstances caused Bava to abandon the production before it was realized, and it fell into the hands of his rival Antonio Margheriti, who filmed Bava's script basically as written and released it as Nude . . . si muore/The Young, the Evil and the Savage (1968). But it was not until the worldwide 1970 success of Dario Argento's L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo/The Bird With the Crystal Plumage—a film that also had German investors, and was sold in West Germany as a Bryan Edgar Wallace adaptation—that the giallo came into its own as an Italian film tradition. Incredible as it may seem, with such recent examples as Dario Argento's Ti piace Hitchcock?/Do You Like Hitchcock? (2005), the giallo has outlasted every other cinematic genre indigenous to Italy, surviving even the Spaghetti Western.

12 Omar Martinez, Eva & I, A Dedication, http://members.tripod.com/evabartok/id22.htm (February 4, 2006).

Music

After their fruitful collaboration on La frusta e il corpo, Bava made a point of retaining Carlo Rustichelli to write the music for Sei donne per l'assassino. Interviewed late in life, the composer remembered his surprised reaction when Bava first screened the picture for him: "There was no doubt, it was something new. I was somewhat shocked by it, partly by its erotic quality. Yes, it certainly shocked me. But I think I wrote some things for it that worked . . . Generally speaking, I am more keen on murder mysteries than horror movies . . . the traditional giallo, where the murders are committed with a sense of style." [13]

Rustichelli did more than write "some things that worked." He was inspired to compose the definitive giallo score of the pre-rock era. In the later genre work of Dario Argento, the violence of murder is accentuated with the violence of progressive rock scores by such artists as Goblin and Keith Emerson; the nature of the music also underlines the art form as an entertainment, preventing the viewer from experiencing these often sadistic moments in a realistic sense. With group-oriented rock still in its infancy, Rustichelli gravitated toward a form of music that would reflect the film's extreme stylization, its use of tableaux vivant, as well as its underlying sensuality. He moved instinctively toward the Tango.

He composed a main theme—titled "Atelier" when it appeared as the A-side of a CAM 45 rpm single—that is reprised in various forms throughout the picture. In the Italian version it is first heard under the main titles as a tango-flavored piece played by a small orchestra with solo trumpet, alto saxophone, and bongo percussion. As the picture progresses, and as the size of the cast diminishes, the sound of the orchestration also scales down; the main theme is echoed as a bossa nova played by a small combo in a nightclub, as a nervous arpeggio for strings, as a moody dirge for Hammond organ, and so on, until the full orchestra resumes for the final crescendo.

COMPOSER Carlo Rustichelli at his piano, photographed by Daniela Catelli while being interviewed for this book.

One of the slower, sparser variants was released on the B-side of the CAM single as "Defilé"—in which alto sax is replaced by a shimmering section of glissando strings; here, a descending section of woodwinds, strings, and kettledrums takes the beauty of the main theme on a detour into ominous danger. Elsewhere, Rustichelli's score employs a looming Hammond organ over the strings—sometimes teasing with the leitmotif, sometimes doubled by baritone sax in a more delicate, spookier cue—adding gooseflesh to the chill. For the scene of Tao-Li's drowning, Rustichelli underscores her struggle with deep, resonant kettledrums and her surrender with a bass octave mash on the Hammond.

At Bava's request, Rustichelli reused some of the misterioso cues he had written and recorded for La frusta e il corpo; these proved to be quite popular, also resurfacing again in Antonio Margheriti's I giganti di Roma/The Giants of Rome (1964), Bava's Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill!, and in the Spanish-made Paul Naschy vehicles Una Libélula para cada muerto/A Dragonfly for Each Corpse (1973) and El Ultimo Kamikaze ("The Last Kamikaze," 1984). Another recycled cue, which Rustichelli had originally composed and recorded for the Gina Lollobrigida film La bellezza d'Ippolita (1962), can be heard during the fashion show runway sequence.

With its tick-tocking bongos and sultry feel, Rustichelli's score is akin to Henry Mancini's soundtrack for Orson Welles' Touch of Evil (1958), another film in which style and sleaze were deliciously entwined. It is one of the most beloved scores in the Bava canon. While he could still play the theme from La frusta e il corpo on the piano from memory in his last years, Rustichelli retained no particular memory of the themes he wrote for Sei donne per l'assassino, and being blind, he could no longer read their charts. It was not until the year after his death in 2004 that the film's score was finally issued on CD by Digitmovies, paired with the music for La frusta e il corpo.

Distribution

Though it would inaugurate the most enduring of all Italian cinematic genres, the importance of Sei donne per l'assassino was not immediately recognized in its homeland. It performed disappointingly at the Italian boxoffice, taking in only 123 million lire [$77,000]—making it only one-third as profitable as the more mainstream Gli invasori, and failing to recoup its investment costs. It subsequently became almost impossible to see in Italy, until its belated (and incomplete) home video release in the spring of 1999. The tape was distributed only in food markets and sold out almost immediately.

Despite Mario Bava's successful track record with American International Pictures, James H. Nicholson and Samuel Z. Arkoff were never offered the US distribution rights to the film. After the interference he had suffered with good grace during the production of I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath, Bava must have known that his first reel—in which a woman was shown being mutilated, killed, and (presumably) dragged into the bushes for a farewell sexual assault—would be enough to queer the deal with the kings of the kiddie matinee.

Stepping in to fill the breach were Lawrence and Bernard Woolner of Allied Artists, who had previously released Hercules in the Haunted World. Remarkably, they released the picture in America with virtually no editorial interference, giving US audiences their first undiluted Mario Bava experience. The Woolners were also responsible for dreaming up the evocative English-language title of Blood and Black Lace.

Aside from one or two very minor trims of redundant dialogue, the American version differs from the original only in terms of its main title sequence. For the Italian version, Bava delighted in posing each of his primary actors in the manner of a salon mannequin; the result is a surprising, and completely winning, tribute to a remarkable cast from a director who often voiced his wish that he could make movies without actors. This was fine for a European adult audience, but for the purposes of an American exploitation release, the sequence was not scary or portentous enough to keep an audience in its seats. Therefore, the Woolners contracted Filmation Associates to prepare a more appropriately menacing title sequence. Though Bava had no hand in the creation of this sequence, Filmation's work is fully in keeping with the stylistic impact of the film that follows—with its slow, deliberate montage of nude store window mannequins, bathed in red and green light, disrupted by the violence of gunfire. While it's unfortunate that Bava's tongue-in-cheek titles would not be seen by a wider public (until the film's DVD release in 2000), the Filmation Associates credits are a splendid hommage to Bava's technique.

13 Carlo Rustichelli, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, unused, 2000.

FRENCH grand affiche, art by Constantin Belinsky.

THE CRUDE US insert poster goes the Italian title's body count two better by promising "The 8 Greatest Shocks Ever Filmed!"

DANISH poster for a belated 1970s release, art by Kurt Wenzel.

When Variety reviewed the film, their critic incorrectly reported that Italian-, German-, and English-language versions had been simultaneously filmed to satisfy the international market. Everyone interviewed about the film for this book has confirmed to me that the script was written in English, and that the cast was required to speak their lines in English, naturally or phonetically as the case may be. Only a guide track was recorded on set, to facilitate later dubbing. Actor–director Mel Welles supervised the recording of the first English soundtrack, which was recorded with Cameron Mitchell, Mary Arden, and other cast members post-syncing their own lines. Welles himself dubbed the lines of Inspector Silvestri and some other secondary characters. For reasons Welles could not understand or explain, his soundtrack—which would seem to be the more authentic choice—was not used. Instead, when the Woolner brothers acquired the film for US distribution, they had the film entirely redubbed in Los Angeles, under the supervision of Lou Moss. In this version, the only English track ever circulated, most of the male performances—including those of Cameron Mitchell and Thomas Reiner—were dubbed by the popular voice artist Paul Frees.

Born Solomon Hersh Frees in Chicago in 1920, Paul Frees got his start in radio, where he first attracted serious attention in the 1940s, as the spooky announcer of the seminal horror radio series Escape. As an actor, he made occasional onscreen appearances in movies like The Thing From Another World, Suddenly, and Son of Sinbad, but he's best remembered for the narration he contributed to movies like The War of the Worlds, The Shaggy Dog, and The Manchurian Candidate, as well as comedy albums like Spike Jones' Spooktacular in Screaming Sound and amusement park rides like the Haunted Mansion at Disneyland. He was also the voice of Boris Badenov, Francis the Talking Mule, John Beresford Tipton (the unseen benefactor of the TV series The Millionaire), the Talking Rings in The Time Machine (1960), the Pillsbury Dough Boy, Morocco Mole, the killer computer in Colossus: The Forbin Project (1970), John and George on the ABC animated series The Beatles, Crusty the hermit crab in The Incredible Mr. Limpet (1964), and countless other pop icons of the period. He also directed the English dubbing of some horror and science fiction pictures, including Toho's The H-Man and King Kong Escapes (1966, in which he dubbed the villain, Dr. Who). Worthy of a place on the Mt. Rushmore of American popular culture, Paul Frees died in 1986 at the age of 66.

Some years after Frees' death, the Freedom of Information Act revealed to Elvis biographer Peter Guralnick that the voice artist had served as an undercover narcotics agent for the Bureau of Narcotics and Dangerous Drugs throughout the 1960s—the period during which he dubbed Blood and Black Lace.[14] So when Frank is being grilled by Inspector Sylvester, he's being grilled by the real thing!

While no scenes were cut from Blood and Black Lace, per se, the reworked English dubbing suppressed some adult material. For example, in the scene at the police station, Marco accuses Cesare of being the killer, reasoning that he kills beautiful women because he is impotent, a fact which caused him to be abandoned by his wife, a year earlier. Some material after the departure of Clarisse was also cut from the US version, when Silvestri decides there is reason to hold the remaining four suspects overnight. This footage is actually fairly redundant, as it's explained again in the subsequent scene, when Max calls Christina to explain his situation.

The wholesale Anglicization of the film's credits paid off with an amusing Variety review by "Whit.," which praised the "okay mystery" as being "handsomely produced by Lou Moss . . . Harry Brest's art direction is tops, and color photography by Herman Tarzana takes advantage of his backdrops." Certainly even more amusing to Bava would have been the reviewer's observation that the film was "backgrounded by expensive sets which add a certain quality not always distinguishable in films of this sort."

When Sei donne per l'assassino was released in Great Britain in 1965, the anonymous critic ("P. J. D.") of Monthly Film Bulletin joked that Bava's "most expensive-looking and decorative horror film to date" seemed to establish a new era of Italian filmmaking, "the Red Telephone era"—a pun based on the telefoni bianchi. The observation was tongue-in-cheek, but in fact, within five years, Sei donne per l'assassino would be revealed as the true harbinger of something new and tenacious in the field of Italian filmmaking.

The international release proved only moderately successful, with the film doing some of its best business in West Germany, where it was called Blutige Seide ("Bloody Velvet"), and in Austria, where it was titled Der Würger mit der Maske ("The Strangler with the Mask"). The picture's success sufficiently impressed the producers of the West German Edgar Wallace krimis that their next script to go into production, Der Bucklige von Soho/The Hunchback of Soho (1966), became the first to be filmed in color—not only in color, but in bold, garish colors—with director Alfred Vohrer and cameraman Karl Löb doing their best to reproduce Sei donne's delirious palette.

14 Peter Guralnick, Careless Love—The Unmaking of Elvis Presley (Boston MA: Little, Brown & Company, 1999), 412.

GERMAN A1 poster, Style B.

Commentary

Sei donne per l'assassino is one of Mario Bava's most tightly plotted films, but for most viewers, the fine points of its narrative are overcast by its sadistic violence and perverse visual beauty. Nevertheless, it reflects—even in its title—Stanley Kubrick's theory that "All a good film really needs is six non-submersible units" (that is, six great scenes). It's not a highly original story, but its heightened visual sense makes the film the equivalent of a familiar story retold by a master raconteur. Marcello Fondato's script is extremely capable in the way it baits audience suspicion, how it juggles the film's various intricate relationships, while proposing (and later exonerating) its red herrings, but all of this hard work is ultimately secondary to the diabolical genius that Bava and Ubaldo Terzano brought to its pictorial interpretation.

The ruination of beauty is a theme that runs throughout Bava's work, from the postwar documentary shorts that catalogued the damage done to Rome's ancient art and architecture, to the very first scene of La maschera del demonio (the hammering of the spiked mask onto the face of Princess Asa); it also persists through his later work, in the form of the outrageous murders that result from a contractor's plan to level the natural forest surrounding a scenic bay and replace it with a contemporary resort in Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve (1971). This situation is reiterated in Baron Blood, in which an ancient castle is being modified into a commercialized tourist trap. But only in Sei donne per l'assassino does this subject so nakedly and fetishistically take center stage. "Perhaps the sight of beauty makes him lose control of himself and kill," Inspector Silvestri speculates about the killer—a line that seems to echo something said by Prince Vajda in La maschera del demonio, when he speculates that the witch Asa may be branding her victims—her twin descendants—with her own beauty before killing them. Those who would destroy beauty destroy themselves.

In Sei donne . . . Bava films the murders of six beautiful women in a way that is savage and shocking, yet also sensuous and almost supernaturally beautiful. The acts of violence are eroticized in the moments preceding death, while the aftermath of violence is depicted ironically—with the women's brutalized remains elegantly posed, as though participating in "still life" fashion layouts for Death Magazine. In some instances, the irony extends to panning away from a fresh corpse to a laughing Cupid or some other decorative angel, or the plucked strings of a harp, which has the doubly perverse effect of introducing an element of spirituality to the proceedings. The "Madonna lighting" Bava had used on Gina Lollobrigida and Maria Fiore in the 1950s here falls on the faces of dead and mutilated women, revealing angels in the wreckage. Color also plays a crucial part in these scenes—heightened, irrational splashes of amber, green, and lavender light that suggest not the encroachment of the supernatural (this story, after all, is rooted in reality), but the presence of danger, the hot blush of arousal and excitement. Making a fetish of the instruments of crime, eroticizing the quickening and suddenly halted breath of half-naked, full-breasted victims, romancing an atmosphere of terror out of scenic beauty, filming death as an orgasm and corpses as angels . . . These would become the hallmarks of all the best gialli that followed in the wake of Sei donne per l'assassino.

SPANISH poster.

But what inspired Bava to lend grace notes of beauty to the horror of violent death? The answer can be traced, in part, to Lewis Milestone's All Quiet on the Western Front (1930), which Bava singled out on more than one occasion as his favorite film. Impressive as it is, Milestone's anti-war classic would not seem at first glance to have had much influence on Bava's horror films, though it is possible to see the influence of its battle sequences on similar scenes that Bava filmed for various movies; for example, in La battaglia di Maratona, Bava—like Milestone's cameraman Arthur Edeson—placed his camera in specially dug trenches, the better to depict war at ground level. For many viewers, however, All Quiet on the Western Front lingers in the memory on the strength of the powerful, poetic grace note that substitute cameraman Karl Freund devised for the film's finale. In this scene, the young German soldier protagonist Paul Baumer (Lew Ayres) sees a butterfly land and flex its wings on the battlefield, not far from his foxhole. Irresistibly attracted to the alighting of this beautiful thing in a place where beauty has become so impossible as to be alien, he reaches out from his hiding place to touch it—attracting a sniper's bullet. It may have been the first time onscreen that death was depicted in such poetic terms, and it may well have been this scene that impressed Bava most deeply, for its ironic juxtaposition of beauty and horror, and also for the element of spirituality it brought to an otherwise meaningless, random act of violence.

CIGARETTES aren't the only thing at Cristiana Haute Couture that are bad for your health. Inspector Silvestri (Thomas Reiner) says "no" to Max's friendly offer.

Freund, like Bava, was a cameraman who became a director best-known for his horror films. He would direct only two films in the genre, The Mummy (1932) and Mad Love (1935), but both are stylish, romantic, and erotically perverse—exemplary examples of the macabre as refracted through a very refined eye.

Another director who had built upon this technique was Jacques Tourneur, the credited director of La battaglia di Maratona, who—working around a Production Code that forbade the graphic depiction of violence—made such "poetic terror" scenes the hallmarks of his three pictures for RKO producer Val Lewton: Cat People (1942), I Walked With a Zombie (1943), and The Leopard Man (also 1943). Bava was certainly familiar with Tourneur's work—to the extent of paying homage to the "corn meal" scene from The Leopard Man in Baron Blood.

Thanks to Mel Welles, we have evidence of another filmmaker who exerted influence on Bava's future approach to depicting violence and murder onscreen. During the period when Sei donne per l'assassino was in production, Bava could often be seen at the Café Rosati, a bar frequented by film people; it was there that he made the acquaintance of Welles, who had already been responsible for dubbing some of Bava's pictures into English. "There was a French film that Bava loved to talk about—Judex, by a director named Georges Franju," Welles recalled. "He loved this film, and he had been impressed by the actor who was in it, Channing Pollack, who had also starred in one of my own pictures, The Red Sheik. It gave us something to talk about."

It makes perfect sense that Bava was impressed by the work of Franju. Judex is an elegant remake of a silent serial by Louis Feuillade, which told a story of heinous crime with the soft touch of a fairy tale. But Franju's earlier work—particularly the abattoir documentary Le Sang des bêtes/The Blood of the Beasts (1949) and the surgical horror film Les Yeux sans Visage/Eyes Without a Face (1959)—was expert at depicting moments of horror with a sense of poetry. It was this frisson, this butterfly of death, that Bava pursued in Sei donne per l'assassino—and he was just as surely influenced by Hitchcock's Psycho, in that its murder scenes were masterpieces of cinematic design. Hitchcock had given audiences two memorable set-pieces of murder in Psycho (the shower scene and the Arbogast murder); Bava would give them three times as many, each one as lovingly photographed as a magazine centerfold.

While much has been written about the extremity of the film's sadism and violence, no blood is actually spilled. "Mario hated violence," insists Freddy Unger, "and he didn't like to show blood. But the producers were always pushing him to show more, so sometimes he would shoot a scene two ways, one with more blood, just to please them—but he would never use it. He preferred to be inventive—with the cutting, with the lighting."

From the very first shot, in which the red-and-gold shingle hanging outside the premises of Cristiana Haute Couture is dismantled by a strong gust of wind, Bava underscores the tenuousness of public image. The first dialogue scene, as Frank appeals to Nicole for a drug fix outside the salon, establishes the citadel of feminine beauty as a front for unattractive activities, and its covert tensions inaugurate a mood of mystery before the first murder is committed.

Bava's attention to color is evident in the first murder sequence, as Isabella takes a nighttime walk through the park at Via Sciarra wearing a shiny red raincoat. The presence of red not only attracts the eye and signals danger, but it tricks the viewer into "seeing" blood where none has been spilled. As Isabella walks through the park, her coat projecting the warmest and most vital of colors, her message is negated as the assassin—a faceless cypher of black-and-white—steps into frame, his mask limned in a deathly blue. Isabella suffers a brutal killing, but we actually see very little of it: the killer grabs her, slams her head several times against a tree, and then garrotes her to death; as he drags her dead body deeper into the woods, the camera lingers on the fresh scars entrenched in her face and cleavage, and as Death drags its claim out of view, the camera tilts up to reveal a chucking ornamental stone cherub. Point and counterpoint.

Inside the salon, Mark returns from repairing the fallen sign, and the camera follows him to a private place, where we observe him—behind a wall of bevelled glass—taking some pills in silhouette. Not only does the shot implicate him in the drug-trafficking going on at the salon, but his second return from outside (after the murder of Isabella) posits him as a suspect, as does—in this shot—the foregrounded image of a mannequin skinned in red velvet, a chromatic reminder of Isabella.

The color red is woven throughout the picture in decorative ways—it is the background color of the Cristiana Haute Couture sign, and also the color of the salon's telephones, drapes, and mannequins. When Isabella's diary is found, it is bound in red leather, making it a personification, of sorts, of the lady in red. [15] Appropriately, the diary is first discovered during a fashion show by Nicole ("Heyyyy," she purrs, "Isabella kept a diary!"), the only girl at the salon willing to model the black dress that was scheduled to be worn by Isabella. The other girls describe Nicole as "cynical," an opinion which is borne out by the way she opens the diary at random and recites a romantic passage aloud, in disrespect for the dead.

The discovery of the diary prompts a fabulous, Langian montage of every face in the place that harbors a secret. Everyone in the room clearly covets the diary—to destroy it, to know what's in it, possibly to use what's in it. In slightly more than a minute since its introduction, Isabella's diary assumes an almost superhuman aura—an object of unholy fascination for every vulture in the place, until Nicole insists on her right to present the diary to the police herself and slips it into her purse—which happens to be black, the color of Isabella's "bad luck" dress. Every sweaty close-up is then reprised, followed by a cut back to the purse itself, giving it an equal weight of personality in the montage, and amplifying its dark threat.

Black becomes as telling a color for Nicole as red was for Isabella. After putting the diary in her bag, she receives a phone call, allegedly from Frank, arranging to meet her at his antiques shop. The attentive viewer's superstitions may be raised by the telephone, which is red with a black receiver—it is identical to, and probably the same prop as, the telephone used by Michèle Mercier in I tre volti della paura's "Il telefono." Bad luck seems to envelop Nicole, chumming the very air around her; it begins to take definite form while she is modelling on the runway, as her handbag is stolen under the cover of a passing wardrobe rack. [16]

THIS RICHLY atmospheric shot predisposes the viewer to regard Mark (Massimo Righi) as a drug addict.

15 Perhaps there is a standard type of diary sold in Rome, but Isabella's diary looks identical to the diary kept by the Countess Frederica, which sets another series of murders into motion in Bava's 1971 film Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve.

16 Wes Craven clearly had this scene in mind when he filmed a similar set-up for Wes Craven's New Nightmare (1994), in which a child is abducted from a movie set as a wall of scenery is moved by stagehands between the child and the camera.

Alfred Hitchcock was fond of telling interviewers that, while other directors gave audiences slices of life, he gave them slices of cake. It's an apt analogy because the results of Hitchcock's meticulous pre-planning are often confectionary; but if his thrillers are slices of cake, Bava's are heavy on the icing. His attention is lavished on the surface. Nowhere in his oeuvre is this more apparent than during Nicole's visit to Frank's antique shop. It is Bava's quintessential Technicolor sequence, and perhaps the definitive example of how to shoot a horror sequence in color.

Nicole has tempted bad luck by wearing the dead woman's dress, and here she innocently crosses a threshold into an entire shop filled with second-hand possessions. The shop interior is fraught with unexpected colors—green, violet, gold and magenta—and the strobing of the "Dancing" sign glimpsed outside at a nearby nightclub turns the harlequin lighting into a veritable heartbeat, in which all the variety of life alternates with the absolute void of death, being with nothingness. The sign also offers a tacit explanation for the music heard throughout the sequence; it is Carlo Rustichelli's tango-flavored theme music, which remains distant-sounding on the soundtrack until the assassin first makes his presence known—at which point, it reasserts its identity as soundtrack music with a sudden, startling increase in volume that brings it right into the room.[17] Rustichelli's score is further manipulated by having it abruptly cut off as Nicole fends for her life in the dark; its sudden absence has the uncanny effect of making Nicole seem doubly exposed and vulnerable. As the scene progresses, her black dress is also ripped to reveal her bra, introducing an erotic frisson that is certainly indebted to Psycho, but which was still extremely rare in horror films in 1964. Ultimately, Nicole makes the acquaintance of an unforgettable, medieval fashion accessory: a spiked iron glove which is slammed onto her face with merciless force. It's a variation on the Mask of Satan in La maschera del demonio, but because it is filmed without the hyperbole of that earlier sequence (with its big muscleman executioner and big, big hammer), it is even more devastating. The sequence is such a standout that, when Sei donne per l'assassino was released in Denmark, it was retitled Jernhanden i rædselsnatten, which means "The Iron Hand in the Night of Horror."

NICOLE is assaulted at Frank's antiques shop by a man in a white mask.

In the finished film, the spiked glove strikes home after only a slight hesitation over Nicole's face. When the scene was shot, Bava experimented with drawing out the suspense to a more gruelling degree by having Nicole struggle to keep the glove away from her face, as its blades inched nearer and nearer. A photograph survives of the idea, but ultimately, Bava and editor Mario Serandrei decided that the scene was more frightening when its payoff was swift and blunt.

AS ORIGINALLY photographed, Nicole's death scene prolonged her struggle with the iron glove.

The shocking nature of the murders in Sei donne per l'assassino tend to distract one from the details of the plot and how well constructed it is. Early in the fashion show sequence, a brief dialogue scene between Nicole and Peggy establishes that the Countess' moods have become more erratic since the death of her husband—the salon's former owner—in a car wreck. Here, in a blithe throwaway reference that will later help to elucidate the reasons behind the campaign of murder, Bava can be found once again indulging his penchant for backstory, extending his narrative beyond its actual length not with illusion but *al*lusion. Audience suspicions and expectations are also constantly baited and surprised, as in the scene where Peggy is followed to her doorstep by Mark. We're on guard because Mark has been acting suspiciously; we know he's hopped-up on something, we saw (what we presumed to be) his silhouette eavesdropping on Nicole's phone call shortly before she was killed, and he was also shown to be outside and in the vicinity when Isabella was murdered. But in this scene, he's revealed to be an ordinary man who has fallen in love with an uninterested, but not uncompassionate, woman.

Peggy's own suspicious behavior is revealed to have a fairly honest motive. It is she who has stolen Isabella's diary, but not to use its information against others, as we might expect. We're teased right up to the last second with her true intentions: when she determines that the diary contains references to her secret abortion, she tears out only the pertaining pages . . . and then, on second thought, without reading further, she throws the entire book on the fire—which can be read as a cautious gesture or a very generous one. Superstition may also play a part in her actions, as is suggested by a comment of Bava's, which describes his own encounter with the written reproaches of the dead. In his Positif interview, Bava confessed to Ornella Volta, "This very morning, inside a book, I found an unopened letter that a friend had sent to me ten years ago. We had been arguing at the time, and so, not wishing to read disagreeable things, I filed it away unopened, without reading it. A few months ago, I learned that this friend—whom I never saw again—had died, so today, it's like I've received a letter from the Beyond. What would you have done in my place? I burned it . . ."

The film reaches its apex of sadism with the sequence of Peggy's torture and death. Forty years later, it remains a hard scene to top for its unrelenting cruelty; it could easily pass for a playlet filmed on the stage at the Theatre du Grand Guignol in Paris. [18] With its subterranean catacombs, abducted girl, and the unmasking of her abductor, this scene also suggests a certain debt to The Phantom of the Opera, but the unmasking here is staged to increase our suspense rather than to assuage it. Mary Arden plays the scene vulnerably yet courageously; it's her shocked reaction that sells the unmasking, and it's wonderful to see Peggy's whimpering give rise to a sense of pluck when the pain she has suffered crosses that line where she understands she has nothing left to lose. Those who watch the scene closely will notice an abrupt sound edit at the end of the scene. Arden confirms that additional footage was filmed of her face being pulled off the stove, ruined and smoking, and she agrees with my assessment that the shot was probably considered too strong, too tasteless to be included—but it must have been a late decision, because the cut was obviously made after the film was scored. Photographs of this cut material also exist, and if we contemplate how the shot might have looked onscreen—a gloved hand pulling Peggy's head back from the stove by its hair, the steam clearing to reveal her ravaged face, its welts swelling in tight close-up until blood begins to run from them, as Rustichelli's demonic cymbals reached their full crescendo—we can begin to appreciate the overwhelming power it might have had, and how it might have made Bava's suggestions of violence elsewhere in the picture seem weaker.

NEVER before published photo shows Peggy's ruined face as it is lifted from the stove—a shot removed from the final cut.

The death of Greta (smothered by a pillow as her legs writhe orgasmically) would seem to be the weak link in this daisy chain of death, design-wise, but the suspenseful preamble to that moment finds Bava working at top form. When she returns home and discovers Peggy's ravaged body in the boot of her car, Lea Krugher's wonderfully nerve-wracked performance leaves us uncertain of whether she's hiding the corpse to protect herself from being framed with it, or if she put it in the trunk herself to dispose of later. After hiding the body behind a decorative partition below the stairs to the second floor of the Marquis' dwelling, Greta goes upstairs, where Bava attends to her undressing by framing the shot in leaves, suggesting a view through a window that really isn't there. Peeled down to a black slip (unlucky color), she flinches at the sound of a harp. At this, we cut downstairs, where the strings of the instrument are still vibrating in the foreground of the shot, a stone cherub peers into frame, completing the ironic suggestion. As the strings cease to vibrate, the camera begins a slow, inexorable track across the floor, snaking toward the partition, peering behind it at the concealed body of Peggy, which is then pulled offscreen by its ankles, her ghastly blue visage seeming to float away of its own accord. This shot provides the climax for the film's French trailer, which I was once privileged to see in 35 mm with a select group of friends. We had all seen this movie at least a dozen times before on video, but this shot assumed a power on the big screen that was completely unexpected—it was like being touched by the hand of God. [19]

Whereas Greta's death is all build-up, the murder of Tao-Li takes us by surprise by beginning in progress, with no suspenseful build-up whatsoever. This sequence remains shocking today for many reasons. First of all, the very suddenness of the scene—which grabs us, as it grabs its victim, and thrusts us into the midst of her struggle for life, the pounding kettledrums of Carlo Rustichelli's orchestra mimicking her thundering heartbeat—catches us offguard; its lack of overture may be indicative that Hitchcock had already played the bathroom murder card to perfection in Psycho. Secondly, as the killer turns the corpse over, Tao-Li's breast is cupped and squeezed—a first in a horror movie, taking advantage of a breakthrough moment in Joseph L. Mankiewicz' Cleopatra (1963), which was probably the first all-ages movie to show a man caressing a woman's breast. The aftermath of the murder, as the soulless, voluptuous shell slides underwater like a mannequin, is also disturbing. Has a victim ever seemed as heartbreakingly vulnerable as Tao-Li as she lies there, cradled by the water? As she sinks, the scene becomes as redolent of birth as it is of death—and here, once again, Bava succeeds in showing us the angel in the wreckage and the obscenity of murder. [20] The climax of this scene—a 17 In his 1982 giallo, Tenebrae, Dario Argento would similarly toy with audience perceptions of theme music, with the accompaniment heard during a sequence suddenly stopped when a character lifts the needle from her stereo turntable—only to have the music promptly continue, as authentic soundtrack accompaniment.

18 Founded in 1897, Le Theatre du Grand Guignol presented plays and vignettes built around strangulations, decapitations, garottings, bleedings, burnings, and various acts of torture for nearly 70 years. But in the late '50s, as horror films began to introduce more and more graphic violence—with pictures like George Blair's The Hypnotic Eye (1960, Georges Franju's Les Yeux sans Visage/Eyes Without a Face (1959), Joseph Green's The Brain That Wouldn't Die (1960), and Bava's own La maschera del demonio—attendance began to drop and the theater finally closed its doors (and long tradition) in 1962. The following year, the gore film was officially launched with Herschell Gordon Lewis' Blood Feast (1963).

19 Incidentally, the room in which this scene was shot can also be seen in Jean-Luc Godard's masterpiece, Le Mépris/Contempt, which was shot at Cinecittà and other locations in and around Rome not long before Sei donne per l'assassino, went into production. In the Godard film, the room belongs to the villa being rented by Jerome Prokosh, the producer character played by Jack Palance, and appears in a scene between Michel Piccoli and Giorgia Moll, both of whom had (or would) work with Bava at one time or another. Many of the same furnishings are present—the cherub and the harp, for instance. In the scene, Piccoli plucks the harp's strings, and because the film was shot with live sound, we can hear that the strings are flaccid and horribly out of tune.

20 This scene so impressed Mexican director Pedro Almodóvar that he used it, and other clips from Sei donne per l'assassino in the first scene of his 1986 movie Matador, which showed Antonio Banderas masturbating to various televised images of graphic horror.

A TRIO of suicidal murders: Jacqueline Pierreux strangling herself in I TRE VOLTI DELLA PAURA, Daliah Lavi preparing to stab the ghost of Kurt in LA FRUSTA E IL CORPO, and Cameron Mitchell comforting Eva Bartok after making an attempt on her life—not suspecting that their next embrace will mean his death.

shot of Tao-Li's submerged, staring face as a cloud of blood billows into frame from her slashed wrist—was censored in many different countries, including most prints circulated in the United States until its DVD release in the year 2000. The scene doesn't trump the shower murder in Psycho, but it isn't redundant, parodic, or disgraceful; the fact that it, like the shower murder, has also been widely imitated—in such films as J. Lee Thompson's Happy Birthday to Me (1981), Dario Argento's segment of Due occhi diabolici/Two Evil Eyes (1990), and Martin Scorsese's Kundun (1997)—testifies to its own unique power and originality.

Sei donne per l'assassino built upon the model of Psycho in another significant way. While Psycho introduced the killer with the split personality, Sei donne introduced the killer with the split identity. After revealing the culpability of Max Morlan halfway through the picture, Bava reserves for the final reel the surprise that he was working in concert with Cristina, who is herself responsible for the murders of Greta and Tao-Li. By sharing the identity of the assassin, the two lovers (who were being blackmailed by Isabella, who knew of their involvement in the death of Cristina's husband) are able to provide each other with alibis. It's an elegant solution to the mystery—more than thirty years before Wes Craven pulled the same trick in Scream (1996)—and it also perpetuates Bava's ongoing fascination with twins and doubles. In the midst of juggling all the red herrings in this picture, Bava and Fondato fortunately remembered to include a bit of dialogue between Max and Cristina, revealing that they are secretly married—thus giving Max a legal path to her fortune in the event of her death.

Over the years, Sei donne per l'assassino has been accused of objectifying its women victims and eroticizing the violence against them. On the contrary, it is the fashion world that objectifies women. As an industry, it has probably done more to reduce women to a surface image than any other; at its worst, it abstracts them to the point of making them look inhuman, if not actually dead. Real flesh-and-blood women have literally killed themselves trying to live up to the images projected by the world of haute couture. If anything, Sei donne shows us how offensive are the aesthetics that we apply to women in life, when applied to them in death. By arranging the models' corpses in a photogenic manner, Bava was certainly making an ironic statement; he didn't get any special kick out of expressing violence against women through his art. He sympathized with women too much for that—any careful examination of Bava's work will reveal that all of his best, most dimensional characters are women; it's clear that he identifies with them, and it is obvious from the way he photographs them that he loves them. We always side emotionally with the sei donne, not with the assassino. We often assume the victim's points of view prior to the moment of death. Obviously, there is an erotic element in the murders—dresses get torn, or the women are attacked while in some stage of undress—but as titillating as this may be for some viewers, it serves two legitimate purposes: it introduces an added dimension of vulnerability to the moment, and it juggles another red herring, namely Inspector Sylvester's theory that the killer is a sex maniac. What Bava is really doing by "eroticizing" these scenes, is what he does from the very beginning of the picture—he is imparting information visually, allowing us to draw our own conclusions, and then surprising us by showing us how deceptive appearances can be.

If there's a philosophy to this movie, it's one shared by Bava's later "body count" movie Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve: that it is pointless to do anything purely for money, and worthwhile to do only those things we love, or do out of love. But, this being a coarse and evil world, very often the things we do for love are conquered by the common lust of others for money. As in La frusta e il corpo, Sei donne per l'assassino concludes with a woman simultaneously embracing and slaying her lover, whose lavished affections are revealed as illusory. Bava directs both scenes in such a way that we feel that Death liberates neither partner, but unites them instead in the Great Beyond. Bava's uneasy marriage had taught him that we are forever bound to the people we love; we may sometimes hate them too, but these relationships are fated and thus inescapable.

THE GREAT final shot of the film: a telephone hangs by its cord as two lives hang by a thread.

The film ends as the camera zooms past the dead bodies of Christina and Max to the red telephone receiver, knocked off its cradle, swinging on its cord—the image rhymes enticingly with the opening shot of the red sign falling and swinging on its chain. It obviously reflects a film prepared with a formal sense of design, but Bava pretended to scoff at anyone who took it seriously. "Some people from Cahiers du Cinema once came 'round to my house," he wrote in his La città del cinema memoir. "My daughter told me they were interested in knowing the connection between the sign swinging in the storm at the beginning of my film, and the telephone left dangling when Bartok died at the end. I couldn't remember how the film had ended!"

Actually, there is a connection—it is hard to believe that Bava wasn't at least somewhat conscious of it—which is very well expressed by Luigi Barzini in The Italians: "Fear can be detected behind the Italians' peculiar passion for geometrical patterns, neat architectural designs, and symmetry in general, which is part of their love for show—mainly the fear of the uncontrollable and unpredictable hazards of life and nature . . . [Even the] greatest Italian literary masterpiece, Dante's Divina Commedia . . . is composed of an introductory canto and three parts, each of thirty-three cantos, each ending with the same word, 'stelle.'"

HERCULE L'INVIN

DE ONOVERWINNELIJKE

BELGIAN affiche for "Al Wordl's" ERCOLE L'INVINCIBILE, which features stock and original Mario Bava effects footage.

Men of Steel, Men of Stone

Ercole l'invincibile
Maciste e la regina di Samar
Il castello dei morti vivi

DURING THE PERIOD of late 1963 to early 1964, the activities of Mario Bava went unrecorded. He was not a director who spent his time between films resting and recharging his creative batteries, so there is every reason to believe that he remained active in friendly, unofficial capacities. Of the other Italian features produced during this period, two offbeat additions to the rapidly expiring peplum cycle contain effects scenes suggesting Bava's hush-hush involvement, and we have surprising confirmation of a day job that Bava performed for a scene ultimately cut from a rather remarkable medieval horror film.

ITALIAN locandina.

Ercole l'invincibile

Released to Roman theaters only one week after Sei donne per l'assassino was the latest, and one of the last, Hercules films of the Italian Golden Age: Ercole l'invincible. Produced for Metheus Film by Mario Siciliano, the film was shot in the latter months of 1963, when Bava was between directorial assignments. Not only does this film contain a fair amount of stock footage from earlier pepla for which Bava was responsible, but it also features several new and delightful effects shots and sequences that, though uncredited, are too accomplished and particular in style to have been the work of anyone but Cinecittà's "Mr. Fix-It."

There is much about Ercole l'invincibile that is mysterious. The film's credits are cloaked in a panoply of pseudonyms and misspellings that give it the appearance of a work from another dimension. Italian publicity materials credit the direction to "Al Wordl," while Italian references credit "Al World," a pseudonym for Alvaro Mancori (b. 1923). Like Bava, Mancori was a director who began his career as

Ercole l'invincibile

"Hercules the Invincible"
Filmed at Cinecittà and on location
Autumn 1963
First released: March 19, 1964
Technicolor, Techniscope, 2.35:1, 85 minutes

Production: Metheus Film, Mancori Film (Rome). Distributor: Regionale.

Belgium: De Onoverwinnelijke Herkules, Cosmopolis Films
France: Hercule l'Invincible
Germany: Der Grösste Sieg des Herkules, 10/15/65, 83m
UK: Hercules the Invincible, Golden Era Distributors Ltd., 8/64, 85m 31s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: Son of Hercules in the Land of Darkness, Embassy Pictures Corporation, 1966

Maciste e la regina di Samar

"Maciste and the Queen of Samar"
Filmed at Cinecittà and on location
Early 1964
First released: June 27, 1964
Eastmancolor, Cromoscope, 2.35:1, 92 minutes

Production: Nike Cinematografica (Rome), CFPC (Comptoir Français de Productions Cinématographiques, Paris). Distributor: Atlantis.

Belgium: Maciste Tegen Versteende Mannen, Les Films Eddie de Jong, 1965 France: Maciste Contre les Hommes de Pierre
Mexico: Hércules Contra los Fantasmas
Spain: Maciste Contra los Fantasmas
UK: Hercules Against the Moon Men, Miracle Films Ltd., 3/65, 88m 34s, Certificate "U," passed with cuts
US: Hercules Against the Moon Men, Governor Films, "Cosmicolor/Lunarscope," 5/65, 90m

Il castello dei morti vivi

"The Castle of the Living Dead"
Filmed on location at the Castello di Balsorano, Artena and at Parco dei Mostri, Bomarzo
Spring 1964
First released: August 5, 1964
B&W, 1.85:1, 90 minutes

Production: Serena Film. Distributor: Cineriz.

France: Le Château des Morts-Vivants
UK: Castle of the Living Dead, Tigon Film Distributors Inc., 12/67, 89m 49s, Certificate "X," passed with no cuts
US: Castle of the Living Dead, AIP-TV, 1968

a cameraman. One of his previous camera assignments was Antonio Leonviola's Maciste, l'uomo più forte del mondo/Mole Men Against the Son of Hercules (1961), which may have been another of Bava's anonymous effects jobs. A talent for cinematography ran in the Mancori family: Alvaro's sons Guglielmo "Memmo" Mancori and Alessandro "Sandro" Mancori followed in his footsteps. Sandro Mancori is the credited cameraman of Il pistolero segnato da Dio ("A Gunman Marked by God," 1968), a Spaghetti Western that is known to have been at least partially shot by Mario Bava.

After co-directing one more picture—the omnibus film Racconti a due piazze ("Stories of Two Places," 1965), starring Sylva Koscina and Leopoldo Trieste—Alvaro Mancori directed no more films. He didn't have to; earlier, in 1962, he had founded Elios Studios where, in 1964, a Western town set was erected for Sergio Bergonzelli's Jim il primo/The Last Gun, starring Cameron Mitchell. With Westerns beginning to supplant the pepla as Italy's leading cinematic export, Mancori's property was one of only three such Western towns extant in Rome proper—the other two being in Cinecittà (which was more expensive to rent) and Dinocittà (which was literally at Rome's southern border and far from the center of town)—and thus immensely profitable.

Judging from Ercole l'invincibile, directing was not really Mancori's forte, but the film is of great interest as a side project for Bava. As usual, he took the job without credit, but the quality and personality of the film's special effects are as good as a signature.

The screenplay of Ercole l'invincibile was credited to the mysterious "Kirk Meyer" and "Pat Kein" (also listed as assistant director), and the cinematography is cloudily credited to "Claude Haroy." Curiously, the direction of the American version is credited to "Lewis Mann," whom the cagey Italian credits list as production supervisor. Was this production in fact supervised by "Louis Mann," the collective pseudonym used by producers Ermanno Donati and Luigi Carpentieri on such films as Riccardo Freda's L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock/The Horrible Dr. Hichcock (1962) and Lo spettro/The Ghost (1963)? The truth about this picture may never be known.

Hercules (Dan Vadis) rescues a beautiful young girl (Spela Rozin) who is attacked by a lion while preparing to bathe in a stream. She is Teica, the daughter of Tideo, a shepherd king who presides over a small village. He tells Hercules it is the local custom to reward men who save village women by offering their hand in marriage, but Teica's station will not allow this; however, if Hercules can find and kill the dragon of the hill and return with its smallest tooth (which is said to grant wishes), he will permit their marriage. Hercules agrees, and goes to a Sibyl for directions to the dragon's lair; when he refuses to bring the tooth to the Sibyl due to its prior claim, she curses him and the tooth, reducing its power to the granting of a single wish.

As Hercules is slaying the dragon, King Tideo's village is raided by the Demios—a tribe of cannibals, led by the Oriental warlord Kabaal ("Ken Klark" a.k.a. Ken Clark). The village is burned to the ground, the villagers taken hostage. ("They believe that by eating the hearts of valiant men, they too will become brave!") Only Babar ("Hugo Arden" a.k.a. Ugo Sasso), a quack doctor, manages to elude their notice. He stays behind, becoming a comic sidekick to the returning Hercules, and leads him to the stone fortress of the Demios, encircled by a moat of volcanic lava. Hercules uproots a tree to use as a bridge across the lava, and is soon taken prisoner.

He is chained to two opposing elephants, to be torn apart—his flesh later to be eaten by the Demios, who hope to thereby absorb his courage—but his prayer to Zeus to shatter the chains is answered. One of the elephants nearly tramples the Queen ("Carol Brown" a.k.a. Carlo Calo), but Hercules saves her. The Queen becomes enamored of Hercules, enticing the jealousy of Melissa ("Joan Simons" a.k.a. Maria Fiore), the daughter of Kabaal. She murders the Queen and blames the killing on Teica, who has been made to serve as a handmaiden. For this information, Melissa is made Queen to her father, and Teica is tied to an altar and bled to feed the witnesses of her coronation. ("Her beauty is great," notes Melissa. "Our women will want to drink of her blood!") During this ceremony, Hercules discovers a stone wall damming the lava flow, and uses his strength to bring it down. Meanwhile, the prisoners revolt and the lava approaches. King Tideo is killed by Kabaal while trying to free Teica from her sacrificial altar, but Hercules returns in time to rescue her. Melissa, in possession of the dragon's tooth, stays behind but finds the talisman no protection against the lava flow. ("Foul liquid of the Earth, stay back! I, Melissa, command it!") Hercules leads the prisoners to the stone drawbridge that takes them to safety, and then uses his strength to destroy it, sending Kabaal and his armies to their deaths in the lava. [1]

SCENES from ERCOLE L'INVINCIBILE: a radio-controlled miniature effects shot that suggests Bava's involvement, followed by two shots of Dan Vadis as Hercules.

Released directly to television in America as Son of Hercules in the Land of Darkness—with Hercules recast as his own "son" Argoles!—Mancori's film is akin to La sfida dei giganti, dodging the need to produce new special effects by recycling footage from older pepla—in this case, Bava's special effects from Pietro Francisci's Le fatiche di Ercole. Consequently, when Hercules goes to slay the dragon of the hill, medium shots of Dan Vadis jumping over a prop dragon's swinging tail are intercut with long-shots of Gabriele Antonini as Ulysses, confronting the Tyrannosaurus Rex that guards the Golden Fleece. (The fleece hanging in plain sight throughout the sequence is ignored in favor of the offscreen extraction of a dragon's tooth we never see!) Likewise, when Hercules uproots a tree to improvise a bridge to the Demios' lair, it is the tree uprooted by Steve Reeves at the beginning of Le fatiche di Ercole that we see.

But the real point of interest here are several new effects shots that are too accomplished to have been the work of anyone in Rome other than Mario Bava. There are two excellent glass matte paintings of King Tideo's village (one before, one after the raid); the exterior of the Demios fortress, with its lowering stone bridge (similar in design to the radio-controlled prop later used as the entrance to Diabolik's lair in Diabolik) and forbidding lava moat (the same polenta and calcium pellets concoction used to create the lava river in Ercole al centro della terra), including shots of horsemen riding over the drawbridge; a glass matte painting of the uprooted tree bridge over the lava moat; a chamber with lever-controlled flames (a clever alignment of onset smoke pots and double-exposed flames filmed on a black set); miniature reconstructions of the set flooded with intruding lava; overcranked shots of toy horses tumbling over the broken drawbridge into the lava moat; and a climactic shot of low, lavender smoke filling the Queen's chamber. These shots intermittently lift an otherwise lame film above the genre's average.

Two of the actors featured in Ercole l'invincibile—American actor Ken Clark and a young CSC graduate, Alberto Cevenini (who adopted the nom d'ecran "Kirk Bert," possibly in tribute to Kirk Douglas and Burt Lancaster)—were subsequently recruited by Mario Bava to star in his next official feature, La strada per Fort Alamo/The Road to Fort Alamo, which would be shot, as serendipity would have it, at Mancori's property, Elios Film Studios. (Might Bava have offered his special effects expertise to Mancori in exchange for studio time?) The same is true of Jany Clair, the Titian-haired star of Bava's next probable side project, Maciste e la regina di Samar/Hercules Against the Moon Men.

Maciste e la regina di Samar

This Italo/French co-production, financed in part by the same company that was on the point of producing Bava's next feature La strada per Fort Alamo, was made in the immediate wake of Sei donne per l'assassino. Since only the German participants in that production say that they were paid, Mario Bava himself may have been left uncompensated at the end of production.

"You can't imagine how many times I've been stiffed by producers," Bava once acknowledged. "I make them a movie, and then I run to the nearest bank to cash my check, so that I can pay my bills, my back taxes, and so forth, and what do you know? It's made of rubber and I've worked for free! So what else is there to do? I start making another movie as soon as possible, because I have to pay my taxes!" [2] This explains why Bava may have been compelled to spend the months immediately following the completion of Sei donne per l'assassino with some anonymous, paying side projects such as the three covered in this chapter.

FRENCH affiche for MACISTE E LA REGINA DI SAMAR, depicting star Alan Steel in an insidious death trap.

Maciste e la regina di Samar/Hercules Against the Moon Men was destined to be the last directorial stand of Giacomo Gentilomo, for whom Bava had worked during the production of Maciste contro il vampiro/Goliath and the Vampires and L'ultimo dei vichinghi. Gentilomo—who lived until April 16, 2001—withdrew voluntarily from the film business to pursue a career in painting. Gentilomo may have been a frustrated painter, but—except for the segments on which Bava assisted or replaced him—his films do not have a painterly quality; even when they show an interest in color, his uses of color tend to be monochromatic, as evidenced by certain scenes in Maciste contro i vampiri which are tinted a blazing red, and the scenes of the Moon Men in Maciste e la regina di Samar, which are tinted an otherworldly, cellophane green evoking the "green cheese" of lunar legend.

The ancient city of Samar was the site of the crash-landing of an enormous lunar meteorite, which formed a new mountain in the desert region. It came to be known as the Mountain of Death, the headquarters of a new form of life—monsters from the moon, led by the high priest Rodolphus, who demands a regular sacrifice of the city's young. As the film's story commences, Queen Samara (Jany Clair) is perpetuating the tradition of her ancestors, by countenancing the continuation of this form of regimented murder. The wise old Claudius (Nando Tamberlani) appeals to Samara to fight the Moon Men, telling her of a man from Ciaran who is strong and resourceful enough to repel them—a man named Maciste ("Alan Steel" a.k.a. Sergio Ciani).

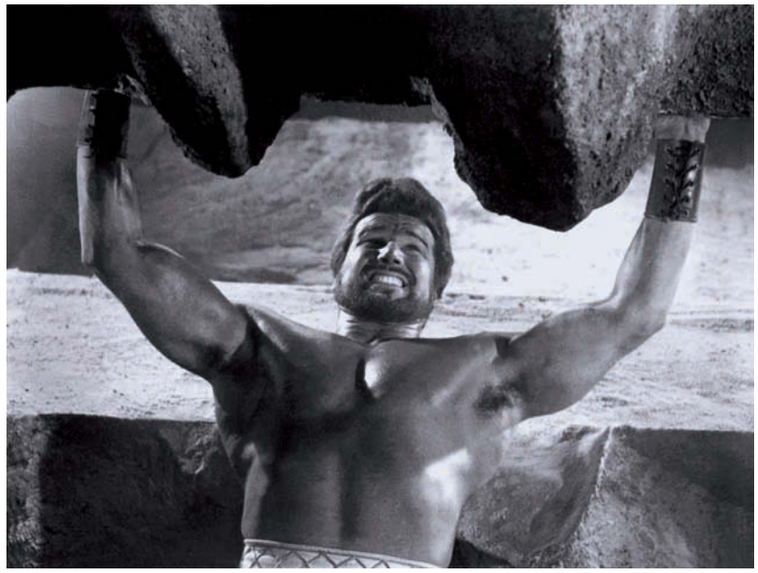
Unbeknownst to Claudius, Samara is actually in league with the Moon Men, who have promised her all the wealth of Earth once they have conquered the planet; to ensure that they can do this, they demand that she turn over her half-sister, Bilis (Delia D'Alberti), as their sacrifice on the evening that "Saturn comes into conjunction with Mars, under the influence of Uranus." Bilis is blissfully unaware of her sister's plan, and is preparing to ask her permission that she may marry her cousin, Prince Darix (Jean-Pierre Honoré).



When the Queen learns that Claudius has already summoned Maciste to Samar, she orders her chief guard, Mogol (Goffredo "Freddy" Unger), to make sure he does not reach the city alive. Her army tries to sabotage Maciste, but he easily defeats the entire unit. Met by Agar (Anna Maria Polani), the daughter of Claudius disguised as a man, Maciste is taken to the royal castle. Claudius apprises Maciste of the situation and receives his promise to liberate the town from their alien oppressors. As Claudius takes Maciste into a secret passage to meet with members of a nascent resistance movement, Agar sees the eyes of Queen Samara peering at them through a secret panel. In a subterranean tunnel, Claudius is impaled by hidden spears and Maciste is dropped into a pit that promptly fills with water. He manages to claw his way through the wall of the pit, finding an ape-like monster awaiting him on the other side; he fights and kills it. Further on, he is reunited with Agar, who takes him on to the tavern where the revolutionaries await his orders. The Queen swears she will have her revenge on Maciste.

At the tavern, Maciste learns that Prince Darix is spearheading the rebellion, along with the tavern-keeper (Giuliano Raffaelli). One of the freedom-fighters who survived his own attempted sacrifice leads Maciste to the Mountain of Death and shows him around. Queen Samara identifies Darix as a conspirator and has him speared, but Maciste comes to his rescue. He takes the injured man back to the tavern, where the commonfolk warn Maciste of the Queen, who wears a pendant around her neck that contains an irresistible love potion. Maciste is caught by the royal guard while trying to rescue a fake Bilis, and he is put to the test by being placed between two enormous spiked walls threatening to sandwich him. His superior strength causes the mechanism to break. Impressed, Samara orders for Maciste to be taken to her quarters. There, in her bedchamber, she tries to drug him into subservience, but knowing her plan, he spills the potion when she is distracted by a minor disturbance from Mogol. To prove his devotion to her, Samara has Agar and Darix brought into Maciste's presence; he shocks them by recommending the death sentence—the slower the better—perhaps starvation. Samara agrees and has them sent to her dungeon in chains. When the Queen confides her full plan to Maciste, he reveals that he is not in her power—and Samara slips away through a secret compartment. She has already delivered Bilis to the Moon Men, who are bleeding her to reanimate their own dormant leader, a twin of Bilis named Queen Selena. Samara goes to the Mountain of Death to plead with Rodolphus for assistance against Maciste, but having no further need of her, he has her crushed between the stone bodies of his rock-like henchmen. Maciste frees Agar and Darix from their chains and they all race toward the Mountain of Death, which is engulfed in a terrible sandstorm as the moon prepares to collide with Earth. Maciste finally forces his way through the stone barricades of the Mountain and destroys the stone men, Rodolphus, and the throbbing brain of their lunar god.

The time of sacrifice has ended for Samar, and as Maciste prepares to ride away to the next of his adventures, he asks that Agar share his future with him.

THE LEADER of the Moon Men prepares to rejuvenate the dead Queen Selena; a group of rock creatures surround Queen Samara (Jany Clair); and Maciste ("Alan Steel" a.k.a. Sergio Ciani) pits his strength against the forces of evil.

1 This synopsis is based on the American version of the film, which was released directly to television as Son of Hercules in the Land of Darkness, and differs slightly from the Italian synopsis—in which Melissa is working to restore the throne to her mother Ethyl (Jeannette Barton) and not to usurp it herself.

2 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 249–60.

She agrees, and they ride off toward the horizon.

There are quite a few special effects in this film, which accords a rather prominent screen credit (at least in the English version, which doesn't necessarily mean anything) to Ugo Amadoro. Amadoro's name also appears in this capacity on the films Seddok (L'erede di Satana)/Atom Age Vampire (1960) and Roma contro Roma/War of the Zombies (1965), but further searches for screen credits turn up nothing. Amadoro is a mysterious figure, due to his limited number of credits and the fact that Mario Bava's name is also sometimes associated—rightly or wrongly—with those other two films. There is a remote possibility (I stress "remote") that Amadoro was someone's pseudonym—the surname suggests "love of gold"!—but this is less easy to prove than it would be to simply accept that Amadoro, whoever he was or is, was hired to supervise the film's special effects, while Bava was brought in to actualize effects scenes that were beyond his ken.

The film's very first shot—of a fiery meteor crashing into a scale model landscape, complete with tiny trees and running water, and treated to some camera truca overlays of spot flame—looks very much like Bava's work. Similarly, the scene in which Rodolphus the Moon Man pays an astral visit to Queen Samara in her quarters was achieved by means of a glass shot, with the Moon Man inserted into the shot by means of his reflection on a pane of glass angled between the camera and actress Jany Clair; it is the kind of shot that Bava had done time and again, relying on the steadiness of his father's vintage Mitchell camera.

Bava's presence is most discernible during the extended sequence of Maciste, Agar, and Darix braving a sandstorm to reach the Mountain of Death at the film's climax. There is no set, per se, only a studio floor covered in sand, with various tree branches and fake rocks strewn about. The static environment is enlivened with visible gusts of wind, which are treated to the most intense color gel lighting; at one point, the heavy winds flummoxing Maciste are as red as Hell itself, as he makes his way through rocks illuminated with yellow, orange, blue, and green gels. Another point in favor of Bava's paternity is the hallucinatory quality of this sequence, which is allowed to go on at such a length that the viewer begins to feel sucked into the sheer metaphysics of it, a sensation that can only be felt in Italian fantasy films of this decade in the work of Mario Bava—particularly Ercole al centro della terra and Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill!.

us one-sheet poster.

Then there is the matter of the climax as it pertains to Bilis, who is taken to a secret chamber, laid parallel to her identical twin, Queen Serena, and bled—hand to hand—so that the other, evil version of herself might live again. This may be a naked restatement of the climax of La maschera del demonio, but it is not handled in a way that suggests Bava's involvement on-set. What does evoke Bava are the various cutaways, before and during this sequence, to moody shots of the moonrise (39:40–50 on the Something Weird DVD release of Hercules Against the Moon Men) and the slow, malefic approach of the lunar orb as it threatens to collide with Earth (1:09:27–30, 1:33:15–44), but what is curious about these shots is that they appear to have been imported from an older, scratchier, black-and-white picture, perhaps even from an old reel of effects test footage, which the color tinting of these shots and sequences may have been introduced to artfully conceal. (When viewed on DVD, the difference between the two film stocks is impossible to miss, with the effects footage looking as though it could date back to the 1940s.) Part of this tinted footage is the final corruption of Queen Serena's face—an optical disintegration, rather than the sort of lighting trick Bava would have done—which is also curious in that, here, Serena really doesn't resemble Bilis at all, nor does she resemble the wax figure inhabiting her glass coffin earlier in the picture, possibly sculpted for Gentilomo by his old friend, Eugenio Bava. The stone creatures commanded by Rodolphus look very much like the handiwork of whomever designed Procrustes for Ercole al centro della terra.

At 1:24:30, as the moon begins to smoke and effect conditions on the Earth's surface, just before the sandstorm begins, the film suddenly cuts to an orange-tinted montage of documentary stock footage of various cataclysms, like volcanic eruptions, crashing waves, and hellacious tropical storms. Here the movie does what Bava did when working with stock footage in such films as La morte viene dallo spazio and Caltiki il mostro immortale, so this sequence may also reflect his involvement. As happens during the climax of Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei/The Last Days of Pompeii (1959), the documentary footage was shot at regular gauge but is stretched to an anamorphic screen ratio, in this case "Cromoscope" (or "Lunarscope," as it was dubbed in America).

Maciste e la regina di Samar could have been one of the most entertaining pepla, but it is held back by inadequate casting, some dull art direction, uneven pacing, and Gentilomo's inability to stretch a lire as well as Bava could. Beetred and oiled like a champion sportscar, Sergio Ciani is a likeable hero and acquits himself in a fistfight with perhaps greater panache than any of his fellow musclemen, thanks to the clever action choreography of Freddy Unger. But while he is an acceptable Maciste, the retitling of the American edition raises the bar to a level he cannot quite attain; he is not a Hercules—nor was he meant to be. To approach this film as the story of a demigod robs the film of its proletariat premise, which reaches back to Maciste's defense of the oppressed in Cabiria, and Ciani's performance of its exceptional everyman character. An American viewer might wonder why Hercules strains so much while pulling two iron bars apart, but to an Italian viewer, the scene is a testament to what a single person can do, if determined, and it is this human aspect of Maciste that makes him truly heroic. As for the film's evil Queen Samara, Jany Clair does not have the classical beauty of Gianna Maria Canale, and her primary attitude is one of petulant spite, but her imperfections manage to support her performance, somehow making sense of her determination to be rid of her more beautiful, blonde, full-bosomed sister Bilis.

Il castello dei morti vivi

When I interviewed actor Luciano Pigozzi for this book, he spoke at length about how deeply impressed he had been by Mario Bava's talent for matte painting. After talking a bit about the trick shots he had executed for La frusta e il corpo, he made the following surprise revelation:

"Another time, he was up on the mountain, and he asked for three or four white sheets—I don't know what for—and he painted. The scenery was very bad, but after he made the special effect . . . my God! You could see a ship, all the time making with this special glass, and you see the ship on this postcard—and he put it very close to the water, and you could see this ship going up and down, up and down, and afterward, it disappeared."

Which film was this?

"It was, it was . . . Il castello dei morti vivi. The Castle of the Living Dead."

Bava worked on that film, too?

"Yeah. He came to make that scene, that special effect."

I trust Pigozzi's memory, because it remains very sharp on other counts, but I have not been able to find such a shot—at least not in the American television prints of The Castle of the Living Dead. Of course, these pan-and-scanned prints are missing a portion of their compositions from start to finish, so it is possible that Bava's effect appeared in the periphery of a scene and would only be visible when the film was shown in its correct 1.85:1 ratio. Pigozzi himself supplies the other possible explanation: "Maybe they cut it, because the story was very long." Although the shot is not visible in currently available versions of the picture, a discussion of the film must be included, if only to account for how Bava spent his time between features.

THIS ITALIAN locandina pictures Gaia Germani at the upper right. She played the masked oracle Medea in ERCOLE AL CENTRO DELLA TERRA.

In the wake of the Napoleonic wars, people struggle to make ends meet. A travelling acting troupe—consisting of the beautiful Laura (Gaia Germani), ex-soldier Bruno (Jacques Stanislawski, who pretends to be Laura's brother as a protective measure), Dart (Luciano Pigozzi, who plays Harlequin), the fire-eating Gianni (Ennio Antonelli), and the dwarf Neep (Antonio De Martino)—stage entertainments in public squares, including a gallows skit in which a hangman (Bruno) is tricked by a condemned Harlequin into taking his place in the noose. After one such performance, the troupe receive an invitation to give a private performance at a castle for three gold pieces. En route, they stop at a tavern, where a violent argument over money breaks out between Dart and Bruno, causing Dart to quit with an oath of revenge. His place is taken by Eric (Philippe Leroy), a homecoming general in the wars whose horse was stolen by Dart as he made his escape.

In the woods near the castle, the troupe notice a complete absence of sounds and find a petrified bird on a tree branch. A witch (Donald Sutherland) appears, warning them in rhyme-speak against going to "the castle of the living dead." ("Some will live and some will die, before the morning sun is nigh!") They proceed to the castle anyway, where they are received by Count Drago (Christopher Lee) and his footman Sandro (Mirko Valentin). The castle is adorned with all manner of petrified creatures, many now otherwise extinct, which Drago has treated with a special chemical. Prior to giving their performance, Drago offers some drugged wine to Bruno, and the gallows skit results in tragic consequences. Dart rides up to the castle during the performance and scales the outer wall to peer through Laura's bedroom window; she sees him, and it is presumed that he was somehow responsible for arranging Bruno's death, as he swore he would. While seeking entrance to the castle, Dart is found and slain by a scythe-wielding Sandro.

At breakfast, Count Drago offers Eric a cup of coffee without success. Bruno is given a proper funeral on the castle grounds, which are visited by the incompetent, allergy-ridden constable Sgt. Poe (Sutherland again, in a dual role) and his two officers. As the troupe prepare to leave, Eric disappears, having been overcome by Sandro and taken to the Count's laboratory. Laura encounters Drago, who overstates his sudden wish that she remain at the castle with him ("You're a very beautiful woman . . . You should stay this way forever"). His overtures offend her.

She goes to her room, pouring herself a glass of the cognac which the Count provided to her the night before; a surprise causes her to spill it, and she watches in horror as a cat laps it up and becomes a rigid thing. Running through the castle, she discovers the room of the late Countess Drago, preserved in youthful beauty in a bed overrun with rats and spiders, staring for all eternity into a mirror placed in her hand. Meanwhile, Sandro makes an attempt on the life of little Neep, who survives being thrown from the castle parapet and is cared for by the witch—who reveals herself to be one of Drago's early experiments, a beautiful young woman turned into a deformed crone by his chemicals.

Searching for her companions, Laura finds her way to Drago's lab, where she finds the petrified remains of Dart and frees Eric from his bonds. They are nearly shot by Sandro, but Drago intervenes. He dips a small hook into his petrification chemical, which he intends to use on them, so that they will play "the leading parts in [his] eternal theatre." Fortunately, Sgt. Poe and his men arrive just in time, and out of sheer desperation, Drago charges Eric and Laura with trying to steal some of his prize specimens. The police nearly arrest them, disregarding their warnings of the frozen people on the premises. However, the witch arrives to confirm their story and the Count attacks her. In their struggle, Drago manages to impale himself with the dipped hook and is frozen instantly. Sgt. Poe takes a brief tour of the castle rooms and frees Eric, Laura, and Neep, who ride on to other adventures.

Il castello dei morti vivi features many actors and crew members who had worked previously with Mario Bava: Luciano Pigozzi, of course; Christopher Lee, who is excellent as the droll, somewhat lovesick ghoul; Gaia Germani, who played the masked Sibyl in Ercole al centro della terra; and Mario Serandrei, who toiled at the editing table. The film was produced by Paul Maslansky, a New Yorker who had relocated to the continent to work as a unit manager on the Ray Harryhausen film Jason and the Argonauts (1963). It was his first job as a producer, in which capacity he still works today; he is best-known for his series of Police Academy comedies (and its spin-off TV series) in the 1980s and '90s, one of which—1994's Police Academy: Mission to Moscow—features Christopher Lee.

ITALIAN quattro-foglia, art by S. Wizett. Likely the only publicity artwork produced for this underrated and little-exported film.

Who directed the film is more difficult to assess. Many sources claim that the film's direction is credited to "Herbert Wise" a.k.a. Luciano Ricci (Solo contro Roma/Alone Against Rome, 1962); this may be true of Italian prints, but American prints credit screenwriter "Warren Kiefer" a.k.a. Lorenzo Sabatini, with directing it. According to David Pirie's book A Heritage of Horror: The English Gothic Cinema 1946–72, Ricci was given credit solely for quota purposes, presumably because Sabatini had not directed before. As Pirie notes, it is rumored that the film's assistant director, Michael Reeves—an American-born Briton not yet 20 years old—was allowed to direct some second-unit scenes, which turned out so much better than Sabatini's footage that he was allowed to graduate to the first unit when Sabatini fell ill. Maslansky denies this—however, according to him, Reeves was rewarded with permission to write a few additional scenes and dialogue for the picture, involving secondary characters like the dwarf. Many have speculated that the film's witch—an uncredited dual role played by Canadian actor Donald Sutherland at the outset of his distinguished career—was one of Reeves' contributions, but Sutherland, who has named all of his children after his directors, christened his first son Kiefer—which tells us who he remembers directing his scenes. However, when asked who directed his scenes in Il castello dei morti vivi, Luciano Pigozzi says, "I don't remember who the director was . . . He was English." To make matters still more confusing, Herbert Wise was also the name of an English director actively working at the time, mostly in British television.

DART (Luciano Pigozzi) and the dwarf Neep (Antonio De Martino) on location at the Parco dei Mostri.

His best-known work includes the miniseries I, Claudius (1976) and the ghost story The Woman in Black (1989).

Dismissing the possibility that this other Herbert Wise was involved, Michael Reeves' specific contributions to the film would appear to include the scenes involving Dart, such as the gallows skit, the tavern fight, the scaling of the castle wall to Laura's bedroom window, and his death-by-scythe. All of these elements share a distinct personality with the three films Reeves would direct before his untimely death at the age of 24: [3] Il lago di Satana/The She Beast (1966), The Sorcerers (1967), and Witchfinder General/The Conqueror Worm (1968). Another patently obvious Reeves contribution is the film's opening narration ("The wars were over. Napoleon was locked with his ambitions in an island prison and the shattered remnants of his armies disbanded. Some went peacefully home, others made the highways unsafe for travel. There was no war, but the killing had not stopped . . ."), which shows an attention to historical timing extremely uncharacteristic of Italian horror, and strongly parallels the opening narration of his final, and finest, film.

Shot in black-and-white by Aldo Tonti—the cinematographer of Visconti's Ossessione (1943) and Fellini's Le notti di Cabiria/The Nights of Cabiria (1957)—Il castello dei morti vivi reflects its mixed parentage and nationality by being at once very characteristic of the Italian horrors of this period, yet also quite original. The movie is enjoyable in its use of familiar locations like L'Aquila's Castello di Balsorano, beloved for its appearances in L'amante del vampiro/The Vampire and the Ballerina (1960), La cripta e l'incubo/Terror in the Crypt (1964), and Paul Morrissey's Flesh for Frankenstein (1973)—and also the Parco dei Mostri, a 16th century park adorned with a dozen or more mythological creatures carved in stone, which also appears in Charles Band's 1988 horror film Meridian. The cavern serving as the secret entrance to Drago's castle, whose exterior is carved in the likeness of a screaming face, is known as the Orco, and it is one of the most popular attractions in "Monster Park," which remains open to paying customers to this very day. [4]

Despite the familiarity of its locations and an obviously low budget (the soundtrack, credited to Angelo Francesco Lavagnino, recycles Riz Ortolani cues from Margheriti's Danza macabra/Castle of Blood), Il castello dei morti vivi film boasts a strong, medieval atmosphere, its Brughelian characters and settings evoking the look of old woodcuts and fairy tale illustrations. In some ways, the film anticipates the Bergmanesque touches that would soon surface in Roger Corman's The Masque of the Red Death (1964), as well as certain historically attuned British horror films, like Piers Haggard's Blood on Satan's Claw (1970) and Gordon Hessler's Cry of the Banshee (1970), which followed in the wake of Reeves' Witchfinder General. Tonti's cinematography, with its bold front-lighting and long shadows, also hints at German Expressionism, while Christopher Lee's appearance as Count Drago suggests the inspiration of silent era villains, such as the Devil in Guido Brignone's Maciste all'inferno/Maciste in Hell (1925).

Regrettably, Il castello dei morti vivi is now but one step away from becoming a lost film in its original screen ratio. The negative elements are said to repose in a European archive, where they will remain until some enterprising video company agrees to pay the unrealistic fee its owner is charging. The film was never given a theatrical release in the United States, where it has only been shown in the form of an extremely grainy, badly-cropped, 16 mm TV print that has since fallen into the public domain.

3 Reeves died on February 11, 1969, reportedly by taking some prescribed depression medication after an evening of drinking. For decades, Reeves' death has been characterized by the press (and the glamorizing fan press) as a deliberate act of suicide, but official documents have recently surfaced—in Benjamin Halligan's 2003 biography of Reeves—which declare it to have been an accident.

4 Interested readers are referred to the Bomarzo website, http://www.bomarzo.net (February 9, 2006).

New Frontiers

"Space-ships and time machines are no escape from the human condition."
—Arthur Koestler, The Boredom of Fantasy

KEN CLARK and Fernando Villeni enact the same scene in different millennia in LA STRADA PER FORT ALAMO and TERRORE NELLO SPAZIO.

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by G. D. Stefano.

La strada per Fort Alamo

The Road to Fort Alamo

IN THE YEARS since it was made, La strada per Fort Alamo—Mario Bava's first excursion into the Western genre—has become one of his most elusive films. Although entirely (and somewhat deservedly) eclipsed today by many other Italian Westerns, the it was produced at a time when the so-called "Spaghetti Western" had yet to be born, before the films of Sergio Leone—beginning with Per un pugno di dollari/A Fistful of Dollars (1964)—established the cinematic vocabulary of this national genre.

Much like the Italian horror film in the mid-1950s, the Italian Western was nothing new in 1964, but it had been extinct long enough to become something new. One of the earliest Italian Westerns, Una signora dell'Ovest ("A Lady of the West") was directed by Carl Koch in 1942.[1] Christopher Frayling tells us that Koch's film was criticized in its day by Giuseppe De Santis for its "cardboard backings . . . and a general atmosphere of the baroque."[2] (If this is an accurate description, Koch's film was a stylistic antecedent of La strada per Fort Alamo and would make very interesting viewing.)

MARIO BAVA*'s first Western incorporates visual elements that would not be out of place in one of his horror pictures.*

Una signora dell'Ovest and its immediate successor, Giorgio Ferroni's Il fanciullo del West ("The Child of the the West," 1942), were inspired by Puccini's opera La fanciulla del West (first filmed in 1911), and as the genre evolved, operatic devices would become inseparable from the stylistic brio of Italian Westerns. Apart from the spotty appearance of some Wild Bill Hickok adventures in the early 1950s, the genre lay dormant until Italian interest was reawakened by a series of West German co-productions made in the early 1960s. These romanticized, unambiguous stories of the Old West were based on the writings of Karl May (1842-1912), the best-selling German author of all time.

Westerns had been popular in Germany as early as the 1930s. Desperate to recover a national sense of optimism which had been lacking in their films since the postwar years, Hamburg's Rialto Films bought the rights to May's numerous Western novels and characters and set a series into motion with Der Schatz im Silbersee/The Treasure of Silver Lake (1962), directed by Harald Reinl and starring Lex Barker as "Old Shatterhand" and Pierre Brice as "Winnetou." Its commercial success quickly led to sequels like Hugo Fregonese's Old Shatterhand (1963, with Daliah Lavi as an Indian maiden!), Reinl's magnificent Winnetou I – III trilogy (1964-66), and Alfred Vohrer's Unter Geiern/Frontier Hellcat (1964) with Stewart Granger and Elke Sommer. Most of these international co-productions had Italian money involved, and as they became more successful in Italy, the Italian investors became eager to eliminate the middlemen and so began producing their own Westerns in open competition with the Germans. Only four "purebred" Italian Westerns were produced in 1964: Leone's film, Bava's film, Buffalo Bill—L'eroe del Far West (starring Gordon Scott and directed by Mario Costa under the laughable alias "John W. Fordson"), and Sergio Corbucci's Minnesota Clay, to which Bava contributed anonymously. As an accomplished matte painter, Bava was the only director in the bunch who came to the job equipped to transform ordinary dirt roads on the outskirts of Rome into breathtaking vistas from the Old West.

La strada per Fort Alamo—written by Enzo Gicca Palli, Bava's assistant director Franco Prosperi, and actress Livia Contardi (who played the role of Hadda in Gli invasori)—was co-produced by Achille Piazzi and Comptoir Français du Film, the cooperation that bankrolled Bava's Ercole al centro della terra in 1961. More recently, Comptoir Français had produced Georges Franju's Feuillade adaptation Judex (1963), one of Bava's then-current favorites. French investment was attracted to the project because it could be sold in France as Arizona Bill, in an attempt to forge a traditional relationship with a series of twenty "Arizona Bill" movies which had been filmed in France between 1907 and 1913, with Joë Hamman in the title

La strada per Fort Alamo

"The Road to Fort Alamo"
Filmed at Elios Film Studios (Rome) and on location
February – March 1964
First released October 24, 1964
Eastmancolor, Totalscope, 2.35:1, 82 minutes

Production: Piazzi Produzione Cinematografica (Rome), Protor Film (Rome), Comptoir Français du Film Production (Paris). Producer: Achille Piazzi. Director: John Old [Mario Bava]. Assistant director: Charles Price [Franco Prosperi]. Screenplay: Vincent Thomas [Enzo Gicca Palli], Charles Price [Franco Prosperi], and Jane Brisbane [Livia Contardi]. French adaptation: Louis Sauvat. Script girl: Priscilla Cooper [Priscilla Contardi]. Director of photography: Bud Third [Ubaldo Terzano]. Camera assistant: Claud Raguse. Art direction: Demos Philos [Demofilio Fidani]. Costume design: Mila Vance [Tina Grani]. Makeup: Leo Travers [Euclide Santolli]. Hairdresser: Mary Gang [Renata Magnanti]. Military Advisor: Col. Elliot R. Edwards. Production supervisor: James Garrett [Armando Govoni]. Editor: Wilson Dexter [Mario Serandrei]. Music: Piero Umiliani. "The Way to Alamo," sung by Tony Wendall. Distributor: Belotti Film.

Ken Clark (Bill Mannerly/Bud Massidy), Jany Clair (Janet), Michel Lemoine (Kid Carson), Kirk Bert]Alberto Cevenini], CSC (Slim Kincaid), Dean Ardow [Gustavo De Nardo] (Sgt. Warwick), Anthony Gradwell [Antonio Gradoli] (Capt. Hull/Hollis), Andreina Paul (Mrs. Collins), Gérard Herter (Mr. Silva/Silver, uncredited).

Belgium: Arizona Bill, Cobelciné, 1965
France: Arizona Bill, Comptoir Française du Film Production, 3/24/65, 88m
Germany: Der Ritt nach Alamo, "The Ride to Alamo," Ceres Film Verleih, 10/8/65
Turkey: Alamo Kahramanlari, "Heroes of the Alamo"
US: The Road to Fort Alamo, World Entertainment Corporation, 7/10/66, 82m role. The original Italian title, once again, tweaked the nose of a more prestigious Italian release, namely Federico Fellini's La strada (1954).

Like Sei donne per l'assassino, which was partly inspired by the West German Edgar Wallace crime thrillers (or krimis) produced by CCC, La strada per Fort Alamo is much closer to the falscher-Amerikaner look of Rialto's "Winnetou" films than to the grittier neorealistic Westerns being innovated at the same time by Leone. Filmed by much the same crew that Bava used on Sei donne per l'assassino, his Western has a look that is baroque as well as expressionistic, with some interior "exteriors" as patently unreal as the painted backdrops of Kobayashi's Kaidan/Kwaidan (1963). Bava imbues the film not only with scenic interest, but with elements of horror. While Leone's classic is more earthy, Bava's borders on the unearthly; and while Per un pugno di dollari finds Leone's later operatic tendencies not yet in bloom, Bava's film is (in a literal sense) a "horse opera"—a traditional Western staged with bold splashes of artifice.

With its scattered cattle skulls and a full moon that stares from a baleful night sky like a wen, Bava's West is a dark and barren place whose landscapes suggest the post-apocalyptic, as well as the post-traumatic. His Indians are dangerous shadow beings who communicate with bones and screams and drums, and his Western heroes—Union Army soldiers, in this case—are in fact the invaders of this eerie, unknowable terrain. In many ways, La strada per Fort Alamo is a rehearsal for Bava's next film, the science fiction/horror classic, Terrore nello spazio/Planet of the Vampires (1965).

KEN CLARK, Jany Clair, and Michel Lemoine are the outlaw protagonists of LA STRADA PER FORT ALAMO.

Synopsis

Bill Mannerly, a once-prosperous rancher, has become an embittered drifter since the day his sister was murdered and his ranch was burned to the ground by marauding Union soldiers. Stumbling across some dead Union soldiers ambushed by Osage Indians, he discovers in their possession a requisition order for $150,000 to be given them for the Fort Lawrence payroll. Bill rides to the nearest town to report his finding, but arrives too early to wake the town's sheriff. While passing the time over breakfast in a saloon, he happens to save a likeable, knife-throwing outlaw, Slim Kincaid, from a group of card sharks led by the slimy Mr. Silva.

Slim thanks Bill by taking him to the cavern hideout of a band of outlaws bossed by the ruthless Kid Carson. Wishing revenge against the Union soldiers who ruined his life, Bill ingratiates himself to the gang by telling Carson about the requisition letter and the dead Union soldiers, whose uniforms will provide useful disguises. A much larger man than Carson, Bill dons a lieutenant's uniform, while Carson is forced to adopt a common private's clothes. The "requisition" goes smoothly until Carson sadistically slays an old woman in the bank. The group return to their hideout to find one of their fellows butchered by the Osages, and their own clothes stolen. Bill fights with Carson over the money, and when Slim comes to his defense, both are knocked unconscious and left behind by Carson and company. As they leave, Osages appear from the recesses of the cave, strip Bill and Slim of their uniforms, and stake them to the desert ground to die of thirst.

A Union escort led by Capt. Hull, en route to Fort Alamo, rescues Bill and Slim from exposure. Bill's tattered uniform identifies him as a lieutenant, so he identifies himself as "Lt. John Smith of Fort Alamo," and Slim as "Pvt. Jim Kincaid." They are accepted by the Captain and put into fresh uniforms. Among the members of the convoy, Bill meets Janet, a young woman arrested for trying to kill a Union soldier who raped her. In time, the nosy Sgt. Warwick discovers the truth about Bill's disguise, prompting Bill to plan his escape under cover of night. As he and Slim prepare to sneak away with two Union horses, they learn that a marauding Osage Indian has had the same idea and intends to free the horses to render the encampment vulnerable to a morning attack. Bill and Slim kill the Indian, though it means waking the camp and foiling their own getaway.

The next day, the evil Carson—still wearing his Union private's uniform—is rescued (with most of the stolen $150,000) by the convoy during a shoot-out with the Osages. The money is placed in Bill's custody, according to Army regulations stating that any discovered currency becomes the responsibility of the second-in-command. When Carson tries to molest Janet, Bill has him put in irons. The Osages ambush the convoy in transit by sending their remaining share of the stolen money downriver, drawing soldiers out into the rapids to recover it. The convoy's only hope is for someone to sneak out at night, when the Osages will not attack, and alert Fort Alamo to their distress. After exchanging some tender words with Janet, Bill volunteers to make the run. He turns the saddlebag of cash over to Sgt. Warwick for safekeeping, then enters the river, swimming past the Indian camp underwater while breathing through a reed.

1 The probable first Italian Western was La vampira indiana (1913), directed by Sergio Leone's father Roberto Roberti, and starring Leone's mother, Bice Waleran.

2 Christopher Frayling, Spaghetti Westerns: Cowboys and Europeans from Karl May to Sergio Leone (London UK: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1981), 32.

As morning arrives, the Osages launch their bloodthirsty attack against the men, women, and children of the convoy. Just as lives begin to be lost on both sides, Bill rides back with reinforcements from Fort Alamo. The Indians are defeated, but Carson soon takes advantage of the rampant bloodshed to enact some violence of his own. He clubs Warwick and relieves him of the money, only to be attacked by Slim, who gets shot in the back. Before he dies, Slim pleads with Bill to avenge him. Bill pursues Carson to a high ridge, where they fight for the money. Carson nearly gets the upper hand, but is shot just in time—by Janet. Bill returns the payload to Sgt. Warwick, who swears his silence and releases both Carson and Janet, saying that no one will miss them in the presence of so much death. The errant couple pledge their love to one another and look forward to building a new life together on a ranch they will build "somehow" with "clean money"—not realizing that wads of ready cash, sent down river by the Osages, is floating on the surface of the river only a few feet away from them.

Cast

Cast in the lead role of Bill Mannerly was Ken Clark, who was born in Neffs, Ohio, on June 4, 1927. Tall and ruggedly handsome, with a bare chest like Robert Redford's, Clark started out as a beefcake photographer's model and as a contract player at 20th Century-Fox, then was cast in a small role in Robert D. Webb's On the Threshold of Space (1956). Thereafter, he moved immediately into Westerns: the Elvis Presley vehicle Love Me Tender and The Proud Ones (both directed by Webb, as well) and Delmer Daves' The Last Wagon (all 1956). In 1958, he played his last role for Fox in the musical South Pacific (1958), after which he had small speaking roles in three episodes of Alfred Hitchcock Presents, including the legendary "Lamb to the Slaughter," starring Barbara Bel Geddes and directed by Hitchcock himself. With this experience behind him, Clark dedicated himself to pursuing bigger roles in smaller films. He succeeded with the lead role in Bernard L. Kowalski's Attack of the Giant Leeches (1959), an independent production that was distributed with great success by American International Pictures. After another cheapie, David Bradley's 12 to the Moon (1960), Clark decided to do what other American "he-men" had done, by trying his luck in Rome. His first role was the Mongolian warlord Kabaal in one of Mario Bava's recent interludes, "Al Wordl's" (Alvaro Mancori's) Ercole l'invincibile / Son of Hercules in the Land of Darkness—in which, to add insult to injury, he was billed as "Ken Klark." After this mishap, Le strada per Fort Alamo must have seemed like the opportunity of a lifetime to Clark, who plays the heroic lead stoically, but passably well.

Exotic, Titian-haired Jany Clair—most recently, Queen Samara in Giacomo Gentilomo's Maciste e la regina

BELGIAN affiche.

BUD (Ken Clark) shares a tender moment with Janet (Jany Clair) before he must venture through Osage country in search of help.

di Samar—was, in some ways, the Maria Montez of Italian exploitation's golden years. Born Jany Guillaume on September 2, 1938, in Lille, France, she had not been acting in films quite as long as Clark, but she had many more to her credit. Among these were Jacques Becker's Montparnasse 19 (1958), Vittorio Cottafavi's Le legioni di Cleopatra/Legions of the Nile (1960, with Linda Cristál as Cleopatra), Le Nuits de Raspoutine/Nights of Rasputin (1961, with Gianna Maria Canale and Ivo Garrani), and the French/Italian co-productions La vendetta della maschera di ferro/The Prisoner of the Iron Mask (1961) and Le Monstre aux Yeux Verts/Planets Against Us (1962), both of which also featured her Fort Alamo co-star and fellow Comptoir Français contract player, Michel Lemoine. After La strada per Fort Alamo, Clair was cast opposite Ken Clark once again in Riccardo Freda's spy thriller Coplan agent secret FX 18 (1965–6). Clair also received screen credit for dubbing roles in the French editions of some Italian fantasy films, including Il gigante di Metropolis/The Giant of Metropolis (1961).

Bava favorite Gustavo De Nardo was back in harness as Sgt. Warwick, the Union Army's watchful third-in-command officer. It may be the best performance he gives in any Bava film; he looks right in the uniform, and his dialogue is unusually sensitive, as when he begins to see through Bill's disguise due to his willingness to criticize fellow officers in conversation with a soldier of lower rank. Considering that Antonio Gradoli's Capt. Hull exists only to remind his subordinates that he must be addressed as "sir," Warwick's sharp-eyed intelligence, sincerity, and sense of fair play are the only redeeming values to be found in the film's portrayal of the Army—everyone else is depicted as either a tyrant, a fugitive, or a fool.

Gérard Herter—memorable for his villainous parts in Agi Murad il diavolo bianco and Caltiki il mostro immortale—makes a surprise uncredited appearance in the minor role of gambler Mr. Silva. According to dramatic law, a villain crossed by our heroes in Act I should rear his ugly head again in Act III, but Herter's complete disappearance from the subsequent narrative and lack of billing suggest that some German co-production funds may have fallen through, or that Bava improvised the part in response to an old friend's need for work.

Credited here for the first and only time as "Kirk Bert," Alberto Cevenini was a young Italian actor who had previously appeared in Antonio Leonviola's Taur, il re della forza bruta/Taur the Mighty (1960), Pino Mercanti's Il duca nero/The Black Duke (1963, with Cameron Mitchell), and Ercole l'invincibile. He would work with Bava once again, as the ambitious young Andy in Minnesota Clay (1964) and in Terrore nello spazio (1965, playing the doomed younger brother of top-lined Barry Sullivan), both times under his real name. His character of the knife-throwing marksman Slim shows the influence of James Coburn's character Britt in The Magnificent Seven (1960) and foreshadows Cameron Mitchell's Rurik in Bava's "Viking Western" I coltelli del vendicatore/Knives of the Avenger (1966).

The most compelling actor in the movie is, without a doubt, Michel Lemoine. Born circa 1928, Lemoine is a self-confessed admirer of "cinema bis" (B-movies) who made his first screen appearance in Julie de Carneilhan (1948). After playing a small role in CARSON (Michel Lemoine) and Bud pose as Union soldiers to cash a requisition order for $150,000 at a bank.

Jean Cocteau's Le Testament d'Orphée/The Testament of Orpheus (1960), Lemoine had his breakthrough as the male lead in José Benézéraf's erotic hit L'Etérnité pour nous/Sin on the Beach (1961) with Sylvia Sorrente, followed by the aforementioned films with Jany Clair, and another film for Benézéraf, Le Concerto de la Peur/Night of Lust (1962). His Italian films of the 1960s include Giorgio Ferroni's Ercole contro Moloch/The Conquest of Mycenae (1963), Delitto allo specchio/Sexy Party (1964), and two features in Antonio Margheriti's "Gamma 1" quartet, I criminali della galassia/Wild, Wild Planet (1965) and I diafanoidi vengono da Marte/War of the Planets (1966). In the late '60s, he worked with his wife, actress Janine Reynaud, in several films for Spanish director Jesús "Jess" Franco (Necronomicon/Succubus, 1967) and French director Max Pecas (Je suis un Nymphomane/Forbidden Passions, 1970). Afterwards, Lemoine's acting career continued in an erotic vein, and he made the crossover into writing and directing erotic films, which he continued to do in France and Germany through the late 1990s. One of his films, Les Week-ends malefiques du Comte Zaroff (1976), an erotic variation on The Most Dangerous Game, was released in France with the decidedly Bavian title Sept femmes pour un Sadique ("Seven Women for the Sadist"). With his almost excessively handsome good looks and crazed eyes, Lemoine is at his best in villainous roles and he is often cast as a decadent aesthete. Though the character of Kid Carson isn't particularly well used in La strada per Fort Alamo, Lemoine has some terrific moments, particularly his lazy gunplay during his first meeting with Bill, and his look of insane excitement as he watches the Wagon City bank manager count out $150,000.

In a special issue of the French fanzine Monster Bis, Lemoine reminisced about his La strada per Fort Alamo experience to journalist Norbert Moutier: "Mario Bava was an extraordinary director and he needed all of his talent to get through that picture, because it was really difficult. The producers had money problems with that film, and Bava had to fight constantly . . . but he was very sly! When you watch the film, you have the impression that there are about forty horses, right? In fact, there were only seven. He made them run around in circles so that they would appear and then reappear on screen, creating the illusion of a huge stampede. When the producers saw that shot, they became very worried: 'You're crazy for spending all that money on horses!'

"I also have, well, burning memories about the film. I had a fight scene with Ken Clark around an open fire. Of course, my back was covered with padding to protect me against the flames when I fell into them. But on the night we filmed the master shot for that sequence, I forgot to put my padding on. When I fell into the fire, I was really burning! That's probably why I'm so convincing in that scene."

Moutier also asked Lemoine how Bava, a maestro of the fantastic cinema, reacted to directing something as earthbound as a Western.

"He just did it; he didn't have time to think about it, with all the other problems that were besieging him. He took special care to set the lighting, to give the impression of a bigger budget. But I must tell you, in the evenings when we had our aperitifs together, we talked exclusively about his horror films."[3]

KID Carson has no compunction about shooting another man in the back, as seen in this German lobby card.

Music

Hired to write the music for La strada per Fort Alamo was an unlikely choice for the assignment: the noted jazz composer Piero Umiliani. Born in Florence on July 17, 1926, Umiliani first became consumed with music at the age of 14, when he discovered Duke Ellington's recording Hot Jazz, which was a contraband item in Italy under Mussolinian rule. He studied composition with Vito Frazzi and majored in counterpoint and fugue at the Luigi Cherubini Conservatory of Florence. After moving to Rome and establishing himself as a nightclub pianist, composer, and arranger, Umiliani landed the job of scoring Mario Monicelli's film I soliti ignoti/Big Deal on Madonna Street (1958). This landmark score—which featured the solo trumpet of the California expatriate and "cool jazz" artist Chet Baker—was part of the vanguard in the movement now known as "crime jazz," which also included such composers as Elmer Bernstein (The Sweet Smell of Success), Henry Mancini (Touch of Evil, Peter Gunn), and Umiliani's original font of inspiration, Duke Ellington (Anatomy of a Murder). Umiliani and Baker continued to collaborate on film scores for several years, including Nanny Loy's 1959 sequel Audace colpo dei soliti ignoti and Franco Rossi's Smog (1962), and his light-hearted compositional style lent itself particularly well to comedies like the Fellini/Visconti/De Sica/

COMPOSER Piero Umiliani.

Monicelli omnibus Boccaccio '70 (1962).

La strada per Fort Alamo was one of Umiliani's earliest opportunities to score something other than a comedy, but the results are so stereotypical and poorly integrated that his contribution—more often than not—has an unwelcomely comic effect. The theme song, "The Way to Alamo" (sung by Tony Wendall), is lyrically ominous ("The blue sky will go cloudy/The ravens will fly low . . .") while musically echoing Herb Alpert's 1962 hit, "The Lonely Bull." As Bill first rides into Wagon City, the theme is reprised with a solo trumpet in place of the vocal, emphasizing its Spanish values even more. Inside the saloon, though it is very early in the morning and inhabited only by four poker players and a sleeping bartender, we hear the obligatory rinkytink piano. A jagged "danger theme" is introduced when Bill stumbles upon the dead Union soldiers, and is replayed throughout the film; one of the better cues written for the picture, it is nevertheless highly inappropriate in its "crime jazz" orchestral colorings. After an aural sampling of jazz of this sophistication, "Janet's Theme"—a homely, warbling harmonica piece—is simply laughable, and the "Love Theme" played during her scenes with Bill is a simple waltz-time theme that sounds quaint and old-fashioned rather than emotional. In short, the score is extremely uninspired and sounds as if it were written in reply to a concept rather than dailies. The music and the editing rhythms of the picture are at odds throughout, and the music is sometimes dragged in arbitrarily to color scenes in which nothing is happening except conversation.

Umiliani would score two more films for Bava in the years ahead: the vivacious giallo, 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto/5 Dolls for an August Moon (1970, one of his finest and most beloved scores) and the comic Western Roy Colt & Winchester Jack (1970).

Distribution

La strada per Fort Alamo was made—in and around Rome—at roughly the same time that Sergio Leone and American actor Clint Eastwood were filming their landmark Per un pugno di dollari in Almeria, Spain. Ultimately, they were released to Roman theaters one month apart, with Leone's film (credited to "Bob Robertson") opening first, on September 19, 1964; it premiered out-of-town, in Florence, one month earlier. Per un pugno di dollari was an immediate sensation, grossing over 3 billion (yes, billion) lire [$1,870,000] in its initial release, making it one of the most successful Italian films of all time. The latest film by director "John Old," on the other hand, attracted only 130 million lire [$81,000]. Given these figures, it might seem that Bava's effort failed dismally. However, to put matters in their true perspective, La strada per Fort Alamo, miserable though its earnings were, outgrossed all but two of the films previously directed by Bava—the exceptions being La maschera del demonio (a bare improvement at 139 million lire) and Gli invasori (326.3 million lire). Therefore, although it was unlikely that the movie placed a cent in the black, it was one of Bava's top Roman successes to date.

Bava's film was the first to be picked up for distribution in the United States, but both films had to wait a while; The Road to Fort Alamo was released by World Entertainment

ITALIAN locandina.

3 Lemoine's comments courtesy of Norbert Moutier, who also translated them.

SCENES and collages of images from the film are represented in this partial Italian fotobusta set.

Corporation (formerly Sigma III, the distributors of the classic The Horrible Dr. Hichcock/The Awful Dr. Orlof double bill of 1962) in the summer of 1966, while United Artists resisted a US release of A Fistful of Dollars until February 1967.

The Road to Fort Alamo contains some bewildering changes of names: Bill Mattingly is "Bud Massidy" (one of those non-existent surnames which haunt the popular Italian popular cinema in translation), Sgt. Warwick is "Sgt. Carter" (someone's nod to Gomer Pyle, U.S.M.C.?) and the Osage Indians are the "Ozark" Indians. Because the export prints were credited to "John Old" as well, the film's American release—which was spotty, at any rate—was overlooked by fans of Bava's horror films.

Even watchful Bava fan Joe Dante managed to miss it: "The poster said it was directed by John Old, so I didn't know it was the new Mario Bava picture . . . I went to see the co-feature and, as I walked in, Road to Fort Alamo was on and had about ten more minutes left to run . . . I could tell it was a Bava film almost immediately! There were these gorgeous color gels, cattle skulls in the dirt, sadistic Indian tortures . . . and I sat there feeling sick, because it was the last day of the booking and I knew that I'd screwed up and would probably never get a chance to see it again. To this day, I still haven't seen The Road to Fort Alamo."

Commentary

Like Sergio Leone's Per un pugno di dollari, a Western retelling of Akira Kurosawa's samurai film Yojimbo (1961), La strada per Fort Alamo is a transgeneric remake of an earlier film—and, for Bava, one much closer to home. Intentionally or not, it is a Western remake of Jacques Tourneur's La battaglia di Maratona, the story of Philippides, which Bava had photographed and co-directed in 1959.

Ken Clark's Bill Mattingly resembles Steve Reeves' Philippides in several respects (including onamatopoetically): both men are farmers plucked from private life to fight as soldiers; both are betrayed by their war experience, and in their bitterness they turn their backs on duty in favor of self-interest. After being pulled into battle one last time, they find themselves in a no-win situation and must save their fellows (and recover their spirit) by making a dangerous solo run to alert reinforcements; afterwards, both men are allowed to return to private life, with the woman they have freed from captivity at their sides, with nothing but a dream of rebuilding what they once lost.

This mythic parallel gave La strada per Fort Alamo the potential to become an important cult Western, but for whatever reason, Bava's attention to the project was either divided or simply uninspired. He had no prior interest in the genre, and he was less comfortable working out-of-doors than in a studio environment he could control. As with Ercole al centro della terra, producer Achille Piazzi was apparently unable to provide his director with much more support than a mostly empty sound stage at Elios Film Studios and a few dirt roads, leaving Bava and his team to "suggest" the rest. In the meantime, tensions were coming to a boil between Bava and Ubaldo Terzano, who had been increasingly frustrated by lack of recognition for his work since Bava was generally assumed to be solely responsible for the cinematography of his films.

Though it is fairly impossible to see today in a decent print, La strada per Fort Alamo has the richly colorful, luxuriant look that distinguishes Bava's other work of this prime period (1963–64), but there are rough edges that show he was ill at ease working in this milieu (at least on this particular assignment) and wanted to wrap things up as quickly as possible. Consequently, the story's historic/mythic parallels remain undrawn, opportunities to generate suspense are flagrantly neglected, and the cast flounders in a continuum consisting solely of long and medium widescreen shots. It is entirely possible to watch the film and not recognize Antonio Gradoli (one of the most experienced actors in the picture, with a screen career dating back to the late 1930s) in the role of Capt. Hull, because he is wearing a false mustache, shown mostly in profile, and never observed more closely than in medium shot. The action scenes also unfold mostly in long-shot, preventing the camera from bringing the viewer into the midst of the action. In a scene where the wagon convoy is attacked by the Osages, a shot of Bill riding his horse alongside Janet's wagon, leaping off his horse onto the wagon, and seizing the reins from her, is filmed entirely in medium shot, without a single horse in sight! Sergio Leone's most important stylistic contribution to the Spaghetti Western—the close-up, the widescreen stare into the eyes of men who do not speak, the almost microscopic study of the landscapes etched into the faces of men who have lived—didn't occur to Mario Bava.

Besides failing to make the fullest use of its cast, La strada per Fort Alamo disappoints the viewer by not staging the sequence toward which its entire narrative arc is moving: Bill's dangerous night trek on foot through Osage country to Fort Alamo. Perhaps Bava found the script's parallels with the story of Philippides pretentious (or redundant, since he had already filmed it once), and so elected to de-emphasize them, but in doing so, he robbed his film of the scenes with the greatest potential for dramatic conflict and suspense: Bill's actual run (with any number of perils along the way), his exhausted arrival at Fort Alamo (where he would need to convince the officers of his own credentials as a soldier before persuading them to follow him into battle), and the race back to the campsite as the Osages prepare to strike at dawn. The mind boggles at what Bava might have done visually to depict a race against the sunrise. More likely, though, is that Bava was prevented from realizing the film's fullest potential by the simple lack of time and money, as Michel Lemoine described.

As the climax stands, we see Bill leave, cross the river, and steal a horse from the Osages—then we dissolve to the next morning with the Osages' abrupt attack on the encampment, with the Fort Alamo cavalry riding in close behind. The attack itself is startling in its abruptness, but also in its fury; like all Bava "raid" sequences (like the one that opens Gli invasori), it revels in the horror of war—the young mother played by Andreina Paul reaches for a pistol as the Indian shadows draw near, intending to shoot her terrified child rather than see it scalped—but it could have been made far more intense with a more protracted and suspenseful set-up.

In an unsuccessful instance of post-modern comedy relief, Bava illustrates the rising fear within the encampment by having one soldier jump in exaggerated fright as a butterfly passes by—perhaps a veiled reference to All Quiet on the Western Front.

Another disappointment is the film's failure to sketch its villain, Kid Carson, as a truly dangerous adversary to Bill Mattingly. After flying off the handle and shooting the old woman in the bank, and leaving our heroes for dead among the Indians, when Carson later reappears in the narrative, he must spend most of his remaining scenes disguised as a Union Army private, making him subservient to Bill's phony rank of lieutenant. With Carson afraid of being exposed, Bill has the upper hand until the final confrontation, which is more in the nature of a blind attack than a duel.

Bava's cinematographic concerns with this production were clearly not performance-based, but rather compositional and scenic. During action scenes, the camera tends to be rock-steady, relying on screen composition and editing to give the action the punctuation they require. One of the film's most memorable shots is the fistfight between Bill and Kid Carson, after Carson's attempted violation of Janet. The entire fight is framed in long-shot, just inside the entrance of a cave; the surrounding stone walls are illuminated with different color gels, but the fight itself is backlit by the natural light pouring through the cave opening and down a flight of carved steps, leaving the two men in silhouette and kicking up occasional clouds of dust. The shot goes on just long enough to cease to be about the fight, and to become about itself, as an abstract work of kinetic art.

Throughout the film, the actors are secondary to the landscape, most of which is artificial. The film's main titles appear over a lovely matte painting that shows a splendid mesa-crowned 4 For some reason, the distributors of the French version—Arizona Bill—were unable to superimpose the French credits over Bava's original matte background, so they were superimposed over a much cruder painting executed by another hand. As the titles stop, the poor painting dissolves into the better one!

SGT. WARWICK and Bud find Union soldiers crucified and mutilated by an Osage tribe.

panorama sprouting out of an ordinary Roman country road of grass and dust.[4] Elsewhere, Bava's paintbrush adds a simple cactus to the side of a road. As the film proceeds, and ventures deeper into Osage territory, Bava begins to romance a darker, more horrific vocabulary from the Western imagery. At one point, the convoy is halted by an occult arrangement of cattle skulls and tomahawks left in the middle of the road as an ill omen; later, a tracking shot past a wall inscribed with mysterious Indian symbols gives way to a view of two Union soldiers left crucified on a pair of crossed wooden beams. (Grimacing at their unseen faces, Sgt. Warwick observes, "They even burned their eyes out.") The interior "exteriors" filmed at Elois are even more unmistakable as outposts of Bava's universe; with its eerie trees and bold blue cycloramic backdrop, the camp site would look identical to the forest surrounding Gorka's family cottage in I tre volti della paura, if not for a small fence of wooden planks, a campfire, and a resting horse. When an Osage scout invades the campsite to steal the Army's horses, his appearance is directly preceded by one of the film's most arresting images: a brace of dead tree branches reaching across the screen like the tentacles of a squid.

Bava's weird melding of horror and Western imagery is unusual, but not unique. The film's look and atmosphere is somewhat prefigured by an earlier Western: Hugo Fregonese's Apache Drums (1951), produced by the great producer of 1940s RKO horrors, Val Lewton. La strada per Fort Alamo owes almost as much to this Lewton production as to the legend of Philippides. The hero of Apache Drums, Sam Leeds (Stephen McNally), is also forced to ride out of town after using his sharp eyes and quick draw to expose a card cheat in a local saloon. In both films, the bodies of white men and women mutilated by Indians are discovered and described. While Apache Drums features a character who wears a hat to cover a partial scalping, Bava's film parodies the act of scalping by showing one of Carson's men being forced to sacrifice a lock of hair to provide Bill with a false mustache for their requisition caper. In both films, a group of people must spend an entire night encircled and tormented by the pounding of Indian drums in preparation for a merciless attack, until the "outsider" among them takes it upon himself to make an heroic dash for help.

WARWICK and Bud comfort Slim ("Kirk Bert" a.k.a. Alberto Cevenini), who has been shot by the vicious Kid Carson.

The End of an Era

Though it isn't one of his better films, La strada per Fort Alamo heralds the end of Bava's classic period. It proved to be his final collaboration with three of his most important co-workers: cameraman Ubaldo Terzano, master editor Mario Serandrei, and assistant director Franco Prosperi. According to Lamberto Bava, "Terzano left because he was fed up with everyone looking at his work and saying that Mario Bava was responsible. He wanted to be accepted as a cameraman in his own right." Sadly, Terzano's move toward independence would not produce the desired result. His most visible later work was as the camera assistant to Luigi Kuveiller on such films as Paul Morrissey's Flesh for Frankenstein and Blood for Dracula (both 1973), Dario Argento's Profondo rosso/Deep Red (1975), and Lucio Fulci's Lo squartatore di New York/The New York Ripper (1982). Terzano refused to be interviewed for this book, and evidently continues to nurture the hurt feelings brought about by his break with Bava. I would have loved the opportunity to tell his story and give his contribution its entire due.

As the storyboarder and lighting director of his own films, Bava was the artist most responsible for the look of his films; however, it is obvious that his films lost a certain standard of quality when Terzano left the Bava squad. Bava may have storyboarded each shot, but Terzano framed them, watched each take unfold through the viewfinder as it was happening, and chose which takes to print. Seldom in Bava's later work will we encounter the kind of slow, insinuating tracking shots that Terzano piloted so capably, and never again will Bava's images be quite as sensuous in their interplay of light and shadow as they were during the tenure of Terzano.

After the success of Il gattopardo/The Leopard, Mario Serandrei became Italy's busiest film editor and he made his few remaining films for directors better able to afford him: Francesco Rosi (Il momenta della verità), Luchino Visconti (Vaghe stelle dell'orsa, 1965), Sergio Corbucci (L'uomo che ride/The Man Who Laughs), and Gillo Pontecorvo. Serandrei died unexpectedly of a heart attack in 1966, at the age of 59, while cutting Pontecorvo's La battaglia di Algeri/The Battle of Algiers.

Franco Prosperi recalls his last Bava collaboration with distaste: "Mario was useless at making Westerns; he had no talent for it. I disown that movie completely; it was kind of a disaster. Everything started with the idea of a producer, a famous one who later went to jail, and there was another person involved, whom we met at the time of Ercole al centro della terra, who—unlike the other guy—we knew had a lot of money because he was backed by then-Cardinal [Giovanni] Montini, who owned SPA Cinematografica, which had also produced Antonioni's Il grido. SPA was very important; when Montini became Pope Paolo VI, he shut it down, but it had been one of the most important film companies, run by people from Milan. After La strada per Fort Alamo, I went on to do La baia di Napoli and other films, and I quit Mario's crew because I was earning more from the Americans. We stayed friends, however, and later, when I directed a film for De Laurentiis—Io non scappo, fuggo [1969], starring [Alighiero] Noschese and [Enrico] Montesano—I took on Mario's son, Lamberto, as my assistant director."

A HARROWING moment as a mother at the Union encampment considers whether or not to murder her own daughter rather than see her fall into the hands of the Osages.

When Bava lost these invaluable team players, his work could not help but enter into a new period. From this point on, Ubaldo Terzano would be replaced behind the camera by Antonio Rinaldi, a longtime member of the Bava squad as chief electrician. Born in Rome on January 17, 1915, Rinaldi was introduced to the film business by his brother, a boom operator, who hired him to work as an electrician at Cinecittà. In this capacity, he climbed high into the studio rafters, where he operated the lamps recessed in the catwalks and ceilings. Rinaldi first worked with Bava in this capacity on La donna più bella del mondo/Beautiful But Dangerous in 1955, whereafter he rose to the role of chief electrician.

The traditional procession in camera teams is to rise from the position of focus puller to camera operator to director of photography; Terzano himself had followed these steps. It is uncommon for a chief electrician to ascend to the position of director of photography, and perhaps unprecedented for one to vault directly to that position—particularly at the belated age of 50. But this arrangement emphasizes the underlying facts that Bava was unwilling, at this point in his career, to start over from scratch with a new head man on his camera team, and that he himself was the true director of photography on his films, regardless of who was credited onscreen as director of photography. Bava drew the storyboards, made all the aesthetic decisions in pre-production and on-set, and approved everything before allowing the camera to turn; Rinaldi communicated the lighting and camera teams in accordance with his director's wishes.

Rinaldi had learned a great deal about the art of lighting from Bava over the years, and he adapted quickly and smoothly to his new role. "He was my mentor, the best director of photography I ever met," he told Alberto Pezzotta in 2004.

With Rinaldi now in charge of the camera unit, the cinematography of Bava's films became less fluid and more mechanical, characterized by an expedient but sometimes injudicious use of the zoom lens—the most-criticized hallmark of Bava's "middle period." With only a couple of exceptions when Bava could not afford the formal services of a D.P., Rinaldi would remain by his side through the filming of Baron Blood (1972)—a period of seven years.

Mario Serandrei proved harder to replace, as Bava floundered through a series of editors until finding Carlo Reali, who supervised the cutting of all but two features from the director's final decade. When Reali and Rinaldi worked together, moments resulted that nearly equalled the classic poise of the Serandrei-Terzano period that is synonymous with the very best of Mario Bava. There were still great things ahead.

JAPANESE poster art.

Mario Bava's Secret Filmography

Minnesota Clay

WHEN ASKED ABOUT his collaborations with Mario Bava, actor Cameron Mitchell recalled that they worked together on six different films, though their official filmographies include only three. According to Mitchell, another of their secret alliances was Minnesota Clay, in which he gives an appealing performance in the unusual role of an aging master gunfighter who must somehow rid his hometown of two opposing gangs though handicapped by incipient blindness.

Minnesota Clay was the first Western directed by Sergio Corbucci, a contributor to the scripts for Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei and Il ladro di Bagdad, who would mature into an Italian Western specialist second only to Sergio Leone. Corbucci was one of those fellows who increased his chances for advancement in his profession by keeping a lot of irons in the fire. Before Minnesota Clay went into production, Corbucci was set to make his directorial debut with Danza Macabra/Castle of Blood, based on his original screenplay, but he was forced to withdraw when a previous directorial obligation (1963's Il figlio di Spartacus/The Slave, starring Steve Reeves) was suddenly green-lighted. Consequently, he entrusted his horror film to his friend Antonio Margheriti, who had just completed his own first foray into horror with La vergine di Norimberga/Horror Castle (1963), starring Christopher Lee and Rosanna Podestà, which he directed as "Anthony M. Dawson."

"[Corbucci and I] were very close friends and often worked together," Margheriti explained. "Sometimes I shot the exteriors of his films, and sometimes he returned the favor on my pictures, so it was natural for me to take over." [1]

Cameron Mitchell's recollections of the Minnesota Clay situation were vague—the most he could say was that Bava was "around" to "assist" Corbucci—but the truth can be determined by scanning the available facts. The Italo/Spanish/French co-production was reportedly filmed on location in Spain at Poblado de Manzanos, Torrelaguna, and Manzanares de Real, near Madrid, and at Elios Studios in Rome, by the film's credited cinematographer, José Fernandez Aguayo. By examining the film closely, one can see that very little, if any, of the picture was actually shot in Spain—perhaps the two scenes involving Ortiz (Fernando Sancho) and his gang, but not much else. The bulk of the movie takes place either in or outside the saloon, or in or outside Jonathan's farmhouse, all of which would have been shot at Elios, with the exception of some farmhouse exteriors, such as reverse shots, which could easily have been filmed by rebuilding a farmhouse façade on location in Spain; this would be cheaper, after all, than bringing Sancho and all the other members of Ortiz' gang to Rome. Aguayo would have been in charge of the Spanish photography, but labor laws would have prevented him from shooting any of the Italian footage, so Corbucci would have needed an Italian cameraman for the majority of the shooting. It was exactly the sort of assignment that Mario Bava would have happily accepted, on the stipulations, that he not be credited and that the work was fast.

The look of the film fully supports this explanation, with even the early prison scenes reflecting Bava's technique with their framing, their compositional sense, and their use of zoom and semi-wide-angle (28 or 30mm) lenses. What is even more interesting about Minnesota Clay are the ways in which it suggests Bava's involvement in the realms of its scripting and direction. Corbucci certainly could have used a helping hand, as his filmography shows that he spent much of 1964 running back and forth between different movie sets—writing, directing, even co-directing such pictures as Danza macabra, Massacro del Grande Canyon/Red Pastures (co-directed with Albert Band) and the Franco and Ciccio comedies I due mafiosi/The Amazing Dr. G and I figli del leopardi/Sons of the Leopard.

ESTELLA (Ethel Rojo) confides to Clay (Cameron Mitchell) that Ortiz plans to raid his brother's ranch in search of buried gold.

Synopsis

The year is 1883, and the place is Drunner Prison—a.k.a. "The Rat Hole"—a forced labor camp in New Mexico, near the border. Eighteen years into a life sentence for murder is Minnesota Clay, reputed to be the world's greatest pistol-shot. He has waited in vain for someone on the outside to step forward to clear his good name. Over the years, he has had to learn to live carefully in prison;

Minnesota Clay

Filmed on location near Madrid and at Elios Studios, Rome
September – October 1964
First released: November 12, 1964
Eastmancolor, 1.85:1, 99 minutes

Production: Ultra Film—Sicilia Cinematografica (Palermo), Jaguar Films (Madrid), Franco London Film (Paris). Producer: Danilo Marciani. Director: Sergio Corbucci. Assistant directors: Romolo Girolami, A. Hurtado. Screenplay: Adriano Bolzoni, Sergio Corbucci and José Gutiérrez Maesso, from a story by Bolzoni. Directors of photography: José Fernandez Aguayo, Mario Bava (uncredited). Camera operator: Mario Mancini. Camera assistant: Simone Zanfroni. Art direction: Carlo Simi. Assistant art director: Francisco Canet. Costume design: Carlo Simi. Hairdresser: Gianna Picchi. Production manager: Faustino Ocaña. Production inspector: Michele Marsala. Production secretary: Arcangelo Picchi. Editor: Franco Fraticelli. Music: Piero Piccioni [CAM]. Sound: Alberto Bartolomei. Distributor: Titanus.

Cameron Mitchell (Minnesota Clay), Georges Rivière (Fox), Fernando Sancho (Ortiz), Alberto Cevenini (Andy), Antonio Casas (Jonathan), Diana Martín (Nancy/Elizabeth), Ethel Rojo (Estella), Anthony Ross [Antonio Rossi] (Scratchy), Nando Poggi (Tubbs), Julio Peña (Lt. Stevens), Joe Kamel (Millicet), with Simón Arriaga, Madeleine Dehek, Patricia Del Frate, Toni Fuentes, Antonio Jiménez Escribano, Alvaro de Luna, José Manuel Martin, Mario Morales, Guillermo Méndez, Gino Pernice, Manuel Peña, José Riesgo, Alfonso Rojas, Pietro Tordi, Carlos Villefranca.

Canada: Minnesota Clay, Astral Films
France: L'homme de Minnesota, 3/9/66, 90m
Germany: Minnesota Clay, 9/7/65, 91m
Spain: Minnesota Clay, Izaro Films S.A., 2/22/65
UK: Minnesota Clay, Compton Film Distributors, 8/66, 89m
US: Minnesota Clay, Harlequin International Pictures, 8/10/66, 89m

he suffers from a degenerative eye disease, and as the prison doctor warns him, "One punch and that will mean night for you." After saving a fellow inmate from drowning, Clay talks to the prison doctor about his condition. During this conversation, Clay spies a poisonous snake preparing to bite Doc and unholsters the doctor's gun to shoot it; he then takes advantage of the weapon in his grip to take Doc hostage, becoming the first prisoner ever to escape "The Rat Hole." A $10,000 reward for his recapture is promptly posted.

After relieving Doc of his horse and the last $40 in his wallet, Clay leaves him at a riverside—returning his gun—and rides away to his hometown of Mesa Encantada. En route, he sees a wagon under attack by three marauding gunmen, who shoot an old man. Two of the men ride away while the third hides in ambush. Thinking quickly, Clay dismounts in time to grab a fallen rifle and shoot his would-be assassin. Surviving the attack are a woman and her black mute servant. She introduces the dead man as the father of Gen. Domingo Ortiz, the leader of a Mexican gang intent on taking over Mesa Encantada—and introducers herself as "Ortiz' woman," Estella. The gunmen were emissaries of Fox, who was hired by Mesa Encantada to protect its people against Ortiz and promptly named himself Sheriff and took over the town for his own evil, profiteering purposes. Mesa Encantada is now known as "Terror Town" because of his methods of intimidating the locals, which include demanding "protection" money from local merchants. In a page taken from John Ford's Stagecoach, Fox is also the man who set up Clay, making it necessary for him to kill the Luke Brothers in self-defense, and who never came forward to testify in his defense—so Clay rides on to Mesa Encantada with a score to settle.

Upon arriving in town, Clay goes to the saloon where he has a tense reunion with Fox. Afterwards, a callow youth named Andy approaches Clay, knowing of his reputation and pleading with him to instruct him in the art of shooting—so that he might help him to save the town from Fox. Clay refuses, saying, "The cemetery is filled with guys who learned to shoot." Fox's men raise hell through the town, frightening a woman's horse and sending her wagon out of control. Clay rides to her rescue and is startled by the resemblance of this young schoolteacher to his late wife, Elizabeth Mullighan. When she refers to the ranch of her uncle Jonathan, Clay realizes that this young woman, Nancy, is his own daughter—not yet born at the time of his arrest. She wears a bracelet adorned with half a medallion, formerly her mother's; Clay owns the other half, which he later gives her as a present, remarking on the lovely music they make when the pieces clink together. After paying a visit to his brother-in-law Jonathan at his ranch, where they are soon joined by Nancy and Andy, several Mexican horsemen arrive to escort Clay to a compulsory meeting with Gen. Ortiz.

Clay demonstrates his marksman abilities to Ortiz' satisfaction, and is given a sack of loot—partly for avenging his father's death, and partly on the condition that he kill Fox and leave the town vulnerable to his takeover. Clay is later told by Estella that Ortiz suspects that Jonathan keeps gold buried on his ranch and plans to raid it; she permits him to escape the encampment, to alert Jonathan, only to kill one of Ortiz' men and steal a fortune in gold herself, pinning both crimes on Clay. Telling Ortiz where he has gone, Estella causes the very raid she anticipated. Clay rides back to the ranch and advises Jonathan to send Andy to Drunner Prison, inform its officers of his whereabouts, and collect the $10,000 reward for his daughter's sake. Meanwhile, in town, Fox's men are distracted from beating up Andy (who has refused to pay for personal "protection") by the arrival of a note from Estella, tipping them off to the coming raid. Ortiz and his army arrive at the farmhouse and set it ablaze with Clay inside, smoking him out. He tries to save the photograph of Elizabeth, but it is ultimately consumed by the fire. Clay is shot in the arm and badly beaten, leaving his vision hanging by a thread. Before he can stab Clay to death, Ortiz is stunned by the arrival of Fox's gang and shot to death by Estella, now intent on joining Fox. They take Clay as a captive, tying him up in a barn.

Fox meets with the businessmen of Mesa Encantada and tells them that he requires an annual protection fee of $100,000, the first payment due within twenty-four hours. Estella's expectations of a sexual victory celebration with Fox are quashed when he declines her invitation to "take" her. She retaliates by freeing Clay, then tries to endear herself to Fox by informing him. He doesn't believe her protestations in the matter and forces her to swear her innocence on a Bible. When she dares to commit this blasphemy, Fox shoots her to death.

HIS EYESIGHT failing, Clay must face a final showdown with longtime enemy Fox.

1 Peter Blumenstock, "Margheriti—The Wild, Wild Interview," Video Watchdog 28, May/June 1995, 48.

As night descends on Terror Town, Fox's gunmen find their advantage over the nearly blind Clay reduced, and his bullets diminish their number one by one. Ultimately, the contest narrows to Clay and Fox, who abducts Nancy to deflect Clay's attentions and to trick him into shooting her. But, at the last minute, the two pieces of her medallion bracelet make their "beautiful music," and Clay's last bullet finds its way home into Fox. Simultaneously, Fox's gun discharges into Clay, and the two opponents fall to the ground simultaneously. Nancy rushes to Clay and embraces him as he collapses.

In an epilogue found only in European prints, the military guards from Drunner Prison pay Jonathan a large sum of money for ridding the town of Fox and Ortiz. When they ride away, Clay emerges from the ranch house, wearing a pair of glasses, his right arm in a sling. He bids farewell to Nancy and Andy, predicting that they will marry soon, and has a final few words with Jonathan in friendship. Clay gallops off to the top of a nearby hill, where he removes his arm from the sling, removes his glasses, tosses them high in the air, and fires single bullets through both lenses.

Alternately, the English version ends shortly after Clay fires on Fox and falls to the ground. As Nancy embraces him, he confesses the truth of their relationship, instructs her to collect the $10,000 reward on his head, and dies in her arms.

Commentary

Minnesota Clay was the first sign, in the wake of Sergio Leone's Per un pugno di dollari, of the coming maturation of the Italian Western. Even moreso than Leone's genre-defining film, Minnesota Clay prophesies what the so-called "Spaghetti Western" would become in its peak years, and also the direction that Leone's own work would take; it is an elegy for the heroes of the Old West and for America's lost innocence, as right and wrong become confused, as family ties become lost or obscured by lies and legend, and as local government is usurped by organized crime. The tone is not gritty yet whimsical as in the "Dollars" trilogy, nor operatic, but bittersweet and fatalistic, with a semi-mythic dimension. In its English version, especially, it anticipates by several years the trend of downbeat movie endings that would become increasingly prevalent nearer the end of the decade.

ITALIAN locandina.

Clay may be introduced with the all-too-common reputation of "best pistol-shot in the whole world," but his talent never really takes center stage, nor is he congratulated by impressed spectators after demonstrating his prowess, which he does in an offhand, almost unconscious way; in fact, it seems that Clay's Zen-like mastery of his six-shooter is the minimal talent necessary to survive in this violent landscape. Minnesota Clay is not a film about ability, but disability—as the hero lives in stoic fear of his deteriorating eyesight and its broader consequences.

Minnesota Clay might have crumbled under the weight of its own brooding aspect, if not for a few moments that seem to have been deliberately included to inject some mild humor. Quite a few of Corbucci's later Westerns incorporated touches of broad, slapstick humor, and a little of this can be seen in the character of Andy, played by Alberto Cevenini—La strada per Fort Alamo's "Kirk Bert." Andy (who resembles Bob Dylan in Sam Peckinpah's Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid, 1973) is a young man of good heart and wholesome intentions, but he is initially portrayed as something very close to an imbecile; he leaps, fully clothed, into a water trough to illustrate how impressed he is by Clay's prowess with a six-shooter, and is so infatuated with Nancy that he trips over his own two feet in front of her, then yelps out to her uncle, "Whaddya know? I fell for her!"—yet he proves himself a hero, running defenseless through the night to summon the cavalry, as Bud Mannerly did in La strada per Fort Alamo. Another comic touch occurs with Clay's first entrance into the saloon at Mesa Encantada, where he sidles up to the bar and—like Sid Caesar in a Your Show of Shows skit—orders a glass of milk. (Mitchell definitely says "milk" onscreen, but the Italian dubbers didn't get the joke and so looped Clay's order as "acqua" instead.) All of the film's saloon interiors and exteriors were shot in Rome at Elios Studios, so Bava would have been behind the camera for this scene, and it is a joke he would "milk" again in Ringo del Nebraska/Savage Gringo (1966), which he co-directed with Antonio Román.

Bava's contributions to the film's cinematography are most apparent in a night scene outside the saloon, where Andy is shown being beaten by Fox's right hand man, Scratchy, for "not paying up." Inside, Fox is putting the squeeze on some local merchants for a preposterously high, weekly "protection" fee, and on the sound of a connecting punch, the scene cuts outside to a low-angle shot of Andy falling backward into the dust directly in front of the lens. In terms of lighting, camera position, and the crisp alacrity of the action within the composition, the shot is almost identical to a shot from the bank robbery scene of La strada per Fort Alamo. The scene—which ends with Fox reading a note alerting him to Ortiz' coming raid on the Mullighan ranch and Andy scrambling away to tell Clay—is also revealing in its shadow-rich, expressionistic lighting and inventive use of color gels, particularly the radiant honey-colored light haloing the two lanterns hanging on either side of the saloon doors.

Another saloon shakedown scene follows fifteen minutes farther on, as Fox informs the businessmen of Mesa Encantada of his $100,000 demand, followed by his upstairs meeting with Estella, where he rejects her invitation to "take" her, reasoning that "One day you'll run into a young chap smarter and more interesting than old Fox, and Ortiz and I will come to the same end." The lighting of this scene, calling for a mood of complicity, foreshadows the look of a similarly themed scene between Fabienne Dalí and Max Lawrence (Luciano Catenacci) in Bava's 1966 film Operazione paura/Kill, Baby . . . Kill!

But it is during the final showdown between the nearly blind Clay and Fox and his gunmen that Bava's presence is most richly felt. Here, the night streets are a wilderness of color and shadow, buckshot with random splashes of amber, red, and green; the silhouette of a wagon wheel looms on a brick wall like a giant spider web; Clay is seen reloading his gun in the foreground of a deep focus shot, visible to us but not to Scratchy, who stands only a few steps away from him, blinded by the night; and then we cut back inside as guns are heard blasting without, Fox looking up from his ongoing game of Solitaire to see Scratchy walking zombie-like across the floor, sidling up to the bar, raising a shotglass to his lips and falling down dead—a scene that recalls another that Bava would stage in his next feature, Terrore nello spazio/Planet of the Vampires, as the captain of a spaceship spies on a fellow crew member walking across the room with a suspicious, corpse-like gait. The occasional subjective shots that bend and blur the marauding shapes perceived by Clay anticipate the distorted reflections of faces on metal walls as also seen in Terrore nello spazio.

Later, when Clay hides in a darkened storage shed from the stalking Fox, everything about this cat-and-mouse game recalls the mise-en-scène of the antiques store sequence from Sei donne per l'assassino, with the stakes of life and death played against a backdrop of material antiquities (bottles, rope, wagon wheels, etc.), while the quality of the frost on the windows anticipates atmospheric touches that would receive their definitive statement in Operazione paura.

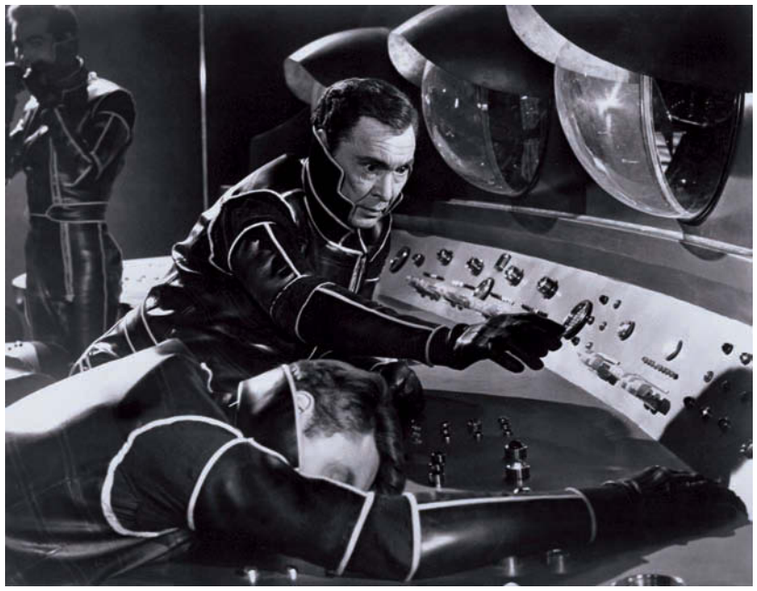
Even more fascinating, from a Bavian perspective, are those aspects of Minnesota Clay which echo themes, as well as visual reinforcements, remembered from earlier Bava films. The most significant of these are Mesa Encantada's deterioration from a safe community into a den of lawlessness (the English dub actually nicknames it "Terror Town"), and the resemblance of Nancy to Elizabeth (revealing her as Clay's daughter), which is further emphasized by the separate interlocking pieces of the lockets carried by Clay and Nancy, which echo the regal birthmarks shared by Erik and Iron in Gli invasori. Each of these additions to the script is made in the context of short, minor, detached shots or scenes that could easily have been added by Bava after the bulk of the film had been shot, enriching its tapestry immeasurably without contradicting or otherwise disturbing any of Corbucci's original intentions. The reference to "Terror Town" is spoken offscreen by Andy; without his words, the scene simply posits him and Clay as witnesses to a routine shoot-'em-up, but with his words providing a running commentary, the scene becomes a compact but affecting document of a once-great town's downfall into violence and vice. Clay's visit to Elizabeth's grave immediately precedes his arrival in town, yet when he first comes face-to-face with Nancy, after halting her runaway carriage, there is nothing in his expression to underscore her supposed resemblance to Elizabeth; that shot comes earlier, back in town, in another fleeting insert that could easily have been shot days or weeks after the surrounding footage. (It is also a shot that makes instinctive, rather than logical, sense, because a man with Clay's deteriorated eyesight would not be able to recognize Nancy from such a distance.) With a minimum of footage, this material brings a wealth of backstory to Minnesota Clay, giving it an emotional resonance it would not otherwise have.

Minnesota Clay was one of the first Italian Westerns released in Rome after the surprise success of Per un pugno di dollari, and it reaped the benefits of that distinction, earning a respectable 400 million lire [$249.000] in its initial playdates—substantially less than Leone's 3 billion lire boxoffice take, but more than twice as much as Bava's own La strada per Fort Alamo. It was subsequently sold to Spain and Germany, where Westerns were already big, but sales to English-speaking territories were not immediately forthcoming, despite the fact that nearly the entire cast had spoken their lines in English.

The film was dubbed into English in Rome, with Cameron Mitchell dubbing not only his own performance, but those of Georges Rivière (Southern accent) and Antonio Casas (New England accent), as well. There is probably no way of confirming it, but the actor who dubbed the performance of Fernando Sancho sounds remarkably like Anthony Quinn, who incidentally was in Italy at the time making Marco the Magnificent (1965). The rest of the dubbing is fairly atrocious, with Diana Martín's performance suffering particularly as a result.

Minnesota Clay was eventually acquired for American and British release in 1966 and 1967, respectively, after the first two "Dollars" films had finally shown their mettle in the marketplace. In America, it was acquired by Harlequin International Pictures, a fledgling distribution outfit owned by Tommy Noonan, a bespectacled light comedian best remembered for appearing with Jayne Mansfield in her controversial "nudie cutie" Promises! Promises! (1963), which he also produced. After distributing only a few films, Noonan—who took a presentational credit on the US release of Minnesota Clay—succumbed to brain cancer in April 1968, at the age of 45.

After Noonan's death, Minnesota Clay effectively disappeared in the United States after a few local television playdates, becoming one of the hardest-to-see Italian Westerns. In 2002, it became available on Japanese DVD, as part of Imagica's "Macaroni Western Library," in an attractive widescreen presentation that included a choice of Italian or English soundtrack, as well as the Italian coda sequence, never before seen outside of Italy. Though the style of this coda is rather straightforward, the final shot of Clay riding away, with his shot-through spectacles at rest on the ground, is palpably the work of Bava in its ironic message and clever use of foregrounded information.



TERRORE NELLO SPAZIO

Planet of the Vampires

MARIO BAVA had been responsible for the first serious Italian science fiction film, La morte viene dallo spazio, in 1958, but that initial work was too earthbound and documentary-like to excite audiences or successfully establish a new Italian genre of filmmaking. Overlooking an intermediary science fiction comedy (Totò nella luna, 1958), Italy's next attempt at fantascienza—Antonio Margheriti's color space opera Space-Men/Assignment Outer Space (1960), made in the semi-realistic manner of George Pal's Destination Moon (1950)—proved far less successful, earning only 41 million lire [$26,000], one-fourth the earnings of Bava's ground-breaker.

CAPT. MARK MARKARY (Barry Sullivan) is trapped in a derelict spacecraft occupied by the remains of an extinct alien race in TERRORE NELLO SPAZIO.

MARK tries to regain control of the Argos when it is caught in the powerful gravity field of an unknown planet.

Regardless of his film's commercial disappointment, Margheriti refused to abandon the genre and was tenacious in his efforts to corner the Italian science fiction market. He went on to make Il pianeta degli uomini spenti/Battle of the Worlds (1961) starring Claude Rains; in hindsight a well-made and occasionally poetic film, it was largely regarded at the time as a sad waste of Rains, who made only a few more films (including Lawrence of Arabia and The Greatest Story Ever Told) before his death in 1967. In 1965, Margheriti directed an entire quartet of science fiction movies: I criminali della galassia/Wild, Wild Planet, I diafanoidi vengono da Marte/War of the Planets, Il pianeta errante/Planet on the Prowl, and La morte viene dal pianeta Aytin/Snow Devils. Filmed for Italian television, where they were shown in black-and-white, all four of these colorful films won the approval of an international theatrical release through Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. These pulpy, imaginative adventures anticipated Star Trek by chronicling the serial adventures of the crew of the starship "Gamma I." Although their campy qualities have helped them to acquire a cult following in recent years, Margheriti's Gamma I films were not enthusiastically received at the time of their original release.

It was Mario Bava's next feature, Terrore nello spazio, that put Italian science fiction cinema on the map. Though not greeted with much enthusiasm in its homeland, it became a major export success, particularly in United States where it was released by American International Pictures as Planet of the Vampires on a double-bill with Daniel Haller's H. P. Lovecraft adaptation, Die, Monster, Die! (based on "The Colour Out of Space"). Lovecraft's original title would have ideal for Bava's film—a Technicolor phantasmagoria of color and shadow that hinted at the potential horrors that might lurk in the black void of space, and fretted over the vulnerable solitude of those pioneers venturing into it. It brilliantly reinvented the other worlds available to science fiction as a new kind of haunted house for the generation raised on televised lift-offs from Cape Canaveral—one as vast as the universe itself.

Thanks to AIP's involvement in the picture, it received an unusual amount of publicity during all stages of production. Around the same time, Italian producers—long resistant to science fiction—began to fund a number of other Italian science fiction films, the most famous example being Elio Petri's La decima vittima/The 10th Victim (1965)—a wild adaptation of Robert Sheckley's sci-fi short story "The Seventh Victim," starring Marcello Mastroianni and Ursula Andress.[1] However, the most lasting legacy of Terrore nello spazio has been its influence on some of the most important science fiction blockbusters of our time, notably Ridley Scott's Alien (1979), which was greeted by Cinefantastique magazine at the time of its release as a rip-off fusion of Bava's film and Edward L. Cahn's It! The Terror From Beyond Space (1958). Alien itself became one of the most widely imitated of science fiction films, and filtered through it—and experienced more directly, via its recent release on DVD—the ideas put forth by Terrore nello spazio continue to influence filmmakers and inspire the genre today, as witnessed by such films as David Twohy's Pitch Black (2000) and Brian De Palma's Mission to Mars (2001).

Synopsis

Two spaceships—the Argos and the Galliot—have been sent to investigate a mysterious pulse signal which has been emanating from the uninhabited planet Aura for the past two years. The two ships communicate, and Capt. Salas of the Galliot offers to land first; Capt. Mark Markary of the Argos agrees. Once the Galliot lands below the thick fog of Aura, the insistent signal comes to a complete stop and all communication from the Galliot ceases.

Terrore nello spazio

"Terror in Space"
Filmed at Cinecittà
22 April – June 1965
First released: September 15, 1965
Technicolor, 1.66:1 and 1.85:1(spfx only), 88 minutes

Production: Italian International (Rome), American International Pictures (US), Castilla Cooperativa Cinematográfica (Madrid). Producer: Fulvio Lucisano. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant directors: Serena Canevari, Manuel San Roman. Assistant to the director: Lamberto Bava. Screenplay: Ib Melchior, Alberto Bevilacqua, Callisto Cosulich, Antonio Román, Mario Bava, Rafael J. Salvia. Based on the story "Una notte di 21 ore" ("One Night of 21 Hours") by Renato Pestriniero. Director of photography: Antonio Rinaldi. Camera operator: Saverio Diamanti. Assistant operator: Giorgio Aureli. Art direction: Giorgio Giovannini. Special effects: Mario Bava (uncredited). Special models: Carlo Rambaldi (uncredited). Technical advisor: Eugenio Bava (uncredited). Electronic effects: Paolo Ketoff. Wardrobe: Gabriele Mayer. Makeup: Amato Garbini, Giancarlo del Brocco. Hairdresser: Gabriella Borelli. Shoes: Pompei. Weapons: Esplovit—G. Stacchini. Production supervisor: Giancarlo Sambucini. Production secretaries: Lucio Romeo CSC, Rosalba Scavia. Editors: Antonio Gimeno, Romana Fortini. Music: Gino Marinuzzi Jr., Antonio Perez Olca (Spanish version only). Sound: Mario Ronchetti. Boom operator: Eugenio Fiore. Distributor: Sidis.

Barry Sullivan (Capt. Mark Markary), Norma Bengell (Sonya), Angel Aranda (Wess), Evi Marandi (Tiona), Fernando Villeni (Dr. Karan), Massimo Righi (Capt. Salas), Ivan Rassimov (Carter), Rico Boido (Keir), Mario Morales (Eldon), Stelio Candelli (Brad), Kirk Bert [Alberto Cevenini], CSC (Toby), Franco Andrei, Giuseppe Mattei (Brent, uncredited).

Additional US credits: Screenplay: Ib Melchior and Louis M. Heyward. Associate producer: Salvatore Billitteri. Sound recording: Titra Sound Corporation, New York. Color prints by Pathé. Voice artists: Barry Sullivan (Capt. Mark Markary), Peter Fernandez (Wess). Music: Kendall Schmidt (Thorn-EMI Video and Orion Home Video versions only).

Canada: Planet of the Vampires, Astral Films, 1967
France: La Planète des Vampires, 3/29/95, TV premiere
Germany: Planet der Vampire, Mercator Film Verleih (35 mm), 1/17/69, 86m, Atlas (16 mm); Schrecken im Weltall, "Terror in Space," TV
Mexico: El Planeta de los Vampiros, Paramount Pictures, 1967
Spain: Terror en el Espacio, "Terror in Outer Space," C.B. Films, 4/10/66, 88m. Reissue: Nou Films, S.A, 1978
UK: Planet of the Vampires, Anglo-Amalgamated via Warner Pathé Ltd., 4/68, 86m 28s, Certificate "X," passed with no cuts
US: Planet of the Vampires, American International Pictures, 10/27/65, "Colorscope" [Pathé Color], 87m. AIP-TV: The Demon Planet

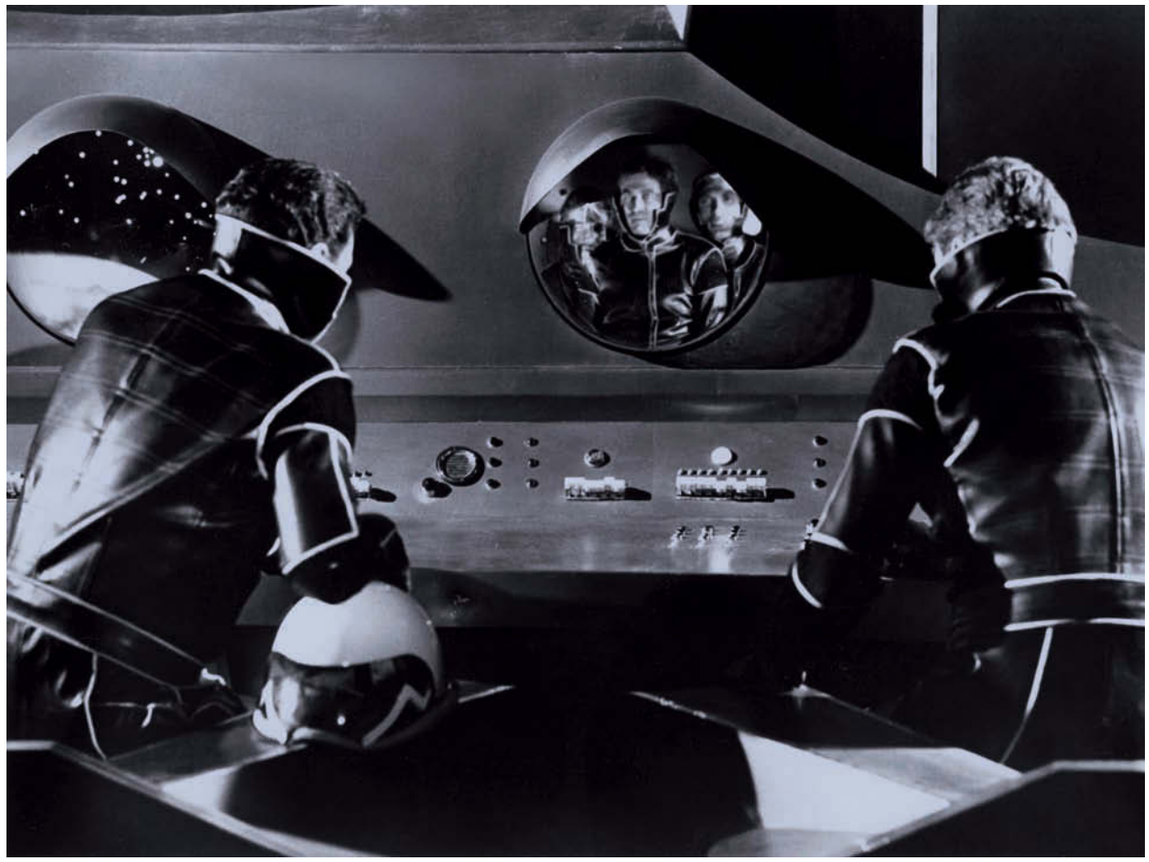
Mark (whose brother Toby is aboard the Galliot on his first space mission) decides to land the Argos as well, but the craft's natural descent is suddenly and powerfully overridden by an immense gravitational force, far stronger than Aura's natural pull. Mark manages to save the Argos and effect a safe landing, but as soon as the smoke clears, he is physically attacked by fellow crew members Sonya and Brent, who have been possessed of some violent controlling force after being knocked unconscious by the hard landing. Panicking, the ship's doctor, Dr. Karen, flees the Argos without a helmet and discovers the Auran atmosphere to be quite breathable. He is calmed by Mark and Wess, the second-in-command, and the three of them marvel at the eerie landscape of Aura, a frontier of strange luminescent rocks and arabesques of fog. Once everyone is back in their right mind, Mark calls for an exploratory patrol to locate the Galliot.



The Galliot is soon found. Lying on the ground outside the ship are two officers who have literally fought to the death, their bloody faces beaten to pulp, their bodies still locked in combat. Looking through a bulkhead window into the control room, Mark and his crew see their Galliot counterparts arrayed on the floor, dead and disfigured. Inside the ship, Wess estimates that the ship's meteor rejector is damaged beyond repair. The Galliot will never fly again—nor will its crew. With the exception of Capt. Salas and his second-in-command, Keir, the bodies of the Galliot crew are all accounted-for and promptly buried, placed under headstones improvised from the twisted wreckage of their ship.

The stress of the forced landing has damaged the Argos, which must remain stranded on Aura until repairs are effected—if they can be effected. After ordering his crew to get some much-needed sleep, Markary begins to record a confession of his own fears into the ship's log, but he is interrupted by the spectacle of Wess, creeping into his quarters and crossing the room with a bizarre, halting, unbalanced gait. Mark follows him to the control room, where he begins to sabotage the Argos' meteor rejector. When Mark interferes, Wess snaps out of it—he claims he knew what he was doing, but was powerless to stop himself. Intuiting that everyone aboard may be susceptible to possession when they lose consciousness, Mark orders that no one should sleep without being watched over by someone else.

As the night passes, the planet's ubiquitous fog begins to move mysteriously, as if possessed by a will of its own. Then, unbeknownst to anyone, the improvised graves of the Galliot crew open from within, their dead bodies rising and tearing themselves free of their polythene shrouds. Meanwhile, Carter and Burt are standing on guard outside the Argos when Carter notices out of the corner of his eye a series of flashing colored lights, visible only when viewed indirectly, as if originating from another dimension. He reports his finding to Mark, who takes the report quite seriously. Burt is suddenly nowhere nearby, and Mark and Carter follow his cries to find him near death, one side of his face horribly disfigured. When Mark asks him who did this, Burt replies with his dying words, "Capt. Salas"—the captain of the Galliot!

In search of tangible answers, Mark, Sonya, and Carter venture out into the Auran landscape, where Sonya spies something shining in the distance. Mark sees it, too. ("Finally! There's something that doesn't disappear when I look straight at it!") They trace the glimmer to the wreckage of an ancient spacecraft, its hull scarred and pitted by the centuries, where the enormous skeleton of an alien pilot lay half-buried in the ground. With Carter left to stand guard outside, Mark and Sonya enter the spacecraft, where they are dazzled by room after room of incomprehensible alien technology. As they enter another area, the portal slams shut behind them and they find themselves trapped in a chamber where second gigantic alien skeleton sits at a large control station, as though in a position of authority. After literally shocking themselves with a small glowing orb that Mark speculates might be an electric torch, they trigger a recording device and the chamber is filled with the echoes of a long-dead alien language. Then, as though triggered by their bungling about, a vent in the wall begins to suck all the air out of the room. On instinct, Mark forces himself to withstand the shock of the orb and uses it to reopen the portal.

Back at the Argos, Tiona—another female officer—tends to the corpse of Burt, which awakens and escapes. The excitement over this mystery is suddenly tempered by the sighting of Capt. Salas and Keir, making their way across the desolate landscape toward the Argos! Upon their arrival, Mark

MARK communicates with the crew of the Galliot. The "televised" image was created live on-set by placing the actors behind the set front with special lighting.

1 These two films were actually somewhat contemporaneous, as La decima vittima was released in Rome in December 1965, only three months after Terrore nello spazio.

interrogates both men, who look much worse than tired and hungry. Salas explains that they were knocked unconscious by the landing and were out of commission until they regained consciousness. Mark accepts them and orders them to bed, one standing watch over the other as he sleeps. A short time later, Tiona reports to Mark that neither of the Galliot men are in their bunks. They are quickly traced to the equipment room, where they are found sabotaging the meteor rejector! In the ensuing scuffle, Salas' coat opens, revealing a mortally ravaged chest. He admits that he is not Salas, but an Auran spirit which has taken refuge in Salas' body. He explains that his disembodied race needs to flee this exhausted planet and require living bodies as hosts; they are inhabiting the dead only to communicate. Salas then proposes "sharing" the bodies of the Argos crew. When Mark replies that everyone on his crew would be willing to die to protect their own race, Salas falls dead to the ground. In the meantime, Keir has absconded with the meteor rejector and taken it back to the Galliot, where it will enable its crew of living dead to return to the crew's home planet to stage a more expansive invasion.

Mark and the others arm themselves with plutonium bombs and traverse the treacherous landscape to the Galliot. They trap much of its zombie crew behind locked bulkheads while making off with the stolen meteor rejector, but are pursued by others outside. In the battle between the living and the dead, all the Argos crew are killed and left behind except Mark, Sonya, and Wess. As the Galliot's final explosion lights up the horizon, the Argos blasts off into space.

Wess has made the necessary repairs to the ship and reinstalled the meteor rejector, but he is later awakened from his sleep by the stealthy creepings of Mark, whom he intuits is secretly possessed by an Auran and means to harm him. He takes his speculations to Sonya, who agrees to go with him and confront Mark with his suspicions. When the three of them are together in the same room, Sonya turns her gun on Wess and admits that she, too, is possessed. In order to save his planet from their invasion, Wess races to the equipment room and destroys the meteor rejector, electrocuting himself in the process.

AFTER landing on Aura, the crew of the Galliot are discovered dead—murdered by each other.

Unable now to return to their planned destination, Mark and Sonya decide to land on the nearest world—the third planet from the sun, our Earth. Malevolently surveying the "puny" skyscrapers of New York City from deep space, they chortle over the primitivism of the planet and hope its people will not put up too much resistance to their arrival, for their own sake.

Una notte di 21 ore

It is safe to assume that Bava's recent, uncharacteristic excursions into the Old West left him aching for a return to the fantastic. One of the books that Bava consulted during this period for possible material was a 1963 science fiction anthology titled Interplanet No. 3. It was in this collection, compiled from the best Italian science fiction short stories of recent years, that Bava discovered an atmospheric, impressionistic story entitled "Una notte di 21 ore" ("One Night of 21 Hours") by Renato Pestriniero.

MARK and Wess (Angel Aranda) explore the mist-laden terrain of planet Aura.

One of Italy's "first generation" science fiction writers, Pestriniero was born on July 9, 1933, in Venice. Asked to explain how he arrived at what was then an unorthodox career for an Italian, Pestriniero explains: "I have always been interested in everything concerning the sky and space. As a result, I first specialized in the aviation field and then in astronautic development, but I had a great interest also in writing. During my military service (Air Force, of course!) I wrote my first science fiction stories."

He published his first story in 1958, in the pages of Oltre il Cielo (literally "Beyond the Sky"), a tabloid-sized journal divided into two sections, devoted respectively to science fact and science fiction; it ran for 155 issues, from 1957–1970. His earliest stories were published under the pseudonym "Pi Erre"—based on the Italian pronunciation of his initials when reversed—in order to keep his writing hobby separate from his professional career in the Venetian branch of an international import/export firm. "Science fiction was my hobby," he admits, "but a very important one. All of my free time was devoted to writing science fiction."

Pestriniero describes his personal struggle, and the overview of his work as a science fiction novelist: "You probably don't know how hard it was for an Italian SF writer to be published [in those days]. As soon as American science fiction began to reach Italy, the main publishers considered the material coming from the States as the only acceptable kind, and they refused any story or novel written by Italians, chiefly because our works reflected our classical roots; the humanistic side was more present than the technological gadgets found in space operas. In my opinion, it was more interesting to speak about the psychological effects on man, as a result of his impact with technology and the unknown, instead of wars against green Martians or other fantastic alien beings. This point of view represents the largest part of my SF production. I'm more and more convinced that science fiction, particularly social science fiction, is the best way to investigate and reflect any moral, ethical, religious, political, and psychological situation of the common man, today and tomorrow—his difficulties in facing and overcoming the gaps between his knowledge, his normal way of life, and the negative sides of the technological fallout."

THE COVER of the Italian science magazine in which Renato Pestriniero's source story first appeared, and the opening page of that story.

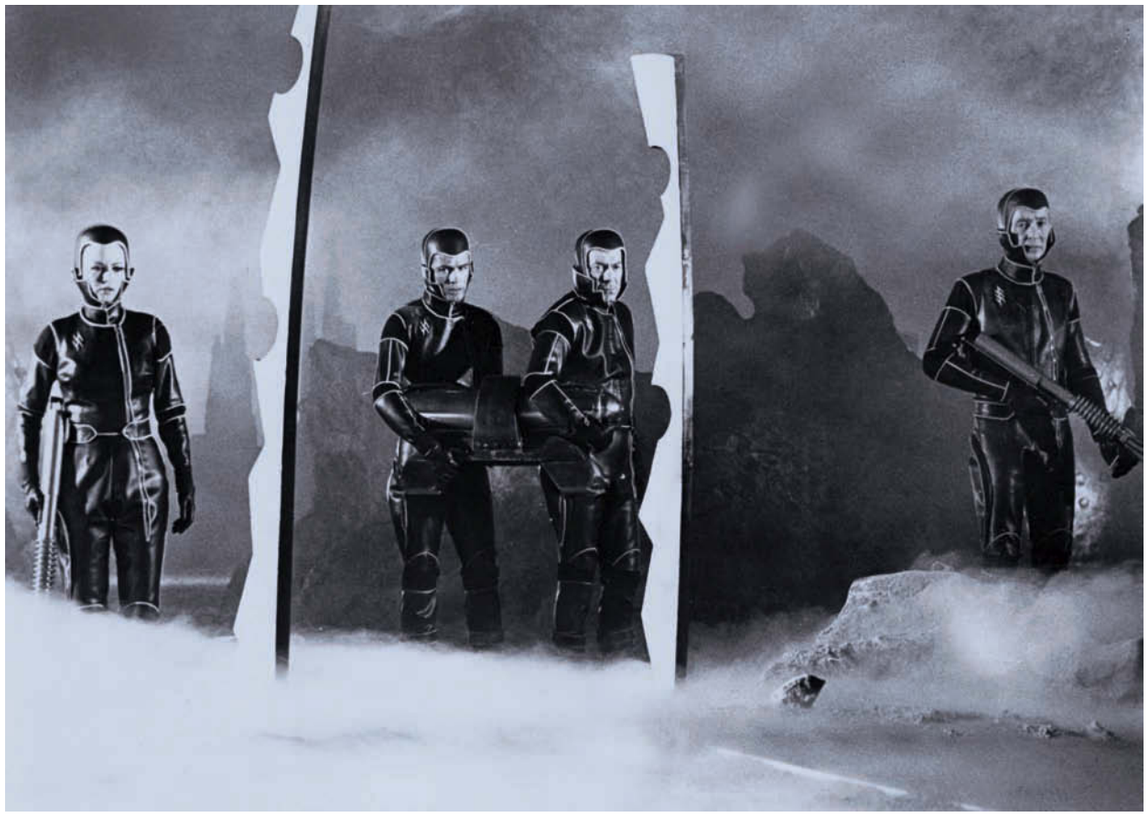
Once Pestriniero felt confident that his stories were being well-received, he began publishing under his own name. In his 40-plus year career, he has written several novels, all in the fantascienza genre—including Quanti quadri ("Many Pictures," 1972), Il villaggio incantato ("The Bewitched Village," 1982, co-written with American author A. E. van Vogt), Le torri del Eden ("The Tower of Eden," 1983), and Una voce dal futuro ("A Voice From the Future," 1996)—and over 150 short stories, which have been collected and anthologized in many different languages. He has also published his own genre magazine, Dimensione cosmica. He is married and has one daughter, and continues to live in his birthplace of Venice.



"Una notte di 21 ore" was originally published in the June 1–15, 1960 edition of Oltre il Cielo. It tells the story of the crew of the starship Vega, which lands on the surface of a gray, barren planet with three moons, following the crash of its companion ship, the Orion, on its surface. One of the Vega crewmen, Dudley Hustin, loses his brother Peter in the crash, along with four others. The Vega's captain, Pat Wheaver, supervises the salvaging of materials from the wreckage and notices among his crew "the nervous, furtive glances toward the alien sky." In a passage that was certain to captivate Bava's imagination, Pat ponders their emotions: "Millions of years have passed since Man was born, and with his capacity and ingenuity he has dominated all of the known universe. But leave Man alone in an abandoned house, alone and at night, and he will find himself completely vulnerable to the assaults of a thousand imagined enemies: incubi, the fear of the unknown . . . Every few minutes the men would raise their eyes toward the reddish spheres above them, lower them to the grey sands surrounding, and listen deep into the immutable silence of the planet. Once again, they were all locked in an abandoned house, alone and in the dark, surrounded by the unknown."

The crew of the Orion are extracted—in whole or in part—from the wreckage and grimly buried in the alien soil, with burned and twisted fragments of the ship serving as grave markers. Pat Wheaver and his men are concerned about their own safety because no single ship has returned to Earth from such a distance with their crew intact, and only one has made it back at all. Pat determines to take as much usable material from the Orion as possible and leave the planet the next morning. First, the crew must endure an alien night lasting twenty-one Earth hours, so Pat assigns a night watch to be shared by four crewmen: Dudley Hustin, Lorry Anderson, Cliff Donovan, and finally, Eb Doyle. The men initially rebel, complaining that the environment is too empty and monotonous to contain any dangers, and also arguing that it is very unlikely they will survive the return flight, but Pat stands firm and insists that they collectively live out their patrol according to the rule book.

During Dudley's watch, after the descent of the first moon, the alien environment begins to thicken with fog. Plagued by mounting fears of the unknown, Dudley takes a few tentative steps into the fog and hears the sound of shifting sand . . . Aboard the Vega, Pat Wheaver cannot sleep. Hearing a noise in the corridor, he sees Lorry Anderson, apparently sleepwalking toward the navigation room. He follows at a distance and sees Lorry moving stiltedly toward the ship's controls, like a puppet being manipulated by an outside force, his face "showing signs of a desperate internal struggle, only to change unexpectedly to a serene expression of happiness." Pat decides to wake him, but is startled by the sudden arrival of Eb Doyle, also sleep-walking. To Pat's astonishment, Eb opens a toolbox, removes a heavy wrench, and uses it to pummel the ship's radio apparatus. Pat screams to awaken both men, neither of whom once roused have any idea of their recent actions. Unable to absorb the truth of the damage he has caused, Eb faints.

When Lorry and Cliff trade shifts during the night watch, only two more hours of night remain. The two men sit together, talking, and ponder what has transpired aboard the Vega, and whether the absence of a sun in this alien sky is responsible for accelerating the crew's feelings of fear and dread. As they talk, the sky grows redder.

Inside the ship, Pat prepares to get some sleep when he is approached by Dudley, who explains that he heard strange noises and saw shadows during his turn on watch. "I couldn't see any details because of the fog," he says of the shadows, "but they seemed to be humanoid shapes. I saw them twice; they were approaching my watch station. I called out to them, but no answer came. I just heard a sort of laugh, as though someone or something was chuckling out of contentment." Dudley explains that he would have kept the whole thing to himself, written it off as an hallucination, if not for the earlier incident on board the Vega. As Pat ruminates on the story, Dudley confesses one more, withheld detail. One of the shadows resembled his dead brother, Peter.

AFTER the Galliot dead have been buried by the crew of the Argos, they claw their way free of their shrouds, inhabited by the disembodied spirits of ancient Aurans.

At this, Cliff's voice bursts through the ship's speakers from his watch station—it sounds like Cliff, but also not like Cliff. He is in hysterics, stammering about how he and Lorry were besieged by phantoms, ghosts, and spirits in the likeness of the Orion crew. "Don't you understand, Pat?" he cries. "All of our friends were there in front of us, all of them dead, just as we pulled them out of the wreckage! Vasco Ramirez had only half of his head, and his body was torn to pieces . . . Peter missing an arm . . . They were all covered in blood . . ." Pat inquires as to Lorry's whereabouts and Cliff confesses that he fled the scene in fear, leaving his partner behind "with an unimaginable expression on his face."

In search of answers, or at least confirmation, Pat and Eb race to the burial site where they laid five of the Orion crew to rest. To their horror, the plots are indeed empty, and they are startled by sheets of free-floating plastic, the shrouds peeled off by the reanimated dead.

Pat and Eb return to the Vega and await word from Cliff and Dudley, but none comes. Instead, through one of the ship's windows, they watch in horror as the brightening, reddening fogscape is illuminated to reveal all the missing crew of the Vega and the Orion—all "holding each other's hands and dancing, shouting with merriment; all as happy as children playing Hide and Seek." Dudley is with them, a bullet wound in the center of his forehead. Cliff and Lorry also appear to have been mortally wounded. Pat overcomes his terror long enough to explain his theory, that something on this planet that "acts on the human psyche and removes the inhibitory Ego, letting the Id rise to full control of the mind," even when the body has been incapacitated—in sleep, or even in death. "After death," he supposes, "this mysterious force finds a free field to recall the Monsters of the Id to the surface. I don't think our friends will ever die completely."

Unable to cope with the scene any longer, both Pat and Eb cradle their heads in their hands and succumb to sleep. Pat awakens later to find Eb missing and much of the Vega's interior wrecked, as though torn apart by some childlike, exuberant display of glee. "Eb, too," he realizes; "now I am the last."

Pat takes a gun from the ship's armory and goes outside, entering into the thick, red fog. He begins to see the dancing shadows of the dead through the haze, and the nearer he comes, they slow to a receptive halt.

"Wait, friends," the captain says. "I'll be with you in a minute."

A shot echoes across the alien desert. Joyous shouts sound from the fog, and their shadows begin to dance, like those of children, once again around the fallen body of Pat Wheaver. Another shadow joins their merry procession as the light of a white sun peeks over the edge of the horizon.

With its descriptions of a space crew being overtaken by a controlling alien presence, "Una notte di 21 ore" would appear to be influenced by John W. Campbell's novel Who Goes There? (the basis of Howard Hawks' 1951 production The Thing From Another World)—and likewise, by MGM's classic film Forbidden Planet (1956) in its evocation of a space patrol that falls prey to an invisible menace related to the subconscious Id. Yet Renato Pestriniero insists: "I did not base my story on other works. I have read the titles you've mentioned, but only successively." He also points out that his psychological approach to science fiction predated by two years J. G. Ballard's groundbreaking 1962 essay "Which Way to Inner Space?" which proposed a more humanistic and psychological approach to the genre.

He explains his motivations in writing the story: "I've always been attracted to human nature and, above all, what happens when a man encounters the perturbante, the unheimliche, which represents—according to Sigmund Freud—all that cannot be revealed. I imagined a group of highly specialized men landing on an unidentified, foggy planet where a mysterious and invisible power drew out their true, original nature, but only after they succeeded in freeing themselves of their material life." He argues against any interpretation that a childlike Evil triumphs in his story. "I didn't represent evil when the crew people, after their material deaths, are dancing like children. They represent freedom from materialism and joy of spirit. And a pure joy belongs only to children, who are not yet contaminated by the world's problems. The crew find their way back to infancy."

It is easy to see why Mario Bava was so attracted to this material. First of all, in his story, Pestriniero the author puts his finger squarely on the fusion point between science fiction and horror—fear of the unknown, which could be multiplied a million-fold in the boundless void of outer space—and he frankly analogized the barren landscape of his alien planet to the darkest corners of a haunted house. Also, Pestriniero's descriptions of the planet were extremely limited and non-descript, which may have helped Bava to envision how the film could be achieved with minimal art direction. All that was needed was a fairly empty set, some sand, his battery of color gels, and a lot of fog. Everything else could be filled-in by the fears of his characters, and suggested with tricks of the camera. Lastly, the concept of Evil as mischievous and childlike also strongly appealed to Bava, who was captivated by stories like Henry James' The Turn of the Screw and its highly cinematic adaptation, The Innocents (1961, released in Italy under the generic title Suspense). This latter aspect would be de-emphasized in this project, but Bava would explore it repeatedly in subsequent features.

Bava himself acquired the film rights to the short story before securing a producer. "Both the contract and check were signed by Mario Bava," Pestriniero confirms. "The total amount, against transfer of any right, was 200,000 lire . . . about 125 US dollars today!"

Preproduction

In the early months of 1964, Bava showed the Pestriniero story to his friend Fulvio Lucisano of Italian International and proposed Il mondo dell'ombra ("The Shadow World") as a possible retitling. Lucisano was receptive to the idea; he was on the lookout for new commercial projects, having recently entered into a partnership with Castilla Cooperativa Cinematográfica, a Madrid-based company whose previous productions—El Sol en el Espejo (1962), Pacto de Silencio (1963), and Un Tiro por la Espalda (1964)—had all been directed by Antonio Román as vehicles for his wife, actress Yvonne Bastien. Lucisano was also actively courting a similar arrangement with American International Pictures, and knew that Samuel Z. Arkoff and James H. Nicholson were eager to make another horror movie with

DR. SALAS (Fernando Villeni) and Mark check the graves of the Galliot crew, confirming that they are now empty.

18+

WHAT IS AVAXHOME?

AVAXHOME-

the biggest Internet portal, providing you various content: brand new books, trending movies, fresh magazines, hot games, recent software, latest music releases.

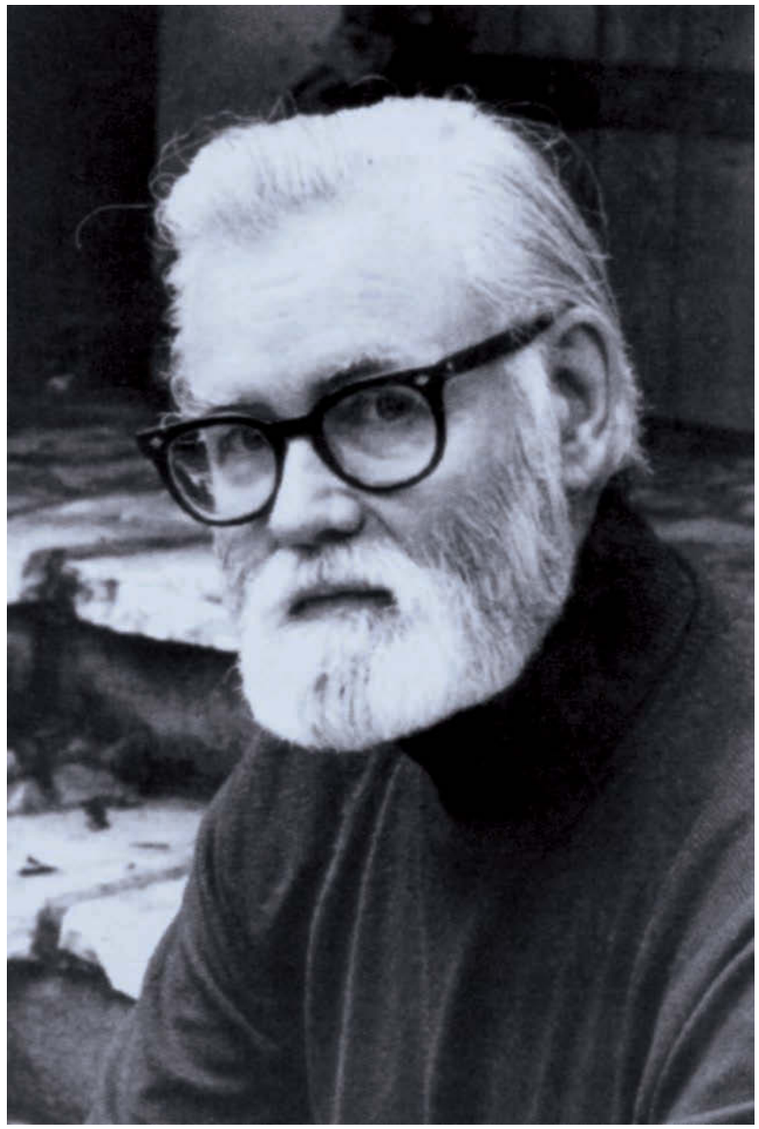
Unlimited satisfaction one low price
Cheap constant access to piping hot media
Protect your downloadings from Big brother
Safer, than torrent-trackers

18 years of seamless operation and our users' satisfaction

All languages
Brand new content
One site

AVXLIVE.ICU

AvaxHome - Your End Place



We have everything for all of your needs. Just open https://avxlive.icu

Mario Bava. Lucisano sent a copy of Pestriniero's story to Antonio Román, who hammered out a rough screenplay with the help of Rafael J. Salvia (1915–76), a screenwriter (and occasional director) best-known for writing Westerns and comedies for such accomplished Spanish filmmakers as León Klimovsky and Julio Coll. Once the script was translated into English, Lucisano sent a copy to Arkoff and Nicholson at AIP, who turned it over to Louis M. "Deke" Heyward—the head of their London office—for evaluation. The script did not translate well, to say the least, and Heyward recommended a complete rewrite.

Jim Nicholson, the creative partner, took the job to Ib J. Melchior. Born in Copenhagen in 1917, Melchior had scripted several science fiction films distributed by AIP—the American-made The Angry Red Planet (1960) and The Time Travelers (1964, which he also directed), and the Danish-made Reptilicus (1961) and Journey to the Seventh Planet (1962). He had additional experience writing science fiction and horror scripts for such television series as Tom Corbett Space Cadet, 13 Demon Street, and The Outer Limits. The son of popular opera tenor Lauritz Melchior, Ib's most recent credit at the time was the original screenplay for Robinson Crusoe on Mars (1964), an outstanding Paramount release directed by Byron Haskin.

"I had done several films for AIP and they called me one day and said that they had a story that they wanted me to turn into a screenplay," Melchior recalls. According to a May 1964 profile, Melchior "put his name on the dotted line without even knowing what the story was about."[2] He explains: "Sam and Jim and I, we had such a good working relationship that they paid me my full salary up front, before I wrote a single word. I read the first script, which was a disaster, and then I asked to read the original story. There wasn't enough there, so I had to come up with some other things."

Early on, it was reported by one industry journal that Melchior would also direct the project, but he insists that he approached his job from the beginning with the understanding that it would be a Mario Bava film. "When AUTHOR Ib J. Melchior, screenwriter of the American version of the film, PLANET OF THE VAMPIRES.

I first got involved, Sam wanted me to see what kind of director Mario Bava was, so he gave me a personal screening of his work. He showed me Black Sunday and I came away very impressed by Bava's visual sense and his command of atmosphere. So that's what I played up in my screenplay, the atmosphere, which was also present in the original story."

It was during this period of preproduction that Renato Pestriniero received a phone call from Fulvio Lucisano's offices, informing him that "Una notte di 21 ore" was about to become a movie—in fact, an international co-production. The pittance he had accepted for the screen rights did nothing to dampen his excitement. "You can imagine what this meant to me, and to Italian science fiction—it was the first science fiction movie based on an Italian science fiction story!"

Melchior annotated his copy of the story—which AIP had crudely translated for him, as it had never before appeared in English[3]—and rejected the talkier passages as well as the depiction of the dead Orion crew as impish and childlike. He renamed the characters, and the Vega and the Orion became the Argos and the Galliot in acknowledgment of the movie's Italo-Mediterranean origins. A 4-page outline became a thirty-nine-page screen treatment entitled The Haunted World. Melchior had no knowledge at the time that one of Bava's earlier films had been released in America (by Woolner) as Hercules in the Haunted World, which is presumably why AIP later rejected the moniker. They loved the treatment, however, and Melchior was told to proceed to the script stage.

In Melchior's personal scrapbook are two remarkable letters, written in response to his treatment. The first—dated June 22, 1964—is from the desk of Samuel Z. Arkoff:

Dear Ib:

Here are the comments of Mario Bava on "Haunted Planet," which he persists in calling "The Shadow World," for some reason.

As you will note, Bava's comments about your abilities are so laudatory, that I am frankly a little remiss to send it to you, lest you feel that you have no further goals to achieve and simply stop work.

Sincerely,
Samuel Z. Arkoff

Attached to this wry cover sheet is a detailed document written by Mario Bava, entitled "Comments on The Shadow-World." Before reading it, it is important to know that Melchior's treatment ended differently than the film. In it, Mark and Baia (later Sonya) escape Aura in a battered Argos, which is not strong enough to return them to their (surprise) home planet of Mars. Instead, they are forced to land on the third planet from the sun—our Earth in prehistoric times, thus becoming our Adam and Eve. Upon landing, they realize that they were not victorious, that they have been possessed by the disembodied Aurans, after all. The treatment ends with the revelation that this resulting conglomeration of two beings—one exterior, the other interior in nature—provided the foundation for the "human" components of body and soul.

Though similar correspondence no doubt exists pertaining to the production of other films made in tandem between Bava and AIP, the following is the only letter actually written by Mario Bava that has come to light. Evidently translated into imperfect English by Bava's production secretary Rosalba Scavia, it is one of the very few letters he ever wrote in English. The letter is printed here verbatim, with Melchior's permission, and the imperfections of the translation have been retained to preserve the authenticity of the document.

Great compliments to Mr. Ib Melchior. The subject is really fine, full of surprises, suspense, and situations. It is obvious that he knows what the cinema is all about. The finale where we suddenly learn that the two leads are possessed by the Ariani. Reed's death by his own hand and not through the work of Mark is excellent. The very final scene of the protagonists becoming Adam and Eve is extremely well done.

1) I would clear up the materialism of our astronauts—that is, they do not have, or have lost, their souls; and that when possessed they are happy, because being possessed by the Aurians means possessing something spiritual internally that permits life to be looked at with different eyes.

2) With the thought in mind that we want to make a "Fantasy-Science-Terror" sort of thing, I would have the dead of the Galliot buried . . . in order, later in the night, to see the ground swell out, and see the dead ones walking out one by one with their ghostly faces, while strange clouds whorl around them. I would show the wonder and the terror of those who find the empty graves.

3) I would like at some point to see the spectral faces of the dead spying on the crew.

ORIGINALLY scripted as lovers, Tiona (Evi Marandi) and Wess have a more platonic relationship in the final cut.

4) When Brad and Wes fall into the sleep to break the cords of the commands that either the empty holes of the Galliot crew is found, or that the dead crew themselves be seen. Or we see that the spectres of Nordegg and Kay are staring at Brad and Wes after which the latters go and rip the commands up. Or else, and I think maybe the best of all, have Nordegg and Kay themselves to break the commands, get discovered by Mark, and then have the battle, the flight of Kay and the crumpling to the ground of Nordegg, which as it stands now comes in the daytime outside the astronave [spaceship]. Or, Nordegg and Kay could get hold of Wes and Brad in their sleep, and go all four together to wreck the plants—thus getting the two relations (I say this because it seems that otherwise there is night in which the cadavers are on board and nothing happens).

5) I would not have any rivalry between Mark and Wes because it does not lead to any conclusion and is hard to explain script-wise.

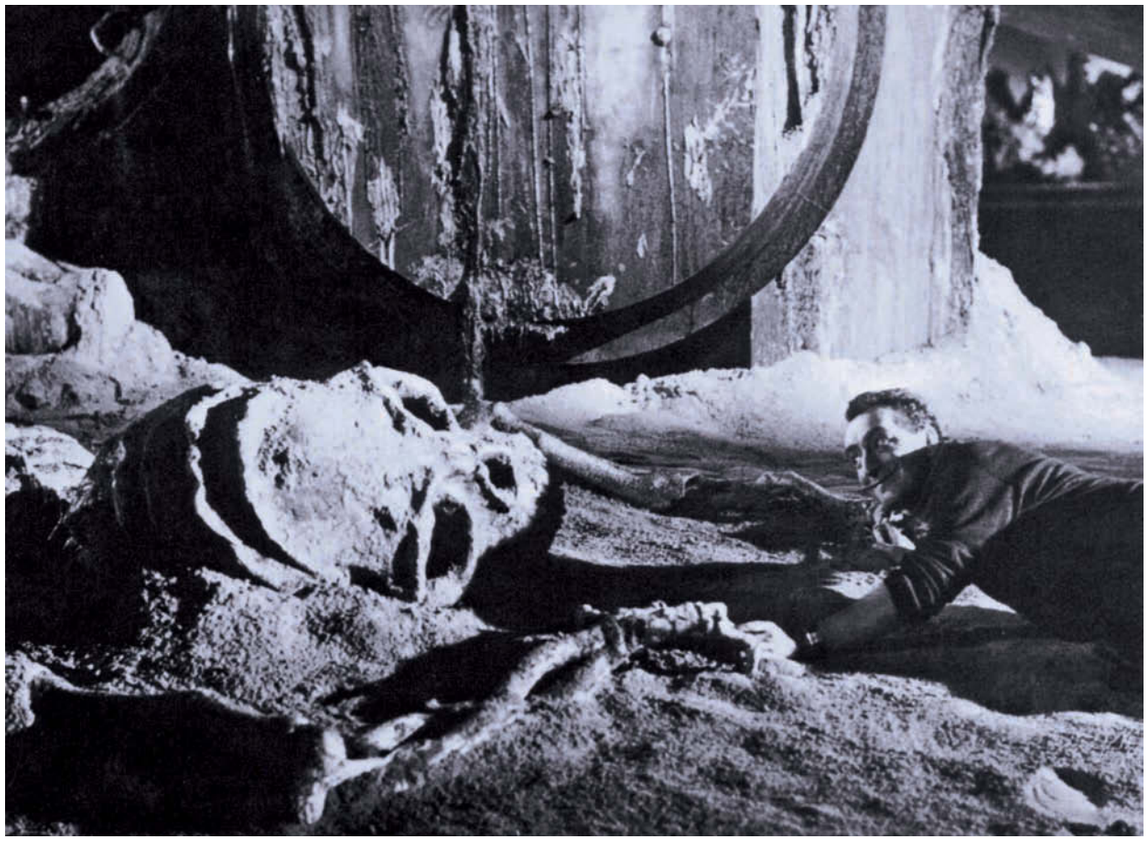
6) I don't think it's very good to have Mark and Baia kiss in the room of the ship—that is, I don't think they should clinch at that moment, it seems a bit frivolous—perhaps he should just press her to him, and then just a little kiss after the door has closed—it would be a refuge to his arms for her, and when they discover their love.

7) When Tiana says that she's sure Garr is one of the dead men she saw in the night, Mark orders the tomb opened—resulting empty. I suggest that if we have already shown the tombs opened and empty, it would be a repetition and we should have the tomb show this same Garr, or for a shock, Mark's brother or someone else.

8) If the hour-glass shaped continent is America, it seems a bit thick to have Adam and Eve there.

9) I thought I understood that the atmosphere of the planet was breathable—therefore no use for the gasmasks.

Again, vivid compliments to Mr. Melchior, and let's hurry up with this because it seems just the right time for a "Fantasy-Science-Terror" sort of idea.



Thank you very much.
Mario Bava

As the aside in Arkoff's cover letter indicates, Bava's preferred title of The Shadow World did not meet with the approval of AIP. Melchior's The Haunted World was formally announced on February 14, 1964, in the pages of the industry journal The Hollywood Reporter. When it came to AIP's attention that this title evoked the memory of one of Bava's films for another distributor, it was withdrawn and formally changed to Warlords of Planet 7 on January 7, 1965.

Melchior completed his "final draft" screenplay, titled Warlords of the Outlaw Planet, on January 18, 1965. It differs from the final production in many ways. Here, the crew of the Galliot are killed when the ship crashes on Aura—by the crash, not by each other. When the Argos lands, Capt. Mark Markary and "communications technician" Baia (later Sonya—and here, something of a romantic interest) cross the alien terrain to the wreckage via a special "land crawler" or space Jeep (which Melchior designed at no extra charge, providing a sketch inside the script). The Argos crew proceed to bury the Galliot dead and patrol the fog-laden planet. While exploring, three members of the Argos

2 Sven Rye, "Spotlight on Hollywood Scandanavians," Pacific Coast Viking, May 1964.

3 "Una notte di 21 ore" would remain unpublished in English until it appeared as "Night of the Id" in the December 1998 issue of Different Realities 4, translated by Joe Randolph. Renato Pestriniero reports that the story has been published five times in Italy, and once in Germany, the Czech Republic, and America.

MARIO BAVA strikes a humorous pose with friend on the set.

crew—including Tiana (later Tiona), another female officer—are bullied by green puffs of fog that eventually recede, leaving them covered in "an iridescent sticky green fluid," requiring their decontamination once they return to the ship. The experience leaves Tiana ultra-sensitive to the phenomena of this alien world and she begins to suffer visions of her dead compatriots—blue-skinned, smeared with gore. Also well-served by her feminine intuition, Baia happens to notice out of the corner of her eye a towering structure built by the Aurans, which is absolutely invisible when she looks at it directly. She guides Mark toward it via her wrist communicator, and after moving cautiously toward a field of apparently empty space, the captain encounters a patch of invisible resistance that forces him to move in slow motion like "the molasses movement of a nightmare." He soon emerges, and likens the experience to "moving through dry water." Baia tells him that she could see him passing through the solid object, but only peripherally—out of the corner of her eye, when her gaze was averted. Later, when they discover the wreckage of the other alien craft, they become trapped inside as the air is drained from the control room through an unreachable vent in the ceiling. After their lucky escape, they are approached by disfigured emissaries of the dead Galliot crew, who explain their possession by the disembodied Aurans. They can occupy dead bodies, but they want to take over the bodies of the living Argos crew and escape their dead planet, which is possible if the crew will only allow it. When Markary refuses, the dead suggest another option: cohabiting the bodies of the living with equal control; this would result in a new hybrid that might even prove mutually beneficial. Again, Markary refuses. The Aurans decide to take the Argos by force, initiating a siege by the living dead—not only the J'Accuse-like procession of the Galliot crew, but reanimated corpses of other alien races lured to the planet over the years by the Auran pulse signal. After a battle in which all their crew is lost, Mark and Baia blast off from Aura in the damaged Argos, and the script concludes with the aforementioned "Adam and Eve" finale.

Once it was turned in, Bava turned Melchior's draft over to I tre volti della paura screenwriter Alberto Bevilacqua and a new collaborator, Callisto Cosulich, a film journalist turned screenwriter. "I first met Bava on the set of I tre volti della paura, where I went to interview Boris Karloff," recalls Cosulich, who was working at the time as a reporter for the publication ABC. "I made friends with Bava and saw how he shot, in this peculiar way—a bit detached, very matter-of-fact, let's say, and with an almost cynical attitude. I also spoke with Mario's father, Eugenio, who was an old movie pioneer and had solved many problems for his son. Mario Bava was a cameraman and had a lot of expertise in his work, but the special effects solutions in his earliest films were often suggested by Eugenio. In this first meeting, I discovered the incredible craft of these two men and the team they had assembled."[4]

When the Melchior draft arrived, it was passed on to Bevilacqua and Cosulich for further development. "We basically read it and then ignored it, and we went on to do a different thing, which was Terrore nello spazio," Cosulich says. "Our screenplay was much trimmed down by Bava, for budgetary reasons. You know how it is when you write: we wanted rain, we wanted this, we wanted that, and then . . . but Bava was very clever: he could take a rock and persuade you that it was an entire planet." Some sources list Spanish writer–director Antonio Román as one of the screenwriters, to which Cosulich responds: "Since it was a Spanish co-production, I think a Spaniard put his hands on it a little bit, but what he did, or if he did something only for the Spanish version, I don't know. Bevilacqua and I didn't have any contact with him."

As the screenplay approached the production stage, the number of visible female crew was cut from four to two, and the male crew was also downsized, with the actions of one omitted crew member, Reed, reassigned to Wess. The character names were also fine-tuned: Baia became Sanya (the name of one of the deleted female characters), and was finally changed to Sonya; Wes (given the surname Wescant in Melchior's script) became Wess; Garr became Brent; Derry became Carter; the ship's doctor, Lannon, was renamed Dr. Linden for a short time before he finally became Dr. Karen; and finally, the undead Nordegg and Kay became Salas and Martin (later Keir).

When Sam Arkoff became aware that additional changes were being made to the screenplay that AIP had already approved, they took measures to protect their interests. Deke Heyward was sent to Rome to represent AIP on the set, performing the same functions that Salvatore Billitteri had performed on the set of I tre volti della paura.

Born in New York City in the 1920s, Heyward started out as a magazine editor and as a writer for various radio series, only to have his career interrupted by six years of Air Force duty during the second World War. After the war, Heyward became a writer for the Associated Press but was quickly wooed into the burgeoning television industry, where he spent eight years as the chief writer for The Garry Moore Show. He also wrote skits for The Ernie Kovacs Show, created the hugely successful Winky Dink (the first interactive television program) and published two popular comic novels, Grandpa and the Girls (1960) and My Son, the Doctor (1963). After working in New York City for nearly two decades, Heyward relocated to Los Angeles and worked for 20th Century-Fox and MCA before joining AIP in 1963. His first job for the company was to write a comedy script on demand, The Maid and the Martian, which became Pajama Party (1964), starring Annette Funicello and Tommy Kirk; after this, he became AIP's director of project development, while continuing to write. After adding one more script to his list of credits—Sergeant Deadhead (made in 1965)—Heyward was promoted to managing director of AIP's new London office. One of his chief responsibilities in this post, as he put it, was "to supervise everything that took place in Europe [regarding] casting. It was always important to get a balanced casting for the American market; if you left it to the Italians, they would have gotten Ciccio Ingrassia for everything!"

Heyward—who considered Mario Bava "a genius"—traced their earliest meetings to a series of social dinners where they were joined by Fulvio Lucisano. "It had nothing to do with business," he clarified. "Bava was a friend of Fulvio's, and it had to do with eating—eating and drinking Italian wines. Bava was a good eater and a good drinker and he liked to show off Italian wines. I had a good number of dinners with him and Fulvio in obscure little trattorias. He knew which ones specialized in various types of good food and he was invariably right about it. He and Fulvio . . . I don't know how close they were, but at the time I'm talking about, they were eating together a lot and they invited me along."

Asked what the topics of conversation were at these get-togethers, Heyward ventured: "Me being the type of creature I am, I would avoid [discussing] business. I remember Bava trying to give me a frame of reference and describing himself as 'The Roger Corman of Italy.' Whether or not that was a true frame of reference, I cannot tell you. We talked mostly about wines, which I like, and the knowledge of wine, which he liked to show off. We did not go to restaurants in the city, but out on the Appian Way. Bava loved that—working man's food. I enjoyed being with him, and I enjoyed making fun of Bava's slight command of English, as much as he enjoyed making fun of my slight command of Italian."

Bava had always been trim, even extremely thin in his youth, when he joked about carrying stones in his pockets so that he wouldn't be carried away by the four winds. However, photographs of Bava dating from the period of Terrore nello spazio show that he had added conspicuous weight to his frame. It wasn't just "middle-aged spread," but the kind of auspicious gain that occurs when one forsakes home-cooked meals in favor of regular dining out, or when people try to stop smoking. Both explanations may suffice in this instance. With both of his children now grown and on their own, Mario and his wife Iole were living more or less separate lives, with Bava eating most of his meals in Lucisano's company. Furthermore, Bava's mother Emma was dying of cancer, and it would fit a common enough profile if Bava had responded to this traumatic news by trying to give up cigarettes, which he had smoked for most of his adult life. Naturally, when people quit smoking, they no longer have nicotine to serve as an appetite depressant, and invariably rediscover the pleasures of food and drink.

LOUIS M. "DEKE" HEYWARD with comedy legend Buster Keaton on the set of AIP's PAJAMA PARTY (1964).

The news about Emma Bava's illness coincided with other news that brought her family great joy, one which would have given her son good reason to be celebrating with great meals and fine wines. On January 11, 1965, Mario Bava reached one of the great milestones in a man's life when his son Lamberto and daughter-in-law Fiamma presented him with his first grandchild—a granddaughter named Georgia, who instantly became one of the great loves of his life. The feeling was mutual.

"He was a great man," says Georgia Bava, today an art scholar, wife, and mother of two. "He was also the center of our family, and especially for me, he was like a second father because my own father was so young at the time."

In his 1971 interview with Ornella Volta, Bava mentioned his granddaughter (who would have been 6 years old at the time) in a revealing way, when he detailed the grotesqueries of his inner life. "All of my fantasies, hallucinations, nightmares and daydreams are horrific in nature," he confessed. "I adore my little granddaughter, but she always appears in my dreams crippled, mutilated, or with a foot missing. Would you like to hear about a persistent character who frequently appears in my nightmares? He's a violinist who serenades his sweetheart using the bared nerves of his skinned forearm as strings! I also worry, for example, that I might discover that my house in the country was formerly owned by a werewolf well-known throughout the region. My whole life is overcast by my hyperactive imagination."[5]

The examples Bava cites are at once tragic and highly romantic, and we can infer from this account that Bava's own fearful nature responded to his love for those he held dear, like his granddaughter, with perpetual worry for their safety and well-being. There is also a superstitious ethic that holds that, by imagining the worst, one may prevent it from happening; it is possible that Bava, consciously or subconsciously, accepted the burden of such fantasies because a part of him believed that—knock wood—it might help to circumvent misadventure. With this interior scenario in mind, the savage violence in his films could almost be interpreted as a perverse expression of his sympathetic feelings for his fellow man.

4 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32. All quotes of Callisto Cosulich are translated from this article.

5 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

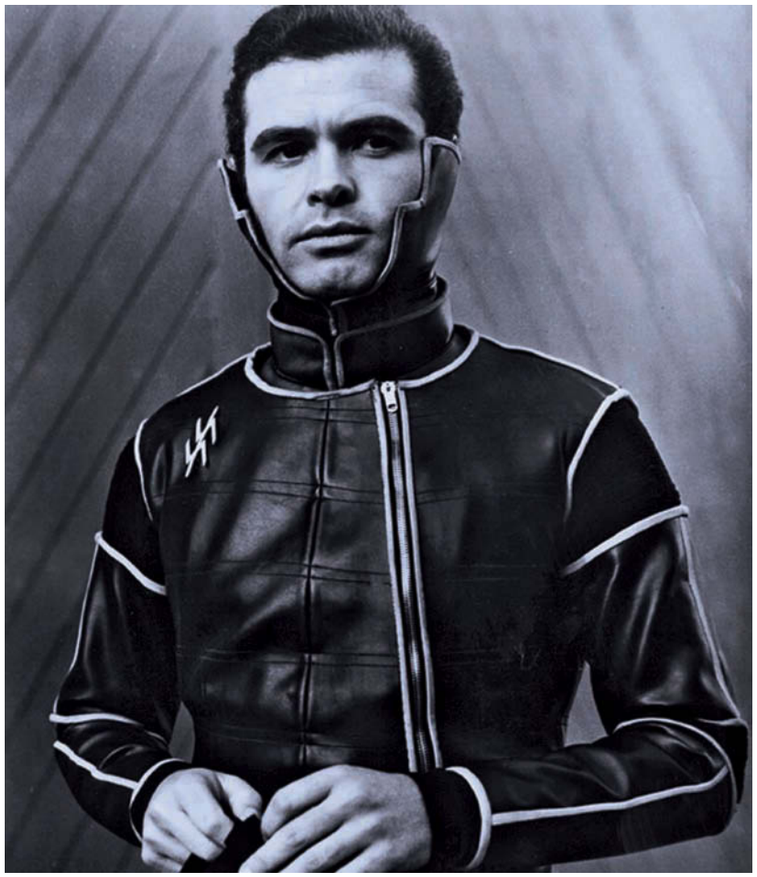
Deke Heyward remembered that one of the principal ways in which the script was changed by the Italian writers was to introduce opportunities for nudity, which was acceptable—indeed, commercially advisable—in certain continental territories.



"I would go to Fulvio Lucisano and say, 'Look, the lady is standing behind the man naked. What is the sense, what is the motivation?'" laughed Heyward. "And Fulvio would look at me sagely, rub the side of his nose and say, 'She's a-wanna have something to do with him!' Well, that I could have figured out, I think—given time! But it was not good writing. So we had to get rid of these extraneous things which appealed then to the Italian market and the Japanese market, where they wanted to see as many naked ladies as they could see at one time. I was busy taking naked ladies out and he was putting naked ladies in!" [6]

On January 25, the film's title was changed once again, to the Western-sounding The Outlaw Planet. At this time, it was also announced that the picture would begin shooting in February, with Susan Hart in the lead. Hart—born June 2, 1941, in Wenatchee, Washington—was discovered by AIP's Jim Nicholson in the supporting cast of Don Taylor's Ride the Wild Surf (1964), in which she played the Hawaiian-born love interest of Tab Hunter. Nicholson is said to have fallen in love with Hart the moment he witnessed her torrid hula dance in the film, and promptly declared his intention to find and marry her. He kept that promise, signing Hart to an exclusive AIP contract. She made her AIP debut in Pajama Party (1964, in which she reprised her hula dance, setting off a volcano), which was followed by a co-starring role in Jacques Tourneur's vaguely Poe-inspired swan song War-Gods of the Deep (1965). By the time The Outlaw Planet was announced as her third AIP picture in the trades, Susan Hart had become Mrs. James H. Nicholson. It was the producer's second marriage, and Hart's first.

On January 26, it was reported that Ib Melchior had completed the English script, now entitled The Haunted Planet. It was back to The Outlaw Planet when Barry Sullivan and Tod Windsor were announced as the film's male leads on February 22. By March, it became Warlords of the Outlaw Planet; by April, the Warlords' frontiers were expanded to infinity with the title Warlords of Outer Space. After this point, press releases no longer carried Tod Windsor's name.

Cast

Born in New York City on August 29, 1912, Patrick Barry Sullivan loved the movies. It was a passion that led him to take his first job as a movie theater usher. He soon after found the courage to audition for—and win—a few roles in New York-produced films. Encouraged by his good luck, he moved West and made his Hollywood debut in the 1943 Western, The Woman of the Town. Sullivan came to specialize in Westerns and crime pictures, but also contributed some remarkable work to Elliott Nugent's 1949 filming of The Great Gatsby (as PORTRAITS of cast members Barry Sullivan, Norma Bengell, Angel Aranda and Evi Marandi.

Tom Buchanan), Vincente Minnelli's The Bad and the Beautiful (1952), and in Sam Fuller's Forty Guns (1957). Though never a romantic lead in his prime, Sullivan began finding roles in middle-age which presented him in this new light in the early 1960s. He made his first film in Italy in 1962, Light in the Piazza, and the following year, he played a more twisted romantic lead in the interesting Spanish thriller Pyro (1963), opposite Martha Hyer. Pyro was produced by Ib Melchior's former colleague, Sidney Pink, and it was distributed in the US by American International—which may explain why he came to be top-billed in Terrore nello spazio.

Despite his successful American career and previous work on the continent, neither Mario Bava nor Fulvio Lucisano had apparently ever heard of Barry Sullivan. Nevertheless, Sam Arkoff recommended him enthusiastically for the role of Mark Markary, and the two Italians were obliged to take Sam's word on good faith. "We were expecting somebody . . . younger," Lucisano says, gingerly. "When we got Sullivan's photo, we called Sam and said, 'Well, he doesn't look very young.' Sam said, 'Oh no, no no! He's wonderful!' So that was a big crisis at the beginning!"

Melchior's original treatment described Capt. Mark Markary as "a ruggedly handsome man in his middle thirties." Sullivan was 53, with a receding hairline, deeply lined skin, and features that were frankly more cold-blooded than romantic. Melchior's screenplay substituted Mark's age with that all-purpose, flattering word "mature." Following his work in Terrore nello spazio, Sullivan would make many other films, including the important Westerns Tell Them Willie Boy Is Here (1969) and Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid (1973), but the majority were made for television. He died of respiratory failure on June 6, 1994, in Sherman Oaks, California.

"Planet of the Vampires—that's a great one!" Sullivan remembered in a 1975 interview with Bill Kelley. "No, really—it is, although there was certainly no indication when I accepted it that it would turn out that way. I was under contract to AIP to do three pictures: Pyro, Planet of the Vampires and . . . I don't think we ever made the third one; I can't remember what happened. I thought the script for Planet of the Vampires was an abomination, very confusing and heavy with dialogue that was difficult to bring any emotion to, and I couldn't imagine how they were going to do the intricate special effects on our schedule and our budget, which was—frankly—no budget. But that wasn't really my department and science fiction isn't my thing anyway. I just thought, 'Well, I've got the lead and it's a feature, so I'll just do what I can and hope for the best.

"I was introduced to Mario Bava and found him to be a cuddly yet somewhat inscrutable little man, very polite and deferential, but not very communicative in terms of acting. There was a language barrier—that was part of it; he spoke almost no English—but I also felt that the actors were, in a way, almost like props to him, who had to stand precisely in a certain place so that he could arrange the cameras for the special effects. Well, that's not the greatest environment for any actor to find himself in. But, at the same time, I knew the movie was very reliant on special effects, and I also noticed that many members of the crew, who had worked with Bava on earlier films, were devoted to him and not only had total faith in him, but were overjoyed to be working with him. That intrigued and impressed me—that kind of dedication and affection is rare anywhere in this business—so I thought, 'He must know what he's doing. This might be interesting.'"

6 Louis M. Heyward interview in Tom Weaver, Science Fiction Stars and Horror Heroes (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 1991), 165.

The first actress to be announced in the trades as Sullivan's co-star was Susan Hart, who travelled to Rome on April 15 after honeymooning with Jim Nicholson in Mexico City. Mario Bava began directing his latest feature on Stage 5 at Cinecittà one week later, on April 22, when the clapboard read Planet of Terror. According to Variety, after one week of shooting, the title was changed yet again to Terror in Space.[7]

"I was in Italy for two weeks the summer we were going to shoot that [film] at Cinecittà Studios," Hart told interviewer Tom Weaver.[8] "I felt that it was going to be a very low-budget, very yucky picture. And I remember Barry Sullivan got into a giant, violent argument with somebody, maybe Mario Bava. Why I didn't end up doing it, I can't remember, but I do remember being in Rome for a couple of weeks, meeting Mario Bava (a charming, colorful man); that the plot was explained to me in some fashion, and flying back to London! That's all I recall and I'm shocked that it ever got made, because to the best of my recollection, Barry Sullivan had some sort of major problem, either with the director or the producer."

The chronology of events shows that the film began shooting shortly after the arrival of Mr. and Mrs. Nicholson in Rome. According to Deke Heyward, their arrival also coincided with the release of a communiqué from the desk of Sam Arkoff, announcing a new company policy—something to the effect that "No members of, or relatives of, AIP will ever appear as performers in any AIP production—in the US or abroad."[9] Consequently, the production lost its lead actress while she was waiting in the wings, leaving Barry Sullivan to begin filming under extremely stressful circumstances which must have seemed to him highly unprofessional. He was the only English-speaking actor on the set, he was working from a script that was still being revised and which had no set ending, and he had no idea who his eventual co-star and love interest was going to be. The trades would not announce Hart's replacement until halfway through the production, meaning that Sullivan was undoubtedly put in the position of playing at least some of his dialogue scenes in tight close-up, opposite the script girl.

WHILE visiting the production at Cinecittà, Ib Melchior snapped this souvenir photo of Barry Sullivan and Mario Bava.

When the film was next mentioned by Variety on June 1, Susan Hart had been replaced by Brazilian starlet Norma Bengell—who spoke very little English and would play the role of Sonya phonetically. Born Norma Benguell on January 25, 1935, in Rio de Janeiro, she had entered show business as a singer and dancer, making her first Brazilian film in 1959. She won the Best Actress Award at the 1962 Cannes Film Festival for her performance in Anselmo Duarte's Brazilian film O Pagador de Promessas/ The Spoken Word, which itself won the coveted Palme d'Or as Best Picture. Riding high on the publicity she received for her award (and her nude scene in the picture), the shapely (35-23-35) Bengell relocated to Rome, where so many other sex symbols had been successfully launched. Her Italian movie career began with Roberto Mauri's Il mafioso (1962), which also starred I vampiri's Wandisa Guida. Not only was Bengell attractive and a talented actress, but in Italy her name was helpful to producers hoping to attract Spanish co-production funds. Amusingly, AIP publicity (out of its head, as usual) issued a stateside press release describing Bengell as "a successor to the late Carmen Miranda."

Today an award-winning film director in her own right, Bengell remembers that the role in Terrore nello spazio was secured by her agents at William Morris. She came to the production with absolutely no knowledge of Susan Hart's prior casting in the role of Sonya. She remembers Mario Bava as "a nice man and very funny," but she did harbor one complaint about him: "He had three or four basset hounds that were on the set every day. They hated us [actors] and peed in our black work boots all the time!"

ACTOR Federico Boido (sometimes billed as "Rick Boyd") had a striking look that inspired Bava to cast him more than once.

As Bava's letter to Ib Melchior implies, a love story was originally planned for Mark and Sonya, but when the roles were finally cast, Bava decided to drop this idea. Sullivan was more than twenty years Bengell's senior, and there was absolutely no chemistry between them. "Barry was nice," Bengell hedges, "but he was not very polite at the table where we ate our food." More than this she declines to say. According to Melchior, who paid a brief visit to the set, there was noticeable tension between the stars and, in conversation, Sullivan ungraciously referred to his co-star as "Norma Bang Well."

Cast as Wess was Angel Aranda. A Spanish actor born in Jaén on September 18, 1934, Aranda found the Italian film industry receptive to him when he made his first bid for stardom there in 1956. A number of his earlier Italian roles were played for former associates of Bava: Steno (Susanna sutta panna and Femmine tre volte, both 1957), Sergio Leone (Il colosso di Rodi/The Colossus of Rhodes, 1961), and Sergio Corbucci (Il giorno più corto/The Shortest Day, 1962). Aranda also played the role of Antonius in Mario Bonnard and Sergio Leone's Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei, to which Bava also contributed. Darkly handsome, with looks that could be equally boyish or brooding, Aranda was sometimes billed as Angelo Aranda or Angel Miranda.

By the time she appeared as Tiona in Terrore nello spazio, Evi Marandi had also appeared in movies under different names, including Evy Mirandi and Evy Harandis—and just as many features in which she was not billed at all. Among her early credits were Giuseppe Vari's La vendetta di barbari/Revenge of the Barbarians (1960), José Benézeraf's erotic Cover Girls (1963), and an impressive number of US productions lensed abroad, including Michael Curtiz' Francis of Asisi (1961), Paul Wendkos' Gidget Goes to Rome (1963), and Richard Quine's Paris—When It Sizzles (1964).

Also visible in the cast are Massimo Righi as Salas, Alberto Cevenini as Toby, Ivan Rassimov (who would have a cameo role as Daria Nicolodi's psychiatrist in Bava's final feature, Schock) as Carter, and as Keir, Federico "Rico" Boido. Though he would appear in only three Bava films—the others being 1968's Diabolik/Danger: Diabolik and 1970's Roy Colt & Winchester Jack, in both of which he plays gunmen—Boido is perhaps the most memorable supporting actor of Bava's middle period. Tall, blonde, and gaunt, almost scarecrow-like, Boido gives such an execrable

AS BARRY Sullivan waited for AIP to supply him with a leading lady, he took solace in temporary publicity shots such as this one with Evi Marandi.

7 A report in Famous Monsters of Filmland 34 erroneously reported that filming of The Outlaw Planet began on March 10.

8 Tom Weaver, Attack of the Monster Movie Makers (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 1994), 140.

9 Nicholson's own daughter Laura had been among the supporting players in AIP's Beach Party series, which grew out of an original screenplay written by Lou Rusoff, Arkoff's brother-in-law.

reading of his one phonetic line that he was given no other dialogue, but he makes a most convincing space ghoul. In later Spaghetti Western roles, he would adopt the screen name "Rick Boyd," but he mostly sticks in the memory as Toby Dammit's (Terence Stamp's) sombrero-wearing stunt double in Fellini's episode of Histoires Extraordinaires/Spirits of the Dead (1967).

Curiously unbilled in the film is Giuseppe Mattei as Brent. Mattei had entered the film business in the early 1960s as a master of arms, and he continued to appear in Italian exploitation films through the 1970s under the pseudonym "James Harris," including Luigi Batzella's decidedly Bava-influenced metaphysical gothic, Nuda per Satana/Nude for Satan (1974).

Production

As Terrore nello spazio approached its start date, Mario Bava was feeling paternal concern about his son, Lamberto. Already a husband, and now a father, at age 21, Lamberto Bava had not yet shown any inclinations toward a specific career. "It was never my wish to become a filmmaker when I was growing up," he explains. "Then, around the age of 18, I found myself visiting my father's sets more and more often, simply to observe. I became fascinated by the sets, the lighting, the presence of actors—and soon, I found myself called upon to assist." [10]

Asked to remember the circumstances of why he became his father's assistant, Lamberto claims, "I don't remember"—but it surely had something to do with his personal circumstances, and with Mario feeling an imperative to instruct his unfocused son in a useful trade, as his father had done with him.

Lamberto did not—and never did—serve his father in the role of a traditional assistant director: the person who serves as the "voice" on-set, calling the scenes and breaks, rounding up actors, and maintaining a controlled environment on the director's behalf. "To assist in the making of horror films was, for me, always more of a pleasure than a job," he says. "I always used my heart more than my head . . . Working with my father came very naturally to me. Moreover, I had known all of his crew regulars since I was a little boy; they were the same people who came to visit him at our house. Even before I went to work with my father, Franco Prosperi—his previous assistant—sometimes turned to me, to explain exactly what my father expected of him. There were times when I was the only person who could understand him." Asked if, by working with his father, he learned anything important about him which he had not known before, Lamberto replies: "It is one thing to live with your father, and something else entirely to work with him. By assisting my father, I discovered his inventiveness, his self-confidence, and his passion."

Two other "assistant directors" are also credited on prints of Terrore nello spazio: Serena Canevari and Manuel San Roman, the second of whom was very likely not present and listed only to satisfy the Spanish investors. As for Serena Canevari, Lamberto explains the differences of their responsibilities succinctly: "She had the text, I didn't. She was a professional, whereas my primary role was to help invent something."

Canevari was not only an experienced continuity worker, but a member of an Italian family that was central to the Italian film community, much like Bava's own. According to Mel Welles, "The Canevaris were a family of artists; everybody in that family, going back generations, was either a painter or a sculptor or both." Serena's father Angelo had been a production designer in the early days of Italian cinema; her brother Cesare was an actor, writer, and director; her brother Sergio followed in his father's footsteps as a production designer and art director (he would later work in this capacity on Bava's Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve, 1971), and Serena herself had worked previously as an actress (in Martin Ritt's Five Branded Women, 1960) and before and after Terrore nello spazio on such important films as Antonioni's Deserto rosso/Red Desert (1960), Leone's Il buono, il brutto, il cattivo/The Good the Bad and the Ugly (1966), Francis Ford Coppola's The Godfather Part II (1974), and Mario Bava's final work in the cinema, Dario Argento's Inferno (1980, on which Lamberto served in a more traditional assistant director role). Since 1987, Serena Canevari has worked primarily as a first assistant director on the films of Bernardo Bertolucci.

As the saying goes, "Some men are born great, and others have greatness thrust upon them." In the case of Lamberto Bava, he became his father's assistant, in essence, to ensure their mutual security. Now a father, Lamberto needed steady employment and apprenticeship at a trade; but his presence on the set also promised a greater sense of security for Mario, who was embarking on a new picture that was to be his first with a new camera crew and editor. Replacing Ubaldo Terzano as the head of Bava's camera team was Antonio Rinaldi, who was assisted by Saverio Diamanti and Giorgio Aureli. Bava's usual editor of choice—

LAMBERTO BAVA, age 21, on the set of his first collaboration with father Mario.

SPANISH lobby card featuring Barry Sullivan, Norma Bengell, and newcomer Ivan Rassimov as Carter.

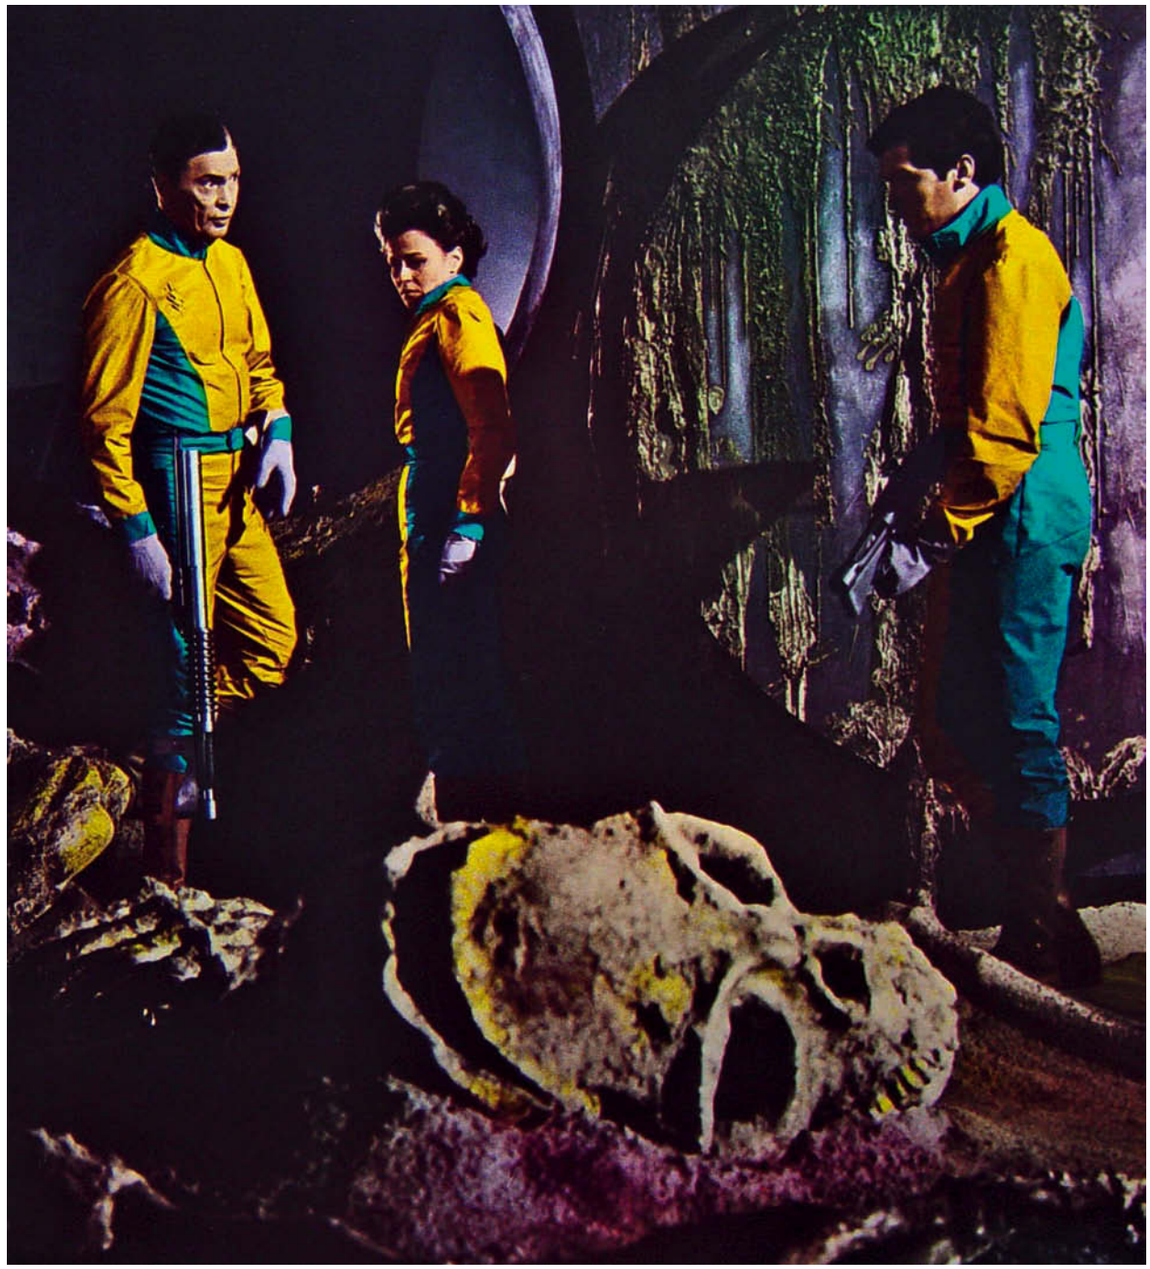
Mario Serandrei—had been unable to sign on, as he was busy juggling important assignments from Giuseppe De Santis, Gillo Pontecorvo, and Sergio Corbucci. Bava turned to Renato Cinquini, who had served him so well on La frusta e il corpo, only to find him preoccupied with the cutting of Barbara Steele's latest horror picture, Mario Caiano's Amanti d'oltretomba/ Nightmare Castle (1965). Cinquini recommended his assistant Romana Fortini, who had recently begun editing films in her own right, starting with Antonio Margheriti's I giganti di Roma/ The Giants of Rome (1964), an impressive peplum retread of The Guns of Navarone scripted by Ernesto Gastaldi. Fortini was the true editor of Terrore nello spazio, though some sources list Antonio Gimeno as editor and American prints list no editor at all. Gimeno was an experienced editor, active in Spanish cinema since the mid-1940s, but with the possible exception of some fine-tuning done prior to the Spanish release, he did not edit the picture; his name was attached to the production for quota purposes only.

Lamberto Bava may have had his position thrust on him by circumstance, but once the production was underway, he realized that he had found his place in the world. "By paying close attention to [my father's] movements and his expressions, I was able to intuit precisely what he was thinking," he says. "It was beautiful. I understood him innately and tried to surprise him by anticipating his every demand." [11]



Also joining the Bava squad for the first time was the aforementioned Rosalba Scavia, a young segretaria d'edizione (production secretary) who evolved into something more akin to a personal assistant and confidant to Mario Bava. Long retired from the film business and now an established psychoanalyst, she looks back on this earlier phase of her career with tenderness:

"I don't really remember how I met Mario Bava. Through the production of a film, certainly—I was the segretaria d'edizione for the most part. He knew what he wanted, so I was mainly there in name only, but he was a pleasure to work with. My own background in all this was very tenuous. As you know, in Italy, some people wake up in the morning and say, 'I want to be an actor' and others say 'I want to be a director' and they get their friends and family together and make a film. But others are genuine artists. Our friend Mario was a genuine artist. I always felt that he would have been a greater success as a painter. He seemed to know what he wanted, but he was never quite able to attain it because the people around him worked against that. Mario was quiet, polite, and respectful, yet also troubled, from what I can remember. He would talk to me—and to other people from time to time—yet he always held something back. At times, I would want him to open up, to understand him better—but he seemed to have various personas—one for me, one for you—but they were all good, kind, and gentle. I know he put a lot of himself into his work. Sometimes I would look at him and see a sad soul, but he always tried to hide it."

10 Lamberto Bava interview, "Mario Bava, Mio Padre" in Luigi Cozzi, Il Cinema Gotico e Fantastico Italiano Vol 1—Mario Bava, I Mille Volti Della Paura (Rome, Italy: Mondo Ignoto/Profondo Rosso, 2001), 149–56.

11 Ibid.

MARK, Sonya, and Carter arrive at the wreckage site of an ancient alien spacecraft.

The production of Terrore nello spazio coincided with AIP's announcement that they were "abandoning all second features to concentrate on 'quality pictures.'" According to Fulvio Lucisano, Terrore nello spazio had a budget of "about $200,000" and was shot on a six-week schedule at Cinecittà. This figure sounds a bit inflated; in all honesty, Terrore nello spazio doesn't look half as resplendent as La maschera del demonio, which was made for half as much money, and despite Bava's obvious ingenuity with the visuals, it remains a movie about a toy spaceship facing invisible terrors on a planet of smoke and mirrors.

It must sound like overstatement today, but at the time it was first released—and until Ridley Scott's Bava-influenced Alien arrived many years later—Terrore nello spazio was widely praised as containing one of the most convincingly alien environments ever filmed. To understand this, we must remember that Hollywood science fiction films—the most widely seen variety—had been influenced in their design by the brightly colored pulp covers of the 1940s and '50s; the strange and unknown worlds they visited were always brightly lit, and most were either shot on location at Bronson Caverns in Los Angeles, or on obvious studio sets with static painted backdrops. Terrore nello spazio took the unusual approach of making its environment mysterious, of accentuating its shadows, and animating it with curling smoke and changeable colors. As usual, Bava shrugged off any suggestion of his own ingenuity, claiming that he did what he could to mask an appalling lack of provisions.

"Do you know what that mysterious planet in Terrore nello spazio was made of?" he revealed, years later. "A couple of plastic rocks—and I mean 'two': one and one!—that were left over from some mythological picture made at Cinecittà. To assist the illusion, I had to fill the set with fog!" [12]

Bava was exaggerating the challenge placed before him, but not by much. The same vaguely lunar rocks can be glimpsed inhabiting different shots, sometimes increased in number by mirrors and multiple exposures, their sameness camouflaged by different positioning (upright, horizontal), varied placement within the frame, and alternating splashes and intensities of color. The jagged mountain terrain providing the planet's horizon was a painted cyclorama originally executed for Hades in Ercole al centro della terra—it literally cost the production nothing.

"They had a set of the planet exterior and there was smoke all over the damn place, a combination of dry ice and actual smoke," according to Ib Melchior, who visited the set one day late in the production. "The dry ice stayed down and the smoke rose up; it was a very interesting effect. They had little smoke pots, normal things. They had many places and little fans, that made the dry ice move as it clung closely to the ground. It was all set up like the lights; it was very controlled." For the planet exteriors, Bava used fumone, a kind of smoke formerly used by the military for camouflage purposes, and he also gave atmospheric density to some interior shots with church incense.

Bava's total control over the otherworldly atmosphere of these studio-bound "exteriors" exceeded the boundaries of special effects into the province of art direction. According to the film's production manager, Mario Silvestri, Bava called all the shots in regard to the film's art direction, while the credited art director, Giorgio Giovannini, essentially put his concepts into effect. "Mario Bava would make all the suggestions for design," Silvestri explained. "Giovannini, at that time, was not a well-known designer; if he had been a well-known designer, he would have been calling all the shots, not Bava, and there would have been no discussion. And this is the reason [Bava] used Giovannini—he was young, unknown, but very clever." [13]

Just as Bava's contribution to the film's "exterior" art direction is evident due to its almost complete reliance on special effects and optical illusion, many of the interiors also incorporate elements which deceive the eye. For example, one of the great design conundrums posed by the film's spaceship setting was how to convert a large, square sound stage at Cinecittà into a more concave-walled enclosure that would match the boomerang shape of the Argos. By studying the Argos interiors closely, we can see that the walls appear to curve, but are actually flat; their concavity suggested by cleverly positioning a series of tall, silver-framed, gun-metal colored flats in a domino arrangement. When reverse shots had to be filmed, the same flats were moved to the other side of the set. The bare studio floor was disguised by rolls of similarly colored plastic floorguard, the criss-crossing outlines of which are clearly visible during the fight that breaks out after the landing on Aura.

Among the most interesting features of the Argos set were the so-called "ionosphere" screens used by Capt. Mark Markary to communicate with other areas of the Argos, and with the crew of the ill-fated Galliot. Bava could have easily left these shots to be optically inserted later, but he took complete responsibility for them by faking the televisual communication on the set. He did this by having Giovannini's crew build a couple of small sets—only slightly larger than a telephone booth—behind a pair of large convex "screens" on the Argos control panel, separated by an exterior view of Aura on the middle screen. These two screens were opaqued by shining a pair of lights in their direction from backstage. When communication was opened, these lights were dimmed as other backstage lighting was raised to illuminate the two respective groups of three actors crammed into their little set, which literally sandwiched them between the screen and a background wall of flashing lights. To enhance the illusion of a broadcast image, the actors were illuminated from one side by a blue light inside a zoetrope-like cyclodrum, which projected onto them an oblique series of rolling horizontal lines.

In some ways, Bava's greatest visual coups in Terrore nello spazio are the miniatures he devised to supply the interiors of the Galliot and the derelict alien spacecraft, where entire technologies are suggested with little more than the careful arrangement of miscellaneous pieces of junk plastic. When Mark and the others visit the engine room of the Galliot, for example, Bava's camera pulls back to encompass a foregrounded miniature collage of odds-and-ends, the two largest pieces of which appear to be the emptied frames of a portable electric fan. Assembled elsewhere in the mostly dark shot are what appear to be a black plastic vacuum cleaner hose, sticks or straws, and shadows that may be enhanced with daubs of matte paint. Photographed through a small window at the bottom of this conglomeration are the huddled cast members, standing on the other side of a negative lens that reduced them in size, correcting their scale in relation to the miniature landscape around them. Even more astounding is the interior of the alien vessel, with its entrance of dark, concentric circles that lead to a foregrounded, emerald-green beacon that seems mired in centuries of soot. The ceiling of the craft appears to be wholly composed of desk lamps and plastic cones, some combined (or placed against mirrored surfaces) to form peculiar hourglass configurations, all strobing with mystery and light, and viewed through a thin foreground of incense smoke. Another shot depicts Mark and Sonya silhouetted against a green spherical entrance, viewed from between the diverging inclines of two parallel orange cones; without moving from its base, the camera then moves to the right, reporting a ceilingworks of other colors and shapes. Viewed without sound, we can see how meager these set-ups really are—but viewed with Gino Marinuzzi Jr.'s electronic sound effects in place, they become extraordinary in their ability to provide our senses with every distraction needed to fill the gaps of this sequence.

SONYA is shocked by the sight of an ancient alien skeleton at one of the interior control panels—a moment echoed by the "Space Jockey" scene of Ridley Scott's ALIEN.

12 Volta.

13 Robert Skotak, Ib Melchior Man of Imagination (Baltimore MD: Midnight Marquee Press, 2000), 238–47.

Bava had equal input into the wardrobe design, which was one of the first film assignments for costumist Gabriele Mayer, who was only twenty-five years old at the time of production. Although the film was completed long before AIP's publicity department came up with the title Planet of the Vampires, the black uniforms worn by the Argos crew are somewhat vampiric in design, with high jagged neckpieces that suggest bat wings while also evoking memories of the high collar of Count Dracula's cape. Likewise, the leather headpieces lend the appearance of a widow's peak. It isn't known whether Bava was using the wardrobe to underscore the vampiric nature of the parasitic Aurans, but Mayer remembers having somewhat different aims.

"My initial idea—my favorite one of all the designs—was that the costumes should resemble the bodies of insects; the seams should mark the segments of the body of the animal, like that of the mantis," Mayer told Robert Skotak. "The idea was accepted and taken forward to completion, even though the time at our disposal was very short—at most about twenty days, plus one week for conception. And the budget was very tight, so much so that we had to do somersaults to get it all finished." [14]

One of the film's peculiarities is an extended sequence in which Barry Sullivan, Norma Bengell, and Ivan Rassimov visit the derelict alien spacecraft while wearing other, rather ordinary, orange-and-lavender jumpsuits, which only serve to emphasize the brilliance of the main costume design seen elsewhere in the picture. The change was necessary for two reasons: to make the actors' movements inside the dark spacecraft interior easier to see, and for another reason, which Lamberto Bava explains: "The costumes were changed so that we didn't always have to use the same ones. We were obliged to dress Norma Bengell with some variety, above all." To make the transition more acceptable, an extra dialogue scene was added later, showing Mark and Sonya in these jumpsuits, prior to departure, meeting with Wess and Tiona—who are wearing their standard black uniforms—to leave them in charge.

SONYA tends to a severely injured crew member, as Dr. Karen observes.

At some point during production, it was decided to emphasize the participation of Norma Bengell and Angel Aranda, perhaps to satisfy the interests of the Spanish investors, after their original screenplay was rejected by AIP.

"It was a Tower of Babel," Deke Heyward told interviewer Tom Weaver. "There'd be one [actor] talking in Portuguese, another in Italian, another in German, and there was no communication, just a lot of facial writhings. Barry Sullivan was the star of the American version, [but] each company [involved in the co-production] star-billed the player that was important to their country. In fact, we had to try for line balancing: 'Your star has got more lines than my star!' 'Okay, I'll trade you two of my star's lines for one of yours.' Which ain't the way pictures should be made. And they ain't never gonna be made that way again!" [15]

Consequently, Evi Marandi's character of Tiona lost a number of her scripted scenes, which would have depicted her as so traumatized by her encounters with the living dead that she became a sort of Cassandra figure—driven mad and subject to prophetic visions of the faces of the dead. Tiona was also originally planned to be the love interest of Wess. In a fairly late draft of the screenplay signed by Melchior and Louis M. Heyward, Wess decides not to leave Aura after Tiona is killed and possessed by an Auran. "It makes no difference to me what she is," Wess explains. "She is Tiona. Still." Despite the severe reduction of Marandi's role, she had the last laugh: it is her face alone that was pictured, screaming in fear, on Spanish posters for Terror en el Espacio.

TIONA screams in response to a surprise encounter with a re-animated dead crew member.

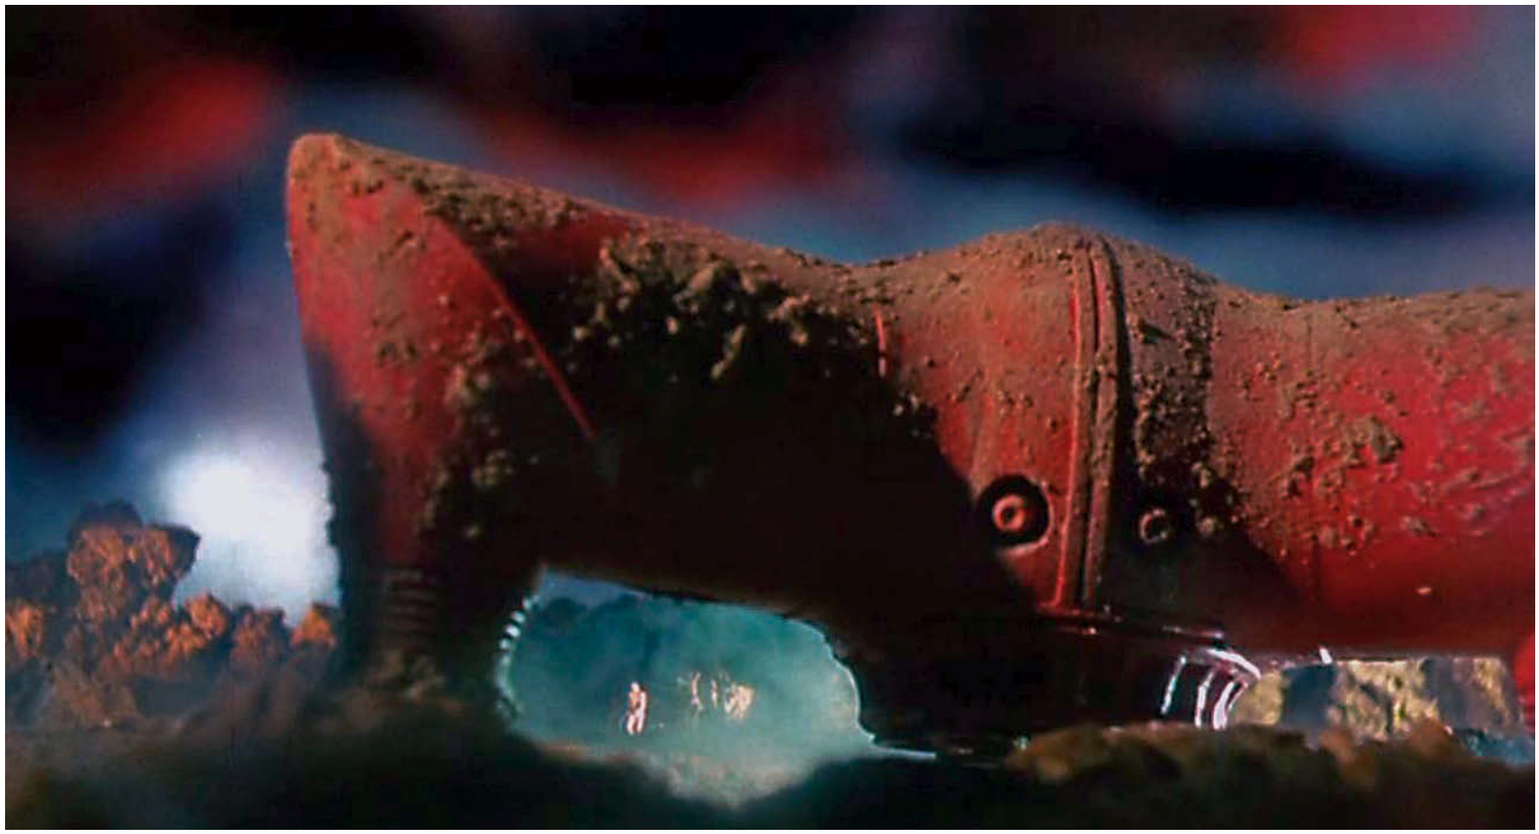
Angel Aranda likewise lost some screen time as Marandi's complementary role was diminished, but his role had already gained in prominence as a result of Wess becoming an amalgam of other deleted characters. As for Norma Bengell, she is clearly the unrivalled female presence in the movie, which is due not only to her generous screen time, but also the changes she effected in her character. In the script, Sanya/Sonya is a weepy communications officer, forever leaning on Mark for support. Bengell does a little of this, but generally she plays Sonya as a more serious, independent, and capable young woman.

The inevitable result of all this line-for-line bartering was a lot of improvised paraphrasing of Ib Melchior's original dialogue, which dumbed it down considerably. Through no fault of Melchior's, the English version of the picture, Planet of the Vampires, contains what is by far the worst dialogue of any Bava film—much of it reserved for Barry Sullivan's Captain Mark Markary: "Okay, let's not stand around—we've got work to do" . . . "If he moves, shoot first—ask questions later" . . . and, most memorably, "If there are intelligent creatures on this planet, they're our enemies." When Markary first sets eyes on the skeletal remains of the dead alien crew, he makes this hilarious assessment: "Judging by the deterioration of the calcium, it must have been here a long time"—never mind that it's not only a skeleton, but buried up to its shoulders in dust!

Dialogue was only one of the ongoing problems. By the last weeks of filming, when Bava was primarily occupied with special effects photography, the matter of the film's ending had still not been resolved to everyone's satisfaction. Bava actually detested Ib Melchior's "Adam and Eve" stinger, as he later confided to Luigi Cozzi: "This screenwriter wanted the man and woman astronauts to land on Earth—in the United States, naturally—in Missouri!—and to discover Eden there, becoming Adam and Eve! Naturally, I refused to film it." [16]

With the possibility for further divergences from the script looming large, Deke Heyward summoned Ib Melchior to the set at Cinecittà, to meet Bava and Lucisano, to look at the dailies, and to work with them to arrive at a conclusion that would be acceptable to all.

Melchior: "They wanted a different ending. I wanted to go right, and they wanted to go left. I remember sitting with the script and talking with the producer, Lucisano, and with Mario, deciding how were we going to do this and that. And I think, at one time, Barry Sullivan was in on it too, telling us what he thought. l came up with different ideas and we finally settled on one that worked to everybody's satisfaction."



In later years, Bava put a less courteous face on the matter of Melchior's visit to Cinecittà. "While I was filming Terrore nello spazio, there was an American screenwriter on the set, rewriting the script, changing the scenes and the dialogue . . . Eventually, I stopped paying any attention to him." However annoyed he might have been by the intrusion into his domain, he was outwardly quite charming, treating Melchior with the utmost cordiality.

"I found Bava to be a very friendly, easygoing man," Melchior describes. "He was very reasonable and very calm, as far as I was concerned. In other words, there was none of this 'C'mon, let me see what you've got . . . No, that's terrible work!' It was more like, 'Okay, let's see what we can do here; this doesn't quite work.' Actually, it was quite unusual because the writer's work isn't usually respected that much. People just go ahead and rewrite whatever they want to, and it usually turns out lopsided or halting in some way. I was impressed with the fact that they had no problem with taking a couple of days with the writer to find out how best a problem could be handled."

14 Ibid.

15 Weaver.

16 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 249–60.

A STRIKING view of the derelict alien spacecraft discovered by the Argos crew—one of Bava's marvelous tabletop miniatures (with airbrushed clouds in mid-field and live actors receded by forced perspective and a negative lens).

Melchior spent only one day on the set itself, but what he saw there pleased him. An experienced writer–director of low-budget science fiction films in his own right, he was impressed by Bava's seemingly effortless grasp of atmosphere—and by his ease in supervising the cast and crew. "What was he like as a director? Well, the little that I saw him direct—he told the people, 'I want this, I want this, I want that,' and it was all done in one take. Another one, maybe, was done in two takes, and that was that. The set seemed very relaxed—no tension. Everything seemed to be running very, very smoothly."

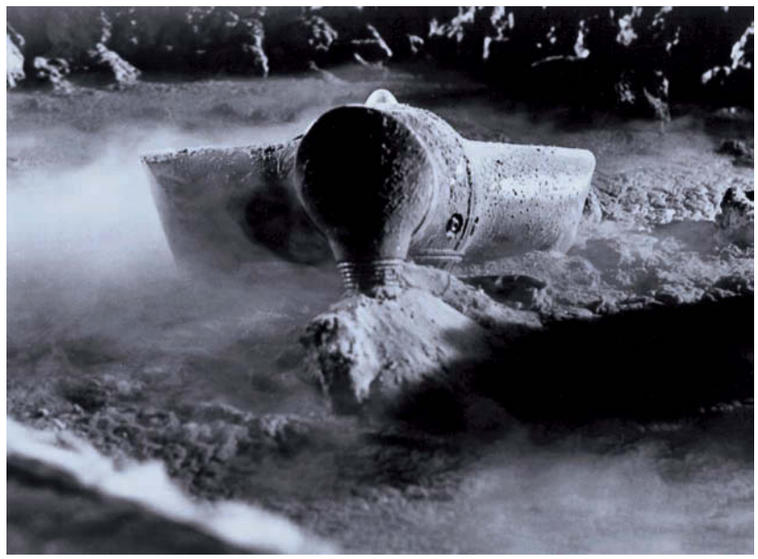
Barry Sullivan agreed with Melchior's assessment: "We shot very quickly, which at least kept our energy level up. There were some rewrites done on the script to improve the clarity of the storyline, although they didn't help an awful lot. Producers always tell you they're going to 'fix' the script, but it rarely happens. Through it all, Mario was totally focused, and there was no technical problem that he couldn't either work out on the spot or have a solution for when he arrived at the studio the next morning."

Renato Pestriniero, author of the source story, was not able to witness the film of his story being made, though Fulvio Lucisano did extend to him an invitation to come to Cinecittà. "I never met Mario Bava and never visited the set," Pestriniero regrets. "Of course, I had no right to intervene in the screenplay, so my presence was not necessary. It would have been a pleasure for me to meet Bava—a man famous for his professionalism and his ability in special effects, but the check in my hands was too small to cover my expenses!"

Special Effects

Despite its limited resources, Terrore nello spazio is a tour de force of special effects wizardry, which Bava supplied almost entirely with deceptively primitive, in-camera techniques dating back to the silent era. By the mid-1960s, even the crudest American science fiction films had achieved a certain level of sophistication in regard to special effects; it was not uncommon to see fairly accomplished optical effects or animation shots in low-budget, independent releases, even if used only sparingly. The polish of such effects led audiences to accept them as facets of storytelling, almost unthinkingly, but there is something about the soulful, handcrafted look of Bava's special effects in Terrore nello spazio that is not so familiar, adding to the film's complexion of otherworldliness and mystery. Trick shots of this nature had seldom been seen by contemporary audiences, and had never before been utilized in such a colorful setting. Eugenio Bava acted as an unofficial technical advisor to the production, Fulvio Lucisano reveals: "Many times, Mario went to his father for advice. Eugenio gave him some suggestions about how to do things, in the camerawork particularly."

The main titles sequence unfolds incrementally, opening with a shot of a star field in space, then adding the blue orb of Aura, followed by the sister ships Argos and Galliot, before using a slow zoom into the pulsing light on the belly of the Argos as a segue to the first interior. The star field was made in the most elementary way: it was a sheet of black velvet, punched full of small holes, with multi-colored gels covering some of the holes on the opposite, backlit side. Carlo Rambaldi built the Argos from Bava's own design; it was a boomerang-shaped miniature about 50 centimeters in diameter. He built only one model, and the shot of the Argos and Galliot together was accomplished with a double exposure. The planet seen in the shots from space was a styrofoam ball, carefully mottled with an airbrush.



The first major special effects shot in the picture is the landing of the Argos. (It is preceded by a brief shot of the Argos descending through the Auran atmosphere, which was done by filming the model at rest on a glass surface from below, and double exposing the shot with scrolling shadows projected from a cyclodrum, creating the illusion of ascending clouds.) For the actual landing, Rambaldi's Argos model was lowered—and later raised, for the take-off shot—inside a large aquarium filled with water. Inside the aquarium, the floor was covered with sand and the background pane was painted with streaks of cloud and a replica of the jagged rocky cyclorama that forms a backdrop to later exteriors in the picture; the rear was further diffused with what appears to be opaque tissue paper, backlit with soft crossbeams of blue and green. Placed between the camera and the front panel of the aquarium was a glass matte of air-brushed clouds, which lent an illusion of depth to the shot while also concealing the means by which the model was lowered into the tank. As it descended, the light-strobing hollow on the bottom of the ship released a gust of air and white leaded powder, which plumed underwater to provide an illusion of braking exhaust.

As Bava later confided to the host of the Italian television talk show L'ospite dalle due, while screening this sequence, "We had to be careful so that little bubbles didn't show up on the spaceship, otherwise everything would have been revealed."

The filming of this shot happened to coincide with Ib Melchior's visit to the set. "When I was there, they were filming spaceship take-offs or landings in water, using the bubbles as exhaust," he recalls, smiling at the memory. "It was really quite interesting. I don't know how they did it, but it was a combination of bubbles and smoke and it really looked fine."

Viewed on a large screen, in sync with Gino Marinuzzi Jr.'s electronic sound effects, the shot is a staggering success—not just the landing, but the subsequent exterior of the Argos powering down in the midst of Aura's densely alien landscape. It is one of several shots in the picture that was a blatant influence on Ridley Scott's approach to Alien, many years later.

OTHER illusions: an exterior view of the Argos on planet Aura (a foregrounded miniature landscape, with Rambaldi's scale model at rest behind it), and another view of the alien ship that suggests its legs may have been built up over ordinary light bulbs.

The next major effects sequence occurs about twenty minutes into the picture, when Mark, Sonya, Wess, and another crewman venture across the primordial surface of Aura to reach the Galliot. After Wess diagrams their procedure and Mark replies, "Let's try it," the studio scene cuts to an effects shot, showing the four actors in the lower right hand corner of the screen, in the foreground of a vast, smoking, red-hot landscape that lies between them and the Galliot, shining in the distance.

With this shot, Bava was reclaiming an invention of his father's, which had come to be known as "the Schüfftan shot," a process of inserting actors into a miniature set or effect, which Eugenio first innovated during the making of Cabiria. In short, everything in the shot—except for the actors—was a miniature, tabletop "set" consisting of little more than rocks, dry ice, and potent red lighting, with Rambaldi's model positioned at the far side. This miniature set was then reflected on a mirror positioned at an angle in front of the camera, and a jagged, rock-shaped area in the lower right hand corner of the mirror had its silvering scraped away to permit a window-like view of the actors, who were perfectly aligned to "inhabit" the shot at a distance that lent them believable scale. The actors appear to enter the miniature landscape by walking toward it, crouching down as they exit their window of visibility; the shot then cuts to a studio shot of the actors venturing down a treacherous hillside, and the illusion is perfect.

To make their trek appear more hazardous, Bava supervised the construction of what Mario Silvestri has described as "a giant frying pan . . . fifteen meters in diameter," in which a partial replica of the Auran landscape was built over bubbling pots of polenta, or corn meal, which was doused with strong red light to create the appearance of lava pits. After Sonya edges past one of these, she looks up and the camera cuts to another exterior of the Galliot, positioned atop a diffuse mountainscape behind heaps of smoldering rocks.

This is the sort of trick shot that not only works on its own behalf, but also to confuse the issue of how the previous illusion was achieved; in this case, what appears at first to be another miniature landscape surprises us when the actors actually walk through it! Examined closely, the shot appears to be a double-exposed matte shot with a particularly tricky, zigzag matte line that separates the lower half of the screen (studio) from the upper half, which shows the spaceship model mounted behind a large glass matte painting of the mountain, behind which a wall of smoke is shown rising, shot through with blue, red, and lavender light. (The blue source light can actually be seen just behind the matte line on the right side of the screen.) In the following shots of the crew reaching the site of the Galliot, the model was cleverly foregrounded to enhance its size in relation to the actors.

The later exteriors of the derelict spacecraft were, of course, also miniatures. Curiously designed, with almost humanoid features, this model appears to have been constructed out of papier maché, built up around ordinary household lightbulbs. [17]

No one was more surprised by the quality of the film's special effects than its star, Barry Sullivan. The actor remembered his final meeting with Bava and his first look at their collaboration: "Toward the end of shooting . . . I [still] wasn't convinced that Planet of the Vampires would look like anything that anyone would want to see. Our budget was so low, I thought it would take a magician to create anything within it. We left the studio one day at the same time and, through an interpreter, [Bava] complimented me on my performance in The Bad and the Beautiful. It was clear that he loved Hollywood movies and respected the actors in them. So I told Bava, 'Maybe we'll work together on something good someday." This was relayed to him in Italian and he looked at me with surprise, genuine surprise. Then he said, 'I think you may be pleasantly surprised.'

"When I showed up [later] for the dubbing session, the first images came on the screen and I couldn't believe my eyes! It was the most beautiful use of color, composition, framing, everything, that I had ever seen! It looked 100 times more expensive than it was; it didn't resemble the studio conditions at all. The thing I remembered most about the studio was how hot it was in those rubber spacesuits under the studio lights, and how they kept the studio cool so we wouldn't sweat in those 'wet suits,' which we did anyway—and yet, there we were up on the screen, in these spectacular settings that Mario Bava somehow fashioned out of nothing. I couldn't look away from the screen, couldn't look down at my script long enough to read my lines! I finally asked the dubbing producer to just run the footage for me, so I could see it all, to take the surprise away, before I did my dubbing. It was so beautiful, it nearly brought tears to my eyes. It looked like an MGM Hollywood picture!

"I thought, 'I said it would take a magician to make this movie look like something special, and I guess we got one!' [Bava was] an absolutely brilliant artist—incomparable, and I mean that, really. And the funny thing is, I don't think all the effects and the art direction were completed at the time I dubbed it, because several years later, Planet of the Vampires ran late at night on the ABC station here in LA, and I watched it—and I was even more knocked out by it! An amazing film. If only the script had been better, it might be a minor classic. Because, visually, it certainly is."

SONYA comforts Tiona after her encounter with the living dead.

Music

Terrore nello spazio wears on its sleeve the influence of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's science fiction classic, Forbidden Planet—it can be seen in the distinctive uniforms worn by its space crew, the premise of a starship responding to a signal emanating from an alien planet, the discovery and exploration of extinct and unimaginable alien technologies, and finally, it can also be heard in its use of electronic music.

Forbidden Planet was scored by the husband-and-wife team of Louis and Bebe Barron. The Barrons were protégés of music experimentalist John Cage—who, in 1951, became the first musician to stage a live concert of electronic music, performing a composition written for twenty-four live musicians and half as many radios. While Forbidden Planet was not the first science fiction film to employ electronic instrumentation—Bernard Herrmann's theremin-suffused orchestral score for The Day the Earth Stood Still (1951) predates it—it was the first of its genre to be scored entirely electronically. The Barrons' "electronic tonalities"—performed on a synthesizer they built themselves and produced in their own home studio—challenged the traditional definition of film music; the score was not used to punctuate the drama of the story but to accentuate its exotic and alien settings with an accompaniment more appropriate to the uncharted mysteries of space. It was music as atmosphere.

The score for Terrore nello spazio was composed by Gino Marinuzzi Jr., who—like the Barrons—had his first motion picture experience composing for short films. Son of the great opera conductor and composer Gino Marinuzzi (1882–1944), he was born Luigi Marinuzzi Jr., on April 27, 1920, in New York City. His earliest film score was written for Guido Guerrasio's documentary La leggenda di Verona (1949), and through the middle 1950s, the bulk of his film assignments was in the realm of arts and travel documentaries. Torn between the cinema and academia (he also worked as an instructor at the Conservatorio di Santa Cecilia), Marinuzzi's feature assignments were comparatively rare, but they were distinguished: Jean Renoir's Le Carosse d'Or/The Golden Coach (1952), Vittorio Cottafavi's Nel gorgo del peccato (1954), and Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide (1961, with Armando Trovajoli), and Pasquale Festa Campanile and Massimo Franciosa's Le voci bianche/White Voices (1964, featuring Barbara Steele), to name a few. Though his father was purely a classicist, particularly renowned for his devotion to the works of Giuseppe Verdi, Marinuzzi Jr. was one of the first Italian composers to seriously explore the new frontiers of electronic music.

During the production of Bava's earlier science fiction feature La morte viene dallo spazio, the model of Forbidden Planet led composer Carlo Rustichelli to provide the film with a hybrid score—half-classical, and half-created by crude electronic means, including various home appliances. Seven years later, Marinuzzi—who first dabbled in electronica onscreen with his contribution to Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide—would take generally the same approach to scoring Terrore nello spazio; that is, by composing traditional orchestral cues as well as some wholly electronic ones, such as the very Barronesque main title piece. More ambitiously, Marinuzzi created nearly all of the film's sound effects electronically, and it is in this area that his contribution is most impressive. In fact, never before or since would Mario Bava relegate as much responsibility to a composer for the final success of a film.

There is no dialogue for the first 2½ minutes of the picture, leaving Marinuzzi an open canvas in which to use sounds to make the opening model shot and stagebound Argos interiors feel persuasively real and starborne. The first cue—an ostinato of high-pitched tweets repeated over a deep, distorted tolling, as other sounds (like sheets of metal being scraped and rubbed together) tease the periphery—is fascinating, and as a whole and in various individual components, the piece would be used as a library track in other pictures for the next twenty years. Marinuzzi also provided all of the ambient sounds heard aboard the Argos until the first line of dialogue is spoken: the flaring hum of the central orb, the subtle drone of machinery, as well as a windy sound to suggest the ship's acceleration through space. His first sonic tour de force is the scene of the Argos being pulled into the gravitational field of Aura. Here, literally everything on the soundtrack besides the actor's voices was provided by the composer, and the sound collage works not only in its functional application, but also as music. We hear the ship's equipment as it is overridden by exterior forces and fails, the whoosh of passing meteors deflected by the rejector, the increasing rapidity of descent (evoked by raising the octaves of the sound effects), the emergence of the landing gear, the landing itself—indeed, the entire character of the spacecraft and its environs, followed by the character of the alien planet.

ITALIAN locandina, art by Averardo Ciriello.

The first orchestral cue occurs immediately after the landing, as the Argos crew are knocked unconscious and thus rendered vulnerable to possession by the Aurans. As the camera pans from Mark across the floor to the sprawled Sonya and Brent, the music builds in layers from a worrying woodwinds part to a spooky, sinuous viola ostinato, which—as Brent recovers consciousness—gives rise to a third complementary part consisting of dangerous short thrusts of muted brass and an element of the uncanny suggested by xylophone. As the camera cuts to Sonya waking, a full string section enters with a high arpeggio, the fullness and eerieness of the sound expressive of the alien presence gaining strength in numbers. As the scene explodes in actual violence, the fisticuffs are accented with short, furious tattoos on a snare drum. And sublimated below these instruments, for the entire length of the cue, is an airy electronic tone sustaining the essential ambiance of the spacecraft in a musically complementary key. If one pauses to analyze it, this cue tells us in musical terms what is happening to the crew well before Mark explains it theoretically. Whereas the woodwinds underscoring Mark's medium shot are breathing instruments, and thus indicative of his human condition, the viola underscoring Sonya's unconscious writhings are at once more sensual and spiritual in tenor. Brent's sudden consciousness, as emphasized by his cryptic facial expressions and menacing body language, is a source of danger (brass) but not yet rational, and the presence of xylophones brings to mind the dancing skeletons of Saint-Saens' Danse Macabre, the most famous use of the instrument in the annals of classical music.

Later, as Mark and the others explore the surface of Argos, the music becomes more fully orchestral, but at the same time, more amorphous and shapeless; it seems to throb and drift rather than progress, enveloping the action in fugues of instrumental fog—glacial Hammond organ, owl-like woodwinds, baleful oboes, all wallowing in an electronic backwash of sound. On occasion, an orchestral cue may be visited by electronic accents, as when Marinuzzi accompanies the zoom shot that introduces the blue-faced dead of the Galliot crew with a whooshing, dart-like sound effect for the action of the zoom itself. The howling winds heard at the burial of the Galliot crew were also created by Marinuzzi, and though generated by artificial means, their use recalls Bava's careful attention to silences and ominous winds in La maschera del demonio and I tre volti della paura's "I wurdalak." Even more crucial to the film's atmospherics are the sound effects provided for the sequence inside the alien spacecraft, which sell the illusion of various pieces of plastic and strobing lights assembled by Bava into a vast, unpredictable, Krell-like technology. (The Krell being the extinct, technologically advanced race who formerly occupied Forbidden Planet.) The score's only concession to tradition is the accompaniment to the final battle, which unfolds against an anxious orchestral backdrop reminiscent of James Bernard's action music for various Hammer films: fretful ostinati for strings, odd and fluctuating time signatures, spurts of machine-gunning percussion—with electronic overdubs to accompany the blasts of futuristic weaponry and the final take-off.

17 For further verification see the MGM Home Entertainment DVD, 46:19—another foregrounded miniature shot, with the studio set visible in the background.

Marinuzzi's electronic score is easily accepted on first viewing as a signpost of the film's futurism, much like the characters' peculiarities of language ("circuits" instead of "hours," and so on); however, on second viewing, we can begin to appreciate how it also subtly confirms, from the film's very outset, what is revealed in the final scenes: that the Argos crew are not of our earth—and, in a sense, the film's audience is invited to take possession of them like the disembodied Aurans, identifying with them and becoming involved in their plight, because fear is universal.

When AIP released the film as Planet of the Vampires in December 1965, they made the startling decision to leave Marinuzzi's score intact. However, AIP skimped on the quality of their lab work, as usual, and the sound mix that was subsequently released to theaters and television was extremely dull and unflattering to the work the composer had invested in his soundscapes. The lower frequencies were muffled and the higher frequencies were either flattened out or broken up, so that Marinuzzi's remarkable contribution garnered little notice or appreciation. The ultimate indignity came in the early 1980s, when Orion inherited the AIP catalogue, whose independent acquisition contracts did not cover the future likelihood of video rights. Rather than go through the considerable legal expense of tracking down the various composers involved, updating their contracts and paying them off, Orion opted to hire a fledgling, young Los Angeles-based musician—Kendall Schmidt—to rescore a dozen or more AIP acquisitions, including Tigon's Witchfinder General/The Conqueror Worm (1968), Amicus' Scream and Scream Again (1970), and Planet of the Vampires.

ORIGINAL SPANISH poster, art by Mataix.

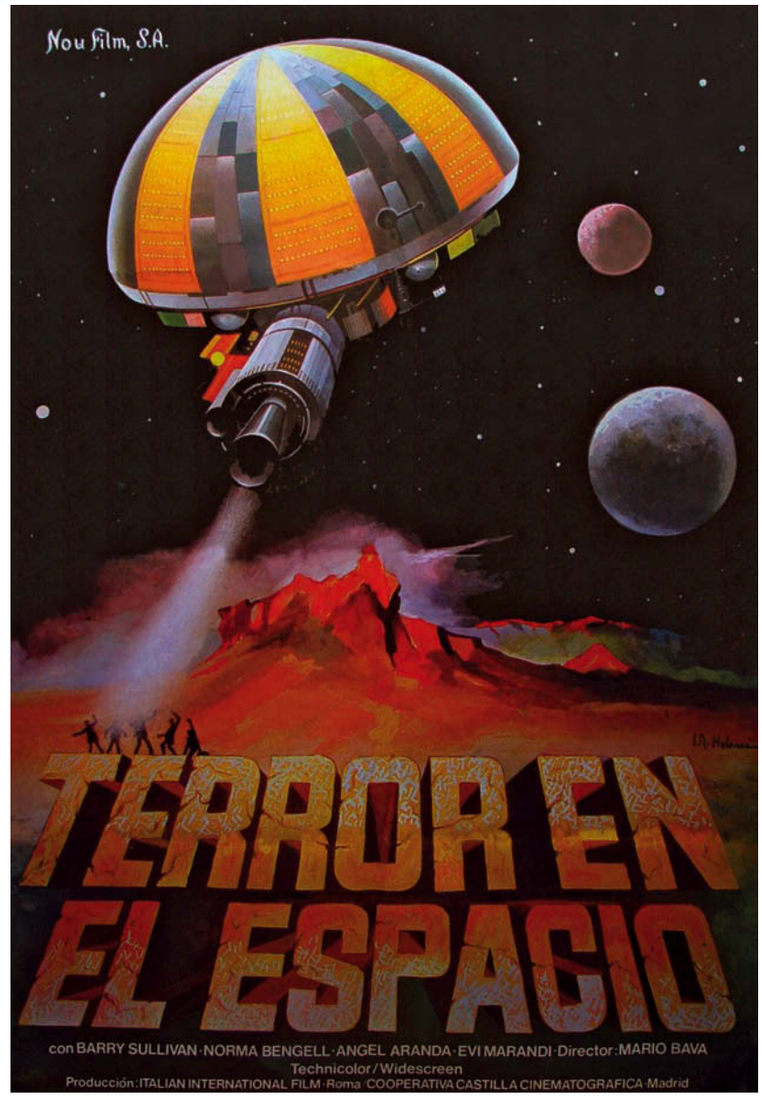
Schmidt rescored all of the films in a very short time, using a Synclavier synthesizer keyboard capable of reproducing dozens of different instrument sounds, melodic and percussive. He did not have the necessary time to compose new cues for each picture, so he used the existing music for each film as a template from which to extemporize his own variations. In cases such as The Conqueror Worm, Schmidt's rescoring was disastrous; to rescore a 17th century historical drama with a late 20th century instrument was a betrayal to every effort the original film had made to remain true to its time frame. However, in the case of a futuristic film like Planet of the Vampires, the rescoring was not so disadvantageous; in fact, Schmidt's more traditional approach to film scoring gave the action scenes more energy than they had in their original form, and changed the whole dynamic of the film's electronic approach from ambient to musical. In essence, the new score gave Planet of the Vampires a greater sense of vitality, and the clarity of its production made the film seem almost contemporary—suddenly, it was possible to discern in this 1965 picture the musical influences of Vangelis and Tangerine Dream. Schmidt's rescoring was neither as brilliant nor as original as Marinuzzi's work, but it mainstreamed the picture in some ways; that said, like Les Baxter's rescoring of Black Sunday, it made the picture seem untrue to its own place in time.

At the end of the 20th century, after the Orion film library was acquired by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, a number of titles from the AIP collection—including Planet of the Vampires—were restored and digitally remastered for overseas television distribution and for domestic release on home video. In 2001, Planet of the Vampires was released to home video for the first time with its original score intact, and its digital remastering was of such outstanding quality that Marinuzzi's long-underrated contribution to the picture was suddenly much easier to appreciate. [18] Unfortunately, the composer did not live to witness the reemergence of his work: Gino Marinuzzi Jr. died in Rome on November 6, 1996, at the age of 76.



Release

Terrore nello spazio had its premiere in Rome in September, earning only 90 million lire [$56,000]—less than a third of what Mario Bava's most popular films (Gli invasori, for example) had earned in initial release. Fulvio Lucisano blamed its low earnings on its middle-aged star, Barry Sullivan. "I'm afraid to say that, if the picture had a younger actor like Mario wanted, it would have been a big success in Italy," he told Robert Skotak. "It did okay, but not enough to write home about. [Mario didn't make any more science fiction films] because it didn't do that well here." [19]

When Renato Pestriniero finally saw the film made from his short story, his reaction was favorable, if somewhat philosophical: "A movie and a story have very different languages, and I felt sure that some changes would be necessary. When I saw Terrore nello spazio, I could hardly recognize my story. Bava decided to avoid the 'inner space' and underline the horror component. At any rate, he did a good job. I liked it, and many favorable opinions were expressed by the critics and fans. Today, it is still considered one of the best Italian science fiction films, all the moreso because it is one of the few actually based on an authentic work of Italian science fiction."

AIP had originally intended Bava's film to be ready for a late summer drive-in release, but its initial production difficulties caused it to be postponed. Then, when the film performed poorly in Rome, AIP reevaluated their marketing plans for the picture, which was subjected to one final, desperate flurry of title changes. AIP's earliest publicity stills were stamped on the back with the title Planet of Blood (first announced in The Hollywood Reporter on July 20), which was eventually dropped in favor of the eventual US release title, Planet of the Vampires (first announced in the same publication on August 20). Not a company to let the expense of a Writers Guild of America title registration fee go to waste, AIP subsequently released Curtis Harrington's 1966 movie Queen of Blood to television as Planet of Blood, while Planet of the Vampires was included in the same syndication package newly renamed The Demon Planet—a phrase which showed up on AIP's theatrical poster art ("Are they beings of the Future or of the Past these 'men' who rule the DEMON PLANET?").

SPANISH poster for the post-STAR WARS reissue of 1978.

The American version was not rescored by Les Baxter, which may have had more to do with the film's delayed release than with AIP's actual liking for the Marinuzzi music. However, Bava's original cut was re-edited—primarily to assist the effectiveness of the English-language dub produced at Titra in New York. To give the voice artists adequate time in which to follow the dialogue script, sometimes cutaway shots had to be extended or inserted, thus upsetting the intended editing rhythms. Four instances of substantial footage were cut: (1) the interruption of Mark's ship log confession by Wess, walking across the room in bizarre, possessed, alien strides; (2) a high angle view of the dead Brent, wrapped in a polyethelyne shroud plastic and nestled in the ground before the metallic lid is lowered over his grave; (3) a short line of dialogue from the confrontation between Mark and the undead Salas; and (4) a shot, following Wess' destruction of the Argos' meteor rejector, showing him fall to the ground, fried by the explosion, his uniform in tatters from the explosion, and dying after a moment's hesitation. Each of these count among the most dramatic moments in an often dramatically stilted picture. [20]

Although Arkoff and Nicholson had earlier issued a press release vowing to abandon second features, it was decided at the last minute to play it safe by combining Planet with AIP's other new "A-picture," Daniel Haller's Die, Monster, Die!, starring Boris Karloff. The pairing was ballyhooed as an "All-New All-Color Horror Scope" double-bill, with both pictures trumpeted as being in "Colorscope," though of the two, only Die, Monster, Die! was lensed anamorphically. Terrore nello spazio was shot in a hard-matted 1.66:1 ratio, while the in-camera effects shots—photographed with Eugenio Bava's Mitchell camera—were hard-matted to 1.85, the intended release ratio. Relegated to the bottom tier of the program, in deference to horror king Karloff, Planet of the Vampires also suffered in its US incarnation by having its color processed at Pathé, reducing much of its original Technicolor luminosity.

The double feature scheme ultimately paid off, helped in large part by the fact that, in those days, drive-in theaters in many regions stayed open all year 'round, providing their patrons with in-car heaters. Of the twenty-two Los Angeles area theaters where the two films premiered on December 15, 1965, eight were drive-in venues. Ultimately—and this is very surprising considering the film's ongoing popular appeal—Planet of the Vampires' split income from 7,023 playdates amounted to no more than $251,000. AIP loved Mario Bava, but through no fault of his own, each of his films since Black Sunday had generated about half as much profit as the one before. It was a sign of dwindling interest in the horror genre itself, as the generation raised on Famous Monsters of Filmland magazine were now becoming adults and putting 18 The complete story of the MGM disc's restoration process can be read in Glenn Erickson's article "Restoring Mario Bava's Planet of the Vampires," which appeared in Video Watchdog 76, October 2001, 36–39.

19 Skotak.

20 The first and third of these instances would not be seen in America until the release of a restored version on DVD in August 2001; the other two shots exist only in the original Italian cut, which was briefly released on DVD in France by Studio Canal Video in November 2001, only to be quickly withdrawn from the market due to a rights snafu.

US half-sheet poster, art by Reynold Brown.

away childish things like scary movies. Roger Corman's boxoffice receipts reflected the same trend, which explains why 1965's The Tomb of Ligeia was the last of his Edgar Allan Poe films. In 1966, Corman would take the maturing age and interests of his audience into account with The Wild Angels, a harrowing account of revelry within the ranks of the Hell's Angels motorcycle club, starring Peter Fonda and Nancy Sinatra. Bava, as an Italian working for hire, had fewer options for survival at AIP; it was an uncomfortable situation, considering that AIP's five-year contract with Italian International was nearing its expiration. As Lucisano brainstormed with Arkoff and Nicholson about new properties that might be good candidates for producing on Italian soundstages, Planet of the Vampires went directly from theaters into television syndication, under the title The Demon Planet.

The unprofitable film was withheld from British release until the latter months of 1968, following close on the heels of the recently permitted La maschera del demonio (there retitled Revenge of the Vampire). The reviewer for Films & Filming, Richard Davis, couldn't help comparing the two: "Color in this context is less effective than black-and-white. And [Bava] is tied to a grossly synthetic studio set which doesn't for a moment convince us of its extraterrestrial reality. A planet inhabited by evil spirits who take over the bodies of spacemen seems to me a plot full of intriguingly imaginative possibilities . . . but the piece on the whole is poor stuff." [21]

The unsigned critic at Monthly Film Bulletin (likely Tom Milne) was more receptive: "This might be described as the triumph of mind over matter, or of Bava over a shoestring budget and appalling dubbed dialogue. Given little more to work on than a handful of wooden actors peering agitatedly at papier-maché rocks and muttering 'Quick! Let's get out of here!' (or, for variation, 'Let's get out of here quick!'), he does atmospheric wonders with pastel-shaded ground-fogs and cunning camerawork." [22]

Commentary

One of Mario Bava's most influential films, Terrore nello spazio shares much in common with his earlier Ercole al centro della terra. Both films are about characters who venture into utterly strange, unfathomable worlds where the shadows hold up mirrors to the phantasmagoria of their deepest fears. In both cases, Bava used these stories as an excuse to create, project, and explore phobic imagery with the intangibles that were his favorite tools: color, smoke, and illusion. With these few things, and the able assistance of Gino Marinuzzi Jr.'s electronic score and sound effects (which gives them substance), Bava devised one of the films that best embodies the essence of his particular genius—though it is, ultimately, not one of his finest works.

Both Ercole al centro della terra and Terrore nello spazio build to a final confrontation between the living and the dead, a literal struggle between life and death which dramatizes the tenuousness of one and the inevitability of the other. Terrore nello spazio was one of the first films to depict the living dead in a state of physical corruption—earlier films tended to say "zombie" by showing stiffly walking characters with dark circles painted under their eyes—and it was also one of the first to confront the most painful extensions of such a fantasy, particularly the ways in which our defenses are weakened as death claims those closest to us. Bava had already addressed this topic definitively in I tre volti della paura's "I wurdalak," in which the need for family finally proves stronger than the will to survive. Mark's discovery of his dead brother Toby among the enemy dead of the Galliot is not nearly so potent, yet it anticipates similar tensions that George A. Romero would address to more extreme effect in his horror classic Night of the Living Dead (1968)—in which an hysterical woman is trapped inside a barricaded farmhouse by a growing number of living dead, including her own brother.

Terrore nello spazio may dabble with these ideas, but it also abstracts them by keeping any real emotions at bay. It is an unusually dispassionate Bava film—so much so, it is tempting to imagine that the incendiary intensity of Sei donne per l'assassino left its director temporarily sated, though hardly at a low creative ebb. There are any number of reasons why Bava may have chosen to abstain here from a similar fever pitch, the major one being that he was working once again for AIP, who had previously discouraged him from depicting scenes of full-on, undiluted horror. It may also have been his deliberate, artistic choice to withhold as many human emotions from his characters as possible, to subtly underscore their true alien character. Another explanation is that he was simply disinclined; Terrore nello spazio was Bava's first extended opportunity since 1962 to immerse himself in the special effects photography that was his art, his play, and his therapy. He was also working for the first time with several new key crew members, which also had an impact on the way things panned out.

The first thing one notices about Terrore nello spazio, when approached in a chronological viewing of Bava's films, is that the sensuousness and elegance of camera movement which defined his earlier work is replaced here by a colder, more mechanical visual demeanor. This may have been partly a response to the material, but it was also Bava's first collaboration with cameraman Antonio Rinaldi, and the obvious differences in the handling of the camera reflect, to some extent, the departure of Ubaldo Terzano. In Rinaldi's charge, the camera is typically well-anchored throughout—excepting the odd lateral movement or tracking shot—framing the action and keeping everything at a formal distance, rather than providing the action itself or meeting it halfway. One of the more obvious traits of Rinaldi's style is a newly accentuated use of the zoom lens, which is not employed for the usual reasons—to save time and expense of setting up detail inserts or dolly shots—but to visually analogize the subjective experience of shock. For example, when Mark sees the dead body of his brother Toby, the camera zooms not into the dead face (as happened in some of Bava's earlier films), but away from it, then executes a mirroring zoom into Mark's shocked expression. Consequently, the zoom-out becomes the zoom-in.

To a degree, Rinaldi's visual approach may have been imposed on him by the spatial limitations of the sets, and also by the film's heavy reliance on in-camera special effects scenery. However, he would continue to employ something like this specific camera stance in all of his subsequent work for Bava, so we must accept it as a matter of personal style as well as an economic imperative. It may also have been a reflection of the ascending aesthetic of the time; in the mid-1960s, Italian films were cooling off across the board, the hot-bloodedness of Gina Lollobrigida and Sophia Loren giving way to Antonioni's ennui and the hyper-artifice of Fellini.

GERMAN half-sheet poster.

Terrore nello spazio also exerts a different feel due to Romana Fortini's particular approach to editing. Whereas Mario Serandrei had been an old-school craftsman of the editing table, Fortini was a young woman who took a more progressive, adventurous approach to her craft. In Terrore nello spazio, we see things that would be unimaginable in earlier Bava features: footage is speeded-up, slowed-down, and otherwise manipulated for sheer sensational effect. When fights break out aboard the Argos shortly after its landing on Aura, Mark rescues Sonya (who is being strangled by Brent) by kicking her attacker, and the kick is felt because Fortini removed the single frame of impact—a trick which editor Peter Hunt had begun to exploit in James Bond action sequences of this period. Later, when the dead body of Brent is discovered outside the Argos, the zoom into his ravaged face is edited, skipping one or two frames, thus propelling us toward the image of horror faster than even the most experienced filmgoer could anticipate. Bava must have been pleased with Fortini's work because she would continue to serve as his editor through Diabolik in 1968.

As adept at the job as she proved to be, Fortini was not the problem solver that Serandrei had been. Terrore nello spazio is plagued by some terrible gaffes that would never have eluded her distinguished predecessor. For example: in the early scene of the Argos communicating with the crew of the Galliot via "ionoscope," Captain Salas is played by a handsome, uncredited Italian or Spanish actor with dark hair, who has a terrible time speaking his English lines phonetically; in Salas' later appearances as one of the undead, the character is played by blonde, thin, nervous-looking Massimo Righi, who (with two earlier Bava performances to his credit) surely would have been the director's first choice. The only plausible explanations for this astonishing breach of continuity are that Righi was either unable, or declined, to complete his performance (for what it's worth, it would be the last time he worked for Bava), or that the first actor was so untalented that he had to be replaced, and the scene already filmed (which did include a large number of actors on-set) was too expensive to reshoot.

Serandrei would also surely have drawn Bava's attention to certain points of confusion inherent in the script, before it went in front of the camera. Disorientation sets in quite early, as Mark communicates with three other uniformed officers—Eldon, Tiona, and Kell (whom we never see again)—via his "ionosphere" screen. Because he addresses them via this long distance device, which he immediately uses thereafter to speak to Capt. Salas of the Galliot, we assume those other three to also be aboard the other vessel, causing some puzzlement when they later show up alive in scenes following the burial of the Galliot crew. Serandrei was the kind of editor who would have suggested that Bava introduce Eldon and Tiona interacting with Mark and the others in the same room, on the same geographic plane, for the sake of clarity, rather than via a television screen. Furthermore, the name of the mysterious planet that plays host to the film's events—Aura—is mentioned only once, buried amid much other futuristic jargon in an early conversation; as a result, a later single mention of "the Aurans" is easily mistaken for a reference to the dead alien race discovered by Mark and Sonya. Adding to one's initial perplexity are the Argos and Galliot themselves, which were scripted as twin ships for economic reasons, allowing the production to use the same model and set interiors for both. However, Rinaldi's failure to provide distinctive establishing shots for each craft makes it often impossible to tell geographically where anyone is, as the Argos crew venture perpetually back and forth from one ship to another.

21 Richard Davis, "Planet of the Vampires" review, Films & Filming 15:4, January 1969, 52.

22 "Terrore nello spazio (Planet of the Vampires)" review, Monthly Film Bulletin, Vol. 34, 1967, 204.

WESS, Mark, and Carter suit up for imminent war against unknown forces.

Nowhere else in the Bava canon do we get quite so many intimations of shots missing. The greatest oversights occur during and following the climactic battle, as we are prepared for pyrotechnics which never take place. Prior to the final showdown, there is a painstaking introduction of grenade-shaped plutonium "detonators," which are carried into battle but never thrown—and finally, there is no effects shot of the Galliot and its spectral crew being blown (as Wess says) "to smithereens." Instead, we get a close-up of a gloved hand setting an explosive timer and—after a bewildering interlude in which the Galliot crew (last seen trapped inside their doomed ship) is suddenly hot on the heels of their saboteurs—several immense flashes of light are shown bombarding the horizon. It isn't satisfying, and on a planet whose atmosphere has been demonstrated to be breathable, a fireball would not have been out of place.[23] emergency visit to the set wasn't enough to save it. It was ambitious of Bava to aim for a "triple-whammy"—(1) Mark and Sonya are possessed, (2) they were alien to begin with, and (3) they are about to invade our Earth—but it is not supported by the actions leading up to it. Nowhere during the climactic scuffle are Mark or Sonya given opportunity to die or lose consciousness, nor are they offscreen long enough for these eventualities to occur without us knowing. (A later line of dialogue was introduced, stating that "All you have to do is want it," but this explanation also would not apply to either of them.) Since Mark and Sonya, and even Wess, are ultimately revealed to be of extraterrestrial origin—not specifically Martian, as in the script—the weirdly obvious "cat-and-mouse" games following the ship's take-off serve no real purpose, other than to make Wess rebel against his companions by destroying the meteor rejector. Yet even this aspect is gratuitous, given the fact that—in a dialogue scene just before the sabotaging of the Galliot—Mark informs Wess that there won't be enough time to install the meteor rejector before take-off. The finale would have been just as effective—and perhaps moreso, in its greater simplicity—had the surviving Argos crew fled into space unprotected, been faced with an approaching meteor shower, and thus forced to make an emergency landing on the nearest planet: Earth. The only reason to eliminate Wess, under the circumstances, is to arrive at the twosome necessary for the rejected "Adam and Eve" ending.

As for the much-revised "sting-in-the-tail" finale, Ib Melchior's

WESS discovers that Sonya and Mark are possessed by Auran spirits bent on colonizing other planets in the surprise finale.

Despite its jumbled and overcompensatory qualities, the ending nevertheless packs a certain frisson, especially when one regards Terrore nello spazio in its historical context. In 1965, science fiction was still largely a genre of optimism, about the triumph of imagination over adversity. After the cataclysmic devastation at Hiroshima and Nagasaki in 1945, the Japanese used the genre to purge some of their national feelings about life after the Bomb in Ishiro Honda's Gojira/Godzilla, King of the Monsters! (1954), which ended in victory but left the victors too benumbed by personal and national losses to feel truly victorious. In the meantime, American and British science fiction films held onto their happy endings, although the main thrust of many such movies during this period was a growing sense of alienation from our loved ones (Invaders From Mars, 1953), ourselves (Invasion of the Body Snatchers, 1956[24]), and our governments and other institutions (Quatermass 2, 1957). Other key influences on the darkening of science fiction cinema were the twist endings of several sci-fi-oriented episodes of Rod Serling's successful television series, The Twilight Zone (1959–65), and the arrival of "near future" cautionary tales such as Fail-Safe (1964).

Terrore nello spazio differs from these other examples in that it has no social statement to make, no political axe to grind; it simply points out, as Bava's films are wont to do, that we have taken appearances for granted and have been thoroughly deceived by what we thought we saw. The effectiveness of the finale has nothing to do with the revelation of Mark and Sonya's possession, which is painted in the broadest strokes possible with Sullivan smirking like a Siamese cat and Bengell glowering at the ship's viewfinder like a zombie; it has everything to do with what this twist implies: that we have spent the entire running time of the picture, without knowing it, becoming "attached" to the plight of alien beings

EUROPEAN versions of the film follow Wess' ultimate self-sacrifice with a close shot of his death not found in the American version.

23 Still other faults assert themselves in the American version, which are rooted in the dubbing track recorded at Titra in New York City. Dr. Karen is sometimes called "Dr. Curran," a character introduced as "Doral" is later called "Derek," and during the scene of Mark and Sonya taking leave to sabotage the Galliot, the supporting character Brent has a line of dialogue dubbed by a voice actor not assigned to him in other scenes—Peter Fernandez, who dubs the voice of Angel Aranda throughout.

24 Director Don Siegel had dared to film a downbeat ending for Invasion of the Body Snatchers, with star Kevin McCarthy staring into camera and shouting "You're next!" However, a studio "pod" intervened, forcing Siegel to add another scene showing that McCarthy's hysterical warnings of the invasion were finally taken seriously by the authorities, and leaving the audience with a secure sense that the military would take the necessary steps to contain it. At the time, audiences had no reason to suspect the military might not be victorious at any task they addressed.

who are no closer to what we are than the disembodied forces which ultimately took possession of them. What we have in common with the crew of the Argos, what enables us to mistake them as human, is the fear they experience when confronting the Unknown.

The core theme of Terrore nello spazio is the universality of fear. As a theme, it is wholly Bava's, having no basis in Renato Pestriniero's short story (which is truly about an Earth crew) or in any draft of Ib Melchior's screenplay. The planet Aura is depicted as a vast, suggestive nothing, a Rorschach blot onto which its visitors may project their own superstitions and insecurities. Alone in his cabin, Mark is shown making the following voice recording into the ship's log:

"A captain should not be afraid. And I confess now—to whomever may hear this—that today . . . now . . . I am experiencing fear. I must not let my crew know this. I must keep them busy. I must not let them know that the situation appears more hopeless with each passing day. Dictated by Capt. Mark Markary of the spaceship Argos, on the planet Aura, in the year . . ."

He is cleverly prevented from revealing the annum observed by his unearthly kind by the sudden entry of Wess, but the scene has already fulfilled its function, planting a seed that will flower later, during the scene inside the derelict spacecraft. Inside this pitted wreckage, Mark and Sonya discover the gigantic skeletal remains of a race of alien astronauts, one of them seated at the still-active controls of a bewildering, otherworldly technology. While examining these unfathomable artifacts, Mark accidentally activates something, which fills the chamber with the droning of a deep, groggy, alien language. The light pulsations of the device, throbbing in perfect rhythm with sounds, recall the strobing of Mark's own electronic log device, prompting an important parallel to be drawn. Might this enormous skeleton—when it was a fully fleshed, living being—have also recorded a confession of its fears, its own sense of dread, its intimations of mortality, as it and its crew found themselves stranded and alone on this alien planet? This sequence would have been extraordinary had it done nothing more than to consider such expansive concepts as alien language and technology within its budgetary constraints, but to also use the opportunity to slyly reflect the emotions voiced by Mark in the previous scene—to imbue these ancient bones with such tragic emotion—shows a tender, sympathetic sense that runs counter to the kind of misanthropy that some critics have detected in Bava's work. With little more at his disposal than a flashing light, Bava bonds two alien civilizations (and our own) with a common thread of terror.

In terms of imagery, Terrore nello spazio finds Bava working at the near-peak of his powers, and there are several sequences outstanding in his oeuvre: the dread exteriors of the alien planet, like none other filmed before or since; the resurrection of the dead Galliot crew, rising from their graves and tearing off their clear plastic shrouds in slow motion; and best of all, the sequence inside the derelict alien ship, which culminates in Mark and Sonya's fight for survival after triggering a device that sucks out all the oxygen in the chamber through a menacing vent in the wall. Many years later, while working on Dario Argento's 1980 film Inferno, Bava would add similar pick-up shots of infernal vents to a sequence in which Leigh McCloskey is overwhelmed by harmful, demonic smells through an identical vent in the wall of an apartment building run by witches.

Finally, it must be noted that Terrore nello spazio contains a troubling moment in which Bava, in effect, quotes himself. As Capt. Salas is questioned by Mark, his uniform briefly opens to flash a putrescent torso—a reprise of a shock effect that occurs late in La maschera del demonio. There are earlier instances in Bava's oeuvre of recurring images, or even recurring sequences of images, as in the case of the similar deathbed scenes in La ragazza che sapeva troppo and I tre volti della paura's "La goccia d'acqua," which curiously share the touchstones of the staring face, the mewing cats, and the spilled water. In a sense, the shock effect shared by La maschera del demonio and Terrore nello spazio is more at home in its second setting, because it was gratuitously used in the former; it's an effective jolt, but on close consideration, it doesn't make sense for Princess Asa to be only partly restored after draining her descendant Katia of her youth. However, because Terrore nello spazio is not a film of equal caliber, the shot hazards an impression that Bava's work had not conveyed till now, that the Maestro might be starting to run out of ideas.

MEXICAN lobby card shows members of the Argos crew comforting Tiona after her encounter with the alien phenomena of planet Aura.

Influences

With Terrore nello spazio, Bava achieved a rare, wholly successful fusion of horror and science fiction—using imagery borrowed from his earlier peplum pictures—that would prove lastingly influential, thanks to the tremendous international success of one film it directly influenced: Ridley Scott's Alien.

Scott has never acknowledged a conscious debt to Bava's film—or to Edward L. Cahn's It! The Terror From Beyond Space (1958), to which it is also often compared—and it is quite possible that he never saw either movie, and that the debt was actually manifest in the original script by American film buffs Dan O'Bannon and Ronald Shusett. From a directorial perspective, Alien and Terrore nello spazio are quite different, Bava's film being extravagantly stylized pulp fantasy and Scott's being more realistic in terms of its dialogue (much of which was improvised onset) and meticulous attention to detail. What the two films share in common, specifically—besides the obvious scenes chronicling the discovery and exploration of a wrecked alien spacecraft, and perhaps the surprise revelation that one crew member is not human—is the use of an unexplored alien world as a substitute for the traditional haunted house. In Bava's hands, the haunted house is a pseudo-Nietzschean realm in which his characters peer into an abyss only to have it peer back into them. In Alien, the haunted house metaphor becomes more literal; Scott's alien planet is a treacherous place of hostile weather, trap doors, and jack-in-the-box threats, whose rules we don't know and where anything can happen. There is one concrete Bava connection, in that the alien lifeforms depicted in the film were mechanical constructs built by Bava's frequent collaborator Carlo Rambaldi, who based them on designs by the Swiss conceptual artist H. R. Giger. It isn't known whether Bava saw Scott's film, but his grandson Roy remembers seeing him read a copy of Alan Dean Foster's novelization. One can't help wondering if he noticed any similarities in the book to his own work.

FRENCH video art acknowledges Bava's film's influence on Ridly Scott's ALIEN while retitling the picture and crediting Bava with a pseudonym never associated with it!

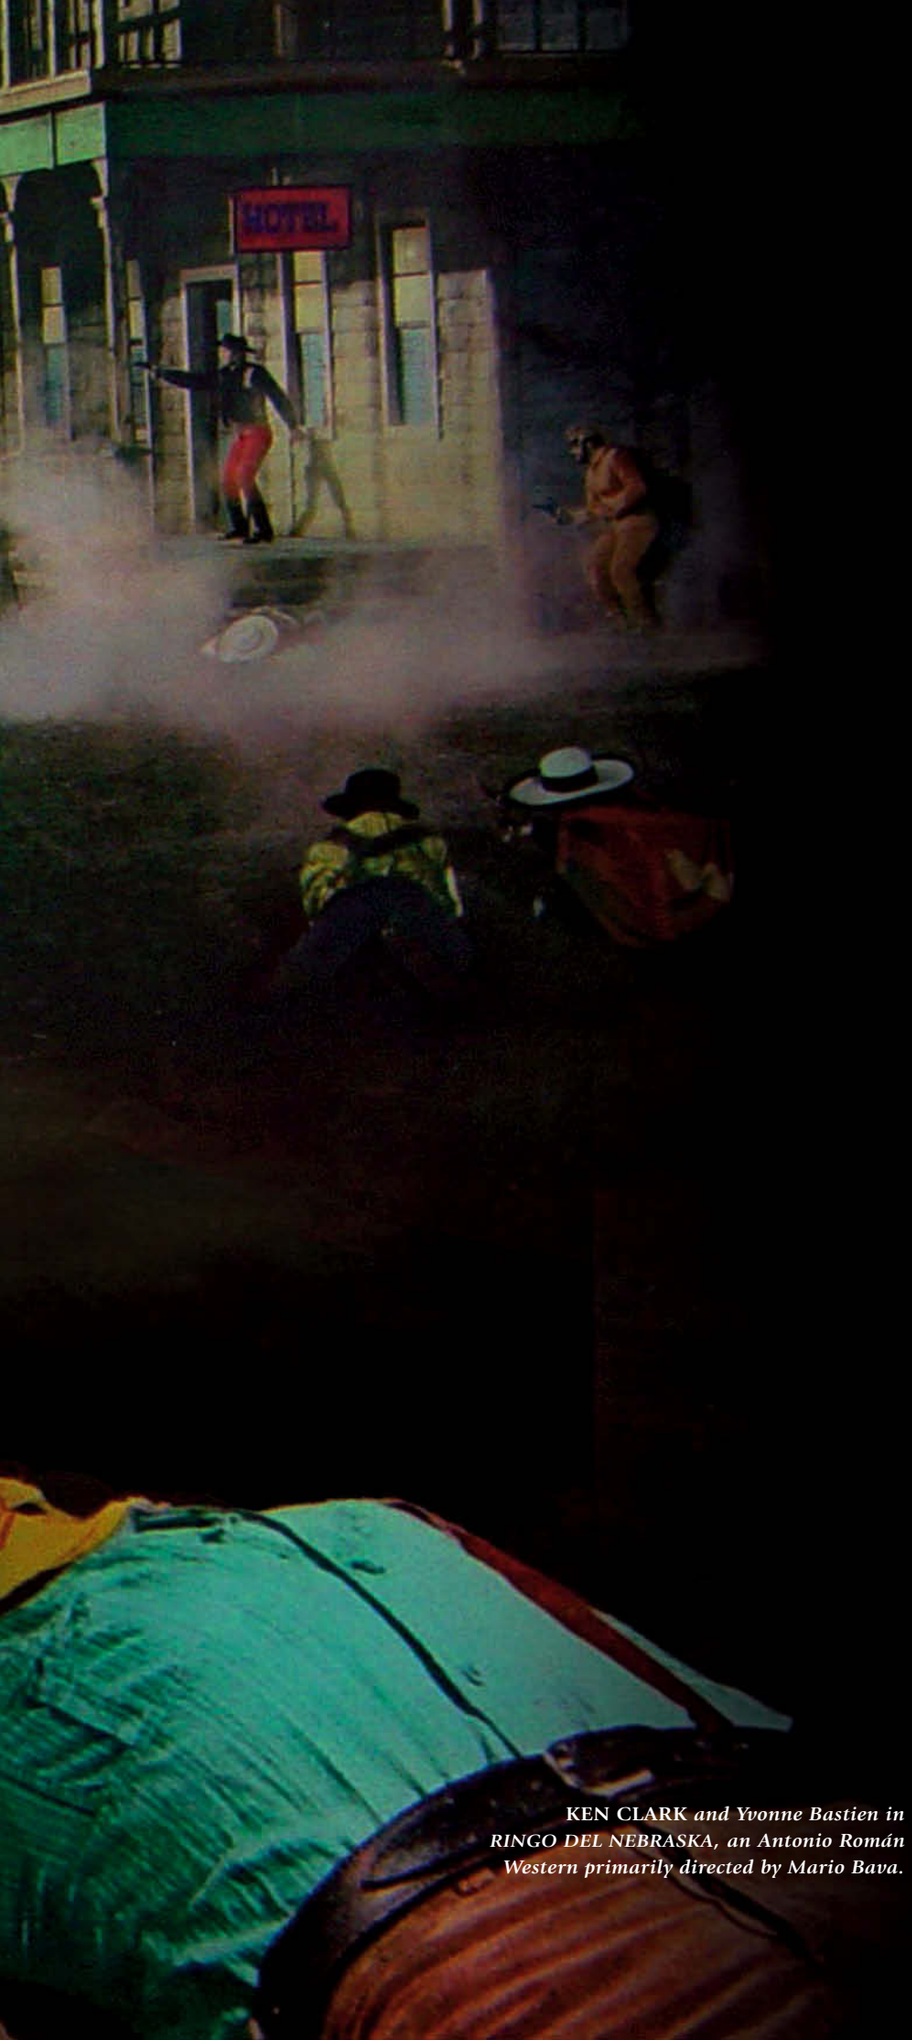
Alien was an enormous boxoffice success all over the world, and following its release, numerous imitations went into production. The Italians struck first, beginning with Ciro Ippolito's Alien 2 sulla terra and Luigi Cozzi's Contaminazione/Alien Contamination (both 1980). Fulvio Lucisano was also moved to reissue Terrore nello spazio theatrically, printing up new skull-faced posters that retitled the film Alien e Terrore nello spazio, the word "Alien" appearing in an identical font to that of the 20th Century-Fox release. Meanwhile in America, Roger Corman produced two knock-offs that were released and re-released between 1980 and 1982 under various titles: Mindwarp: An Infinity of Terror/Planet of Horrors/Galaxy of Terror (1981) and Mutant/Forbidden World (1982). They may not have been so brazen as to incorporate the word "Alien" in their titles, but they were unashamed in their incorporation of aspects of Giger and Rambaldi's creation in their monsters. The trend continued for a surprisingly long time, before finally petering out with William Malone's Creature/Titan Find (1985)—made just before James Cameron brought the profits back home with the first of three official sequels, 1986's Aliens.

Postscript



Today, Renato Pestriniero is proud of the cult reputation of Terrore nello spazio, which has resulted in continuing interest in his original short story, "Una notte di 21 ore." Pestriniero had other close encounters with the cinema after his fateful $105 sale to Mario Bava, but none of them reached fruition. In the mid-1980s, following the success of Aliens, he was invited by a producer to write a new screenplay, a remake of Terrore nello spazio that would be more faithful to his original story.

"Unfortunately, no movie was realized," he says, "but I later used the material for a novelette—Né Ariel né Calibano, published in 1986—which represents a sequel to 'Una notte di 21 ore.'" The title translates as "Not Ariel nor Caliban," a reference to characters in William Shakespeare's play The Tempest . . . the unlikely literary basis of Forbidden Planet.

In the early 1990s, an even more tantalizing opportunity came Pestriniero's way—in the form of a telephone call from Federico Fellini. The great director was looking for material, and he flabbergasted the author by expressing a wish to read everything he had ever written! "Fellini had the intention of making a science fiction film," Pestriniero sighs, "but, unfortunately, he died [in 1993] . . . so the project remained a dream."

But, thanks to Terrore nello spazio and Mario Bava's early recognition of his talent, Renato Pestriniero will always remain a seminal figure of Italian science fiction cinema.

HOTEL

KEN CLARK and Yvonne Bastien in RINGO DEL NEBRASKA, an Antonio Román Western primarily directed by Mario Bava.

RINGO DEL NEBRASKA

Savage Gringo

AFTER COMPLETING Terrore nello spazio, Bava's interest apparently returned to the giallo. No film from 1965 or even 1966 survives to attest to this fact, but a two-color advertisement was placed in an Italian industry publication, Giornale dello spettacolo, hoping to drum up interest in another decorative body count thriller.

ITALIAN reissue locandina.

The film was to be called 12 bambole biondo ("12 Blonde Dolls"), and the ad describes it as a venture between Bava, actor-turned-producer Ulderico Sciarretta, and Sciarretta's production company, Eco Film. The advertisement asks: "Who killed Gino? Who killed Linda? Who killed Paolo? Who killed Romolo? Who killed Raymondo? Who killed Emerson? When these questions are asked, Inspector Klem will answer them!" (Apparently most of the "12 Blonde Dolls" were to be men!) What is interesting about the ad—which goes on to promise "not just a Super Giallo, but a Colossal Giallo"—is that it says absolutely nothing about Bava's Sei donne per l'assassino, a film that was released all around the world. Instead, it proclaims that 12 bambole biondo "follows the grand success of Crimine a due," Sciarretta's first and only film as a producer, which was issued earlier in 1965 and apparently released nowhere outside Italy. Nothing came of the advertisement, and Bava and Sciarretta never worked together. Their venture had the misfortune of bad timing: in 1965, Italian audiences were crazy for Westerns, not thrillers.

Though it would be two years before United Artists released it in America as A Fistful of Dollars, the European response to Sergio Leone's Per un pugno di dollari was immediate: it made a fortune. Consequently, a number of homeless Italian scripts written in response to the popular Karl May Westerns from West Germany were immediately adopted and put into production. Unlike Leone's anti-heroic "Man With No Name" (played by Clint Eastwood), his imitators were quick to name their heroes, identifying them in the titles of their films, à la Old Shatterhand. There was Sergio Corbucci's Django (named for the nimble-fingered jazz guitarist Django Reinhardt), Sartana (an invention of screenwriter Ernesto Gastaldi), and Ringo—to name only a few.

The "Ringo" films were the brainchild of writer–director Duccio Tessari, who had the idea of taking the star

Ringo del Nebraska

"Ringo from Nebraska"
Working title: Nebraska il pistolero, "Nebraska the Gunman"
Filmed at Elios Film Studios (Rome), Ballesteros (Madrid), and on location in Spain
October 4 – November 1965
First released: March 18, 1966,
Eastmancolor, "Widescreenscope," 1.85:1, 91 minutes

Production: Italian International Film (Rome), Castilla Cooperativa Cinematográfica (Madrid). Producer: Fulvio Lucisano. Director: Antonio Román, [and Mario Bava, uncredited]. Assistant directors: Lamberto Bava, Manuel De la Regilia. Screenplay: Jesús Navarro Carrión, Antonio Román, Adriano Bolzoni. Additional dialogue (Italy): Grazi Benedetti. Director of photography: Guglielmo Mancori. Art direction: Gastone Carsetti, Augusto J. Lega. Editors: Renato Cinquini, Antonio Jimeno, assisted by Romana Fortini. Music: Nino Oliviero, conducted by Robby Poitevin [CAM]. "Quando se muere el sol" by Oliviero/Martinez, sung by Vittorio Bezzi. Distributor: Regionale.

Ken Clark (Nebraska/Ringo), Yvonne Bastien (Kay), Peter Carter, Piero Lulli (Bill Carter), Charles K. Lawrence, [Livio Lorenzon] (Marty Hillman), Red Ross [Renato Rossini] (Felton), Alfonso Rojas, Anthony Gradwell [Antonio Gradoli], Paco Sanz, Renato Terra, Angel Ortiz, Losé Canalejas, Frank [Francisco] Braña (Dixon).

Belgium: De Dollars van Nebraska, Rank Organization, Eastmancolor/Scope
France: Les Dollars du Nebraska, Rank Organization, 12/10/67
Germany: Nebraska Jim, Pallas Film–NWDF–Unitas, 12/6/66, 83m
Italian reissue: Preparati a morire, Ringo del Nebraska c'è Sartana, "Prepare to Die, Ringo of Nebraska, I am Sartana," 1970
Spain: *El Rancho Maldito, "*The Ranch of the Damned," Columbus Film, 12/2/68, 82m
US: Savage Gringo, AIP-TV, 1966

(Giuliano Gemma) and tongue-in-cheek attitude of his earlier peplum Arrivano i titani/My Son the Hero (1961) and adapting them to a Western format. The name of the character, which dates back to John Wayne's Ringo Kid in Stagecoach (1939), had come back into vogue with the hit single "Ringo," a spoken-word recording by Canadian actor Lorne Greene (1915–87), star of the popular, long-running NBC-TV series Bonanza. The 1964 release told the story of a legendary gunfighter and his final showdown with the lawman responsible for once saving his life. Greene's rich, resonant voice—simply accompanied by a strummed acoustic guitar, finger cymbals, a male chorus, and a rising crescendo of brass at the moment of truth—combined with the manly irony of the story to touch the same nerve that Leone's film (and Ennio Morricone's now-legendary score) had touched. The song was not only a surprise #1 hit on American AM radio stations, but also in Canada and Europe, where a still more potent, alternate French language version was released. Tessari took advantage of the record's surprise success by reviving the name for a series of new Italian/Spanish co-productions. Another impetus may well have been that Ford's Stagecoach was in the process of being remade around this time (c. 1965 or '66), with Alex Cord as the Ringo Kid. [1]

The result was the popular Una pistola per Ringo/A Pistol for Ringo, which was promptly followed by a sequel, Il ritorno di Ringo/The Return of Ringo (also '65), which reunited the charismatic Gemma (billed as "Montgomery Wood") with original co-stars Lorella de Luca, Fernando Sancho and Antonio Cases—in different roles. The "Ringo" films would become a phenomenon of sorts: between 1965 and 1972, nearly thirty films were produced with the name "Ringo" in the title; some of the titles were direct descendants, but most were unrelated Euro Westerns gratuitously renamed to plunder Tessari's pot of gold.

One of the earliest projects to co-opt the "Ringo" name was Fulvio Lucisano's next production, Ringo del Nebraska, which was co-produced once again with Antonio Román's Castilla Cooperativa Cinematográfica—this time with Román directing. Born in Ourense, Spain, on November 9, 1911, Antonio Román had been directing films since the late '30s, starting with documentaries. He directed his first dramatic feature, Esquadrilla, in 1941. His career included a 1944 version of Lola Montes (preceding the celebrated film of Max Ophuls by eleven years) and La Fierecilla domada (1955), a retelling of William Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew. In recent years, all of his films starred his actress wife, Yvonne Bastien. Ringo del Nebraska originated as an original screenplay co-authored by Román and Jesús Navarro Carrión. [2]

Román was set to direct the picture (then called Nebraska il pistolero), but after a few days of shooting in the mountainous regions of La Pedriza, north of Madrid near Manzanares de Real (where scenes for Minnesota Clay had been filmed), Lucisano felt that he "wasn't working out" and shut down the production. Returning to Rome, Lucisano asked Mario Bava if he would consider taking over the picture as director. Bava agreed—as long as he could finish it in Rome. Since the majority of the cast was Italian to begin with, this was not a problem, and the film was completed at Elios Film Studios in Rome. The finished picture would carry only the original contracted credits, including a primarily Spanish crew, but as Lucisano now reveals, "To be frank with you, [Bava] directed the greater part of the picture."

The extent of Bava's involvement in the direction has been recently called into question by two quotes appearing in the Italian magazine Nocturno, from Lamberto Bava and actor "Red Ross" a.k.a. Renato Rossini. As Rossini notes: "I know this film very well, but I really can't remember Mario Bava involved in it. The director was a Spaniard, Antonio Román, a rather old man, a tall one. Lucisano was the producer and the film starred Ken Clark, Piero Lulli and Antonio Gradoli. The girl, Yvonne Bastien, was the director's wife. We shot it almost entirely in Spain. I was on the set from the first to the last day, but I really can't remember Mario Bava there . . ."

Rossini continued to emphasize that his memory was good and that he knew perfectly well who Bava was: "I met Bava when I was doing Francisci's pepla, for which he was the cameraman, and then also in La battaglia di Maratona, although I was just an extra in that. Then we did a giallo together, shot in Tor Caldara and Lavinio, 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto. He was really a gentleman on the set; the last gentleman of the Italian cinema."

As Lamberto Bava remembers, "Lucisano called my father to do something, mattes and things like that, and I went with him in Spain. Tony Román, the Spanish director, was a pleasant gentleman. I remember that my father and I were in stitches as we watched him shooting, because he always approved the first take. Otherwise, he reasoned, 'se mecaniza'—it becomes mechanical. In other words, you risked shooting the same scene twenty times because you might never be satisfied.

NEBRASKA (Ken Clark) proves himself adept with a gun.

1 Other Ringos worth mentioning: Gregory Peck played Jimmy Ringo in Henry King's The Gunfighter (1950); there was a short-lived TV series, Johnny Ringo, starring Don Durand and Mark Goddard, that ran for thirty-eight episodes from 1959–1960; and, this same year (1965), The Beatles responded to the zeitgeist by releasing their only country-western single, "Act Naturally," with drummer Ringo Starr on vocals.

2 Carrión was one of the first screenwriters to specialize in the new field of Euro Westerns. His name appears on two earlier Westerns co-produced in Italy: Joaquin Luís Romero Marchant's El Sabor de la Venganza/Gunfight at High Noon (1963) and Primo Zeglio's I due violenti/Texas Ranger (1964)—both of which were co-written by I tre volti della paura's Marcello Fondata.

And so, for him, the first take was always the best."

Lamberto's quote does not really contradict Lucisano's account, so much as it explains how Bava became involved in the production. It also needs pointing out that Rossini's role in Ringo del Nebraska would not have required him to be present on-set for every day of the production. It is possible that Román shot Rossini's role in its entirety, and that Bava maintained a low profile on the set, especially where the Italian actors were concerned, out of respect for Román's territory. Román's "easy to please" methods were perhaps one of the reasons why Lucisano opted to replace him, or possibly he wanted to move the production back to Rome for financial considerations once he had satisfied the terms for this Spanish-Italian co-production and gotten the location shooting out of the way. Lamberto Bava is credited onscreen as one of the film's two assistant directors, which would not have happened had the film been entirely shot under Román's direction in Spain.

The problems that prevented Román from directing Ringo del Nebraska also evidently plagued him on his subsequent picture, Trappola per sette spie ("Trap for Seven Spies," 1967), which was ultimately taken over by director Mario Amendola. Fulvio Lucisano faithfully kept the secret of Román's replacement until after the director's death, which occurred in Madrid on June 16, 1989.

ITALIAN reissue fotobusta.

THE DASTARDLY Bill Carter (Piero Lulli, left) gets his comeuppance at Nebraska's hands after his attempt to defile Kay (Yvonne Bastien).

Synopsis

Beltan, New Mexico, the 1870s. Donato, a herdsman working for ranch baron Marty Hillman, is strumming his guitar while leading cattle to Laredo when he is shot dead by three masked gunmen. The assassins are confederates of the dastardly Bill Carter, an outlaw who covets Hillman's property—and his wife. Carter has cleverly provided his gunmen with an alibi by giving them horses owned by three other men, all of whom were plainly visible at the town saloon at the time of the murder.

Hillman returns home to find his wife, Kay, packing a trunk to leave him. He slaps her into submission. Their argument reveals that they are not actually married, but pretending to be, to protect her from Bill Carter. Hillman—whose workers have fled his employ, for fear of Carter—practices his shooting on a row of strung-up cans, and proves himself a competent marksman. As he prepares to get a closer look at the cans, the entire queue is shot down by a drifter who introduces himself as Nebraska: "Just a man ridin' a horse . . . from Nebraska."[3] Impressed by his shooting, Hillman hires Nebraska as a herdsman—and as protection.

KAY holds Carter and his gang at bay with a loaded rifle.

After dinner, Hillman worries that Donato has not returned from his cattle drive. He and Nebraska ride into town to investigate. Halfway there, they discover Donato's bullet-riddled body. After studying the markings on the ground, Nebraska deduces that there were three gunmen who took the southern trail, shot Donato, scattered the herd, and rode off in another direction—the direction leading back to town. After taking Donato's body back to the ranch for burial, Hillman and Nebraska double back to the local saloon, where Carter and his men are sitting with the town's lawman, Sheriff Burke, who is so intimidated by Carter that he's become a pitiable alcoholic. Hillman accuses Carter of killing Donato and, in vicious response, the villain draws a gun in which Nebraska shoots out of his hand. The noble stranger explains in patient detail how the killing was accomplished. Pushed into action, the Sheriff timidly insists that Carter's men hand over their guns ("It's best to avoid trouble," he says, trembling) and come along to the jail until things are cleared up. In parting, he promises Hillman that he will visit the ranch the following morning. Carter, exonerated by witnesses to his presence in the bar, remains free.

Nebraska calmly walks over to the town doctor, who is playing a game of chess with himself, and with one well-considered move, puts him in check. The doctor is impressed: "I've been working here all my life and I've never met a chess player before!" Sidling up to the bar, Nebraska is offered a free drink and he orders milk. Carter picks a fight with him, and the saloon is soon wrecked by their violence. Carter slashes Nebraska's chest with a broken bottle, but Nebraska wins the fight. Carter openly threatens Burke and Hillman as he departs. As the bartender prepares to pour Nebraska another glass of milk, he orders whiskey instead.

WITH NEBRASKA far away, Bill Carter makes unwelcome advances to Marty Hillman's widow, Kay.

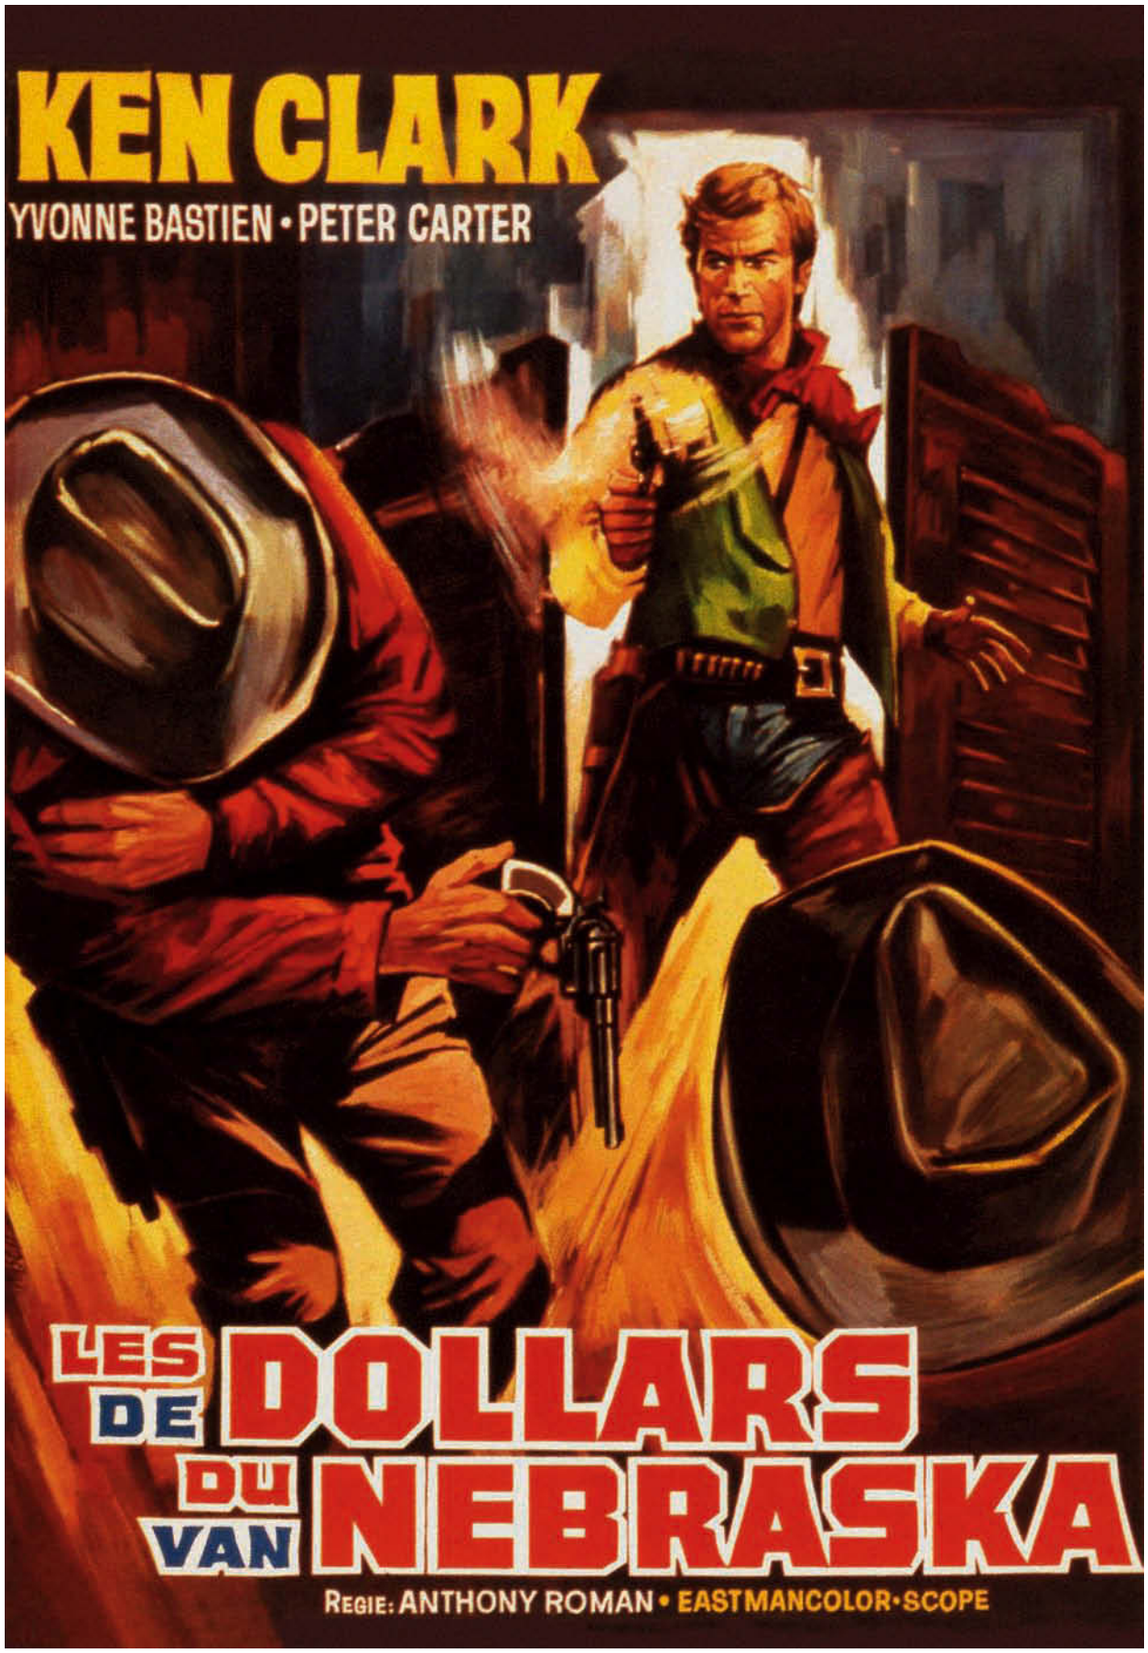
3 In the Italian version, his name is "Ringo, from Nebraska," while the German version names him "Nebraska Jim."



The next morning, Sheriff Burke is shot in the back by Carter and his men, shortly after arranging their release from jail. Meanwhile, at the ranch, Kay finds herself becoming attracted to the handsome stranger. Over breakfast, she tells Nebraska that she and Hillman are not really married, and that the ruse was meant to deter Carter's interest: "He thinks of me like a prize he might win in a shooting gallery," she explains. Concerned about Burke's non-arrival ("He may drink too much, but he always keeps his promises"), Hillman and Nebraska ride toward town and are ambushed by Carter's gunmen in the mountains. They shoot Nebraska's horse in the chest and Hillman in the throat. Nebraska takes the wounded cattle baron back to the ranch, where Kay cares for him, after sending their worker Manuel in search of the doctor.

Carter arranges for Sheriff Burke's corpse to be escorted back to town by his own gunmen, telling them that he was killed by Nebraska and Hillman for releasing them from jail. Bad weather floods the river, making it impossible for Manuel and the doctor to get back to the ranch. Nebraska decides to take matters in hand. He rides into the mountains, where two of Carter's men find his sleeping form and fire bullets into it. It's just a dummy, though, and the real Nebraska returns their fire with more fatal results. Elsewhere, he finds two other gunmen eating around a campfire and taunting some starving children with their food. Nebraska shoots the gun out of one man's hand, and shoots part of the other man's ear off—promising worse unless they admit Carter's responsibility for the murders.

Back at the saloon, Nebraska looks for the last of Carter's gunmen, a man named Van Hollander—who tries to shoot the hero, but again, has the weapon shot out of his hand. In great pain, Van Hollander confesses to the bartender—who has been named the town's new sheriff—that Carter was the mastermind behind all the murders. Another of Carter's men, Dixon, is present at the confession and sneaks away to inform his boss.

ITALIAN reissue due-foglia.

At the ranch, the doctor finally arrives—but only in time to declare Hillman dead. Left alone together with the corpse, Kay makes an overt pass at Nebraska, who decides to leave—in order for Carter to make his next move easily against the ranch. It isn't long before Carter and two gunmen—Felton and Dixon—descend on the ranch to bully Hillman into surrendering $50,000 hidden somewhere on his property. Finding Hillman dead, Carter orders his men to ransack the house until they find the cash. While Felton and Dixon are thus occupied, Carter tries to force himself on Kay, but she fights him off. Carter reasons with her to forget her romantic thoughts about Nebraska, asking her how he would feel if he ever learned that she was the daughter of Duke Kramer—"the most bloodthirsty bank robber in New Mexico"—or that Marty Hillman was actually Marty Baumann ("a murderer") or that she herself had helped to rob banks in El Paso. The questions are left unanswered by the discovery of the stolen $50,000 in one of Marty's boots.

Unbeknownst to them all, Nebraska has entered the ranch house through the bedroom window and concealed himself under the sheet beside Hillman's corpse. He manages to shoot Felton and Dixon and has a lengthy fistfight with Carter, ending in the villain's death. Kay is upset that Nebraska has learned her secrets and pleads with him to overlook her past. He makes his regrets to her, and she collapses in tears. Nebraska turns the boot with the stolen cash over to the sheriff, as he arrives with some rather late-in-coming help.

One of the sheriff's men comes out of the house, reporting four bodies—Marty's, Carter's, and those of the two gunmen. "It's going to be an expensive funeral," he says.

"Never mind," laughs the sheriff, eyeing the boot. "We can afford it!"

Cast

Unless some roles had to be recast when the production relocated to Rome, Mario Bava had nothing to do with the casting of Ringo del Nebraska. He had worked previously with both

BELGIAN affiche.

NEBRASKA*'s timely return places Bill Carter at a disadvantage, but Kay finds her needs rejected as well.*

Ken Clark (his hero in La strada per Fort Alamo) and Piero Lulli (who figured in some of the additional scenes he had directed for Giacomo Gentilomo's L'ultimo dei vichinghi in 1961), so one imagines he was fairly pleased with the actors he inherited from Román.

Ringo del Nebraska would provide the last decent starring role for Ohio-born Ken Clark, whose true standing in the world of cinema at the time can be gauged by the fact that he was being top-billed in subsequent Italian films like Sergio Grieco's Rapporto Fuller, base Stoccolma (1967) and Guido Malatesta's Tarzana, sesso selvaggio/Tarzana the Wild Girl (1969) at roughly the same time he was doing nearly anonymous walk-ons in "real" Hollywood films like Mike Nichols' Catch-22 (1970), in which he plays the nondescript MP who arrests Alan Arkin's Yossarian.

Piero Lulli, cast as the villainous Bill Carter, was born in Florence on February 1, 1923. The younger brother of Folco Lulli, an actor and personal friend of Bava's who had played the chief villain in Gli invasori, Piero was a superb actor and stunt man in his own right. Much of the dramatic success of Ringo del Nebraska is due to his steely-eyed, lupine presence. Clad entirely in black, with a leather jacket and neckerchief, he is the true power in town; he knows it and flaunts it, waiting in the sheriff's office for the release of his men with his feet on the lawman's desk. One can't help thinking, watching him in this movie, that he would have made a magnificent Javutich, had Arturo Dominici not been available for La maschera del demonio.

The role of Kay was played by Argentinian singer–actress Yvonne Bastien, whose previous four films—Me mujer mi gusta más (1961), El Sol en el Espejo (1962), Pacto de Silencio (1963), and Un Tiro por la Espalda (1964)—had all been directed by her husband, Antonio Román. (Pacto de Silencio was in fact a remake of a 1949 film of the same name, also written and directed by Román.) Making the film must have been a trying situation for her—acting in a role written for her by her husband, who was removed from the film as director—because it mirrored, in a way, Kay's own situation of sharing quarters with a man who was not her husband. The red-haired Bastien bears a strong resemblance to Jany Clair, Clark's co-star in some of his earlier Westerns, including La strada per Fort Alamo. Unfortunately, the role of Kay does not give her an opportunity to demonstrate her range; she spends the entire picture either distraught or aroused, and is too aggressive to be a likeable heroine.

Commentary

Mario Bava stepped in as director of Ringo del Nebraska after all of the film's preparatory work had been done by others. In judging it, we must therefore bear in mind that it was cast and designed without Bava's creative input, that he was placed with little advance notice at the helm of a largely unfamiliar crew, and that some of the shooting took place—uncomfortably for Bava—outside of Rome. The film doesn't often look like Bava's work, because it would have been intrusive of him to impose his visual ideas on the film's director of photography, Guglielmo Mancori—the son of former cameraman Alvaro Mancori, now the owner of Elios Studios.

Considering that the project afforded him so few opportunities to assert himself, it is remarkable that Ringo del Nebraska turned out to be—discounting Minnesota Clay, which despite Bava's input remains the work of Sergio Corbucci—the most satisfying of Bava's traditional Westerns. While La strada per Fort Alamo is the Bava Western most closely allied to his horror films, with stylized look and its fascinating dark twists on standard Western situations and imagery, Ringo del Nebraska works as both an authentic, traditional Western (all' italiana) and as a wicked parody of the genre.

In the very first scene, Bava achieves a perfect note of irony by having the gentle whistle-and-strummed guitar music on the soundtrack stop cold as Donato is shot by the masked gunmen, dropping his blood-spattered guitar down the hillside to a rest under the main titles. Donato does not die immediately, and as he scrambles to a more comfortable place to die, Bava reprises a set-up remembered from Caltiki il mostro immortale, La maschera del demonio and La frusta e il corpo: the camera focuses tightly on the edge of a cliff as Donato's bloodied hand is thrust forward for a secure grip, pulling him up onto the ridge. But he is shot again, and tumbles back down the hillside, and when his blood-streaked face rolls to a halt under the lens, there is a match-cut to one of Kay's dresses—striped red and white—being pressed into a trunk prior to her attempted getaway.

Elsewhere in the movie, Bava seems to be playing the genre for laughs—again having his hero order a glass of milk in the town saloon. The hero behind that appetite for dairy goods is just as homogenized; we never learn anything about him, only where he's from and that he's good with a gun, and that his eyes don't miss a trick. Nevertheless, Bava and actor Ken Clark humanize the cypher with glimpses into his privacy, such as a scene in which the brawny, bare-chested hero rises one morning, executes a number of sitting stretch exercises that make him look like a God, and then stands up—bumping his head on the low ceiling above. His good heartedness is also very winning, as when he tells Kay why he's decided to stick around and fight this inherited battle: "Curiosity . . . that, and the fact that Marty called me 'friend' before he was wounded." It's not too far of a stretch to see in Nebraska's position a metaphor for Bava's own, on this assignment; both men have been recruited, on the basis of shown talent, to fight another man's battle, to protect another man's ranch.

Bava's hand can also be discerned in various small details, like the extra arch painted into Bastien's eyebrows and the way makeup emphasizes not only her eyes, but also those of Lulli. Nino Olivieri's score is also surprisingly romantic, in a florid Spanish vein that anticipates Bava's use of Rodrigo's "Concerto d'Aranjuez" in Lisa and the Devil (1973): it has gentle, dulcet moments that employ only a fervently plucked flamenco guitar, and outbursts of passion and exaltation when a full orchestra—with trumpets at the fore—are added.

Ringo del Nebraska contains a number of references to Sergio Leone and his composer Ennio Morricone, particularly in the trills and whistles heard in Nino Olivieri's score. But what is particularly fascinating is that Ringo del Nebraska appears to be one of the few Italian Westerns made in the wake of Leone's success that may have influenced Leone himself. Throughout the picture, there are shots that anticipate Leone's masterpiece C'era una volta il West/Once Upon a Time in the West (1968), particularly in the sequence where the soon-to-be-widowed Kay walks outside to the well, her cleavage amply displayed in a form-fitting top baring her shoulders, and is met by the arrival of the evil Carter and his associates. Everything about the setting looks familiar, but so do the wardrobe and the attitudes of the characters, and the subsequent scene—of Carter initiating the rape of Kay, tearing her dress to expose the white cup of her brassiere—recalls the scene of Harmonica (Charles Bronson) ripping the white lace from Jill's (Claudia Cardinale's) dress, which makes her a too-tempting target for the riflemen stalking her ranch. The two films also share the plot points of a husband's hidden fortune, gunmen who disguise themselves (or swap horses) so that others will be blamed for their crimes, and a heroine who owes her pluck to an unsavory past she is struggling to forget.

Despite its qualities, Ringo del Nebraska fails to demonstrate an authentic feel for the material—which is somewhat understandable. Bava was unable to impose his visual sense on most of the picture—or perhaps was unwilling to do so, given the fact that it would remain, officially, an Antonio Román film—with the highly unusual result that it is the exteriors, not the interiors, where he seems most in control of the film's atmosphere. In other interior scenes, in the sheriff's office or the ranch house, windows or doorways permitting floods of bright artificial light are usually the most noteworthy feature of any composition. Generally speaking, there is very little that is remarkable about the lighting or camerawork.

Though there may be others, the film contains only one evident special effects shot, where, quoting Howard Hughes' The Outlaw (1943), Nebraska shoots a piece off the ear of one of Carter's men. The shot is framed in widescreen with Nebraska backgrounded on the left and the reverse of the gunman's head foregrounded at the far right; a prosthetic piece is yanked off the actor's ear by an invisible thread as Clark's gun fires. Due to the extremity of the framing, this startling effect cannot be seen in pan-and-scan television prints.

RARE American International Television promotional card for the US release version.

In the context of Mario Bava's career, Ringo del Nebraska may be little more than a footnote, but when it premiered in Rome on March 18, 1966, it earned conspicuously more money at the boxoffice than Terrore nello spazio—143 million lire [$89,000]—making it also a slightly bigger Italian earner than La maschera del demonio! In 1970, as distributors milked everything they had for the last trickle of Spaghetti Western profits, it was reissued in Italy by Regionale under the new title Preparati a morire Ringo del Nebraska c'è Sartana ("Prepare to Die, Ringo from Nebraska—I Am Sartana").

The film did not fare so well in other countries. It was generally withheld from release in other territories until Sergio Leone's "Dollars" films began to find their international cult following. The first outside country to acquire it was Germany, where it was shown in the summer of 1966 as Nebraska Jim—a Karl May-like title that showed no interest in jumping on the nascent Leone bandwagon. To the contrary, there was no French or Belgian release until Christmas 1967, when it opened under the revealing titles Les Dollars du Nebraska and De Dollars van Nebraska, respectively. Strangest of all, the last country to release the picture was its own native country of Spain, where it remained unseen until its February 1968 premiere as El Rancho Maldito ("The Ranch of the Damned").

To this day, the film remains almost completely unknown in America. Contractually prevented from exploiting Bava's secret role in the film's direction, and having turned their back on Westerns since Roger Corman's revisionist oaters of the mid-1950s (Apache Woman, Gunslinger), American International Pictures declined to book the picture theatrically. Instead, they included it in one of their AIP-TV movie syndication packages under the title Savage Gringo. It has not been shown on American television in more than two decades, and today it is next to impossible to find in a watchable, English-language copy.

I COLTELLI DEL VENDICATORE

Knives of the Avenger

LATE IN 1965, Mario Bava was touched by one of life's greatest sorrows when his mother Emma lost her battle with cancer.

"She had great pain and our father [Eugenio] suffered a great deal with her," Mario's sister Elena remembers. "He took very good, loving care of her, and he was almost alone in nursing her. Their children had families and responsibilities of their own. My Mother Superior, aware of my mother's illness, sent our doctor many times to examine her, and he told my fellow Sisters that he had never seen such an affectionate husband, who was so mindful of this sick woman. I told them that my father was also a great artist, intelligent and very charitable."

RURIK (Cameron Mitchell) demonstrates his penchant for knife-throwing to the shock of Queen Karin (Elisa Mitchell) in I COLTELLI DEL VENDICATORE.

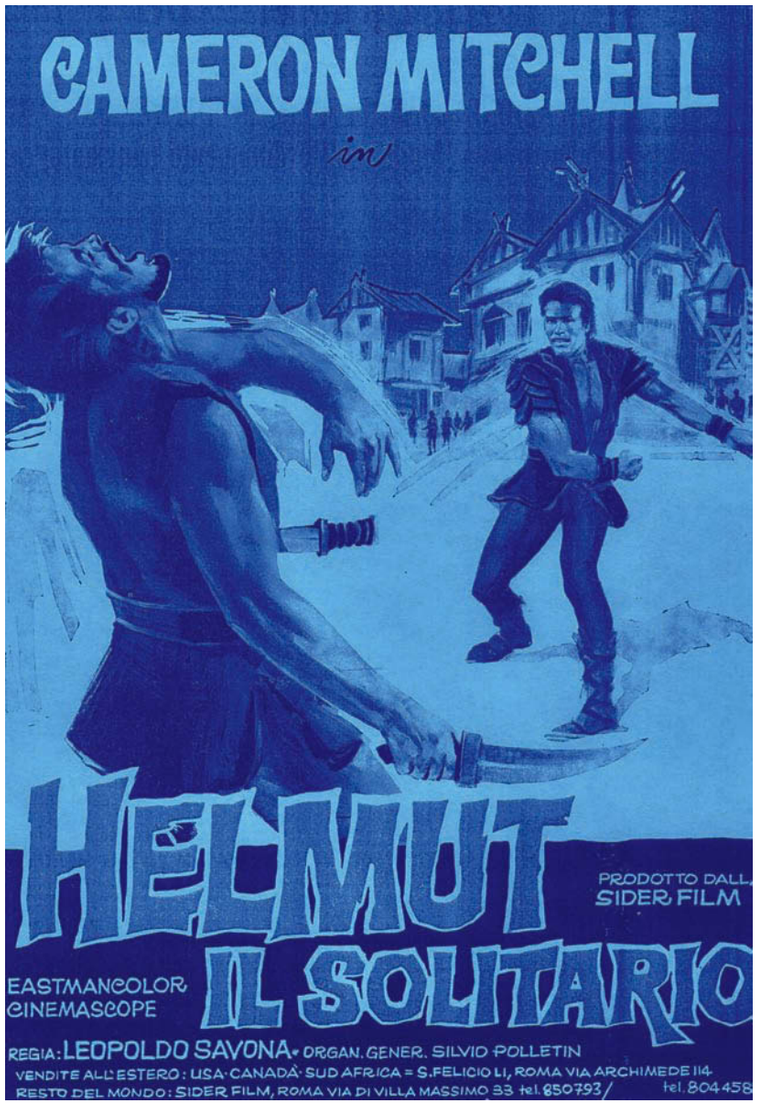
"I don't know the date of my grandmother's death, or the type of cancer that killed her," admits Lamberto Bava. "She was in a great deal of pain, and it was not in her nature to let others see this; I know she worked very hard at this task. Ours was a North Italian family, and she, my grandfather, my father—they all hid their feelings, in a manner typical to the people of Northern Europe. People in the United States tend to think of all Italians as the kind who come from the South and are far more effusive."



Considering the personal sense of grief and loss he felt in the wake of her death, it should not be surprising that Mario Bava's next film turned out to be an uncharacteristically warm, humanistic work about the longing of an aging, lonely drifter for the lost comforts of home and family—though the film itself was yet another job-for-hire that found him picking up and polishing what another, lesser director had dropped.

By this point in time, the Viking film cycle launched by Richard Fleischer's The Vikings in 1958 was nearing its end. The initial spate of Italian Viking pictures—which had included Giacomo Gentilomo's L'ultimo dei vichinghi and Bava's own Gli invasori—had fizzled out after a year, and did not catch fire again until Jack Cardiff, the gifted cinematographer of The Vikings and the greatest of the Powell and Pressburger classics, directed The Long Ships (1964), an exciting British-Yugoslavian co-production whose considerable worldwide success indicated there might still be some life in the Old Norse yet.

Naturally, an Italian Viking renaissance was soon to follow. By this time, Gentilomo had already directed his last picture, leaving the genre to be resuscitated by Mario Caiano. His film, which bore the Bava-indebted title of Erik il vichingo/Erik the Viking, starred Gordon Mitchell, Giuliano Gemma, and Elisa Montés and was released in March 1965. Within the year, Cameron Mitchell—Italy's archetypal Viking star—was also back in fur-vested harness on a new production.

The film that became I coltelli del vendicatore originally began production on December 3, 1964, under a different title—Helmut il solitario—and under the aegis of a different director, Leopoldo Savona. Born in Lenola, Italy, in 1922, Savona directed his first picture, Il principe dalla maschera rossa, in 1955; it was not a success, and he subsequently co-directed films (like 1956's Uomini e lupi/Men and Wolves, with Giuseppe De Santis) and accepted second-unit direction assignments. One of these had been Riccardo Freda's Agi Murad il diavolo bianco/The White Warrior (1959), photographed by Mario Bava, and he assisted Freda once again on I Mongoli/The Mongols (1961), co-directed by Andre de Toth.

Produced by a new company called Sider Film (incorporated on March 13 of that year), Helmut il solitario was not a happy assignment for Cameron Mitchell. Now 47 years of age, Mitchell ADVANCE promotional ad announcing that a new film from director Leopoldo Savona is in the works.

I coltelli del vendicatore

"The Knives of the Avenger"
Working title: Helmut il solitario, "Helmut the Loner"
Filmed at Titanus Studios and on location in Monciana, Perugia and Rome
November – December 1965
First released: May 30, 1966
Technicolor, Techniscope, 2.35:1, 85 minutes

Production: Sider Film (Rome). Producer: Saro Patané. Director: John Hold [Mario Bava]. Assistant directors: Roberto Giandalia, Ines Brusci, Saverio Diamanti. Screenplay: Alberto Liberati, Mario Bava. Dialogue and post-synchronization: Gene Luotto. Sound recorded at Cinemontaggio. Director of photography: Antonio Rinaldi. Camera operator: Sacerio Diamante. Camera assistant: Teodorico Memè. Art direction: Piero Filippone, Alberto Tavazzi, Sergio Savini [Sergio Cortona]. Special effects: Eugenio Ascani. Giovanni Assenza. Giuliano Anchisano. Teodorico Memè. Wardrobe: Giorgio Desideri. Costume design: Tigano Lo Faro. Production supervisor: Sergio Cortona. Key grip: Giuliano Anchisanti. Editor: Otello Colangeli. Music: Marcello Giombini. Sound: Vittorio De Sisti. Distributor: Regionale.

Cameron Mitchell (Rurik), Fausto Tozzi (Aghen), Giacomo Rossi-Stuart (Arald), Lissa, Elisa Mitchell or Lisa Wagner [Elissa Pichelli] (Karin), Luciano Polletin (Moki), Mike Moore [Amadeo Trilli] (Viking King), Renato Terra, Sergio Cortona, Tony Burton.

Belgium: Mesduel, "Knife Duel," Stellor Films
France: Duel au Coteau, "Duel of Knives," Comptoir Française du Film Production, 12/7/66. 1970s Reissues: La Vengeance du Viking, "The Revenge of the Viking"; Les 7 Couteaux du Vengeur, "The 7 Knives of the Avenger," France Inter Cinema
Germany: Eine Handvoll blanker Messer, "A Fistful of Gleaming Daggers," Sonderfilm, 2/24/67, 82m
Italian reissue: Raffica di coltelli, "A Shower of Knives," 1970
Spain: Los Cuchillos del Vengador, Filmax S.A., 81m
US: Knives of the Avenger, World Entertainment Corporation, 10/23/68, 86m. Reissue: Harris Associates, Incorporated, 1969 knew that he getting a bit long on the tooth to be starring in swashbucklers, but at this point in his career, he couldn't afford to be more selective. For several years, between 1960 and 1964, Mitchell had worked entirely abroad to escape back taxes and alimony problems. During this period, the Italian cinema had been his basic bread-and-butter, but now, with the Italian film industry entering a state of crisis, that oasis was drying up. Fortunately, some time in the previous year, Mitchell made an arrangement with the courts and the Internal Revenue Service that allowed him to return to work in his homeland, with a percentage of every dollar earned being directly applied to his debt. He had returned to American movies in a Western that has since become a cult classic, Monte Hellman's Ride in the Whirlwind (1965), opposite the promising young newcomer, Jack Nicholson. Mitchell had taken the role in Savona's picture to continue working off his debt, but with his domestic career finally on the mend, he was looking forward to calling an end to his European period. That opportunity came sooner than expected when, two weeks into production, on December 15, Sider Film executive Saro Patané announced that they had run out of funding.

CAMERON Mitchell gives a sensitive performance as Rurik, a former king now without home or country.

Mitchell thanked the company with a gregarious gesture: "I remember putting up a couple of thousand lire to buy lunch for the crew. I came back to the States because I had a commitment here, and I was toying with the idea of not maybe not going back."

The facts of the production encouraged Mitchell to think along these lines, because the better part of a year passed before Helmut il solitario began to straggle back onto its feet. During the extended shutdown, Leopoldo Savona was forced to move on to other projects, leaving the producers to either finish it as best they could or accept their losses. Saro Patané knew of Mario Bava's reputation as a multitalented savior of abandoned films (most recently Ringo del Nebraska), and arranged a meeting with him to discuss his predicament. Being available, in need of distraction, and wanting to be of service to his friend Cameron Mitchell, Bava approached the project as he did when he had to replace Riccardo Freda as director of I vampiri in 1956: he screened the completed footage and conceived a plan that would not only allow him to complete the picture quickly and economically, but also to make it his own.

Bava was a canny choice to replace Savona—not only because he was experienced at film doctoring and could make a no-budget picture look like a million bucks, but because he was perhaps the only director in Rome who could have lured the film's star back to Italy now that he was finally free to pursue work again at home.

Mitchell was delighted when "Lo and behold, I got a call from Mario! When I heard that Mario was now directing the picture, I wanted to finish it! It raised my spirits. It made me happy, because I knew it would be a good film."

Sider Film was able to amass a completion budget of somewhat less than $75,000 (Mitchell's estimate, probably considerably less) on the strength of Bava's involvement. Bava was able to assemble most of his usual crew on short notice, but his son Lamberto was unable to break his prior commitments to resume his role as his father's assistant. Nevertheless, he remembers Mario's activities during preproduction: "My father looked at the footage of the other director and decided not to use most of it. He shot about three-fourths of the film himself on a shooting schedule of no more than six or seven days."

Given this background, one could be forgiven for feeling—as Lamberto Bava does—that I coltelli del vendicatore should be filed among his father's least important assignments. After all, it was only a week's work. Yet, against all odds, I coltelli del vendicatore is an historical adventure story with an unexpectedly moving human dimension; it is also a film that bears its maker's indelible mark in scene after scene. Not often praised for his direction of actors, Bava's own current sense of melancholy provided Cameron Mitchell with a model for a complex and sensitive role that would remain one of the actor's personal favorites for the rest of his days.

When Mitchell arrived on location to begin working with Bava, he immediately noticed that something about his old friend had changed. It wasn't that he was more remote or short-tempered, as he could sometimes be when money was running low and the pressure was on. Bava was more shaded and melancholy; his genial sparkle had dimmed. After making some discreet inquiries, Mitchell learned that Bava had recently lost his mother. "We didn't really discuss it, but I think it affected him," the actor perceived. "I think a part of Mario died when his mother passed away."

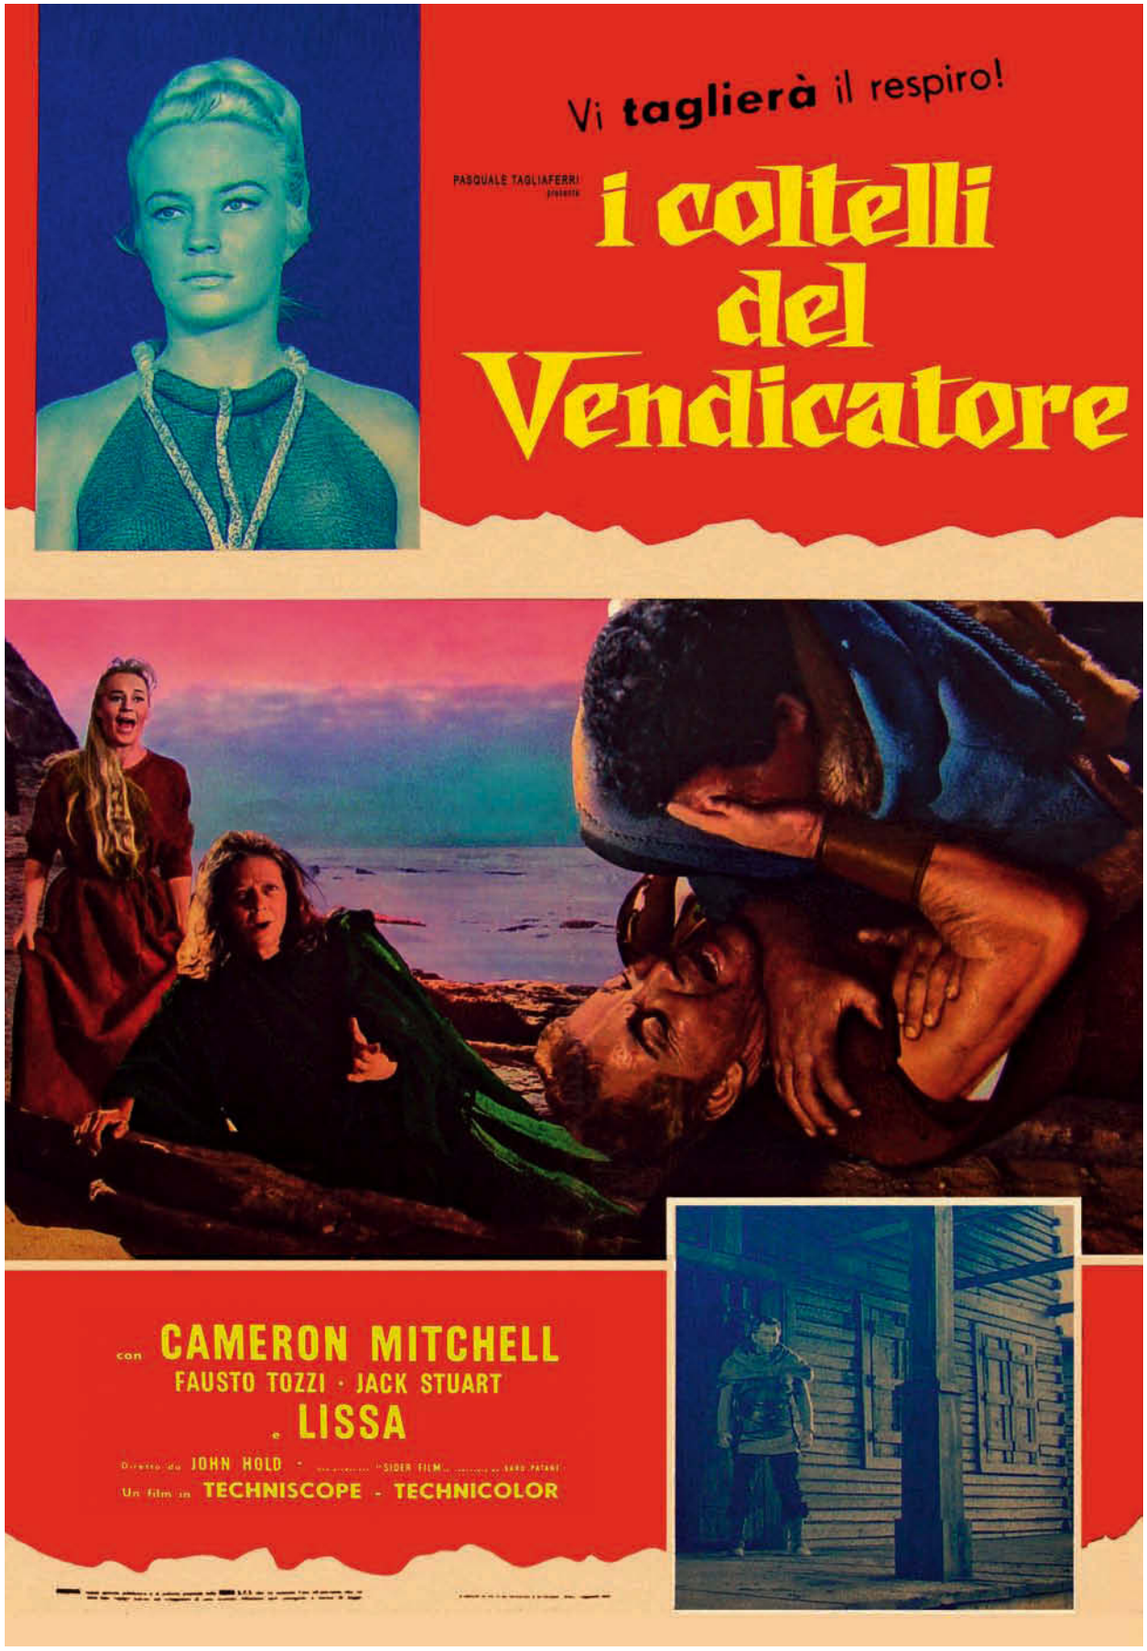
One of the ways in which Bava's diminishment expressed itself, Mitchell notes, was through his eating. The days of multi-course lunches and dinners with wine, which had been his habit with companions like Fulvio Lucisano and Deke Heyward only a year earlier, were now over, replaced by a single, favorite comfort food.

"If you had known Mario Bava before, you'd swear that this man was immortal, he had such life!" Mitchell avowed. "Now his favorite dish—he'd eat pasta of course, but his favorite dish was Italian bread, warmed or toasted in an oven, with butter and jam, along with a cafe au lait or cappuccino. He would dunk the bread with the jam into the coffee, like a farmer. He would order this same dish throughout the day; he might have it two or three times a day."

With I coltelli del vendicatore, Bava was once again mixing genres much like he mixed his food. La ragazza che sapeva troppo had blended light comedy with dark thrills, and Terrore nello spazio had cross-pollinated horror and science fiction, and now I coltelli del vendicatore would propose "the Viking Western." Looking at the finished film, it is not easy to pick out the footage that Bava did not shoot, and impossible to imagine how the original storyline must have differed from Bava's final revisions. But as he watched the other director's footage, the scenes of the Viking drifter coming to the defense of a woman and her young son, and the log-cabin settings, sparked Bava's memories of George Stevens' classic Western Shane (1953), known in Italy under the bittersweet romantic title Il cavaliere della valle solitaria ("The Horseman of the Lonely Valley"). This—perhaps with other thoughts in mind of how Sergio Leone had reinvented Kurosawa's Yojimbo as Per un pugno di dollari/A Fistful of Dollars, and how John Sturges had reworked The Seven Samurai into The Magnificent Seven—gave Bava the inspiration to recast Stevens' masterpiece in a Nordic mold.



Shane starred Alan Ladd as an aging, sharp-shooting drifter who is looking for a place to settle down and hang up his guns for good. He finds work in exchange for room and board at the Starrett ranch, owned by Joe Starrett (Van Heflin), who lives there with his wife Marian (Jean Arthur) and their young son, Joey (Brandon de Wilde). While working around the ranch, Shane takes time to teach the boy some of the things a father traditionally teaches his son; Marian notices, and finds herself drawing closer to Shane, but they both deny their mutual attraction. The Starrett spread is coveted by cattle baron Rufus Ryker (Emile Meyer), but when Joe refuses to sell, Ryker summons a vicious gunman, Jack Wilson (Jack Palance), who makes flagrant displays of his cruelty, shooting an innocent townsman in cold blood. To save Starrett—not a gunfighter—from Wilson, Shane reluctantly dons his guns and challenges the villain to a showdown at the local tavern. Victory is hard-won, and Shane feels contaminated once again by having resorted to violence. He returns to the ranch and announces that it is time for him to be on his way. In one of the more heart-wrenching scenes to be found in the Western genre, as Shane rides toward the horizon, Joey runs after him, crying "Shane . . . Shane . . . come back!" Bava was still mourning the loss of his mother while preparing I coltelli del vendicatore, which may have predisposed him to thoughts of this elegiac Western masterpiece, which is very much a mythicization of a young boy's yearning for an absent parent.

"Bava liked Shane very much," Mitchell recalled. "I like it, too; I think it's a classic Western and, far and away, the best film Alan Ladd ever made. And it was this aspect that intrigued me about [Bava's take on] the project. If you were to go through Knives of the Avenger scene by scene, you could probably find similar scenes to every one of them in Shane. For example, when the bad man comes, we also showed a dog slinking away. The only difference between them is that Knives of the Avenger cost a dollar fifty and Shane went two million dollars over-budget!"

Taking a cue from Toshiro Mifune's character in Kurosawa's The Seven Samurai, Bava had the notion of making Rurik an expert knife-thrower, capable of firing three daggers at once from each of his hands—an inspired metaphor for Shane's alacrity with a six-shooter. Westerns were not Bava's favorite genre, but having directed La strada per Fort Alamo and Ringo del Nebraska and perhaps a good deal of Minnesota Clay, he was as experienced as any other director in Italy was at making them in 1966. Though only a metaphorical Western, I coltelli del vendicatore nevertheless seems the best—and in some ways, the most traditionally satisfying—of all Bava Westerns.

THIS SHOT is all the proof one needs that I COLTELLI DEL VENDICATORE was deliberately patterned after George Stevens' SHANE.

Synopsis

Arald, King of the Vikings, has been missing at sea for three years. Now his errant general Aghen, a violent and ambitious man, has returned to their homeland with his army in tow, to claim Arald's crown and bride, Karin, as his own. Karin and her son Moki consult with Shuna, an aged oracle, who assures them that Arald still lives, and will soon return—but not before Aghen places them in immediate danger. However, she etches in the sand a symbol of a man holding the disc of the Sun, which she says will be the sign heralding the arrival of the man who will be their salvation. Shuna urges the Queen and her son—the future of her country—to await his coming by fleeing across the beach into hiding, so that the sea's incoming waves will erase the tracks of their departure.

Karin and Moki set up a secluded home in the woods. One day, their solitude is interrupted by a weary traveller named Helmut, who comes to their doorstep, begging a meal. Warily, Karin sends him away to feed from the fish in the river and the berries growing along its banks. Helmut is wounded by her distrust, but does as the fearful woman suggests. While cleaning and eating the dinner he's caught from the stream, Helmut hears a scream and rushes back to the cottage, where the woman and her son are being attacked by a pair of Aghen's men. Helmut bursts in and quickly puts a stop to the intrusion with his fists and a pair of well-tossed knives. Some damage is done in the process, and while disposing of the dead men, Helmut promises to stay until he can repair the broken furniture.

During his stay, Helmut begins teaching the fatherless Moki the masculine arts of self-defense and trapping. Karin is touched by the interest he shows in the boy, but is also aware of his growing attraction to her. Bothered by a sense that they have met somewhere before, Helmut questions Karin, who he can see is no ordinary country woman. She takes him into her confidence, introducing herself as Queen Karin. She tells him the story of how her country went to war against

ITALIAN manifesto.

"IT WILL take your breath away!" promises this Italian fotobusta.

King Rurik due to the independent actions of Aghen, who disrupted her wedding day by flinging the severed heads of Rurik's murdered wife and son on their altar—in open defiance of the peace accord signed by the two Kings. Outraged, Rurik returned from a sea voyage to stage a merciless, retaliatory raid on Arald's kingdom, killing its men and seeking out the newly married queen, whom he then raped on her wedding night while wearing a garish, helmet with mask. Hearing her story, Helmut's own memories come flooding back—for he is, in fact, the former King Rurik, now deposed and living in denial of his past misdeeds. When Karin flees the room in tears, Helmut/Rurik realizes that he may well be the biological father of the boy whom he has begun to accept as a son.

The next day, after teaching Moki how to trap animals, Rurik returns to make a confession to Karin, but he is interrupted by the boy's screams. Spotted walking on the beach by three of Aghen's men, Moki is nearly apprehended, but saved when Rurik hurls his daggers into the would-be abductors. One of the men escapes and finds Aghen, now returned and making the local tavern his headquarters; Aghen punishes the man for his failure with death. Rurik also proceeds to the tavern but finds Aghen gone; he plans to await his return—but seeing Moki peering at the scene through a window, he realizes that he might be in danger, and so issues a forceful warning to Aghen's men that he will return later. The men notice that Rurik bears a strange birthmark on his wrist that resembles a man holding the disc of the Sun, and report this to Aghen. Knowing that this mark identifies Rurik, Aghen sends his men to find the blademaster on the road and prevent him from returning to the tavern. While riding back later that day, Rurik expects the road will be treacherous and rigs a trap for the trappers, sending a cloaked prop of himself down the road on horseback; when it is caught in a net, the trappers emerge, and Rurik drops them all with his knives. At the tavern, Rurik and Aghen have a showdown, drenched in darkness, but the knives Rurik aims at the black heart of his enemy are deflected by a shield worn over his chest. The cowardly villain also takes advantage of the shadows to flee the scene, riding out to the cabin, where he abducts Moki and leaves Karin with a warning that she must now obey his every command.

As night begins to fall, King Arald's ship finally arrives home, and he confides to his men his concerns that his own son may not recognize him after an absence of three years.

RURIK teaches Moki (Luciano Polletin) the manly art of self-defense, with the approval of Karin.

Arald goes to the tavern and finds Rurik—his old enemy, but also a man who allowed him to live at the end of his raid, because he had suffered enough—and challenges him to cross swords. Rurik gains the upper hand in the duel, but refuses to take the King's life. Arald continues fighting, right up to the edge of the beach, until the two adversaries are brought together by the hysterical arrival of Karin, who tells them that Aghen has kidnapped Moki. Arald moves to go after them, but Rurik insists that the boy's rescue is his duty.

Rurik discovers the old sibyl Shuna inside a dark cave, breathing with difficulty. With her dying breath, she tells him—and Arald, who has followed—that Aghen has taken the boy to a secret grotto, and points the way. There in the grotto, Arald's attempt to save Moki is unsuccessful, but the boy manages to remove Aghen's shield, making him vulnerable to Rurik's daggers, and the villain is killed with a blade hurled straight into his heart. Rurik rushes toward the boy and cuts his bonds, saying proudly, "You were courageous, my son"—but the instant his limbs are free, Moki runs into the waiting arms of Arald. Realizing that he has no real right to the boy, or to Karin, Rurik stoically mounts his horse and rides off into the sunset.

Production & Cast

Mario Bava had not photographed one of his own films in an anamorphic widescreen gauge since Gli invasori in 1961, but because Leopoldo Savona had filmed his footage in Techniscope, Bava was obliged to followed suit. Techniscope, an invention of Technicolor in Italy, allowed anamorphic films to be shot with standard cameras and lenses, though the camera was modified to expose half the frame at a time, thereby artificially doubling the width of the image. When the film was developed at Technicolor, it was enlarged to fill the entire four-perforation frame space (as opposed to the two-perforation exposure space), which also compressed the image, as on other anamorphic prints, necessitating the use of an anamorphic projection lens to retranslate it to its intended width. Techniscope may have been "the poor man's CinemaScope," as it was sometimes called, but it had more attractions from Bava's perspective than other widescreen processes. First of all, because it permitted the use of standard lenses, Techniscope was the only 2.35:1 format that gave him the freedom to use his zoom lens, which was so crucial to his expediency. Even better, the two-perf process effectively lowered the cost of negative development by a whopping 50%.

Money was tight in all departments, so the one-week shoot was deprived of some traditional conveniences, such as catering. "We never really had a lunch break," Cameron Mitchell admitted. "Instead, there was a crew member around who would bring us food. If I wanted something, or was feeling hungry, I would tell Bava and he would pass the word to the gofer. No craft service table, nothing like that at all—and you know what? You didn't miss it."

Once again, studio accomodations were credited to the no-longer-extant Titanus Studios, a cover for some other studio that Bava was allowed to use in exchange for professional favors granted. Mitchell remembered the majority of the exterior filming taking place in Monciana, a pastoral region of Catanzaro, in Calabria—the instep of the Italian boot. "It was just a 50-minute ride from Rome, but it was like going back in time several hundred years," he recalled. "It was way off the beaten path, away from the town; they had the mountain mules and that little creek there, herds of goat and sheep and small cattle. It was such a contrast to the main highway, about three miles away, where guys were speeding around in Maseratis! But the guys in Monciana were still using the old-style saddle on their mountain mules and dressed as their ancestors dressed three or four hundred years ago. That was our main location for the exteriors. Later, we did the other exteriors somewhere else that Bava picked."

The climactic cavern sequences were filmed in the underground caves of the Viale Libio, which remarkably run below the streets at the very center of Rome. The film's seaside exteriors were filmed at Bava's beloved Tor Caldara location, which came as quite a relief to Mitchell. "The bulk of the other stuff we had shot miles away from the beach," he said, laughing at a recollection he was about to describe. "Mario would be directing us, in Italian:

'Now you a-look at the ocean.'

'What ocean, Mario?'

'There's an ocean—over there.'

'Where?'

[Sternly] 'Just-a believe.'

'No problema, no problema!'"

In the finished film, it appears that the tavern was built on prime real estate just above the beach, and a fabulous point-of-view shot of a setting sun turning the ocean into a shimmering sheet of gold is shown punctuated by the decorative posts of its porch. In fact, like the tavern, the porch section was built indoors and location footage of the ocean was optically inserted onto a blue-screen backdrop. The brevity of the film's schedule did not allow for many special effects to be included, but some other trick shots are present, notably a glass matte that places Arald's Viking ship into the far background of the scene of his return; a shot of the helmeted Rurik on horseback during the flashback to his raid on Arald's kingdom (filmed exactly the same way Boris Karloff was filmed for the finale of I tre volti della paura, but there is no dollying back this time); and one particular instance of stop-start camera "animation" that allowed Rurik to imbed three knives in a wall behind Aghen's head in a flashing, symmetrical arrangement.

In addition to Cameron Mitchell, I coltelli del vendicatore was fortunate to assemble an above-average cast, some of whom worked under pseudonyms, while others—the actress who gives the superb performance as Shuna, for example—received no credit whatsoever. The most familiar face in the supporting cast belongs to handsome Giacomo Rossi-Stuart, who plays Arald. In the years since his early appearances in La morte viene dallo spazio and Caltiki il mostro immortale, the British/Italian actor had risen to more conspicuous roles, including that of Ishmael in Robert Aldrich's Sodom and Gomorrah (1962). He also achieved a kind of pop stardom in Antonio Margheriti's campy space operas Il pianeta errante/Planet on the Prowl and La morte viene dal pianeta Aytin/Snow Devils (both 1964), in which he played Commander Rod Jackson—the Italian equivalent of Star Trek's Capt. James T. Kirk. His role in this film may be minor, but few Italian actors of his station could have embodied it quite so well.

Mitchell and Rossi-Stuart had few scenes together, but the American actor had high praise for the leading lady they shared. Making her first appearance on the screen, newcomer Elissa Pichelli was billed on Italian prints as "Lissa," and in other world markets as "Elisa Mitchell" or "Lisa Wagner." She gives an excellent performance, but published records indicate that I coltelli del vendicatore was her first and only film. "Now that's a mystery, isn't it?" Mitchell exclaimed, reflecting on his co-star. "I thought she was very good—very different and very real." Some published sources, mislead by her "Mitchell" pseudonym, actually reported that Elissa and Cameron were married, but this is untrue.

The actor mentioned Pichelli as the focal point of an occasion when Bava proved to him his absolute mastery of lighting: "Do you remember the scene where I'm wearing the mask and raping the girl? Well, when the day came to film that scene, it was that time of the month, and her skin had broken out. I went to Mario and said, 'You can't shoot her today.' He said, 'Why not?' I said, 'Her face, it's a mess—impossible!' He looked at her and said, 'No, no—due minuti.' Two minutes, that's all it took. He moved a couple of lights and, suddenly, she looked . . . 16! Young and beautiful! I've never seen anyone else perform such a miracle in only two minutes! Bava had the technical expertise to make sure the actress was at her most beautiful, even when she was at her worst."

On film, you can see exactly what Mitchell was talking about. In Pichelli's close-ups, the right side of her face is three-quartered in shadow, while the left quarter is softly lit. It is a trick, but completely acceptable in this instance because the scene takes place inside the shelter of a bed, making the change in lighting completely plausible.

Cast in the villainous role of Aghen was Fausto Tozzi, an actor and screenwriter whose career had previously coincided with Bava's in Riccardo Freda's Beatrice Cenci (1956) and Le meraviglie di Aladino (1961), in which he played the Grand Vizier; he would later play Menelaus in Bava's future project with Franco Rossi, the TV miniseries Odissea (1968). Tozzi, whose varied career also included such highlights as El Cid (1961), Im Stahlnetz des Dr. Mabuse/The Return of Dr. Mabuse (1961), The Valachi Papers (1972), and The Black Stallion (1979), also directed a single film in 1971, Trastavere, a comedy featuring Vittorio De Sica, Nino Manfredi, and Leopoldo Trieste. Tozzi may well have been cast as Aghen to capitalize on his vague, high-cheekboned resemblance to Shane's Jack Palance, but he is given too few opportunities to project true malevolence and seems more of a coward and fool than a formidable opponent. A heavy smoker, he died of emphysema on December 10, 1978, at the age of 57.

MOKI and his mother discuss the stranger who has entered their lives.

Mitchell also liked working with young Luciano Polletin, the first-time actor who played Moki, who happened to be the son of Silvio Polletin, a Sider Film executive named in the original promotional ads for Helmut il solitario. "The kid was not too bad, considering that he never did anything before or since. Actually, we began the film with somebody else; I can't remember his name. His father was a very poor man, I remember." Polletin is good in the role, accurately conveying the awkwardness of a male child willing, but not yet strong or mature enough, to be "the man of the house." His presence, though, is somewhat compromised by a ridiculous dye-job on his hair, meant to make him look more like Rurik's own son, and an ill-conceived wardrobe that resembles an Old Norse variation on a Catholic school uniform of the 1960s.

The boy who preceded Polletin in the role can be glimpsed in the final cut, very briefly, at the end of Rurik's first encounter with Karin; the shot of her standing in the doorway lingers onscreen long enough for us to see a similar-looking boy, albeit with straight dark hair, emerge from behind her, defensively holding a bow. Evidently, in the original film story, the boy would have been proficient with such a weapon; in the Bava film, a scene was included showing Helmut/Rurik instructing Moki in how to properly handle a bow and arrow.

With this one telltale piece of the abandoned film identified, it is then possible to determine which other shots and scenes were most likely helmed by Leopoldo Savona. Surely, the entire first meeting between Karin and Rurik qualifies, as do the prior shots of Rurik riding across a stream into the valley, and the subsequent scenes of him cleaning and eating a fish plucked from the river and, later, following the sounds of Karin's screams back to the cabin. It seems probable that the latter scene was filmed with the intention of Rurik ingratiating himself into the homestead by successfully defending this woman and her son against two intruders, but it was amended for Bava's purposes on its soundtrack, with Rurik overhearing the voices of the men identifying Karin as the Queen and wife of Harald—an obvious afterthought, as the blademaster evidently hears this dialogue without processing it, as he doesn't realize her true identity until much later in the picture. Bava's footage would then begin with the shot of the wooden door (which appears to be a miniature), initially closed over the entire field of vision, being pushed open to reveal the fracas going on inside.

VICTORY is bittersweet for Rurik, as Karin is reunited with husband King Harald (Giacomo Rossi-Stuart).

Another held-over scene would be the footage of Rurik flailing about in a shallow brook to catch a fish, which would have been filmed as the actual prelude to his fresh-caught meal in the earlier scene, but was re-edited here, with cutaways to an amused Moki, to make it seem he is teaching the boy how to hunt, with buffoonish results. Jarringly, this scene cuts to Rurik returning to the cabin alone to speak privately with Karin, saying that he left Moki behind "at the sea." This isn't where they were, of course, so it would seem that this conversation—during which Rurik seems primed to confess his love to his hostess, but is interrupted by the boy's cry for help. The scene cuts away to Moki being attacked on the beach at Tor Caldara by three of Aghen's men; the shot is naturally backlit, so we cannot see who is playing Moki in these shots, but this sequence was at least partially restaged by Bava, with Polletin, in order to show Rurik saving the boy from his kidnappers with expertly thrown knives.

In all of these scenes, there is a sense of warmer weather and an absence in the interior shots of the colorful lighting employed elsewhere. Bava resumed filming in the middle of a freezing Italian winter—a fact underlined by Shuna's introductory prophecy as she announces the coming of winter, and by the fact that the actors' breath can be seen during at least two interior scenes: during Rurik's encounter with the obese barkeep at the tavern, and during the honeymoon rape scene, and again as Elissa Pichelli backs away from Mitchell onto the bed where the deed is done.

One of the changes necessitated by the change in climate was warmer wardrobe. According to Mitchell, Bava designed all the amendments to the existing wardrobe himself, starting with the heavy mantle that Rurik adopts from the dead body of one of Karin's dead attackers ("Winter is coming," he reminds us). "You remember the thing with the stuff around the shoulders?" Mitchell said of this item. "Very virile, very practical. It was quite cold, some of the days and nights we worked on that. It was a fur piece that went from over my head to the middle of my chest. Mario actually designed all the wardrobe on that."

According to Mitchell, a Bava set was uniquely open to moments of inspiration and intuition. "Working with Mario was like working on an impressionist painting. If the brush drops, there it is. We were given a script at the beginning, but it was really nothing more than an outline. Any changes that he wanted to make, or that you wanted to make, then make them. If you came up with a good idea, Bava might say 'buon idea' and go with it. You had some words, you had something of a script, but you didn't necessarily have to stick to it."

By closely studying the lip movements of the actors, it is possible to see that Mitchell, Pichelli, and Rossi-Stuart, at least, played their scenes in English—however, they are usually saying something other than what the English dubbing later had them say. Mitchell claimed that the dubbing took considerably more liberties with the dialogue than merely polishing it to a respectable sparkle. "I'll tell you what was interesting," he said. "When I saw Knives of the Avenger, I'd never heard those lines before! The English version had a totally different script! Whoever put that dialogue on the soundtrack, I don't know how they did it, I don't know how they dubbed it, I don't know how they could put it in any kind of sync at all, but it was a totally different storyline!"

The picture was edited by Otello Colangeli, with whom Bava had worked closely on his "stock footage" adventure La morte viene dallo spazio in 1958. Since that time, Colangeli had manned the editing table for such classic Italian horror and fantasy pictures as Riccardo Freda's I giganti della Tessaglia/The Giants of Thessaly (1960), Antonio Leonviola's Maciste, l'uomo più forte del mondo/Mole Men Against the Son of Hercules (1961), Alberto De Martino's Perseo l'invincibile (1963), and Horror/The Blancheville Monster (1963), and several films for Antonio Margheriti, including Danza macabra/Castle of Blood (1964). Colangeli did an exceptional job on I coltelli del vendicatore, particularly in pacing the action scenes; perhaps at Bava's suggestion, he also tried his hand at some of the frame-deleting techniques which Romana Fortini had introduced in Terrore nello spazio. During the scene of Rurik/Helmut fighting the intruders at the cabin, one of the men nearly brains him with an axe, which splits a salad bowl; after Mitchell exits frame, all the frames of the actual strike are missing, making the impact seem all the more forceful and startling.

A FLASHBACK sequence tells the story of how Rurik, in his earlier life as King Helmut, exploited his military defeats with rape and pillage.

When I coltelli del vendicatore was completed, Bava chose to sign it with a variation on his "hired gun" pseudonym for La frusta e il corpo: "John Hold." Considering its unusual status as a Viking Western, "John Fjord" might have been a more appropriate choice. "I asked Mario why he used a different name," Mitchell said, "and he gave me some kind of goofy answer. I think he wanted it changed because he liked the original version [of Shane] better."

Given the fact that Bava was not alone in playing "the name game"—hence the casting of "Jack Stuart" and "Elisa Wagner"—Bava's pseudonym might just as well have been a production mandate enforced to misrepresent the picture as another English production à la The Long Ships. But there are other valid reasons, too, why Bava might have preferred to sign the picture with an alias.

I coltelli del vendicatore was more of a rescue job than an original work, and it was made under the duress of little money and even less time. It has some rough edges, missing joints of narrative that the hectic schedule was unable to fill-in, even with Bava presiding. While Bava had every right to be pleased with the final result, such a picture would not be seen by his colleagues in the Italian film industry as a good career move, especially in the wake of so many other moonlighting jobs. With "John Hold" billed as director, certain people in-the-know would recognize the film as his work, but they would also recognize that he had made the gesture of distancing himself from it, implying that his own standards were higher.

Significantly, I coltelli del vendicatore would be the final collaboration between Mario Bava and Cameron Mitchell, a fraternal spirit and his most frequent star. During their years of collaboration, knowing of the actor's financial problems, Bava had recommended his acting services to a number of fellow directors, and it can fairly be said that the Italian phase of his career may have resulted in more distinguished starring roles than would have been available to an actor of his age at the same time in America. Mitchell always kept a special place in his heart for Bava, whom he considered the most talented of all the world-class directors he worked for. They would meet once again, by surprise, but never again would Bava's Mitchell camera photograph Cameron Mitchell.

"I always hoped we would find another great project to do together," Mitchell said with warmth and regret. "Mario and I were always looking for the right vehicle, the film that would be our Sistine Chapel, you know? Our Davide. We almost had one at one time; we were close. We were planning a historical thing about Peter the Great. It would have been a big film. You see, the trouble with Bava . . . it wasn't trouble, really . . . but he wouldn't leave Italy. He loved Italy, and he wanted only to lavorare in Italia [work in Italy]. I tried to get him to do some things here [in the States], and some other things in South America, or various points around the world, but he wouldn't budge! 'I'm-a sorry, Camarone,' he would tell me, 'solamente in Italia.' That was a big hang-up of Mario's. I suspect that, if he found himself making a film in another country—even with a few Italians around him—he would have felt lost. I don't think he would have been lost, because he was too good for that, but it stalled what should have been a brilliant career."

Bava's secretary Rosalba Scavia agrees with Mitchell's estimation: "I'd love to have worked with him on an epic. He deserved to be that kind of director, to make that kind of film. He could have been King Vidor, but his modesty and simpatico nature were his downfall. I remember Mario having a great sense of aesthetics. He was a perfectionist but, most of the time, things were far from perfect."

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by A. Morini.

Mitchell's own career in America quickly succumbed to the very forces that made it possible to resume. Returning to his homeland on the high note of a popular NBC television series and a role in the high-profile Paul Newman picture Hombre (1967), Mitchell soon felt the pinch of sharing his earnings with the IRS. Consequently, he had to work frequently, regardless of material or location, and almost immediately began appearing in low-rent exploitation fare such as the Mexican horror film Autopsia de un Fantasma (1967), Nightmare in Wax (1969) and The Rebel Rousers (shot 1967, released 1970). The 1970s were more rewarding, bringing him more respectable work, albeit in not significantly more respectable films, such as The Midnight Man (1974, opposite Burt Lancaster), The Klansman (1974, opposite Lee Marvin), and The Swarm (1978), as well as numerous made-for-television pictures and a soul-affirming part in Orson Welles' legendary, unreleased The Other Side of the Wind. However, after starring in 1978's The Toolbox Murders, the die was cast and Mitchell's career embarked on a downward spiral that lasted for the rest of his days. There were occasional highlights, such as his small part in the hit comedy My Favorite Year (1982), but more typical of his call sheets during this period were Screamers (1980, a day's work that inserted him into the revised American version of Sergio Martino's lethargic La isola degli uomini pesce/Island of the Fish Men), Titillation (1982, an uncredited appearance in a hardcore sex film featuring Russ Meyer discovery Kitten Natividad), and Terror on Tape (a 1983 scene compilation video, starring Mitchell as a pasty-faced video store clerk—perhaps the first time a name actor agreed to appear in a direct-to-video production). His last film, Steve Latshaw's Jack-O (1995), featured Mitchell in the posthumous role of "Dr. Cadaver." In short, his ensuing resumé made "Solamente in Italia" sound like good advice.

Cameron Mitchell—the star of Gli invasori, Sei donne per l'assassino, Minnesota Clay, and I coltelli del vendicatore—died on July 6, 1994, at the age of 75. His real-life assassino was lung cancer.

RARE promotional art for a French reissue of the film, circa 1980s.

Music

I coltelli del vendicatore was scored by Marcello Giombini, who was hired to compose the film's music before Bava signed on to complete it. Giombini delivered a rousing heroic score, full of adventure and appropriate colorings of melancholia and self-sacrifice. Unfortunately, by post-production, there was little money left in the production coffers to provide Giombini with an adequate orchestra. Though beautifully written, the music heard on the film's soundtrack is badly compromised by thin orchestration.

The main theme anticipates, in some ways, Paul Ferris' celebrated score for Michael Reeves' Witchfinder General/The Conqueror Worm (1968), another historical melodrama that functions as a metaphoric Western. Giombini's own oeuvre as a film composer encompassed a large number of Westerns, both before and after this assignment—Tre pistole contro Cesare/Death Walks in Laredo (1966), Ballata per un pistolero/Ballad of a Gunfighter (1967), Ehi amico . . . c'è Sabata, hai chiuso!/Sabata (1970), Lo irritarono . . . e Sartana fece piazza pulita/Sartana Kills Them All (1971), and È tornato Sabata . . . hai chiuso un'altra volta/The Return of Sabata (1971), to name a few—and he also scored some latter-day pepla in earlier stages of his career, which also prepared him well for this job.

In some ways, Giombini's music for I coltelli del vendicatore is a Western score, with harmonica occasionally introduced to underline Rurik's loneliness, and the rhythms of percussion underscoring Aghen's abduction of Moki are unmistakably those which the ear associates with Indians on the warpath. Giombini would never quite escape the lower ranks of Italian popular cinema scoring, working for such directors as Joe D'Amato and Alfonso Brescia, but notable in this context among his later efforts are Ruggero Deodato's Un'ondata di piacere/Waves of Lust (1975, scripted by Lamberto Bava) and Alfredo Rizzo's La sanguisuga conduce la danza/The Bloodsucker Leads the Dance (1975, starring Giacomo Rossi-Stuart).

Commentary

I coltelli del vendicatore may have been undertaken as work-for-hire, but because Mario Bava was forced by expediency to concoct the final script himself—even if the writing was tantamount to seeing where the brush dropped, as Cameron Mitchell recalled—it is the closest of all his films to something written in his own hand. Reflective, philosophic, autumnal, and humanistic, it is recognizable as an annex to Bava's universe from its very first scene, which is comprised of elements present in several of his earlier films, but possessed of a dark and devastated emotional tenor unlike anything felt in his previous work.

The scene fades in on a shot of the symbol of "a man holding the disc of the Sun"—that is, Rurik's birthmark—which Shuna has etched into the sands of the beach. Thus, from the very first frame, the movie asserts its primary theme with a mark of familial association, a symbol evoking the privilege and burden of heredity. The use of a birthmark to identify the high-born dates back to Bava's first adventure film as a director, Gli invasori, in which two apparent enemies (one of them also played by Cameron Mitchell) are revealed by the discovery of such marks to be brothers, separated in childhood. Here the sign is foretold by another of Bava's female oracles. Unlike the dazzling, young, exotic sibyls of Le fatiche di Ercole or Ercole al centro della terra, Shuna is an aged, withered crone, forced to live outside society like a feral thing, perhaps outcast as an unwelcome reminder of its superstitious origins, and perhaps somewhat maddened by a lifetime as a seer. Bava may be alluding to the intuitive nature of women by having this hag's advice sought by Karin, who is herself now one of the ostracized, and yet another primary archetype from Bava's back catalogue: a member of a deposed, or fallen, royal family. The scene is grippingly constructed, almost post-apocalyptic in its barren scenery and elegiac pacing, and it prepares us—with Karin—to keep our eyes sharpened for the arrival of a foretold image. As Shuna collapses and the camera tracks down the length of her body, across the brine-washed sands to the incoming waves, one feels confidently in the hands of an artist at the height of his powers, however anonymous.

AGHEN (Fausto Tozzi) manhandles Karin while Rurik lies in wait.

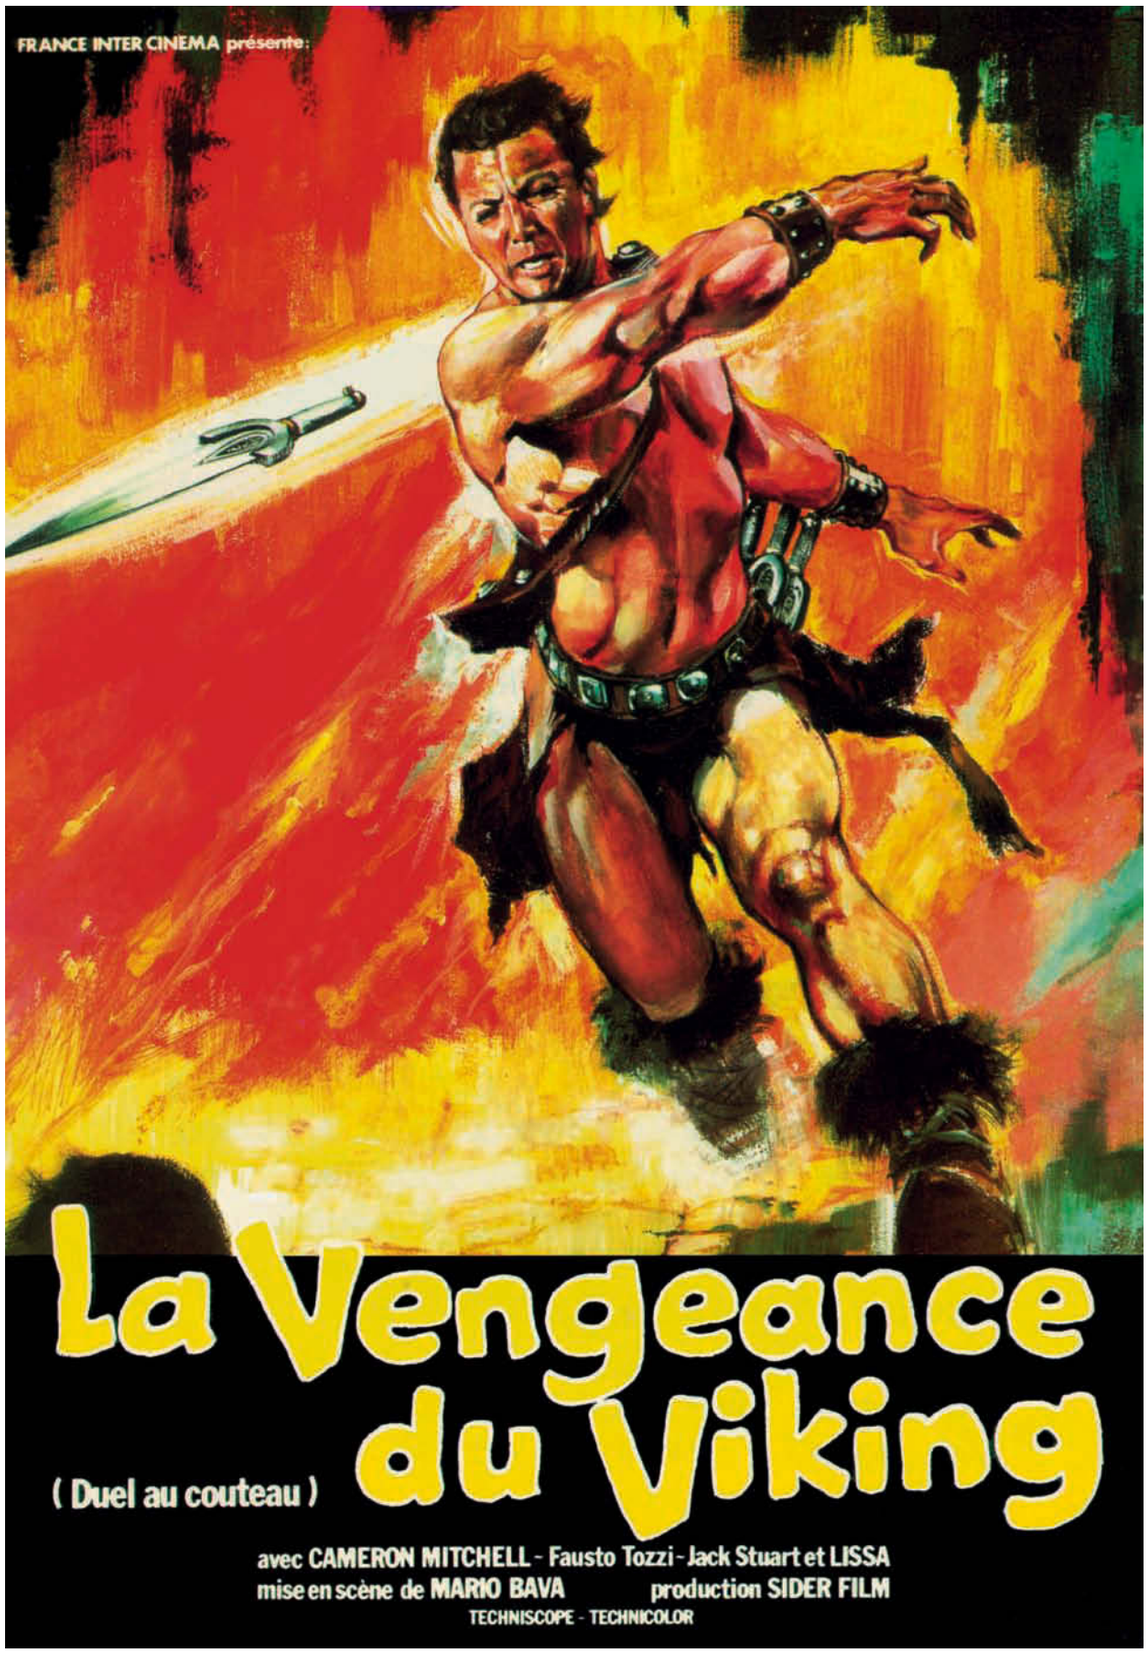
The arrival of Helmut/Rurik is almost immediate, and it is a flaw of the film's design that "the other shoe" never drops by validating Shuna's prophecy in Karin's eyes by having her see his birthmark; that privilege is left to the audience, when the mark is spied by one of Aghen's men. Rurik's choice of "new identity" is curious, because "Helmut" obviously refers to the most striking component of his battle garb on the occasion when he raped Karin on her wedding night, the act he most regrets from his former life as King. The reunion of these two characters, unperceived by them both, finds Karin meeting him warily, as she met him before, and Rurik as someone more basically trusting of human nature—the flaw which allowed him to be victimized by Aghen in the past.



"Why is everyone so mistrusting in this region?" he exclaims.

Though Karin refuses to admit or feed him, she refers him to the abundance of nature, which, beginning with this film, becomes an increasing concern in Bava's work.

"The river is filled with fish," she says, "and there are berries by its banks. Nature you can trust—everywhere."

It may seem an odd sentiment, coming from a director whose films are so plainly uncomfortable when set out-of-doors, but in future works such as Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve (1971) and Baron Blood (1972), we will find Bava editorializing—subtly, but with some frequency—about the importance of protecting those things which nature and time have perfected from the craven, commercial meddlings of humankind.

As his filmography progresses, Bava also becomes increasingly interested in detailing the consequences of violence; in this film, by showing how a vengeful rape results in the birth of the violator's son—the offspring he can never have—he is showing how Nature can sometimes provide the balm for the animal violence natural to men, while at the same time harshly reproaching men for the choices they have made. Rurik loses his own family, and is later provided with the satisfaction of slaying the man responsible, but for inflicting his own random violence against the innocent, he is punished with a short time in the bosom of the family he might have had, which is then taken away from him, leaving him to wander till the end of his days, rootless and damned.

Though the resemblance between the two films is sometimes obvious, no critic at the time noted I coltelli's conscious debt to Shane. It may be that, whether for legal or artistic reasons, Bava decided to downplay this connection himself. According to Cameron Mitchell, a final scene was shot in which Moki noticed Helmut/Rurik's departure, broke away from Arald's paternal clutch, and ran after him, calling his name. This was a wise deletion, as such a finale would have upset the complex poignancy of the film as it now exists, for the sake of a gratuitous film reference that would have seemed parodic in such a context, and may also have provoked unwanted laughter.

Even as it is, the film has its faults. The pre-credits scene, however arresting it may be in terms of its elegiac solemnity and powerful imagery, finds Shuna imparting more spoken information (including unfamiliar names) than can be easily absorbed by viewers just settling into the picture. It is another miscalculation to have asserted the cowardice of Aghen—represented by a shield he wears over his heart—over his villainy; it is true that he murdered and beheaded Rurik's family, but because the film never introduces us to these living characters, their loss carries no dramatic weight. By extension, Aghen never accrues the aura of an indomitable evil that must be reckoned with—quite the opposite of Jack Palance's formidable opposition to Alan Ladd in Shane. Instead, when Aghen disrupts Arald's wedding with the tribute of the heads, the King publicly berates him, which has the residual effect of making Aghen seem not terribly important, or feared, among his fellow countrymen. When he finally faces Rurik in the tavern, he confirms his cowardice by fleeing the scene under the cover of night. The duel scene is impressively staged, and the obvious attention paid to it, in terms of build-up and its expressive mise-en-scène, gives one the impression that it should have been the film's climax, but it is ultimately just another means of postponing the inevitable.

THIS French reissue affiche art from the 1980s shows the influence of John Milius' recent success, CONAN THE BARBARIAN.

Without an aura of evil to bolster Aghen's role as Rurik's ultimate target, Bava prepares us for his moment of truth throughout the picture by giving Rurik dialogue expressive of his obsession to someday pierce his enemy's heart. "Someday," he swears at one point, "I'll tear his living heart out." When the two men finally stage their duel in the darkened tavern, Rurik taunts Aghen into removing the cowardly brand of his shield so that his knives can "find [his] black heart." When they meet again in the secret grotto, Rurik again taunts Aghen, his voice echoing from a hiding place among the rocks, that his blades will find their way to his heart. Finally, Moki succeeds in removing his shield moments before the fatal dagger is flung. Interestingly, the desire to claim an enemy's heart as the ultimate prize is also voiced by Elizabeth Holle in Baron Blood, made six years later, indicating that this concept held some personal significance for Bava.

I coltelli del vendicatore also suffers by being essentially restricted to only two sets: Karin's secluded cabin and the tavern where Aghen establishes his headquarters. Consequently, the narrative is forced to ping-pong between one place and the other, with only occasional location shots to break up the monotony. Without much choice of where to go, the second half of the picture is guilty of extensive geographic padding. For example, Rurik goes to the tavern in order to confront Aghen, but retreats after realizing that Moki has followed him into the danger zone. He escorts the boy back to safety, then returns later; Aghen is still not present, because he is back at the cabin, abducting Moki! Such material could have been easily compressed, but it was left in disarray to help bring the simple story to feature length.

Usually the most adept of directors at maximizing a minimal budget, Bava also fails to conceal the production's inadequate completion funding—proving beyond doubt that he was working in depressed, debilitated condition, probably more for distraction than for money. In the past, Bava had quadrupled the size of small armies in the twinkling of an eye with carefully measured multiple camera exposures. On this occasion, Bava lazily (and not very convincingly) doubles the size of Aghen's small army—only five men on horseback—to ten, by simply reversing the camera angle from one side of Fausto Tozzi's face to the other, while rearranging the extras on horseback beside him in different costumes. (Closer examination of the shot reveals that Bava may have left the camera where it was and had the shot reversed optically.) Later, when Aghen settles into his favorite seat in the tavern, Lulli's back bumps into the wall behind him and sets it trembling, like the skin of a drum—exposing the stonework as a painted sheet of canvas.

The film is also guilty of sometimes reaching too obviously for effect, as in providing Rurik with the alias of "Helmut," an obvious reference to the helmet he wore when he raped Karin. The helmet, designed by Bava, resembles the grille of a Rolls-Royce while also recalling Nikolai Gogol's descriptions of the eponymous creature of his story, "The Viy," as a monster whose all-seeing eyes reposed behind heavy iron eyelids. Another case would be one of the film's more obvious borrowings from Shane: the irregular appearances of a dog. As Cameron Mitchell remarked, when Aghen is shown arriving at the tavern, there is indeed a shot of a dog slinking under a table in fear; the trouble is, the dog is established in an earlier scene as belonging to Moki and, since he is not present, it has no business being at the tavern, other than to fulfill this self-conscious function. The dog makes only one other appearance in the picture, when Rurik caresses it, lost in thought, after discovering his role in Karin's past and realizing that Moki might be his own son. Knowing how important dogs were to Bava personally, and to his family, we can understand how even the irregular presence of one in the film would be, to him, an important factor in evoking a sense of home.

ITALIAN locandina, art by A. Morini.

Speaking of the Helmut/Moki relationship, there is also a troubling edit in the film, which abruptly cuts short a marvelous scene in which the man uses a handmade cage to educate the boy in the trapping of animals. At one point, Moki laughs and remarks that animals must be stupid to wander so willingly into a trap, and Helmut/Rurik's expression becomes almost pained with conflict as he counters, "No, not necessarily . . ." By this point in their conversation, the viewer is completely absorbed, not least of all because Rurik appears to be on the point of drawing a parallel between the desperation that would make an animal risk its freedom to satisfy its hunger, and his own earlier situation in coming to Karin's doorstep begging for food. Our high expectations of the scene are frustrated by a sudden cutaway, but the scene is nevertheless redeemed by a comic exchange between Karin and Helmut, when the Queen narrowly escapes being hit by one of his thrown daggers. Feigning anger, she yells that he should stop using his knives to instruct the boy in the ways of war and come inside to cut strips of lard for her cooking. "Use my knives for kitchen work? Never!" Helmut laughs—but when Karin goes to pull the knife from the wall, she finds that its impact has already stripped a length of lard from a rack of bacon left hanging there. In this moment, paternal braggadocio and spousal cooperation are wed in a single, elegant gesture and Helmut/Rurik's domestication is complete.

With its unusual mixture of mysticism and barbarism, I coltelli del vendicatore can be seen not only as a "Viking Western," but also as a distinct forerunner of the "sword and sorcery" genre that first came into bloom with John Milius' Conan the Barbarian (1982), scripted by Oliver Stone. As someone who regularly binged on pulp fantasy fiction, Mario

BELGIAN affiche, crudely repainted from the Italian locandina design.

Bava was undoubtedly familiar with the "Conan" stories of Robert E. Howard at the time he made this picture, and therefore deserves recognition as the forefather of yet another Italian fantasy subgenre, as the Milius film inspired a whole set of Roman imitations, including Lucio Fulci's La conquista/Conquest (1983), Ruggero Deodato's The Barbarians (1987), and of course, Luigi Cozzi's sci-fi-tinged reinventions of Ercole/Hercules (1983) and Le avventure dell'incredibile Ercole/Hercules II (1985).

Distribution

I coltelli del vendicatore had its premiere screenings in Rome at the end of May 1966. It earned 250 million lire [$156,000], making it a better-than-average release for Bava, while at the same time hardly encouraging more movies struck from the same mold. The Italian Viking genre was now officially at an end. It struggled toward release in other European countries, being held back in France until the year's end. It waited another entire year before playing in West Germany, where its distributor gave it the frankly Leonesque title Eine Handvoll blanker Messer ("A Fistful of Gleaming Daggers").

In America, Viking pictures had been dead since the early 1960s; even in their heyday, they never attained the level of success they had known in Europe. Consequently, Knives of the Avenger—as it was called (a direct translation of the original Italian title, for a change)—did not find a willing distributor until early 1967, when it was acquired by World Entertainment Corporation, previously the US representatives of Bava's The Road to Fort Alamo. By the time WEC put Knives into release in 1968, Cameron Mitchell's celebrity had been refreshed in America by his starring role on the NBC series The High Chaparral. Alas, despite its global pretensions, World Entertainment Corporation's funds were insufficient to take advantage of that connection with a nationwide blanket of prints. Indeed, the company was so broke, they processed their trailers for Knives in black-and-white, which did nothing to enlighten potential ticket-buyers as to its scenic beauty. An enthusiastic review in the trade newspaper Variety encouraged the company to print a special two-color one-sheet that reprinted the review in full—but since the picture received virtually all of its playdates at drive-in theaters, the poster probably didn't sell many additional tickets.

US one-sheet. Arguably the most ridiculous double bill concept of the 1960s.

In 1969, the World Entertainment Corporation prints were reissued by Harris Associates, Inc. in tandem with Gammera the Invincible—the American reworking of Daikaiju Gamera, a black-and-white Japanese monster picture from 1965—as "The Biggest . . . Most Frightening Science-Fiction-Action-Show of the Century!" As "science-fiction-action-shows" go, the combo was adequate at best, but in the annals of unseemly marriages, it was without parallel.

In the 1970s, I coltelli del vendicatore was resurrected under new titles for fresh bookings in both France (La Vengeance du Viking) and Italy (Raffica di coltelli). In the 1980s, Bava's erstwhile producer Alfredo Leone bought the world rights to the picture and had new titles added, which openly credited the formerly pseudonymous Mario Bava as director. It was during the period of Leone's ownership that several US video companies released unauthorized, pan-and-scanned video copies of the film under the camouflage titles Viking Massacre and Bladestorm—thinly disguised translations of the French and Italian reissue titles. As a variant, the Mogul Video release of Viking Massacre is worth acquiring by completists for its preservation of the film's original, pre-Leone main titles.

Leone made no move to release the film himself until the year 2000, when he licensed the DVD rights to Image Entertainment, resulting in a handsome, widescreen digital master that made the picture available, for the first time, to a new generation of viewers.

Within its humble perimeters, I coltelli del vendicatore is a better-than-average effort. It is flawed, without question, but Bava—approaching the project in an uncommonly serious mood, his own heart unusually near the surface—invests the material with a dimension of warmth and bittersweet pathos seldom encountered in Italian adventure or fantasy cinema. An inherited project made on short notice, it nevertheless reflects its maker perfectly in the particulars of his recurring themes and interests, and also in some of the dialogue he breathed into these characters. Bava's own inquisitive approach to life and his love for solving problems is especially apparent in an exchange between father and son in the trapping scene.

After Helmut explains to Moki the intricacies of a trap fashioned with his own two hands, the boy asks, "How did you ever learn so many different things?"

"Through wondering—continuously," explains Rurik, simply.

It is because of Bava's ability to express himself so personally through this orphaned project—and in Cameron Mitchell's empathetically haunted performance—that I coltelli del vendicatore must ultimately be counted a success. In terms of the Italian Viking cycle that spawned it, it stands as a remarkable example of its type and, in its own quiet way, represents the genre's last hurrah.

2353 SG 51

Operation: Pop

"There's no money in poetry, but then there's no poetry in money either."
—Robert Graves

LOVE so hot, it's a crime: John Phillip Law and Marisa Mell in DIABOLIK.

THE COLD hand of heritage reaches out to touch Monika (Erika Blanc) in the form of a child's ghost (Valerio Valeri) in OPERAZIONE PAURA.

OPERAZIONE PAURA

Kill, Baby . . . Kill!

THREE YEARS had now passed since Mario Bava last directed a traditional horror film, the genre in which he felt most comfortable and creative. La frusta e il corpo had been just ambiguous enough to elude such a description—the ghost of Kurt Menliff was finally revealed to be a guilty figment of his lover/murderer's imagination, rendering the story more psychological than supernatural—and Sei donne per l'assassino was anything but traditional as it laid the ground rules for what the horror genre would become in the decades ahead.

DR. ESWAI (Giacomo Rossi-Stuart) arrives in Karmingen.

For his next film, Bava returned to his roots with an unnerving ghost story set in a rustic, Old World milieu that hearkened back to the "Once Upon a Time" settings of La maschera del demonio and I tre volti della paura. In some ways adventurous, progressive, and eccentric, Operazione paura is also the purest of Bava's horror films: it was made without American stars and without American International interference, on less than half its allotted budget; it reflects the kind of horror film that could be made, as Bava liked to say, "solamente in Italia." Moreso than any other Bava film, it achieves a perfect synthesis of horror and poetry, realism and surrealism, color and atmosphere, classicism and innovation.

The director explained how it came about: "I once made a film in twelve days as a bet with some Americans, in which [the ghost of] a little girl appears to certain people and drives them to suicide. The film was improvised from a thirty-page script that was written on the spot. Later, an article was published that said this film earned a place for me in the history of cinema." [1]

Bava's inclination to colorful exaggeration is somewhat in evidence here. The film's lead actress, Erika Blanc, insists that it was filmed over a somewhat longer period of time: "Twelve days?" she laughs. "No, no—maybe twenty." (According to Lamberto Bava, the schedule was four weeks.) However, both Erika and Lamberto corroborate the incredible story that Operazione paura was largely a product of improvisation, with the actors inventing their dialogue from rough outlines handed to them in advance of each new camera set-up. The screenplay, as such, is credited to the writing team of Romano Migliorini and Roberto Natale, who previously signed two other horror scripts: Massimo Pupillo's Il boia scarlatto/Bloody Pit of Horror (1965, starring Mickey Hargitay) and Ralph Zucker's Cinque tombe per un medium/Terror Creatures From the Grave (1966). All three films shared production personnel and studio space; the family crypt at Villa Graps was built on the same sound stage as the dungeon of Il boia scarlatto's Crimson Executioner, and both sets share some of the same furnishings. Also, Cinque tombe per un medium has so much in common with Operazione paura, in terms of theme and specific scenes, that the screenplay for Bava's film may well have been improvised from the floor plan of the earlier script.

Regardless of how quickly or haphazardly it was made, Bava was not bending the truth when he noted the respect accorded to his film by the critical and artistic communities. Phil Hardy's Aurum Film Encyclopedia: Horror called it "one of [Bava's], and therefore one of the genre's, best pictures," and over the years, it has noticeably influenced the work of such filmmakers as Federico Fellini, Luchino Visconti, Nicolas Roeg, Roman Polanski, Martin Scorsese, David Lynch, and numerous others—including Bava's own son.

"Of all the films made by my father, Operazione paura is the one I like best," Lamberto Bava enthuses. "I like the film very much, but I also enjoyed the shooting. It was made in a very short time with a very good, small crew in a strange little village. The locations

Operazione paura

"Operation: Fear"
Filmed at Titanus Appia Studios, Villa Lancelotti (Frascati), and on location in Calcata and Faleria, Italy
February – March 1966
First released: July 8, 1966
Eastmancolor, "Schermo Panoramico," 1.85:1, 83 minutes

Production: FUL Films. Producers: Nando Pisani, Luciano Catenacci. Director: Mario Bava. Screenplay: Romano Migliorini, Roberto Natale, Mario Bava. Assistant director: Lamberto Bava. Director of photography: Antonio Rinaldi. Camera operator: Saverio Diamanti. Camera assistant: Salvatore Caruso, C.S.C. Art direction: Sandro Dell'Orco. Makeup: Maurizio Giustini. Wardrobe: Tina Grani. Hairdresser: Maria Teresa Laganga. Production manager: Luciano Catenacci. Production secretary: Rosalba Scavia. Editor: Romana Fortini. Music: Carlo Rustichelli. Sound recordists: Romano Pampaloni, Armando Tarzia. Recorded at CDS Studios, Rome. Distributor: INDIEF.

Additional US credits: English soundtrack scripted by John Hart. Directed by Lewis E. Cianelli.

Giacomo Rossi-Stuart (Dr. Paul Eswai), Erika Blanc (Monika Schuftan), Fabienne Dali (Ruth), Piero Lulli (Inspector Kruger), Max Lawrence [Luciano Catenacci] (Karl), Micaela Esdra (Nadine), Gianna Vivaldi [Giovanna Galletti] (Baroness Graps), Giuseppe Addobbatti (innkeeper), Franca Dominici (innkeeper's wife), Mirella Pamphili (Irene Hollander), Valerio Valeri (Melissa Graps).

Argentina: Mata, Bebé, Mata, "Kill, Baby, Kill," Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 1969
France: Operation Peur
Germany: Die Toten Augen des Dr. Dracula, "The Dead Eyes of Dr. Dracula," Alpha Film–Nobis, 3/13/70, 83m. Dr. Dracula—eine Bestie schlägt zu, "Dr. Dracula—A Beast Strikes," UFA, (8 mm)
Japan: Kill Baby Kill, 20th Century-Fox
UK: Curse of the Dead, Miracle Films Ltd., 6/67, 83m 24s, Certificate "X," passed with no cuts
US: Kill, Baby . . . Kill!, Europix Consolidated Corporation, 10/66, 84m; Reissue: Curse of the Living Dead, Europix Consolidated Corporation, 7/73, 75m
US (Spanish-American): Mata Bebé Mata, "Kill Baby Kill," Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 1969

were just as beautiful and mysterious in life as they appear on the screen. It is a special film that I remember with great affection."

Synopsis

The year is 1907. In the remote, rustic village of Karmingen, where life is still lived as in earlier centuries, a frightened young woman climbs the stairs of a derelict building as though goaded by some unseen force. Reaching the top of the stairs, she jumps to her death, as though fighting her own will to survive, impaling herself on the spikes of an iron gate. Leaving the scene of this apparent suicide is a young girl, giggling in the wake of death.

Dr. Paul Eswai, a coroner, is summoned to Karmingen to perform an autopsy on the body of the suicide, who is identified as a servant girl named Irene Hollander. Upon arriving, Eswai sees a coffin being carried in haste to the village cemetery on the shoulders of four men in red hoods. He moves on, greeted with cold suspicion by the villagers at the local inn—until the arrival of Karl, the burgomaster, who escorts him to the makeshift office of Police Inspector Kruger.

Kruger tells Eswai that the dead woman was a servant at Villa Graps, seat of the local Barony, who posted a letter to his office—vivid with the dread of dying—shortly before her body was discovered, claiming that the answers to a series of local deaths could be found at Villa Graps. During their meeting, Eswai and Kruger are notified that two local men, Rudolph and Oscar, are—at that very moment—hastily burying Irene's body to prevent it from being "desecrated" by Eswai's autopsy. They arrive at the cemetery in time to preempt the burial and retrieve the corpse. Eswai is assisted in the autopsy by Monika Schuftan, an attractive medical student who left Karmingen as an infant, and who happened to return to her birthplace on the day Irene died. Eswai's post mortem discloses a strange discovery: a gold coin implanted in Irene's heart. Monika explains the finding with an ancient local legend: "Only with money in the heart can a body that has suffered a violent death ever rest in peace."

That night, after escorting Monika to her rooming house, Eswai is accosted in the foggy streets by Rudolph and Oscar, now wielding knives, but is saved by the mystical intervention of Ruth,[2] a local witch. Exhausted and confused, Eswai returns to the inn, where Nadine—the daughter of innkeepers Hans and Martha—informs him that Kruger has gone to Villa Graps in search of answers. Asking when Kruger will return, Nadine replies without thinking, "You don't come back from Villa Graps!" Sensing that she has said too much, Nadine flees the room and sees the face of a blonde little girl gazing at her spitefully through her frosted bedroom window—the face of Melissa Graps.

Unknown to Eswai, the townsfolk of Karmingen are haunted by the guilty memory of Melissa, the 7-year-old daughter of the local Barony, who was trampled to death by horses while running after her ball during a village festival twenty years earlier. As she rang the bell in the town's church tower for help, the villagers came . . . but not to her rescue, watching her bleed to death—as though astonished that a blue-blood bled red like anyone else. Now, the vengeful spectre of this child appears to anyone who dares speak her name, compelling them to acts of self-annihilation.

Nadine's parents summon Ruth to exorcise the hovering malevolent spirit, but her ancient birch-whipping and leech vine treatments are interrupted by Eswai, who is outraged by these abusive, superstitious cures. He gives the girl's mother some medicine to administer—"no more than twenty drops"—but after much feverish anticipation on Nadine's part, Melissa reappears outside her window and compels her to impale herself on the sharp, decorative projection of a gas lamp.

Eswai pursues Kruger to Villa Graps, a foreboding and neglected mansion of bending, disorienting corridors, ominous portraits and staircases that spiral upwards into color and down into darkness. The Baroness Graps, demented by decades of isolation and anger, denies that Kruger has been to see her and warns Eswai, "Get out of my sight, or you'll be sorry." While looking for an exit, Eswai encounters a child who introduces herself as Melissa and promptly disappears. He follows her disembodied laughter and bouncing ball into the darkness, losing sight of her. Meanwhile, across town, Monika has a nightmare filled with strange, prophetic images. She awakens to find a doll from her nightmare resting on the foot of her bed; it

ESWAI performs an autopsy on Irene Hollander (Mirella Pamphili) with Monika assisting.

1 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

2 "Marthe" in French prints. In English-language prints, this is the name given to the innkeeper's wife.

RUTH (Fabienne Dalí) startles the innkeeper (Giuseppe Addobbatti) with her arrival.

SUPERSTITION calls for superstitious cures, as Ruth whips Nadine (Micaela Esdra) with birches to expel the evil forces gripping her.

ESWAI is appalled to discover ancient "cures" like leech vines being used to help Nadine.

disappears into thin air moments after she touches it. Terrified, she races to the room next door to beg shelter, but her neighbor, Frau Morgan, refuses to admit her because she "shouldn't have touched that dead girl"—meaning the corpse of Irene Hollander, but establishing a link between the doll and the little dead girl who once owned it.

Turned away by her neighbors, Monika races into the street and meets Eswai, who blames her nightmare on her participation in the autopsy. Then, together, they witness something that cannot be explained: the sight of the bell of the village church—now a long abandoned ruin—ringing twelve times, though untolled, simulating Melissa's summons of twenty years ago. They later find Kruger in the cemetery, a bullet hole in his temple. Eswai and Monika report these mysteries to Karl—now revealed as Ruth's lover—who uses the opportunity as an excuse to make even greater revelations. He confesses to Monika that the Schuftans were not her real parents. "The answers you're looking for can be found only at Villa Graps," he says, leaving the room to retrieve some explanatory papers left in his care by the Schuftans. Opening the armoire where his special papers are kept, he finds Melissa's ghost clutching the documents! By the time Eswai and Monika can respond to his screams, Karl has slit his own throat with a sickle. The documents related to Monika's birth lie in ashes on the floor.

Eswai accompanies Monika to Villa Graps, where Monika discovers the wrought-iron gate she saw in her dream. The path beyond it also seems oddly familiar to her. It leads them into the Graps family crypt, of which Melissa's tomb, dated 1880–1887, is the centerpiece—along with another. "Twenty years ago," Monika realizes, noting that this was the time of her departure from Karmingen. Together they enter the villa and confront Baroness Graps with their information, which the haggard woman confirms without hesitation. The Baroness admits that Monika is her younger daughter, whom she hoped to shield from her sister's spectral rage by entrusting her care to her servants, the Schuftans. It becomes obvious that Melissa's ghost has assumed its power from the Baroness' refusal to forgive the villagers for letting her die; she is in fact a medium whose anger has bred an exterminating angel. As she shows Monika and Eswai the dolls in Melissa's old room, Melissa herself is manifest among them—opening a metaphysical labyrinth, a Mobius strip, in which Eswai becomes momentarily lost, comes face-to-face with his own doppelgänger, and is then ejected from the villa through a rift in space where reality and art become one.

Meanwhile, Monika is drawn into a similar cycle, trapped in an endless repetition of the villa's spiral staircase, until she swoons. She awakens in the Graps crypt, where she now discovers a tomb, beside Melissa's, where her own name is engraved: Monika Graps, born 1886, the death date blank. A vision of her older sister, a fatal temptation preserved in spirit at the moment of its premature death, appears before her.

Before the ghost can urge Monika to leap to her death from a precipice outside, Ruth suddenly appears elsewhere in the villa—angered by Karl's death—and revokes a protective spell she has placed over the Baroness by killing her. On the verge of death, the Baroness stabs Ruth in the heart with a fireplace poker. As the two women perish with their grief, Melissa's ghost vanishes into nothingness. Eswai rescues Monika from the edge of the precipice as it crumbles. The nightmare ended, the couple exit the villa together, as the sun rises on Karmingen—seemingly for the first time.

SANDRO DELL'ORCO provided the rustic art direction for Bava's spectral masterpiece.

Migliorini and Natale's scenario shares a number of story elements in common with Roy William Neill's The Scarlet Claw, a Sherlock Holmes mystery produced by Universal Pictures in 1944. In this original thriller, scripted by Edmund L. Hartmann and Neill from a treatment by Paul Gangelin and Brenda Weisberg, Holmes (Basil Rathbone) and Dr. Watson (Nigel Bruce) are summoned to a small, timeless hamlet called Le Mort Rouge ("The Red Death") in French Canada, where a number of locals are found dead with their throats torn out, supposedly by a ghost haunting the village. The story begins with the death of Lady Penrose, the wife of Lord Penrose (a leading advocate of the occult sciences), who dies bleeding to death while ringing the local church bell for assistance that never comes. Despite advice to the contrary, Holmes travels to Le Mort Rouge intending to prove that the death of Lady Penrose was caused by rational rather than supernatural means, which makes him unwelcome in the eyes of the superstitious townsfolk. Holmes and Watson examine the corpse of Lady Penrose and take a room at the local inn, where they interfere with the abuse of the innkeeper's young daughter at the hands of her superstitiously frightened father; the girl is later found dead, her throat pierced like all the other victims. The murders are eventually traced to an actor who uses phosphorescent paint on his clothing to adopt a spectral glow and a gardener's weeder as his "claw." The last of the murders is committed while the killer is in drag (an interesting detail for reasons that will become apparent shortly).

Another notable cinematic antecedent is Wolf Rilla's Village of the Damned (1960), based on John Wyndham's 1957 novel The Midwich Cuckoos. Here, a race of similarly blonde, supernatural children—in this case, of alien origin—demonstrated their capacity for committing murders while keeping blood off their hands, by psychically compelling their victims to suicide. In the first scene that shows them demonstrating their power, they act in response to being accidentally struck by a normal child's ball.

Production & Cast

Retrospectives of Italian horror bracket the years 1957–66 as its "Golden Age." Just as I vampiri marks the beginning of this stimulating and fertile period, Operazione paura is often cited as its grande finale. It was not the last Italian horror film to be produced within this cycle, but it was the last to be widely distributed. It was also one of the last films to be made at Titanus Appia Studios—the former Scalera Film sound stages where Bava had formally begun his directorial career six years earlier with La maschera del demonio—which, in 1966, stood on the verge of bankruptcy. It was on the same sound stage where Javutich rose from his grave, and where Dr. Kruvajan was impaled through his eye, in the cemetery of that earlier film that Melissa Graps floated to and fro, past the camera on her spectral swing, in a different yet familiar graveyard setting.

The establishing shots of Karmingen seen in Operazione paura actually show the village of Calcata, a medieval village of stone houses huddled atop a plateau in the Treja valley of southern Tuscany, about 50 kilometers outside of Rome. A quiet, verdant village that seems to exist outside time, Calcata is one of the most haunting and unusual natural locations ever showcased in a horror film, and it is remarkable that it has not used in films more often. Certain 20th century conveniences such as electricity and running water have been available in Calcata only since the 1990s, which added to the difficulties of filming the movie.

ESWAI and Monika Schuftan bond with one another while investigating the mystery of Villa Graps.

"Calcata was another dead city, like Canale Monterano," remembers Lamberto Bava, in reference to the locations where parts of "I wurdalak" were filmed. "Abandoned, constructed on a mountain of tufa, a material that has crumbled over the centuries, like many countries of the high Lazio. The Anticamente constructed its cities high atop hills in order to defend itself against invaders. When it began to collapse, it was virtually abandoned, but in the late 1960s, it became a kind of hippie community."

While Calcata provided the general view of Karmingen, and also some of its particular locations, the majority of the film's exteriors were shot in Faleria, about five miles north-east of Calcata. A notable Falerian landmark seen in the film is the Parrochia di San Giuliano, a church built in 1298, which is the site of the mysteriously tolling bell tower. Another "dead, medieval city," Faleria was entirely vacated for many years in the wake of a catastrophic earthquake that struck the region in 1942.

Filming commenced in November 1965, and the actors were grateful for the period setting of the piece, as it allowed them to endure the chilly, all-night shootings in warm, layered, turn-of-the-century apparel—much of it authentic vintage clothing provided by wardrobe mistress Tina Grani. "During the shooting it was bitterly cold," recalls Lamberto Bava, "and I remember the actors huddled each night around a large fireplace. It was a very difficult undertaking to pry them away from there to shoot a scene!"

Some of the film's exteriors, such as the village cemetery, were actually studio interiors designed by Bava and his young scenographer, Alessandro "Sandro" Dell'Orco. Dell'Orco would go on to become a gifted art director in his own right, later ascending in his profession to such productions as Jean-Jacques Beineix' La lune dans le caniveau/The Moon in the Gutter (1983) and Bernardo Bertolucci's The Sheltering Sky (1990).

Standing in for Villa Graps—exteriors and some interiors—was Villa Lancelotti, located in the lush Italian wine country of Frascati, about 30 kilometers outside of Rome, at the intersection of Via Catone, Via Piccolomini, and Via Sant' Angelo in the town's south quarter. Originally built as Villa Piccolomini in the 16th century and rebuilt in the 1700s, Villa Lancelotti was the home of King Charles Emanuel IV of Sardinia (later King Charles IV) in the late 18th and early 19th centuries. Villa Lancelotti made its Italian horror debut in Lionello De Felice's La lama nel corpo/The Murder Clinic (1966), produced by Elio Scardamaglia just a short time before Operazione paura went into production. In reality, Villa Lancelotti is one of the great garden showcases among Frascati villas, but in both La lama nel corpo and Operazione paura, it looms out of the darkness as a facade of foreboding gloom, a barren moonscape cratered with empty windows. Lamberto Bava remembers that the location was brought to his father's attention by "a very handsome guy . . . who happened to be kidnapped some years later, and the villa had to be sold to pay the ransom."

Some of the settings in Operazione paura also figure in other Italian horror films of the "golden age," as well. In the opening scene, Irene Hollander commits suicide by jumping from the same tower where Katia (Maria Giovanninni) fell to her death in Piero Regnoli's L'ultima preda del vampiro/The Playgirls and the Vampire (1960); the Villa Lancelotti corridor where Eswai first encounters Melissa can also be seen in Paul Morrissey's Blood for Dracula/Andy Warhol's Dracula (1973) and Andrea Bianchi's Le notti del terrore/Burial Ground (1981); and the spiral staircase at Villa Graps was previously featured in Camillo Mastrocinque's La cripta e l'incubo/Terror in the Crypt (1964). Several of the film's other locations, as well as its moody graveyard set, also appeared in Massimo Pupillo's La vendetta di Lady Morgan ("The Vengeance of Lady Morgan,"1966), truly the last gasp of Italian horror's "Golden Age"—which went into production two or three weeks after the completion of Bava's film.

The Americans who made the bet with Bava that allegedly begot this film could not be identified, but they were somehow affiliated with Europix Consolidated Corporation, the New York-based company that released it in America one year after its completion, in the weeks preceding Halloween 1967. Founded by Herbert D. Schimmel and his brother Stuart B. Schimmel, former partners in a New York certified public accounting firm, Europix had been in operation since 1963, when its first acquisition—a West German/Yugoslav co-production called Verführung am Meer, starring Elke Sommer—was distributed to "Adults Only" theaters under the title Seduction by the Sea. When "nudie-cutie" features declined in popularity, Europix turned to horror films, beginning with a successful double bill of two 1965 productions: Michael Reeves' La sorella di Satana and Dino Tavella's Il mostro di Venezia, which the company retitled, respectively, The She Beast and The Embalmer. ("Deadlier Than Dracula! More Frightening Than Frankenstein!" the ads trumpeted.) If Bava's story about the origin of his film is correct, Operazione paura was Europix's first excursion into active film production—which would also explain the concurrent metamorphosis of Europix Consolidated into Europix-International, Ltd.

THE VILLAGE of Karmingen is governed by supernatural forces—as is reflected in the love affair between Burgomeister Karl ("Max Lawrence" a.k.a. Luciano Catenacci) and Ruth, the town witch.

ANOTHER great art direction shot, this one showing Baroness Graps ("Gianna Vivaldi" a.k.a. Giovanna Galletti) summoning the ghost of her dead child, Melissa.

The film's credited producers were Nando Pisani and Luciano Catenacci, both rising above their usual stations for the first (and last) time. Pisani was an experienced production manager, having worked on such pictures as Roberto Rossellini's Dov'è la libertà . . . ? (1952) and Giorgio Bianchi's Gli attendenti (1961), while Catenacci worked principally as an actor under the nom d'ecran "Max Lawrence." Here, Catenacci extended the film's threadbare budget by doing triple duty as producer, production manager, and actor, shaving his head to play the town's burgomaster, Karl.

Bava recalled that the film was titled Operazione paura "because the star was the one from the James Bond movies."[3] In fact, Erika Blanc never appeared in a Bond picture, nor did she ever appear in any of the several spy pictures produced in Italy whose titles began with the recurring word Operazione. However, she had appeared in two other spy programmers—Sergio Grieco's Agente 077 missione Bloody Mary (released in Spain as Operacion Lota Azul and in France as Operation Lotus Bleu) and Domenico Paolella's Agente 033 operazione Atlantide (both 1965). It is therefore doubtful that the titling of the picture had anything to do with Blanc's casting, unless it was rooted in a misunderstanding.

Born Enrica Bianchi Colombatto on July 23, 1942, in Brescia, Erika Blanc was discovered while visiting her husband, future director Bruno Gaburro, on the set of a film where he was employed as an assistant director. "I started going to the sets to see Bruno and, right away, producers and directors started approaching me, asking if I was interested in becoming an actress," she recalls. "I never thought about it before, but I said I didn't mind."

Published filmographies disagree, but Blanc insists that her first film was Il terzo occhio ("The Third Eye," 1966), a tale of necrophilic passion starring Franco Nero, produced by I vampiri's Ermanno Donati and Luigi Carpentieri and directed by Mino Guerrini—who worked under the pseudonym "James Warren."[4] She also maintains that Operazione paura was her second film, but it could not be, given that its title was supposedly chosen to capitalize on her earlier spy roles. Within twenty days of completing the Bava film, Erika returned to the same locations to play a malicious governess in La vendetta di Lady Morgan. Looking more German or Scandanavian than Italian, this strawberry blonde left an indelible mark on the Italian cinema of the 1960s, starring in spy films, Westerns, romances, erotica, and horror films with a pronouncedly fetishistic bent. Among her outstanding achievements in the latter category were Jean Brismée's Le Plus Longue Nuit du Diable/The Devil's Nightmare (1971) and Emilio Miraglia's La notte che Evelyn uscì dalla tomba/The Night Evelyn Came Out of the Grave (also '71), in which she performs a stupendous striptease that begins with her oozing out of a coffin while wearing thigh-high leather boots. Today, Erika Blanc—in real life, a charming eccentric who smokes a Meerschauum pipe—is considered one of Italy's top theatrical actresses, and she continues to make intermittent onscreen appearances, such as her 1991 cameo in Lamberto Bava's violent thriller Corpo mosaico/Body Puzzle.

Cast in the male lead role of Dr. Paul Eswai was Giacomo Rossi-Stuart, happy to work with Bava again after their reunion on I coltelli del vendicatore. This, their third and definitive collaboration, would also be their last, though Rossi-Stuart continued to be active in Italian popular cinema for almost another twenty-five years. He died in 1992, two years after his last picture, Umberto Lenzi's Gates of Hell (1990). The sons of Bava and Rossi-Stuart perpetuated the collaborations of their families in the first four installments of RAI-TV's popular series of fantasy films Fantaghirò/The Cave of the Golden Rose (1991–94)—directed by Lamberto Bava, and starring Kim Rossi-Stuart.

Though she remains well-covered as Ruth, French-born Fabienne Dalí found her fame as a European sex starlet. She appeared topless in Max Pecas' Le Baie di Désir/The Erotic Touch of Hot Skin (1964), and modelled revealing wardrobe in Sergio

3 Abruzzese.

4 Not to be confused with the James Warren who starred in the 1953 sci-fi film Port Sinister, or the James Warren who published the long-running American horror film magazine Famous Monsters of Filmland.

Grieco's Agente 077—dell'Oriente con furore/From the Orient with Fury (1965). According to Erika Blanc, "Fabienne took her role [as the witch] so much to heart that she began studying the Tarot and offered card readings to the film company during our breaks."

Piero Lulli, who had played the villainous Bill Carter in Ringo del Nebraska, was cast as the heroic Inspector Kruger—just one of the film's many deliberate inversions.

As previously mentioned, the role of Kurt—credited to "Max Lawrence"—was in fact played by Luciano Catenacci, the film's co-producer and production manager. He had been acting under the "Max Lawrence" name since 1965, when he appeared in Giancarlo Romitelli's spy opus Mark Donen agente Zeta 7. His career as a moonlighting actor lasted somewhat longer than his daytime work as a producer. He subsequently appeared in the unbilled role of a family physician in La vendetta di Lady Morgan, hiding his identity under slightly more hair, a pair of antique spectacles, and a meek demeanor. He resurfaced as an actor, under the new pseudonym "Luciano Lorcas," in Giorgio Ferroni's La battaglia di El Alamein (1968), and was subsequently featured in Sergio Bergonzelli's Nelle pieghe della carne/In the Folds of the Flesh (1970), Ferdinando Baldi's Afyon oppio/The Sicilian Connection (1972), and Sergio Corbucci's Pari e dispari/Odds and Ends (1978), among many others.

Lamberto Bava remembers his father directing Catenacci with difficulty: "He wasn't an experienced actor, so he got nervous and wasn't able to act. Mario directed him angrily, repeating, 'Don't move! Don't worry about the lines; Lamberto will prompt you. Just repeat what he says, don't move and don't knit your brows!' Actually he had these long pauses in his dialogue, which gave me time to prompt him. It looked like he was thinking of something very profound, something that tormented him, and because of that, Mario sometimes chose to pan away from him to the actress."

According to Australian documentary filmmaker Brendan Young, who befriended the producer–actor in the years just prior to his death on October 4, 1990, Catenacci resigned from the world of filmmaking and relocated with his family from Rome to Melbourne, where he worked as a baker.

MELISSA GRAPS, the great ghost-child of Italian cinema, was played by Valerio Valeri, the 7-year-old son of the production office's caretaker.

The innkeepers, Hans and Martha, were played by Giuseppe Addobbatti and Franca Dominici. Addobbatti (b. 1909), who sometimes worked under the names "John Douglas" and "John MacDouglas," had been active in films since the 1930s. His films include Il mostro dell'opera/The Vampire of the Opera (1961), Ursus nella terra di fuoco/Ursus in the Land of Fire (1963), the Spaghetti Western classic Django (1966), and Bernardo Bertolucci's Il conformista/The Conformist (1970). No other credits for Franca Dominici could be ascertained, though it is known that she was not related to actor Arturo Dominici.

The introductory role of Irene Hollander was played by Mirella Pamphili, whom the credits mention was then a student at the Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografica. Though she appears only briefly in this early role, Pamphili appeared in over two dozen films between 1965 and 1969, including the James Bond spoof O. K. Connery/Operation Kid Brother (1967), Satanik (1967), Federico Fellini's Satyricon (1968), Il dolce corpo di Deborah/The Sweet Body of Deborah (1968), Jess Franco's Venus in Furs (1969) and Femina ridens/The Laughing Woman (1969).

The actress who played Baroness Graps is credited as Gianna Vivaldi, but was in fact Giovanna Galletti, a veteran stage and screen performer. Born to Italian parents in Siam in 1916, Galletti had been active in Italian films since the 1930s. She had previously worked with Bava on Le meraviglie di Aladino, in which she played the small role of a midwife. Among her other screen credits: Roberto Rossellini's Roma città aperta/Open City (1945), John Huston's La bibbia/The Bible—In the Beginning (1966), and Bernardo Bertolucci's Ultimo tango a Parigi/Last Tango in Paris (1972).

The film's most uncanny casting story concerns the role of Melissa Graps. According to Lamberto Bava, his father auditioned hundreds of girls for the part but none of them had "the necessary quality." At the eleventh hour, a frustrated Mario Bava was astonished to discover that necessary quality standing right under his nose, in the person of Valerio Valeri—the young son of the portière at the production's main office. As incredible as it may seem, the role of Melissa was played by a 7-year-old boy in drag.

"The little boy, Valerio Valeri, was not at all enamored with having to dress up as a girl," Rosalba Scavia recalls, "but he hoped it might be the start of a film career. Mario told him never to blink, and I remember he would complain of headaches from having to go for so long without blinking in his scenes."

Erika Blanc erupts in merriment when reminded of the boy's name today. She agrees that Valerio had an almost incandescent hatred of the long blonde wig and Victorian dress he was obliged to wear, and that the force of Melissa's eerie, unblinking gaze was summoned from the depths of Valerio's own blazing, offended machismo. To everyone's amusement, Bava delighted in goading the boy's performance by addressing him as "Valeria . . . perdonami—Valerio." This made the boy seethe with quiet rage, to which Bava would theatrically respond by knocking on wood and pretending to ward off chills.

Operazione paura appears to have been Valerio's only movie role, though an actress named Valeria Valeri was active in the Italian dubbing industry during this period. Locating the boy who played Melissa Graps, one of the most influential monsters in the history of horror cinema, has proved impossible. At last check, there were about three dozen Valerio Valeris in the Roman telephone directory.

Two weeks into the filming, producers Pisani and Catenacci ran out of money, and for a short while it seemed that Operazione paura would not be completed. Bava summoned his cast and crew around him to apprise them the situation, explaining that they would have to shut down until the necessary funds could be found to complete the picture. To his amazement, everyone agreed on the spot to continue working without pay.

"We all liked the story very much," explains Erika Blanc, "but more importantly, we were all very fond of Mario. We wanted to help him finish the movie."

Considering that Bava's AIP films, those with international stars, were usually budgeted at $100,000–150,000, it seems likely that Operazione paura—made on a half-budget with no name stars—was completed for less than $50,000. Regardless of the spontaneous generosity of his cast and crew, Bava still had to see the film through to completion within extraordinarily tight economic guidelines. This surely impacted the week of special effects shooting that was reserved for the last week of production. One likely sacrifice can be detected by paying close attention to the dialogue between Monika and Baroness Graps as the film approaches its climax, where there is reference to the Baroness about to be visited and destroyed by the dead souls of Melissa's victims. That J'accuse procession never materializes, being preempted by Ruth's far more economic, heroic act of vengeance. This change was actually fortunate, because the more epic finale would have essentially reprised the climaxes of a past Bava film (Ercole al centro della terra) and also a future one (Baron Blood), thus weakening all three pictures in retrospect with redundancy.

But Operazione paura is less a film about special effects than cinematic sleight-of-hand and visual ingenuity. It is doubtful that the film had to forfeit much more than its climactic siege of the undead. Assorted in-camera tricks are peppered throughout the picture, beginning with the "water glass" effect seen during Irena Hollander's subjective view of the spiked fence, which is used again halfway through the main titles sequence, as Melissa's giggling ghost steps offscreen, leaving ripples in her wake. Similar in effect are the shots of the Baroness Graps' face, stretching and distorting as she extends her will into the Beyond, achieved by photographing Giovanna Galletti's reflection in an ordinary mirror, which was then tipped backwards and forwards to impart the impression of a funhouse mirror. But when all is said and done, the film's greatest illusion is Melissa Graps herself. With young Valerio Valeri's dark hair pinned under a long blonde wig, the illusion of femininity is a triumph for makeup artist Maurizio Giustini.

Melissa's various appearances are given a special air of mystery because she is almost never shown from head to toe. Instead, the child's ghost was shown only in segments: a hand pressed against a window pane, two buckled shoes walking gingerly down a flight of stairs in moonlight, in quick flashes as it darts in or out of a corridor. Melissa's most startling appearance occurs in the context of a camera trick that unexpectedly seats her at the end of a queue of dolls. In other shots—as Bava had done many times before, borrowing a page from Jean Cocteau—Valerio Valeri was placed on a caster board, to impart a "floating" effect, as he was carried toward a frosted window with arms outstretched. To make these shots even more inexplicably strange, Bava had them filmed in reverse, as Valeri was pulled away from the windows. Melissa's disappearance into thin air, at the film's conclusion, was simply achieved by dimming the light that projected Valeri's reflection onto an angled pane of glass.

MELISSA peers through a window at Nadine, compelling her to commit suicide.

I must confess to still being uncertain whether one shot in the movie is a trick or not—namely, an easily overlooked shot in which the gravediggers Rudolph and Oscar are shown carrying the corpse of Inspector Kruger toward the cemetery. The shot is indistinguishable from reality, yet the cemetery was a studio set, and the road in question was an actual location, so the two would not converge as they do in this shot. One explanation is that a color slide of the studio cemetery set was projected, at night, onto a wall as the actors carried their bundle toward it; this is a plausible explanation, because the shot cuts to the next setup before Rudolph and Oscar can cross the threshold into the necropolis, However, it is just as possible that some prop headstones were taken to the location and arranged within the shot. Having looked at numerous different prints, videotapes and DVD sources, the shot offers a conflicting explanation every time I see it, and I must admit that, here, Bava has me fooled.

As photographed by Antonio Rinaldi, Operazione paura has a visual character that is hard to explain. Filmed on Eastmancolor stock—with prints developed either in Eastmancolor or in Technicolor, depending on where you see it—its foggy, moss-laden exteriors are as intoxicatingly colorful and atmospheric as anything in Bava's most expensive pictures, when seen in a proper Technicolor print. There are minor touches (like a hint of green on a cobweb in Villa Graps) that are quite remarkable, but the greens were the first thing to go in the domestically circulated prints that played in American drive-in theaters and on television. Additionally, the texture of the film stock itself looks a bit coarse and moldy throughout. The opening exterior preamble to Irene Hollander's suicide, the exterior views of Villa Graps, and also the scenes at the inn look uncharacteristically washed-out and lacking in detail, in even the best prints circulating today. This, combined with Rinaldi's jagged zoom thrusts, give the picture a personality unlike any other in the Bava canon, and when such crude means are applied to the presentation of such psychologically resonant images, one has the impression of seeing raw dream imagery transferred to film.

ITALIAN locandina, art by Averardo Ciriello.

No good deed goes unpunished, they say—and although it was the cast and crew's devotion to their director that got the film completed, Mario Bava himself was never paid for directing Operazione paura. He resented the producers for abandoning him after he finished it, but he took the experience philosophically. As he summarized: "At least they left me with a film I love." [5]

Music

The more familiar one is with the history of Italian horror cinema, the more aware one is bound to be of the ragged, recycled nature of Operazione paura's musical score. The score is credited to Carlo Rustichelli, who had no recollection of working on it. "I don't remember the music—I don't even remember the film," he chuckled. "It could be that they used my music without me knowing about it. After all, to engage a symphonic orchestra costs a great deal of money."

It isn't surprising that Rustichelli doesn't remember Operazione paura. It is a patchwork score consisting solely of library tracks from the CAM Music library, much of which—but not all—was composed by Rustichelli, including several mysterioso cues written and recorded for La frusta e il corpo. In addition to making use of music written by Rustichelli, the score includes samplings from the past work of Roman Vlad, Armando Trovajoli, Francesco De Masi, and Angelo Francesco Lavagnino. Some of the music heard in Operazione paura was recorded as much as ten years before it was made, as in the case of a cue from Vlad's I vampiri score.

During the autopsy, when Monika is startled by the shadow of a moth drawn to the flame of a lantern, her fright is underscored with a cue composed by Roman Vlad for I vampiri. Other I vampiri compositions are heard during Eswai's initial approach of Villa Graps, during Ruth's "treatment" of Nadine's curse, and during Monika's prophetic nightmare montage. When Eswai questions Nadine about Inspector Kruger's visit to Villa Graps, her classic line "You don't come back from Villa Graps!" is followed by baleful Rustichelli music from Antonio Margheriti's I lunghi capelli della morte/The Long Hair of Death (1964); other excerpts from this cue are heard during the meeting of Ruth and Karl in her cottage, and during the agonizing scene in which Melissa compels Nadine to kill herself.

The music heard during Eswai's initial encounter with Baroness Graps was composed by Francesco De Masi for La lama nel corpo, as was the bittersweet theme heard at the very end of the picture, as Eswai and Monika walk toward a new sunrise; this track appears on the rare CAM soundtrack album of La lama nel corpo under the title "Verso del Speranza" ("Outpouring of Hope"). The climactic scene of Monika running away from her spectral encounter with Melissa in Villa Graps is scored with a vertiginous Roman Vlad cue from Riccardo Freda's Lo spettro/The Ghost (1963). There are one or two other cues—particularly the almost subliminal electronic hum heard as Eswai first arrives in Karmingen and enters the tavern, with its sustained, hovering, finger-round-the-wineglass-rim note—which originate from Armando Trovajoli's score for Ottavio Alessi's dark comedy Chè fine ha fatto Totò Baby?/Whatever Happened to Baby Totò? (1964), as does the macabre "music box" theme that recurs throughout Operazione paura. The specific contributions of Angelo Francesco Lavagnino have not been determined.

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by Averardo Ciriello.

While the recycling of familiar cues is disturbing to some who feel that it degrades an otherwise original film, the resulting patchwork of music also reinforces Operazione paura's spectral atmosphere in extraordinary ways. This is surely accidental, as it was hardly anyone's intention that the audience should recognize the music from other movies, but if we do, our recognition imbues the film with a sense of déjà vu, which resonates well not only with the Oedipal subtext of Monika's self-discovery but also the film's emphases of doubled and inverted images. Though cobbled together from a half-dozen sources of varied vintage, the tracks coalesce into a superbly atmospheric score. Only once does a musical selection seem inappropriate—when Rustichelli's "Winsor Concerto" from La frusta e il corpo is used to underline the night scene of Eswai escorting Monika to her door, following the autopsy. Despite their tireless devotion to each other's safety, the film really grants the couple no opportunity for romance to blossom, least of all at this early juncture, so the rhapsody would feel inappropriate even had the music not been so sloppily inserted, or belonged so completely to the earlier film.

Samuel Z. Arkoff of AIP, though not involved in the making of this picture, explained how this might have occurred: "Sometimes, the Italians made pictures that had no budget for music, whatsoever. There were several Italian music companies that provided musical soundtracks free, in exchange for publishing and other rights. You would tell 'em what [kind of music] you wanted and they would lay the tracks in."

While there is little about the Operazione paura score that is truly original, the film itself is so unlike anything else proposed within the horror genre (despite its many imitations) that the crude manufacture of its soundscapes is easily taken for granted as part of its off-kilter nature. In some ways, the piecemeal character of the music enhances one's appreciation of the movie as a crowning achievement of a great national period of movie making. Also, with no composer actively involved in the scoring, the music of Operazione paura comes closer than any other picture to presenting us with a score by Mario Bava himself.

Commentary

Though saddled with regrettable titles the world over, Operazione paura stands as a pivotal work in the lineage of horror cinema. In some ways, it represents a turning point in the Gothic horror cycle of the 1960s, showing the way to more intellectual concerns and more complex mysteries. Following its example, though surely not in any studied way, Hammer Films would begin to ask more existential questions of its material in subsequent productions like Terence Fisher's Frankenstein Created Woman (1967) and Roy Ward Baker's Quatermass and the Pit (1968). It would not be incorrect to suggest that Operazione paura occupies, in the chronology of the horror film, a place akin to that of Stanley Kubrick's 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) in the chronology of filmed science fiction. Both movies represent a point of embarkation, when these genres began to venture away from traditional linear narrative toward literally new dimensions in storytelling that dared penetrate into areas ambiguous, abstract, and intuitive. The two films also have in common rational heroes, bound by logic, who embark on an inexplicable, time- and mind-bending adventure and must ultimately submit to the superiority of that which cannot be explained, and could only be diminished by any attempt at rational explanation.

5 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 249–60.

ESWAI finds himself lost in the navel-like labyrinths of Villa Graps.

Though set at the turn of the 20th century, Operazione paura is a film very much of the era in which it was made. It can be argued as belonging to a seemingly unrelated group of 1960s films which might be designated as "Continental Op"—European movies with a visual style influenced by the Op Art movement of the 1950s and '60s. The Op artist most influential to the style of Operazione paura is undoubtedly M. C. Escher (1898–1972), whose poster art was popular in the 1960s for being at once poetical, mathematical, and deceptive to the eye. The close, huddled village of Karmingen recalls Escher's "Ascending and Descending," which portrays a building surrounded by a never-ending stairway. Specific scenes, such as Eswai's run through the looping corridor and his displacement through a portrait of Villa Graps to the point of the artist's original vantage, also introduce sense-defying, spatial ideas worthy of the artist, as do the overhead zooms into the dark core of a spiral staircase bathed in multiple colors.

Operazione paura is also a splendid example of what stood to be gained from Bava's increasingly improvisational approach to filmmaking. While some critics used the occasion of its release to ponder, "When will Bava get a decent script?" the final text is actually one of the strongest he ever had: a mystifying mélange of the logical and the irrational, of strange names and stranger sights—poetic, richly psychological and phantasmal, yet also underpinned with elements of Greek tragedy. A more conscious, deliberate approach to telling this story could only have made it more mundane. By using the script as a basis for improvisation, Bava left the success of the final draft to a vote between his own aesthetic judgment and decisive factors outside his control or understanding. The French novelist and essayist André Gide was another of many artists from Bava's generation who took such an approach to their work. As Gide once put it, "Art is a joint creation of the artist and God—and the less the artist does, the better."

Especially in its English version, which credits the dialogue to John Hart, the characters' words are uncommonly striking:

> "We might as well live on the Moon—hardly anyone comes our way."
>
> "The tombs where you lay your wreaths in devotion is [sic] not where your parents are."
>
> "Only with money in the heart can one who suffers a violent death rest in peace." [6]
>
> "You don't come back from Villa Graps!"

When all is said and done, the convoluted story finally does make perfect sense, though it includes moments in an other-dimensional context which are not given—and should not require—concrete explanation. The ghost of Melissa is ultimately explained as the psychic projection of her vengeful mother, the Baroness Graps, a medium whose anger over her daughter's death has kept her ghost alive, enslaved to her unquenchable thirst for retribution. Being a voracious reader of occult literature, Bava was surely familiar with the Gnostic fable of the Passion of Sophia, which tells that our world first became infused with Evil when the sybil Sophia dared to psychically probe too far into the Beyond, provoking a rupture of cosmic proportions that caused otherworldly forces to bleed into reality. Like Sophia, Baroness Graps may have the purest maternal intentions in trying to make contact with her dead child's spirit, but because she has not dealt consciously with her hostility toward the townspeople of Karmingen (the village name evoking the notion of karma, as well as "come again"), the energy she summons back from the Beyond is also hostile. In this way, Operazione paura is the horror genre's counterpart to the science fiction classic Forbidden Planet (1956), in which the mind of Morbius (Walter Pidgeon) is so increased in capacity by subjections to brain-boosting machinery left behind by the extinct Krell race that he unwittingly unleashes the primal forces of his subconscious in the form of a rampaging Monster of the Id.

Forbidden Planet may well have been in Bava's own subconscious while preparing Operazione paura, as it followed the similarly influenced COCTEAU-like torch-bearing arms guide Eswai's passage through the villa.

Terrore nello spazio. Another inspiration may have been Roger Corman, who has said that he was influenced by readings of Freud while making his Edgar Allan Poe films for AIP. While Corman's Poe films are innovative in their attention to psychological detail and sexual metaphor, their actual Freudian content is simplistic and, as Corman has since admitted, possibly misunderstood.[7] Set in 1907 (we are left to deduce this by ourselves, from the dates on cemetery headstones), Operazione paura delves into matters of the subconscious and paranormal as no other horror film had done before. In 1907, Sigmund Freud's The Interpretation of Dreams was still a comparatively new book, inspiring a new generation of doctors to enter into the practice of psychoanalysis and map the uncharted wilderness which Freud termed "the subconscious." In Operazione paura, the source of evil is subconscious, but this is not as yet a familiar term to the superstitious people of Karmingen, to Inspector Kruger, or to Dr. Eswai, who is merely a forensic surgeon—that is, a medical detective or, more precisely, a death detective. Between Kruger, Eswai, and the townsfolk, the film presents a cross-section of the human animal, divided between the consciousness of law and medical science and the mistier, subconscious terrain of fear and superstition, neither of which is fully apprised of the true laws governing reality. That all three principals are equally in the dark about what's going on is evidence of Bava's personal anti-intellectual stance; it acknowledges that there are some areas of existence in which logic and education are not necessarily an advantage, and may make us more stubbornly unreceptive to the truth.

ESWAI*'s first encounter with Melissa.*

6 An inspired, Surrealist line, but perhaps also the result of an imperfect translation. In Italian, the word argento is synonymous with money and silver; the act of lodging silver in the heart of an agent of evil is an age-old concept.

7 Hear the audio commentaries Corman provided for the DVD releases of his films The Fall of the House of Usher (1960), Pit and the Pendulum (1961), and X—The Man With the X-Ray Eyes (1963).

HEARING Monika's cry of alarm, Eswai pursues a fleeing phantom until he comes face-to-face with his doppelgänger.

RARE shot of Giacomo Rossi-Stuart on set with the stand-in who played his double in the doppelgänger sequence.

Of the various characters involved in this tale, the wisest may well be Ruth, another of Bava's beloved occult women, a tradition encompassing Barbara Steele in La maschera del demonio, Rada Rassimov in Baron Blood, and Laura Betti in Ecologia del delitto, not to mention the various sibyls in his Hercules films—characters who simultaneously embody the fear and attraction of women. Alone of all the characters, Ruth has the wisdom to acknowledge the seen and the unseen, and approaches life in accordance with her own intuitions and the ancient knowledge passed down from mother to daughter, through the generations.

If human psychology is rooted in our perceptions of events in the past, and the way we process memory, the superstitious character of the people of Karmingen may well be ingrained in them by the fact that their village and its way of life have not outwardly changed (read: progressed) in centuries. The past actively coexists with the present; the streets they walk are the same streets walked by people who are long dead. The church where Melissa Graps rang the bell for help, after being trampled, has not been torn down, as it would be by a society determined to put its guilt behind them, but merely abandoned (echoing the chapel ruins of La maschera del demonio and I tre volti della paura's "I wurdalak"), left as an ongoing reproach of the townsfolk's inaction as they watched her bleed to death.

When Nadine, the young innkeeper's daughter, is marked for death by her chance sighting of Melissa's ghost, we see that the curse afflicts more than those who were present at Melissa's death—an event that certainly preceded Nadine's birth. The scene itself is ambiguously blocked, allowing the viewer to interpret it as a genuine haunting, or as an unconsciously willed hallucination. After telling Dr. Eswai "You don't come back from Villa Graps!" Nadine gasps, realizing she has crossed an unpardonable line, and the ghost appears as though summoned by her own sense of guilt. Ruth is likewise summoned—in fact, she is standing right outside, aware that she is needed—and treats the girl by flogging her with a branch and binding her with a leech vine, Old World cures that recall the ancient medical practice of bleeding patients, literally cutting them with knives, to alleviate fevers and contaminations. Lying in her bed, Nadine indeed looks feverish as she chants, "She's chosen me, she's chosen me," as if convincing herself by rote of what must now occur, according to the local belief system. When Melissa appears once again at her window, Nadine moves toward the end of her bed and folds her fingers around the ball-tipped post of its footboard, unconsciously emulating Melissa's stance with her ball. She is clearly in the grip of a dogma hammered into her, through her parents and environment—oppressed to a state of suicidal desperation by a guilty memory not even her own.

The gruelling scene in which Nadine impales herself through the throat on a gas jet recalls a similar one in Cinque tombe per un medium/Terror Creatures From the Grave, also scripted by Romano Migliorini and Roberto Natale earlier the same year. In the earlier film, a wheelchair-bound man is driven by the malefic spirits of a town's plague victims to impale himself on the blade of a sword. Bava remains true to his suggestive aims and shows no blood in the scene, but such is the quality of Micaela Esdra's performance that it remains very difficult to watch.

If Melissa Graps seems a literal embodiment of the allure of death, consider this observation by the American author Shirley Jackson, from her classic ghost novel The Haunting of Hill House: "No ghost in all the long histories of ghosts has ever hurt anyone physically. The only damage done is by the victim to himself."[8] Operazione paura takes to its limit a concept that would obsess Mario Bava for nearly the entire arc of his directorial career. In "La goccia d'acqua" from I tre volti della paura, Miss Chester is plagued by the spectre of the dead medium whose ring she has stolen, until she finally strangles herself; in La frusta e il corpo, Nevenka takes her own life to end her remorse over killing her lover; and in his final feature, Schock, Dora Baldini cuts her own throat after recovering the suppressed memory of having killed her husband and buried him in her cellar. Like these other tragic characters, the villagers of Karmingen may be the victims of a genuine supernatural occurrence, or they may simply be dogged by remorse. This element of ambiguity and the varieties of perception becomes increasingly central in Bava's work, and one imagines he felt it was the only way such subject matter could be truthfully depicted. It was a brave move, artistically, but in the context of a genre so traditionally literal (even condescendingly so at times) as the horror film, ambiguity was widely mistaken at the time for bad writing.

This ambiguity is also consistent within the actions of the film's hero, Dr. Paul Eswai. Impatient with the ignorance he sees in Ruth's treatments, Eswai interferes with her "black magic" by ripping the leech vine from Nadine's back—but Bava slyly introduces a further note of superstition when Eswai prescribes his own, more civilized medication to Nadine's mother, cautioning her to administer "no more than twenty drops"—one drop for every year of the curse in which he has so far refused to believe. Another sign of Eswai's unconscious superstition can be inferred from the fact that he keeps the coin he removes from Irene Hollander's heart in his own breast pocket—above his own heart. Throughout the film, Eswai's body language reflects that, though he may well be intellectually superior to the villagers' backward ways of thinking, he likely grew up among people like them, and hasn't entirely escaped from their ways of thinking, regardless of how far he's risen professionally.

ART becomes reality as Eswai leans for support against an old painting of the villa . . . then finds himself transported into an identical web outside.

In some ways, Operazione paura is the story of Eswai's acceptance of the things undreamed-of in his philosophy—not a case of "Physician, heal thyself," but "Detective, find thyself." In Freudian terms, his arrival in Karmingen is staged in the manner of a birth: the coach carrying him rides through a splash of blood-red light, and after stepping out, he makes his way into town through an elaborate, oval archway. (In Lisa and the Devil, Lisa Reiner must pass through a similar portal, in the shape of a keyhole, to enter into her dream world.) While he has no familial tie to Villa Graps, its mysteries seem to hold a message specifically intended for him. The Graps family crest, which is seen carved above the entrance to the crypt and again on a wall inside, appears to be an exploded form of the Caduceus—the heraldic emblem of the medical profession—in which the snakes, traditionally entwining the staff of Mercury, have come free. Intentionally or not, the crest portends that, here within these walls, Eswai's belief system will come flying apart. While the film never stops long enough to provide a romantic subplot for Eswai and Monika, the ending does imply that they are embarking on a new life together; if this is the case, then Eswai could also be said to discover his significant other at Villa Graps, through the discovery of the other dimensions of himself. Arriving at Karmingen, Eswai is a realist who believes only in what he can see and touch—that is, conscious reality; as the sun rises on a new day, he has experienced, acknowledged, and survived many things which cannot be explained on that primary level.

The film's only fully realized romantic relationship, that of Ruth and Karl, reflects this duality of consciousness. Initially, it comes as a shock to find them involved with one another—Karl, as burgomaster, represents local government, while Ruth represents everything about the same locality that cannot be governed—but when we see them together, interacting calmly and with a sense of purpose, they communicate a sense of fitting together as a complete person, a unity that no other single person or couple in the film is capable of showing.

Italian horror had always inclined toward the metaphysical—even I vampiri toys with the concept of reincarnation, where few American films other than Peter Ibbetson (1935) had dared to tread—but Operazione paura contains passages that careen into the psychedelic, making this period horror film very much of the era in which it was filmed. Bava bends his film's reality by turning Karmingen into an Escher-like funhouse of labyrinths, reflections, Mobius strips, distortions, and inversions. As Tom Milne pointed out in his perceptive review for Monthly Film Bulletin: "The real charge of Operazione paura comes from its reversal of the usual symbolism of good and evil. The strange, lowering witch-woman who surges mysteriously out of the night in her black robes during the attack on the hero turns out to be on the side of light; it is the little girl with golden ringlets and frilly white dress straight out of a Victorian picture-book that conjures evil—a vision as poetically ambiguous as Èdith Scob's bland mask in Les Yeux sans Visage."

Of course, the inversions go beyond even this account: the little girl with golden hair is played by a dark-haired little boy, and not only does the "witch-woman" turn out to be on the side of light, but this raven-haired sorceress—robed in layers of clothing—is portrayed by a blonde French actress notable for wearing nothing at all in other films. Appearances, as they often are in Bava's films, are deceiving. Ruth is initially perceived by Eswai as directly responsible for perpetuating the local superstitions he is trying to combat, but as the story unfolds, we discovers that he is actually more like than unlike her. ("Why do they call you as if you're practicing medicine?" he asks, incredulously.) Likewise, Monika has returned to Karmingen to visit the graves of the Schuftans, but she never reaches the cemetery; instead, she is led by images from a dream, planted in her subconscious since childhood, to discover the grave of her sister, and the matching grave awaiting her, which confirm that the couple who raised her were not her parents after all. Here the film introduces narrative threads dating back to the Greek myths, particularly the legend of Oedipus.

In his structural analysis of the Oedipus story, Claude Levi-Strauss observed that "the very precautions taken to avoid incest actually make it inevitable."[9] Monika Schuftan is an 8 Shirley Jackson, The Haunting of Hill House, in The Lottery and Other Stories/The Haunting of Hill House/We Have Always Lived in the Castle (New York NY: Quality Paperback Book Club, 1991), 135.

9 Claude Levi-Strauss, The Scope of Anthropology (London, UK: Jonathan Cape, 1967), 35.

Oedipal character, in the sense that she was sent away from her home at an early age to protect her from the murderous advances of her sister's ghost, but brought closer to inevitable self-discovery by her chance return to Karmingen and her equally chance association with Eswai. She returns on the same day that Irene Hollander impales herself on the very gate that will later appear to her in a dream, and again later in reality, heralding her arrival at self-knowledge. The images in Monika's nightmare are all prophetic in nature, perhaps a gift unknowingly inherited from her mediumistic parent. Oedipus likewise had the Promethean gift of foresight, his path fixed, predestined, unavoidable. The ultimate revelation in Monika's case is not incest, but it is Oedipal in the sense that her personal riddle is ultimately solved by the punchline of her own bloodline. It is one of several instances in Bava's filmography of an individual awakening to an unsuspected kinship or mirror image—the Princesses twinned across centuries in La maschera del demonio, the enemies who discover themselves to be brothers in Gli invasori, the Viking drifter who learns that a past rape resulted in the birth of a son in I coltelli del vendicatore.

The dark secret of Monika's parentage is signalled throughout the film by a series of twinned images. The first occurs moments prior to Monika's first entrance: in the room given to Dr. Eswai to conduct his autopsy, two empty coffins bracket the doorway. (This shot also prophesies Monika's later awakening between the twin crypts reserved for her and her sister.) During the autopsy, she reacts frightfully to a shadow fluttering on the wall, which she traces to a moth lighting repeatedly against the bright glow of a lantern. Seemingly unrelated to the scene at hand, this brief divertissement ultimately mirrors her own situation, her determination to get closer to the truth placing her life in danger. Later, when Karl consents to retrieve the papers pertaining to Monika's parentage from his office, two small sickles are shown hanging on the wall, very much resembling double question marks. Moments later, he is compelled to use one of them to slash his own throat. When she finally visits Villa Graps and feels Melissa's cold hand on her own, Monika flees down a spiral staircase lit with colored gels, photographed from above so that she appears to be fleeing deeper and deeper into the involutions of her own navel.

Elsewhere within the walls of Villa Graps we see a corridor illuminated by lamps held by sculpted human arms, which may be a deliberate nod to Jean Cocteau's La Belle et le Bête/Beauty and the Beast (1946); indeed, Operazione paura shares the shimmering irreality of much of Cocteau's work, especially Orphée/Orpheus (1949), which depicts Death as a world accessed through mirrors, where everything is filmed in reverse. However appropriate they may be to MELISSA shocks Karl with a surprise appearance inside his armoire. Note the chalk marks telling the child actor where to stand.

MONIKA awakens on the floor of the Graps family crypt, as she earlier saw herself in a nightmare.

RUTH determines to bring an end to the hauntings by confronting Baroness Graps, a meeting that ends in their deaths.

this specific film, these decorations were not, however, created for Operazione paura, as they can also be seen lining another corridor in Piero Regnoli's earlier L'ultimo preda del vampiro/The Playgirls and the Vampire (1960).

There are noticeable parallels between the Graps and the Vajdas of La maschera del demonio, both of whom are once-royal families fallen from grace. Just as the spiritual sickness of the Vajdas is represented by their desiccated chapel, where low winds moan through the broken pipes of an organ, the psychic preoccupations of Baroness Graps are reflected as much by her neglect of the physical world, expressed by the general mustiness of her villa and her dishevelled personal appearance. As with Miss Havisham's derelict mansion in Charles Dickens' novel Great Expectations, her world has been deliberately frozen at a moment of an overwhelming loss and, as the Cocteauvian torch-bearing arms in her corridors eerily suggest, the realities have been gradually replaced by tangible fantasies.

Like Monika, Dr. Eswai has his own great moment of self-discovery in Villa Graps when Monika's offscreen cry for help sends him off in pursuit of a fleeing phantom. He follows the marauder through a room, which connects to the same room, forming a Mobius strip; each time he traverses the room, he gains on his quarry until he succeeds in catching up with and apprehending the man, who turns to glower at Eswai with his own face. This doppelgänger sequence is one of the most shattering and disorienting moments in horror cinema, all the moreso because Bava never condescends to explain it, thereby preserving its mystery and his film's respect for mystery. As Martin Scorsese has pointed out, this scene has an antecedent of sorts in a divinely irrational moment from Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger's The Tales of Hoffmann (1951), wherein a woman is shown dancing out the door of an elaborate room at screen left, only to burst immediately through a matching door at screen right, as she completes her dancing maneuver. [10] In Bram Stoker's Dracula, Jonathan Harker notes a process of supernatural repetition during his coach ride to Castle Dracula: "It seemed to me that we were simply going over and over the same ground again . . ." adding about the coach's encounter with a mysterious blue flame in the depths of the forest that "I think I must have fallen asleep and kept dreaming of the incident, for it seemed to be repeated endlessly . . ." This serial revisitation of the same room also recalls Freud's definition of repetition (in Beyond the Pleasure Principle) as "a process of coming closer to final truths," as well as "an hypnotic, negative compulsion symbolic of the allure of death." The allure of death is an appropriate reference in this case, as it relates directly to the nature of the mystery that is Melissa Graps.

A PORTRAIT of Melissa hangs in a corridor at Villa Graps.

Eswai's encounter with his double packs such an existential shock that the scene cannot possibly move beyond it, at least not in any linear fashion. So Bava has Eswai exit the moment as abstractly as he entered into it, tottering in shock until he stands leaning against a large, cobweb-covered painting of Villa Graps, which—in a change of location concealed by a change of camera angle—inexplicably transports him into an actual web outside the villa, so that he occupies the same space once chosen by the artist of that long-neglected canvas. So precisely has art matched reality that one becomes a portal to the other.

Eswai first uncovers the facts of Melissa Graps' life and death with the help of another portrait in Villa Graps, captioned with her name and the dates 1880–1887. This painting is the film's only misstep: an almost risible insertion of Valerio Valeri's face into a comic art amalgam of skulls, books, and other Lovecraftian ephemera, which gives the unfortunate impression that Melissa was a thing of formidable evil even when alive—quite opposite to the film's eventual explanation of events. Otherwise, this portrait is interesting for recapitulating what Bava had previously done in La maschera del demonio, and again, more comically, in La ragazza che sapeva troppo: that is, using a family portrait as a source of menace and illumination to the living. It is ground that Bava would continue to cover in later works such as Baron Blood and Lisa and the Devil, and carry into the realm of sculpture with La Venere d'Ille.

ESWAI saves Monika from certain death as she races onto a crumbling terrace.

To borrow Hitchcock's phrase, Bava filmed his murders as if they were love scenes, staging violent acts in ravishingly lit compositions that could seduce even the most unwilling gaze. This aspect of his craft reaches its ne plus ultra in the character of Melissa Graps, the most inspired of Operazione paura's many inversions. The inversion is not, as Milne wrote, that the source of the film's evil is the picture of innocence, because the Baroness—another Miss Havisham-inspired shut-in, recalling Aunt Edith from La ragazza che sapeva troppo—is the true source of evil. What makes Melissa Graps such a potent figure is her embodiment of the ultimate emotional pain an adult can experience: the loss of a child. She is further enriched by her associations to the many cherubs and angels we've seen in great paintings and graveyard carvings; if we don't consciously make this connection ourselves, Bava brings it to the surface in the scene of Oscar and Rudolph hurriedly disposing of Inspector Kruger's body at the cemetery, where their furtive actions are observed by a mirthful, foregrounded stone cherub. For all her merriment, Melissa is so thoroughly invested with our worst fears that she can raise our gooseflesh by simply pressing her hand to a frosted windowpane—much like her direct antecedent in the Bava filmography, the undead toddler Ivan in "I wurdalak," crying out to his mother that he's cold.

Consequently, the film's most chilling images are those with the lightest touch: the moment when the autopsy of Irene Hollander is interrupted with a cutaway to a giggling Melissa (who has not, at this point, been introduced or explained) playing on a spectral swing in the fogbound cemetery—or another moment, following the autopsy, when her white ball is shown thumping out of nowhere into the empty examination room, bouncing off the inert form of Irene's corpse. Despite the garish and unsuitable titles to which it was subjected around the world, Operazione paura contains no graphic violence and very little bloodshed, Bava instead emulating the examples of Jacques Tourneur and Georges Franju by staging his horror scenes with a poet's lightness of touch.

MONIKA flees the truths that will inevitably be uncovered during her visit to Karmingen.

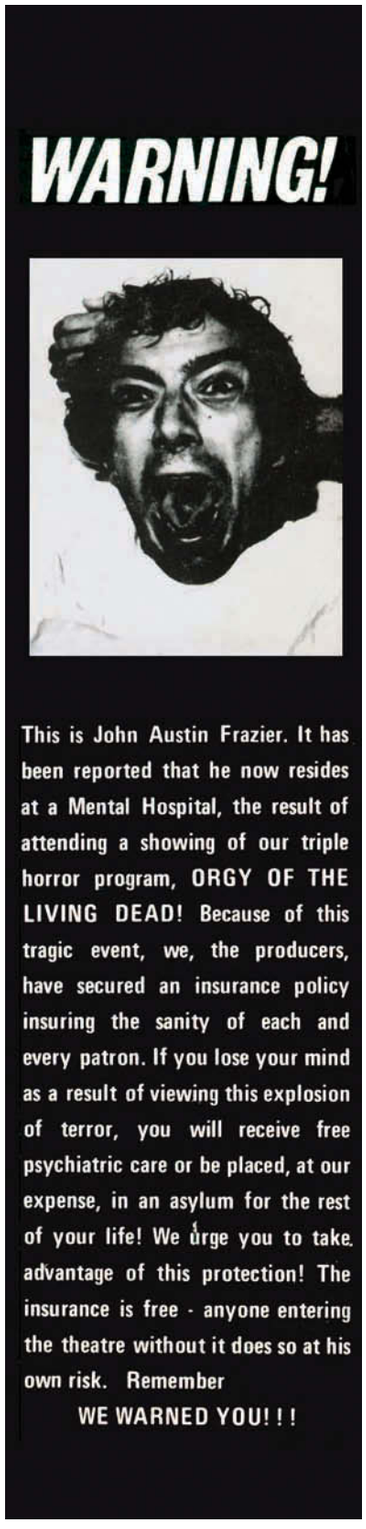
Distribution

Operazione paura had the misfortune to be released in July 1966, at the height of the Italian vacation season. Consequently, few Italians interested in seeing it had the opportunity, as it played in Italian theaters for only a short time—all of four days in August at Rome's Quattro Fontane theater—and consequently disappeared from circulation for decades. Even so, Italian boxoffice records indicate that the self-proclaimed "classico dell'orrore" earned 210 million lire [$131.000] in its only run, making it a bigger Italian success than either La maschera del demonio or I tre volti della paura, his greatest American successes to date. Considering that Operazione paura had to be completed for approximately half of its intended budget, its earnings were twice as healthy as they appeared to be, and its producers surely profited well from their failings.

According to a proud Erika Blanc, one of the Italians who sought the film out was the acclaimed film and opera director, Luchino Visconti. "I not only heard that he saw it," she says, "but I was told that he gave it a standing ovation." Based on later evidence, the film was also sought out by Bava's friend Bernardino Zapponi, a writer of fantastic short stories who subsequently became the favorite screenwriter of Federico Fellini.

Europix Consolidated waited a full year before releasing the film in America, by which time their company name had changed to Europix-International. They branded it with the unfortunate exploitation title Kill, Baby . . . Kill!— following the patterns of AIP's Die, Monster, Die! and Russ Meyer's Faster, Pussycat! Kill! Kill!—which was more evocative of plunging daggers, go-go boots, and rock 'n' roll than the suggestive, turn-of-the-century chills the film actually delivered. It was paired with The Sound of Horror—a black-and-white Spanish import originally titled El Sonido Prehistórico, which starred (in early, extremely unpromising roles) future horror queens Ingrid Pitt and Soledad Miranda, and a strong contender for the cheapest special effect of all time—an invisible dinosaur. The resulting double-feature was sold as "The Big S & Q Show," with lurid advertisements guaranteeing "You'll Shiver and Quiver with Kill Baby Kill—and—Shake and Quake with Sound of Horror!"

The combo scored well on the American drive-in circuit, and became something of a cash cow for Europix, who licensed both films for TV syndication as early as 1968. By this time, Variety finally got around to reviewing the overlooked film, thanks to a belated report filed by Stuart Byron ("Byro."). He wrote: "Reviewed for the record since this Italian horror mystery, set in the Transylvanian vampire country, has been in US release via Europix Consolidated since 1966 [sic] though only now playing New York (as a second feature at a 42d St. grind house). But film demonstrates once again, as some European critics think, that in director Mario Bava lies one of Italy's most important film talents though he specializes in genre product. 'Kill Baby Kill' is a small masterpiece of its kind, comparing favorably with the late Val Lewton's horror programmers of the '40s."[11] Its geographic inaccuracy aside, Byron's comments are significant in hindsight as one of the earliest American commendations of Bava's talent. Europix maintained the film as an active theatrical rental for several more years, during which time it trailed other double-bills from Europix (and other companies) as part of weekend triple-bills. In 1972, it was revived once again as part of Europix-International's legendary triple-bill, "The Orgy of the Living Dead."



For this program—the brainchild of Europix national sales executive Bob Kilgore, formerly with Gemini Film Corporation—Bava's film was retitled Curse of the Living Dead and cut to 75 minutes, by dropping an entire reel. Also in the package were Revenge of the Living Dead (a similarly shortened retitling of La lama nel corpo/The Murder Clinic) and Fangs of the Living Dead, actually Amando de Ossorio's Malenka (1967), a Spanish/Italian vampire opus starring Anita Ekberg—the only film of the three not previously released by Europix. Disguised with new, unfamiliar titles and fresh PG ratings, ARGENTINIAN one-sheet poster.

10 Scorsese makes this point in his audio commentary for the Criterion Collection LaserDisc of The Tales of Hoffmann, now out of print.

11 Stuart Byron, "Kill, Baby . . . Kill!" review, Variety, October 18, 1968.

EUROPIX*'s "Orgy of the Living Dead" campaign was accompanied by this amusing bit of ballyhoo.*

the films were first paraded across America in March 1972 with a brilliantly exploitative ad campaign. It pictured a screaming man in a straitjacket, who, the accompanying text explained, was "John Austin Frazier," a man committed to a mental hospital after viewing the "Orgy of the Living Dead" triple-bill. "If you lose your mind as a result of viewing this explosion of terror," the ads declared, "you will receive free psychiatric care or be placed, at our expense, in an asylum for the rest of your life!"

The campaign—hilariously fleshed-out in a trailer that showed as little footage from the three films as possible—was masterminded by Alan Ormsby, a young artist/writer then based in Coral Gables, Florida, where he played major creative roles in the making of several well-remembered, independent horror films, including Deathdream (1972, writer and makeup), Children Shouldn't Play With Dead Things (1972, writer, actor, and makeup) and Deranged (1974, writer, co-director and makeup). In 1975, he published an instructional book for children, Movie Monsters: Monster Makeup & Monster Shows To Put On. In later years, he co-authored Paul Schrader's remake of Cat People (1982), directed the recursive horror film Popcorn (1991), and wrote the three films constituting the Substitute franchise (1996–2000), before his stint as a staff writer for the CBS detective series Nash Bridges. Ormsby's personal devotion to the horror genre made the "Orgy of the Living Dead" campaign a classic of boisterous ballyhoo, which also managed to include a surprising grace note of scholarly respect. For the first and only time on an American film poster, the Maestro's name appeared above the title: "Mario Bava's Curse of the Living Dead."

"I don't know that I can take credit for that," laughs Ormsby, "but I certainly knew who Bava was at the time, going all the way back to Black Sunday. I remember also being very impressed by Planet of the Vampires, with its scary dreamlike atmosphere. A lot of people, over the years, have asked me about the work I did on that campaign, some of them asking me to sell them the rights to that skull artwork I did for the posters, but I don't own it anymore."

US "Orgy of the Living Dead" triple feature reissue one-sheet, art by Alan Ormsby.

When asked the undying question "Who was John Austin Frazier?" Ormsby draws a blank until he's reminded about the screaming man in the straitjacket—and then he laughs. "That was my friend Victor Bumbalo," he reveals, "an award-winning playwright who has gone on to write screenplays and do some acting jobs, too. Europix did a special one-sheet just of him, which was hilarious; I've seen it on eBay. I remember that I also shot some film of him, which I guess was used in the trailer; it was shot right inside the offices at Europix, which was this dinky little company in the midst of a porn theater district in New York City. I remember, at the time we shot that, Behind the Green Door with Marilyn Chambers was playing at a theater right across the street."

According to a report in Variety, the "Orgy of the Living Dead" package racked up more than 400 playdates between March and June 1973, resulting in earnings of over $750,000.[12] At that time, the triple-bill had played in only seven major US cities and was about to open on multiple screens in the metropolitan New York area, so its total income was certainly well over $1,000,000. Not bad for three old movies missing a reel each.

WHO INSPIRED whom? This image, highly reminiscent of OPERAZIONE PAURA, appears in a flashback sequence of Fellini's GIULIETTA DEGLI SPIRITI/JULIET OF THE SPIRITS.

Elsewhere around the world, Operazione paura suffered a perpetuation of the misfortune that plagued its production. It was not released in Great Britain until the summer of 1967, when Miracle released it as City of the Dead, which was burdened with some of the ugliest, most inept advertising art ever to soil a movie poster. Lagging farther behind was West Germany, where Alpha Film did not premiere the picture till 1970, and then under yet another absurd title: Die Toten Augen des Dr. Dracula ("The Dead Eyes of Dr. Dracula"). In this version, the German dubbing of the film relocated the story from Karmingen to Translyvania. Alpha Film reportedly went out of business shortly after releasing it, which prevented the film from being widely seen in that market. In France, the release of Operation Peur was similarly postponed, so that its release coincided with the demise of the traditionally enthusiastic magazine, Midi-Minuit Fantastique. In the autumn of 1976, the French fumetti magazine Film Horreur featured an unauthorized photo-comics adaptation of Operation Peur in its seventh issue.

When the film was released in Holland, it contained an alternate main titles sequence that held the still-frame image of Irena Hollander impaled on the spiked fence as the credits rolled, eliminating the mood-setting shots of Melissa stepping merrily away from the carnage, and retaining only the non sequitur sound of her giggling on the track.

Influences

In the years since it was made, and especially in the years since it has become widely available on video, Operazione paura has become one of Mario Bava's most influential works, indeed one of the most influential films in the horror genre. The character of Melissa Graps, in particular, has become Bava's greatest and most everlasting monster—even more widely imitated than La maschera del demonio's indomitable Princess Asa. This character must touch a very deep nerve in our collective psyche to have spawned so many imitations, but how far back does this archetype really go?

Presumably, Melissa was present in some form or another in Migliorini and Natale's original screen story, but considering the difficulties Bava experienced in casting the role, he must have had a very precise image in mind to start with, one that he was unwilling to compromise. The connection between a dead child and a rolling or bouncing ball can be traced back to Fritz Lang's M (1931), which diverts its camera eye away from the violence of Peter Lorre's child murders to the poetic images of a dropped, rolling ball coming to a dead stop or a luminous white balloon bouncing on the undersides of telephone wires. The depiction of the deaths of children has always been a screen taboo, and balls have often been used in films and television as a metaphor for that which could not be shown: a child rushes into traffic, we hear the screech of a braking car, the thud of impact, and the camera cuts to a ball rolling into frame to a halt. It has become so basic a cliché, it hardly requires a specific example; it has become part of the language of cinema.

THIS Melissa Graps archetype grows up to be a troubled adult played by Susannah York in John Huston's hallucinatory biopic, FREUD.

12 "There's $ Life in Screen 'Dead,'" Variety, June 13, 1973, 7.

Though the film itself has generally disappeared from public view, a still from John Huston's biopic Freud (1962) depicts a young girl in Victorian dress holding a white ball, looking very much like Melissa Graps. The still, capturing a knowing yet off-kilter expression on the child's face, feels powerfully pertinent, but the character is less so in the film itself, where she is only fleetingly shown with the ball, as the film focuses on Freud's attempts to liberate the suppressed memories of childhood sexual abuse from the subconscious of a tormented adult patient (Susannah York).

Critic Richard Harland Smith has traced the most gripping of Melissa's antecedents to Federico Fellini's first color film, Giulietta degli spiriti/Juliet of the Spirits (1965), made just one year prior to Operazione paura.[13] Throughout the film, Fellini flashes back to the childhood of his protagonist (Giulietta Masina), in scenes shared with her dead friend Laura, who is ultimately revealed to have committed suicide at age 15. Both girls are dressed à la Graps, in white dresses, with long blonde hair. At one point, the young Juliet is shown peering through a transparent curtain at her older self, which not only predicts the shot of Melissa Graps looking through the window of Nadine's bedroom, but also the way John Harrington (Stephen Forsyth) is accompanied by an outward projection of his boyhood self whenever he approaches his acts of murder in Il rosso segno della follia/Hatchet for the Honeymoon (1970). Bava's casting of a boy in the role of Melissa may also have been inspired by Fellini's history of casting people in roles of the opposite sex, such as the women who played the priests in 8½ or the nuns who were played by boys in Giulietta degli spiriti. This revelation turns on its ear the common assumption that Bava was ripped off by Fellini . . . which, of course, is also true.

ITALIAN locandina, art by Rodolfo Gasparri.

Fellini would direct the first and most important film to imitate Operazione paura: Toby Dammit, "liberally adapted" from Edgar Allan Poe's story "Never Bet the Devil Your Head" and included as the final segment of the French/Italian co-production Histoires Extraordinaires/Tre passi nel delirio (1967), eventually released in the United States by American International Pictures as Spirits of the Dead in 1969.

In the book Fellini: An Intimate Portrait, written by the director's longtime assistant Liliana Betti, a chapter entitled "In Search of Toby Dammit" recounts the long genesis of this short film. According to Betti, when Fellini was first asked to direct a segment for the omnibus—and told that there would be matching contributions from Louis Malle and Orson Welles—his first response was to turn the offer down. "To remove Poe from the written word, especially today, after the experiences of Existentialism, Surrealism and psychoanalysis, would be arbitrary and uninteresting," he protested. "And what about translating him literally? In that case, Mario Bava is the most qualified man; he would be the most suitable and rigorous director for the job."[14]

Fellini and Bava had known one another since the 1940s, and Fellini is said to have been a keen admirer of Bava's movies, but the true progenitor of Bava's influence on the project was Fellini's fellow screenwriter Bernardino Zapponi, who personally regarded Mario Bava as his favorite director of horror films and later befriended him. Only a couple of years earlier in his life, Zapponi had been the editor of a short-lived magazine called Il Delatore ("The Informer"), devoted to a variety of arcane topics. In one of its last issues, a special Bava issue was announced as forthcoming in 1965–66. It would have been the first Italian monograph devoted to Bava, but the magazine ceased publication before it could appear.

"[Bava] was the father of the entire Italian genre, and a delightful man whom I knew well," Zapponi told the authors of Spaghetti Nightmares. "He was also the most frightened person I ever met. When the night wove its tales of horror, he felt a need to gird himself against it. He was excessively modest; he wasn't particularly aware of his artistic talent, didn't have much ambition, and was content to submit to the production system more than he should have done. I can also tell you that we intended to work together someday, but unfortunately, our plans never came to anything." [15]

Zapponi's failure to collaborate with Bava is perhaps the single greatest missed opportunity of either man's career. Zapponi was that rare Italian writer capable of fusing the morbid, rococo, often impish excesses of Italian horror to a strong backbone of narrative integrity. His screenplay for Dario Argento's Profondo rosso/Deep Red (1975) resulted in what is considered, by many, to be Argento's most consistent thriller—never losing sight of its plot or themes in its fevered search for disturbing images. Zapponi's script for Juan-Luís Buñuel's Leonor (1975) resulted in one of the few great Spanish horror films, a hauntingly romantic ghost story. However, it was with Toby Dammit that he most grandly succeeded in propelling Italian horror to its most delirious, mind-bending extremes.

In Toby Dammit, Terence Stamp stars as the eponymous character, an alcoholic British Shakespearean actor who comes to Rome to star in "the first Catholic Western," a job which he has accepted because the production as promised him a brand new, golden Ferrari. Toby arrives at Fiumicino Airport in a psychedelic haze, the terminal depicted as a series of bizarre friezes of nuns, paparazzi firing off flashbulbs, women backing away in abject horror, and other strangers shuffled with two-dimensional cardboard likenesses of other strangers—all photographed by the great Giuseppe Rotunno through a lysergic orange lens. Toby has brought with him his bête noire, an apparition of the Devil, whom he sees as a little blonde girl, dressed in white, whose presence is always announced by a luminous, soundlessly bouncing ball. Met by the director of his new project and his entourage, including a sibylline interpreter who seems to translate only every fourth sentence of their antic babble, Toby is driven through a Boschian Roman highway to a RAI-TV interview, where his avowed belief in the Devil prompts a question about whether he sees the Devil as a goat or a cat or a bat. "No, I'm English—not Catholic," he replies. "To me, the Devil is cheerful, agile. He looks like a little girl." After the interview, Toby is taken to the Italian Oscars ceremony, where he is overwhelmed by a parade of artificial stars and hangers-on, all professing their love and admiration for him, despite his best efforts at being the prototype of Johnny Rotten. After reciting some lines from Macbeth on stage, he insults the crowd and races off into the night, behind the wheel of his promised Ferrari. In a berserk hommage to the finale of Vincente Minnelli's Two Weeks in Another Town (1962), Dammit hells around the labyrinthine backroads of the city, finding cul-de-sac after cul-de-sac in a land where, supposedly, all roads lead to Rome. Crashing through a road barrier, he skids to a halt at the lip of a collapsed bridge. He makes the spot decision to speed the car across the gulf, tempted by the returning apparition of la piccola diavola, seen dancing at its cusp. The Ferrari rockets into the dark, and there is no sound of a crash, only a sudden, persistent squeaking. The camera tracks into the darkness, where we discover a wire stretched across the road, plucked and nauseously creaking, dripping with blood. Toby's severed head lies on the asphalt, met by the luminous bouncing ball of the Devil, who gently kneels to collect it.

In a rare act of creative appropriation by this most original of filmmakers, the Devil in Fellini's film is the very image of Melissa Graps, from

THE DEVIL "looks like a little girl"—and like Melissa Graps—in Fellini's Edgar Allan Poe adaptation, TOBY DAMMIT.

13 Richard Harland Smith: "Juliet of the Spirits," reviewed in Video Watchdog 90, December 2002, 52–55.

14 Liliana Betti, Fellini: An Intimate Portrait (New York NY: Little, Brown & Company, 1979), 135.

15 Luca M. Palmerini and Gaetano Mistretta, Spaghetti Nightmares (Rome, Italy: M&P Edizone, 1996), 159–60.

her long blonde hair to her luminous bouncing ball and the lullaby theme by Nino Rota that accompanies her every appearance. According to Liliana Betti's book, Fellini experienced similar difficulty in casting this role, eventually casting two performers: Russian actress Marina Yaru in close-ups, and a young dancer for long-shots. It has been claimed by many published sources (including Bava's error-riddled obituary in Variety) that Bava supervised the uncredited second-unit direction and special effects of Toby Dammit, but this is untrue.

After being told of Fellini's friendly (perhaps tit-for-tat) larceny, Bava attended a screening of Tre passi nel delirio. "That ghost child with the bouncing ball . . . it's the same idea as in my film, exactly the same!" he marvelled. "I later mentioned this to Giulietta Masina and she just shrugged her shoulders, smiling, and said, 'Well, you know how Federico is . . .'" [16]

According to Roy Bava, his grandfather also screened the film for Masina to score a point: "When Mario screened his film for Giulietta, she kept looking at him and finally said, 'I really think you should say something to Federico about how much he's taken from you.' Mario said, 'I know, but I don't care; it shows that he appreciates my work.' In fact, when Mario was at De Laurentiis preparing Diabolik, Federico was in the same office corridor working on Toby Dammit, and they used to communicate via remote control cars. They'd send little messages to each other. They always kidded each other. So what is the borderline between hommage and stealing? I'd say Fellini's was hommage, but the rest . . . ?" [17]

Indeed, Toby Dammit was only the beginning of Operazione paura's extensive influence on other films and filmmakers. Nicolas Roeg's Don't Look Now (1973), set in Venice, concludes with Donald Sutherland pursuing a small hooded figure through the labyrinthine streets of that haunted city, half-believing it to be the ghost of his dead, golden-haired daughter. The tiny figure is revealed to be the homicidal dwarf responsible for a recent series of unsolved slayings, and Sutherland's visions are explained as unheeded psychic premonitions of his own death.

The effects of Operazione paura were still being felt in the declining Italian horror cinema of 1974, when Luigi Batzella made an interesting, if not entirely successful, erotic horror thriller called Nuda per Satana/Nude for Satan. The story, scripted by Batzella himself, is a near amalgam of all the classic Italian horror premises: while driving alone one night, a man (Terrore nello spazio's Giuseppe Mattei, billed as "James Harris") discovers a dazed woman (Rita Calderoni) behind the wheel of a wrecked car, and sprints uphill to a nearby villa for assistance. Therein, he is greeted by a woman (Calderoni again) who not only resembles the injured party, but the model of an ancient portrait hanging on the wall. In time, as previously happened with Dr. Eswai, Mattei comes face-to-face with his own, evil doppelgänger in the timeless labyrinths of the villa.

In The Tenant (1976), Roman Polanski sets the stage for a clerk's nervous breakdown by quoting the Bavian image of a white ball bouncing spectrally, from nowhere, outside his window—through the air where a woman fell, like Irene Hollander, to her death. In John Schlesinger's Marathon Man (1976), Roy Scheider is shown walking through a deserted European plaza by night, when a white ball suddenly rolls out of nowhere; it's never explained, but one feels immediately that his life isn't worth a plugged nickel. In his giallo thriller Tenebrae (1982), Dario Argento precedes the in-broad-daylight murder of John Saxon's character by having his thoughts interrupted by a child's ball bouncing up against him.

One of the most overt, and surely the most inside, hommages to Operazione paura is Lamberto Bava's second directorial effort, La casa con la scala nel buio/A Blade in the Dark (1983). The film opens with a scene of two boys daring a third (Giovanni Frezza) to venture into the dark of an abandoned house. He accepts the challenge, and his disappearance is followed by the emergence of a white ball that bounces off a wall, leaving a bloody mark. The scene is then revealed to be a sequence from a film-within-the film, which is being scored by its young composer hero. In a closing image, Bava fils shows Frezza climbing the stairs in drag, wearing a long blonde wig, which offers a metaphoric explanation of the film's killer's sexual ambiguity. For viewers aware of Valerio Valeri's predicament in Operazione paura, La casa con la scala nel buio becomes a humorous, if somewhat guilt-tinged, contemplation of how playing the role of Melissa Graps might have played hob with the boy's sexual identity.

US insert poster for the film's original "SQ Show" double bill with THE SOUND OF HORROR.

In 1983, a significant literary reflection of Bava's film was manifest in Susan Hill's successful ghost story novel, The Woman in Black. To my knowledge, Hill has never admitted to being influenced by Operazione paura—or Curse of the Dead, as it is known in Britain—but the similarities between them are quite noticeable. The novel's protagonist is H. G. Wells' solicitor hero Arthur Kipps, who is sent to an eerie coastal village to work on the estate of one Alice Drablow, whose house is an object of local fear and superstition. During the course of his visit, Kidd rescues a small gypsy girl from being trampled to death, an accident which the locals were content to watch passively—which is, of course, precisely the story of Melissa's fate—and is haunted by the non-violent spectre of a child, male in this case. Hill's novel was adapted several times for the stage, and in 1989 it was filmed by the British network Central Television and director Herbert Wise, working from a script by Nigel Kneale of Quatermass fame.

In 1987, Chuck Russell's A Nightmare on Elm Street, Part 3: Dream Warriors delved into the backstory of the Freddy Krueger mythos by depicting a disused, haunted-looking manor in which the school janitor committed a series of child murders, and was later punished by their enraged parents. The barren, bluish exterior of the house bears a strong resemblance to Villa Graps, and when the ghost of a little blonde girl comes tricycling out, Russell weds the Bavian imagery provocatively to that of Stanley Kubrick's The Shining (1980), which—incidentally—also depicted a ball rolling out of nowhere in a hotel haunted by the ghosts of two murdered girls.

Bava's film was paid further tribute by Martin Scorsese in his film of Nikos Kazantzakis' The Last Temptation of Christ (1988), which reaches its climax as the crucified Jesus Christ (Willem Dafoe) is tempted by the Devil with lusty tableaux of the life he might have led as a mortal man. The Devil is portrayed, once again, as a young girl. "In the book, and in Paul Schrader's original script, the angel at the end was a little Arab boy," Scorsese once recounted, "but I felt that brought connotations and we'd have difficulties . . . Then we decided it should be an old man—we had Lew Ayres cast in 1983—but that concept didn't seem right . . . So we went with a little girl, even though we couldn't get away from Pasolini's use of a young girl as an angel . . . but after all, it's a scam; it's the Devil. Of course, a little girl has appeared as the Devil before, in Mario Bava's Kill, Baby . . . Kill!, where she plays with the ball, but our girl is older; she's 13." [18]

Alessandro Capone provided another spectral girl-child with a white bouncing ball in Streghe/Witch Story (1989), an Italian film produced in the United States. In 1991, ABC-TV premiered David Lynch's acclaimed series Twin Peaks, in which a detective (Kyle MacLachlan) is summoned to a small community to investigate a young woman's death. In the case of Twin Peaks, the similarities to Operazione paura became ever more pronounced as it moved toward its final episode. The series reached its delirious climax in the otherworldly dimension known as the Black Lodge, where—like Dr. Eswai encountering his doppelgänger in the Mobius strip corridors of Villa Graps—MacLachlan is pursued and fatally wounded by a phantom figure who is revealed to be his own double. The scene also recalls a much earlier TV series climax, that of Patrick McGoohan's outstanding ITC series The Prisoner (1967–68), which concluded with McGoohan's Number 6 unmasking Number 1 and finding himself face-to-face with himself, or to be more accurate, the dark side of himself. But in the case of Twin Peaks, the resemblance to Operazione paura extended beyond doppelgängers into an elaborately extensive and sustained series of twinned and inverted images and subplots. Lynch's particular debt to Bava has never been acknowledged, as far as I know, but it is emphatically supported by unfilmed pages from his screenplay for the series' spin-off feature film, Twin Peaks Fire Walk With Me (1992), in which a nurse steals a ring from the finger of a dead patient—clearly a reprise of the "La goccia d'acqua" segment of I tre volti della paura. [19]

Another television production, Lars von Trier's Danish miniseries The Kingdom (1994), featured a narrative thread about a psychic patient who finds herself communicating with the unquiet ghost of a young girl haunting a hospital's elevator shaft. Though this ghost hasn't either the look or the trappings of Melissa Graps, the tone evoked by Bava's film is immediately apparent from the moment we first see von Trier's girl—which indicates what should now be obvious: that Operazione paura was a seminal chapter in the cinema of the supernatural. More recently, Jeremiah Chechik's ill-advised remake of The Avengers (1998) found John Steed (Ralph Fiennes) and Emma Peel (Uma Thurman) disoriented in a serially repeating room.

Operazione paura was also released theatrically in Japan and had reverberations there, as well as on the Chinese mainland. In 1997, the ghost of a little girl named Ting Ting appeared, accompanied by a bouncing ball, in Wellson Chin's Hong Kong film Tamagotchi. Around the same time, another Melissa Graps clone turned up in the unlikely setting of two episodes of the popular animated series Pokémon ("Abra and the Psychic Showdown" and "Haunter vs. Kadabra"). Here, the figure of the blonde, ball-carrying girl is eventually revealed to be a spectre, the marauding psychic projection of another character. This explanation, so similar to the relationship between the Baroness Graps and her late daughter, suggests the resemblance is hardly coincidental, as does the macabre, doll-strewn ambiance of the "Haunter vs. Kadabra" episode in particular.

Since the arrival of Kill, Baby . . . Kill! on DVD throughout the world, the film's influence on horror filmmakers has become even more pervasive. In Japan particularly, the entire "J-Horror" movement appears to be fixated on the concept of a young girl with long hair who died by abuse or neglect, whose restless spirit returns to punish those who carry the guilt of her death with them. The most noteworthy of these are the Ringu/The Ring series started by Hideo Nakata in 1998 (based on a novel by Koji Suzuki) and Takashi Shimizu's Ju-on (2000), subsequently remade in America as The Grudge (2004). In Spain, Guillermo del Toro made El Espinazo del Diablo/The Devil's Backbone (2001), which the director calls his "Mario Bava Western" in the film's DVD commentary. This is a period ghost story set in an orphanage and includes a few shots admittedly copied from Operazione paura. The Melissa Graps character was also blatantly copied in William Malone's Fear Dot Com (2002).

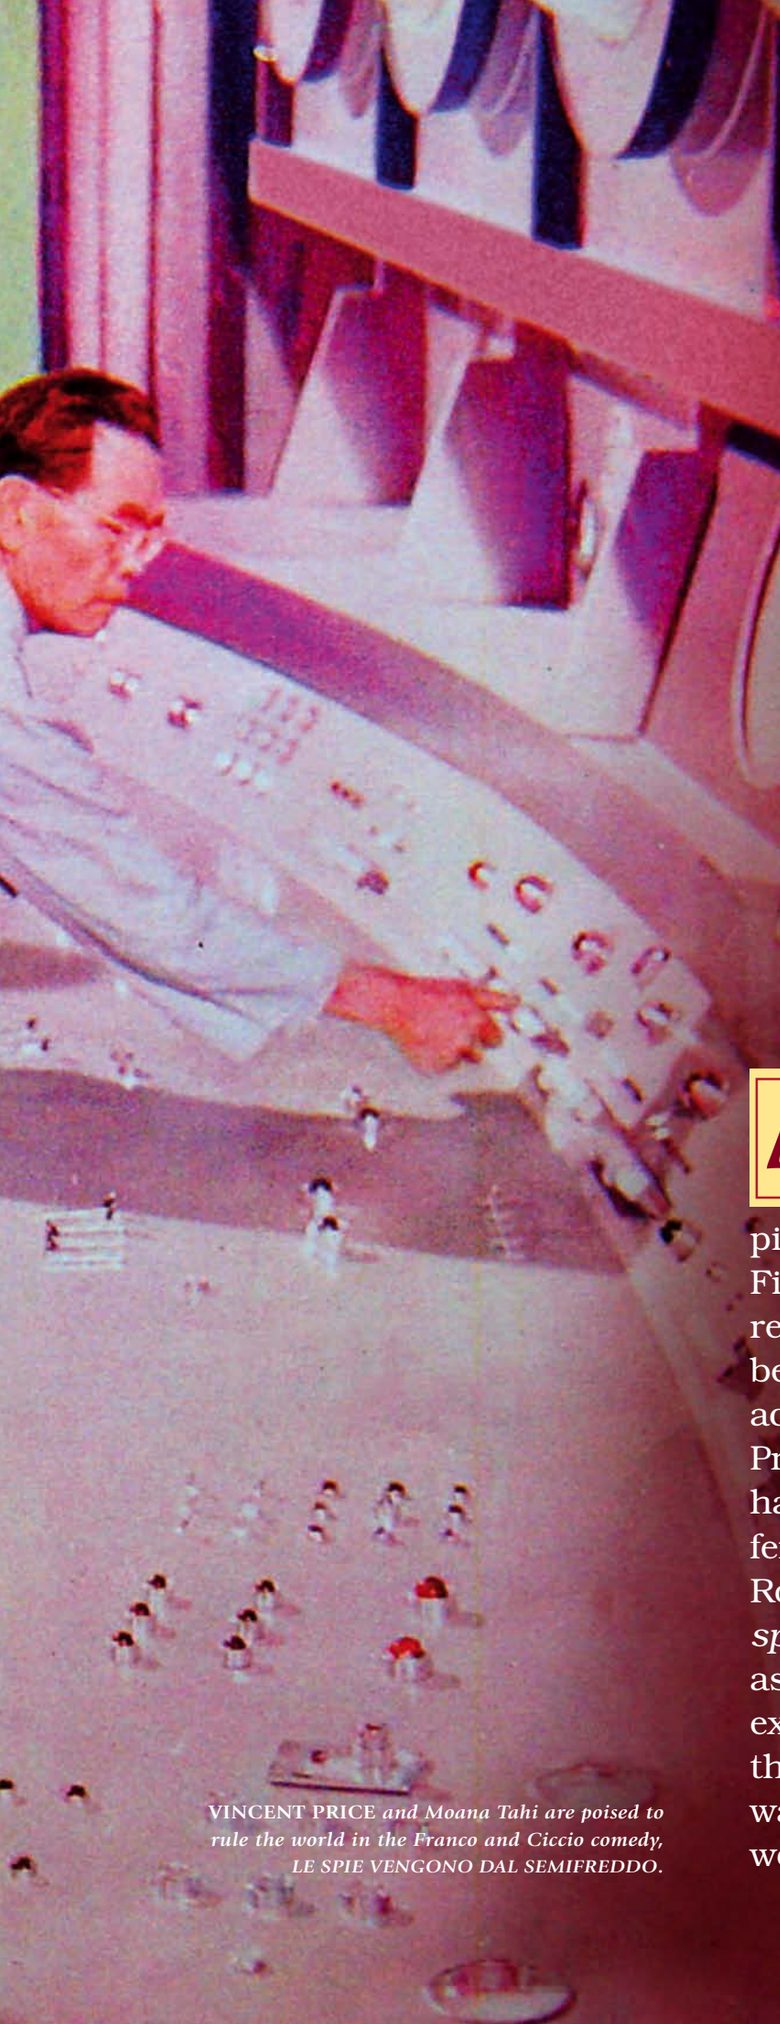
While 1971's Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve is usually cited as Bava's most influential film, due to the Friday the 13th and other "body count" films produced in its wake, Operazione paura has become nearly as valuable a conceptual resource to other filmmakers. As the most original of the two works, it may someday be more widely recognized as a codex of its genre—a film that was the first to state a number of ideas that were elevated, by the consensus of persistent imitation, into new tenets of horror cinema.



16 Cozzi.

17 Roy Bava interviewed by Alan Jones, April 2003.

18 David Thompson and Ian Christie, eds., Scorsese on Scorsese (London, UK: Faber & Faber, 1989), 143.

19 For more details, see Tim Lucas, "One Chance Out Between Two Worlds: Notes on Twin Peaks Fire Walk With Me," Video Watchdog 16, March/April 1993, 26–47.

VINCENT PRICE and Moana Tahi are poised to rule the world in the Franco and Ciccio comedy, LE SPIE VENGONO DAL SEMIFREDDO.

LE SPIE VENGONO DAL SEMIFREDDO

Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs

AFTER THE PRODUCTION of Operazione paura, Mario Bava was approached by producers Giorgio Moser and Arrigo Columbo to save another troubled picture. This time, the movie was Dick Smart 2007, a Filmstudio production starring Richard Wyler and Margaret Lee. Filming had begun in Rio de Janeiro and was set to be completed in Rome at INCIR–De Paolis Studios, where—according to Wyler—Bava's former assistant, director Franco Prosperi (ultimately credited onscreen as "Frank Shannon"), had to be replaced when personal problems began to interfere with his ability to work. The editor on that picture was Romana Fortini, the innovative cutter of both Terrore nello spazio and Operazione paura, who may have suggested Bava as a replacement. Wyler remembers that there was some excitement among the actors for the few days when they thought Bava might be coming to their rescue—"I had always wanted to work with him," he says—but things didn't work out that way.

ITALIAN locandina for Norman Taurog's
DR. GOLDFOOT AND THE BIKINI MACHINE, art by Enrico DeSeta.

Bava was tempted away from Dick Smart 2.007 by an offer from his friend Fulvio Lucisano to helm a similar spy spoof—the current Italian "flavor of the month"—for his company Italian International, in tandem with American International Pictures. Whereas Bava's earlier experiences with AIP had usually resulted, after the fact, in the creation of a distinctly different cut for the English-speaking market, this new project was evidently conceived as a means of killing two birds with one stone—a film that would function as a sequel to one of Italian International's pictures, and one of AIP's unrelated pictures, as well.

In 1965, AIP had released Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine, a Goldfinger-inspired spy spoof starring Vincent Price as a flamboyant villain in gold lamé jacket and slippers, who creates an army of bikini-clad robots to seduce Top Secret information out of important government officials. Frankie Avalon and Dwayne Hickman co-starred as Craig Gamble and Todd Armstrong, two incompetent, girl-crazed agents of SIC (Security Intelligence Command). Conceived by James H. Nicholson, scripted by Robert Kaufman, and "punched-up"

Le spie vengono dal semifreddo

"The Spies Who Came in From the Cool"
Filmed at Cinecittà and on location in Rome
April – May 1966.
First released: July 29, 1966
Technicolor, 1.85:1, 84 minutes

Production: Italian International Film (Rome). Producer: Fulvio Lucisano. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant directors: Antonietta Fiorito, C.S.C. and Lamberto Bava. Continuity: Rosalba Scavia. Screenplay: [Franco] Castellano and Pipolo [Giuseppe Moccia], from an idea by Lucisano. Additional dialogue: Franco Del Cer. Director of photography: Antonio Rinaldi. Camera operator: Saverio Diamanti. Assistant operator: Giorgio Aureli. Second assistant operator: Salvatore Caruso C.S.C. Art direction: Gastone Carsetti. Wardrobe: Ugo Pericoli. Production supervisor: Antonio Raffa. Production manager: Lucio Zarini. Production secretary: Maurizio Marvisi. Editor: Federico Muller. Music: Lallo Gori. "Bang Bang Kissene" by De Paulis, Castellano and Pipolo, sung by Franco Franchi (Ester Records). Sound: Ludovico Scardella. Title design: Biamonti and Grisonte. Distributor: Italian International.

Franco Franchi (Franco), Ciccio Ingrassia (Ciccio), Vincent Price (Dr. Goldfoot/Gen. Willis), Fabian (Bill Dexter), Francesco Mulé (Col. Douglas Benson), Laura Antonelli (Rosanna), Moana Tahi (Hardjob, uncredited), George Wang (Fong, uncredited), Ennio Antonelli (henchman, uncredited), Mario Bava (angel strumming harp, uncredited).

Italian reissues (1972): I due mafiosi dell' FBI, "The Two Mobsters From the FBI," Il clan dei due mafiosi, "The Family of the Two Mobsters"

Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs

Working title: Dr. Goldfoot and the "S" Bomb
First released: November 9, 1966
Technicolor, 1.85:1, 78 minutes

Production: American International Pictures. Producers: Fulvio Lucisano, Louis M. Heyward. Director: Mario Bava. Screenplay: Louis M. Heyward, Robert Kaufman. Story: James Hartford [James H. Nicholson]. Editor: Ronald Sinclair. Music: Les Baxter. "Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs" written by Guy Hemrick and Jerry Styner, performed by The Sloopys (Sidewalk Records).[1] Title design: Westheimer Co. Sound effects: Edit-Rite, Inc. Distributor: American International Pictures.

Additional US Credits: Executive producers: James H. Nicholson and Samuel Z. Arkoff. Vincent Price and Fabian are billed above Franco and Ciccio in the English version.

France: L'Espion qui Venait du Surgelé, "The Spy Who Came in From the Cold," TV only Mexico: Dr. Goldfoot Contra el Mundo, "Dr. Goldfoot Against the World," "en Sicodelico Technicolor!"

by Elwood Ullman (a veteran writer of Three Stooges and Bowery Boys comedies), Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine was originally filmed as a musical comedy. However, after screening director Norman Taurog's original cut, Sam Arkoff ordered all the songs cut from the picture, feeling that Price's delivery was "too fey." Regardless of the trims, which Price personally felt badly compromised what "would have been a very good, and very funny, picture," Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine (with a theme song by Motown's biggest singing group, Diana Ross and the Supremes) proved more successful than expected—even in Italy, where it was released under the title Dr. Goldfoot e il nostro Agente 00¼.

In a strange coincidence, Fulvio Lucisano had independently produced a similar film around the same time, based on a story of his own invention. I due mafiosi contro Goldginger ("The Two Mobsters vs. Goldginger," 1965) was another Goldfinger spoof, starring the popular Sicilian comedy team Franco and Ciccio, and Fernando Rey as Goldginger. A major success in Italy, where it earned 441 million lire ($275,000—more than any of Bava's directorial works would ever earn in his homeland), the picture was deemed too Italian to receive a theatrical release in America. However, AIP eventually acquired it as filler for their AIP-TV syndication packages, and in the late 1960s, it occasionally turned up on local American television stations under the obscure title The Amazing Dr. G. In comparison, Dr. Goldfoot e il nostro Agente 00¼ had performed well on Italian screens, but hardly achieved the same level of success as the Franco and Ciccio release, which seemed fated to have all its profit concentrated at its geographic point of origin.

Therefore, when Lucisano was approached by Arkoff and Nicholson with the challenge of producing a sequel to their Goldfoot film in Rome, he recognized an opportunity to not only fulfill that obligation, but to simultaneously produce a sequel to his own company's biggest commercial success to date, while adding some distinguished American guest stars into the bargain. The resulting production yielded two distinct comedies—an Italian International release top-lining Franco and Ciccio (and third-billing Vincent Price), and an AIP release starring Vincent Price (and "introducing" Franco and Ciccio).

Curiously, when interviewed for this book, neither Arkoff nor Lucisano were willing to admit that this had been their conscious strategy. Yet the evidence is there in the movies themselves, and the intention to make two movies in one is further validated by the screenplay, which at over 270 pages, is long enough to have yielded three movies. Pressed to reveal whether or not he was aware that Lucisano had used the production to devise a sequel to his own picture, the most Arkoff would say was, "I'm not saying I didn't [know]."

For his part, Arkoff remembered the production as being "completely American" in origin. "That was a deal picture," he said. "We had made Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine, which was a medium success. We thought of doing a sequel, so Fulvio and I got to talking, and he thought it sounded like a good idea. Horror pictures come and go and, during that period, they weren't doing too well. We had commitments to Vincent [Price], and the picture was conceived as a means of fulfilling our commitment to [him]. We talked to Fulvio and he had these people—they were a pair of Italian comics, so Italian it was ridiculous. Their audience was exclusively Italian. They were . . . they weren't even Laurel and Hardy! But he had these people, and we had Vincent Price. It was a mishmash. Then we got Bava. God knows why we used him . . ."

Lucisano explains his reasoning: "Mario was always a man with a big sense of humor. It was surprising [to me] that he was always doing horror pictures. This is why, when I was going to make a picture with Vincent Price and it was going to be a comedy, I chose him to direct. But it was not ready; there were problems with the script . . ." Luigi Cozzi, who met Bava for the first time during this period, agrees with Lucisano's assessment: "Actually, Mario's dream was to be a comedy director. That's what he really wanted to be . . . and he was such a funny man!"

ITALIAN locandina, art by Enrico DeSeta. Note Vincent Price's also-ran billing.

1 The song was eventually released on the Tower Records label.

Everyone agrees in retrospect that the script was abysmal, yet several people who never met sought and received credit for it. The Italian version identifies the authors as Castellano and Pipolo (the abbreviated screen credit for the writing team of Franco Castellano[2] and Giuseppe Moccia), and "an idea by Fulvio Lucisano." The American version, on the other hand, is credited to AIP's European line producer Louis M. "Deke" Heyward and Robert Kaufman—the latter being the principal screenwriter of Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine, and the creator of its cast of characters.[3]

"Substantially, it was a screenplay written originally by Robert Kaufman," Deke Heyward confirmed. "I did a total rewrite on it, retaining some of Kaufman's material and his essential storyline. Then I went to Italy to supervise the production, representing the American interests."

The film's international interests may have dovetailed well in theory, but in execution, it became, in Arkoff's words, "a pain in the ass, because we tried to mix genres, languages, and every other goddamn thing. If ever a picture was ill-conceived, by everybody . . . [that was it]."

Although contractually obligated, Vincent Price had flown to Italy with some optimism. He loved Rome for its great scenic beauty, and he looked forward, most of all, to the times when he would not be needed on the set, when he would be free to visit some of the world's greatest museums and scout the little gallerias off the beaten path for local art treasures. He had also heard promising things about his new director. "I knew of Mario Bava, as Boris [Karloff] had told me that he was a very good director," Price revealed, twisting his tone mid-sentence, "but I don't know what happened to him on this!"

"Nobody was very happy about [that picture]," agreed Arkoff, "and I imagine [Bava] couldn't have been very happy making it."

Indeed he was not. According to Heyward, the deep melancholic changes which Cameron Mitchell had observed in Bava's character during the filming of I coltelli del vendicatore were still in force throughout this production. "He was depressed," Heyward explained. "He going through a very bad time, but I can't think of him missing any days, nor can I think of him not functioning." Asked to further explain his diagnosis, Heyward added: "First of all, you have to understand my own character. I am something of a 'cheerer-upper,' an everybody-should-be-happy camp director; [I try to] make everybody smile. That's what I do. One day, one of our actors didn't show up, the guy who was supposed to play the general in charge of NATO. So I got into his uniform, dressed as a 5-star general. I was clowning it up, and I had everybody laughing—except Mario. He looked at me in a strange way and said, 'You are now an actor, and you behave as an actor.' Another time, when we were shooting in the park, I remember Mario looked down at the dirt, at the [empty] popcorn boxes, at the whatever-it-was on the ground, and he turned to me very apologetically and said, 'We Italians are really not like this.' It was a sad moment."

To those of us who eagerly awaited each new Bava film, there was an impression—falsely conveyed by AIP's delayed releases of his pictures—that they were being issued with reasonable regularity; there was an impression of a steady creative force at work. But as the true chronology of events, and the revelation of his side projects, show, Bava probably felt that he had given up a happy and prestigious career as a cameraman for a directorial career he never wanted, which was deteriorating—through lack of ambition—into a series of unpaid assignments and anonymous sweep-up jobs. There were also problems at home—problems with his wife Iole (who had grown very fat and neurotic), secondhand problems with his son Lamberto's own now-unhappy marriage, money problems, and perhaps (as Deke Heyward theorized) "problems with a mistress." Bava used to be able to escape his problems by going to work, but now, work itself was a problem. In Italy, Bava was perceived as a failure by many of his colleagues; his movies seldom made money, and he was stereotyped as a horror film director—a lesser breed of filmmaker even when boxoffice was good, but in the mid-1960s, the genre was returning to low ebb for the first time in a decade. In conversation with friends, he spoke about wanting to change his professional course, saying that he wished to direct comedies—and now that he was finally handed the reins of such a project, he was too firmly entrenched in depression to make the best of it.

It might be fairer to say that the script and the haphazard circumstances of production did nothing to assuage Bava's depression. Deke Heyward was kind enough to lend me his personal copy of the shooting script, its title page credited solely to him, which reflects the chaos of the production. Impossible to read sequentially, the screenplay contains a great many disregarded scenes and appears to have been written on at least three different typewriters, indicating a certain amount of composition done while globetrotting. Furthermore, there are numerous handwritten pages, evidently added to the picture on the spur of the moment.

ONE of Goldfoot's "ragazze-bomba" emerges from a hiding place in a General's hotel room, ready to kiss him into oblivion.

2 Franco Castellano had previously co-scripted and directed Franco and Ciccio's science fiction comedy I marziani hanno dodici mani ("The Twelve-Handed Men of Mars," 1964).

3 Born March 22, 1931, Robert Kaufman made his screenwriting debut with Ski Party (1965), produced by AIP as a welcome winter alternative for their popular "Beach" series. After writing Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine (based on an idea by James H. Nicholson), Kaufman also wrote the episode "The Devil and Peter Tork" for NBC-TV's The Monkees, a clever reworking of The Devil and Daniel Webster that many of the show's followers prize as the outstanding episode of the cult series' two-season run. Kaufman's greatest success of later years was his hit Dracula spoof Love at First Bite (1979), starring George Hamilton, Susan Saint James, and Arte Johnson, but he also wrote serious works, notably Ted Kotcheff's Split Image, which starred James Woods as a man specializing in the deprogramming of religious cult converts. Kaufman died at the age of 60 on November 21, 1991.

TEEN IDOL Fabian is clearly outnumbered by the female cast members.

Neither version of the movie can be synchronized to the script for more than four pages at a stretch; scenes from the middle or end are relocated near the beginning, and sometimes not used at all, and the scripted dialogue was seldom followed verbatim by the actors. Everything that could go wrong with the picture, short of the money running out, apparently did.

The resulting movie is almost always described as the nadir of Mario Bava's career, but this observation is most often made by people unaware that two distinct versions exist, and that the more familiar version—Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs—hardly qualifies as "A Mario Bava Film" at all. Though Bava is credited as the film's director, this version was wholly assembled in Los Angeles by AIP staff editor Ronald Sinclair, without Bava's input or participation. As Deke Heyward recollected, "It was brought back here [to America] and put together out of sheer desperation." It is highly unlikely that Bava ever saw, or had any interest in seeing, the American version.

The Italian and American versions may share the same cast, some of the same scenes, and the same basic story, yet they are as different to one another as I tre volti della paura is unlike Black Sabbath. As with those films, the definitive version "exists" somewhere in-between, in the viewer's own imagination. Neither version of this comedy is ideal, as both omit outstanding scenes to flatter their respective agendas. The Italian version is more noticeably Bava's creation; it contains its own share of faults, but despite them, it satisfies its intended audience far better than the American version does.

The following synopsis represents Le spie vengono dal semifreddo,[4] the only version supervised by Bava.

LOOKING here much as he felt during production, Vincent Price plays the secondary role of Gen. Willis.

Synopsis

In Paris, a French general arrives in a hotel room for an afternoon tryst with a mysterious woman in a gold bikini. As they kiss, the city is rocked by an explosion. Dr. Goldfoot is back in business.

In Rome, Bill Dexter—a secret agent from Security Intelligence Command (SIC)—sees Goldfoot being met at Fiumicino Airport by his Chinese hirelings Fong and Hardjob, with whose help he plans to continue assassinating world military leaders, so that "we Chinese" (Goldfoot is not Chinese, but doesn't seem to realize this) can take over the world. Bill recognizes Goldfoot from a prior case and pursues him unofficially, hoping that whatever information he gets will help him to make amends with SIC's top official, Col. Douglas Benson, whose wife was earlier caught making love with Dexter. While pretending to romance a local woman in a park in the Parco di Principe, Bill shadows Fong, but his suspicious moves are observed by two strangers in what appear to be generals' uniforms. They are Franco and Ciccio, two idiots who work as uniformed doormen at Rome's Hilton Hotel, while awaiting the results of a correspondence course to become secret agents—in order to get "lots of girls." Suspecting that Bill is in cahoots with "the Chinaman," they subdue him and rush off to work, where Dr. Goldfoot soon appears with the hotel's hat check girl in tow. Playing with a dart-firing "spy pen" he ordered from a comic book, Franco accidentally discharges it at the woman's derrière, but she doesn't flinch. Goldfoot's companion is a robot designed to replace the real hat check girl, whom Fong chloroforms and abducts. The Girl Bomb takes her place and winks her eye at a passing admiral. Back at the entrance, Franco and Ciccio see Bill enter the hotel and grab him again, this time tying him up for good measure. When Bill's bonds are loosened by an explosion in the hat check room, he explains to the two idiots what has happened and introduces himself as a SIC agent. Franco and Ciccio are awed to meet a real spy and try to impress Bill with their own unique "abilities," including Franco's dumb founding talent for impersonating a chicken.

The two idiots tag along with Bill to SIC Headquarters, where Col. Benson is explaining the need to stop Dr. Goldfoot's evil plot to the agency's best men. Application cards are dispensed to be filled out, and as Bill confers with Benson and his secretary Rosanna, Franco and Ciccio are mistaken for agents and given applications. While speaking to Bill, Benson is distracted by a telephone call from the President of the United States, who orders him to solve the Goldfoot problem as quickly as possible. Speaking to an assembly of international military brass, Benson makes a show of S.I.C.'s new super-computer, RITA, which will be entrusted with choosing the best qualified applicants for the case. Dr. Goldfoot himself spies on the meeting and mischievously crosses RITA's wires so that the electronic brain selects Franco and Ciccio for the job.

Ciccio decked out in deerstalker cap, Franco sporting a boutonniere that squirts water, they proceed to do what secret agents do—lounge around a swimming pool while adored by beautiful girls. They are approached by Bill, who is off the case but has unofficially trailed Goldfoot to a secluded villa. In the meantime, Fong abducts Rosanna—Dexter's current heartthrob—and replaces her with a robot duplicate. Franco and Ciccio go to the villa, where they are rushed by a henchman who lands in a swimming pool stocked with piranha. Helping the man out of the water and pulling up a skeleton, the two idiots flee the premises, bringing back Col. Benson and a dozen soldiers. By the time they return, Goldfoot has disguised the place as a Country School for Young Girls, with his Girl Bombs dressed in gymnasium wear and himself disguised as a nun! Fong, posing as a gardener, proves the pool to be safe by wading in it. While apologies are made by the colonel, Franco and Ciccio sneak into the villa and look around. In the bathroom, they are rushed by one of Goldfoot's thugs, who falls into the bathtub, where the flesh is stripped from his bones by the piranha moved indoors from the pool. They run outside to tell Benson, but the colonel refuses to listen to any more of their nonsense. As his Jeep drives away, Goldfoot signals for the gates to be closed and reveals his identity to the two hapless spies, holding them prisoner.

Tied up and left unattended in the lab, the two idiots look for a radio to produce some calming music and unwittingly activate the Girl Bomb Generator. Dozens and dozens of "ragazzebomba" emerge from the machine, asking how they might serve their masters. Returning from a visit with his stuttering twin, US Air Force Gen. Willis, whom he plans to impersonate as part of his master plan, Goldfoot is aghast at the spectacle of the Girl Bombs participating in a choreographed musical number. Franco manages to escape, disguised in a blonde wig and gold bikini, but Ciccio is not so lucky, posing as Goldfoot's own mirrored reflection! He is apprehended and duplicated into a super-strong robot who finds and tries, unsuccessfully, to kill Franco on the villa grounds. After Ciccio succeeds in dismantling his double, Franco returns to avenge the earlier attack on his person. Bill arrives, breaking up their absurd fight, and they alert him that Rosanna is being held hostage inside. They find and free her, and thus begins a riotous chase that leads the S.I.C. agents and their Communist enemies to the amusement rides at Luna Park. Impersonating Gen. Willis, Goldfoot gains access to a US Air Force jet carrying a nuclear bomb, which he plans to drop on the Kremlin, initiating a new war between the United States and Russia.

Bill, Rosanna, and the two idiots do what they can to stop Goldfoot's evil plan, hijacking a hot air balloon and riding it to the door of the jet. After gaining entrance by knocking at the side door, various fistfights ensue, as well as a cat-fight between Rosanna and Hardjob. With the bomb set to drop automatically, Dr. Goldfoot exits the plane with Hardjob and nothing more than an umbrella to soften their landing. Once Fong is tied up, all that is left to do is to disarm the nuclear warhead, which Franco and Ciccio attempt as Bill pilots the plane. The two idiots are both aboard the bomb as it drops, but it manages to land softly and non-explosively in a pile of snow somewhere in Siberia.

Initially, Franco and Ciccio are treated like kings by the Russian military for saving their country, but a call from Col. Benson soon reassigns the two idiots to the worst prison imaginable: a simple wooden fence defining their area in the midst of a Siberian snowstorm. Ciccio is seen cooking some food, and a passing Russian officer—obviously Goldfoot in disguise—asks what he's having for dinner. "Spaghetti all'italiana," he says. Goldfoot opens the pot for a look inside—and sees Franco's head, yelling his objections from amid the pasta.

Cast & Production

One of the true originals of American movies, Vincent Price was a modern Renaissance man so beloved by his public that he hardly requires introduction. Film star, stage actor, radio star, author, lecturer, gourmand, art collector and gallerist, and bon viveur, Price was born in St. Louis, Missouri on May 27, 1911. In films since 1938, he was also one of the first Hollywood actors to work in international co-productions, beginning with the prophetically titled Adventures of Captain Fabian (1951), an Errol Flynn vehicle directed in France by William Marshall. In the early 1960s, Price appeared in his first US/Italian co-productions, Fernando Cerchio's Nefertiti, Queen of the Nile (1961) and Mario Costa's Godon, il pirato nero/ Rage of the Buccaneers (1962]. In 1963, he starred in AIP's underrated L'ultimo uomo della terra/The Last Man on Earth, co-directed by Ubaldo Ragona and Sidney Salkow, based on Richard Matheson's classic horror novel I Am Legend.

Price was unequivocal in his opinion of Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs. "I absolutely eliminate the entire memory of that picture, it was such a disaster," he exclaimed. "It was a picture that was completely unplanned, unrehearsed, unset, un-acted. They had two Sicilian comics in it (who weren't in it to begin with), who didn't belong in it at all . . . two American actors . . . a German Oriental actress . . . an Italian director . . . it was just disastrous! They lost the soundtrack after the shooting, and had to hire a man who read lips to tell us what we said! I, of course, never saw it."

If Price never saw the American version, he almost certainly had neither opportunity nor wish to see the Italian version, in which he might have found moderately more worth. Some of Price's best scenes appear only in the Italian version. If the memory of this experience was not a happy one, it seems to have nevertheless had an instructive effect. At age 54, Price was one of the few actors of his generation still receiving top-billing in an ongoing motion picture career, but he found himself stereotyped in making an entirely different kind of picture than most actors want to be making when they know themselves to be in their creative prime. For some time, Price had been giving "automatic" performances in his horror films—partly because there was a certain "Vincent Price" that audiences expected, and partly because the material he was given seldom inspired him to give anything more. In retrospect, one can see that Price began to take his acting more seriously in the wake of this mess, and SIC Agent Bill Dexter (Fabian) meets Franco and Ciccio (Franco Franchi and Ciccio Ingrassia).

4 The Italian word "Semifreddo" literally means "half cold," so I have translated its meaning to "cool." The Italian word, I am told, was probably chosen to make a sideways reference to a then-popular brand of gelato (ice cream) called "Semifreddo."

gave some of his best and most thoughtful performances in his films of the late '60s and early '70s. One of the industry's true gentlemen, Vincent Price died of lung cancer and complications of Parkinson's disease on October 25, 1993, at the age of 82.

Prior to production, the industry trades reported several times that Frankie Avalon—Price's co-star in Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine—would reprise his role of S.I.C. agent Craig Gamble in the sequel. However, in late March 1966, Avalon secured a release from the picture, allowing him to stay at home with his wife Kay for the birth of their third child. The Beach Party star was quickly replaced by another "teen idol," Fabian. (The name of the protagonist was changed by Deke Heyward, though all references to the hero's past experiences opposite Goldfoot were retained. "I schlepped Fabian along because we couldn't get Frankie Avalon," he admitted.) Born Fabiano Anthony Forte on February 6, 1943, Fabian was "discovered" under unusual circumstances, while watching his father, the victim of a heart attack, being taken to the hospital in an ambulance. There on the sidewalk, a stranger showed him persistent attention, asking him if he'd ever done any acting or singing. Upset, Forte cursed at the stranger, who pressed a business card into his hand. Realizing that his family would need some compensatory income while his father recovered, he soon called the number on the card—and the rest is history. Fabian won the 1958 Silver Record Award for Most Promising Male Vocalist at the precocious age of 15, and made the jump to acting in Don Siegel's Hound Dog Man (1959), subsequently appearing in such films as High Time (opposite Bing Crosby), North to Alaska (opposite John Wayne), Five Weeks in a Balloon (opposite Peter Lorre) and Dear Brigitte (opposite James Stewart). His first international co-production was 1962's The Longest Day. Like many teen idols of the 1950s, Fabian later attempted to distance himself from his original, clean-cut image—by playing the lead role of gangster Pretty Boy Floyd in A Bullet for Pretty Boy (1970). He also appeared in Joe Dante's made-for-cable feature Runaway Daughters (1994).

BILL is surprised when Gen. Benson's conservative secretary Rosanna (Laura Antonelli) tries to seduce him.

"Side bar on Fabian," Deke Heyward interjected. "The nicest, hardest-working, most cooperative young star of that era it was ever my pleasure to work with. More than once during the making of that picture, he turned to me and said, 'Deke, what the hell are we doing here?' And I really didn't know what to tell him."

Headlining the Italian cast were the Sicilian comedy team of Franco Franchi (born Francesco Benenato, September 18, 1928) and Ciccio Ingrassia (born Francesco Ingrassia, October 5, 1923). Natives of Palermo, the two men were boyhood chums who, after drifting apart for a number of years, reunited by chance and formed a "strolling minstrels" act. One of the many people who saw them perform was Domenico Modugno (famous for his recording of "Volare"), who recommended them for a screen test. Franco and Ciccio became an overnight sensation in their first film, Appuntamento ad Ischia (1960), directed by Mario Mattoli. Incredibly, they appeared in twenty-three films over the next two years. Far from being "introduced" by Bava's film, Le spie vengono dal semifreddo was their 54th joint screen appearance; they eventually starred in well over 100 films together. Some of their earliest pictures were directed by future Italian horror specialist Lucio Fulci, most notably I maniaci ("The Maniacs," 1963), which also featured Barbara Steele. In later years, together and apart, Franco and Ciccio made a practice of poking fun at popular movie trends and successes with titles like 022 Agenti segretissimi ("022 Very Secret Agents," 1964), Il lungo, il corto, il gatto ("The Tall, the Short and the Skittish," 1967) and L'esorciccio ("The Exorcist—Ciccio-style," 1974). The most popular comedy duo in Italian film history, Franco and Ciccio came to an end when Franco Franchi died on December 9, 1992. Ciccio Ingrassia began his solo acting career in 1961, but his best-remembered screen role minus Franco was in Fellini's Amarcord (1973), in which he played the strange, taciturn uncle who climbs a tree and starts yelling, "I want a woman!" In 1996 he made his final screen appearance as a beggar in Al Festa's giallo, Fatal Frames. Ingrassia passed away on April 28, 2003, of heart failure.

"They were the Italian Abbott and Costello—the very poor man's Abbott and Costello," Heyward described them. "They also had direct access to Sicilian wines, which were rather great. They plied Mario with Sicilian wines, which they had shipped to them by the case! It was one of the ways they ingratiated themselves to the production." Asked what Franco and Ciccio were like to work with, Heyward was highly complimentary:

"They were great! Fantastic! Cooperative! I loved them. Even though they gathered around in great seriousness, listening to whatever words of wisdom I had to impart on their use of fractured English, should a pretty girl go by, one or the other would go after her, Harpo-like, and give her butt a most delicate pinch. They would bow, explain that they were Sicilian, this was a great compliment they said . . . and got away with it! They had genuine senses of humor, much talent, and were eager to work."

According to the AIP pressbook for Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs, "Naples-born" Laura Antonelli (Rosanna) was cast in the picture because Mario Bava considered her to be the most "American-looking" of more than 200 actresses who auditioned for the part. In truth, Laura Antonaz was born in Pula, Italy (now in Croatia), on November 28, 1941, and had made one previous film, Luigi Petrini's Le sedicenni (1965), an omnibus of love stories which received only minor circulation. Le spie vengono dal semifreddo was her first international release, and surprisingly, she is far more prominent in the American version than in the Italian one. Here, the 24-year-old Antonelli looks like a normal, wholesome young woman, despite spending most of her screen time in a slip. She is attractive, but there is nothing overtly sexy about her—certainly no indication of the direction her career would take only a few years later, when she embraced her future as one of Italy's leading erotic stars.

As Rosalba Scavia remembers, "It was an early film for Laura Antonelli, but she was already keen to exude her charm and her influence long before she became a siren in Italian popular culture. She and Mario had an affinity, due to her very religious upbringing."

Sam Arkoff had a very specific regret about hiring Antonelli. He explained: "My nephew, Ted Rusoff, was working for us in Italy at that time. He still [lives and works there], as an actor, dubber, and director of dubbing. He's even been in a couple of Fellini pictures. At that time, he was very young and we employed him as, basically, a go-fer. He got friendly with Antonelli, who was a beautiful young lady . . . Here was Antonelli; she had made one earlier picture and she'd taken her clothes off in it. We hired her thinking that she might at least take off some of her clothes, but my nephew—unbeknownst to us—was over there telling her that she shouldn't be taking off her clothes, that it was undignified! Here was this woman, known throughout the world as a very sexy woman, who took her clothes off with impunity if not immunity—and she wouldn't take her clothes off for us! The only picture she ever made with her clothes on and she made it for us!"

Deke Heyward confirmed: "I had written some additional scenes for the European version, one of which opted to show Laura—in good taste . . . oh shit, maybe not in such good taste!—taking a bath while talking to Franco and Ciccio. She agreed to it, but the morning of the big scene, her mother showed up, dressed in black, and vowed that her daughter was clean enough and didn't need to take no baths, and if there was going to be bath-taking, there was going to be money changing hands, and not too many people around. I could agree to not too many people, but I couldn't agree to more money. After a lot of screaming, breast (mine) beating, threatening and cajoling, Laura got into the bathtub (tepid studio water, not enough bubbles), braless, but with panties on. Every time Mario yelled, 'Camera!' Mamma was there, whipping up bubbles [to conceal Laura's breasts], while Franco and Ciccio stood around like Abbott and Costello, averting their eyes from Laura's exposure! A half day was wasted trying to get that shot, and I finally made an executive decision: Dry her off and move on. Considering the amount of flesh she showed in subsequent films, even at this late date, I feel short-changed."

Heyward paused here to clarify himself: "I don't mean to imply that Laura was a terror. She was an actress, with one picture completed that had produced quite an enormous press and coverage of her uncoverage. She was scared. She wanted a career, and faced the fact that she had precious little talent and virtually no training, had difficulty speaking and understanding English, and that the major interest in her career was predicated not in the body of her work, but the body of her body."

After working with Bava, Antonelli reconsidered her stance on screen nudity and began more aggressively pursuing her future reputation as one of Italy's great sex symbols of the 1960s and '70s. She began specializing in sexy films in 1968, when she starred in such popular but controversial films as Gian Luigi Polidoro's Satyricon, Riccardo Ghione's Le rivoluzione sessuale (co-scripted by Dario Argento), and Massimo Dallamano's Le malizie di Venere/Venus in Furs, all filmed that same year. By the time she starred in Luchino Visconti's final feature L'innocente/The Innocent (1976) opposite Giancarlo Giannini, Antonelli was in her mid-thirties and her body had grown voluptuous with maturity. This film marked the commencement of her international stardom, which continued well into the 1980s. In 1991, Antonelli made unwelcome headlines when she was arrested for cocaine possession and sentenced to three and a half years in prison; the term was suspended when the actress agreed to enter a detox clinic. A reborn Antonelli, still beautiful in her 50s, emerged from the clinic, announcing that she intended to devote her life to God . . . after making one final erotic movie, Malizia II (1992). As a crew member on that production mockingly explained, "She's going to seduce the world one last time, then marry Jesus Christ."[5]

Antonelli's comeback was not successful, and her name most recently appeared in the Italian press when she filed suit against the newspaper reporters who made headlines of her drug arrest, claiming that the negative publicity had destroyed her career.

The most surprising difference between the Italian and American cuts of the picture is that Laura Antonelli scarcely appears in Le spie vengono dal semifreddo—not to create more screen time for Franco and Ciccio, but as a stern reprimand for her prima donna behavior on the set. Deke Heyward freely admitted this: "Laura was contentious throughout the picture and never came with her lines prepared. Unprepared, cared less, Mamma around terrifying cast and crew. Laura was going to be a star—she believed it, as did I—but this foolishness was beneath her. Yes, she was cut, cut, cut."

Francesco Mulé (Col. Benson) was born in Rome on December 3, 1926. Active in films since 1953, Mulé quickly gravitated to comedies, working with the likes of Steno, Renato Rascel, and Totò (with whom he made several films between 1958 and 1961). He also appeared in Steno's rarely seen comedy thriller Psycosissimo (1961), Il giorno più corto/The Shortest Day (1962), Le voci bianche/White Voices (1964, with Barbara Steele), John Guillermin's House of Cards (1968), Ken Annakin's The Biggest Bundle of Them All (1968), and Stanley Kramer's The Secret of Santa Vittoria (1969), and continued to work onscreen through 1979. He served Bava once again in an uncredited appearance as the crematory official in Diabolik/Danger: Diabolik (1968). Mulé succumbed to cancer on November 4, 1984.

Half-Chinese, Hawaiian-born "Moana Tahi" a.k.a. Moa Tahi (Hardjob, Goldfoot's "dragon lady" assistant) had been living and acting in Rome for several years prior to this film. She had played small roles in several Roman productions—besides Antonio Margheriti's I criminali della galassia/Wild, Wild Planet (1965), she was the Asian model caught in a web of ropes and terrorized by Carlo Rambaldi's mechanical spider in Il boia scarlatto/Bloody Pit of Horror (1965).

Uncredited in most prints, George Wang (Fong) made his screen debut as one of the few authentically Chinese actors in Nicholas Ray's 55 Days at Peking (1963), in which the main Asian roles were portrayed by Leo Genn and Flora Robson. Handsome, stocky, impeccably groomed, with an impassive face, Wang was cast in many European productions as imposing henchmen with names like Chu and Ming and Mingo. Among his more important screen appearances were Umberto Lenzi's I pirati della Malesia/The Pirates of the Seven Seas (1964, with Steve Reeves), La decima vittima/The 10th Victim (1965, as the Hunter shot by Ursula Andress' loaded brassiere), and—of particular relevance to his casting in the Bava film—Bruno Corbucci's James Bond spoofs James Tont operazione U.N.O. and James Tont operazione D.U.E. (both 1965) and Lenzi's A 008 operazione sterminio (also 1965). After the Goldfoot film, Wang found himself increasingly typecast and continued to menace spies until the Italians ceased to parrot the success of the Bond films later in the 1960s. Unexpectedly, he then began to show up with surprising frequency in the backgrounds of Italian Westerns, beginning with Sergio Bergonzelli's Una colt in pugno al diavolo/A Colt in the Hand of the Devil (1967) and continuing through nearly a dozen others, including Giuliano Carmineo's Buon funerale, amigos, paga Sartana/Gunslinger (1970), Mario Caiano's Il mio nome è Shanghai Joe (1972), and Antonio Margheriti's Ming, ragazzi!/Hercules vs. Karate (1973). He relocated to Taiwan around this time and appeared in a number of local productions, including 1977's To Kill With Intrigue, opposite Jackie Chan.

5 The Sport (UK daily tabloid), June 26, 1991.

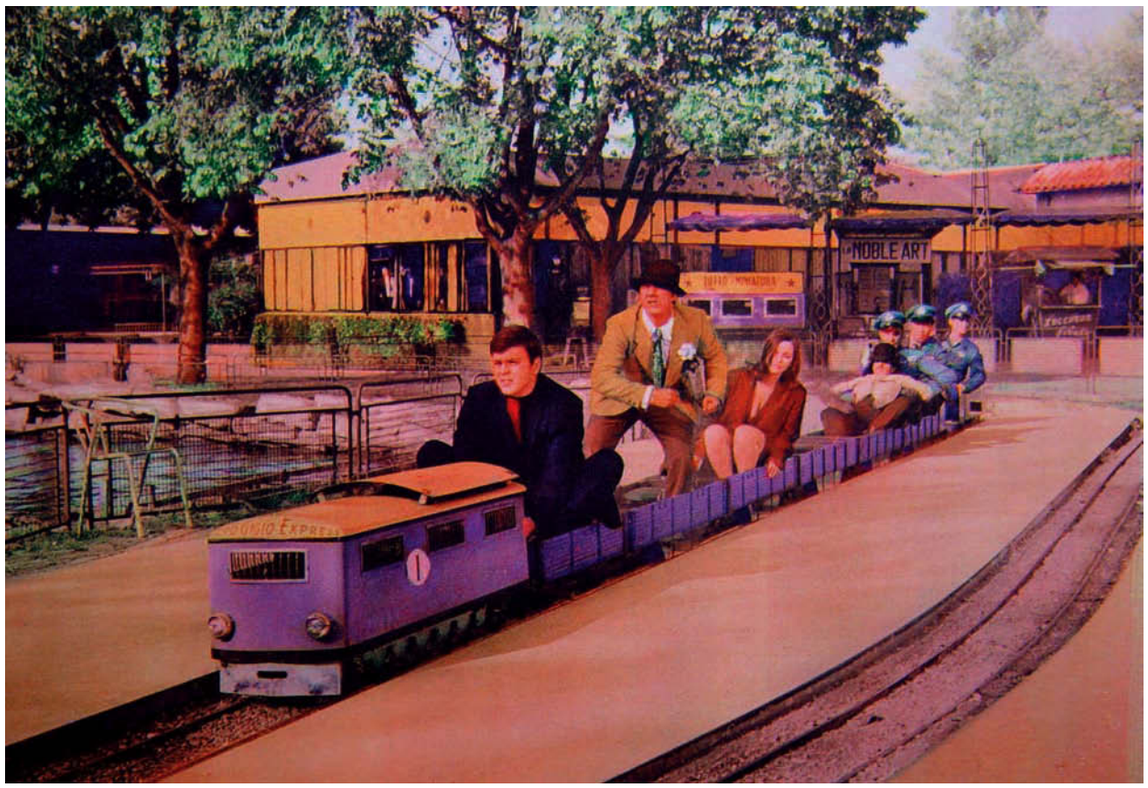
Designed by art director Gastone Carsetti in accordance with Bava's instructions, Goldfoot's laboratory set occupied Stages 8 and 9 at Cinecittà, and is said to have been the largest set built there since the filming of Cleopatra, equivalent in size to one-and-a-half city blocks. Carsetti held the same position on an earlier Franco and Ciccio film produced by Fulvio Lucisano: L'amore primitivo/Primitive Love (1963). Goldfoot's laboratory is certainly the most impressive of the film's sets, yet it is almost indistinguishable from the interior of the Argos in Terrore nello spazio, an indication of Bava's absolute control over the set design of his movies. In this department, the film is a noticeable improvement over Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine, whose laboratory was none too convincing and heavily recycled existing set modules from the dungeons of earlier AIP releases.



Other interiors were filmed at the Rome Hilton, where the non-local cast and crew members also resided during the filming. In return for its generous promotional exposure (actually, the film never mentions the Hilton by name), the luxury hotel rolled out its red carpets, contributing free shooting space, conference rooms, a food station, and room service. Deke Heyward, who was summoned into service to play one of the generals who meet with Col. Benson, remembered having a surreal encounter there, while in uniform: "I met [Egyptian President Gamal-Abdel] Nasser. He was staying at the Hilton, I was staying at the Hilton, and I ran into him while I was wearing my 5-star general outfit!"

The production demanded much more location shooting of Bava than he liked to do, including a partial day's filming at the Parco di Principe, the scenes inside the Rome Hilton, and also extensive filming at Rome's popular amusement ground, Luna Park. "The value of the amusement park was that we needed production value," Heyward clarified. "'More production value!' was something that Sam was always screaming at me. So Mario or the production manager said, 'We'll go the amusement park' and wrote the scene in, so we could get some production value there."

According to AIP's pressbook, the Luna Park filming did not proceed without incident: it reported that Fabian became a hero that day, after saving a child from imminent peril. During the filming of the mini-train sequence, a 6-year-old Roman girl—eager for a glimpse of the celebrities—reportedly leaned too far outside the miniature car she was riding and nearly fell under the train's wheels. Fabian noticed the mishap and jumped off his own train car, swept the screaming child up in his arms, and carried her to safety. It reads well, but when one looks at the film itself, it becomes obvious that all of the shooting inside Luna Park took place early in the morning, when it was closed to the public. There were no onlookers, no 6-year-old child.

While on location at Luna Park, Bava's lack of inspiration was such that he did something that would have been unthinkable under other circumstances: he hired another artist to execute a glass matte painting needed for the shot. The results, however, were enough to propel Bava back into action. Deke Heyward recalled the occasion: "We had another matte-man [with us] for the day in the park, but Mario was not pleased with the results and [he] repainted it hurriedly on the glass . . . I remember watching him and thinking that this was a strange thing to see a director doing, but he wasn't satisfied and what he did was right."

Another of the curious assertions made by the AIP pressbook is that Bava personally constructed a large-scale miniature of the Colosseum, made entirely out of linguine! It reports that more than 400 pounds of the wheat pasta were crumbled and then painstakingly assembled into "the believable maquette." Unfortunately, the only footage of the Colosseum appearing in either version of the picture is an exterior stock footage shot. What is curious about this publicity item is that Bava is one of the few directors of whom such an assertion is entirely plausible. The Colosseum features in the narrative during the chase sequence, as Goldfoot's car crashes into it, pummelling the vehicle with chunks of falling (papier maché) rock. One would imagine, from this footage, that Bava may well have planned to film a gag effects shot of the entire Colosseum crumbling from the impact.

THE PATHETIC chase sequence filmed at Luna Park.

"Forget the AIP pressbook," Deke Heyward advised. "They didn't have a guy on location with us, so they had to make up things they felt might appeal to the then-willing and quite gullible press. As for the Colosseum being made entirely of linguine—horse hockey! There was no time for fooling around. We were fighting for our financial lives. If there was anything made of linguini on the set, it would have been served to the crew in lieu of a break! On one occasion, Mario did spend hours preparing a glass matte painting of the Colosseum, but we were shooting in the Parco di Principe without a permit, and by the time Mario got the shot lined-up to his satisfaction, a member of the park's tight-hatted police force came by and told us to move on. I had no money with me to offer as a friendship gesture, so I offered him an Italian Fudgsicle I had half-eaten. He didn't think it was funny."

THE TWO idiots pay hommage to Stanley Kubrick in the film's madcap finale.

The hot air balloon seen in the film was a hanging, 3-dimensional miniature that was photographed, respectively, before a "blueback" [blue background] screen for various optical insertions—for example, for the shots of the balloon landing at Luna Park and ascending, between two groupings of cypress trees, the miniature was optically inserted into the blue sky behind them. For other shots, the miniature was photographed while sandwiched between a blue background screen with dark, animated clouds projected from the stencilled cyclodrum device seen in the closing moments of I tre volti della paura, and a foregrounded glass matte of white clouds. For the storm shots, "rain" was added by a dribbling hose held just offscreen to the left. This method produced water droplets too large to be convincing—but, by this point in the movie, the audience has seen so much broadly caricatured that it hardly matters. In one of the most impressive shots of the sequence, Bava introduced a miniature of the US Air Force jet, fashioned after the one seen in the accompanying stock footage, and animated its gradual approach toward the camera, as the balloon awaits its approach from a cluster of clouds.

For reasons that no one remembers, Bava made another of his rare cameo appearances during this sequence. In what appears to be an inside joke of some kind, Bava and another unidentified man appear in two shots as haloed angels on a cloud, who confer and shrug their shoulders philosophically as the angel of the dead amusement park manager continues to badger our heroes from Heaven about the balloon they have stolen from him.

Another charming special effects moment in the picture is the Dr. Strangelove-inspired scene in which Franco and Ciccio, entrusted with the task of defusing the nuclear warhead, are accidentally dropped with the bomb while straddling it. The bomb looks flat on camera, and it may well have been a flat wooden reproduction rather than the rounded prop shown as the bomb bay is first opened, the better to allow them to roll around atop it while not sliding off. Flat or round, the bomb was filmed before a blueback screen, allowing the blue area to be optically replaced with passing clouds, a miniature desert where the bomb nearly touches down, and finally a snowy bank where it safely settles. The bomb was rotated optically, in accordance with the actors' movements. For the surprising moment when the bomb bounces like a balloon off the desert surface, a carefully timed jet of air was fired through the sand from below, creating a response to the contact.

The completion of filming left no one feeling very elated. Deke Heyward remembered his last meeting with Bava: "The last time I saw him was at a goodbye feast, at a long table in an Italian restaurant. It was called Lumaca—the Italian word for 'snail'—on the Appian Way, and Bava was there playing the genial host, even though he wasn't paying for it. Poor Fabian was inconsolable. He thought his career was ruined. He was a dear friend, but he looked me in the eye and said, 'Vincent told me you'd screw me into the ground. All you AIP guys screw us actors into the ground.' 'Me?' I asked innocently. 'After all we've gone through on The Dick Clark Show together?' 'Well, maybe not you,' he said, 'but those AIP guys. I don't know their names, but they came around here yesterday wearing their dark suits.' 'Fabe,' I said gently, 'don't ever talk about them again.' 'You mean . . . ?' I nodded. 'The Big M—Franco and Ciccio are from Sicily, remember?' Fabian nodded. End of conversation."

GOLDFOOT conducts an inspection of his Girl Bombs, as associate Fong (George Wang) awaits instruction.

While occupied with the editing of Le spie vengono dal semifreddo, Mario Bava's low spirits were raised when he was approached by a young admirer named Luigi Cozzi, born in Busto Arsizio on September 7, 1947. This enterprising 19-year-old would, in time, become a film director in his own right, but at the time, he was approaching his hero as an enthusiastic Italian correspondent for the American magazine Famous Monsters of Filmland.

"I was living in Milan at that time," Cozzi remembers, "and I went to Rome and met Mario Bava, to see if I could do an article about him for Famous Monsters. He was very, very kind, and I spoke at length with him. I loved listening to him; he was such a funny man. He was a joy to talk with, always joking—that kind of guy. He didn't take himself seriously. He was amazed that someone would talk seriously about his movies. He would say, 'I didn't do the scene that you're raving about because it was a good critical idea, but because I ran out of time and money!'—that kind of thing. He was a very nice guy, but always complained about not being understood by the critics, not being helped by his producers. I would ask him why he made a bad film, because he had such a big talent, I couldn't understand why he would put himself down by working with such stupid scripts. Most of his scripts, I felt even then, were pretty bad—and he agreed! 'Yes,' he said, 'I knew the script was a piece of trash, but I had problems with taxes, I had taxes to pay . . . I asked the producer for authorization to rewrite the script, and he would say 'I don't give a shit, but I won't spend one more penny on it, so I suggest you just take it and shoot it.' This is what he told me. He knew that the French had written a lot of good things about him, and he was proud of that, but at the same time, he was also sad because he was considered as nothing more than a 'B' director in Italy. After he died, all of a sudden, the critics started to say, 'Oh, Mario Bava!' Till the very day he died, a new picture by Bava was not even reviewed by the main reviewer of a newspaper; they would send some kid to cover it. He told me that producers never called him because he was a good director, but because he was cheap and fast. This saddened him. An awareness of this was filtered through his words, you know?"

At some point during their time together, Bava treated Cozzi to a private screening of the rough cut of his work-in-progress ("It wasn't one of his good ones," Cozzi winces), which contained slugs [blank filler] where special effects shots and opticals were to be inserted later. Cozzi was bewildered by this temporary measure, prompting a detailed explanation of the blueback process from the Maestro, afterwards.

As Cozzi prepared to leave, Bava gave him the addresses of some publicity agents who could provide him with promotional stills. To his amazement, Cozzi was soon in possession of a large stack of original black-and-white photographs from several different Bava movies, both scene and behind-the-scenes shots. "They were all originals," Cozzi told me in 1989. "I wish I still had them, but I sent them all to Forry Ackerman. He published maybe one or two, but I sent him at least a hundred, probably more."

Cozzi remembers writing two or three articles based on his initial conversations with Bava, but these pioneering appreciations of Italy's King of Horror never appeared in the pages of Famous Monsters of Filmland. "No, no," Cozzi laughs, "because those were serious articles—but I did publish them in Italy."

This account is something of a revelation, considering that Bava was perceived by his few fans at the time as a publicity-shunning man of mystery. As someone who knew him personally, Cozzi suggests that Bava may have later deliberately concocted this false image of himself to stimulate the public's curiosity about him and his work. (Or rather, when I suggested this to Cozzi, he replied, "Maybe so . . . I think so.") The fact remains that Bava was warmly receptive to a young interviewer at this time, not just answering questions but actually taking a young and caring giornalista into the confidence of his craft. Unfortunately, after this, it was some time before anyone else cared. Bava's bid for international exposure in an important American fan magazine came to nothing, and three more years would pass before the first interview with Mario Bava appeared in print.

Variations

The Italian version of Le spie vengono dal semifreddo was edited by "Federico Muller," one of several pseudonyms employed by Frederick Muller, whose career in films has been prestigious and varied. Muller began as an editor, cutting the Biblical drama Ponzio Pilato/Pontius Pilate (1962), co-directed by Irving Rapper and Gian Paolo Callegari, which starred actress Leticia Roman the same year she made La ragazza che sapeva troppo with Bava. Then, under the name "Fritz Muller," he worked as assistant director on I castello dei morti-vivi/Castle of the Living Dead (1964), which may have provided him with the opportunity of meeting Bava. It will astonish anyone who has seen Le spie vengono dal semifreddo that it was edited by the man responsible for the astounding montages of Orson Welles' The Trial (1963) and Falstaff: Chimes at Midnight (1965), but it's true. After the Bava film, Muller changed careers once again and worked as a unit production manager on various American epics filmed in Italy, including The Agony and the Ecstasy (1965), Reflections in a Golden Eye (1967), The Shoes of the Fisherman (1969), and Robert Altman's Malta-lensed Popeye (1980). These productions allowed him to make the connections necessary to become a producer, and in 1973, as Frederick Muller, he produced his first film—Nicolas Roeg's marvelous Don't Look Now. Muller continues to work in this capacity today, having brought to the screen such productions as Code Name: Wolverine (1996) and Tea With Mussolini (1999).

The synopsis presented above represents the Italian version supervised by Mario Bava and edited by Muller. When this version was sent to Arkoff and Nicholson at AIP, they screened it and felt it was too Italian for American tastes; however, because they had cast (and paid) Vincent Price and Fabian, it was compulsory to release some form of the picture theatrically in the United States and other English-language territories. Consequently, all of the footage shot for the picture was turned over to AIP editorial supervisor Ronald Sinclair. Sinclair—the most likely suspect behind the filming of Boris Karloff's English-language host footage for Black Sabbath—was thus the principal architect of Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs.

"Anything majorly wrong with that picture was [a result of] the American editing, which was pretty bad," admitted Deke Heyward. "They were given a pretty good film to start with. Mario hadn't made many careless pictures before, if he ever did. As you know, Mario was a consummate craftsman. But somehow, whenever we shipped a director's cut to America, it fell prey to itchy fingers."

To better understand the exact nature of the changes affected by Sinclair, the following is a chronological overview of both films, illustrating the ways in which one diverts from the path of the other. Le spie vengono dal semifreddo is designated as "II" (for Italian International), while Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs is designated as "AIP."

II: The main titles are pure Bava, depicting Franco and Ciccio—both dressed in white, with white detective accoutrements (Holmesian pipe, magnifying glass), photographed against a black background—ogling various details of women's bodies, which appear out of the darkness drenched in saturated color lighting. Faces, breasts, legs, hips are all manifest before them, sometimes gigantically, in a manner that recalls Boris Karloff's interaction with the giant telephone in the introduction to "The Telephone" in AIP's Black Sabbath. The title sequence is accompanied by Franco's frenetic song "Bang Bang Kissene," which was released in Italy as a single on the Ester label.

AIP: The main titles recap the story of Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine, using clips from that earlier picture (as well as some preview shots from the movie about to be shown) with voice-over narration by Price and new music by Les Baxter. Ironically, Bava's directing credit coincides with the spoken phrase "caught like a rat in a trap."

After the titles, the AIP opens with a stock footage exterior of the Eiffel Tower, which the following shot of the ragazza-bomba at the window, establishes as the view from her hotel room. This interior shot is the very first narrative shot of the Italian version, which curiously omits the stock shot.

After the exploding kiss, the AIP cuts to a stock shot of the Colosseum, denoting a change of location to Rome. In a scene not included in the II, Bill Dexter deplanes from his flight reading a newspaper with the headline: "FRENCH GENERAL EXPLODES." Almost immediately, Bill bumps into Dr. Goldfoot, who is being escorted to a North Pole flight by Fong and Hardjob. Bill recognizes Goldfoot and insists that they have met before, but the evildoer denies this, claiming that he is a world-famous Sousaphonist who has fan clubs springing up all over the world.

The next AIP scene is set in a highly artificial North Pole, where a Girl Bomb in bikini stands decoratively outside an igloo. Goldfoot, disguised as a general, drives another general to this remote place of assignation. The general approaches the girl, and we see his hand (at rest on the surface of the igloo) gain heat and sink into the ice as though it were shaving foam—exactly what it is, in this not-very-persuasive trick shot. Goldfoot drives away and hears the explosion. This scene is not included in the II.

Then the AIP cuts to the laboratory in Goldfoot's Italian villa, where he creates a Girl Bomb in the likeness of the hat check girl at the Hilton. "I know a general who's just dying to lose his . . . Good Conduct Medal over her!" Goldfoot effuses.

II: The Italian version cuts from the first exploding kiss in the (undesignated) French hotel room to a different scene in Goldfoot's laboratory, which appears about thirty minutes later in the AIP assembly. Dr. Goldfoot speaks proudly to Fong and Hardjob of his equipment and demonstrates how his machine produces the Girl Bombs. With great panache, he creates several and arranges them in a military inspection queue, while addressing the audience directly. The dialogue in the II is somewhat different than the wording of the AIP, with Goldfoot here comparing his invention to the great achievements of science, and himself to such notable past scientific minds as Nostradamus. This scene feels more accurately placed in the II, as its placement in the AIP causes Goldfoot to explain his invention the second time we see it used, when it no longer requires explanation, if it ever did.

This scene is followed by the scene in the Parco di Principe, introducing Franco and Ciccio. The AIP completely eliminates the business about the two idiots believing that Bill is in cahoots with "the Chinaman" Fong (who is in the park spying on a general) and using a handy trip-wire device to send the SIC agent tumbling down a flight of stairs. Then, realizing they are late for work and may lose their jobs, they hurry away to the hotel. As Bill collects himself, Fong happens along and nonchalantly steps on his hand, without stopping.

At the Rome Hilton, Franco and Ciccio are put immediately to work, attending to an arriving couple. Franco is asked to help the lady out of her fur coat; this he does, exposing her bare back, which he ogles at close proximity, wagging the brim of his cap with his brow to comic effect. This lascivious moment is cut from the AIP.

AIP: As in the II, the hotel business cuts outside the hotel, to show Fong meeting Goldfoot's car. The doctor has brought his duplicate of the hotel's hat check girl, and the two men converse separated by an open car door, with its window rolled up. The AIP adds an absurd bit of business where Goldfoot cannot hear a word that Fong says until he rolls down the window of the open door.

II: When Bill follows Fong to the hotel, he is promptly attacked once again by Franco and Ciccio. The Italian version lengthens their skirmish with a comic, high-speed fight that concludes with the two idiots dragging Bill off to an adjoining room and tying him up.

AIP: Shortly after Fong begins to subdue the hat check girl with chloroform, there is an additional shot of the Hilton's elaborate staircase as the general descends toward the area. Dr. Goldfoot notices and signals to Fong to hurry up. He drags the girl away.

II: Whereas the AIP ends the scene with a close-up of the hat check duplicate winking at the general, the II adds a shot of the general reaching over and pinching her cheek affectionately.

At SIC Headquarters, when Col. Benson produces a tape recorder to impress some new agent recruits with excerpts from a speech he recorded earlier, he initially presses the wrong button and plays some silly music.

AIP: Here, when Benson presses the wrong button on his tape recorder, we hear a woman moaning, "Oh, Colonel, baby . . ."

When Benson enters his office to speak with Bill Dexter, who has brought him word of Dr. Goldfoot's whereabouts, he finds the suspended agent kissing his pretty secretary, Rosanna. At the end of Bill's visit, Rosanna shows him to the door, and he invites her to join him for coffee. She declines, saying that she hates coffee, and Bill asks her to step into the hall for a moment. She follows him out the door, and we hear the offscreen sounds of a kiss and a slap.

II: Both of these scenes with Rosanna, establishing her as the romantic interest of our young protagonist, are omitted from the II, moving Laura Antonelli's character to the far background of the story. Indeed, with the exception of her participation in the chase that occupies the last twenty minutes of the picture (from which it would have been impossible to remove her), all of Antonelli's major scenes were cut from Le spie vengono dal semifreddo.

AIP: The film next cuts back to Dr. Goldfoot's villa, where the villain is visiting with his behind-bars prisoner, Gen. Willis—who, if not for his slightly different hair style, eye patch, and hopeless stutter, would be his identical twin. It would seem that Goldfoot was impersonating Gen. Willis in the earlier North Pole scene, but this is the earliest reference to the character in either version—indicating its misplacement in both. (Vincent Price shares the screen with himself in one of Bava's typically well-executed, split-screen, double exposure shots.) Exiting the room, Dr. Goldfoot sends a Girl Bomb in to the general with instructions to give him only "half a charge" since they are indoors. She enters the room and moves toward the jail bars to kiss Willis, who recoils as though he knows exactly what is coming.

The II reserves this scene till the last half hour, thus leading directly into the masquerade prior to the chase sequence, but there are some minor differences. In the AIP, the scene cuts away before the Girl Bomb's lips actually touch Gen. Willis; in the II, the kiss is shown and held for a second or two, before cutting to the explosion (a shot of a red smoke bomb photographed against a black backdrop, flashed onscreen with an accompanying sound effect) and then cutting, again, outside the room to Goldfoot's satisfied expression. The II moves on to the next scene before he can speak, but the AIP includes a comment by Goldfoot: "And then there were none!"

It is at this point that the AIP cuts to the laboratory "creation" scene that occurs almost thirty minutes earlier in the II.

As Dr. Goldfoot leaves the laboratory to supervise the feeding of his pet piranha in the outdoor pool, the AIP contains an additional bridging scene of Goldfoot climbing up through a trap door into a lavish bathroom. There he scolds one of the hired help, whom he catches using his "very best cologne"—packaged in a large, florid-looking atomizer bottle.

After the piranha scene, the AIP cuts to SIC Headquarters, where Rosanna coaches Col. Benson on the speech he is about to make to a gathering of generals.

During the course of Benson's speech, he confuses Dr. Goldfoot's spy periscope for an ashtray and drops a lit cigar down the tube. The watchful villain yells "Ow!" as he backs away from the viewfinder, then explains to the viewer (in the most godawful dialogue reading in the picture), "Smoke got in my eyes!"

When the sabotaged RITA computer selects Franco and Ciccio as the most effective agents for the job of capturing Goldfoot, the AIP contains additional footage of the machine obviously malfunctioning before the selection is made. The II, on the other hand, opts for the more subtle approach of cutting from the wires crossed by Goldfoot to Benson pulling the cards sent up by the computer.

As Franco and Ciccio enter the room of generals in their ridiculous detective garb—Franco sporting a large, water-squirting boutonniere, Ciccio wearing a deerstalker cap and clenching a pipe in his teeth—the AIP cuts to an exclusive scene in Rosanna's apartment, where Bill Dexter is still kissing her. She puts him off, explaining that she likes him, but prefers to be romanced slowly. They talk and Rosanna makes the important suggestion that Bill get to know "the two idiots" who have been assigned to the Goldfoot case, because "if you join them and solve the case, you'll get back into SIC!"

As the conversation ends, we discover that Dr. Goldfoot has been spying on the couple. "That Bill Dexter makes me nervous," he confides to Fong, "and I absolutely must have that girl Rosanna!" Fong is surprised, saying, "Ah! So you do have a heart after all, Dr. Goldfoot!" To which the doctor petulantly replies, "I don't want to oscillate her, I want to duplicate her!"

II: It is curious that the II retains the scene of Fong chloroforming Rosanna and replacing her with an identical Girl Bomb, because all later reference to the substitution is omitted!

AIP: In this version, Fong's abduction of Rosanna is interrupted by the unexpected arrival of Bill Dexter. The duplicate playfully greets Bill by covering his eyes with her hands, allowing Fong to furtively escape with the real Rosanna in tow. The robo-Rosanna puts on some seductive music and dances provocatively around the apartment, hoping to lure the intrepid agent into a fatal kiss, but Bill sees through her when she agrees to have a cup of coffee. "I love coffee!" she purrs. Bill accuses her of being one of Goldfoot's Girl Bombs, and while stalking him through the apartment, she accidentally electrocutes herself, causing her to hyperactivate and explode into several pieces. Bill declares that the real Rosanna must be at Dr. Goldfoot's villa and exits.

Rosanna's abduction by Fong, Antonelli's most erotic scene, and Bill's reason for driving out to the villa—all missing from the II version.

Back at the laboratory, Goldfoot amuses himself by combing his hair differently, donning an eye patch, and asking Fong who he looks like. Fong guesses "Dr. Goldfoot," but the preening villain sternly corrects him: "I look just like Gen. Willis!" Their bickering is interrupted by a phone call, announcing the arrival of a meat truck carrying a side of beef for Goldfoot's pet piranha fish.

II: Here, the same scene is relocated to a point after Franco and Ciccio are shown prowling around the grounds of the villa and discovering the piranha in the pool. The scene also omits the dialogue referring to Gen. Willis (not yet introduced in this version) and begins with Goldfoot on the telephone—the Italian dialogue rewrites the scene so that the call alerts him to the presence of the two idiots on the grounds. Because Vincent Price's hair is combed differently here, in this context without explanation, the inconsistency draws undue attention to itself as an apparent continuity error.

GOLDFOOT eludes the notice of SIC and the Italian Army by posing as a bearded, pregnant, beach ball-bouncing nun.

Although the AIP retains the scene introducing Dr. Goldfoot's pool of piranha, the two subsequent "payoff" scenes of Franco and Ciccio's interaction with the carnivorous fish are both cut from that version. In the first, Franco dips his foot into the swimming pool to test the water, and has part of his shoe eaten. Immediately, they are rushed from behind by one of Goldfoot's thugs and he lands in the pool. Franco helpfully reaches out to the hand extending from the water, to help the poor fellow out, but finds the hand attached to the arm of a complete skeleton. In terror, the two idiots flee the scene, running into various booby traps along the way, including two rows of large sabres that spring out of an innocent-looking hedge. They manage to escape before the front gate closes on them.

AIP: Here we cut directly from Goldfoot's comment about the diminished appetite of his piranhas to the abrupt arrival of Col. Benson and his troops—whom Franco and Ciccio presumably summoned after making their getaway.

II: Just before Col. Benson arrives with his military might, the II adds some shots of buttons being pushed in the laboratory, which effect certain changes on the grounds. The menacing sabres retreat once again into the hedges, and a sign appears outside the front gate, reading "Collegia della Malvezza."

As Dr. Goldfoot—disguised as a nun (a bearded and apparently pregnant nun, at that!)—supervises gymnastics among his shapely "students" for the amusement of Col. Benson, Franco and Ciccio interrupt to alert their superior to the piranha pool. Goldfoot sends a barefooted Fong, posing as a gardener, into the pool to prove otherwise, whispering to him that the fish have been moved. Fong wades into the pool without incident. Franco and Ciccio sneak away to explore the interior of the villa. While snooping around the bathroom for clues, they are attacked by yet another henchman, who falls into the bathtub—where he is reduced to a floating skeleton by the piranhas secreted in the water.

BAVA used a mirror-lined room to multiply a limited number of extras into a veritable army of Girl Bombs.

AIP: The two piranha scenes incorporate the only macabre imagery Bava was able to interject into the picture, but Sam Arkoff found Franco and Ciccio's antics so insufferable that the scenes were scrapped anyway.

Given the removal of this footage, in the AIP it appears that Col. Benson arrives, stays long enough only to pass a beach ball around with the exercising "student body," then makes a speedy getaway with his soldiers.

II: After being left behind by Benson in the clutches of Dr. Goldfoot, the II dissolves to a shot of Franco and Ciccio, tied up together, stumbling into the laboratory, nervous and upset by their predicament. Franco attempts to calm his nerves by turning a dial that he confuses for a radio control, thus sending the Girl Bomb duplicator into hyperdrive. The lab is soon filled with donne bomba asking the two idiots how they might serve their masters. As more and more of the shapely robots dance out of the machine, a wordless musical number begins.

Sprightly and impish, the sequence is one of the most enjoyable in the II, not least of all for Bava's clever camera tricks which transform a core group of no more than ten or fifteen girls into a veritable army. This is mostly achieved by lining the walls with mirrors—an obvious trick for Bava—but the sequence also contains one of his most successful, faceted, multiple exposures, as the camera appears to look down into the lab from the criss-crossing steel beams of its rafters—which provided the facets of the effect.

AIP: All of this sequence, prior to Goldfoot's outraged entrance and whistle-blowing, was cut from the AIP, though unexplained portions were used as background to the AIP's end titles.

II: Here Franco's emergence from the villa onto its grounds, following his escape and prior to his meeting Bill, is slightly longer.

AIP: After Franco's escape, Dr. Goldfoot instructs Fong to give Ciccio a hypodermic injection to sedate him prior to duplication. As Fong stalks his foolish prey, Goldfoot receives a call from Peking, during which his exact plan for world domination is outlined. He tells his Red Chinese partner that some parts of their agreement must be changed, and he divides their designated territories of conquest to assign the fun spots (Las Vegas, Los Angeles, all the Playboy Clubs of the world, etc.) to him, while tossing the drearier scraps to Mao Tse-Tung. During this exchange, we cut away to Fong and Ciccio's game of cat-and-mouse around the duplication machine, which ends with Fong stabbing the needle into Ciccio's protruding posterior.

A trick shot of the duplication machine, showing Ciccio's evil twin materializing in a parallel glass tube, is also exclusive to the AIP.

II: Ciccio's robotic twin exits the laboratory and stomps around the villa grounds, enjoying its exorbitant strength by bending steel bars, felling trees, and splitting a park bench down the middle with a single blow. Still on the villa grounds is Franco, who is delighted to see his friend alive and well, and rushes toward him in a friendly embrace. The robo-Ciccio reciprocates by nearly crushing him to death. Horrified, Franco manages to extricate himself and runs away, calling Ciccio a maniac and a killer.

AIP: Bill Dexter finds his way to the laboratory, where he frees the real Ciccio (suffocating inside the glass-walled duplication chamber) and Rosanna (who has been consigned to a deep freeze chamber wearing only her negligée and heels). Bill thaws Rosanna with a kiss, but the couple are soon attacked by Ciccio's axe-wielding duplicate. ("You are living things," it says mechanically, "therefore you must die!") In a scene appearing in both versions, the robot's axe nearly missing Bill, slamming into some electrical cables, causing it to race around at hyperspeed before exploding into several pieces, as Rosanna's duplicate did in the earlier scene.

II: Franco returns to the villa outfitted in a metal helmet and other soldier garb, to have his revenge against his would-be killer. Naturally, he finds the real Ciccio and they engage in another comic, high-speed fight.

As Bill, Rosanna, and Franco and Ciccio exit the villa in search of the escaped Goldfoot & Co., they pause for a rest beside a religious sculpture of three cloaked, saintly figures—Goldfoot, Fong, and Hardjob in disguise. The mocking of religious statuary alone would have been enough for AIP to cut the scene, but Bava carries it further by having the Goldfoot saint light Bill's cigarette, while a tired Franco leans on the statue by resting his hand on Hardjob's breast.

AIP: Here, the sequence of Goldfoot & Co.'s drive into Rome—in a car hijacked from two very distracted, kissing lovers—is much longer.

First, there is additional footage in which a policeman observes the carjacking without interfering, only moving to make an arrest once he sees the two lovers kissing on a park bench. As the villains reach the outskirts of the city, Goldfoot asks directions from an armless statue, who gives the directions, then sprouts a white-painted human arm to accept a gratuity. Goldfoot drives through Rome, crashing into the Colosseum, passing the Piazza di Spagna, and tossing a coin into the Fontana di Trevi, which rewards him with a tremendous splash. The AIP also reveals the presence of our heroes in the back seat much earlier than in the II, as they make repeated attempts to rise up and seize Goldfoot, but are upset time and time again by his reckless driving, as he disguises himself as Gen. Willis behind the wheel while trying also to drive. Goldfoot instructs Fong and Hardjob to change their outfits too, and when they have difficulty in undressing, he interjects the surprisingly bold line, "Now I know why you Chinese are so in-screw-table!"

For most of the Luna Park/hot air balloon chase sequence, the AIP doesn't bother to dub the dialogue, taking its cue from Bava's silent comedy chase approach to save themselves the expense of looping it. When dialogue is absolutely necessary, silent-style intertitle cards are used. The AIP also adds some conscience, and a further joke, to the episode in which Franco used a pair of handy hedge-clippers to sever the rope hanging from the balloon, to which the angry manager of Luna Park is clinging for dear life. In the AIP, we can see Bill silently berating Franco for this comic act of murder (and such it is, because the angry cuss turns up a moment later as an angel, still irate, yelling at him from a cloud), causing him to drop the clippers. In an additional joke shot, we cut to a long-haired hippie strumming his guitar, interrupted as the falling clippers strike his head and shave half of his head completely bald.

Some dialogue is also changed at the point when our heroes knock at the door of Goldfoot's hijacked US Air Force bomber. Replacing the II dialogue ("Who is it?" "A friend." "Oh, a friend!"), Franco here identifies himself as a Fuller Brush salesman, who offers a pleased Goldfoot the free gift of a genuine Chinese back-scratcher.

II: As described in the synopsis above, the II concludes with Franco and Ciccio stumbling from the bomb into the custody of the Russian Army. Indicating the color of their red underwear and offering salutations of "Viva Trotsky!," they explain their friendly intentions and the fact that they have just saved the Kremlin from certain destruction. They are then treated like kings, seated at a large banquet table, and treated to wine and balalaika music. Just as they are about to be fed, their host receives a telephone call from Col. Benson—prompted by a call from the President, insisting that SIC deny that this episode ever took place—denying any knowledge of these two professed spies. Consequently, Franco and Ciccio are thrown into a Siberian prison and we proceed to the comic closing shot, as described.

AIP: Here the finale is more confusing. We see Rosanna escorting Bill to the airport. He kisses her, promising that he will never look at another woman again, and immediately notices a woman raising her skirt to adjust one of her stockings. She turns and runs to meet her plane, and Bill follows, not realizing that the woman is Hardjob, who pauses on the departure ramp to offer the pilot an unexplained "OK" gesture. Then the scene cuts to the snowy wastes of Russia, where Franco and Ciccio are imprisoned in their little fenced-in area. The disguised Goldfoot stops by to ask what they are cooking, and responds by saying that "we Russians" were responsible for inventing spaghetti. Ciccio invites him inside, and Goldfoot turns to the camera to say, "They're going to love these two in Siberia!" (the omission of this line from the II is concealed by a cutaway to the steaming spaghetti pot)—which doesn't make sense, as they are supposedly already in Siberia!

Music

Another significant difference between Le spie vengono dal semifreddo and Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs lies, predictably, in their music scoring. With the exception of the "Bang Bang Kissene" theme song (which is attributed to the Italian screenwriters and a third partner identified as De Paulis), the Italian version was scored by Coriolano "Lallo" Gori. Gori had been composing the music for Franco and Ciccio's films since 1963—a short time, perhaps, but time enough to have brought him already more than a half-dozen assignments. As always, AIP considered the Italian music inappropriate and had the completely re-edited picture completely rescored by their old stand-by, Les Baxter.

Lallo Gori entered the film music business in 1960 with Domenico Paolella's rock musical I Teddy Boys della canzone ("The Teddy Boys of Song"), starring Teddy Reno, Delia Scala, and Signora Passaguai herself, Ave Ninchi. His path to Franco and Ciccio came about as a result of scoring one of the earliest so-called "mondo movies," Osvaldo Civriani's faux documentary Sexy proibito/Sexy Proibitissimo (1962), a supposed, around-the-world tour of striptease clubs. When Fulvio Lucisano decided to star Franco and Ciccio in a satire of the mondo movement—L'amore primitivo/Primitive Love (1963), which also featured Jayne Mansfield and Mickey Hargitay—he hired Gori, who was young, affordable, and had some past experience in the genre. L'amore primitivo was a surprise hit, earning nearly 350 million lire [$218,000], and as he continued to make films with Franco and Ciccio, Lucisano kept Gori under contract as well.

Gori's original accompaniment is consistently comic, combining standard jazz instrumentation with funny sounds, like a wah-wah trumpet, boinging Jew's harp, or clackety spoons, and occasionally quoting well-known themes to venture ironic comments. It also displays a virtuoso sense of musicianship and tempi; the dazzling, light-fingered piano parts could only have been played by a true master, and the time signatures of several cues pose particular challenges (the cue heard during the hat check counter scene, for example, unfolds in 5/4—a difficult tempo rarely attempted in popular music, with the famous exception of Dave Brubeck's jazz classic "Time Out"). It is a quirky but clever score, a perfect accompaniment to the ripe antics of Franco and Ciccio, as it never lets the audience forget that the intention is to laugh, to have a good time, to not take things too seriously.

Bava (who often cited Charles Chaplin as his favorite director) pays visual hommages to silent comedy throughout his director's cut, beginning as early as Franco and Ciccio's accelerated hotel fight with Fabian. Lallo Gori responded to this element with a recurring use of "old timey," rinkytink or stride piano. Consequently, when these "silent comic" touches reoccur during the climactic chase, they feel perfectly germane—not abrupt and inappropriate, as they do in the AIP re-edit. If one can make any complaint about the Gori score, it is that it tends to objectify the action rather than involve the viewer in it, but this is actually quite faithful to Italian comedy traditions, which tend to be farcical rather than realistic.

Another undoubtedly apocryphal story from the AIP pressbook relates that the music for the Girl Bombs' dance sequence was based on a 5-minute theme improvised on the spot by Franco Franchi, who played it for the film's composer by blowing on a blade of grass stretched taut inside his cupped hands—a technique he learned while a child in Sicily. It is a peculiar story, because (1) the dance sequence was not included in the US version; (2) the music is virtually the same as the "Bang Bang Kissene" theme, minus the vocal, which is not credited to the film's Italian composer, much less its American one; and (3) the AIP version was scored by Les Baxter, who never visited the set and, we can therefore assume, never got any ideas from Franco Franchi blowing on grass.

Baxter's score takes a completely different approach to that of Gori. The American score is very accessible, buoyant without being comic, and at times, is very much influenced by the freewheeling instrumentals of Herb Alpert and the Tijuana Brass ("Spanish Flea," "Tijuana Taxi"), which were popular at the time. While Gori's score is unfailingly witty and energetic, Baxter's is sometimes leaden, particularly when it complements the swaying hips of the Girl Bombs with "bump-and-grind" music. It also has an annoying tendency to telegraph and underline comic bits with all the subtlety of an avalanche. That said, the rock-percussive cues heard during the Luna Park chase lend that sequence a fun, propulsive energy it doesn't otherwise have. The theme song heard at the end of the picture—composed by AIP's resident songsmiths Guy Hemric and Jerry Styner (Beach Party, Beach Blanket Bingo), and performed by the manufactured Tower Records act "The Sloopys"—tries its best to turn the film's unmelodious title into a lyric and is sung endearingly off-key.

Baxter's rescoring lays heavily on the AIP cut, like a dense, waxy build-up that, along with the dubbing and the other post-production artifice, makes Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs seem less like a movie than a weird, Third World recreation of an AIP movie.

Commentary

Over the years, so much of the critical commentary regarding these two related films has been dismissive that none of it has been very well considered or meaningful. It isn't enough to look at these films and declare that Mario Bava was miscast as director and disabled by an unfamiliar milieu and a hopeless script. In fact, Bava was not a poor choice to direct this picture; he was thoroughly experienced in the art of comic filmmaking, having collaborated on some of the finest works of Aldo Fabrizi, Vittorio De Sica, Totò, and Alberto Sordi and proven himself adept at visually maximizing the humor of their performances onscreen. Furthermore, the raw material of the Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs script contains several narrative components seemingly tailored to Bava's particular universe. In retrospect, the ragazze bomba are not unlike the mannequins of Sei donne per l'assassino, Il rosso segno della follia/Hatchet for the Honeymoon, and Lisa and the Devil, which were rooted in Bava's childhood recollections of finding full body sculptures and sculpted body parts in his father's workshop.

Appropriately, in this context, Goldfoot himself is somewhat influenced here by the example of Eugenio Bava. Far more than in Norman Taurog's Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine, the Goldfoot of the sequel often suggests the ingenious, flamboyant, bohemian inventor that Bava portrayed when describing his father in interviews. When Goldfoot takes to the streets, he dons a wide-brimmed black hat, cape, and velvet ascot ensemble that is closely modelled on the "avant garde" clothing styles worn by Eugenio in photographs taken in the early 20th century.

The nature of the Girl Bombs also presented Bava with the opportunity to further explore two of his recurring themes: romantic betrayal and the dangers of erotic temptation. The "kiss kiss bang" dealt by these shapely robots can be read as a comic reduction of the mutual murder that bonds Nevenka and Kurt at the end of La frusta e il corpo, Max and Cristiana at the end of Sei donne per l'assassino, or any number of lovers in Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve. Elements of the nascent "body count" subgenre are also in evidence, as it is Goldfoot's specific plan to put nine generals out of commission before an important summit conference. This detail is emphasized in the AIP version when the explosion of Gen. Willis is followed by Goldfoot's comment to the audience, "And then there were none"—a direct reference to the American title of the Agatha Christie novel that started it all. (Bava reportedly disliked Christie's novel, which may explain why the reference was not retained in the Italian cut.)

Bava's interpretation of this admittedly silly, half-baked material is also more emphatically erotic than anything in the juvenile Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine. His Girl Bombs are not the wholesome, bikini'd beauty queens of Taurog's film, but slinkier, sexier, and more street-wise, with a slightly sinister aspect. When Fong replaces Rosanna (a girl who protests that Bill kisses too much) with her duplicate, the shadings of Laura Antonelli's facial expressions change immediately—not to a blank, emotionless state, but to a darkly knowing aspect of sexual experience and mechanical superiority. The duplicate dedicates herself to seducing Bill right away, and unlike Taurog's earlier picture (in which kissing was portrayed as the ultimate act between the sexes), there is no question that the robo-Rosanna is tempting Bill with the promise of more than her lips. Visually, both versions of the Bava film verge on prurience in their appreciation of the flaunted female form, encouraging memories of ROSANNA*'s robot double gets so turned-on by SIC agent Bill Dexter that she falls to pieces.*

Bava's comic cameo in Evil Eye as the leering portrait of Uncle Augusto.

The film's slapstick humor is often laborious, and its eventual retreat into silent movie mannerisms is awkward—excruciating in the American version, while almost charmingly nostalgic in the Italian edition. What is most interesting about the picture, in comedic terms, is Bava's occasional attention to surreal or absurdist humor, which shows a certain debt to the films of Richard Lester. (It must be Bava's contribution, as it has no basis in the Kaufman/Heyward script.) To note a few examples: the conversation between Goldfoot and Fong, on opposite sides of an open car door, neither of them able to hear the other until the window is rolled down; Goldfoot sharing the frame with Fong and Hardjob and saying, "we Chinese"; the Luna Park scenes in which the heroes naïvely "pursue" the villains on various amusement rides (helicopters, trains) where there is no possibility of gaining on the enemy; Franco hitting Fong twice on the head with a large metal wrench to no effect, but knocking him cold when he experimentally hits himself on the head; and the open pen that is Franco and Ciccio's Siberian prison, seemingly vulnerable to all the harsh elements yet admitting cold air only when the barbed wire gate is opened.

Bava was an inappropriate choice to direct, however, in terms of the script's political content, because as a private citizen, he was essentially apolitical. As director of this script, he was able to distill the comedy from it, but not the satire. Admittedly, the script's satiric content isn't very deep (one suspects it was moreso in Robert Kaufman's initial draft), but in a film that touches on such subjects as the precarious relationships between world powers, the vanities of the military, our increasing dependency and trust on machines, and the imminent danger of nuclear war, Le spie vengono dal semifreddo might have had more lasting appeal had it given its audience something more substantial than bubble gum to chew.

But bubble gum was exactly what Italian audiences wanted. When Le spie vengono dal semifreddo was released to Italian theaters on July 29, 1966, it was an immediate success, eventually grossing more than 365 million lire [$228,000] at the boxoffice. Incredible as it may seem—especially given the film's universally bad reputation—Franco and Ciccio gave Mario Bava the biggest Italian hit of his career.

In America, however, Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs was a disaster, pure and simple. US boxoffice figures for the film are not available, but no one affiliated with the picture was, or is, too happy to discuss it. Every failed motion picture demands a martyr, someone ultimately accountable for the losses incurred, and though Bava was in no way responsible for the mess made of his picture in a Los Angeles editing suite, he would pay the price for it. Deke Heyward's reports to Sam Arkoff about Bava's depressed state of mind during the production somehow—we cannot say how without access to studio correspondence—became inflated into yet another story of a nervous breakdown, and the American cash cow finally broke their ties with the artisan who made Black Sunday and Black Sabbath. AIP's co-production contract with Italian International was not renewed.

Consequently, Bava's biggest hit lost him the opportunity to helm a project with the potential to become another masterpiece of terror: Scarlet Friday, AIP's long-planned adaptation of "The Dunwich Horror." This signature tale of his favorite writer, H. P. Lovecraft would have reunited Bava with Boris Karloff and Christopher Lee.

"It was first mentioned [to me] by Mario Bava," Lee recounted in a 1967 interview. "He was given a script by American International. Boris didn't like the script, I understand; I was given it and thought it needed a great deal of revision. It was advertised that we were going to do it together . . . and since then, there's been a complete and utter silence. I'm still hoping; it's a great subject, but very difficult to do . . . like most of Lovecraft's work. Frightfully difficult to do it as he wrote it because he put so many strange and extraordinary beings into his stories that they would be impossible to translate into the physical these days. Virtually impossible, I think."[6]

The film would have provided Bava with an extraordinary opportunity, and considering how brilliantly he had evoked the unknowable, eldritch creatures and atmospheres of Lovecraft in cheap vehicles like Caltiki il mostro immortale and Terrore nello spazio, the failure of Scarlet Friday to materialize must be counted as one of the great missed opportunities of his career. But after Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs, and hearing exaggerated rumors about Bava's depressed state of mind, AIP effectively withdrew from their collaborations with Italian International and began focusing their attention on British co-productions.

As for Scarlet Friday, it resurfaced in trade ads under the title Dunwich in 1969, with AIP's new youth star Peter Fonda announced in the lead and Russell still listed as screenwriter. When the film was finally released as The Dunwich Horror in 1970—a year after Karloff's death—Fonda's role was played by Dean Stockwell, the director was AIP's Lovecraft veteran Daniel Haller, and the roles written for Karloff and Lee were played, respectively, by Ed Begley and Lloyd Bochner. No longer attributed to Russell, the script was signed by future L.A. Confidential director Curtis Hanson, Henry Rosenbaum and Ronald Silkovsky (who had served as editor on Haller's 1968 release The Wild Racers). The extent of their revisions is open to speculation, but given the original casting plans and the locations used for Die, Monster, Die!, Russell probably scripted the action to take place in England, instead of Lovecraft's New England. If so, Bava's refusal to work outside of Italy may have also played a part in his forfeiture of the project.

Had the film been made, the production surely would have been overseen by Deke Heyward, who remained in AIP's employ on the continent through the early 1970s, working on such films as Witchfinder General/The Conqueror Worm (1968), DeSade (1969), The Abominable Dr. Phibes and Murders in the Rue Morgue (both 1971).

While awaiting Deke's email responses to my questions about the Bava/Lovecraft project and its dissolution, I read online that he had passed away, owing to complications from pneumonia, on April 3, 2002, at the age of 81. The comments he contributed to this chapter represent the last interview ever given by "the Third Man of AIP."

It was in the wake of the Goldfoot debacle that Mario Bava was approached by someone else in the vanguard of his young admirers. A young artist from Turin, Armando Valcauda was so inspired by Bava's work that he would later enter the field of special effects himself, contributing some enchantingly old-fashioned stop motion and optical effects to several films, including the 1980s Hercules remakes of Luigi Cozzi.

Valcauda recalls the circumstances of his first encounter with the Maestro: "I was at the age of 21 when one of my friends told me, in passing, that his uncle was a cousin of Mario Bava. I was a mad fan of his movies, and had read only some minor coverage of them in Midi-Minuit Fantastique—I had to meet him! One evening, while visiting the house of my uncle, I called and, with the greatest emotion, spoke with Bava! We made a date to meet the following week, and I went to Rome. It was a hot day, in June 1966, when I met Mario Bava near his house, in the historical part of Rome, in the Via Ripetta, near the Piazza del Popolo.

"It was a wonderful experience for me. Our meeting lasted only twenty minutes, but I explained to him my great enthusiasm for his movies, paying special attention to my impressions of La maschera del demonio and its fantastic atmosphere of black-and-white. In reply, he told me about his trouble with the scorpions that crawled out of the mask—some of them got loose on the set, and he said the result was amusing, dramatic! I wanted very much to work with him, but did not succeed because our cinema was always in a state of crisis. So I left Rome and continued to work in television and short subjects, in Turin and Milan."

Bava was probably somewhat embarrassed by Valcauda's unabashed adulation, but he must have also found his sincerity endearing. They would not meet again for another ten years, and then in a more professional context.

6 Michel Parry, "CoF Interviews Christopher Lee, Part Two," Castle of Frankenstein 11, 1967, 19–20.

Eugenio Bava 1886–1966

On September 9, 1966—not long before the US release of Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs, and less than a year after the passing of his wife, Emma—Eugenio Bava died under almost anecdotal circumstances.

Still vigorous and industrious at the age of 80, Eugenio had just finished shopping for sculpting supplies on Via Gregorio VII when he stepped outside, began to cross the street and walked into the path of an oncoming automobile. The driver braked well enough in advance so that the impact was lessened; Eugenio was knocked down, but not disabled by the accident. To the surprise of onlookers, the octogenarian rose calmly to his feet, protesting to all concerned that he felt fine. Nevertheless, he was taken to a nearby hospital for a quick examination. It was there, two hours later, that Eugenio Bava died as a result of undetected internal injuries sustained in the accident.

The inventor had been killed by a machine.

There was only one published report of Eugenio's death that mentioned him by name. It appeared many weeks belatedly, on December 7, in the Vatican's daily newspaper L'Observatore Romano. The unsigned article—surely arranged by his daughter, Elena—made no mention of Eugenio's extraordinary career in the cinema, nor of the many inventions he had conceived which remain in popular use today; instead, he was eulogized for the work which had occupied him throughout his private life, particularly during his years of retirement: his sculptures of the Saints.

L'OSSERVATORE ROMANO — 7 Dicembre 1966 — N. 232 (32.358)

UNO SCULTORE DI SANTI

EUGENIO FRANCESCO BAVA

Il giorno 9 dello scorso settembre nella cronaca dei giornali romani del mattino si leggeva: « Un ottantenne, investito da un'auto, sulla via Gregorio VII decedeva due ore dopo all'Ospedale Santo Spirito dove era stato trasportato ». Questo ottantenne era Eugenio Bava, una figura di artista che avrebbe meritato una ben più ampia notazione in quanto ha lasciato nelle chiese, e non solo d'Italia, opere degne che attestano la sua sensibilità e la umanità della sua arte.

Una morte ignorata, confusa tra le tante altre che ogni giorno costellano l'asfalto delle città e sulle quali oramai si sorvola distrattamente, perché considerate il naturale contributo all'attuale civiltà meccanica. Ma lui stesso, in vita, volle essere ignorato, l'umiltà era la sua divisa, raramente, e solo se sollecitato, firmò le sue opere poiché, compreso dalla sua grandezza morale e spirituale dei Santi che effigiava, considerava effimera la sua arte.

Merito di Eugenio Bava è stato quello di uscire dalla tradizione, che, salvo rare eccezioni, trasferiva le figure dei santi in opere artigianali, primitive, che confinavano in figure da teatro dei pupi a, che solo la fede faceva accettare e venerare. La sua arte si rialacciava a quella dei grandi Maestri e come questi operava. Ogni sua opera era studiata e sofferta; studiata perché prima di porre mano alla creta si immergeva nella vita del Santo, leggendo le opere e collocandolo nel suo tempo: sofferta per la ricerca della perfezione anatomica e perché le esigenze dei Padri committenti lo obbligavano a sovrastrutture che spesso alteravano l'opera originale. Sovente doveva trarre gli elementi per la somiglianza da iconografie imperfette e spesso contrastanti. Supplivа allora con la sua sensibilità guidata ed esasperata dall'approfondita conoscenza delle caratteristiche del santo. E sono forse queste le sue migliori. Si può ben dire che creava per una sua gioia interiore.

Altra peculiarità quella di donare, donare agli altri che così poco aveva. La sua vasta opera non gli diede la ricchezza, non appagò sul suo successo, non ebbe mai riconoscimenti ufficiali. Coerente con i suoi principi respinse offerte ben più remunerative perché non volle confondere il sacro con il profano. Un uomo sereno che in piena maturità le viveva con entusiasmo giovanile.

Quando Papa Pio XII scese in S. Pietro per la Beatificazione di Innocenzo XI e per venerarne le reliquie racchiuse nell'effige in argento da lui eseguita, umilmente si cercato per essere presentato al Pontefice, che desiderava esprimergli la Sua ammirazione per quell'opera degna di tanto Tempio. Commosso e felice, dell'ombra come sempre, nascondeva la sua gioia di artista nell'umiltà che gli era cara.

Questo era Eugenio Bava sepolto con quattro righe di cronaca il 9 settembre 1966.

* * *

Si è spenta così una vita esclusivamente consacrata a far rivivere, attraverso un'arte davvero degna di questo nome, grandi figure che la Chiesa ha elevato agli onori degli altari. Egli non era, anche se ottantenne, un pensionato ma un attivo artista che viveva solo del frutto del suo lavoro.

È evidente che non ci è permesso esporre l'intero elenco dei suoi lavori, compresi quelli rimasti incompiuti per l'improvvisa tragica sua morte, ma quelli che ci sarà consentito accennare basteranno a dimostrare la sua fama artistica portata nel campo religioso per ottenere che l'arte compenetrasse la religione e questa a sua volta elevasse e spiritualizzasse l'arte.

Queste sue opere inoltre non appartengono soltanto ad un'epoca storica, ma vanno dal tempo della Chiesa primitiva, con S. Pancrazio, il martire quattordicenne fino alle persone canonizzate e beatificate dai grandi Pontefici Giovanni XIII e Paolo VI.

In questo esteso arco di tempo incontriamo eminenti figure di cui il prof. Bava ha realizzato statue per incarico dei Postulatori dei processi di beatificazione o canonizzazione o delle famiglie religiose alle quali appartenevano.

S. Francesco Borgia
(Scultura di Eugenio Francesco Bava)

SEGUE NELL'ULTIMA PAGINA DEL LIBRO

EUGENIO BAVA*'s death notice, as it originally appeared in L'OBSERVATORE ROMANO, illustrated with a photo of one of his Saintly sculptures.*

A Sculptor of Saints
Eugenio Francesco Bava

Last September 9, in the local section of the Roman newspapers, it was reported: "An 80-year-old man, knocked down by a car on Via Gregorio VII, died two hours later at the Santo Spirito Hospital where he had been taken." This 80-year-old man was Eugenio Bava, an artist who was deserving of more than this short notice, because he left in our churches—and not only in the churches of Italy—works that speak eloquently of the sensitivity and humanity of his art.

An overlooked death, confused among the many casualties that are scattered daily on the asphalt of our streets, and that we are accustomed to passing by without paying heed, because we consider them to be the natural contribution to our mechanical civilization. But the man himself, when he was alive, preferred to be ignored; humility was his trademark. Rarely, if ever, did he sign his works, and only when he was urged to do so, because he had such respect for the moral and spiritual greatness of the Saints he depicted, that he considered his own efforts ephemeral.

One of his accomplishments was bringing an end to that tradition, with few exceptions, that limited the illustrations of the Saints to primitive works, similar to a puppet theater, that only the faithful could accept and appreciate. His art was connected to the art of the great Masters, and he worked as they worked. All of his works were painstakingly thought-out—before plunging himself into his clay, he plunged himself into the life of each Saint, reading about them and the time in which they lived. He experienced great pain in his restless pursuit of anatomical perfection, and also because the demands of certain client countries forced him to useless adjuncts that often distorted his original works. In his search for likenesses, he sometimes had to rely on defective iconographies, which were at times conflicting. He compensated with sensitivity, uplifted by his deep insight into the Saints' characteristics. And maybe these are his best works. You could say that he created for the sake of his own inner joy. He also had another joy: the joy of giving to people in need, although he himself did not have much to give. His big corpus of work did not make him a rich man; he never boasted of his success, never begged for official awards or recognition. Consistent with his principles, he sometimes refused offers that would have paid him well because he did not want to mix the sacred and the profane. He was a peaceful man who lived his old age with youthful enthusiasm.

When Pope Pius XII came down to San Pietro to beatify Innocenzo XI and to venerate his relics made in silver effigy by Bava, he was sought to be introduced to the Pope, who wanted to tell him of his appreciation for his work, which he considered worthy of a Temple—but to no avail. Moved and happy, he stayed in the background as was his custom, finding his artistic fulfillment in the humility that was so dear to him. Such was Eugenio Bava, buried with four lines of local news on September 9, 1966.

And so ended a life that was entirely devoted to restoring to life, through an Art worthy of that name, the great figures who were raised to the honors of the altars of the Church. Though he was 80, he was not a retired man, still living on the fruits of his labors. It would be impossible to draw up a complete list of his works, including the ones left unfinished by his sudden and tragic death, but we will quote just a few of them, to illustrate his artistic effort in the religious field, in order that art could permeate religion, and so that religion could raise art to the level of the spiritual.

These works aren't restricted to one historical period, but range from the first days of the Church (with St. Pancrazio, the 14-year-old martyr), to such great Popes as Giovanni XIII and Paolo VI, beatified and canonized. In this extended arc of time, we find outstanding figures whose statues Bava realized on behalf of the Postulant of the beatification or canonization processes, or of the religious families to whom these figures belong.

These are the principal works, in chronological order:

St. Filippo Benizi; St. Giuliana Falconieri; S. Francesco Borgia (this statue is venerated in the Church of Maldonato in Madrid); St. Francesco Caracciolo; B. Giovanni Battista della Concezione (Corduba, Spain); St. Camillo de Lellis; B. Tommaso da Cori; B. Vincenzo Maria Strambi; B. Anna Maria Taigi (Bava created two of this personage, one resides in Montreal, Canada, while the other is in the Church of Santa Crisostomo in Rome); B, Placido Riccardi; St. Francesca Cabrini (there are two such statues, one in Rome and the other in New York); B. Elena Guerra; B. Luigi Palazzolo; St. Carlo da Sezze; Sister Bertilla Boscardin; B. Nunzio Sulprizio (two works, one in Pescosansonesco, Albruzza, the other in Naples); B. Ignazio de Santhià.

The Church of Santa Maria della Minerva in Rome once entrusted him with reassembling the remains of the body of Pio IX (which is venerated in Santo Lorenzo al Verano), and also the body of Innocenzo XI.

The greatness of the Saints and the Blessed listed above required a particular power of expression in the artist so entrusted to realize their likeness, and it is to the merit of his clients that they found in Bava someone who was worthy of being called "the sculptor of the Saints."

It is therefore natural to join his admirers, who, when they learned of his tragic end, said they were confident that the Saints—whom he had helped to live again with such realism—would have joined together promptly to raise his spirit and ask for the grace that he might be allowed to remain with them as their companion in eternal bliss.

Also, His Holy Father Pope Paul VI was so gracious as to send his [Eugenio's] daughter—a nun of the Ancelle del Sacro Cuore in Rome—a wreath blessed by him and the assurance of his prayers for her loved one, and his paternal apostolic blessing to all of his relatives, which he hoped would bring them deep spiritual comfort. [7]

Mario Bava had become a father-in-law, a grandfather, had the greatest domestic success of his career—and lost both of his parents—all within the span of a single year.

Eugenio's death must have been shattering to Mario. He was known to complain about his burden of heredity, but it had been his greatest endeavor to please his father for as long as he could remember. Eugenio was evidently the kind of father who boasted of his son's accomplishments only to others, never making demonstrations of more direct approval. Mario had taken care to include his father in his own projects, as his own directorial career coincided with Eugenio's retirement from the Istituto LUCE, which indicates a close and irreplaceable bond, but it would be a mistake to assume that their relationship was entirely positive or uncomplicated. Everyone who observed the interactions of the two men at first hand seems to remember it differently, yet taken together, these different views offer a certain Rashomon of truth.

"Theirs was a strict relationship," ventures Mario's son Lamberto. "Since Eugenio also worked in the cinema, there was not much time for family. He was never at home, and it was not until he and my father began working together that they established a relationship. It was a different time—a time when fathers paid almost no attention to their children until they grew up, when they could begin to communicate with them on an adult level."

Armando Govoni, who worked as the production supervisor of Mario Bava's earliest directorial efforts, witnessed the father–son relationship at close proximity on the set. He describes Eugenio Bava as "a very careful man, a wonderful camera mechanic, but also a northern Piedmont character." Govoni's friend, screenwriter Ernesto Gastaldi (who passed his comments along to me), explained the Piedmont character reference as meaning "calm, kind, logical, but a bit cold." Gastaldi, who hails from the Piedmont region himself, and who also knew and worked for Bava, added, "Mario spoke very little about his father; it wasn't his favorite subject, if you want to know the truth."

Cameron Mitchell had witnessed the relationship between father and son on the set of Gli invasori: "[Eugenio], I'm told, was a very fine technician and taught Mario a great deal. I know that he helped Mario, but I think Mario went beyond his father. Mario would never admit this, however, because Papà was always the boss."

Mitchell's opinion was shared by actor Luciano Pigozzi, who observed Mario and Eugenio together during the filming of La frusta e il corpo. "The father was an old man, but he didn't die in bed—a car came along and knocked him down. I think, maybe, this was good for Mr. [Mario] Bava, because he was good when he worked alone, you understand?" (I didn't, so I pressed Pigozzi for a further explanation.) "Let me explain," he said. "When the father was still alive, people in our business would go to Bava's movies and if they saw something good, they would say, 'Eh! Maybe his father did it . . . maybe the father helped his son.' But after a certain point, they could no longer say this, because the father was already dead! I think [Mario] was more talented than his father."

Ordinarily, it might have been a time when Mario could show his colleagues that he was capable of standing and working alone, but Eugenio Bava happened to die at a time when the world of Italian filmmaking was also dying. With the pepla now out of fashion, with films dell'orrore on the decline, and with the cultural pulse having moved east from Rome's la dolce vita to Swinging London, the Italian cinema was now deeply entrenched in crisis. As Eugenio died, Mario found that his old professional ports were also receding from his life. Titanus Studios, where he had photographed and directed some of his biggest projects (including La donna più bella del mondo and La maschera del demonio), made national headlines during this period after filing for bankruptcy. Galatea, the production house responsible for all of Bava's films during the lucrative 1958–64 period, was dissolved when Nello Santi's wife sued him for divorce. And given their feelings about the latest picture he had given them, Bava seemed to have permanently queered his once-prosperous relationship with AIP.

In the years since he had worked with them, virtually all of Bava's former colleagues—Roberto Rossellini, Vittorio De Sica, Federico Fellini, Gina Lollobrigida, Mario Soldati, Michelangelo Antonioni—had become international celebrities. Now, a new generation of young Italian directors like Marco Ferreri, Bernardo Bertolucci, and Pier Paolo Pasolini were emerging with small films hailed as masterpieces and heaped with awards. Mario Bava, on the other hand, was now a 52-year-old grandfather, working for producers who wrote him rubber checks for sweeping up other directors' messes and directing what was commonly perceived as junk—when his films received distribution at all. There were also the ongoing rumors within the industry about his mental state.

Perversely, Bava would continue to fan the flames of these rumors. In one of his earliest print interviews, he described his professional state of mind: "I've been on the verge of a chronic nervous breakdown for years, due to overwork. I'm unable to say 'No' to a check, even if I know it's likely to bounce. You have no idea how many times my producers have robbed me with these films! I direct them, I run to the bank to cash my check, to pay the bills that gnaw at me, only to discover that the check is no good—that I've worked for nothing! Then I have no choice but to accept the next film I'm offered, because with all the back taxes I have to pay, I'm in no position to pick and choose. Also, I work with the same crew that's been with me for twenty years—the camera operator, my son, the electrician . . . If I stop working, how are they going to eat?" [8]

In another interview, he went so far as to itemize his own personal flaws: "The problem with me is that I accept everything that is offered to me, and also, I can't be serious. I'm always joking, and to producers, it's inconceivable that a director should make jokes. But I've been in the film business for so long . . . I know everybody and everything, so how could I possibly take this absurd circus seriously?" [9]

These quotes show extraordinary candor, but also an extraordinary lack of concern—one might even say, a self-destructive lack of concern—for maintaining a sense of professional decorum in public forums. Bava refused to play the games that other directors played with the press; he scoffed at any attempt to discuss his work seriously, often pointed an accusing finger at the unprofessional standards of his industry and co-workers, and refused to be characterized as an artist. His approach was not likely to help him move ahead, but he wasn't working from a game plan. He would speak to the press—on those rare occasions when they cared enough to speak with him—with absolute frankness, taking interviewers into his confidence, relating the difficulties he encountered as a hard-working technician in an industry that, all too often, functioned without moral or aesthetic sense.

7 L'Observatore Romano, December 7, 1966. Translated from the Italian by Daniela Catelli.

8 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 249–60.

9 Alfredo Castelli and Tito Monego, interview in Horror 1. 1969. Translated by Daniela Catelli.

THE PRE-CREDITS bathtub murder of NUDE . . . SI MUORE reprises a similar death scene in SEI DONNE PER L'ASSASSINO.

NUDE . . . SI MUORE

The Young, the Evil and the Savage

WHILE MOURNING the death of his father, Mario Bava was contacted by an old friend from America. Lawrence Woolner—the younger half of the Woolner Brothers team that successfully distributed Hercules in the Haunted World and Blood and Black Lace in the United States—had relocated to Rome with his wife Betty, and together they were setting up a new independent production company in partnership with Giuseppe "Joe" De Blasio.

As British screenwriter Tudor Gates (1930-2007) remembered: "Lawrence was quite old at the time, and Betty was much younger and pretty much the boss. Joe De Blasio was an Italian-American who had been a production manager for one of the US majors in the palmy days." A former Warner Bros. production supervisor, De Blasio came to the Woolners' new company with more than ten years of Italian film production experience, dating back to Robert Wise's epic Helen of Troy (1955).

Earlier in the decade, Lawrence "Larry" Woolner and his brother Bernard ("Bernie") had at least twice invited Bava to relocate to America, promising him all the work he could handle—as AIP's Nicholson and Arkoff had done before them. Bava had turned them all down, and now—several years later—the mountain had finally come to Mohammed. Woolner, with dreams of surpassing the box-office success of Blood and Black Lace, approached Bava with an idea about a killer stalking a school for young debutantes, which had been proposed to him by Tudor Gates and his writing partner, Brian Degas.

According to Gates (who had previously written an "adventure/musical" called Dateline Diamonds, 1965), his partnership with Degas was more practical than creative. "Brian was never a writer, by any stretch of the imagination," he revealed, "but he had an uncanny ability to pitch an idea and get it sold, which was never my forte. So we both did the plotting, I did the writing, he did the song-and-dance, and we shared the byline—until our partnership dissolved in the early '70s."

Bava accepted Woolner's invitation to direct the film, provisionally titled Cry Nightmare. In late May or early June, he settled down to work with the two English writers in Rome, plotting key scenes based on imagery that fired his visual imagination.

Tudor Gates: "I recall going over to Rome and staying at the American Palace, quite near the Woolners' modest offices. They rented a house right by the Hilton. [Brian and I] worked with Bava and his PA [Rosalba Scavia], who interpreted for us. She was a very plain girl, who was also his mistress. He explained that he was unhappily, but committedly, married—Italian-style. He did his own storyboarding, which made it very easy to communicate with him, in the sense that his intentions were very clear. He always knew exactly what effect he wanted to get. The script we wrote amused him. He laughed a lot and was a lovely man."

Asked how he arrived at his perception of Bava's personal relationship with Scavia, Gates explained: "I can only give you the unmistakable impression I had at the time, which was that she and Mario were a couple, and that Mario was married—unhappily—but bound to his wife by ties of custom, practice, and I suppose, faith. Rosalba, also being Catholic, seemed to accept this. There was no overt kissing or cuddling, or anything like that, but they behaved as intimates. If he took us to dinner, it would be with Rosalba as his companion, and not his wife."

When asked directly about the nature of her personal relationship with Bava, Rosalba Scavia answers, hesitantly: "He was very attached to his family, but not very forthcoming about his personal life. I had an occasional insight into that side of him, which may seem unusual for a director and a crew member, but we were close—well, yes, close. He told me some things about his personal life, but it would be hard to remember what he said exactly—plus, I don't want to upset anyone. Suffice to say, he was having problems at home and sometimes he wanted to escape from it all—but he did not allow many people to see that side of him. Not even his own son, I think. He used to talk about us being more than colleagues, more than friends. It would be indiscreet of me to say more."

The Script

A woman ("handsome, full-bodied, in her middle thirties") is drowned by a black-gloved intruder while bathing. Her nude body is placed inside a trunk and shipped by train to the Côte d'Azur, where it is met by a minibus that takes it, and a group of arriving people, to St. Hilda College, a school catering to the teenage daughters of "the best families of Europe and America." The minibus is driven by the school's caretaker old Simon; also aboard are his son, the school's riding instructor Richard ("32, handsome"); La Forêt, the gardener ("35, hunched, sitting alone . . . distorted, ugly, Quasimodo-like"), who is returning from vacation; and three new teachers recruited by the school for their holiday season: Miss Martin ("English, about 30, quite pretty but vacuous"), who has been at St. Hilda's before; Mrs. Clay ("about 37, good-looking but in a rather masculine way, rather severe in expression"), a widow dressed in black; and a swimming instructor, Mr. De Brazzi ("an Italian, 35, handsome, athletic"). It is summer and only a small percentage of the student body is in residence—the ones who can't be accommodated by the jet-setting lifestyles of their wealthy parents (thus saving the production the expense of several dozen extras and concentrating the focus and intimacy of the narrative).

While the new teachers make the acquaintance of headmistress Miss Tranfield ("English, aloof, upright, 55"), La Forêt moves the trunk to the school's storage cellar. The relationships at the school are all diverse but share a subterranean erotic current. Miss Martin is shown to a room connecting with that of Miss Tranfield, facilitating the continuation of a past lesbian relationship. La Forêt is a collector of pornographic photos, as well as a Peeping Tom. The students are all hot for members of the faculty, with hyper-imaginative Jill ("a plump and pert American girl with a lively personality") voicing particular interest in Mr. De Brazzi. Whereas Jill is the hyperimaginative type, fuelled by a steady diet of mystery fiction and fond of eavesdropping on others with a set of walkie-talkies sent by her father, there is also real romantic activity going on between a teacher and student. Richard is conducting a secret romance with Lucille Moffat ("French, 17, beautiful, blonde"), who is just a few days away from turning 18. He may have ulterior motives, as she stands to inherit over half a million pounds from her late parents' estate on her birthday. Lucille wants to elope with Richard, but he insists she must wait a few more days until she is of legal age. He agrees to meet with her later that night in the Insect House, an entomology museum maintained by the elderly Prof. Andre.

That night, while seeking a trunk that was supposed to have been picked up for her, student Betty Anne ("American, 17, brunette, attractive . . .") follows La Forêt's advice and looks in the storage cellar. There, searches for the

Nude . . . si muore

"Naked . . . You Die"
Working titles: Cry Nightmare, Sette vergine per i diavolo.
Filmed July – August 1967
Shot on location in Rome and on the French Riviera
First released: February 20, 1968
Perfectcolor, Cromoscope, 2.35:1, 98 minutes

Production: BGA (Rome), Super International Pictures (Rome). Producers: Virgilio De Blasi, Dante Amatulli. Executive producers: Lawrence Woolner and Giuseppi De Blasio. Director: Anthony M. Dawson [Antonio Margheriti]. Screenplay: Anthony Dawson and Frank Bottar [Franco Bottari]. [Uncredited: Tudor Gates and Brian Degas, with Mario Bava.] Story: John [Gianni] Simonelli. Director of photography: Frank Zuccoli [Fausto Zuccoli]. Art direction: Antonio Visone. Wardrobe: Annamode. Makeup: Piero Mecacci. Editor: Otello Colangeli. Music: Carlo Savina. "Nightmare" written by Carlo Savina, lyrics by Don Powell, sung by Rose Brennan. Distributor: DIFNE.

Michael Rennie (Inspector Duran), Mark Damon (Richard), Eleonora Brown (Lucille Moffat), Sally Smith (Jill), Ludmilla Luova (Miss Clay/Peter Moffat), Alan Collins [Luciano Pigozzi] (La Forêt), Frank De Rosa (Detective Gabon), Vivian Stapleton (Miss Tranfield), Pat Valturri [Patrizia Valturri] (Denise), Esther Masing (Miss Martin), Gianni Di Benedetto (De Brazzi), Val Marko [Valentino Macchi] (policeman), Aldo De Carellis (Prof. Andre), Katty Parker [Kathleen Parker], Sylvia [Silvia] Dionisio, Lawrence Gerard, Malisa Long [Longo], Paola Natale (girls), Robert Papiri [Umberto Papiri], John Hawkwood.

Australia: The Young, the Evil and the Savage, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer
Belgium: De Sadist van het Dertiende Uur, "The Sadist of the 13th Hour" France: Le Sadique de la 13e Heure
Germany: Sieben Jungfrauen fur den Teufel, "Seven Virgins for the Devil," 94m
Spain: Crimen en la Residencia, "Crimes in the Boarding House," 10/1/72
UK: The Young The Evil and the Savage, American International Pictures, 3/71, 81m 17s, Certificate "X," passed with no cuts
US: The Young, the Evil and the Savage, American International Pictures, 8/14/68, 82m. Video: Schoolgirl Killer, 78m trunk in vain, the cellar is plunged into darkness by the sudden slamming of the door, and Betty Anne knows she is not alone. Seeing the face of the other person, she is relieved . . . until she is strangled to death. She is discovered missing at bedtime and the remaining students are confined to their rooms for the night. Learning that La Forêt was the last to see Betty Anne, Miss Tranfield questions him and follows his lead to the cellar; the girl is nowhere to be found. Despite the heightened security, Lucille manages to sneak out to the Insect House where, while waiting for her lover, she discovers Betty Anne's dead body concealed in an armoire. By the time Richard turns up, the corpse has vanished. Richard calms Lucille, but sends her back to her room for the present, agreeing to meet her at the swimming pool at 3:00 a.m.

To explain her absence from her room, and to cool off from the hot night, Lucille goes to the shower room, unaware that she is being furtively watched by La Forêt from a tree outside the window. Mrs. Clay discovers her and orders her back to her room immediately after her shower, but Lucille is discouraged from actually showering by a rustling in the tree. She leaves the water running, but another student, Cynthia, happens along and decides to take advantage of the water—only to be strangled by a shadowy figure on the other side of the shower curtain. When the body is first discovered, shrouded in the shower curtain, it is thought that Lucille was the victim. It is the second attempt on her life, the second time a young woman has died for being where Lucille was supposed to be.

Arriving at St. Hilda's to investigate the murder are Inspector Durand and Sgt. Perrier. Jill reports La Forêt's peeping to Mrs. Clay, who advises her to inform the police. Meanwhile, in his cabin on the grounds, La Forêt prepares for the inevitable visit from the authorities by burning his collection of erotica, with tears in his eyes. Suddenly the door opens, and as the gardener pleads his innocence, his visitor buries a scythe in his chest.

Durand questions Jill, who shows keen interest in joining the investigation

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by Sandro Symeoni.

198. EXT. THE SEA. NIGHT. (STOCK FOOTAGE)

AS THOUGH IN ANSWER TO JILL'S PLEA, the guns of the seventh fleet open out, muzzle flashes illuminating the night sky.

ANOTHER ANGLE: The battleship prows cut through the waves toward CAMERA, as "Anchors Aweigh" blares on the soundtrack.

ANOTHER ANGLE: Fighter planes make their rocket-assisted takeoff from all corners of the deck of an aircraft carrier.

ANOTHER ANGLE: Landing barges open their jaws like pre-historic monsters to disgorge a battalion of American Marines, with "From the Halls of Montezuma" now vying with "Anchors Aweigh."

ANOTHER ANGLE: On the beach, the Marines deploy themselves, and a battalion commander gives his instructions over a walkie-talkie. The voice which cuts in seems strangely girlish.

JILL (Voice Over): Come in, Red Zero . . .[1]

In actuality, Jill's voice is transmitted to the walkie-talkie left in Miss Tranfield's office, summoning Durand and his men to the caverns in the nick of time. In a humorous coda scene, Durand stops by Jill's room to thank her, just as her father arrives at the school to collect her. He drives a distinctive Aston Martin that identifies him as . . . James Bond!

as an amateur detective, but when the professionals are unreceptive to her enthusiasm, she plants one of her walkie-talkies in Miss Tranfield's office to keep abreast of new information. Lucille, upset by the events, begs Mrs. Clay to let Denise, a fellow student, stay in her room overnight. She later uses her as a decoy to occupy her bed as she sneaks out to keep her date with Richard by the pool. But as 3:00 a.m. nears, Inspector Durand—who has begun to theorize that Lucille may have been the intended victim of the murder—summons her to be questioned, and Lucille asks Denise to take a message to Richard at the pool. There, Denise is attacked by a man in scuba gear who tries to drown her; fortunately, her scream is overheard by Jill, who rushes to her defense and manages to repel the attacker and save Denise's life. The scuba-masked killer gets away, and De Brazzi is found nearby, wet, explaining that he was doing some experimental night diving.

In time, Durand discovers that Lucille has one living relative, a step-brother named Peter, who would have half a million good reasons to want her dead before her 18th birthday. He puts out an alert for any marauding young men. The next morning, the search party discovers the dead body of Betty Anne hidden on the grounds. Next, Mrs. Clay disappears—and her body is found in a lime pit on the property, recognizable only from her clothing. In her room, Durand finds a suicide note and a confession to the murders ("Don't ask why I did it . . . I don't know myself . . . Perhaps I am mad . . . Perhaps it was envy for their beauty and youth, for all the things that are no longer mine . . ."), but doesn't believe it to be anything more than a contrivance to throw him off the scent of the real maniac.

MICHAEL RENNIE in one of his final roles, as Inspector Durand.

That night, Lucille sneaks out to meet Richard in a beachfront cave, where she discovers not her lover but her "affectionate step-brother," whose administration of her inheritance has been careless and greedy. He has been living in drag, disguised as Mrs. Clay, whom he drowned in her bathtub, packed into the trunk, and later dumped in the lime pit to discourage recognition of its true identity. As Jill surreptitiously audits the killer's confession via walkie-talkie, the script describes Lucille's rescue as being depicted in Jill's mind's eye:

Cry Nightmare was approached in the same serio-comic spirit as La ragazza che sapeva troppo—particularly its Evil Eye variant—with the character of Jill offering a contemporary reprise of Bava's prototypical mystery maven, Nora Davis/Drowson. At the same time, there was an obvious attempt to reprise various highlights from Sei donne per l'assassino—the bathtub drowning, the body dragged into the woods, the corpse discovered in the armoire, etc.—but there is a certain redundancy in its use of watery murder settings (the bathtub, the shower, the swimming pool). Bava's contribution can also be detected in the surprise slaying from behind a curtain (à la La frusta e il corpo), in the phony suicide note of Mrs. Clay (which falsely characterizes "her" as someone driven to homicidal madness by the beauty of women, as in the false modus operandi provided by the perpetrators of the murders in Sei donne per l'assassino), and also in the character of the entomologist Professor Andre, inspired by Bava's memories of Prof. Roberto Omegna, the entomology advisor to his father's documentaries at the Istituto LUCE (who would subsequently inspire another character in 1971's Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve). The input of Tudor Gates is apparent from the girl's school setting and the gender-bending aspect of the killer—which the script shares with a scenario later written by Gates for Hammer Films: Lust for a Vampire (1971), the second film in their series about the lesbian vampire Carmilla Karnstein.

More densely plotted than Sei donne per l'assassino, Cry Nightmare was obviously written with specific components in mind. The script contains several references to a theme song, described as though already recorded; the characters and locations are detailed with perfect familiarity, based on what was known to be available (the only reason to film the climax off the school grounds, in a cave, would be to take advantage of the Viale Libio caverns, seen in the final act of I coltelli del vendicatore), and the "Quasimodo-like" role of La Forêt was clearly written to be portrayed by Luciano Pigozzi ("Alan Collins"); indeed, the peeping nature of his character is a veritable reprise of the role he played in Paolo Heusch's Lycanthropus/Werewolf in a Girl's Dormitory (1961). Pigozzi confirms that he was aware of Bava's role in developing the screenplay, and was cast by him for the picture.

The screenplay was completed by July—at which time Le spie vengono dal semifreddo was showing in Italian theaters and racking up the biggest Italian boxoffice of Bava's directorial career. Its grand success coincided with the collapse of Cry Nightmare, at least as far as Bava was concerned.

"Just a short time before the filming was to begin, my father had an argument with the producers and he abandoned the film," Lamberto Bava recalls.

By the time of the dispute, Tudor Gates and Brian Degas were back in England and none the wiser. It was not until he was interviewed for this book that Gates discovered that the film was made—and not by Bava. "We finished that assignment and came back to London, which was our base," Gates recounted.[2] "I was certainly under the impression that the film had been shot [by Bava]. How I could have missed out on the real story, I don't know. Maybe it was the language [difference]—or maybe they didn't want to tell us!"

The argument between Bava and the Woolners may have been rooted in the Woolners' decision to form a partnership with the production company of Bava's professional rival, Antonio Margheriti, with whom they also had business ties. Margheriti explained how he came to be involved: "[The Woolner brothers] came to Italy because they had been the distributors of [my film] Danza macabra and several other Italian films and they wanted to produce some horror and adventure pictures. They were also in contact with Bava about doing some horror pictures with him. One of them was this picture. I don't remember exactly why things didn't come together at the end; I think Mario was busy at that time, working on Diabolik or something. Anyhow, the project they wanted to do in collaboration with me was a completely different one, also a horror film. Since Mario couldn't do this one, they gave it to our company, because we were also involved on the production side."[3]

MARK DAMON and Eleonora Brown as Richard and Lucille, the film's intimidated young lovers.

1 Tudor Gates and Brian Degas, Cry Nightmare, screenplay, 138.

2 Tudor Gates, letter to the author, December 16, 1993.

3 All Margheriti quotes taken from Peter Blumenstock, "Margheriti—The Wild, Wild Interview," Video Watchdog 28, May/June 1995, 42–61.

Fans of Italian horror tend to regard Freda, Bava, and Margheriti as its great first generation triumvirate, and therefore as a team, but it was common knowledge within the Italian film industry that bad blood existed between Bava and Margheriti. "He and Mario were opposed," confirms their mutual friend, Luigi Cozzi. "They disliked each other. I knew them both at the same time, and they were always talking shit about each other."

By reading between the lines of Margheriti's statement, we can see that the Woolners—unbeknownst to Bava—placed him in a position of working under Margheriti's production supervision, an idea he would have flatly rejected. This complication must have occurred only a short time before filming was to begin; locations had been scouted and secured, cast and crew had been hired, a theme song had been written and recorded. But without its promised director at the helm, cast members and investors backed out, leaving Cry Nightmare in dry dock—for almost a full year, while Bava went on to direct his next picture, Diabolik, for Dino De Laurentiis.

Cry Nightmare finally went before the cameras the following summer, on location in Rome and on the French Riviera.[4] The film was shot under the Italian title Sette vergini per il diavolo ("Seven Virgins for the Devil"—a title retained for its German release), indicating Lawrence and Betty Woolner's intention to promise audiences even more picturesque murders than they were given by Sei donne per l'assassino. At the helm was Bava's rival, Antonio Margheriti, directing under his usual nom d'ecran "Anthony M. Dawson." Asked how he came to replace Bava as director, Margheriti said, "I directed [it] because I feel better when I know what is happening with my money."

Finally submitted to the Italian censor on December 22, 1967, the film—which ultimately bore the salacious title Nude . . . si muore—was not released for another two months, at a time when most titles were approved for release within a single week.

Margheriti directed the film using the screenplay by Gates, Degas, and Mario Bava, none of whom received credit for their work on the resulting movie. Instead, the script was credited to Margheriti and Franco Bottar, with the additional claim of being based on a story by Gianni Simonelli. The enmity between Bava and Margheriti was lasting, but evidently the two professionals could put it aside when necessary. Margheriti's son Eduardo, who was aware of the rivalry between his father and Bava, recalls an occasion when he and his father went to an out-of-the-way trattoria for dinner and found Bava there, dining alone. "I was just a boy but I had heard stories of how they didn't get along, which could have made the situation awkward," Eduardo remembers. "But Bava rose up on seeing us and invited us to join him, shaking my hand. He took an uncomfortable situation and made it a rather happy memory."

LUCIANO PIGOZZI as La Forêt, the peeping gardener whose attempts to spy on the girl's shower room places him as a witness to murder.

The Film

Nude . . . si muore opens with the bathtub murder of Mrs. Clay, used as a pre-credits sequence, with the montage of the trunk-in-transit unfolding to the tune of Carlo Savina's electric bass-thumping theme song, "Nightmare"—similar to the almost synchronously written "Batman Theme" by Neal Hefti, but sung in the brassy style of Shirley Bassey by Rose Brennan.

As the movie unfolds, it becomes obvious that the original Bava/Gates/Degas script was filmed almost 100% faithfully, with only minor adjustments made. Lucille was played by Italian-English brunette Eleonora Brown (previously seen in Tony Richardson's The Sailor From Gibraltar), rather than a French blonde; the character of Jill was appropriately cast with a British actress (Sally Smith), rather than an American (which the daughter of James Bond couldn't be); and the climactic "Here Come the Marines" stock footage sequence was abandoned in favor of a more sober settling of accounts. The only instance of additional dialogue was some truly moronic flirtation between Richard and Lucille; he calls her "Little Miss Moffat," she calls him "Richard the Lionhearted," and he occasionally camps it up with further allusions to Alice in Wonderland. It was obviously meant to be charming and naïve, but it comes across as the infantile prattlings of two mental defectives. While the full-length Italian version retained the last-minute cameo by 007, it was not included in English-language export versions—which were trimmed in some territories by as much as 20 minutes.

LUCILLE is cornered by her murderous brother Peter (Ludmilla Luova), who spends most of the film disguised as another character.

In some ways, Nude . . . si muore is typical of Margheriti: a dull and somewhat ambiguous hero, a heroine forever running around in her nightclothes, a two-dimensional romance sandwiched between perfunctory horror scenes, overbright and unmysterious lighting, aggressively mixed orchestral music, and red herrings galore. The direction is flat, the mise-en-scène uninteresting, and there is zero interest in color. Fausto Zuccoli's anamorphic cinematography is hobbled by the prevalence of white-walled settings and wardrobe ranging from whites and grays to beiges and black, a scenic palette that is almost too barren to create atmosphere or sustain interest.

Margheriti's previous horror films—La vergine di Norimberga/Horror Castle (1963), I lunghi capelli della morte/The Long Hair of Death (1964), and Danza macabra/Castle of Blood (1964)—introduced him as a promising horror talent in the classical Freda and Bava mold, but he specialized in noisy, impersonal action pictures and pulpy science fiction, which he shot with a limiting three-camera technique adopted from live television and an eye that generally favored quantity over quality. After fifteen years as a director, Margheriti had completed nearly fifty feature films. By the time of Nude . . . si muore, he had become far too brisk and pedestrian to have arrived at some of the carefully composed (albeit clumsily shot) suspense sequences found here, leading one to suspect that his visuals here may have been guided in part by storyboards drawn by Bava during the film's preproduction in 1967.

The most likely instance of a Bava storyboard being used is the murder of Betty Anne in the school's storage cellar. The cellar itself showcases the kind of ominous clutter that makes it a forbidding environment, and throughout the scene's opening moments, the single camera is kept in constant tracking motion at a furtive low-angle, accentuating the spooky trappings in a way that recalls the antiques shop sequence of Sei donne per l'assassino. (When Jill and Miss Tranfield visit the cellar later, there is a dialogue speculation that someone might have cut the power—a direct reference to the opening shot of that earlier sequence.) The actress playing Betty Anne moves to the right of frame at precisely the right moment to highlight the white upright rectangle of the open door at the rear of the shot at frame left, seconds before it swings shut—the kind of meticulously designed shot, atypical of Margheriti, that could have been captured only by a single camera. The rest of the scene is played out on the stage of Betty Anne's facial expressions, in three-quarter profile, as she registers initial relief, then mounting concern, and suddenly—with a sudden adjustment to a head-on, subjective shot—panic, as a pair of gloved hands thrust up from the bottom of the screen to clutch her throat . . . and to implicate the viewer in the act of murder. The scene ends as she falls, her lifeless head facing the camera, as the killer's escape is implied by the brief flash of light on the stairs in the background as the door is opened and closed. The scene sounds better than it is, because regardless of its clever design, the blueprint is here interpreted without any sense of active style or passion. It doesn't help the atmosphere of the scene that the actress is garbed in a riding costume of absolute white.

Other images strongly suggest the conceptual guiding hand of Bava: Jill's reading lamp headband, which allows her to read her beloved mysteries after "lights out," giving the tent of her bedsheet the ironic appearance of a glowing ghost; the image of a moth flapping its wings drowsily after being pinned by the doting Prof. Andre (an image Bava would personally reprise in Ecologia del delitto); and the scene of Jill being caught in the act of eavesdropping on La Forêt, who startles her and laughs like a madman as she runs away—as Luciano Pigozzi would also 4 Variety, July 20, 1967.

EXAMPLES of the Saul Bass-influenced Italian fotobusta set.

do to Elke Sommer in 1972's Baron Blood.

With the exception of "guest star" Michael Rennie (best remembered as space emissary Klaatu in Robert Wise's The Day the Earth Stood Still, 1951), the actors seem to be deliberately overstating their performances to help simplify their later post-sync recording duties. (Nearly all of the actors, including Pigozzi, dubbed their own performances—something that almost never occurred in Italian co-productions of this, or any other, period.) Mark Damon, formerly of I tre volti della paura, plays the male lead broadly and unctuously, and a number of the supporting players—Vivian Stapleton, Ludmilla Luova, Esther Masing, and some of the secondary student actresses—are so dry and unexpressive that their presence aggravates the film's dramatic pallor. The proceedings are intermittently enlivened by Sally Smith, who gives a spirited performance, and also by Pigozzi, who as usual tackles a somewhat stereotypical character with a dimension of tenderness and pathos. The killer's masquerade as the relentlessly poker-faced Mrs. Clay must also be counted a success, and one of the most deceptive of the many transvestite killers found in '60s cinema. As in William Castle's Homicidal (1961), the illusion is assisted by having a woman playing a man disguised as a woman, but Luova makes an even more convincing man than did Joan Marshall (credited as "Jean Arless") in the Castle film. In its way, it is a Bavian trompe l'oeil in the spirit of Valerio Valeri's Melissa Graps in Operazione paura.

Ultimately, Nude . . . si muore provides a useful illustration, by omission, of what Mario Bava brought to his thrillers. As it is, the film has certain enjoyable characteristics—not least of all the prominent score, which finds Carlo Savina aping everyone from John Barry to Neal Hefti to Nino Rota to Riz Ortolani—but no juice. It is basically a numb, mechanical interpretation of some potentially arousing, even subversive material. Realizing Bava's involvement in its preparation, one can't help fantasizing about what sort of darkly comic thrill ride he might have cooked up about a killer who inevitably and repeatedly murders the wrong person.

In the United States, Nude . . . si muore was acquired by American International Pictures, who gave it an unsuccessful August 1968 release as The Young, the Evil and the Savage—an exploitative attempt to capitalize on the titular template of Sergio Leone's The Good, the Bad and the Ugly. The film fared poorly wherever it was released, and it did not arrive in some countries until after the 1971 death of its top-billed star, Michael Rennie: Great Britain in 1971, Spain in 1972.

Disappointed with their Italian venture, Lawrence and Betty Woolner returned to America in 1969, where Larry formed a new company—New World Pictures—in partnership with Roger Corman. He remained as vice-president of the company until 1971, at which time Corman fired him in a dispute involving The Big Doll House, a New World women-in-prison release. Woolner took with him the rights to a forthcoming New World release called Twilight People, a Filipino adventure-thriller modelled on The Island of Dr. Moreau, which became the premiere release of Woolner's own company, Dimension Pictures. Dimension lasted for a full decade, releasing such films as Group Marriage, Terminal Island, and Stone Cold Dead before selling off their holdings to 21st Century Distribution in 1981. Lawrence Woolner then retired to Las Vegas, where he died in 1985—8 years after the 1977 death of his brother and former partner, Bernard—at the age of 73.

Looking back on Nude . . . si muore, Antonio Margheriti took some pride in the fact that he had made his "nice little giallo" a year before Dario Argento tried his far more successful, black-gloved hand at the genre. ("Again, I made a film ahead of its time!" he laughed.[5]) Margheriti lived to make dozens of other films, for the cinema and television, before a heart attack claimed his life on November 4, 2002, at the age of 72.

As for where Mario Bava was left in the midst of all this, it was darkest just before the dawn. Around the same time that Eugenio Bava died, Lamberto Bava and his wife Fiamma conceived their second child, who would be Mario's only grandson. And then, just as the most tumultuous year of his life came to an end, Bava received a call from the offices of Dino De Laurentiis, inviting him to step up into the major league and direct the biggest, most prestigious production that would ever bear his name.

US half-sheet.

5 Blumenstock.

COMIC strip characters come to life: Diabolik (John Phillip Law) and Eva Kant (Marisa Mell) elude the police after a daring heist in DIABOLIK.

DIABOLIK

Danger: Diabolik

FOR AS LONG as there has been pulp fiction—a cheaply printed, working-class form of escapist literature—there have been "anti-heroes."

In 1857, Victor-Alexis Ponson du Terrail published the first installment of Rocambole, ou Les Drames du Paris, a newspaper serial about a murderous master criminal who eventually sees the error of his ways and turns his formidable talents to more lawful ends. The serial lasted until 1870. In 1905 came Arsène Lupin, the brainchild of Maurice Leblanc, a wittier variation on the Rocambole concept that escalated the personality of the eponymous character to the fabulously inescapable; no matter where you hid your jewels, the great Lupin could plunder them at his leisure. Spoofing the seminal pulp invention of Arthur Conan Doyle, Leblanc opposed Lupin with the master detective "Hemlock Sholmes" in some of his earliest adventures, including the story collection La Dame Blonde/Arsène Lupin versus Hemlock Sholmes and the novel L'Aiguille Creuse/The Hollow Needle. 1911 saw the first appearance of Fantômas, the diabolical thief, assassin and master of disguise created by Pierre Souvestre and Marcel Allain, whose popularity flourished over a series of thirty-two novels, which were followed by another ten written solo by Allain, following the death of his partner. All of these characters were popular with the Surrealists, who appreciated their elements of surprise and triumphs of style over the mundane, but they were particularly beloved by the working class, who enjoyed their descriptions of the higher classes having their upturned noses tweaked by these daring agents of terror.

DIABOLIK as he appears on the cover of a recent edition of the Giusanni sisters' long-running digest.

These characters, and others, were directly responsible for the founding of the motion picture serial and, by extension, the feature-length motion picture as we know it today. In 1908, Studios Éclair hired Victorin Jasset to make a short adventure film based on the eponymously written American stories about detective Nick Carter, while rival studio Pathé retaliated with a Rocambole silent. Both proved so successful that Jasset followed through with four serials devoted to Léon Sazie's master criminal hero Zigomar, made between 1910–12. Then, in 1913, the great French cinema pioneer Louis Feuillade obtained the screen rights to Fantômas, whose exploits became the subject of four ambitious, feature-length serials filmed between 1913–14; these were the first feature-length stories ever told on celluloid. Feuillade topped his Fantômas films with an original epic, Les Vampires (1915–16), based on his own conception of a criminal gang led by seductive Irma Vep. When Les Vampires met with even greater success, police and church officials began to chastise Feuillade in public forums for romanticizing criminality and murder. He responded with the finest of all his serials, Judex (1917–18, co-written with Arthur Bernède), about a cloaked righter of wrongs—a kind of dark-caped public conscience who was probably one of the many cinematic influences on the later creation of Bob Kane's character, The Batman.

Such films were by no means limited to France; in 1913, Vincenzo C. Dénizot followed the example of Feuillade by directing Tigris, the first of three feature-length serials about a sinister master of disguise. The Tigris films marked, in effect, the birth of the Italian thriller.

It was in loving response to this tradition that two Milanese sisters, Angela Giussani (born June 10, 1922) and Luciana Giussani (born April 19, 1928) conceived Diabolik. The character made his debut in the first issue of a fumetti digest the sisters wrote and illustrated in the winter of 1962.

Diabolik

Working title: Goldstrike
Filmed at Dinocittà and on location in Rome, Anzio and Turin
April – May 1967
First released: January 24, 1968
Technicolor, 1.85:1, 101 minutes

Production: Dino De Laurentiis Cinematografica (Rome) and Marianne Production (Paris). Producer: Dino De Laurentiis. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant director: Lamberto Bava. Screenplay: Dino Maiuri, Brian Degas, Tudor Gates, and Mario Bava; based on the comic magazine by Angela and Luciana Giussani. Story: Angela and Luciana Giussani, Dino Maiuri, and Adriano Baracco. Casting director: Guidarino Guidi. Continuity: Rosalba Scavia. Director of photography: Antonio Rinaldi. Camera assistant: Salvatore Caruso. Art direction: Flavio Mogherini. Production design: Ennio Michettoni. Set decoration: Dino Leonetti, Franco Velchi, Elena Da Forno. Wardrobe: Tigano Lo Faro, Gabriele Mayer, Piatelli. Costume design: Luciana Marinucci and Piero Gherardi. Diabolik's mask by Carlo Rambaldi (uncredited). Jewelry: Nino Lembo. Makeup: Otello Fava. Hairdresser: Renata Magnanti. Stills: Alfonso Avincola. Underwater filming consultant: Nicola Balini. Underwater equipment: Fratelli Balini. Production manager: Bruno Todini. Production assistants: Giorgio Adriani, Marco Tamburella, Gilberto Scarpellini, Eros Lafranconi. Production accountant: Fred Sidewater. Unit publicist: Chuck Painter. Editor: Romana Fortini. Assistant editor: Nadia Bonifazi. Music: Ennio Morricone. "Deep Down" by Morricone and Audrey Nohra, sung by Christy [Maria Christina Brancucci]. Sound: Mario Celantano. Boom operator: Gaetano Testa. Distributor: Paramount Pictures Corporation in all territories unless otherwise noted.

John Phillip Law (Diabolik), Marisa Mell (Eva Kant), Michel Piccoli (Inspector Ginco), Adolfo Celi (Ralph Valmont), Terry-Thomas (Minister of the Interior), Claudio Gora (Chief of Police), Mario Donen (Sgt. Danek), Renzo Palmer (Minister's assistant), Caterina Boratto (Lady Clark), Lucia Modugno (prostitute), Annie Gorassini (Rose), Carlo Croccolo (lorry conductor), Lidia Biondi (policewoman), Andrea Bosic (bank director), Federico Boido (Jo), Tiberio Mitri (henchman), Isarco Ravaioli (henchman), Giulio Donnini (Dr. Vernier), Edward Febo Kelleng (Sir Harold Clark), Giorgio Gennari (Rudy/gas station informant), Giorgio Sciolette (Dr. Ferrer/forensic surgeon), Giuseppe Fazio (Tony), Wolfgang Hillinger (henchman), Francesco Mulé (crematorium official, uncredited), Robert Buchanan (gold ingot supervisor, uncredited), Chuck Painter (newscaster, uncredited).

Belgium: Gevaar: Diabolik!, "Warning: Diabolik!"
Denmark: Diabolik—Pantertyven i Jaguar, "Diabolik—The Panther Thief in a Jaguar," 11/25/68
France: Danger: Diabolik, 4/12/68, 90m. Announced title: Diabolik contre l'Inspecteur Ginko, "Diabolik vs. Inspector Ginko"
Germany: Gefahr: Diabolik, "Danger: Diabolik," 4/25/68, 101m
Greece: 12 Ekoikheh toù Enatepman
Sweden: Diabolik Ger Ingen Nåd
Mexico: Diabolik, 1969
Spain: Diabolik, Filmax S.A., 93m
UK: Danger: Diabolik, 1/19/69, 88m, Certificate "U," passed with cuts (submitted at 99m 13s)
US: Danger: Diabolik, 12/11/68, 100m
Yugoslavia: Diabolik, Inex-Film Beograd, 1969

JEAN SOREL and Elsa Martinelli as Diabolik and Eva Kant, in promotional shots for Tonino Cervi's shelved production.

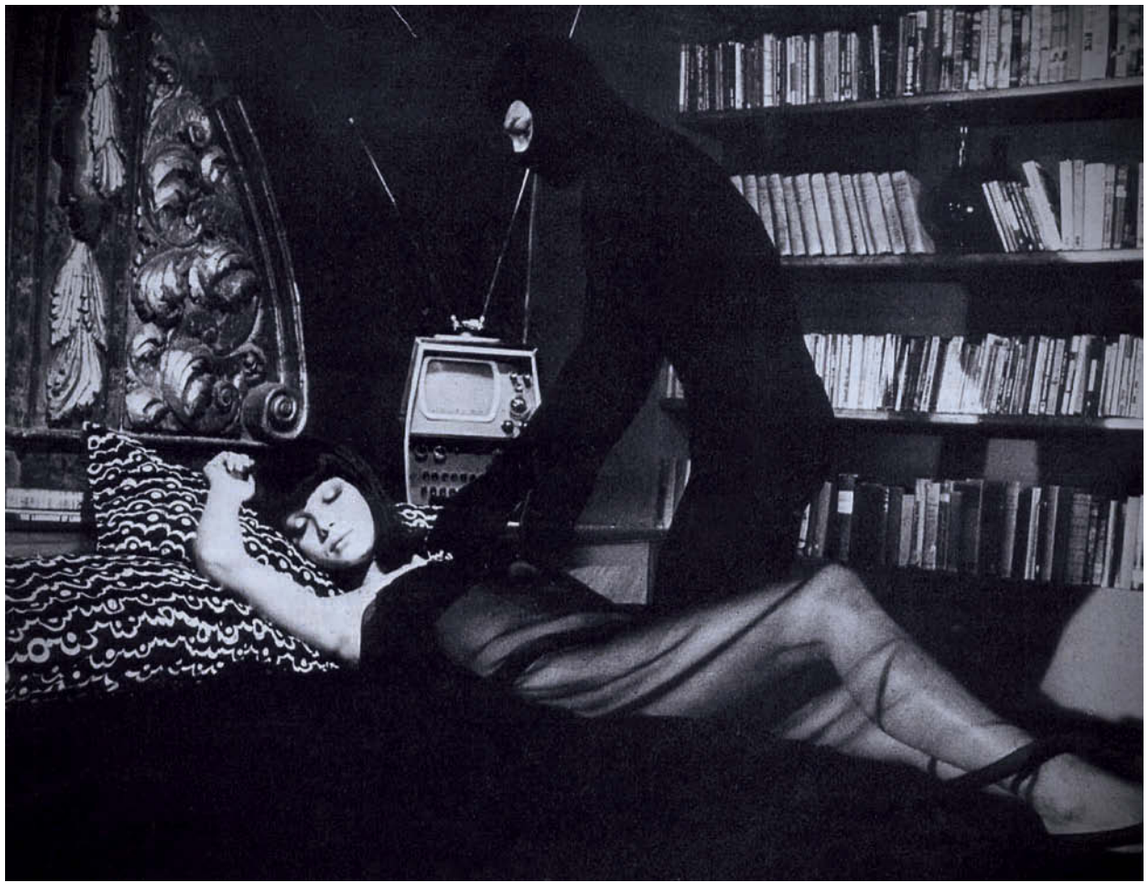
Diabolik is a master of crime and disguise, yet admirable for both his audacity and logical code of ethics, which includes contempt for a police force capable of doing business with the underworld, and a government that monetarily abuses its people. Most humanizing of all Diabolik's personal traits is his faithful and abiding love for one woman, his enchanting accomplice Eva Kant. Most commonly depicted in a skin-tight, midnight-blue costume that reveals only his hawk-like brow and piercing blue eyes, Diabolik's unmasked appearance was patterned by the Giussani sisters after their favorite actor: Robert Taylor. More than forty years after its first issue, Diabolik is still being published by Astorina, the Italian comics company founded by the Giussanis. Over the years, there have been attempts to launch an American edition of Diabolik, but somehow these export editions have never been able to last for more than a handful of issues.



Diabolik's campaign to reach the motion picture screen began in 1964, around the time Gaumont of France launched a new series of Fantômas films, starring Jean Marais, Louis de Funés, and Mylène Demongeot. Directed by André Hunebelle, the initial film Fantômas was a tremendous hit, striking a perfect chord of mystery, comedy, Bondian action and gadgetry, and comic book garishness; in retrospect, it anticipates nearly everything that the 1966 ABC-TV series Batman would later be credited with originating. When Fantômas hit European screens in 1964, Antonio "Tonino" Cervi (1929–2002)—the executive producer of such art house fare as Boccaccio '70 (1962, an omnibus film with portions directed by De Sica, Fellini, Monicelli, and Visconti), Bernardo Bertolucci's debut feature La commare secca/The Grim Reaper (1962), and Michelangelo Antonioni's Deserto rosso/Red Desert (1964)—decided the time was right for a Diabolik film.

Cervi assembled an interesting package. The film was to be an Italian/French/Spanish co-production starring Jean Sorel (as Diabolik) and Elsa Martinelli (as Eva Kant), with Cervi sharing the directorial duties with British filmmaker Seth Holt. Holt, a former editor (Saturday Night and Sunday Morning, 1960) had proven himself adept at suspense with the Hammer productions Scream of Fear (1961) and The Nanny (1965). Some interesting publicity stills of Sorel and Martinelli were leaked to the press (including Continental Film Review and Midi-Minuit Fantastique)[1] but after one week of shooting in Malaga, Spain, in late 1965, the production was shut down.[2] Recently asked about their Diabolik experience, Sorel and Martinelli independently concur that most of that week was spent filming screen tests and posing for publicity photos in ill-fitting costumes. Martinelli recalls that her role would have been "quite acrobatic and lively, with big eyebrows and a sharp haircut . . . dark and shadowy, not at all the way it was eventually played." In 1969, Sorel and Martinelli were subsequently cast in a film [Lucio Fulci's Una sull'altra/One On Top of the Other, 1969] opposite Marisa Mell—the actress who would ultimately play Eva Kant onscreen—and after comparing notes, none of them was any the wiser about why the Cervi/Holt version had been aborted.

Possibly Cervi's financing sources dried up, or perhaps he had planned all along to use this week's footage to attract a producer with deeper pockets. For whatever reason, Dino De Laurentiis took over the property in early 1966.

1 Continental Film Review, January 1966, 22 and Midi-Minuit Fantastique 14, June 1966, 67–68.

2 Variety, February 1, 1967.

DIABOLIK (Jean Sorel) creeps up to a sleeping Eva Kant (Elsa Martinelli) in another scene from the abandoned version.

Born August 8, 1919, in Torre Annunziata, Campania, De Laurentiis was arguably the most important Italian producer of the postwar era, and remains a vital force in international film production in the early 21st century. The son of a pasta maker, he set out on his own at the age of 17, attending classes at the Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografica by day and working as a busboy at the Cinecittà commissary at night. A determined and industrious worker, De Laurentiis produced his first film before he reached his 22nd birthday. His first international success was Riso amaro/Bitter Rice (1948), starring Vittorio Gassman and Silvana Mangano. In the early 1950s, he joined forces with fellow Lux producer Carlo Ponti to form what would become the most important production company in Italy, Ponti–De Laurentiis. With Ponti, Dino had produced Steno and Mario Monicelli's Guardie e ladri (1951, which Mario Bava photographed) and also Mario Camerini's Ulisse (1954, on which Bava is likely to have worked as an uncredited special effects and cameraman). After reaching a pinnacle of success with Federico Fellini's La strada (1954) and Le notti di Cabiria/The Nights of Cabiria (1957), Ponti and De Laurentiis went their separate ways. As an independent producer, De Laurentiis made the occasional prestige picture (Barabbas, La Bibbia/The Bible . . . In the Beginning), but the backbone of his enterprise was composed of properties of a more pulpish nature. Among his earliest solo endeavors were Carlo Lizzani's Il gobbo/The Hunchback of Rome (1960), Mario Camerini's Crimen/Criminals (1960), Giacomo Gentilomo's Maciste contro il vampiro/Goliath and the Vampires (1961), Tinto Brass' La disco volante/The Flying Saucer (1964), and the spy spoofs Se tutte le donne del mondo/Kiss the Girls and Make Them Die (directed by Le meraviglie di Aladino's Henry Levin) and Alberto Lattuada's Matchless (both 1966).

Once he had acquired control of Diabolik from Tonino Cervi, De Laurentiis junked the 1965 Malaga footage, preferring to start over from scratch using his own sound stages at Dinocittà, which were in need of activity.[3] Drawing inspiration from one of his favorite classic Hollywood films—Sam Wood's Raffles (1940), which starred David Niven as A. J. Raffles, a charming, internationally notorious jewel thief—De Laurentiis believed that Diabolik had the potential to become a new, young Raffles for the Pop Art era. He commissioned a new screen treatment from screenwriter Adriano Baracco, a former documentarist (1961's Benito Mussolini—anatomia di un dittatore) who had some recent experience at writing tongue-in-cheek spy trash (1965's Berlino—appuntamenta per la spie/Spy in Your Eye, which featured Dana Andrews as "Secret Agent Z3").

In the meantime, De Laurentiis exploited his screen rights to the Diabolik character by featuring him briefly in the omnibus film Le streghe/The Witches (1967), starring his wife Silvana Mangano. In the last of the film's segments, Vittorio De Sica's "A Night Like Any Other," Clint Eastwood plays a dull husband whose wife (Mangano) is too preoccupied with comic-book heroes to pay him any attention. In an elaborate fantasy sequence, Eastwood battles Superman (Armando Bottin), Batman (Pietro Torrisi), Flash Gordon (Angelo Santi), Mandrake the Magician (Paolo Gozlino), and Diabolik for Mangano's affections. In this sequence, Diabolik was played by Italian Western actor Gianni Garko, wearing a black, full-body leotard that looks suspiciously like Jean Sorel's hand-me-downs.

Corràdo Farina, the '60s comic book writer–artist who became a film director in the 1970s (Hanno cambiato faccia, Baba Yaga), takes credit for suggesting Mario Bava as a replacement for Seth Holt. "I wrote two stories for the original Diabolik comic book series, but the publishers used only one, called L'artiglio del demonio, claiming the other was too slow," he recounts. "This was back in 1965, and I remember the Giussani sisters were completely overwhelmed with the movie matter. They came to me and asked if I could suggest a good director for the movie, because they were having problems finding one, and I suggested the name of Mario Bava, because of some great horror and giallo movies he had directed, which I had seen."[4]

Lamberto Bava remembers that his father became involved through a personal telephone call from De Laurentiis. "He called my father and told him: 'Let's start again from scratch, because the comic book is good . . .' They had already shot part of the film with a French actor in the lead . . . they threw it all away and De Laurentiis wanted to remake it big . . . He pursued my father because his movies were already loved at that time by certain intellectuals and cinephiles."[5]

The character of Diabolik was a natural for Bava. Much like the gialli he had innovated earlier in the decade, with their minimal plots and lavishly cruel tableaux of violence, the Giussanis' fumetto nero ("dark comic book") was controversial, frequently accused of exalting crime and violence. But, as the two sisters reasoned, "When you're playing Cops and Robbers, or Cowboys and Indians, who wants to plays the cops or the cowboys?"[6] Perusing the titles of early Diabolik stories, one is immediately struck by their similarity to the titles of movies that Bava had made, or would make: Incubo, Terrore sul mare, La casa della paura, Catena di delitti, La Venere d'oro. In fact, the poster design for Bava's I coltelli del vendicatore could have been patterned on the most famous of Diabolik's promotional poses, which depicted the Master of Crime hurling a dagger.

By the time Adriano Baracco's treatment was turned in, Bava had been signed to direct. Bava was responsible for hiring the film's principal screenwriters, Tudor Gates and Brian Degas, with whom he had worked on the aborted Cry Nightmare. "We got on very well with Mario during the stint on *Cry Nightmare a*nd he directly recommended us to Dino De Laurentiis," Gates confirmed.

Gates and Degas wrote various drafts of the Diabolik screenplay in the latter months of 1966, drawing their inspiration primarily from three of the original fumetti stories: Sepolto vivo! ("Buried Alive!" Diabolik 8, August 10, 1963), Lotta disperata ("Hopeless Battle," Diabolik 15, March 10, 1964) and L'ombra nella notte ("The Shadows of Night," Diabolik 35, May 31, 1965).[7] Aware that Diabolik was an unknown commodity outside Italy, they proposed an alternative title for the export market: Goldstrike. This unused alternate title, like the relatively straightforward (if gadget-oriented) tone of the script itself, reminds us that this project had become a commercial risk worth taking due to the worldwide success of the James Bond films—particularly the recent blockbusters Goldfinger (1964) and, more particularly, Thunderball (1965), which had been partially filmed, and was especially profitable, in Italy. Though the script was primarily influenced by the Bond films, one might expect that the US premiere of the ABC-TV series Batman in January 1966 had an impact, but it is unlikely that Bava saw an episode before his film went into production. Its true Pop Art influence is more accurately rooted in André Hunebelle's Fantômas series, which likewise inspired numerous other Italian imitations—Superargo, Goldface, Fenomenal, Mister X, Kriminal—all of whom were soon punching their way onto theater screens in bold primary colors.

The Gates/Degas script for Diabolik was so well-liked by De Laurentiis that the writers were retained to write the final draft of his looming science fiction blockbuster Barbarella (1968), based on the popular adult comic strip by Jean-Claude Forest.

Synopsis

Inspector Ginco is summoned to secure a bank transfer of $10,000,000 against theft by the arch-criminal Diabolik. While an armored car is loaded with blank, dollar-sized notes, the real fortune ("the largest amount of single dollars ever moved at 6:00 in the morning") is entrusted to a single Rolls-Royce, driven by policemen disguised—none too well—as diplomats.

DIABOLIK (Jean Sorel) poses as a wax figure in this publicity pose.

3 According to actor Brett Halsey, who worked at virtually every Italian film studio during his many years in Rome, De Laurentiis was spared the expense of building his own production facility. As he explains: "I forget what it was called, but there was a government program in place there to encourage industry in the south of Italy. Apparently they drew a line—south of Italy, just below Rome—and Dinocittà was built just on the other side of that line, practically in Rome, but not quite. So Dino got the government to build it for him, but most people didn't want to use it because it was just far enough out of town to be inconvenient."

4 Corràdo Farina interviewed by Luca Rea, January 2001.

5 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

6 Danger: Diabolik, Paramount pressbook, 4.

7 By the time of the film's release, Diabolik had surpassed its 100th issue.

En route, the Rolls is besieged with multi-colored fog and raised high into the sky by a crane controlled by a chortling Diabolik. Diving with the money into the sea, he makes a daring getaway by speedboat and, after moving to land, in his trademark black Jaguar E-2. Meeting his beautiful accomplice Eva Kant in a tunnel, they switch to a white Jaguar and return to their vast, subterranean headquarters, where they celebrate their victory by making love on a round, rotating bed littered with stolen bank notes.

The Minister of the Interior holds a press conference, announcing the reinstatement of the death penalty. Eva and Diabolik brazenly crash the conference disguised as reporters and use "exhilarating gas" to turn the solemn meeting into a laughing stock. Ginco gets the idea of forcing Diabolik out of hiding by turning the underworld against itself. The police bust one of the teenage drug dens supplied by crime boss Ralph Valmont. They threaten continued crackdowns unless Valmont uses his connections to put Diabolik out of business.

It is announced that a special gala reception will be held at New York's British Embassy in honor of Sir Harold Clark, the British Minister of Finance, and his wife Lady Clark, who will wear her famous Assan necklace of eleven pendant emeralds. Eva coyly lets it be known that she wants the necklace for her birthday, which coincides with the reception. Eva poses as a prostitute to size-up the comings and goings outside the Embassy. Another streetwalker finds her suspicious and delivers her description to Valmont, who uses an Identikit to formulate her likeness, which he distributes throughout the underworld. Meanwhile, Diabolik successfully steals the jewelled necklace by fooling Ginco's security camera with a Polaroid photograph of the room he supposedly has under surveillance. Diabolik makes an apparent escape by using an ancient catapult atop the Embassy to fling himself out to sea, but as the police pursue him, the real Diabolik emerges from the shadows to make his getaway. After driving a short distance, Eva injures her arm while helping Diabolik to set up a mirror-like banner to force their pursuers off the road. Diabolik realizes her injury and tells her that she must see Dr. Vernier as soon as possible.

WHILE filming DIABOLIK on one sound stage at Cinecittà, John Phillip Law took advantage of down time by going to fittings for the angel wings he would next wear as Pygar in BARBARELLA.

The next day, Eva is recognized by a stool pigeon at a gas station and Valmont's thugs follow her to Vernier's office. They abduct her, slaying Vernier. Diabolik places a call to Valmont, who demands the stolen money and emeralds in exchange for her safe return; Diabolik agrees. They meet aboard Valmont's private plane. Diabolik hands over the loot, Valmont hands him a parachute and points to a cabin through the open bomb bay doors. Diabolik grabs Valmont and they plummet together toward the cabin where Ginco and his men wait in ambush. Diabolik manages to free Eva and point her to safety, then shoots Valmont with a machine gun. He takes what appears to be a cyanide capsule to elude punishment.

Later, in the morgue, Eva poses as a nurse and injects Diabolik with an antidote. Diabolik poses as Valmont's brother to collect his ashes at the crematorium. Intermingled with Valmont's ashen remains are the emeralds of Lady Clark's necklace—which Diabolik used as machine gun ammunition! Diabolik celebrates his victory by blowing up the Hall of Tax Records, which forces the Minister to plead with the public to pay the taxes they think they owe . . .

To replenish the government, an enormous amount of gold must be transported, which is melted down into a gigantic, twenty-ton, steel-netted ingot—presumably too heavy to steal. Ginco escorts it by train. Diabolik blows the train off a bridge and transports the ingot underwater to his cavern headquarters. After changing into a protective uniform, Diabolik proceeds to melt the ingot down, pouring it into gold bar moldings. Unknown to the criminal, Ginco has radioactivated the gold, which allows him to locate Diabolik's hideout and all his stolen property. As Diabolik prepares to fight off the siege, the gold overheats and the ingot explodes, covering the master criminal in a hardening straightjacket of gold! Eva later returns, dressed in mourning, to visit the body. Ginco is there to arrest her, but she manages to catch a glimpse of Diabolik, secretly conscious and alive in his heat-protective costume . . . winking!

Production & Cast

Mario Bava and Dino De Laurentiis began auditioning various candidates for the lead roles in February. Accustomed to having complete creative control on his previous films, Bava learned during this early process that he would not be "calling the shots" on Diabolik, where the stakes were considerably higher. Though Bava would not spend the entire amount, De Laurentiis Cinematografica budgeted the production at approximately $3,000,000—more money than the director had ever seen in his life. But with that money came interference and the end of directorial autonomy. Even in the matter of casting the picture, Bava was allowed to state his preferences, but all final casting was dependent upon Dino's approval.

De Laurentiis' first choice for the lead role was an inspired one: Alain Delon. With his insolent good looks and penetrating eyes, Delon would have made a magnificent Diabolik, but he happened to score a major hit at this time with Jean-Pierre Melville's Le Samouraï (1967) and, according to Lamberto Bava, priced himself out of competition.

"Every actor in town wanted to play Diabolik," remembers John Phillip Law, who eventually won the role. As fate would have it, one of the actors in town happened to be the Giussani sisters' original model for Diabolik:

JOHN PHILLIP LAW as Diabolik, wearing a form-fitting mask made especially for him by Carlo Rambaldi.

Robert Taylor, who was acting in Luigi Scattini's La sfinge d'oro/The Glass Sphinx. Then 56 years of age, and only a year away from death due to lung cancer, Taylor was neither auditioned nor seriously considered for the role.

Born September 7, 1937, John Phillip Law was a Los Angeles native who had entered the business as a child actor, making an uncredited appearance in John Sturges' The Magnificent Yankee (1950). He resurfaced in the early '60s playing secondary roles in Italian films, beginning with Franco Rossi's romantic comedy Smog (1962). With more Italian than American pictures under his belt, Law had a surprise success in two popular American releases: Norman Jewison's The Russians Are Coming! The Russians Are Coming! (1966) and Otto Preminger's Hurry Sundown (1967), which gave him the boxoffice cachet to headline subsequent Italian productions. While working with Jane Fonda in Hurry Sundown, Law was made aware of her next assignment, Barbarella, which was going to be directed by her husband, French director Roger Vadim. Fonda personally recommended Law for the role of the blind angel, Pygar, and while finishing his role in the Preminger film, he immersed himself in the Jean-Claude Forest comics. When Hurry Sundown wrapped, Law flew to Rome, where he lived as a guest of the Vadims at their villa on the Appia Antica, where Forest himself was also in residence. Dino De Laurentiis approved of Fonda's choice for Pygar, but Barbarella itself had such a lengthy period of preproduction, as elaborate sets were built and costumes were made, that Law was able to fit in two starring roles while he waited to don his wings. The first was in Giulio Petroni's Spaghetti Western Da uomo a uomo/Death Rides a Horse (1966), which was immediately followed by Diabolik.

"They did Diabolik just before Barbarella," Law explains. "They said, 'We have this other feature and we're casting for it.' I got the comic book since I was already into a kind of comic book thing anyway. When I was going to do Pygar in Barbarella, I got some old Hawkman comics; I was trying to figure out how the wings would look and how to make it look good; I looked at angels on top of churches, and everything else. The distinctive feature about Diabolik from all the little comics were his eyebrows, you know; he had this kind of wild look on his face with these high eyebrows. So I just looked in the mirror a few times and figured out how to talk with the outside of my eyebrows up. When I went in to see Mario Bava the first time, I held my eyebrows like that practically through the whole interview. He kept saying, 'Look! It's Diabolik!' and I said, 'Yeah, yeah! You got it!'" It surely also suited Bava's sense of irony to hire an actor named Law to play the most audacious of criminals.

As with Pygar, Law prepared for the role by immersing himself in the Diabolik comics. "I read a few of them," he says. "At the time, I didn't read Italian very well—I still don't, but I speak it pretty well. But I'd stumble through and have my friends translate for me. I had a very strong sense of not wanting to disappoint the public when I was playing a character like that. A lot of actors think of it as a vehicle for themselves, but I never thought of it that way. I thought the deeper I could immerse myself in the character, the better job I would be able to do."

Law quickly became aware that his director and producer had duelling concepts for the film they were about to make. "Dino wanted to do a different Diabolik, a commercial movie that could be an international hit, so he told me: 'John, remember David Niven in Raffles?' I couldn't figure out what Raffles had to do with Diabolik, and neither could Bava! Dino had one idea, and Mario had another. I fought for us to stay as close as possible to the comic books, although I wasn't as familiar with the character as I was with, say, Superman or Batman. I felt personally obliged to the fans of the comic to recreate the original character, as much as possible. Dino wanted to do an 'international' film about an 'international' thief, trying to elevate Diabolik to 'international' status, you know? In my opinion, this wasn't going to work, because every country has its own fantasies, its own humor . . . Bava wanted to make a darker, more violent film for a more cultish audience. In the end, after a lot of arguing back and forth, it became a sort of hybrid."

The trademark black skin-tight mask that Law wears in various scenes of the film, and the corresponding white one which he wears while scaling the tower of St. Just Castle, were created especially for him by an uncredited Carlo Rambaldi. Rambaldi took molds of Law's face (and also of stuntman Freddy Unger's face) during preproduction and fashioned the masks from the same rubber used to make scuba masks.

JOHN PHILLIP LAW on the set with the second Eva Kant to be hired, Catherine Deneuve.

Eva Kant, Diabolik's moll and muse, proved a far more problematic role to cast. "Mario always said there were only two actresses who could play the role of Eva—Marilù Tolo and Marisa Mell—but the front office had different ideas," Law reveals. In all, three different women were cast and filmed in the role. The first—whose name has been forgotten—was the attractive blonde protegé of a major Paramount executive.

"She wasn't an actress," Law affirms. "She was a very beautiful model from New York and a friend of [Charles G.] Bluhdorn, the head of Gulf + Western, the parent company of Paramount at that time. He brought this gal over from New York and she was absolutely gorgeous, but she couldn't act. She looked like Vanna White, but she was obsessed with her teeth. She talked about her teeth all the time. We worked together for a few days, then they looked at the rushes and realized it wasn't going to work."

The second actress they tried was considerably better known.

"I also worked for about a week with Catherine Deneuve," Law reveals, smiling at the memory. "I told Roger Vadim about the trouble we were having, finding an actress to play Eva. I think he was instrumental in approaching Catherine for us.[8] I thought she was fine, and I couldn't get over how sweet she was. One day, she saw a hole in my jeans and sewed them for me. People don't believe me now when I tell them that Catherine Deneuve once sewed a hole in my jeans! She belied that cold, exotic beautiful ice queen look that she has in [her] perfume ads. But Mario had a problem with her."

Catherine Deneuve has never spoken on the record about her temporary casting in Diabolik, but when the late Bava historian Carlos Sylva met her at the Cannes Film Festival in the 1980s, he asked her about the experience. These are Deneuve's words, as Sylva reported them to me: "Bava didn't like me at all. I don't like to remember this, but he was actually a little abusive with me. He behaved terribly, calling me a cow in front of everyone and saying that I couldn't act. He didn't seem to find anything about me agreeable, not even the way I walked."

Deneuve's comments indicate that, even before the film was properly underway, Bava was not responding well to the heightened pressures of directing a major motion picture. His impatience with Deneuve may have been curt, but not necessarily unfounded. Anyone familiar with Deneuve's work must admit that she was, even at this early stage of her career, one of the finest actresses of her generation. However, by examining the surviving photographs of her week-long stint on the production, the true nature of the problem is easily grasped. Blonde, knowing and coolly patrician, Deneuve was unable to subdue her own persona to inhabit the character of Eva Kant. Standing beside her clearly enamored co-star in her white vinyl boots and mini-dress, she looks like an Ice Princess to be worshipped—which was not the interpersonal dynamic required between Eva and Diabolik. Deneuve would not have been believable hitch-hiking, or running, or returning to the scene of her lover's death and kneeling before his gold-shrouded remains; in these photos, it is obviously she who is to be adored. Her casting would have badly weakened Diabolik's all-important authority and thrown the film completely off-balance.

CATHERINE DENEUVE in full Eva attire with Diabolik in his cave.

LAW and Deneuve (in a Pop Art dress by Luciana Marinucci and Piero Gherardi).

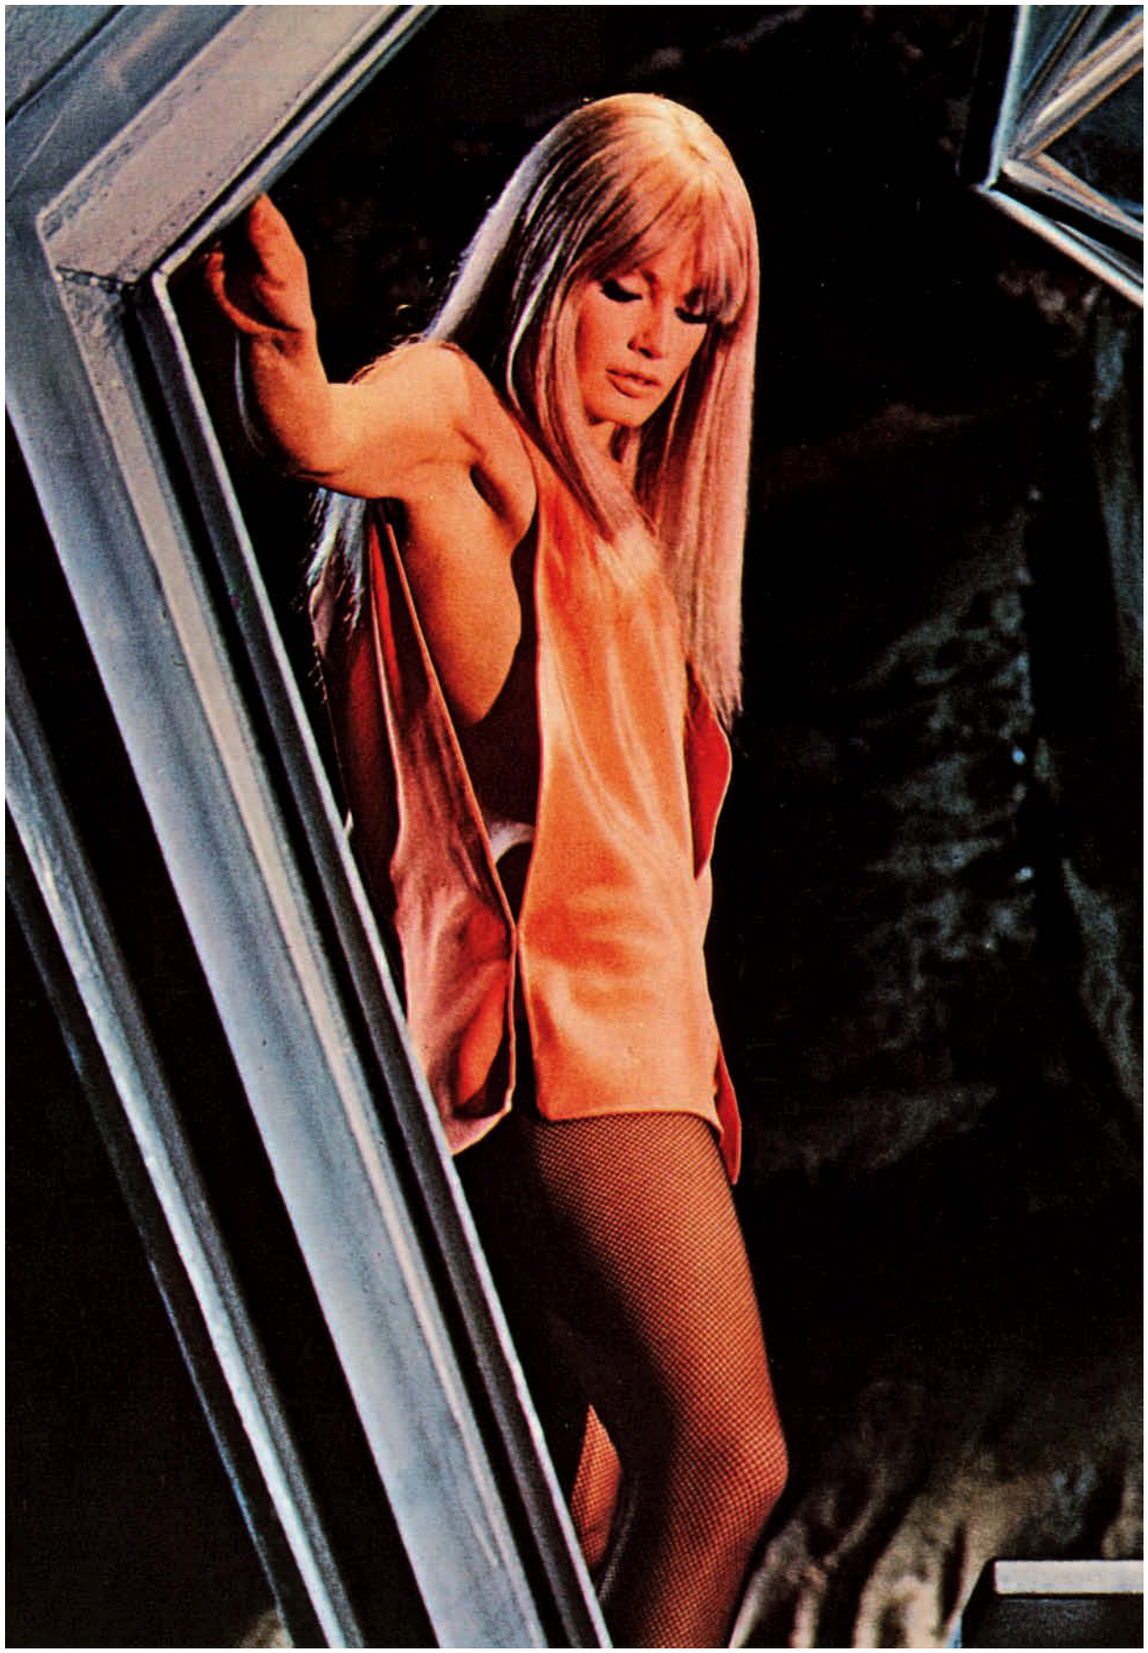
At the end of the week, Deneuve butted heads with Bava for the last time when she flatly refused to participate in one of the movie's most celebrated scenes. In short—as John Phillip Law says, laughing—"She didn't want to fuck in the money."



Bava reminisced about his problems with Deneuve to Luigi Cozzi: "She wouldn't allow me to show so much as her ankle or her calf! Don't even mention her breasts! So we packed her back off to France, and replaced her with Marisa Mell. And do you know what film Deneuve made as soon as she got back to France? Belle de Jour—where they were practically showing every inch of her naked skin under a microscope, so that you couldn't miss a thing! I suppose it takes an actor to understand one."[9]

Perhaps it does. "Catherine may not have been ready for the part," Law reasons. "She had not yet done Belle de Jour. I think if she had done Diabolik after Belle de Jour, she might have been more relaxed, and things might have worked out a little differently."

Law was thinner than usual and had shorter hair in these early stages of production, and he looks this way in isolated shots of the finished film—as Diabolik prepares to deposit the stolen millions in his personal safe before conceiving a better use for the cash, as he drives solo, and as he contacts Valmont from a telephone booth—so shooting evidently proceeded as best it could while a suitable Eva was being sought. With only a minute or two of usable footage in the can after two full weeks of shooting, an exasperated Dino De Laurentiis finally relented on his casting preferences.

8 Catherine Deneuve was, at this time, the ex-wife of Vadim.

9 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 249–60.

MARISA MELL, the perfect Eva Kant.

"Bava wanted very much to have Marilù Tolo, and it was a question of Dino [not wanting her], so then they came to a big compromise with Marisa Mell," says Law. "But from the moment she showed up dressed for work, we knew that everything was going to work out. We fell into each other's arms on the first day, and had a really great relationship on—and off screen, after a while."

Gorgeous Marisa Mell was born Marlies Moitzi in Austria, on February 23, 1939. She graduated from the Max Reinhardt School of Drama at age 17, and had appeared in a number of Austrian and German films (including Helmut Ashley's 1962 Edgar Wallace krimi Das Rätsel der Roten Orchidee/The Puzzle of the Red Orchid, opposite Christopher Lee), making a rapid ascent to English and European productions (including Ken Russell's directorial debut French Dressing, 1963). At this point, her screen career was unexpectedly derailed for nearly two years when she was involved in a violent auto accident in which she nearly lost her right eye. After undergoing plastic surgery (so successful that even lovers like John Phillip Law were unable to detect that any reparations had been done), Mell returned to the screen in Luigi Zampa's Le dolci signore/Anyone Can Play (1966), and probably caught Bava's attention in Giorgio Ferroni's New York chiama Superdrago/Super Agent Super Dragon (1966), which featured Bava alumni Luciano Pigozzi and Jacques Herlin. With her naturally dark hair piled under a radiant blonde wig, the 28-year-old Mell was nothing less than Eva Kant come to life. Onscreen, she and John Phillip Law made a remarkable team: magnetic and exciting, revelling in a mutual attraction that was palpable to audiences, and infectious.

"When I started working on it with [Marisa], everything just came together," Law told me. "We had a kiss during our first scene together [the drive into the underground hideout], and let me tell you, that was a great kiss. Up to then, Mario had been very disappointed with the chemistry between me and the other Evas, but after that take, he came over to us looking very happy. 'Okay,' he said, 'now I've got my Diabolik and I've got my Eva. I'm a dog of a director but I'm good with the camera, so if the two of you will trust me, I think we've got a picture.'"

ADOLFO CELI as the murderous mob boss, Ralph Valmont.

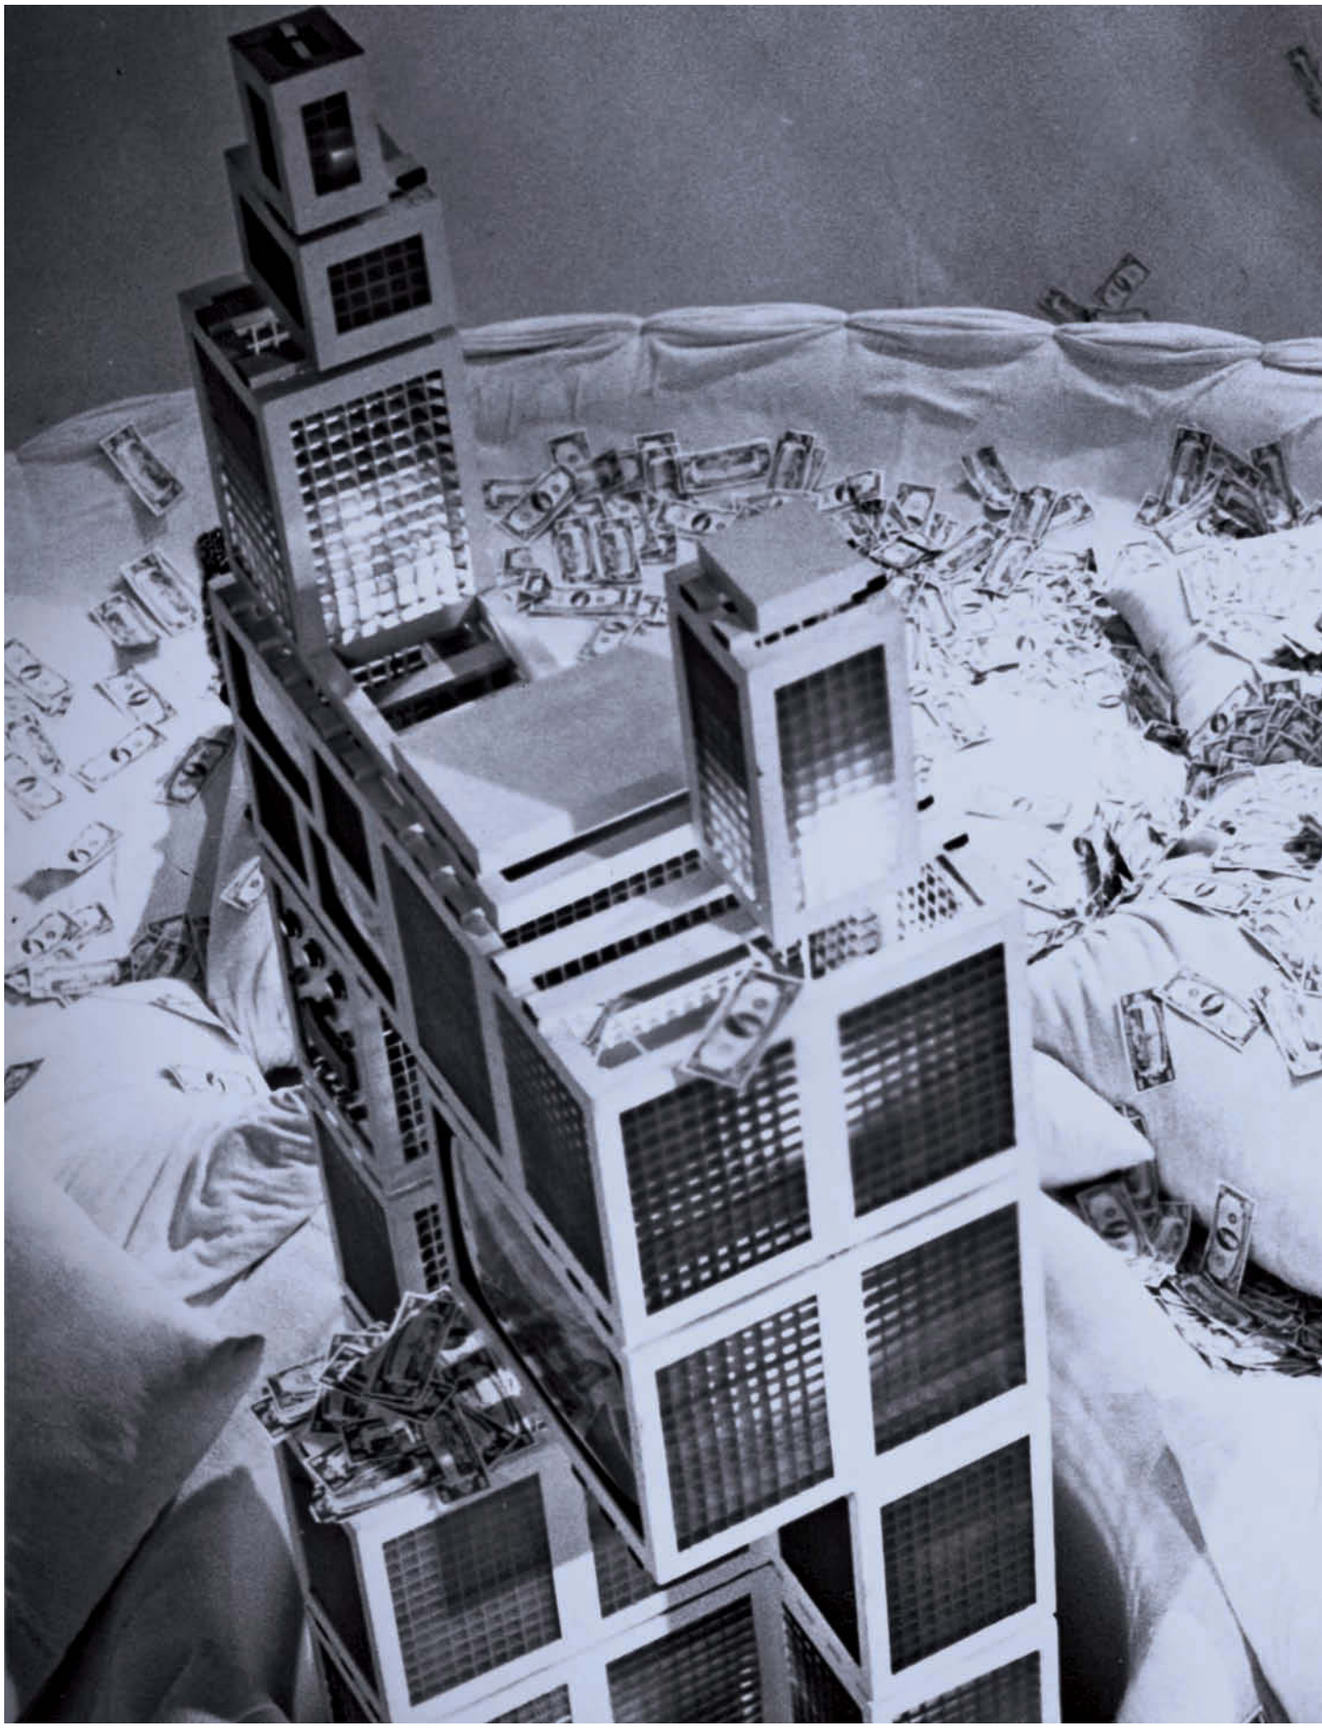
For the duration of the production, Mell and Law lived together, adopting a stray black kitten (which they named Diabolik) found on the beach near Anzio where Diabolik's castle-scaling scene was filmed. After Diabolik, the couple went their separate ways and Mell began to accept more brazenly erotic roles, making softcore adult films well into her 40s and posing nude for various European men's magazines. A heavy smoker, she succumbed to throat cancer on May 16, 1992, at the age of 53. The following year, Paramount released Danger: Diabolik on VHS in the United States and she became a cult figure.

Another actor recommended to the production by Roger Vadim was French actor Michel Piccoli, whom he had directed in La Curée/The Game Is Over (1966), and who had experience acting opposite Catherine Deneuve in Jacques Demy's Les Demoiselles de Rochefort/The Young Girls of Rochefort (1966). Piccoli was signed to play Diabolik's arch-nemesis, Inspector Gingko—whose name was simplified to "Ginco."

Born Jacques Daniel Michel Piccoli in Paris, on December 27, 1925, he made his first film in 1945 but did not ascend to true stardom until his appearance as the screenwriter protagonist of Jean-Luc Godard's Le Mépris/Contempt (1963), opposite Brigitte Bardot. He worked frequently with the Spanish surrealist director Luis Buñuel, beginning with 1956's La Mort en ce Jardin/Death in the Garden and continuing with Le Journal d'une Femme de Chambre/Diary of a Chambermaid (1964), Belle de Jour (1967, in which he played the dull husband of Catherine Deneuve), La Voie lactée/The Milky Way (1969, as the Marquis de Sade), Le Charme Discret de la Bourgeoisie/The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie (1972), and Le Fantôme de la Liberté/The Phantom of Liberty (1974); he also worked for many other notable European directors, including Claude Chabrol (La Décade prodigieuse/Ten Days Wonder, 1972), Marco Ferreri (Liza, La Grand Bouffe) and Louis Malle (Atlantic City). Today, Piccoli continues to act while maintaining a second career as a director–screenwriter in his own right; he has directed and co-written four films since 1991, including La Plage Noir ("The Black Beach," 2001). A talented actor, Piccoli was not required to give a standout performance in Diabolik, as Ginco is not the film's hero. He gives the role a perfectly serviceable interpretation, bland but authoritative; it is difficult to say whether the film might have been more effective, or further unbalanced, had Diabolik been given a more formidable adversary.



Adolfo Celi, still riding high after his enormously successful portrayal of Emilio Largo in Thunderball, was a natural choice to play organized crime boss Ralph Valmont. A Sicilian, Celi was born on July 22, 1922, in Messina and began acting in films shortly after the war. He can be seen briefly as an American soldier in Pietro Francisci's Natale al campo 119 (1947), photographed by Mario Bava, and he had shared billing with John Phillip Law in the omnibus film Tre notti d'amore (1964), co-scripted by I tre volti della paura's Marcello Fondato. His imperfect command of English was still good enough to bring him prominent roles in Von Ryan's Express, The Agony and the Ecstasy and Grand Prix (all made 1965–66), which brought him to the attention of producer Albert R. "Cubby" Broccoli for Thunderball, the biggest James Bond production to date. After that triumph, Celi immediately spoofed his success by lending his presence to Alberto De Martino's O.K. Connery/Operation Kid Brother (1967), which took advantage of the Italian residency of some Bond alumni like Daniela Bianchi (From Russia with Love) and Celi, and the non-exclusive contracts of Bond series regulars Bernard Lee ("M") and Lois Maxwell ("Miss Moneypenny"), to concoct a one-shot star vehicle for Sean Connery's brother, Neil. Silvery-haired, beefy, and with steely blue eyes, Celi became stereotyped as a crime boss and played the role to the hilt in Ad ogni costo/Grand Slam (1967), Midas Run (1969), La mala ordina/The Italian Connection (1972), and many others. In the 1970s, Celi made a concerted effort to change his image, playing lawyers, generals, and police inspectors and he again played opposite Michel Piccoli once again in Luís Buñuel's swan song, Le Fantôme de la Liberté. He continued acting through 1985, and died of a heart attack on February 19, 1986, in Rome. Celi's performance as Valmont is believably ruthless and a valuable asset to the film, though his line readings are compromised by his post-synched English.

MICHEL PICCOLI (center) as Diabolik's adversary, Inspector Ginco.

The international cast was rounded out with the British gap-toothed comedian Terry-Thomas, who filmed his two amusing scenes as the Minister of the Interior and Minister of Finance in a single day. Often cast as a lascivious rogue, rascal, or dandified twit, Thomas Terry Hoar Stevens was born July 14, 1911, in Finchley, near London, and made his earliest screen appearances under his screen name in 1940. By 1949, he had attained enough success to play himself in such films as Helter Skelter and The Queen Steps Out, and he became a television star in the 1950s thanks to regular appearances on How Do You View? (which he also wrote), Strictly T-T, and My Wildest Dream. After becoming a fixture in sex comedies produced and directed by the Boulting brothers, Terry-Thomas fuelled his celebrity with an autobiography (1959's Filling the Gap), and then moved up to large-scale, often international productions, such as George Pal's The Wonderful World of the Brothers Grimm (1962), Stanley Kramer's It's a Mad Mad Mad Mad World (1963), and Those Magnificent Men in Their Flying Machines (1965). Prior to Diabolik, he had appeared in a number of spy pictures—including Don Sharp's Our Man in Marrakesh/Bang! Bang! You're Dead (1966), Henry Levin's Kiss the Girls and Make Them Die (1966), and the makeshift Man From U.N.C.L.E. feature, The Karate Killers (1967)—which made him very appropriate casting. Terry-Thomas ended his career in the late 1970s with Paul Morrissey's comedy The Hound of the Baskervilles (1978, starring Peter Cook and Dudley Moore). In 1980, he announced his retirement by publicly revealing that he had been living with Parkinson's disease for close to a decade. In the late 1980s, the US syndicated series Entertainment Tonight broadcast a tragic story revealing the beloved comedian to be living in nearly destitute conditions, his disease advanced to a completely debilitating stage that required round-the-clock care. He died on January 8, 1990, in Godalming, Surrey.

The bank manager seen in conversation with Ginco in the opening scene is played by Yugoslavian actor Andrea Bosic, who had worked a number of times in Italian films for Riccardo Freda: Maciste all'inferno/Maciste in Hell (1962), Il magnifico avventuriero/The Magnificent Adventurer (1963), Giulietta e Romeo (1964) and Genoveffa di Brabante (1965). Bosic's casting in Diabolik may have been intended as a wink, as one of his most visible recent roles at the time was as Inspector Milton, the Scotland Yard adversary of the eponymous anti-hero of Umberto Lenzi's Kriminal (1966) and Il marchio di Kriminal (1967), which were based on another popular Milanese comic book series by the Giussanis' own arch-rival, Max Bunker (a.k.a. Luciano Secchi).

Bava's good friend, stuntman Goffredo "Freddy" Unger, doubled for John Phillip Law in some masked long-shots that didn't require Law to be on-set, and also in some physically challenging shots, such as the drop from the back of the moving truck and the high dive that preceds the main titles. Unger can also be seen, sans mask, in the opening scene of the undercover policemen disguising themselves as diplomats in the $10,000,000 autocade; he's the third policeman, the one shown straightening his unmatched socks, and is given a top-to-bottom lookover by the camera as Ginco inspects him.

All casting hung on the approval of Dino De Laurentiis, which shows that he and Bava had sympathetic tastes, as Bava was able to hire some of his favorite supporting players. A bouquet of familiar faces can be found in Diabolik, some of them uncredited. Gaunt, scarecrow-like Federico Boido, who played an undead astronaut in Terrore nello spazio, appears as one of Valmont's henchmen (he nonchalantly plugs a machine-gun hole in a jet's fuselage with a wad of chewing gum); Francesco Mulé, who appeared in Le spie vengono dal semifreddo, appears anonymously as the crematorium attendant, who discovers the emeralds in Valmont's ashes; and Robert Buchanan (a.k.a. Walter Williams), the court eunuch of Esther and the King, can be seen supervising the giant gold ingot shipment with Ginco.

DIABOLIK and Eva are in the money, in the film's most celebrated sequence.

CRIME is the ultimate aphrodesiac for Diabolik and Eva.

Production

As Diabolik was in the preproduction stage, Le spie vengono dal semifreddo was released to Italian theaters and became Mario Bava's highest-grossing Italian release ever, which doubtless brought De Laurentiis some joy in his choice of director. Bava took advantage of his success to ensure that he could retain the valued services of his usual camera squad, including Antonio Rinaldi, which Dino permitted in light of their current success, knowing that Bava himself could always step in, were a problem to arise.

Bava also hired, as art director, his old friend Flavio Mogherini, with whom he had not worked since Le meraviglie di Aladino in 1961. After the traumatic events of that production, Mogherini had turned his attention to projects less fabulous but more prestigious, including a pair of neorealist films for Pier Paolo Pasolini (Accattone, Mamma Roma) and the notable omnibus film Laviamochi il cervello/RoGoPaG, jointly helmed by Roberto Rossellini, Jean-Luc Godard, Pasolini, and Ugo Gregoretti (hence its US title). Between 1963 and 1966, Mogherini appears to have temporarily withdrawn from the cinema, for undetermined reasons. In 1966, he returned to active duty as art director of Pasquale Festa Campanile's Il marito è mio e l'ammazzo quando mi pare/Drop Dead, My Love.

MARIO BAVA prepares the "money bed" scene for filming by arranging some faux American currency around his actors to make it more readable for the camera.

In fact, the art direction credit of Diabolik is shared by Mogherini and Piero Gherardi (1909–71), one of the great veterans of Italian production design, whose past triumphs included King Vidor's War and Peace (1956), Mario Monicelli's I soliti ignoti/Big Deal on Madonna Street (1958), and several of Fellini's greatest: Le notti di Cabiria/Nights of Cabiria (1957), La dolce vita (1960), Otto e mezzo/8½ (1963), and Giulietta degli spiriti/Juliet of the Spirits (1965), two of which won him Academy Awards. Gherardi had worked with Bava a few times before, early in both their careers; he designed the sets for two Carlo Ponti productions shot by Bava: Quel bandito sono io! and Miss Italia, both released in 1950.

Diabolik's resplendent, semi-futuristic sets are more suggestive of the past work of Gherardi, which leads one to believe that Mogherini's talents were applied to the field in which Bava first made his acquaintance: miniatures. The film features extensive miniature work, including the foregrounded radio-controlled rock that conceals the entrance to Diabolik's cave, the tunnels leading into the cave, the model of the exploding train and bridge, and so forth. Mogherini's contribution to Diabolik revitalized his career, and he thereafter returned to the cinema full-time. He designed several more pictures—including Machine Gun McCain (1968), Kemek (1970), and Homo Eroticus/Man of the Year (1971)—before making the jump to the director's chair in 1972, a position he held until his death in 1994.

FILM publicist Chuck Painter introduces John and Marisa to Diabolik's latest comic book adventure.

By comparing the second and final draft of the Gates/Degas screenplay (dated December 5, 1966, and titled Goldstrike) to the finished film, it is possible to discern Bava's particular contributions to the narrative.

In the pre-credits heist sequence, the script depicts the transport motorcade as an ordinary armored car carrying $10,000,000 in gold; the film uses the armored car motorcade as the first of many sleight-of-hand diversions, with the payload being transported in a Rolls-Royce, in cash. This clever amendment, with the police posing as a foreign diplomat and his entourage, not only shows the extraordinary measures which the law is required to take in order to avoid Diabolik, but by depicting the fortune as cash rather than gold, Bava simultaneously renders the later giant ingot scheme less redundant and sets the stage for the celebrated scene of Diabolik and Eva making love in their stolen fortune. This bed scene, incidentally, is not represented in the script and thus was entirely Bava's own invention.

On page 14 of the script, a color suggestion is made: "In general, all of Diabolik's accoutrements are black, all Eva's—white." Judging from the test stills of Catherine Deneuve, this concept was retained throughout preproduction and early production; it was abandoned at some point after the arrival of Marisa Mell, who wears various colors in the film, particularly orange. However, the black/white scheme is cleverly utilized onscreen with Diabolik and Eva's matching Jaguars. When Diabolik drives his black car into a mountain tunnel, he meets Eva inside with her white car, and they send the original getaway car over the cliff via remote control before continuing in their motorized disguise. Curiously, a similar moment occurs in "True or Falseface," a first season episode of ABC-TV's Batman, in which Falseface (Malachi Throne), a villainous master of disguise, drives his dark getaway van behind a building, only to have it emerge on the other side as white, recolored by unexplained, magical means.

Perhaps in a nod to Dr. No (1962)—in which the eponymous villain's hideout displayed a painting then in the national headlines as being stolen—the script refers to a wall in Diabolik's cave being stacked with "heaps of money bags," including "the thick grey Royal Mail bags which Diabolik took in the Great British Train Robbery."[10] This may seem an odd detail, as most of the twenty perpetrators of the Great British Train Robbery (the biggest robbery in history, which took place on August 8, 1963, and involved the theft of £7,500,000 in small denomination pound notes) were captured and sentenced to a collective 300 years in prison; however, the mastermind behind the operation—later revealed to be a professional thief named Bruce Reynolds—succeeded in eluding the authorities until 1968. Thus, Gates and Degas were wittily crediting the triumph of this bold crime to Diabolik.

During the press conference which Diabolik and Eva upset with "exhilarating gas," the script has them don small protective masks prior to gassing the room; Bava replaced

JOHN and Marisa pose with Diabolik, a kitten they adopted during production.

10 Brian Degas and Tudor Gates, Diabolik, final draft screenplay, 16.

these cumbersome devices with "anti-exhilarating gas pills."

A scene of Ginco busting Valmont-employed lorry drivers at the shipping docks for smuggling narcotics inside fish was abandoned.

The psychedelic discothèque seen in the film was scripted as taking place in a casino. Here, a group of old and middle-aged men are described as playing "The Royal Game of the Goose" on a giant board with scantily clad young women as the game pieces.

In the script, Eva reminds Diabolik of her upcoming birthday, whereas in the film, it is Diabolik who reminds her. This is a better approach, as it better underscores Diabolik's devotion to her. As they watch television in their hideout, Eva calls Lady Clark an "ugly bitch" (a line omitted in the film, as it would have made Eva less attractive in character), and her necklace is made not of emeralds, as in the film, but of black pearls. (This allows them to stand out more effectively in the later shot revealing them in Valmont's white, cremated ashes.) The theft of the necklace is also depicted far more crudely than in the film, with Diabolik snatching the necklace directly off the neck of Lady Clark, to whom he says, "Thank you. I hope you're insured."

The script finds Eva injured while working out on an exercise bicycle, not while setting up the makeshift mirror roadblock with Diabolik. She goes to Dr. Vernier, whose receptionist informs Valmont; in the film, she is turned in by Vernier himself—his betrayal of Diabolik's woman underscoring the extent to which he has been intimidated by Valmont. The script contains no suggestions of Eva's guard at the cabin being a sadist, trying to burn her with cigarettes and so forth, so this was also likely Bava's addition.

The scene involving the Minister of Finance was scripted as a conversation between he and Ginco, but was later rewritten as a televised plea by the Minister to the public, beseeching everyone to pay the taxes they feel they owe. With Terry-Thomas cast in the role, it made far better use of his comedic talents to restage the scene in this way. Though the scene is very funny, it fades out before reaching any kind of adequate conclusion and makes a disappointing exit from the film for the comedian.

The script finds Diabolik being hailed as a national hero for making fools of the police and government, and he later hijacks the gold ingot from a train with 600 people aboard. The underwater sequence is much briefer and not as elaborate in the script. Diabolik and Eva move the huge ingot inside a prefabricated cottage that communicates with their hideout. In one of the screenplay's most amusing lines, Eva looks at the massive plunder and notes, "As our only piece of furniture, it's rather space consuming . . . !" The proximity between the cottage front and the cave allows Ginco and his men to find their way into Diabolik's hideout simply by finding the ingot. The climax generally plays out as filmed, although Eva does not return to pay homage to her gold-encased lover inside the hideout. Instead, the script finds her seeking out the gold-encased Diabolik in the Hall of Ministry, where he has been placed on permanent display.

In general, a comparison of the script and film indicates that Bava was largely responsible for making all of the characters more real and sympathetic, the situations even more fabulous, and accentuating the film's sense of fun, in its staging as well as its incidental dialogue. Almost without exception, the film's most memorable lines appear to have been added by Bava, including Valmont's line about dropping Vernier "from the human register," and Diabolik's poetic appraisal of his thermal protective outfit: "With this suit, I could swim through the center of the sun." Bava was also careful to remove any hint of negativity from the depiction of his anti-heroes, who comport themselves very much to public approval, in the spirit of surreal anarchists rebelling against the strictures of government—the creative rebelling against the mundane and unimaginative.

For Diabolik, Bava was granted the most indulgent budget of his career, but he was kept on a tight leash—in fact, a couple of tight leashes. One of these was the result of his own past experience of making films with more ingenuity than cash, and the other was the arch-conservatism of the De Laurentiis organization.

"The only film I ever shot with true economic ease, without any concern for budget, was Diabolik," Bava confessed. "They placed about $3,000,000 at my disposal, but I was so used to working with little money, I spent no more than $400,000!" [11]

With great amounts of money comes great responsibility, whether one uses it or not, and Bava quickly learned that he wasn't cut out for this more responsible level of filmmaking. Though the equivalent of $3,000,000

◀ DIABOLIK prepares Eva for the birthday gift of Lady Clark's emerald necklace.

BRITISH comic actor Terry-Thomas has a few amusing scenes as the Minister of the Interior, an exemplar of the corrupt and incompetent government opposed by Diabolik.

11 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

was allotted for the film, every expense had to be proposed and explained beforehand, and accounted for afterwards. Gone was Bava's former freedom to act impulsively on new ideas, to improvise, to throw away the script. Everything that crossed his mind required Dino's okay before it could be put into action. Bava got along quite well with De Laurentiis, according to Lamberto Bava, but he was perpetually aggravated by the fact that Dino was not always available, having other films in various stages of production, preproduction, and post-production at Dinocittà and elsewhere throughout the world, all at the same time.

"Between one thing and another, they kept me dancing for months and months—I, who made Operazione paura in twelve days!" Bava later complained. "And it wasn't as if they were paying me extraordinary expenses. I had very few means available to me. Imagine how I had to get by, inventing everything with trickery, because the production company gave me nothing to work with! Nothing!" [12]

This is apparently why, in the name of expediency, Bava resorted to creating some of the film's key sets himself, by means of illusion. For the opening shot, Bava supervised the creation of two hanging maquettes which provide the illusion of the two buildings framing the action of the armored motorcade. The scene was actually staged on the exterior grounds of Dinocittà, where there were no buildings, with the vehicles driving within marked "safe" areas that preserved the illusion. Portions of these maquettes were later reused in the montage of exploding government buildings.

By far the most elaborate of the film's illusions is Diabolik's fabulous underground hideout. In the screenplay, it is described thusly:

> Camera moves with EVA, away from the garage with its curved, polished steel walls supporting the camouflage of the mound, to the GROTTO with its soft air conditioned hiss.
>
> Chromium plated girders bear the weight of the mass of rock and earth above. EVA's reflection shimmers in the blue water of the beautiful appointed swimming pool.
>
> She passes through the glass, electrically operated doors into the living room, low-ceilinged. Here the girders are faced by wood panelling, reflecting the warm glow of the concealed lighting. There is a tasteful mixture of superb modern pieces and beautiful antiques, the waiting theme being the rich perfection of everything. Soft music drowns the faint hiss of the air conditioning, a slow, romantic, dreamy version of the DIABOLIK MUSICAL THEME. [13]

The hideout seen in the finished film is considerably more spectacular than the ordinary basement recreation room described in the script; a tour de force of Bava and Mogherini's combined scenic imagination. "I swear to you," Bava assured Luigi Cozzi, "it was all done with mattes—photos that I retouched and cut-up on the spur of the moment, improvising to improve upon the impoverished quality of the sets, which I glued to a piece of glass in front of the camera."

"I remember, one time, they called off work for about three days," recalls John Phillip Law. "I said, 'What's going on?' and they said, 'Never mind, stay at home. Mario's working. We'll call you when we need you.' When I came back a couple of days later, I walked onto this big empty set. There wasn't a set, you know? There was a camera, but there were no props, nothing except the place where they put the Jaguar. Then they said, 'C'mon up here and take a look!' I climbed up [onto the catwalk] and took a look through his camera. He had two big pieces of glass that held all these cutouts of that whole cave where Diabolik lived! And when Dino saw that in the rushes, I remember I was sitting in the back [of the screening room] and he was going, 'Ahhh! I'm going to tell Paramount this set cost $200,000!' And he could have easily done it!"

The entrance to Diabolik's cave utilized a combination of locations. The entrance was filmed on a roadside with a natural declension; in the foreground of the shot was placed a miniature, radio-controlled rockbed that could be opened and closed like a box lid from a switchboard. When the miniature was operated, the Jaguar was driven behind it in forced perspective, creating the illusion that it was moving on to a ramp availed by the secret entrance. The Jaguar is next shown driving into actual cavern surroundings, which were shot on location in the caves beneath Rome's Viale

MARIO BAVA at work on the elaborate glass matte and maquette construction that is Diabolik's cave.

WHO says crime doesn't pay? Diabolik and Eva relax on their giant revolving bed. ▶

12 Cozzi.

13 Degas and Gates, 14–15.

DIABOLIK changes color to camouflage his climb to the residence of Sir Harold and Lady Clark, in search of a birthday present for Eva.

Libio, where the climactic scenes of I coltelli del vendicatore had been filmed. What follows are a combination of live automobile interiors and miniature exteriors as a toy Jaguar rolls through various fabulous tunnels and elevators. The area where the car finally settles was a near-empty stage, with only the borders of the passage built to keep the car aligned with the mattes, as well as an aluminum-colored stairwell to accommodate Marisa Mell's exit from the shot. She walked up the stairs onto an ordinary backlit catwalk, which was blocked from the camera's view by a hanging maquette of a steel, streamlined passage with opaque windows; as the scene unfolds, she appears to be entering and walking through the maquette. Some of the more fabulous trappings of Diabolik's cave—like his combination safe—had to be built from scratch, but many of the unusual devices on display therein were made up of little more than everyday household items, such as smoke alarms, electric fan grilles, plastic hoops, and art supplies, some of them carried over from Terrore nello spazio—including the door of the spaceship Argos, which shows up as a ceiling fixture.

Bava was also pressed into action by the dictum that money can't buy everything. "I could never find the scenery that I wanted, so I took care of that by hanging silhouettes of houses, cut out of cardboard, over a sheet of glass in front of the camera." [14]

Law remembers an instance of this, as well: "We were out on a hillside, one day . . . I was doing the scene where I come down in a parachute, gather everything up and go running up to this cabin to rescue Eva. Mario couldn't find a cabin that he liked. They went out and looked for some cabins, but he didn't like this and he didn't like that . . . Finally, he said, 'Let's break for lunch; give me a magazine' and he cut a little cabin, maybe an inch-and-a-half high, out of a Camel cigarette ad. He glued it on one little sheet of glass—you know, about 2' x 2'—stuck it there and then he put a platform up on the hill behind it. He said, 'Look, John—just run up there, walk up those two steps, step forward onto the platform and then don't move—because you'll be masked by this little thing on the glass.' Sure enough, I went up there and, you know, [on film] it looked like I was banging on the door and I stepped inside and that was it. The cabin wasn't even there. I was just standing in space there on a little box!"

14 Cozzi.

MARIO BAVA camping it up in a footman's powdered wig, to the amusement of Michel Piccoli.

Bava worked his magic similarly in the earlier scene of Diabolik meeting with Valmont's men outside their private plane. The best way to explain the magic is to state, very simply, that no plane was rented for use in the film. The action on the airstrip was shot outdoors on the grounds of Dinocittà, with the actors standing behind a large glass matte where the wing and a portion of the hull of a prop plane was painted. Production stills reveal that a glass matte was also painted to show the plane in flight, as Diabolik awaited it on the ground below; the plan may have been to move the glass matte on a dolly, to "animate" the plane, but for whatever reason, the shot was sacrificed. The shots of characters dropping through the trap door in Valmont's plane were shot on a miniature floor with an articulated trap door, positioned above a rotating matte painting of the ground below; by stepping through the film one frame at a time, it is easy to identify the falling figures as ordinary store-bought G. I. Joe dolls, redressed in appropriate clothing, but the editing is so precise, the illusion is successful.

John Phillip Law remembers that Dinocittà was revving up for Barbarella at this time by acquiring various new-fangled effects equipment for its facility, including elaborate blue screen and front projection systems. The studio was also a warehouse for equipment left over from earlier De Laurentiis productions. One piece of archaic equipment that Law remembers less than fondly were a set of "wind machines" that had previously done duty on La Bibbia/The Bible . . . In the Beginning—and perhaps in the second World War, as well.

"YOU can tell by looking at this picture how well we got along," says John Phillip Law of this photo from his personal collection.

LECHEROUS Uncle Augusto lives again, as Mario Bava pretends to pounce on Marisa Mell in this gag production shot.

"They were like the front end of B51 Mustangs that had been scrapped after WWII. The wings and the fuselage were mostly gone; it was just like the cockpit and the engine compartments basically, and the propeller. They had this thing out there and the idea was that they would shoot me, lying on my side, opening the parachute with the blue sky behind me; they wanted to see the parachute pop open. They had the wind machine in front of me, and I was wearing a parachute harness while laying on this flatbed truck; they were shooting at just enough of an angle to miss the truck. Well, first of all, it took half a day to get the engine started on this wind machine, so that kind of slowed everybody down and got everybody a bit frustrated. When the guys finally got the thing cranked over, it made a heck of a noise! Bava had earphones on and everything else . . . When it fired up, the wind machine caught the canopy of the parachute, and I was attached to the top of the truck—they tied me to it, so I wouldn't blow off—but they didn't calculate the fact that the parachute . . . I mean, it adjusted every vertebrae in my back from the base of my spine to the top of my neck! When the thing caught, I went 'Wha . . . ?' and they said, 'Roll 'em, shoot'—and I didn't look very much like Diabolik, because I was hollering 'cause they were stretching me out like a rubber band! That thing was really powerful. I was yelling 'Cut! Cut! Cut!' but nobody could hear me, 'cause the guy was so happy after trying for three hours to get this thing going, he was gunning it—rrrrrr! Rrrrrrr! There were crew guys running and waving to get him to stop. It took him a couple of minutes to slow it down. I just gritted my teeth and hung on and hoped I wasn't going to be in two pieces by the time it was over."

Law had a much easier time filming the sequence of Diabolik's precarious scaling of the tower of St. Just Castle, home to Sir Harold and Lady Clark. Essentially a contemporary remake of Erik's (Giorgio Ardisson's) suspenseful dagger-assisted climb of Lord Rutford's castle walls in Gli invasori, the sequence was achieved in much the same way. The castle itself never existed: the exterior views of the premises were suggested by two glass mattes; the oceanside view utilized a photograph of a castle clipped from a magazine, while the view from the prostitutes' work station and Diabolik's low-angle POV of the tower were both air-brushed paintings. The wall scaled by Diabolik was a convex section of material positioned on a beachfront slope at an angle of approximately 35°, allowing him to scale it easily, without having to be doubled by Freddy Unger. The scene was shot day-for-night on location, with a wide-angle lens for the high-angle shots, to exaggerate their sense of depth and thus create a false sense of height. Close inserts of the suction grips were added later in the studio, as was a side view of the climb which Law re-enacted against a blueback, allowing a background of ocean footage to be optically inserted.

One of the more ambitious trick shots was of the "Operation Goldvan" train crossing over the high bridge rigged for explosion. The bridge was a scale model, the train was a toy train painted to resemble the real one used in the preceding footage, and the set-up was filmed through a glass matte with air-brushed clouds, to layer the illusion. The explosion that occurred on-set, filmed by high-speed cameras, was evidently unsatisfactory, as it was beefed-up in post-production with an animated, optical overlay explosion. While not a realistic bit of demolition, the optical element gives the act of destruction a comic book feel that doesn't seem out of place.

When Diabolik was released in January 1968, it earned a not overly impressive 285 million lire [$178,000] at the Italian boxoffice; Vadim's Barbarella, when it was released the following October, would earn nearly three times as much. However, if one were to compare the expenditure-to-earning ratios of the two films, Diabolik was by far the more profitable of the two—at least until Barbarella's greater success in the home video era, due largely to its notorious anti-gravity striptease by Jane Fonda.

"Diabolik wasn't a flop, but wasn't a hit, either," estimates Lamberto Bava. "It did well enough, though De Laurentiis, who loved going into the editing room and following the whole process, was certain that Diabolik was going to be a masterpiece." Indeed, although De Laurentiis was a frequent presence on the set during production and a regular visitor to the editing room, he was still taken by surprise when presented with the film's final cost, which was in stark contrast to the sum he had allotted. He immediately offered Bava the balance of the budget to produce a sequel. At the time the offer came, Bava was exhausted by the demands made of him throughout the production by De Laurentiis' front office ("Worse than a ministry," he called it) and refused to work again under such strenuous conditions. "I informed [De Laurentiis] that Diabolik was immobilized, that he was suffering from a permanent disability—that he was dead!" Bava explained. [15] In a subsequent interview, Bava suggested the true extent of his identification with the anti-hero: "De Laurentiis tried to cajole me into directing a sequel, but I told him I was sick, sick in bed. Permanently!" [16]

DIABOLIK prepares to meet Valmont's plane . . . but how to film a plane without renting one? Bava and crew gather to execute a layered glass matte painting. Photo in top left corner shows Valmont's jet in flight, a trick shot cut from the final assembly. ▶

THIS PROMOTIONAL shot of Marisa Mell shows the actress in a bisected Jaguar situated in front of a blue screen on a Dinocittà sound stage.

Music

Diabolik is remarkable as the only collaboration between the Italian cinema's greatest fantasy director and its most gifted and prolific composer, Ennio Morricone. Born November 10, 1928, in Trastavere, Morricone began composing original music at the prodigious age of 6. At the age of 12, he began his studies at the Accademia di Santa Cecilia, where he studied trumpet and composition. As a musician, his academic performance was above average (he received his diploma in trumpet in 1946, earning 7 out of 10 points), but he truly excelled in orchestration and composition (receiving these diplomas respectively in 1952 and 1954, receiving a respective 9 and 9.5 out of 10). Morricone married in 1956 and worked as a musician, performing in various Roman nightclubs, before progressing to composing and arranging scores for RAI Televizione. From the late 1950s to the early '60s, he worked as an arranger at RCA Records, working on recordings by such artists as Mario Lanza, Paul Anka, and Catherine Spaak. His first film score was for Lionello Salce's Il federale/The Fascist (1961). In 1962, he scored Bernardo Bertolucci's first feature, Prima della rivoluzione/Before the Revolution, and in the following year, he scored his first Italian Western, Ricardo Blasco's Duello nel Texas (1963), which he was obliged to sign with an American-sounding pseudonym, "Dan Savio." These early years were spent repeatedly scoring films for Salce and also Camillo Mastrocinque, for whom he would later score the Barbara Steele horror film, Amanti d'oltretomba/Nightmare Castle (1965), which Morricone later declared as one of his own favorite works.

While working at RCA in 1963, Morricone was introduced to an American musician named Peter Tevis, a guitarist and vocalist whose lack of success in his homeland prompted him to explore the opportunities available to him abroad. To make his music more interesting to the European palate, he perfected a blending of American bluegrass and Spanish flamenco, which he demonstrated for Morricone in an audition performance of Woody Guthrie's "Pastures of Plenty." Morricone subsequently arranged for the song to be released on the RCA label in 1963. During this period, Morricone was keen to score the forthcoming film of his childhood schoolmate Sergio Leone, the seminal Spaghetti Western Per un pugno di dollari/A Fistful of Dollars (1964), but Leone—who was familiar with the American-sounding scores Morricone had written as "Dan Savio"—was not interested. Morricone then convinced him to visit him, for old times' sake, and played for him "Pastures of Plenty," which came as a eureka to Leone and subsequently became the main theme of Per un pugno di dollari. With this vivid reinvention of Western music, Morricone would become the definitive Italian Western composer.

In 1965, Morricone and ten colleagues formed the "Gruppo de Improvisazione Nuova Consonanza," an exploratory musical collective devoted to the study of new musical developments, unusual instrumentation, and instrumental combinations. A kind of classical "super-group," the GdINC would continue, with a revolving door of participants, well into the 1970s, releasing records and sometimes producing music that later resurfaced in Morricone's official scoring work, one notable example being Enzo G. Castellari's thriller Gli occhi freddi della paura/Cold Eyes of Fear (1971). Morricone's work with the GdINC was also a notable influence on his contribution to Diabolik, which is remarkable for its boundless musical invention and reinvention, as well as its uses of unusual instrumentation.

By the time Morricone came to Diabolik, his work had become quite famous in Italy, and he had risen in station to write the music for such important directors as Gillo Pontecorvo (La battaglia di Algieri/The Battle of Algiers, 1965), Pier Paolo Pasolini

◀ DIABOLIK emerges from the sea with suction cups at the ready to facilitate a precarious climb.

15 Volta.

16 Cozzi.

(Ucchellacci e ucchellini/Hawks and Sparrows, 1966), and of course, Sergio Leone, notably the remaining two entries in their "Dollars Trilogy." Priding himself on working only with the best in his profession, Dino De Laurentiis signed Morricone to a non-exclusive contract in 1966, beginning with Le streghe/The Witches. Morricone would have surely scored Diabolik in any case, but it certainly didn't hurt his chances that he had also scored the James Bond spoof O.K. Connery.

The Diabolik screenplay is full of specific references to various cues, detailed enough in their descriptions to suggest the score may have been written before a single frame was shot. Tudor Gates was insistent, however, that he heard no music in advance of writing. "I always specify music cues where I want them to point up the dramatic action," he explained. "I find composers are more amenable to suggestions than directors. I did not meet Morricone, that I remember, although I may have done and not registered it was Morricone, if you know what I mean."

Just as Diabolik itself is a celebration of pop culture, Morricone's score can be read as a celebration of the manic diversity of Italian popular cinema. It takes a main theme and then proceeds to reinvent it, scene by scene—as a lush romantic ballad, a comic jaunt, a psychedelic siren song, a jangly Spaghetti Western anthem with full vocal choir, and so on. There are other cues as well, which pay implicit hommages to such signposts of the time as Batman (it is possible that Morricone was able to hear Neal Hefti's theme before scoring the film), acid rock, and also Schoenbergian atonality.

The film's main theme, "Deep Down," is a sultry vocal ballad—sung by "Christy" (Maria Christina Brancucci, who had likewise performed the main theme vocal for O.K. Connery)—that was recorded in at least three different languages: Italian, French, and English. When I first saw the film in the early 1970s, I found the song cloying and inappropriate, as it made no direct comment on the action preceding the main titles or the film's characters. But the more familiar one becomes with the film, the song becomes increasingly lovable and infectious. The forceful, decidedly sultry vocal line is underscored with an assertive distorted electric guitar (played by Alessandro Alessandroni) repeating a three-note riff, played twice with a return to the first note, which lends the piece an undercurrent of strength and optimism. The vocal lines are likewise repetitive, but the vocal itself is aspiring and passionate, and given additional muscle by a diversion into a trickier time-signature as the song enters its middle-eight. The bridge introduces an unexpected element of sitar, a distinctly Indian flavor doubtless inspired by George Harrison's Indian pop experiments within The Beatles. This Indian coloring of the music, also played by the violins and violas of the orchestral string section, also recurs in other contexts throughout the score, suggesting Diabolik's life of crime as a form of enlightenment, a state of nirvana, a religion. The Italian version of the song was released in Italy as a single on the Parade label, with a track from a different Morricone score on the B-side.

DIABOLIK composer Ennio Morricone.

Throughout the film, the "Deep Down" theme is reprised in a variety of guises. As the Jaguar first enters the hideout, it is revisited as a soft and wistful theme with flute, acoustic guitar, sitar and sitar-pitched violin accompaniment, the "Deep, Deep Down" chorus chiming in as the car proceeds down the ramp. A more lush, romantic vocal take accompanies the shots of the two criminals showering. For the lovemaking scene on the money bed, the piece is more strikingly reinvented in the manner of a Spaghetti Western anthem, beginning with ambient, moody organ (played by Bruno Nicolai, who orchestrated and conducted the score) that explodes into the main theme being played on electric guitar as a 4/4 rhythm is tapped out on a high-hat, with a "wa-wa" chorus sweeping in as the full rock accompaniment begins. The theme returns during Eva's swim in the cavern pool as a softer, slower, more melancholy version with Christy singing a melisma in place of the lyrics, over a silken, dreamlike string accompaniment. There is also a spirited, peppier version of the cue heard during the preliminaries of two heist sequences. The final variant, heard as Eva returns to the cave to see her defeated lover, is introduced on solo electric organ with gradual orchestral accompaniment, and finally a luxuriantly warm and loving reading of the piece as she embraces the gold encasing him. A remarkably flexible composition, "Deep Down" becomes, in the final analysis, Eva's love song to Diabolik.

A Batman-like chase theme has a rhythm section provided by Alessandroni's double-tracked electric guitar, repeating a frenetic call-and-answer pattern over a high-powered drum kit, while the lead parts are traded between a caterwauling trumpet (anticipating sounds that Miles

WEARING a protective thermal suit that would allow him to swim through the center of the sun, Diabolik is accidentally covered in an explosion of molten gold—a shrine visited by Eva, in luxurious mourning wear in the final scene. ▶

Davis would begin to explore with his electric band in the early 1970s) and thunderous, reverberating stings of electric guitar. As the cue progresses, a ghostly, siren-song melisma by Christy is added. A simplified version of the track, perhaps a demonstration recording, is also heard, with the double-tracked guitar playing unaccompanied over a simple staccato high-hat pattern.

A police siren introduces the scene at Valmont's nightclub, segueing into a splendidly anthemic psychedelic number, boldly played in solid 4/4 time with a full vocal chorus providing the only melody over a rhythm section of electric fuzz bass and drum kit. The music, recorded with Phil Spector-like "wall of sound" reverb to make the musical performers sound about five times their actual number, then replaces the vocals with brass, at first playing in concert and then trading parts in a complementary fractured way, before the choir resumes.

During the scene of Valmont's pool party, a vocal song can be faintly heard in the background, playing over a turntable or radio, which the casual viewer may not perceive as an actual Morricone composition—but it is. As if chosen to bring a secret smile to the lips of his most attentive audience, the song is actually Morricone's main theme for an earlier Dino De Laurentiis production, Thrilling (1965), an omnibus film co-directed by Carlo Lizzani, Gian Luigi Polidoro, and Ettore Scola. The Polidoro segment, "Sadik," is about the efforts of a neglected husband to win back the attentions of a fumetti-loving wife by posing as the Diabolik-like criminal hero of her favorite comic, Sadik—essentially the same story later retold by Vittorio De Sica in his segment of Le streghe, which featured the very first screen appearance of Diabolik. The vocalist on this cue, incidentally, is not Christy, but Rita Monico.

The film's most experimental cue is heard during the Identikit sequence, consisting of a choppy, atonal electric keyboard "freak out" (to quote one of the bootleg CDs), played by Bruno Nicolai over soft-malleted drums.

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by Renato Casaro.

The scene of Diabolik's ascent up the wall of Lord and Lady Clark's castle is scored by a full orchestra, playing a shapeless, low-key, atmospheric piece in which pulsing woodwinds, made to sound like the nocturnal sighing of birds and crickets, evolves into a subtle orchestral restatement of the sitar-theme from "Deep Down," its mysterioso character occasionally disturbed by thundering reverberations from Alessandroni's electric guitar, synchronized to Diabolik's slipping during his precarious climb.

During the submarine abduction of the giant ingot, another vocal melisma is heard, this time courtesy of the incomparable Edda dell'Orso. Her ethereal scat-singing is initially supported by murky, amorphous orchestral accompaniment, which is then abruptly replaced by a ¾ drum beat and an infectious vocal chorus by his choir, I Cantori Moderni ("Wo-wo-WO-Wo, WO-wo-wo . . ."). After an initial, sparse vocal statement of the theme, a traditional rock band accompaniment with electric piano kicks in to present a fully developed theme that feels closely allied to Morricone's Spaghetti Western work while also feeling perfectly at home in an espionage milieu. Additional parts for brass and woodwinds are heard in the fluttering middle-eight. In a score boasting several outstanding compositions, this one is perhaps the most impressive.

At the time of Diabolik's original release, Morricone's contribution to the film attracted little attention and probably did little for his career. However, when Paramount Home Video first released Danger: Diabolik on VHS in 1992, the youth culture was rediscovering '60s "lounge" and "space age bachelor pad" music and Morricone's inexhaustibly rich score suddenly fell on open ears; it was enthusiastically rediscovered and praised as a work at least thirty years ahead of its time. Today, it is one of the Maestro's most beloved soundtracks, and also regarded by soundtrack collectors as a "holy grail" of sorts.

The score's admirers have refused to allow the loss of the original tapes (which are said to have been destroyed in a 1970s warehouse fire) to prevent them from enjoying the music. In recent years, several bootleg CDs have been released, all featuring different configurations of cues lifted from the home video releases. The first of these originated from the VHS release, or an even poorer source, and is the least listenable of the three. The second, working from the cleaner LaserDisc master, is an extremely short production consisting of four "suites" cobbled together from the film music, eliminating the dialogue sound bytes and not including a good deal of uninterrupted music found in the movie itself. The third and most widely circulated of the discs is the best; a limited edition of 2,222 copies, it contains 33 tracks of music and dialogue (and an unrelated, unnumbered bonus MIDI track) and is attributed to Palottolo Foro of Italy. This version, with approximately 39 minutes of music and a total running time of 47:50, is prevented from being an ideal listening experience only by the dialogue excerpts, but can be programmed to skip over the sound bytes. It does an otherwise commendable job of collecting what music from the film is available from various sources. Showing surprising resourcefulness and dedication, Palottolo Foro reached back to the original theatrical release for the English-language version of "Deep Down" (played in a different key than the film version, and given a more sparkling mix), and also included the Italian version directly for its 45 rpm release on Italy's Parade label, throwing in the title cut from O.K. Connery (also from its Parade 45 release) as a relevant bonus. At least one of the other bootlegs in release is a repackaged copy of this disc. So great is the potential market for an official release of this music that these unofficial releases have sometimes fetched $60 or more when offered on the Internet auction site, eBay.

US half-sheet poster, art by renowned Western artist Frank McCarthy.

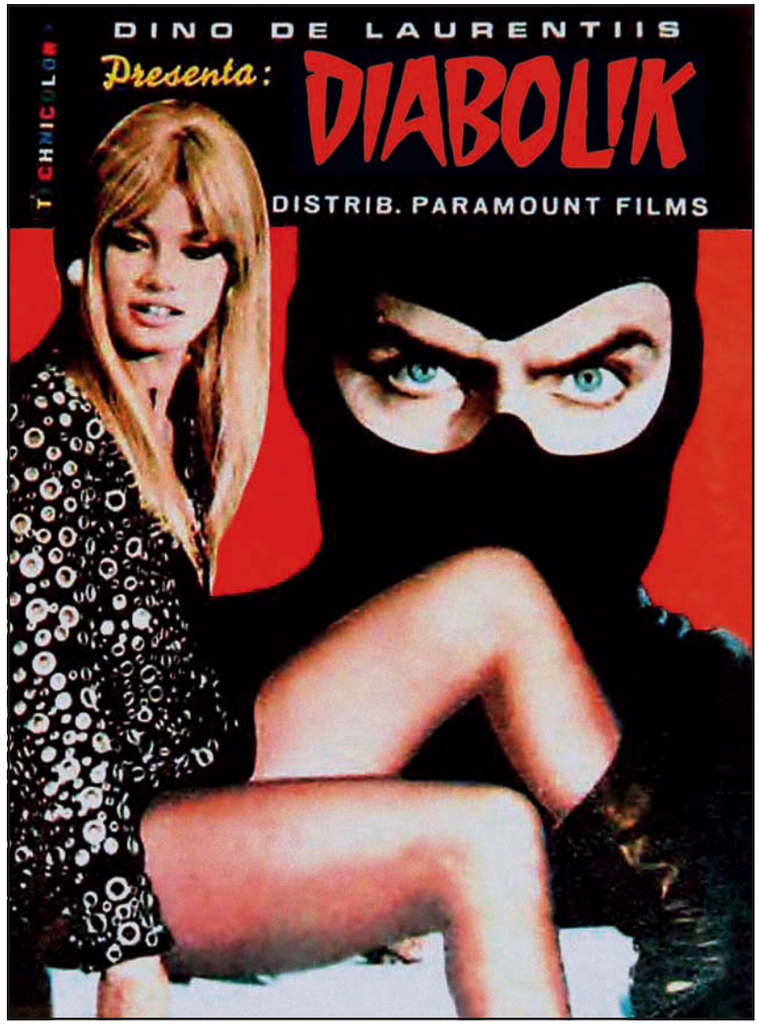
Even more remarkably, when the March 2002 issue of the popular men's magazine GQ offered a list of the Top 10 Movie Soundtracks of all time, Morricone's officially unreleased Diabolik was listed as #3.

Commentary



Considered a disappointment at the time of its original release, Diabolik has aged remarkably well and is now generally regarded as the best of Bava's light-hearted entertainments. It is more than just an inspired adaptation of the Giussani Sisters' fumetti, a fact that only becomes apparent when one realizes that the original comics stories were published in black-and-white. Diabolik defines the correct color template for this black-and-white character, much as Bava redefined the way horror films were photographed in color earlier in the decade. It's not a colorful study in fright and superstition—the sort of film one associates with Bava—but neither is it an impersonal work; on the contrary, the more one is aware of Bava's total control over the film's design, and the abundance of camouflage and trickery that went into its making, Diabolik reveals itself to be every bit as personal as Ercole al centro della terra or Terrore nello spazio, if not quite so autonomous a creation.

Diabolik continues the flowering of a new phase of Bava's oeuvre, one that started to bud in Terrore nello spazio, which found him breaking away from the gothic horror stories for which he was best known, and forging a new cinematic identity more closely allied with pop art and pop artifice. This was not a unique approach for an Italian director to take in this moment in history, when directors like Fellini (8½, Giulietta degli spiriti), Antonioni (Blowup), Elio Petri (La decima vittima/The 10th Victim), Tinto Brass (Nerosubianco/The Artful Penetration, L'urlo), and others had a shared inclination to invent the times rather than reflect them. The resulting films were not unlike a science fiction spin on the telefoni bianchi—the settings became increasingly abstract, the characters (and in many cases, caricatures) grew more stylish and detached, and an implicit challenge was issued to audiences to find something, anything human to grasp onto. In Bava's films, his Pop Art settings and characters are used to depict a shallow society that embraces loveless sex and worships money as a god. Diabolik might be expected to run counter to that philosophy, but Bava champions his thieving protagonist because he is that society's enemy—one who steals for love, not greed, and is never "owned" by his acquisitions.

Bava's own feelings about the film were mixed. He hated the additional responsibilities and front office interference that came with working on a "big-budget" film, so much that he would subsequently retreat back into the womb-like safety of anonymous work and low-budget productions; and yet, in one interview, he declared that making Diabolik was "one of the most incredible experiences of my life." [17] It contains some flagrant technical imperfections—all the proof one needs of Bava's divided attentions and lack of hands-on control over every department—but no air of compromise. More than thirty years after it was made, it is still considered by many (including some noted comics artists, like Stephen R. Bissette) to be the most successful of all attempts to transpose the comics medium to the screen—quite an achievement, considering its main competition for the honor are Paul Verhoeven's $12,000,000 blockbuster, RoboCop (1987) and Sam Raimi's $100,000,000 record-breakers Spider-Man (2002) and Spider-Man 2 (2004).

In any comics adaptation, the saving grace is often dynamic imagery and a command of color, and Diabolik has both in spades. In fact, Diabolik is introduced in such a way as to establish his mastery over color and atmosphere, as he clouds the screen during the opening armored car heist with the emissions of three gas cylinders: green, yellow, and purple. By thus identifying Diabolik with color and fog, Bava initiates one of the most amusing indulgences he permitted himself in this production: Diabolik's penchant for crime is almost always illustrated in ways that reflect Bava's own gifts as a filmmaker and illusionist. Just as Bava's greatest pleasure was solving technical problems by the simplest means possible, Diabolik is distinguished as a criminal by finding elegant, audacious and sometimes spectacular solutions to the challenges separating him from his plunder and a safe getaway. When Diabolik drives his Jaguar to the hidden entrance of his fabulous cave, what he does onscreen to open the radio-controlled door is more or less what Bava was doing offscreen to actuate the miniature. More to the point, during the theft of Lady Clark's emerald necklace, Diabolik is shown cheating Inspector Ginco's spy camera by taking an instant photograph of the room and mounting it in the soft wax of a candlestick positioned in front of the camera; thus, he outwits the police by improvising what is, in effect, a matte shot. He subsequently eludes Ginco and his men by catapulting a dummy from the parapets of the castle, and also by stretching a rolled mirror surface across a road to send his pursuers over a cliff; these are both tricks involving deceptions of the eye.

EARLY promotional art for the film, which accidentally paired the likenesses of Marisa Mell and Jean Sorel.

In the subsequent pay-off of this scene, Bava slyly conceals a reference to one of his own earlier achievements. As Eva emerges from the subterranean swimming pool, Diabolik presents her with the emeralds from Lady Clark's necklace, arranging them on her chest in a manner identical to the headless, limbless figure in a painting by the French surrealist Rene Magritte. The name of that painting is The Drop of Water—and thus does Bava equate Diabolik's career triumph with his own. Bava quotes his earlier work in other instances, too. When Diabolik revives in the morgue, he halts the forensic surgeon's scalpel by reaching out to engulf the camera lens (occupying the surgeon's point of view) with his outstretched hand, its fingers spread to suggest an approaching spider—as Christopher Lee did in La frusta e il corpo. Another visual idea from that film, albeit inverted, is used when Diabolik sends Eva away from the cave as it is invaded by Ginco's men. In La frusta, Bava repeatedly photographed the apparition of Christopher Lee appearing suddenly from the darkness, as though stepping into life from the Beyond; in Diabolik, as the title character promises, "You'll not be alone so long as I live, Eva!" the film cuts to Eva's face hovering with worry, wraith-like, in the shadows of an exit, which literally swallow her face as she retreats. The shot is rich with ill foreboding, and we are made to know instinctively that this is the end for them. When Eva later reappears, dressed in mourning black, she seems to be garbed in an extrapolation of those very shadows.

Bava also puts his grasp of superstition to work in the earlier scene, not included in the screenplay, of Eva visiting an Esso station en route to see Dr. Vernier. There she is spotted by Rudy, one of Valmont's informants. The gas attendant asks if she would like "a tiger's tail for good luck"—a reference to Esso's trademark slogan of the time ("Put a tiger in your tank") and a promotional giveaway item that Esso station attendants attached to their customers' car radio antennae during the period of that campaign. Eva declines, explaining that she's not superstitious. But it is at this precise moment that her luck takes a turn for the worse.

While Diabolik reprises some elements from Bava's past work, it also encompasses the initial statements of some visuals that would recur in subsequent films, notably 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto/5 Dolls for an August Moon (1970). In the celebrated money orgy sequence, the presence of the couple buried under the cash is signalled by the sudden upward thrust of Eva's feline leg, a bank note clenched between her toes. In a couple of different scenes in 5 bambole, Bava would emphasize the decadent, animal nature of adultery by showing couples steer motorboats and pass cigarettes with their feet. Likewise, Eva's final visit to the gold-imprisoned Diabolik, in stylish mourning apparel, is essentially reprised in the surprise finale of 5 bambole, as the former naïf Isabelle (Ely Galleani) visits Gerry Farrell (William Berger) in prison, wearing a spectacular outfit that tells us all we need to know about where the missing millions have gone. This was a scene that

ITALIAN locandina, art by Renato Casaro.

Bava later admitted to creating himself, and the similar scene in Diabolik also originated somewhere other than in the screenplay. Both scenes are about imprisonment on the surface, but feel more specifically about death and seem to reflect a personal fantasy of premature death and being mourned by a beautiful woman. But is the female in this fantasy just a beautiful woman, reflective of a midlife crisis? Or could she be the artist's muse, or a personification of the artist's work itself? In both scenes, Eva and Isabelle are not just beautiful women, but beautiful women transformed—trophies fashioned by the sweat and schemes of the men who loved them. Whatever the personal import of these scenes, they are interesting as romantic scenes in which the male is essentially impotent while the female is at her most attractive—a dynamic most explicitly explored in the climactic necrophilia scene of Lisa and the Devil (1973).

Diabolik is one of the most stylishly photographed films of Bava's period with cameraman Antonio Rinaldi, removing (for the most part) the bold colorful lighting of their earlier collaborations and actualizing those colors instead on props, costumes, and set decoration. The most creative lighting in the film is used on the walls of Diabolik's cave, which basically reiterate the color schemes seen in the climactic cavern scenes of I coltelli del vendicatore—spots of blue, green, and amber—but are most impressive in the final scenes, after they are covered with molten gold. I find it impossible to tell whether this coloring was done exclusively with amber lighting, or if a replica maquette of the cave walls and ceiling was painted gold and hung in the establishing shots; either explanation seems plausible, but the shots are dazzling, however they were achieved. The film's most interesting cinematographic innovation is its extensive use of wide-angle lenses, which Bava and Rinaldi use to enlarge small sets and to invest individual shots with a greater sense of dynamic comic book frame composition. An excellent case in point is an extended low-angle shot in Valmont's headquarters; the centerpiece of the shot is a telephone (they are waiting for Diabolik to call), but one of Valmont's molls paces through the shot in a miniskirt, which lends the otherwise stationary shot a sense of movement and appeal. When the telephone finally rings, two heads—belonging to Valmont's two henchmen—jut into frame from the left and right periphery to answer it, their unexpected appearance startling the viewer and cleverly reiterating, in a purely visual way, how well guarded this contemptible villain is. Wide-angle lensing would become one of the common signposts of Bava's subsequent directorial phase, used to lend a counterfeit sense of grandeur to sets that were noticeably more humble in actual size, and as an outward reflection of the distorted inner worlds of his protagonists.

17 Ibid.

Much of the film's sense of magic and fun is generated from the onscreen chemistry between John Phillip Law and Marisa Mell. Apart from looking very much like their fumetti counterparts, they are intoxicated by each other's company to an infectious degree; they have an onscreen chemistry that recalls Peggy Cummins and John Dall in Joseph H. Lewis' sexy crime spree drama Gun Crazy (1949). Mell and Law's mutual arousal is highly sympathetic, allowing the film to sidestep a more prosaic explication of Diabolik's ethical code. His obsession with Eva forgives his various crimes, all of which are committed with hedonistic flair. Bava (who was marking the 32nd year of his own marriage during this production) couldn't resist occasionally imposing on his criminal couple a sampling of the sometimes trying, seasoned domesticity that was most familiar to him. In the scene where Diabolik asks Eva what she would like for her birthday, she immediately sees and covets Lady Clark's emerald necklace on television. Bava coaxes some wry and ironical emotions from his two young actors, as Eva self-consciously suppresses her pride in feeling worthy of such a tribute, and Diabolik puzzles husbandlike over the extreme measures required to keep this vision contented. After her lover has moved heaven and earth to fulfill her wish, Eva has the gall to purr, "Ahhh, you shouldn't have done it!" It's a delightful counterweight to the film's various caprices, and one of the key instances which connect this glittering confection to the domestic preoccupations that were becoming more pronounced in Bava's work at this time.

POP ART-influenced French affiche.

On the negative side, the film contains some blatantly sloppy blue screen work. Two examples are Diabolik placing a call to Valmont from a phone booth, and Ginco lamenting Diabolik's presumed death while driving along ("I can't believe he's really dead"); in both cases, the background plates are poorly color-timed and move independently of the foreground element. These are the kind of shots that cause even those viewers unacquainted with rear-screen projection techniques to howl in pain, and the fact that they survived the final cut shows the extent to which Bava was exhausted and aggravated by the production and forced to relinquish responsibility.

There are also a number of continuity errors, which are surprisingly uncommon in Bava's work. When Diabolik and Eva make love on their bed of stolen money, we can see a discarded black dress adorned with metal-rimmed eyelets, whereas Eva was actually dressed previously in an orange hot pants outfit, and then a bath towel; it is not until the later scene on the same bed—when the duo see the broadcast about Lady Clark's necklace—that Eva is shown wearing this dress (which is either the same dress, or made of the same material, as one worn by Laura Betti in Bava's subsequent Il rosso segno della follia/ Hatchet for the Honeymoon, 1970). Eva's birthday is given in this scene as May 5; when Valmont is shot later in the film, after Eva's birthday, an insert shot of his death certificate gives the date as May 3. The necklace is described as being composed of eleven emeralds, but Diabolik victoriously decorates Eva's throat with only nine. This incontinuity could be explained by imperfect marksmanship, but the film says nothing about two of the gems missing their target.

Diabolik was charged by several critics with being a James Bond imitation—which is certainly true in some ways, given the casting of Adolfo Celi and the Thunderball-like underwater sequences—but the reverse is equally true. Richard Maibaum and Tom Mankiewicz' screenplay for Diamonds Are Forever (1971), Sean Connery's comeback Bond film, mirrors the Diabolik script in interesting ways. In one sequence, Bond secretes a cache of diamonds in the body of a corpse, recouping them in a jackpot-like urn while posing as a relative attending the cremation. Later in the film, there is an exact imitation of Bava's foreground miniature of the entrance to Diabolik's subterranean headquarters, as two assassins exit the underground control base of Ernst Stavro Blofeld. Neither scene occurs in Ian Fleming's 1956 novel of the same name. Likewise, Bava's innovative approach to shooting underwater close-ups of Law and Mell—filming them at a higher film speed to slow their movements, through an aquarium foreground—was subsequently adopted for the 1981 Bond film For Your Eyes Only, in scenes with Roger Moore and Carole Bouquet.

Release / Variants

In the United States, where the Giussanis' comic never gained a foothold, Danger: Diabolik was barely released. Adding injury to insult, it was withheld from a proper British release until January 1969, and then shown in a version reportedly cut by seventeen minutes. As David Hutchison, reviewer for Films & Filming, noted: "The result of this delay is that most of the film's content now appears outmoded and its concentration on thrilling chases, daring robberies, underground hide-outs, underwater sequences and super heroes and villains is more than familiar from the Bond films and the glut of superspy characters." Though not completely flattering to the film, Hutchison made the important point that "the comic strip has a great many affinities with the motion picture; both are a series of separate pictures and take the same advantage of light, shade, color and perspective. Bava is obviously well aware of this and the result is a film strip cartoon which, despite its faults, is generally more successful than either Modesty Blaise or Barbarella in capturing an elusive comic strip flavor."[18]

THIS German one-sheet poster represents the only photographic advertising generated for the movie, world-wide.

Monthly Film Bulletin's anonymous critic was more enthusiastic about the whole: "Bava's superb visual sense stands him in good stead in this comic-strip adventure which looks like a brilliant pastiche of the best of everything in anything from James Bond to Matt Helm . . . Occasionally reminiscent of Barbarella in its sidelong sense of humor . . . what it really recalls is Feuillade. Not simply because of Diabolik's penchant for black leotards or for scaling vertiginous walls with hand-operated suction-pads, but because he restores to villainy that long-lost and inimitable touch of good-humored chivalry."[19]

In his 1970 book Science Fiction in the Cinema, John Baxter agreed that "Judex is alive and living at Cinecittà." Baxter deserves credit for being the first critic to single out Bava's later work for praise in book form; he calls Bava a "brilliant cinematographer and one of Italy's finest fantasy film-makers," applauds John Phillip Law's "dazzling characterization" and says that Bava gives the film "the visual pace of a streamlined juggernaut."[20] 18 David Hutchison, "Danger: Diabolik," Films & Filming 15:7, April 1969, 45–46.

19 "Diabolik (Danger: Diabolik)," Monthly Film Bulletin 36:421, February 1969, 31–32.

20 John Baxter, Science Fiction in the Cinema (New York NY: Paperback Library, 1970), 198–99.

In short, Diabolik was enthusiastically received by those lucky enough to see the film when it was still "of its time" and could be appreciated for what it added to the pop culture landscape of which it was very much a part. However, when seen in the context of the more realistic cinema emerging only a couple of years later—Midnight Cowboy, The Wild Bunch, Woodstock, to name a few—Diabolik was one of the films that suffered most by comparison; it was not only artificial, but frivolous. As the decades passed, and as culture evolved in new directions, Diabolik mutated as well, looking quaintly campy in the 1970s, "interesting" in the 1980s, and finally—miraculously—fashionable once again in the 1990s, when new trends in lounge music, style and fashion caught up with it.

It was just prior to the arrival of the lounge music movement that a fan's letter-writing campaign prompted a hesitant Paramount Home Video to release the film on VHS (as a budget-priced EP speed tape only), and later as a digitally restored, letterboxed LaserDisc in the United States, the latter rumored to have been pressed in an extremely limited edition of only 500 copies. The version of the film presented by both these releases differs dramatically from the currently available DVD edition, and these differences require some notation.

As was discovered by film editor Glenn Erickson, at the time employed in MGM's trailer department, the English soundtrack of Danger: Diabolik had to be extensively re-recorded for these initial home video releases. When the tapes were examined, the voice tracks of John Phillip Law, Marisa Mell, and Terry-Thomas were found intact, but the original recordings of the other dubbed voices—including those of Adolfo Celi and Michel Piccoli, all of which were dubbed by British and American voice talent, notably actor Richard Johnson—were lost and had to be re-recorded.

According to Erickson, "When I tried to find a print of Diabolik to show at Filmex in 1985, Paramount told me that all rights and prints had been returned to De Laurentiis. When we called De Laurentiis at that time, we were told that all the prints of the film had been recycled for sound fill. I believe, from my experience at MGM/UA, that the 35 mm English-language masters for Diabolik were lost, and that the picture had to be reconstituted using an Italian film master and pre-dub audio elements, which accounts for only the principal actors' lines being recovered. Unlike some of our reconstruction attempts at MGM with, say, [Sergio] Leone pictures, Diabolik appears to have been produced in several international versions simultaneously. The laser and tape release has music, sound effects, and these three key voices intact, but the rest of the track had to be re-recorded with new talent and remixed."[21]

PROMOTIONAL art for Rospo Pallenberg's stillborn RAI-2 revival series from 1991.

Erickson supplied a list itemizing some of the audio differences: (1) in the original theatrical release prints, Diabolik's name was pronounced "Dieabolik," whereas the tape and disc pronounce it "Dee-abolik." (2) A number of minor rewritings of lines have occurred. Celi once said to Dr. Vernier (pronounced "Vern-yay"), "San Francisco dropped you out of the medical register, but if you're lying, I'll drop you from the human register." Now the doctor is "Ver-neer," and the reference to San Francisco has been excised: "Your name was once crossed off the medical register . . . If you're lying, I'll cross you off the human register." (3) The mix also now favors sound effects over music. Originally, every time a Morricone cue was heard, it drowned out most everything else. Now some cues fade in lamely where they used to crash in at full volume; one conspicuous change is the omission of dissonant electric guitar stings to underscore the gold autocade's shadowing by Diabolik's black Jaguar. The music also dips to very low volume as Diabolik and Eva kiss in the car while descending in the hideout's elevator. (4) The soundtrack is generally distorted. "Even my scratchy 16 mm print has a punchier audio dynamic," Erickson observed.

The rewriting of some of this redubbed dialogue is arguably superior to some lines in the original (as in changing "dropped you out of the human register" to "crossed off," which more accurately corresponds to the visual), and the redubbing was sufficiently well-done overall to pass for a vintage job. Unfortunately, the fine performances of Piccoli and Celi suffered in the revoiced version, as did those of the women playing Valmont's molls, who were dubbed in such a way as to make them seem not only vacuous, but completely brainless in a way that only cartoon characters can be.

Paramount's re-recorded version also worked from an Italian digital video master, so the main titles were presented in Italian and sported the Diabolik title, though the theme song (originally heard in Italian on Italian and US prints) was still heard in English. Originating from a PAL source, this version was also time-compressed—or, to be more accurate, mastered from a 25 frames per second source that slightly accelerated the action, making the uncut film run shorter.

There were also some noteworthy visual differences between the American theatrical and video prints. The scene of Diabolik and Eva making love under piles of money on the rotating bed, for example, was replaced by a longer and sexier take. In the US theatrical release, the scene stayed closer, showed less of Mell's body and cut to the next scene without the climactic high angle shot. "The music cue for this alternate scene is also different," notes Erickson, "much better, one of the best cues in the track." The early video version also restored scenes which some observers have noted as being trimmed from the original US prints, including the shower scene that follows Diabolik and Eva's homecoming, the terrifically druggy discothèque sequence (in which some of the set decorations are recognizable as borrowings from the Barbarella sets elsewhere on the De Laurentiis lot), and the footage of the cabin guard teasing Eva with the lit end of a cigarette as a prelude to attempted rape.

It seemed a bitter irony that, just as an appreciative American audience for Diabolik was finally coming into being, it was no longer available for viewing with its original soundtrack. Happily, in June 2005, Paramount finally surrendered to fans' wishes by issuing Danger: Diabolik on DVD. The resulting presentation—produced by Kim Aubry of ZAP Zoetrope Aubry Productions—was nothing less than a unique, definitive edition combining the original, fully-restored English dubbing tracks, the English main titles, and all of the scenes previously exclusive to the Italian version. Mario Bava's Danger: Diabolik is now available for viewing in a truly continental version that outstrips all of its predecessors.

Influence

While the studio that financed its production is seemingly oblivious of its importance and legacy, Diabolik is currently one of Mario Bava's most beloved films and its influence on filmmakers has been far-ranging. Bava himself declined to revisit his debonair criminal in a sequel, but Diabolik would be heard from again and again.

It says a lot about De Laurentiis' grasp of Bava's unique economical abilities that he did not entrust the sequel to another director. Instead, the torch was passed to the hands of satire. In 1967, Italian comedian Johnny Dorelli starred in a feature film spoof of the Diabolik character, Arriva Dorellik/How to Kill 400 Duponts, directed by Bava's old companion in postwar comedy, Steno. The absurd plot finds the world's master criminal, Dorellik, impoverished, abandoned by his sexy sidekick Baby Eva (Margaret Lee), and forced to place want ads for his criminal expertise in the daily newspapers. He is approached by a man named Dupont (Riccardo Garrone) who knows that he figures in a distant relative's multimillion dollar will, albeit pretty far down the line; he hires Dorellik to do away with every other Dupont in France, to clear the field of other pretenders to this vast fortune. It's a miserable film, on the whole, but the funniest parts show Dorellik taunting his dedicated pursuer, Inspector Green of Scotland Yard—played by none other than Terry-Thomas—by disguising himself as almost every person occupying his world.

The next official Diabolik adaptation took place in 1972, when Radio 2 RAI broadcast twenty episodes of audio adaptations of various stories from the fumetti, produced by Radio Monte Carlo. The series ran every weekday from November 13 – December 8, and featured the voice talents of Luca Ward (Diabolik), Roberta Greganti (Eva) and Francesco Prandi (Gingko, restored to the original spelling of his name).

In 1991, the Italian television network RAI-2 announced a forthcoming TV series of Diabolik, to be executive produced by M Films Produzione and directed by Rospo Pallenberg, who began his career as a screenwriter for John Boorman (Excalibur, The Emerald Forest). The series was to commence with a special 100-minute pilot episode, but it never came to pass.

In 1999, Diabolik became an animated television series co-produced by Saban Enterprises International, France's M6, Italy's Mediaset, and Japan's Toho/Ashi Production Company. Clearly made in response to the success of Bruce Timm's reinvented Batman animated series for Fox, Diabolik found its title character broadly reinvented to suit a juvenile audience; he dressed the same, but in this incarnation, he and Eva were Robin Hood characters who stole only from other criminals. The series premiered on the French television network M6 in the autumn of 1999. It was announced that Diabolik would join the Fox Family Network schedule in America in 2000, but the order for episodes was canceled before it ever reached the air. English-language episodes of the animated Diabolik did make it to air in Australia, and bootlegged tapes of the 40-episode series have been known to trade hands on eBay.

It was around this same time that Bava's film was resurrected under unflattering circumstances in America, becoming the last in a long line of films to be ridiculed by the heckling silhouettes of the US cable series Mystery Science Theater 3000. Known as MST3K by its devoted fans, the program lasted for ten seasons, airing first on the Comedy Central cable network and moving, in 1997, to the Sci-Fi Channel. The fact that such an accomplished film would be singled out for insult and lampoon on the program showed that it was running out of appropriate fodder.

Diabolik has now outlived the two Milanese sisters who conceived his long-lasting reign of terror. Angela Giussani died on February 12, 1987, at the age of 64, and Luciana Giussani died on March 31, 2001, at the age of 72. After their deaths, the rights to the character fell to the French production company Studio Canal +, under whose auspices a new Diabolik feature film is currently in the planning stages. The director assigned to the project is Christophe Gans (Crying Freeman, Brotherhood of the Wolf), a horror and fantasy specialist who spent many years working as a film journalist for such French publications as L'Ecran Fantastique, before starting his own magazine and video label devoted to Hong Kong cinema.

"I love the [Bava] film as much as anyone," Gans told Fangoria's Alan Jones, "but it was much more a James Bond/Batman parody, the vogue of the time, rather than anything to do with the original Italian comic book. The idea is to get a writer like Donald Westlake [The Grifters] to take the character and place him in an erotic, very adult caper movie, as far away from any 'Austin Powers' feel as possible . . . I'd love Mark Dacascos to play Diabolik, and Monica Bellucci would make the perfect Eva. I'm also thinking of Deborah Kara Unger [Crash, The Game] to play the KGB assassin the Black Widow, and someone like Billy Crudup for the part of Inspector Ginco—although, in the comic, he and Diabolik are mirror images of each other. I want this stunningly beautiful and handsome cast involved in a classy, clever caper, with darkly perverse relationships and all doing thrilling stunts. The Bava film is unique and I'd never, ever want to copy it. But let's see where we can take Diabolik today for a totally new and different Pop Art experience." [22]

One of the most surprising side effects of the Bava film's cultish rediscovery is Roman Coppola's directorial debut, CQ (2001), which debuted at that year's Cannes Film Festival. Set in 1969, it's the story of Paul Ballard [23] (Jeremy Davies), a young American working in Paris on a film called Codename: Dragonfly. Dragonfly (Angela Lindvall) is a dynamic female superheroine, and the film is an affectionate tribute to the Pop/Op Art comics films of the 1960s such as Modesty Blaise and Barbarella, but its most obvious antecedent is Diabolik. The film reprises the white jumpsuits, the speeding Jaguars, and the nude bodies rolling in money; also, the story of how Ballard is promoted from the film's editor to its director and special effects designer has an apparent basis in the legend of how Mario Bava was recruited to finish I vampiri in 1956. The score by Los Angeles-based retro-lounge band Mellow occasionally alludes to specific passages from Ennio Morricone's classic score, and making the hommage all the more emphatic is the participation of John Phillip Law in the supporting role of "The Chairman."

No one could be more pleased with Diabolik's ever-growing fan base than Diabolik himself. "I remember finding a book about science fiction movies and seeing a mention of Barbarella and Danger: Diabolik," Law told me, while sitting on his front porch overlooking Los Angeles' famous Sunset Strip. "The author said that Barbarella was okay, but that Danger: Diabolik was the masterpiece. I was amazed because, for years, I'd thought it was probably the other way around. But as time goes on, you know, I can see what he meant. I think Diabolik probably is the masterpiece."

21 Glenn Erickson, correspondence with the author, January 8, 1997.

22 Alan Jones, "Danger: The Adventurer," article/interview, www.fangoria.com (July 2002).

23 The name "Paul Ballard" is a very deep in-joke on Coppola's part. The name appears on the back of numerous Italian pop cinema stills found in the collection at the library of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences in Los Angeles, California.

Il pistolero segnato da Dio

ANTHONY STEFFEN reunited with Mario Bava for the first time since CITTÀ DI NOTTE on this little-seen Italian Western.

ON JUNE 3, 1967, Mario Bava became a grandfather for the second and last time, with the birth of Lamberto and Fiamma's second child, a son named Fabrizio—who nevertheless grew up being called Roy.

"I always thought my name was Roy," he laughs. "That's all I've ever been called by my family! I only found out my real name was Fabrizio when I went to school. The teacher read out the register and I didn't answer when Fabrizio was called—because I didn't know it was my name! Lamberto wanted to baptize me as Roy, but the Church refused because it was a foreign name. Carole Levy, Lamberto's agent, also only knew me as Roy. I was in the same class as her daughter Gioia, and when she went home telling her mother she had met Lamberto's son Fabrizio, Carole made a puzzled call to my father saying, 'When did you have another son? You could have told me!'" [1]

Roy's birth coincided, roughly, with a time of professional reassessment for his grandfather, as is recalled by actor Richard Harrison, who had a personal conversation with Mario around this time. "Bava told me that he got a chance to direct a larger budget film and he hated it," Harrison remembers. "He couldn't make his own decisions; he had to get permission to do everything. He didn't enjoy making movies that way. He needed more freedom, so he went back to making low-budget films."

Just as Bava had followed his directorial debut with a deliberate return to the cinematographic ranks from which he had supposedly been promoted, he now followed Diabolik—the biggest production of his directorial career—with a return to anonymous work. This assignment would remain anonymous until 1996, when journalist Robert Monell discovered—while interviewing actor Richard Wyler—that Bava had at least partially photographed a Western that Wyler made in the autumn of 1967: Il pistolero segnato da Dio ("A Gunfighter Sent by God," 1968), directed by Giorgio Ferroni under his Western pseudonym "Calvin Jackson Padget."

Ferroni and Bava had known each other a long time. Born in Perugia on April 12, 1908, Ferroni was another filmmaker—like Bava—whose career had begun with short arts documentaries during the second World War. Ferroni directed his first dramatic film L'ebrezza del cielo in 1939, the year that Bava became a cameraman. In 1960, Ferroni released his first horror film, Il mulino delle donne di pietra/Mill of the Stone Women, one of the finest Italian films of its kind. Il mulino delle donne di pietra is frequently cited as resembling the work of Bava or Freda more than his own. Later in his career, after numerous "Calvin Jackson Padget" Westerns, Ferroni directed his second and final horror film under his own name, La notte dei diavoli/Night of the Devils (1972), a contemporary adaptation of Alexei Tolstoi's "The Wurdalak," previously filmed by Mario Bava in I tre volti della paura.

Credited with the film's cinematography is Sandro Mancori, the son of cameraman-turned-director Alvaro Mancori, with whom Bava worked anonymously on earlier productions. Sandro Mancori's career as a cameraman began just a short time before this assignment—with Requiescant (1967)—and he was active as recently as 1987's Il ritorno di Django. A single viewing of Il pistolero segnato da Dio is all it takes to recognize Bava's visual style, but it is not present in every scene. This, and Mancori's credit, would seem to indicate that Mancori was taken ill, or fell behind during the production, and Bava took over the cinematography as a personal favor to Ferroni and/or the Mancori family.

Il pistolero segnato da Dio was never released in the United States, and no English-language version is known to exist. However, the film is so exceptionally well-told visually, that the narrative is fairly easy to unravel.

Montana, 1880. The ranch of factory owner Jonathan Murphy is raided one night by a team of masked gunmen. Murphy's young son, Tony (Marco Stefanelli), is awakened by his father, who shows him the hiding place of the money he has saved for his future—$30,000. Moments later, a masked man dressed in white shoots Jonathan to death before his son's eyes. The sound of bullets bridges a cut to a later date, when Tony is enjoying a sharp-shooting exhibition by master gunman Gary McGuire ("Anthony Steffen" a.k.a. Antonio De Teffè) in a travelling circus. After the performance, Tony goes backstage to praise Gary and is collected by Manuel, the manservant of his foster family, the Claridges, who were found for him by the attorney Brudi, executor of his father's will. The Claridges try to punish Tony for sneaking out of the house, but proudly, he refuses to be beaten.

As the circus travels to the next town, they find a man who has been beaten and robbed. The townsfolk have heard of Gary's prowess with a pistol and request his help in ridding their town of the robbers responsible. Gary and another man ride out to the gunmen's encampment, and seeing that they are many, the man rides back to town for support. Hiding behind the wreckage of a stagecoach, Gary eavesdrops as the gunmen gloat over the $30 they stole and argue about how to split it up. Owl Roy (Richard Wyler) solves the problem by shooting them all, taking the cash and riding away. Gary has an ideal opportunity to plug Roy in the back, but his hand hesitates . . . Shortly thereafter, the local man returns with help and finds Gary in the middle of the dead gunmen. He is hailed as a hero—an accolade he readily accepts.

Coleman ("Ken Wood" a.k.a. Giovanni Cianfriglia), the town's richest man and the ringleader of local crime, wakes Roy the next morning and tells him that Gary McGuire is taking credit for his kill. That night at the circus, when Gary's performance reaches the point when a planted actor accepts the challenge to outdraw and outshoot Gary (always failing miserably), Roy makes him sit down and accepts the challenge himself. Recognizing the killer, Gary is intimidated to the point of losing his prowess in a spinning target competition. In a second contest, the two gunmen are asked to shoot bells positioned behind their opponent's head, during which Gary becomes so convinced that Roy is going to shoot him that he drops to his knees in front of everyone and runs yellow from the center ring. He is comforted backstage by Mika ("Liz Barrett" a.k.a. Luisa Baratto), a bareback rider, and Gary tells her the story of where his cowardice began—in a childhood incident involving a beating by his father. A whiplash scar on his shoulder remains, never allowing him to forget.

The next day, Roy invites Gary into the local saloon to show that there are no hard feelings—only to embarrass him further. When the next night's circus audience greets him with boos and catcalls, Gary is reassured by Mika, but it's no use: Gary leaves town and turns to drink. His escape coincides with that of Tony, who has decided to run away from the Claridges. Tony meets Gary in a tavern and takes him to meet the Latto family, with whom he plans to stay. As they arrive, they see Mr. Latto being harassed by Owl Roy and his gang, who steal the goods heaped on his wagon. Latto is overjoyed to see Tony and takes him home with Gary. Tony pleads with Gary to adopt him and take him to Boston, where he hopes to attend his father's old college. Embarrassed by his inability to help the adoring boy, Gary feigns meanness by slapping him, then rides to the next town.

At a cantina, Gary gets drunk and accepts a prostitute's invitation to go upstairs. As she removes his holster, Gary boasts that he's a great gunfighter and demonstrates his ability by shooting out a candle and shooting a picture off the bedroom wall. When he passes out, the woman steals his precious silver six-shooters. The next day, Tony traces Gary to the saloon and goes to his room. The prostitute recognizes the boy and eavesdrops at the door, where she overhears Tony informing Gary of the $30,000 concealed at his father's ranch. Before he mentions where it is hidden, they hear a creak outside the door, and the bar's serving girl sneaks away. When Coleman comes in for a drink, she tells him about it.

Tony is summoned to Brudi's office, where he meets Coleman, who

Il pistolero segnato da dio

"A Gunfighter Sent by God"
Filmed at Elios Studios and on location in Rome
Fall 1967
First released: February 29, 1968
Eastmancolor, 2.35:1, 100 minutes

Production: G. V. Produzione. Distributor: Augustus.

Brazil: O Pistolero Marcado por Deus, Columbia Pictures, 1969
France: Deux Pistolets pour un Lache, "Two Pistols for a Coward," 9/10/69, 80m Italian reissue: Due pistole e un vigliacco, "Two Pistols for a Coward" introduces himself as one of his father's best friends. The sight of Coleman's ornate watch chain triggers the boy's memory—his father's killer wore the same chain! As Coleman and Brudi try to bully the money's location out of the boy, Gary enters just in time to see Coleman strike the boy with his lash. Memories of his own whipping awakened, he pleads with them to stop—that he will tell them what they want to know. Tony spits on him in disgust. Gary decides not to tell, and is beaten by Coleman's men and taken to a barn where he is restrained. Locked in a room by Brudi, Tony escapes by the window and frees Gary. Brudi catches Tony and slaps him, and Gary retaliates with a punch that kills the man. After recovering his stolen guns, he goes to the town sheriff and tells him that Coleman was the murderer of Jonathan Murphy.

They arrest Coleman at the cantina, but Owl Roy's gang arrive to help him escape. As the gang rides away, they pass the travelling circus as it goes to the next town. There, Gary is pleading with the townsfolk for assistance, but they consider him mad—Coleman is the wealthiest man in town, and thus its future. Coleman finds Tony at his ranch, hoping to recover his fortune. The gang dunks Tony in a well until the boy tells them where the money is hidden. When Coleman claims the money, once again Roy disagrees and shoots him dead, starting a gunfight between Roy's and Coleman's gangs. Tony takes the opportunity to escape, but he is followed by three men. Gary shoots them dead. He tells Tony to go for help and closes in on the ranch.

Gary single-handedly opposes the two gangs, while Roy goes inside to stuff his jacket with money. Help arrives in the form of Gary's circus companions, and the bad guys are brought under attack by a surreal team of acrobats, archers, clowns, and strongmen. Gary disarms Roy with a bullet and then, to establish his bravery, he empties a gun of all but one bullet, spins the chamber and throws it at his adversary. Roy clicks the nearly empty gun as Gary circles him, until a bullet grazes Gary's cheek. His gun empty, Roy begs and pleads for his life on his knees and pulls the stolen money from his jacket. More help arrives from town and Owl Roy, humiliated, is taken into custody. Gary and Mika embrace with Tony, who together form a new family.

ITALIAN manifesto.

1 Roy Bava, interviewed by Alan Jones, April 2000.

ITALIAN due-foglia.

"I was told by my agents that Giorgio Ferroni was a first-class director and that I would have a great time working with him," Richard Wyler says, when asked about the film he remembers as Two Pistols for a Coward. "I went to see him before I did the film, and he told me I could become the top guy in Italian Westerns if I spent more time practicing—you know, spinning the gun and that kind of stuff—but I guess I was too lazy. It's too bad, really, because I thoroughly enjoyed doing them. The opportunity was marvelous and, because I'm English, I would never have gotten such an opportunity in Hollywood. But I remember being furious with him because he cast me as the baddie, which was not the most important part. I had never played a baddie before, but he told me that I would enjoy it, that it's always more fun to play the villain. Ferroni was a super guy, really intelligent; he knew his job very well and spoke very good English. On most of those Western films, the crews didn't speak English very well, so you just had to learn enough Italian to be polite and carry a conversation.

"It wasn't a low-budget film; it was medium-budget, shot near Rome, and the director was well above the common ranks. The schedule was also considerably longer than that of a low-budget picture; I think it lasted over six weeks. Maybe it just seemed that way: I was not in a good mood on that picture, I was so angry about not doing the role that Steffen got. I remember very clearly being on the set, which was, to my way of thinking, the unfriendliest set I'd really been on. I felt almost like an outcast. I liked the director, but Tony Steffen was a bit of a snob. Also, very, very often in Italy they don't pay you for the last week of filming. I remember saying that I wasn't going to shoot on the last day, because they didn't bring the checks, so I walked off the set and had the chauffeur take me back into town. And on the way, I saw the money coming back up the other side of the street! I turned the car around and went back!

"I'm sure that the man behind the camera was Mario Bava. I wish I'd known more about him at the time. I don't remember what happened to bring him there, but I remember his name because someone wrote it on the clapboard one day. When he looked through the viewfinder of his camera and saw this, he walked round and rubbed it out with his elbow. He gave everyone a stern look, then went back behind the camera as everyone laughed."

Wyler also confirms that Ferroni was present throughout the production. At no time did Bava take over the direction of the picture.

Il pistolero segnato da Dio is an exceptional Italian Western. It may well be the first film to contrast the Old West and the showbiz version of the Old West—later explored in such films as Robert Altman's Buffalo Bill and the Indians (1976), Sydney Pollack's The Electric Horseman (1979), and Clint Eastwood's Bronco Billy (1980). It's also remarkable for its use of the escapism inherent in the showbiz version as a parallel to the main character's psychological dilemma (i.e., he works as a circus cowboy because he cannot function as such in the real world). The film contains some flat performances, notably by Luisa Baratto (of Il boia scarlatto/Bloody Pit of Horror infamy), but it also offers some good ones, especially those of the spirited piccolo Marco Stefanelli (Alain Delon's younger self in Louis Malle's "William Wilson" episode of Histoires Extraordinaires/Spirits of the Dead), Giovanni Cianfriglia (as the granite-faced villain), and top-billed Anthony Steffen.

Mario Bava photographed two of the three Westerns he directed, and in general, they prove that he obtained his best results in a studio environment. Most of the natural exterior shots in his Westerns could have been photographed by anybody; they are without character and, given that dollies and cranes were beyond their budgets, their reliance on the zoom lens can be distractingly mechanical and crude. The average quality of these parallel works makes it impossible to tell how much of the average-looking footage in Il pistolera segnato da Dio was Bava's doing. That said, the film also contains a good deal of exceptional, signature-quality Bava cinematography. The film's distinctly Bavian aura extends, beyond its camerawork, to the incidental presence of Massimo Righi in the supporting cast, and a fear-tinged Carlo Rustichelli score that often sounds like passages on loan from Operazione paura's library score.

The subject matter here, of course, is fear—Bava's favorite subject—and it is in those scenes most reflective of this emotion that he produces the film's most indelible images. The first standout scene is the exterior of Gary eavesdropping on the gang's encampment, which makes marvelous use of scenery never used in any other Western of my acquaintance: a wrecked stagecoach, half buried in dirt. At first sight, it suggests an Old West translation of the wrecked alien spacecraft in Terrore nello spazio. The camera's close attention to Steffen's facial expressions in this scene elevate the film to a new level of psychological insight, without which his later actions would seem cartoonish and lacking in dimension. This same technique, almost inquisitional in its study of the character's facial landscape, is also utilized in many of the later scenes—most remarkably, as Gary is seized by fear and self-doubt during the shooting match, or as he relates the story of his childhood beating. A veteran of countless Italian programmers of all sorts, including the Bava-photographed Città di notte. Steffen never gave a better performance than this one—perhaps because he was working here with a cameraman who understood the degree to which a face registers emotion.

In the case of Giovanni Cianfriglia's performance, the opposite is true—with equally effective results. Cianfriglia doesn't change his facial emotion once in the entire picture; even when he laughs, he laughs as a statue would laugh. Clearly, Owl Roy is a man who has never known a second of self-doubt. This not only enhances his own presence as a figure of fear, it enhances Steffen's performance by making his emotions seem all the more obvious and deranged.

The final showdown is also remarkable, as Owl Roy and his gang are opposed by the circus folk. The imagery of this sequence provides not only an unexpected jolt into the realm of the fantastic, but also to the plane of our hero's psychology. When the circus rides to Gary's aid, it is a visual reinforcement that he has recovered the courage that he has lost—the environment that surrounds his victory is the environment that witnessed the successes that made him famous. In another director's hands, the sequence might have appeared jarring or (even worse) Felliniesque, but Ferroni and Bava invest it with psychological shadings that are immensely satisfying. It's better than the arrival of the cavalry; it's the return of a man's soul.

For those familiar with Bava's career as a cameraman, one scene in particular stands out as a moving, autobiographical touch. When Tony finds Gary drunk in a hole-in-the-wall tavern, he blames his pessimism on his sordid surroundings and offers to take him out of there, to "the most beautiful place on Earth." We then cut to the two of them, at rest, reviving their souls beside that most picturesque of all Italian film locations: the Cascate di Montegelato—the extraordinary waterfall that appears in Orlando e i paladini di Francia, Le fatiche di Ercole, and so many other films associated with the Golden Age of Italian Fantasy. In context, the scene has nothing to do with the story, but the scene has an extraordinary effect, as if the point of the whole journey was really just to bring us back here, one last time.

After the peak achievement and point of retreat that was Diabolik, Bava contentedly zooms into the splashing waters of Montegelato, symbolic of the attractive naiveté of Italian film production in the 1950s. In this sublime moment, the tormented scenario of Il pistolero segnato da Dio seems interrupted by a sweet yet fervent wish that things could once again be as simple as they used to be.

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by "Moz" [De Bernardinis].

ODISSEA
LE AVVENTURE DI ULISSE

The Adventures of Ulysses

WHILE BARBARELLA was in production on the sound stages of Dinocittà, Dino De Laurentiis determined to top himself. He would now improve upon his own 1954 production of Ulisse with a new, truly epic retelling of Homer's poem, The Odyssey. De Laurentiis conceived the new project as an extended serial for television, consisting of seven episodes that could be shown nightly for one week, or stretched out over as many weeks; it was a visionary plan, coming a full decade before the term "miniseries" was coined in America. Represented by producer Vittorio Bonicelli, Dino De Laurentiis Cinematografica entered a partnership with Jadran Film of Yugoslavia (where the location shooting was done), and also sold broadcast rights with Bavarian TV of Munich, ORTF of Paris, and of course, RAI-Radiotelevisione Italiana—and proceeded to make what Variety would term "the costliest TV venture in Italy to date." [1]

BEKIM FEHMIU as Ulysses, seen here in the series' closing moments as he reunites with wife Penelope (Irene Papas).

Mario Bava was a major contributor to this production, but not in the role of director—at least not initially. After the experience of Diabolik, Bava realized that expensive productions took much of the fun and creative spontneity out of filmmaking; he much preferred to direct in a low-budget environment that did not oblige him to account for every penny that was spent. Given Bava's background in "lower" forms of Italian cinema—horror, science fiction, Franco and Ciccio comedy—it is unlikely that he would have been invited to direct such a prestigious endeavor, in the first place. The direction of Odissea was ultimately entrusted to 48-year-old Franco Rossi, who in the past year had directed segments of two omnibus films for De Laurentiis: Le streghe/The Witches (1967, co-directed with Mauro Bolognini, Vittorio De Sica, Pier Paolo Pasolini, and Luchino Visconti), and Capriccio all'Italiana (1968, with Bolognini, Mario Monicelli, Pasolini, Steno, and animator Pino Zac).

Born in Florence on April 28, 1919, Rossi had started in the film business as an assistant director, working for Aldo Vergano (I fuorilegge) and Luis Trenker (Barriera a settentrione) in 1949–50. He quickly graduated to directing his own features, beginning with I falsari (1950, co-scripted by Ugo Guerra and Leopoldo Trieste) and, just as rapidly, established himself as a specialist in erotic comedies, including Il seduttore (1954), Amici per la pelle/Friends for Life (1955), Odissea nuda and Smog (1962, the Italian debut of Diabolik star John Phillip Law). In the mid-1960s, Rossi co-directed the sexy omnibus I bambole/Bambole! (1965) with Mauro Bolognini, Luigi Comencini, and Dino Risi. This all-star sex farce, with its climactic near-nude scene by the iconic Gina Lollobrigida, proved so popular at the boxoffice that it breathed renewed life into the multi-part film tradition launched with Boccaccio '70 in 1961, and stereotyped Rossi as a filmmaker to some degree. Over the next few years, he seemed to work exclusively as a contributor to such films, beginning with I complessi (1965, co-directed with Luigi Filippo D'Amico and Dino Risi), which then led to the two projects for De Laurentiis and, by extension, Odissea.

Odissea

"Odyssey"
Filmed at Dinocittà (Rome) and on location in Rome and Yugoslavia
Fall – Winter 1967
Miniseries, 8 episodes
First broadcast: March 24 – May 5, 1968.
640 minutes

Le avventure di Ulisse

"The Aventures of Ulysses"
Condensed Theatrical Version
First released: August 13, 1969
Technicolor, 1.37:1, 105 minutes

Production: Dino De Laurentiis Cinematografica (Rome), RAI-Radiotelevisione Italiana (Rome), Jadran Film (Zagreb), ORTF (Office de Radiodiffusion Télévision Française, Paris), and Bavaria Film TV (Munich). Producer: Vittorio Bonicelli. Directors: Franco Rossi, Mario Bava and Piero Schivazappa. Assistant directors: Nello Vanin, Lamberto Bava. Teleplay: Giampiero Bona, Fabio Carpi, Luciano Codignola, Mario Prosperi, Franco Rossi and Renzo Russo, based on the work by Homer. Continuity: Flavia Vanin. Director of photography: Aldo Giordani. Camera assistant: Sergio Bergamini. Additional photography: Mario Bava (uncredited). Production design: Luciano Ricceri. Set decoration: Mario Altieri. Special effects: Organo Thomas, Mario Bava (uncredited). Special mechanical effects: Carlo Rambaldi (uncredited). Wardrobe: L. Contini. Costume design: Dario Cecchi. Makeup: Maurizio Giustini. Makeup assistants: Gianni Amadei, Luciano Giustini. Hairdresser: Anna Gora Ziosi. Production manager: Giorgio Morra. A.D.C. Production assistants: Eros Lanfranconi, Vittorio Serafini. Chief machinist: Franco Solitario. Chief electrician: Duzo Zecchi. Editor: Giorgio Serrolonga, with Olga Petrini. Editorial assistants: Franco Lettri, Mauro Bonanni, Armando Pace, Giancarlo Morelli, Massimo Cingalani. Music: Carlo Rustichelli, conducted by Bruno Nicolai [published by "Dino"]. Sound engineer: Vittorio Trentino. Distributor: Paramount Pictures Corporation in all territories unless otherwise noted.

Bekim Fehmiu (Ulysses/Odysseus), Irene Papas (Penelope), Renaud Verley (Telemachus), Ivica Pajer (Eurylochus), Sime Jagarinec (Eraclios), Constantin Nepo (Antinous), Nona Medici (Iphthime), Jaspar von Oertzen (Nestor), Barbara Gregorini [Barbara Bach] (Nausicaa), Roy Purcell (Alcinous), Marina Berti (Arete), Kyra Bester (Calypso), Michèle Breton (Athena), Juliette Mayniel (Circe), Fausto Tozzi (Menelaus), Scilla Gabel (Helen), Mimmo Palmara (Achilles), Samson Burke (Polyphemus), Luciano Rossi (Theoclymenus), Maurizio Tocchi (Leocritus), Giulio Tomei (Priam), Marcella Valeri (Euryclia), Otto Alberti [Karl-Otto Alberty] (Eurymachus), Rolf Boysen (Agamemnon), Petar Buntic (Philoetius), Husein Cokic (Eumaeus), Giulio Donnini (Tiresias), Bianca Maria Doria (Anticlia), Hrvoje Svob (Phemius), Sergio Ferrero (Peisistratos), Enzo Fiermonte (Demodocus), Stefanella Giovannini (Cassandra), Vojislav Govedarica (Philoctetes), Gérard Herter (Laocoon), Peter Hinwood (Hermes), Ilija Ivezic (Ctesippus), Branko Kovacic (Laertes), Vladimir Leib (Aeolus), Corràdo Monteforte (Amphinomus), Ada Morotti (Cyane), Duje Novakovic (Elpenor), Laura Nucci (Antinous' mother), Silvano Spada (la ciurma), Gianluigi Crescenzi (il Proci), Franco Balducci, Franco Fantasia, Orso Maria Guerrini, Franco Indovina, Tiberio Mitri, Giancarlo Prato, Miodrag Loncar (Irus/Amaeus).

Additional credits: French langauge dubbing directed by Jacques Souvant. Adaptation: Jacques Souvant, Edmond Bernard, Jacques Muller. Voices: Rene Roussel (Ulysses), Julia Dancourt (Penelope). English-language dubbing directed by Mel Welles. Voices: Dan Sturkie (Ulysses), Carolyn De Fonseca (Penelope), Mel Welles (Polyphemus, others). German language dubbing directed by Leonard Steckel.

France: L'Odyssée
Germany: Die Odyssee, 10/19/69
Spain: Las Aventuras de Ulises, Filmax S.A., 8/16/71

PENELOPE has sworn to take a new husband when she completes her weaving.

WASHED ashore by punishing waters, Ulysses initially mistakes the lovely Princess Nausicaa (Barbara Bach) for a goddess.

Rossi was an excellent choice to direct the project for several reasons. First, he was a serious filmmaker with a shown affinity for the amorous subjects that were most popular among Italian audiences; he was that rare filmmaker who could tell a romantic story in realistic, 3-dimensional terms, without becoming sappy or melodramatic. He had worked with many of Italy's greatest stars, had also directed films outside Italy, and though he had never had a major success entirely his own, he was considered good enough to share equal billing on the omnibus films with some of the greatest Italian directors of his time. Perhaps most importantly, Rossi was a writer as well as a director, and one of the Italian cinema's most experienced practitioners of short form storytelling. This discipline made him particularly adept at deciding how to tell Homer's epic story segmentally, without the audience losing interest as time elapsed between one chapter and the next.

Given the European complexion of the cast, De Laurentiis was unable to strike a co-production deal with an American network, so as Odissea went before the camera in the latter months of 1967, it proceeded with a dual plan. Once the teleplays were written, a feature-length screenplay would be distilled from their contents, allowing the series to be re-edited into a condensed motion picture version for theatrical release abroad. De Laurentiis' distribution partner on Diabolik and Barbarella, Paramount Pictures Corporation agreed to distribute the feature version worldwide, knowing that it would be commercially viable even in areas where the complete miniseries had been shown on television. Though American network television was broadcasting exclusively in color by 1967, European networks transmitted solely in black-and-white until the early 1970s. Therefore, anyone in Italy, France, and Germany who saw the debut broadcasts of Odissea saw them in black-and-white, and might be intrigued to see how well their favorite scenes played in Technicolor on a large theater screen.

RAI-TV hosted the premiere of Odissea on Sunday night, at 9:00 p.m. on March 24, 1968. The series finally consisted of eight one-hour episodes, and continued in its prestigious timeslot for the next six weeks, concluding on May 5 with a special two-hour finale (which led to the program's mistaken description as a seven-episode series in some references).

Episode 1: The focus of this initial segment is on the house of Ulysses, King of Ithaca, where his wife Penelope and teenage son Telemachus find their faith in the voyager's promised return beginning to falter after a passage of twenty years. The palace is invaded by a group of arrogant kings, princes, and soldiers of other cities, led by the insolent Antinous, demanding that Penelope select a new husband from among them. Telemachus assembles men from his father's kingdom for a secret meeting, beseeching their support in his plan to repel the invaders. Word of the meeting gets out, and the would-be suitors disrupt the proceedings and heckle the young prince's futile attempts to oust them. The next morning, Telemachus sets sail with a few others in the hopes of finding his father or, at least, stories of his whereabouts. He arrives at the isle of Phylos, where he is greeted with a great ceremonial meal by King Nestor, a former comrade of his father's, who advises him to seek his answer from King Menelaus of Lacedaemon. Meanwhile, Penelope is distraught by the discovery of her son's departure, and wails at her now complete abandonment. That night, she is awakened by the sudden flaring of a bedside brazier and sees the ghost of her dead sister Iphthime in the flames. Iphthime assures her of the eventual safe return of Telemachus—and Ulysses, who still lives. Indeed he does, but he is the last survivor of his original crew, fighting for survival aboard a small raft in a treacherous, accursed sea . . .

Episode 2: Ulysses emerges from the sea after losing his raft to tumultuous waters. He spies a beautiful woman onshore, whom he mistakes for a goddess. This is Nausicaa, the daughter of King Alcinous of Drepane; she arranges for him to bathe and redress and, noting his regal bearing, invites him to have an audience with her parents. Ulysses meets King Alcinous and Queen Arete, who offer him a meal and note the sophistication of his table manners. After eating his fill, Ulysses explains that he is the king of his own land and requests that a ship be built to return him thence. The request is granted. As its construction gets underway, Ulysses reminisces to Nausicaa (clearly enamored of the handsome stranger) about his most recent adventure, his stranding on the isle of Ogygia, after his ship sank and drowned all his companions. He lived there for seven years in the companionship of the beautiful nymph Calypso, until Zeus finally granted him freedom to leave. Calypso offered him the gift of immortality if he would remain there with her, but he took advantage of the reprieve and built the raft that eventually brought him to Drepane. At an athletic competition, Ulysses is challenged to participate by two of the contestants, who openly suspect he is not what he claims to be, that he is nothing but a deserter. He bests every last one of them in swordfighting, but declines to kill anyone, winning the King's admiration . . .

1 Hank Werba, "Italo TV 'Odyssey' Hits a Homer," Variety, May 22, 1968.

TROY is left in flames after Ulysses and his men penetrate its fortress walls inside the Trojan Horse.

TELEMACHUS (Renaud Verley) meets the former Helen of Troy (Scilla Gabel) while searching for his lost father.

Episode 3: Nausicaa leads a blind man into the presence of Ulysses and her parents. A survivor of the siege of Troy, he recounts the story of how Ulysses and his men hid inside the Trojan Horse to gain access to the city. The story brings Ulysses to tears and he admits his identity to the blind man. Back at Ithaca, the suitors of Penelope grow more impatient and belligerent, and begin to run riot with wine, violence, and abuse of the maids. Meanwhile, Telemachus arrives in Sparta to meet with his father's friend and comrade, King Menelaus, and his wife, the former Helen of Troy. Menelaus receives him warmly as the mature son of an old friend, but he cannot enlighten him as to his father's current whereabouts. Helen remembers her meeting with Ulysses, covered in blood, on the night of the sacking of Troy. Back at the palace of King Alcinous, Ulysses is asked about his travels in the many years since the fall of Troy, and he reminisces about his dead crew members. He explains that they set sail from Troy and next landed on an island where his men became enslaved to a white, addictive powder which they found and consumed in quantity; he had to force their departure when they became lazy and disobedient, and it took many weeks for them to throw off their need and recover their health. They next came ashore in a land teeming with wildlife, where the smoke of a controlled fire attracted their attention. Ulysses suggested that they meet their host, to make sure they have not been stealing from a god, and they enter his cave. There they find an enormous supply of milk and cheese, and a giant axe. The men are frightened and want to leave, but the sound of the cave's returning inhabitant makes it too late for escape . . .

THE CLOUDY-haired subjects of King Aeolus, god of the winds.

Episode 4: Returning to his cave, with a full flock of sheep, is the giant cyclops Polyphemus. Ulysses and his men watch in awe as the giant seals the entrance of the cave with a massive boulder and starts a fire with two stones. An accidental sound alerts the monster to their presence, and Ulysses bravely steps forward. Polyphemus soon kills two of Ulysses' men for a meal, breaking their bones to a powder in his massive fist, bashing their brains out and ripping them limb from limb like game hens, devouring them behind his turned back—as the others look on in horror and revulsion. The giant then bathes his face and sleeps. The next day, while tending his herd, the men set to work clearing the branches from a tree, which they hone into a long spear. They draw straws to see who will give their lives for the success of the others' escape, and when Polyphemus returns, these two dash for cover in a recess within one wall of the cave; the monster reaches inside and, once again, makes a grisly meal of them. Ulysses then offers the cyclops a vat of drugged wine, which is so well liked that Polyphemus promises Ulysses that he will be the last to be eaten. As the giant falls into a deep sleep, Ulysses and his men light the end of the spear and impale the cyclops through his eye, blinding him. The men flee the cave by attaching themselves to the undersides of the sheep, which the blinded giant sets free to graze. Polyphemus becomes aware of their escape, and hears Ulysses boasting his own name as the defeater of this cruellest son of the gods. Enraged, the cyclops begs his father Poseidon, god of the oceans, to curse the ship of those who blinded him and ensure that it never reaches its home port. Terrible weather conditions follow, with tidal waves and furious winds, which run Ulysses' ship aground near the kingdom of Aeolus, the god of the winds. Ulysses scales a wall and finds himself in the banquet hall of this god—fat, owl-browed, with a head full of silvery, frizzy, cloud-like hair—and his identical family members. After hearing of Ulysses' troubles, Aeolus contains the winds working against his progress in a large parcel. With the wind no longer working against him, the ship very nearly reaches its home port—but as Ithaca comes into view, Ulysses' men come to believe that the parcel contains a treasure, and they rip it open—releasing the foul, accursed winds and driving their ship far, far out to sea . . .

Episode 5: Ulysses' crew is sent ashore to collect fresh water and hunt for provisions, but when they do not return, the captain follows in search of his men. He finds only his first mate Eurylochus, who explains that the others were all invited by a woman to dine with her. Eurylochus, sensing a trap, declined and tells Ulysses that he observed as the men were transformed into swine by their hostess. Setting off in search of his enchanted men, Ulysses first encounters the god Hermes, who presents him with a flower that will offer him some protection against the wiles of the enchantress, Circe. After penetrating a wall of flame, Ulysses spies a woman at work on a loom, whom he initially mistakes for his wife, Penelope. He touches her shoulder, and Circe turns to face him. She plies Ulysses with a drugged potion, which he resists. He demands that Circe take him to his men, and she escorts him to a pit full of pigs. She insists that they are happier than they've ever been in their lives, and that by reverting them to men will cause them to be revisited by all the problems and woes of the human condition. Ulysses orders that they be made men again, and Circe complies. He orders the crew to ready their ship for sail, but by the time it is ready, Ulysses himself has fallen under Circe's spell and become her lover. The men are loyal to their captain, and a full year passes before Ulysses is made aware of his enslavement. He begs Circe for his release, and she advises him to visit the land of the Cimmerians, where he should sacrifice a goat to summon the dead and ask the ghost of Tiresias, the prophet of Thebes, for a glimpse of the future awaiting him outside her protected realm. The blood of the slaughtered beast attracts many wandering ghosts—including that of Achilles, and that of Ulysses' mother, of whose death the wanderer has been unaware. Tiresias drinks of the goat's blood and reveals to Ulysses the curse that Polyphemus placed on Ulysses and his men, through his father Poseidon; the seas will never grant them safe passage home. He is cautioned about Penelope's suitors at the palace in Ithaca, and told that he must return home well-disguised and not reveal his identity to anyone until the time is right to reclaim his throne and family. When Ulysses emerges from the Kingdom of the Dead, he rejoins his men and discovers that one of his crew—one whom he regarded as a brother—has died after falling from a tree. Ulysses realizes that the death was do to his neglect, and he determines to continue their homeward voyage even if they fail, because it is better to die in the attempt than to live as a slave.

SEEKING answers from the ghost of Tiresias, Ulysses is besieged by restless spirits thirsting for blood, including the spectre of his own mother.

JULIETTE MAYNIEL as Circe, whose siren song reaches out to Ulysses.

Episode 6: As Ulysses and his men sail away from Circe's island, they must pass through the treacherous area where countless sailors have been run aground by the song of the Sirens. After filling the ears of his rowing crew with beeswax, he asks Eurylochus to tie him firmly to the mast of the ship—he wants to hear the song, but not be able to respond to it. Eurylochus, his own ears plugged, watches in pity as Ulysses experiences the torment of temptation, one of the voices imitating that of his wife, Penelope. The crew looks on in horror as they see the rocks and ocean floor scattered with the bones of the seamen who never cleared this area. They escape the Sirens, proving to Ulysses that there are ways in which men can overcome the will of the Gods. When they next sight land, the crew come ashore and find it well-stocked with longhorned cattle; Ulysses warns his men that these are the sacred cattle of Hyperion and not to be touched. But while Ulysses sleeps, the men slaughter and eat the cattle. This forbidden act raises the ire of Zeus himself and, as the men return to sea, the ocean is used as a veritable weapon against their ship . . . and the Argos sinks, claiming the entire crew—except for Ulysses. This concludes the story of how Ulysses came to arrive in the kingdom of Alcinous, who immediately judges that his guest should no longer have to postpone his return to Ithaca. Instead of finishing the ship that is being built for him, the King orders that Ulysses be escorted home that very day by his own navy. He is delivered to the shores of Ithaca and, according to the warnings of Tiresias, he re-enters his country as a commoner. He is immediately recognized by a goatherd, who turns out to be Athena in earthly disguise, one of many guises she has assumed in watching over the twenty-year journey of Ulysses. She explains that she has secured his release from his curse, but that the battle awaiting him is purely mortal. Ulysses finds his way to a small farm, the home of his old friend Eumaeus, a swineherd, who invites the stranger to share his humble fare. Once inside, Eumaeus is quick to recognize his long-lost king. When he hears that Telemachus has returned to Ithaca from Sparta, Eumaeus invites the young prince to his home—to see if Ulysses can resist revealing himself in the presence of his son. Ulysses struggles in vain to retain his secret, and father and son soon embrace in a clutch that lasts literally from day into night.

Episode 7: As Ulysses approaches his palace, disguised as a beggar, he is immediately recognized by his old dog, who dies shortly after seeing him. Inside, Telemachus covertly orders that the beggar be fed, and Ulysses pockets his bread and sets about pleading for crumbs from the various suitors to test their charity and strength of character. All rudely refuse him, with Antinous demonstrating his offense by hurling a wine gourd at the beggar's turned back. Of all the suitors, only one approaches Ulysses in secret to apologize for his public rudeness. Antinous suggests that the beggar be given a chance to share in the meat served at dinner and challenges him to a fight against one of the most physically formidable men; Ulysses bests him, but refuses to eat the meat. Eumaeus comes to the palace, and together with Ulysses, they reveal his identity to Ulysses' faithful neatherd Philoetius and plot their moves. As night falls, the princes depart for the evening, but Ulysses stays behind, having asked for an audience with Penelope. She asks him to sit opposite her in a chair, but he refuses politely, clinging to the shadows; she recognizes him nevertheless, and cannot fathom his determination to not reveal himself and save her from her circumstances. As he is bathed by his old nursemaid Eurynome, she discovers a telltale scar on his right knee and recognizes him, but he orders her to keep silent. The next day, Penelope—hoping to force her husband out of hiding—announces to the assembled princes that she will marry the man capable of drawing the string of Ulysses' great antlered bow and firing an arrow through the apertures of twelve axe handles—a task which only her husband was ever able to perform. Ulysses himself sets the axe handles in place . . .

Episode 8: One by one, the suitors fail miserably at their attempts to master Ulysses' bow. Finally, the beggar steps forward and asks Penelope for permission to participate. Antinous objects, but the Queen consents. Outside, Eumaeus barricades the doors of the palace to trap everyone inside. As Ulysses lifts the bow, Penelope leaves the room for her private quarters. By subjecting the antlered bow to heat, and by lubricating its hemp string, he makes it easier to manage and thus wins the competition. He then fires a second arrow into the chest of Antinous and signals to Telemachus and Philoetius to let righteous punishment fall upon the heads of the suitors. The main hall of the palace erupts in violence. Melantho, Penelope's maid, who has been cooperative with the princes, rushes to their rescue and throws axes into their hands over the very head of her master. When every last suitor has been slain, the weeping maids who whored themselves to the princes are forced to shroud them and Melantho is put to death for her betrayal. Eurynome informs Penelope that Ulysses has returned and vanquished their enemies, and she runs below into the arms of her son, grateful to find him still alive. "Why do you not greet my father?" he asks. Penelope replies that she does not recognize this man as her husband, and demands that he prove himself by speaking of something which only Ulysses would know: the olive tree. Ulysses explains that Penelope had a favorite olive tree as a child, and loved it so much that he arranged to build their home around it so that their marriage bed would actually be cradled in its boughs. Penelope melts into his embrace. The next day, Ulysses and Telemachus travel to see his father, Laertes. Theirs is a tearful reunion. As Ulysses shows his father the spear and bronze dagger he took as souvenirs of his victory, Laertes' property is visited by a legion of Antinous' grieving people, including his father, who demand satisfaction for his murder. A voice from a tree, that of Athena, advises Ulysses to surrender his prizes and bow to the grieving king for mercy. Finally learning to put aside pride and accept humility before the wisdom of the gods, he does so, and is able to return that night to his palace, to his marriage bed and the arms of his loving wife.

Eight hours of cerebral, heroic drama, Odissea represents the maturation and high watermark of the "sword and sandal" genre which Mario Bava had been instrumental in revitalizing in the 1950s. Every other film of this type which had come before—including the still-admirable version of Ulisse which Dino De Laurentiis co-produced in 1954—limited its scope to violent action and the exploitative values of monsters to be defeated and beautiful women to be romanced. Odissea finds the genre coming of age, venturing beyond mere spectacle into more intellectual, philosophic, and existential concerns, depicting Ulysses as a hero determined to understand his world and himself. This stance is not only essentially true to the original Homeric texts, but represents the personal attitudes of young filmgoers of the late 1960s.

ULYSSES demands that he be tied to the mast but be allowed to hear the sirens' song as the Argos passes the isle of Calypso.

NAUSICAA (left) introduces her parents, King Alcinous (Roy Purcell) and Queen Arete (Marina Berti), to Ulysses.

Cast as Ulysses was Yugoslav actor Bekim Fehmiu, who had recently played a supporting role in Karel Reisz' black comedy Morgan! A Suitable Case for Treatment (1966). Fehmiu was in early ascent as an actor, but he was handsome, talented, adept at physical action, conversant in English, and a Yugoslav—thus satisfying the co-production agreement with Jadran Film. His Ulysses is a mindful adventurer, initially arrogant, sometimes blasphemous if not entirely atheistic, who is determined to test the limits of man's freedom in a world traditionally ruled according to the will of the gods. We are encouraged throughout to ponder the hero's motivations: is he subjecting himself to these tests of character to make himself a better king to his people? To avoid his responsibilities to his wife and son? Is he trying to unshackle himself from the chains of ignorant superstition, or is he envious of the knowledge of the gods and needful of tasting as much of life and experience as possible, damn the consequences? As such, Fehmiu's Ulysses shares many characteristics with the young people of the 1960s—questioning tradition, religion, and family, making mistakes, learning from them, and seeking answers to the eternal questions via a series of "trips" into his inner self. The sequence in which Ulysses demands that Eurylochus bind him to the mast of his ship, that he might hear and resist the song of the Sirens, is a particularly emphatic parallel to the then-contemporary users of LSD, seeking glimpses of alternative realities and personal insights from the security of controlled experimentation.

The renowned Greek actress Irene Papas is no less remarkable in the role of Penelope. Born Irene Lelekou in Chilimodion, Corynth, on September 3, 1929, Papas made early screen appearances in Pietro Francisci's Attila and Riccardo Freda's Teodora, imperatrice di Bisanzio (both 1954, and both Bava side projects), before achieving greater international fame in such productions as The Guns of Navarone (1961), Elektra (1962), and Zorba the Greek (1964). Her few scenes with Fehmiu, particularly their first reunion when Ulysses refuses to admit his identity, are never less than gripping and sometimes emotionally wrenching; indeed, it is a tribute to the power of the reunion scene that it (alone of all the scenes in the miniseries) was carried over to the condensed feature-length cut virtually intact.

The remainder of the cast is a fascinating patchwork of experienced talent and promising newcomers from the various co-production countries involved, who spoke their lines in French, Italian, German, or English, according to their own convenience. Notable among them are Scilla Gabel, absolutely stunning as a haute couture Helen of Troy; Juliette Mayniel (who gave her face to science in Georges Franju's Les Yeux sans Visage/Eyes Without a Face) as Circe, the sorceress who turns men into swine; Renaud Verley (later the star of Claudio Hill's cult horror film La Campaña del Infierno/A Bell From Hell) as Telemachus, the son of Ulysses and Penelope; Gérard Herter (from Caltiki il mostro immortale) as a Trojan citizen demonstrating against the acceptance of the Horse as a gift from the Ithacans; Michèle Breton, later a member of Mick Jagger's ménage a trois in Donald Cammell and Nicolas Roeg's Performance (1970), as Athena; and, as Nausicaa, the young princess who falls in love with Ulysses during his penultimate port of call, a young American actress identified as Barbara Gregorini (her married name at the time), who would later achieve greater fame as an actress and model under the name Barbara Bach and marry the former Beatle, Ringo Starr.

As the principal director of Odissea, Franco Rossi must be credited with the series' overall success, though he also brought to it a number of self-conscious touches which have not aged well—among them the recurring interruption of narration over dialogue (which conveys the unfortunate sense of a "patch-up") and the final episode's use of a literal Greek chorus. These are minor complaints in the context of what is, overall, a magnificent achievement. Rossi's direction is at its best in the final episode, whose violent climax, in retrospect, presages the most bloody, cathartic passages from the films of Sam Peckinpah—particularly Straw Dogs (1971), in which an intellectual (Dustin Hoffman) is called upon to protect his wife (Susan George) and home from a siege of local men fuelled on drink, lust, and machismo. Though not as gory as Straw Dogs or The Wild Bunch (1969), this sequence was unusually bloody for television of its day, with one of Ulysses' victims shown literally vomiting blood onto the pale stone floor as he tries crawling to safety. As Ulysses fires arrow after arrow into the bodies of his fleeing enemies, his gray hair and beard appear to darken, as though literally rejuvenated by the catharsis of revenge—or the reclamation of a long-denied identity.

MISTAKEN for a deserter by Alcinous' soldiers, Ulysses must prove his courage in a test of hand-to-hand combat.

Mario Bava's contribution to Odissea was principally in the realm of special effects, but his duties were eventually enlarged. The series' special effects are credited to "Organo Thomas," with Bava (and his associate, Carlo Rambaldi) receiving no screen credit whatever. As both men are properly credited in the feature version, it would appear that Bava and Rambaldi—as seasoned cinema professionals—were reluctant to be noticed "slumming" for television. In addition to supervising the photography of live miniature effects (Ulysses' ship being tossed by stormy seas, tidal waves, etc. in Episode 4) and executing matte paintings on glass (the city of Troy seen in the tracking shot that introduces the Trojan Horse in Episode 2, and the city of Sparta lining a diagonal hillside in Episode 4), Bava extended second unit photography support to credited director of photography Aldo Giordani (b. 1914)—who had previously photographed such films as Anton Giulio Majano's Seddok (L'erede di Satana)/Atom Age Vampire (1960), Silvio Amadio's Teseo contro i Minotauro/The Minotaur (1960, which also featured a Rambaldi monster) and Andre de Toth and Riccardo Freda's I Mongoli/The Mongols (1961). In the context of Giordani's comparatively straightforward work, Bava's second unit shots are fairly easy to identify, either from characteristic use of the zoom lens for shock effects, or from their use of melodramatic lighting or plays on perspective, all of which would be out of character for Giordani. The final episode, in particular, contains some distinctly Bavian images: the Nevenka-like shots of Penelope seeking refuge in her bed, caressing the empty portion of the mattress where her husband once lay; a shot attending Ulysses' search for his fellow Argonauts on the isle of Circe, which is photographed entirely in the upside-down reflection of a lake; a frightening shot that occurs shortly before the slaughter of the suitors, when Ulysses dips his fingers into a cup of wine and raises them to veil his glowering at the hated Antinous, whose face is thus obscured (from his perspective) by drippings of blood-red wine; and the painterly arrangement of the dead suitors, ravaged and bleeding, on the steps and floor of the main hall.

ITALIAN manifesto.

Bava's presence is most palpable in Odissea in the scenes featuring the giant cyclops, Polyphemus—and with good reason. "My father created all of the special effects for the 'Polifema' episode," explains Lamberto Bava. "To create the effects involving the cyclops, he had to storyboard all the effects shots in advance and decide where the camera would be placed. Franco Rossi soon realized there was not much left for him to do. After the first day of shooting, he came to Mario and asked him to take over as director."

When all was said and done, Bava directed slightly more than one full hour of the eight-hour series. It may seem contradictory that Bava would refuse to direct another film for De Laurentiis, and yet ended up doing (more or less) exactly that, but in this case, Bava's rank protected him from unnecessary distractions. He was answerable only to Rossi, who knew the best results would be obtained by leaving him alone. Bava was therefore was able to enjoy the best of both worlds, being able to focus fully on his creative work, while all of the dealings with the front office fell on Rossi's ready shoulders.

Ulysses' encounter with Polyphemus is, without question, the highlight of the miniseries; it is permeated in a terror-rich atmosphere that is so particular to Bava's genius, we immediately feel that he not only directed the segment and supervised its special effects, but was also in total command of its lighting and cinematography. Elsewhere in the series, Rossi and Giordani's collaboration gives Odissea a bright and naturalistic look, in which even dark scenes are always illuminated by golden flickering candles and roiling braziers. The result is generally realistic. In the Troy scenes—which Rossi turned over to his second unit director Piero Schivazappa (subsequently the director of the extraordinary Femina ridens/The Laughing Woman, 1969)—there is a sudden infusion of shadowy, pensive mood lighting and wide-angle lensing, and during the encounter between Ulysses and Helen of Troy, there is a memorable instance when the invader places a bloody hand on her milk-white throat, but such visual frissons are employed sparingly. When elements of the fantastic crop up later under Giordani's watch, they tend to be expressed on the plane of makeup, wardrobe, or set design, as in the cases of the surfboard-like thrones of King Alcinous' court, or in the frankly Felliniesque appearance of Helen of Troy or King Aeolus and his lookalike family, which evoke futuristic fantasy rather than the ancient past.

However, when Ulysses and his men sally forth into Polyphemus' cave, Odissea is catapulted into a realm of dark, hallucinatory fantasy: the cavern walls are splashed with blue, green and amber light; the camera angles leap high and drop low; the scattered flames lick the air with unreal movement (photographed at a slightly higher speed to give them a sense of immensity); and shadows are dramatically employed to make oversized objects (like Polyphemus' axe) appear even more astonishing, to heighten the story's visual drama, and to romance to the surface the growing, gnawing terror of the captive men.

SAMSON BURKE as Polyphemus, wearing a radio-controlled mask devised by Carlo Rambaldi. In the bottom shot, an actor is held in a giant hand built to scale, positioned in front of a perfectly matched rear projection plate.

Cast as the man-eating Polyphemus was Samson Burke. Born Samuel Berg in Montreal, Canada on April 6, 1930, Burke was another of the North American bodybuilders who sought motion picture fame in Italy. Standing 6' 4" and weighing 245 pounds, Burke had won the titles of Mr. Canada 1952, Mr. Muscle Beach 1960, and Professional Mr. Universe of 1961. Afterwards, he ventured into the world of wrestling, but withdrew after failing to win the world heavyweight title four times. Burke found his fortune when he was cast in the role most bodybuilders of his era aspired to play, in The Three Stooges Meet Hercules (1962). Producer Norman Maurer made the strategic mistake of allowing the film to be shot in black-and-white, which deprives it of much of the splendor found in the genre it's spoofing. Nevertheless, it holds up best of all the feature film projects of stooges Moe Howard, Larry Fine and "Curly" Joe Di Rita. Burke took advantage of his stardom in the picture to seek a continuation of his cinematic fortune in Rome. He was quickly cast as Ursus in Luigi Campiano's Le vendetta di Ursus/The Revenge of Ursus (1961), and as Maciste in Fernando Cerchio's inevitable Totò contro Maciste (1962). Among his other efforts were Umberto Lenzi's Il trionfo di Robin Hood (1963) and Harald Reinl's two-part remake of Die Niebelungen (1966), in which he played Blo-Edin.

Polyphemus was one of Burke's last known film roles, and he gave his entire performance while wearing a mechanical, one-eyed, foam latex mask built by Carlo Rambaldi. Burke's own mouth was exposed, but everything else about the face was operated by cables; it was such a cumbersome apparatus to wear that Burke "nearly suffocated under it," according to Bava.[2] Also constructed by Rambaldi for the episode was a giant-sized mechanical hand, which was used for the shots of Ulysses' men being picked up, crushed to death, and trapped under its massive palm. The prop was approximately seven feet in size and covered in foam latex. Likewise, a twelve-inch mechanical doll was made for Burke to hold and abuse, and its limp, yet believable human weight and movement are remarkable, far more convincing than similar human animation figures seen in the feature films of acknowledged masters like Ray Harryhausen.

Samson Burke looks back on his participation in the episode with bemusement: "I don't remember Bava. They got me at the last minute . . . and I never had a chance to remember the script. I was in a scene with these little lambs, so I put the script under them and could see [it]. I was reading from the script and petting the lambs and reading for about 15 minutes. I couldn't remember the whole thing at once—it was too heavy—so I just read it. Two or three full pages, of just me talking! The strangest part was, the cameraman [Bava] and everyone on the set was clapping and yelling 'Bravo! Bravo!' You never heard a roar like that in your life; you'd think it was the start of an opera or something. They didn't know how I'd remembered all that dialogue. I did a Marlon Brando thing!"[3]

Some years later, while appearing with Rambaldi on the RAI afternoon talk show L'ospite dalle due, Mario Bava was asked to comment on the creation of his special effects for Odissea. "To put it simply," he tried to explain, "there was an immense cave, the cave of Polyphemus, where the actors interacted; it was as big as an entire sound stage. From this, we made an exact copy of the cave, reduced in size, so that the actor who played Polyphemus, with Rambaldi's mask on his face, almost touched the ceiling with his head. So we had the same set in two proportions. It's too complicated to explain; it would be easier with some drawings . . . I don't know, let's take my face as an example: we cover half of it and here [on the other side] we expose the big Polyphemus in the small cave, so that he seems enormous. Then we wind the film back, cover the other [exposed] half, and we match the proportions to those of the men in the real cave. The difficult part of it is that the alignment of the two sides must be precise, hidden by something that keeps the seam invisible."

When Bava's stammering, uncomfortable explanation of double exposure photography resulted in general confusion on the talk show dais, he begged off further elucidation. "Ultimately, I think it is more important to see the effect as it appears than to explain like how it was done," he reasoned. "It can only be a disappointment, after all; it's better to keep the illusion, the dream, alive. I would have to talk for two hours, to explain it properly. We would have to talk about blue back, front projection, matte shots—difficult terms that I would also have to explain, one by one."

The illusion of Polyphemus' great size is masterfully organized, stated first in realistic terms before blending reality and illusion—with the men's awed reaction to various oversized props, like the humongous mound of cheese, the mammoth axe, and the bed that Ulysses traverses (approaching the camera from a starting point of depth) in more than a dozen great strides. Then, before Polyphemus enters, he is proceeded by a shock as a large heap of trees is hurled inside the cave for kindling, followed by the casting of a towering, macabre shadow on the stone wall. The first onscreen appearance of the Cyclops is depicted with a slowly executed reverse zoom, allowing the ogre to blossom before our eyes into the full, astonishing scope of his immensity. Reaction shots of the men's terror bolsters the sense of dread. The revelation of the monster's single eye is withheld till last, and Bava is extremely careful never to play the same special effects card twice; the double-exposed, meticulously matched shots which show Ulysses and his men dwarfed by their host and his crackling fires are used only once, and reappear only when a new angle can refresh them. The shots of the two men being lifted and killed in his hand are effective not only by virtue of the craftsmanship evident in the props, but by the actors' performances, and the unexpected cutaway to a startling blue-back shot that seamlessly merges the actor in the giant hand to the gigantic head and shoulder shot of Polyphemus added to the background. The merging is perfected not only in the alignment of the elements but in a perfect continuation of atmospheric lighting. Most frightening of all is the moment when Polyphemus turns away from the other men, brains the two captives by clubbing their heads against a rock, dangles them over an open flame, and then rips them apart like roast poultry—a process articulated almost entirely through the muscles in Burke's turned back, and the nauseated, despairing reactions of the onlookers. Later—in a scene that hearkens back to the staking of Dr. Kruvajan in La maschera del demonio—when the men succeed in ramming a flaming spike into the sleeping monster's eye, Bava milks the actual blinding for all its worth, depicting Polyphemus from the men's point of view, the wobbling stake extending toward the viewer in a pseudo-3-dimensional composition that conveys a sense of the full range of human sight. Burke evokes genuine pity as he flails about in pain and dotes the next morning over the sheep he must now trust to graze on their own.

TWO SHOTS illustrative of Mario Bava's split-screen technique. Top: Polyphemus is made to tower over Ulysses and his men by a seamless split that follows the edge of the cave wall along the bottom of the brazier. Bottom: Here, the foregrounded wooden post in the center of the frame marked the territory of the separately photographed elements.

If Bava was entrusted with the direction of the Polyphemus segment because his special effects duties placed him in complete control of the camera placement, he must have also been the de facto director of Ulysses' encounter with the spirits of the dead in Cimmeria. This disturbing passage—with its hero engulfed by legions of mournful, bloodthirsty ghosts, led by Tiresias with his mouth mottled with blood—is photographed with a highly mobile camera, which would preclude the obvious, more static solution of matching on-set action to action reflected from an adjacent stage onto a pane of glass angled in front of the camera. Instead, it would appear that the various shots were meticulously blocked and timed to allow for the seamless combination of two separately filmed elements: one of Fehmiu acting in the studio, and the other of the dead, photographed on the same set after it had been blanketed in black. Some of the individual shots, particularly those in which Ulysses rests his head on the lap of his mother's ghost and when Tiresias' face overlaps with that of the hero to speak through his mouth, are perfect in their execution.

While perhaps the most outstanding showcase Bava ever had for his special effects ingenuity, Odissea also deserves recognition as a high point of his directorial career. The Polyphemus episode is, in many ways, the heart of the entire drama as it is here that Ulysses brings upon himself, and his men, the curse of Poseidon that prevents their homecoming. It is also in this episode that Fehmiu most embodies the hero of legend—scheming, physical, resourceful, boastful—rather than the mortal man seasoned by remarkable experience whom Rossi sought to capture. Without Bava's fantastical imagery, the series' overall construction would have been greatly diminished. As it is presented in the serial version, the Polyphemus story is mildly damaged by its commencement near the end of Episode 3, which imposed a week-long disruption of the suspense which Bava built into the scenes leading up to the demigod's arrival in Episode 4. The entirety of Bava's footage was not shown, as a whole, until a 1995 retrospective of his work on RAI-3 TV.

2 Bava, L'ospite dalle due, RAI-TV.

3 Samson Burke as quoted in "Canadian Hercules," Larry Anderson and Gordon Harmer, Spaghetti Cinema 75, June 2004, 7-11.

The Polyphemus episode, and the series at large, also shares another important component with Bava's most memorable work: the music of Carlo Rustichelli. Rustichelli composed some unmistakably characteristic music for the series, all arranged and conducted by Bruno Nicolai (a former amanuensis of Ennio Morricone, and a brilliant composer in his own right), including a tyrannical march theme accented with stings of distorted electric guitar (played by Alessandro Alessandroni), used to introduce the opening invasion of Penelope's suitors; an ethereal romantic theme, interwoven with spectral melismi from a female vocalist (likely the legendary Edda dell'Orso), which recalls the nostalgic music composed for Chris Marker's La Jetée (1962) by Trevor Duncan; and, for the Bava episode, a chilling suite of churning strings that evokes potent memories of the Maestro's misterioso cues for La frusta e il corpo and Sei donne per l'assassino. In fact, some of the music heard in the grim final episode, in particular, is nearly identical to some Sei donne cues, with Alessandroni's guitar replacing the former's lead alto saxophone. It is not Rustichelli's most original score, but it is an effective one, and familiar enough to enhance one's awareness throughout of Bava's presence on the set.

ULYSSES and the Argonauts prepare to blind Polyphemus with a red-hot stake as he sleeps.

BLINDED by the voyagers, Polyphemus raises a boulder to sink their escaping ship.

Regrettably, Odissea would mark the last collaboration between Mario Bava and his greatest musical ally. Reflecting on the value of their fruitful partnership, Rustichelli had no explanation for why it did not continue past this final triumph: "I never quarreled with Bava, as far as I can recall. I don't know why our paths didn't cross again. Maybe it was because, after we worked this last time, I began to work abroad—in Russia, Japan, France, and the United States, conducting orchestras. Maybe another reason we didn't meet again was the Italian tendency to economize; they began to do the soundtracks utilizing only electronic instruments. I took a more synchronous approach to film music; I 'clothed the actors with music,' in a manner of speaking. I respected that synchronism. Today, synchronisms are ignored by the musicians and groups that do so many of our soundtracks; all they have to do is play loud.

"I'm sorry, but I have no other recollections of Bava," Rustichelli concluded. "I don't believe we met again after our collaborations. Surely, we never had any disagreements; we were both able to control our temper. I've always been very good at working with directors, even bad ones . . . This wasn't the case with Bava, of course! With the bad directors, I always let them believe that I was doing exactly what they told me, while at the same time doing precisely as I wanted."

Le avventure di Ulisse

In August 1969, more than a year after the first broadcast of Odissea, Paramount Pictures released the condensed, feature-length version of the material, entitled Le avventure di Ulisse/The Adventures of Ulysses. Though this theatrical edition represents the cutting of more than 500 minutes of screen time, the removal of many important supporting characters, and the omission of some key scenes, the film not only survives its radical reduction but compares favorably to every other feature adaptation of the story made to date.

Le avventure di Ulisse could be said to vulgarize the TV version to some extent because it reorders the original version's involuted approach and renders it more or less chronological, after the initial scenes of Penelope's home being invaded by her suitors. While the original series gives the viewer (and the characters) space in which to breathe and think, the feature version quickens the pace of the storytelling, as befits a movie of this kind, but without betraying the intellectual, introspective tenor of the material. The feature drastically shortens the material it accommodates, but unlike the series, it allows that material to unfold without serial interruption or cutaways to Ulysses telling these stories in the present tense. Some changes were made to the film in terms of dialogue, in response to the cutting of certain sequences. For example, the entire sequence of the reunion of Ulysses and Telemachus at the farmer's home was omitted, so the dialogue was retooled to deceive audiences into perceiving their later meeting at the palace as being their reunion. Nevertheless, some of the shot transitions evince such cleverness that it is hard to imagine that the component shots were not initially conceived to complement one another; a good example is the shot of the angry suitors discovering the nightly unravelling of the shroud Penelope is weaving for Laertes, which they throw to the floor and trample, which cuts to a shot of the same woven fabric serving as the sail on Ulysses' ship. The images synchronize well in this alternative montage, though they appear a few episodes apart in the serial presentation.

The value of Mario Bava's contribution to Odissea is particularly evident from the fact that Le avventure di Ulisse devotes more than twenty minutes of its screen time to the Polyphemus story: although reduced by two-thirds of its original running time, it accounts for roughly one-fifth of the feature's length, in contrast to the series, of which it occupied approximately one-eighth of the total length. The Polyphemus episode also contributed more than any other highlight to the film's advertising campaign, which depicted Ulysses' men preparing to blind the sleeping monster.

ITALIAN locandina, highlighting Mario Bava's "Polyphemus" segment.

Despite securing distribution from Paramount, The Adventures of Ulysses appears to have gone without a proper theatrical release in the United States. One-sheet posters, theatrical stills, or heralds for the picture never turn up on the collector's market. The few Americans who have seen this condensed version did so in the late 1970s, when it premiered, edited and with commercial interruptions, on The CBS Late Movie, with Mario Bava prominently credited onscreen as director of the Polyphemus scenes. This version found Bekim Fehmiu's performance dubbed by Dan Sturkie (who previously voiced John Richardson in the ELDA dub of The Mask of Satan, and Reg Park in Hercules in the Haunted World), Irene Papas looped by the ubiquitous Carolyn De Fonseca, and the booming voice of Polyphemus provided by the man who supervised the dubbing sessions, actor–director Mel Welles. For this late night broadcast, repeated once again in 1980, the slaughter of the suitors was removed in its entirety by the network censors, rendering the entire presentation pointless.

When asked what he believes to be his father's greatest achievement, Lamberto Bava points to the "Polyphemus" episode of Odissea without hesitation. This opinion may surprise Bava's American admirers, since the program is today almost completely unknown in the United States. In the three decades since its Italian premiere, it has never been broadcast in its entirety in the US, despite the existence of an English-dubbed version, The Odyssey, which was shown in Canada and made available for a while as a 16 mm rental for use in classrooms. However, in Europe, it was a phenomenal hit, never to be forgotten—especially by young viewers who got their first taste of cinematic terror at the feet of the towering Polyphemus. Such was the impact of this episode that, nearly a decade after the filming of Odissea, Mario Bava would be identified in the advance trade ads for a stillborn project, (Baby Kong) not as the genius behind La maschera del demonio, Sei donne per l'assassino, or Diabolik, but as "the inventor of Polifema."

JOHN HARRINGTON (Stephen Forsyth) requires wedding apparel as a talisman for murder in IL ROSSO SEGNO DELLA FOLLIA.

IL ROSSO SEGNO DELLA FOLLIA

Hatchet for the Honeymoon

PUBLISHED FILMOGRAPHIES of Mario Bava's work disagree about the order in which his next two films—Il rosso segno della follia and Four Times That Night—were produced and released. Both productions were troubled, and neither film would receive a general release until years after it was completed. However, by comparing the various recollections of those involved, it is possible to reconstruct the likely order of events.

LAURA BETTI with longtime friend, writer–director Pier Paolo Pasolini.

The best place to begin is with actress Laura Betti, who plays the major female role in Il rosso segno della follia. She was born Laura Trombetti in Bologna on May 1, 1934, and began her career as a jazz vocalist, performing under the name Laura Sarno. After releasing an album of Kurt Weill songs, she became the darling of Rome's literary set and had lyrics penned especially for her by such admirers as Alberto Moravia and Mario Soldati. In 1958, she met the poet and novelist Pier Paolo Pasolini, and this association would change her life. As one of Pasolini's inner circle, Laura became a prominent figure of Rome's avant garde and was nicknamed "la Giaguara" (the Jaguar) by the press for her platinum helmet-shaped hairdo and comma-shaped eyebrows, which she drew on near her temples.

Her notoriety landed her a role in Federico Fellini's La dolce vita, which led to other film appearances in Giuseppe Bennati's Labbra rosse ("Red Lips," 1960), Roberto Rossellini's Era notte a Roma ("It Was a Night in Rome," 1960), Gianni Proia's Ecco [Il mondo di notte n. 3, "The World by Night 3," 1963], and several Pasolini omnibus films, including Le streghe/The Witches. In September 1968, her disturbing yet poignant performance as the mute servant in Pasolini's Teorema was recognized by the Office Catholique International du Cinéma, which awarded her the prestigious Volpi Cup for Best Actress. In a perverse gesture of triumph, she celebrated her victory by telephoning Mario Bava, whom she did not know personally, and asking for a part in his next film.

"I used to adore horror films, as I still do, because they made me laugh," she explained. "And so I used to see the Bava films . . . and I could see that his horror films were very ironical and the way he was shooting them was . . . well, as you know, many great directors copied Bava. Do you remember the short Fellini film with Terence Stamp? Anyway, in Italy, I was always considered an intellectual actress. Bava, in my opinion, was a fantastic director, but he was also the opposite, let us say, of an intellectual filmmaker. After my victory—after that consecration—I called Bava and said, 'Here it is, my Oscar, my prize, and now I want to shoot something with you!' And he immediately got my joke, do you see? He knew that he wasn't an intellectual, but he had the same ironical point of view, as I do, about intellectuals. So that was the beginning of our friendship. Immediately—and I do mean immediately—he found a film and we shot it."

Because Four Times That Night is documented (in the personal diary of its star, Daniela Giordano) to have been in production from October to December 1968, Betti's stressing of the word "immediately" must be taken seriously. This would mean that Bava was already in preproduction on Il rosso segno della follia at the time Betti contacted him, and addressed himself to the task of working into the finished script a new role suitable for an actress of Betti's stature. He began shooting just a short time after Betti won the Volpi Cup, but the production ran out of money before it was

Il rosso segno della follia

"The Red Sign of Madness"
Working title: Un'accetta per la luna di miele,
"A Hatchet for the Honeymoon"
Filmed in Barcelona and Rome
September – October 1968, completed early 1969
First released: June 2, 1970
Eastmancolor, 1.85:1, 88 minutes

Production: Pan Latina Films (Madrid) and Mercury Films (Rome), Peliculas Ibarra y Cia S.A. Producers: Manuel Caño Sanciriaco, Giuseppe Zaccariello (uncredited). Associate producer: Enzo Ferla. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant directors: Lamberto Bava and Ricardo Walker. Screenplay: Santiago Moncada [Other sources add Mario Bava and Mario Musy]. Continuity: Patrizia Zulini. Director of photography: Mario Bava. (Some sources credit Antonio Rinaldi as D.P.) Camera operators: Jaime Deu Casas and Emilio Barriano [Varriano]. Camera assistants: Avelino Carla and Marcello Anconetani. Art direction: Jesús Maria Herrero. Makeup: Elisa Aspach and Piero Mecacci. Wardrobe: José M. Tresserra. Production supervisor: Jaime Fernandez Cid. Production assistants: Pedro Villanova and Graciano Fabiani. Editor: Soledad Lopez Ramirez. Music: Sante Romitelli, [RCA]. Stills: José Adrian and Giuseppe Parrabano. Distributor: Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

Stephen Forsyth (John Harrington), Laura Betti (Mildred Harrington), Dagmar Lassander (Helen Wood), Jesús Puente (Inspector Russell), Femi Benussi (Alice), Antonia Mas (Louise), Alan Collins [Luciano Pigozzi] (Vences), Veronica Llimera (Betsy), Guido Barlocci (John as child), Silvia Lienas (Vicky), José Ignacio Abadaz (Jimmy), Gérard Tichy (Dr. Kalleway), Elina De Witt, Fortunato Pasquale, Bruno Boschetto, Montserrat Riva (bride on train).

Additional US credits: N. W. Russo presents a University Associates Production. English dubbing directed by Mel Welles. Voices: Rodd Dana (John Harrington), Mel Welles (Inspector Russell).

Spain: Un Hacia para la Luna de Miel, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Ibérica S.A., 9/14/70, 83m
UK: Blood Brides, Tigon British World Services, 2/73, 87m 33s, Certificate "X," passed with no cuts
US: Hatchet for the Honeymoon, GGP Release, Color by Movielab, 2/9/74, 88m. TV: Embassy Pictures Corporation completed, and was temporarily left unfinished while its producer sought additional funds. It was during that window of time when Bava—needing the money—accepted the invitation to direct Four Times That Night.

CANADIAN actor Stephen Forsyth as John Harrington, paranoiac.

Il rosso segno della follia was initiated by an independent Spanish producer named Manuel Caño. Born Manuel Caño Sanciriaco in 1931 in Tamames, Salamanca, Castilla y León, Spain, Caño became a producer after working for nearly a decade as a narrator and voice actor on various films, establishing himself with a trio of internationally successful Tarzan films, starring Los Angeles Rams linebacker Mike Henry: Tarzan in the Valley of Gold (1966), Tarzan and the Great River (1967), and Tarzan and the Jungle Boy (1968), which were directed by Robert Day in Mexico and South America.[1] Caño went on to become a not-particularly-distinguished director in his own right, later helming the Florida-made Swamp of the Ravens (1973, scripted by Santiago Moncada) under the pseudonym "Michael Cannon," and then, under his own name, Vudu Sangriento/Voodoo Black Exorcist (1974). He is still active in films today, and has racked up an impressive number of screen credits in the capacity of actor, writer, producer, director, and composer.

Laura Betti revealed that although his name does not appear on the picture, Il rosso segno della follia was in fact co-produced by Giuseppe Zaccariello, an Italian producer–director with whom Bava would work again on future projects. Born in Campania, Zaccariello started out as a magliaro, a travelling salesman of cheap fabrics, in which profession he travelled the breadth and width of northern Europe and made many contacts. When he returned to Italy, he married the daughter of a tile factory magnate. "Having come into some money, he returned to Rome with the idea of being a producer," explains screenwriter Filippo Ottoni. "Of course, he only wanted to produce films in order to romance the actresses. He had the worst motivations that you can imagine, but he was a very sweet character . . . rather uneducated but, at the same time, very intuitive." Zaccariello's earliest productions were typically international co-productions of a soft erotic nature, such as La scuola della vergine ("The School for Virgins," 1966), and he veiled his participation in them by adopting the pseudonym "Josef Zachar."

A chance restaurant meeting with director Elio Petri, who needed 80 million lire to complete his work-in-progress, led to Zaccariello (who, as legend has it, had the money on him) becoming the de facto producer of A ciascuno il suo/We Still Kill the Old Way (1967), a popular success. Zaccariello subsequently produced Femina ridens/The Laughing Woman (1969), a delirious Pop Art bondage fantasy starring Philippe Leroy and Dagmar Lassander, written and directed by Piero Schivazappa, who, like Bava, had directed an episode of Odissea. The special effects of this Italian/German/French co-production were devised by Carlo Rambaldi, and it is possible that Bava and Zaccariello crossed paths while visiting, counseling, or assisting Rambaldi on the set. The production team itself included a number of artists and technicians who would subsequently join the Bava squad—editors Carlo Reali and Roberto Sterbini, and composer Stelvio Cipriani, to name a few.

The shooting script—entitled Un hacha para la luna de miel (literally, "A Hatchet for the Honeymoon")—was the work of the aforementioned Santiago Moncada, whose byline would subsequently appear on some of the most intelligent horror films to originate from Spanish-language territories in the 1970s and '80s: Claudio Guerin Hill's La Campaña del Infierno/A Bell From Hell and Juan Antonio Bardem's La Corrupcion de Chris Miller/The Corruption of Chris Miller (both 1973), Jess Franco's Solo Ante del Terror (1981) and many others—dark psychological thrillers whose uniformity (and perversity) of vision reflect a true genre auteur. Moncada's name also sometimes appeared on films that he reportedly had nothing to do with, presumably to attract Spanish co-production funds; a case in point being the Spanish-language print of Sergio Martino's Lo strano vizio della signora Wardh/Next! (1971), which Ernesto Gastaldi insists he scripted himself.

"It was a story that came from Spain almost pre-packaged," remembers Lamberto Bava. "The producer, a Spaniard, was a con man, known throughout Spain as someone to be on your guard about, but my father always liked producers who were a little dodgy."

The title Il rosso segno della follia may have been coined by Bava himself. Though it has no reference to anything in the picture itself, it recalls a line from Oscar Wilde's novel The Portrait of Dorian Gray: "Suddenly there had fallen upon his brain that tiny scarlet speck that makes men mad."

Lamberto Bava remembers that his father revised the script for this picture more extensively than any other he undertook. Moncada's original screenplay was more straightforward, presenting "Juan" as a mannequin fetishist who murders the women who betray him (i.e., the models who abruptly leave his employ to be married) on their wedding nights, thus preserving the innocence symbolized by their lily-white apparel, and reducing them to mannequins incapable of rebuffing his affections. He is compelled to murder by visions triggered by his death-dealing blows, which progressively unlock the door that suppresses a childhood trauma; in order to know himself, he must continue to kill. Juan is lured into a genuine relationship with one of his models, who is eventually revealed (in a twist derived from Edgar Wallace, or possibly Edgar G. Ulmer's Bluebeard) to be a policewoman, the sister of an earlier victim, working undercover to entrap him. Bava was attracted to the script despite its redundancies, knowing that he could develop it into something personal—exactly the kind of small, intimately personal horror film he was craving to make. One of the personal touches he added was to give the heroine the talismanic name shared by his sister and daughter, Elena—which became "Helen" when the film was later dubbed into English.

1 For some reason, the producer credited on American International's domestic prints is one Sy Weintraub.

When Laura Betti surprised Bava by ringing him up and asking for a part in his next movie, he was flattered and intrigued—but her request also put him in a difficult position. Moncada's script had no role suitable for an actress of Betti's type—short, in her mid-thirties, more striking than glamorous—only a series of sexy fashion models ripe for murder. But Bava accepted the challenge and worked with Betti to develop a suitable role for her to play, and to restructure the existing story around her presence. In the process, Bava's marital aggravations were joyously vented in entirely new second and third acts that owe something to Noël Coward's Blithe Spirit (or, more likely, David Lean's 1945 film of the play). Thus was born the memorable character of Juan's—now John's—shrewish wife Mildred, and thus was Moncada's story transformed into a delicious comedie noir lamenting a murderer's inability to escape his "better half."

JOHN*'s mother at the moment of her death—a haunting memory which John seeks to better understand through acts of murder.*

Synopsis

A handsome man creeps along a train corridor, exchanging furtive glances with a young boy who is studying his actions. Using a pass key, the man lets himself into a private compartment where a honeymooning couple stand in the early stages of lovemaking. He slaughters the husband and wife with a small cleaver, which he cleans afterwards by wiping the blood onto the female victim's bridal veil.

The killer, John Harrington, is the affluent director of the House of Harrington, a Parisian fashion salon specializing in women's wedding apparel. The female victim is Rosy Miller, a former Harrington model—the third to be murdered on her wedding night in less than a year, while four others have disappeared without a trace—having been fed to the incinerator in John's hothouse, their ashes fertilizing his tropical flowers.

John inherited his salon from his mother, who was murdered on the night of her second wedding, and his wife Mildred's business sense has turned it into a thriving operation. Impotent and a self-described "paranoiac," John has never consummated his marriage, a deprivation which has turned his frustrated wife's attentions to spiritualism and the hope of establishing contact with her late, first husband—also named John. John Harrington is likewise preoccupied with the dead: a witness to his mother's murder, he cannot remember the details . . . and so, whenever a model from his salon quits to be married, he slays them on their wedding night, a therapeutic act which helps to bring the events of that fuzzy trauma a little more into focus.

John is suspected of the murders by Inspector Russell, who has no evidence on which to arrest him. Shortly after Rosy's murder, a new model—Helen Wood—is hired to fill the vacated post. Helen senses that John's marriage is troubled and tries to seduce him, without success. Mildred, suspecting John of infidelity, pretends to visit an ailing sister but flies back home the same night, expecting to surprise him with another woman. Tired of her incessant nagging, but unable to commit murder without the talisman of a wedding gown to trigger his violence, John dons a wedding veil himself and kills Mildred with a hatchet! Her screams are overheard by Inspector Russell, paying an unexpected visit, but John explains the cries by turning on the television—where a local station is running Bava's I tre volti della paura!

That night, John buries Mildred in the garden . . . but the next day, he learns that, despite her murder, Mildred remains visible to everyone but him! Crazed with paranoid anxiety, he exhumes her body and incinerates it, placing her ashes in a dusty satchel. Taking the "old bag" to a local bar for some much-needed refreshment, John is aghast when the waiter asks the bag what Madam would like to drink! At wit's end, John scatters the ashes into a river, after which Helen seeks him out and tries to offer some consolation. The temptation to solve his internal puzzle becomes overwhelming, but Helen dodges the hatchet as it falls—and summons the lurking Inspector Russell as John lies helpless, reaching the only possible answer to his Oedipal puzzle: that it was he who murdered his mother and stepfather in a jealous rage on their wedding night. Russell commends Helen—the sister of the late Rosy Miller—for her bravery in agreeing to entrap her sister's murderer, as she breaks down in tears.

John is placed under arrest and committed to a mental institution for the rest of his life. As he is driven away in a paddy wagon, an attending officer places a familiar satchel beside him—and the sound of Mildred's cackling laughter tells John that he will be haunted by the old bag for the rest of his life!

Cast

Canadian actor Stephen Forsyth—born in Montreal on September 22, 1938—had worked in the Italian cinema for several years before being cast as John Harrington. He made his debut as Golo in José Luís Monter's Genoveffa di Brabante (1964), an Italo/Spanish co-production scripted by Riccardo Freda. Forsyth eventually ascended to the second male lead in La morte non conta di dollari/Death at Owell Rock (1967), a Western directed by Freda under the pseudonym "George Lincoln." Of the dozen or so films he made, the one of which he is most proud is Valerio Zurlini's Seduto alla sua destra/Black Jesus (1968), a violent political drama starring the American actor Woody Strode. He is aware that Il rosso segno della follia is the film he's best remembered for, and admits with good humor that his friends are fond of teasing him about his performance as the wedding-veiled hatchet man, and of quoting his immortal opening line, "My name is John Harrington . . . I am a paranoiac."

Forsyth is also aware that his performance has taken some knocks over the years for its perceived shortcomings. He has been accused of being stiff and inexpressive, but, in fact, he gives a fumetti-style performance that was deliberately cultivated in Italian thrillers of this period. The idea was to cast attractive people, put them in attractive settings and involve them in deeds revolting and unattractive—like murder. In the particular case of Il rosso segno della follia, Forsyth's seemingly wooden performance is a critical element in suggesting a man whose interior life is his entire life, and in echoing his relationship to the mannequins in his private collection.

"I read something recently, where someone said that I was a 'singularly colorless' actor," he chuckles. "I told my friends about it, and said, 'Well, at least I was singularly colorless!'" When I told him that I thought he was quite perfect in the film, he said, "Well, to be serious, Bava must have thought so too, because he cast me and he never told me I was doing anything wrong. So it must have been what he wanted."

In hindsight, Forsyth wishes that he had more instruction from his director: "I really didn't get any direction from Bava, which was very isolating for me, as an actor. One day, I went up to him and said, 'Mario, you've never said anything to me—ever.' He had never really directed me, or made a correction to me, of any kind. So I said, 'Listen, Mario, if there's anything you don't like, or if there's anything you might want to tell me or explain to me . . . [please do.]' He smiled and he said, 'Listen, if you were doing anything wrong, if there was anything I had to tell you, I would tell you.' Much more time was spent preparing the sets, the lighting. I was shooting almost every day, and I would get there in the morning and most of the day had gone by, by the time they got the sets ready. It was the same, whether we were in Italy or Barcelona. The day shots were a little different, because we needed to get them done while it was still daylight, but for the interiors, it took an incredible amount of time. I'd be made up and ready to go, but by the time they got ready for me, I was asleep somewhere!"

JOHN in his mannequin menagerie.

Czech actress Dagmar Lassander—born in Prague on June 16, 1943—appears to have skyrocketed to stardom by appearing frequently nude in Andrea—wie ein Blatt auf Nackter Haut ("Andrea . . . Like a Leaf on Naked Skin," 1968), directed by Hans Schott-Schöbinger.[2] Afterwards, she relocated to Rome and starred as the abducted heroine in the aforementioned Femina ridens. Il rosso segno della follia was her first work outside the erotic cinema, to which she briefly returned in Luciano Ercoli's Le foto proibite di una signore per bene/Forbidden Photos of a Lady Above Suspicion (1970). Her subsequent career consisted of secondary (and eventually, character) roles in such horror films as Riccardo Freda's L'iguana dalle lingua di fuoco/Iguana

2 A well-publicized shot of Lassander in this film, reclining on a bed with leaves strategically covering her nude body, may have inspired a similar shot of Elke Sommer in Bava's Lisa and the Devil.

FEMI BENUSSI as Alice, a model at John's salon who makes the mistake of announcing her engagement.

With the Tongue of Fire (1971) Lucio Fulci's Quella villa accanto al cimitero/The House By the Cemetery (1981), and Lamberto Bava's Oceano rosso/Devilfish a.k.a. Monster Shark (1984).

Today, Lassander remembers Il rosso segno della follia without affection. She was told by the film's producers to lose approximately twenty-five pounds before filming commenced, and after meeting this difficult goal, she arrived on the set only to discover that the lead role (which she expected to be hers) was now being played by Laura Betti. She remembers that Betti was "extremely rude" to her on the set, and as she spoke only German and a little English at the time, she found it "extremely difficult" to communicate with her director. The paramour of producer Manuel Caño at the time of filming, Lassander later took legal action against her ex-lover when he failed to make good on his agreement to bill her above Laura Betti on all advertising, and emerged from the litigation with enough cash reward "to let me live la dolce vita for a while." (The film's original export trailers only added salt to Lassander's wounds by labelling a shot of Laura Betti as "Dagmar Lassander," and vice versa!) Lassander takes a measure of satisfaction in remembering that, when she next crossed paths with Betti in a Roman clothing store in the early 1980s, she was able to snub her in return.

Cast in the minor role of the ill-fated model Alice was Yugoslavian starlet Femi Benussi (b. Eufemia Benussi, 1948), who had previously appeared as similar window-dressing in Il boia scarlatto/The Bloody Pit of Horror. As the freedoms of the screen increased toward the end of the decade, Benussi—sometimes billed as "Femy Benuzzi" or "Femy Martin"—began to specialize in more frankly erotic roles. Among her later films were Alfredo Rizzo's La sanguisuga conduce la danza/The Bloodsucker Leads the Dance a.k.a. The Passion of Evelyn (1975) and Antonio Margheriti's Finalmente . . . Le mille e una notte/1001 Erotic Nights (1972). Veronica Llimera, who appears briefly as Betsy (one of John's "near-victims"), later appeared in Amando de Ossorio's La noche del Terror Ciego/Tombs of the Blind Dead (1971). She has no particular recollections of working for Mario Bava today.

Two familiar faces of the Italian horror film can be found lurking in the background of Il rosso segno della follia, in thankless roles. "Alan Collins" a.k.a. Luciano Pigozzi—last seen as La Fôret in Nude . . . si muore—here plays Vences, much the same role he played in Bava's Sei donne per l'assassino five years earlier. Sadly, the "Italian Peter Lorre" is poorly represented in the final cut, appearing in only two short walk-ons, given one thankless line ("Mr. Harrington, we'd like to have you take a look at these sketches") and not a single close-up. Gérard Tichy—the star of Alberto De Martino's Horror/The Blancheville Monster (1963), to which Bava may have contributed some uncredited special effects—is given the even more anonymous role of Dr. Kalleway, Mildred's spiritual advisor, appearing all but offscreen during the brief seance he oversees.

And then there is Laura Betti, who gives one of the finest performances Mario Bava ever committed to film. When I first wrote to her, asking for her recollections of Bava, she responded with the following letter:

"I deeply loved Mario Bava, both as a director for his irony, which wound through even his most horrific films, and as a person for his human charge.

"He was a very sweet man—the sweetest. He knew cinema like nobody else, like a Renaissance artisan, a real craftsman. He could simplify anything. His splendid special effects were done with almost ridiculous means: a planet was achieved by pouring a small maize pudding on a wooden table. He could make me fly in the air, instead of walking, by simply lying himself on the floor with his camera and waving his hand up and down in front of it—I flew! A dark forest where there was none? On location on a long desert beach, he agitated one or two tree branches in front of the camera lens and created the thickest woods. Half a pound of tripe, animated at a distance by two electrical wires, resulted in the most terrifying monster, climbing up model stairs and walls.

"He was in love with his dog, a basset hound so long that the poor thing could not turn around on its legs by itself. So when we were walking him and were supposed to go back, we had to stop and lift the back end of the dog, who could then trot in the right direction. He nursed the dog like a baby. With his love for the cinema and animals, he made me realize that acting is a deed of love, of giving rather than receiving.

"I could talk about Mario for days on end; by letter, it is too difficult. To sum things up, I would say that his films mirrored his purity. In his own way, he was a poet." [3]

Production & Special Effects

Il rosso segno della follia was filmed in September and early October 1968 in Barcelona, Rome, and Paris. Two short years after Dino De Laurentiis had placed him at the helm of a multi-million dollar production, Bava was back to making another three-week horror programmer, budgeted between $100–150,000 . . . entirely by choice.

Although he denied being afraid of success, Bava had deliberately retreated from the level of filmmaking where more dollars equalled more creative interference. Ironically, and much to his annoyance, the location chosen for Chez Harrington—the Barcelona villa of none other than Generalissimo Francisco Franco—required Bava to put up with as much production interference as he had suffered with De Laurentiis.

Bava compared the two experiences himself: "While we were making Diabolik," Bava recalled, "that famous lawsuit against the sadistic comic magazines was going on in Italy. To avoid controversy, De Laurentiis had insisted that not one drop of blood be shed in the film! Can you imagine—with a character like Diabolik? When I was in Spain making Il rosso segno della follia in Franco's villa, the city guard was looking over my shoulder every minute, making sure that we didn't stain the staircase with blood!" [4]

Likewise, one of Laura Betti's abiding memories of the shoot was "lots of police." The constant vigil of armed security guards ensured that Manuel Caño's production respect its agreement not to shoot on the private upstairs floors of the villa, and not to damage the property or its furnishings in any way; they also brought an oppressive gravity to the process of filmmaking that worked against Bava's usual festive on-set atmosphere.

Not only did Bava rework the script in advance of shooting; he also improvised on the set whenever the spirit moved him. "We would rewrite scenes together," Betti laughed. "Mario pretended that the script was nothing, that we had to work on the set to improve upon what was written before. This is something that is not considered normal in America, yet I must tell you that all Italian directors do this. Even Fellini, Pier Paolo [Pasolini], and Bernardo [Bertolucci]. They all improvise; it's typical of the Italian style. I used to tell Mario, 'Now you are behaving like Pier Paolo!' and he became defensive, saying, 'Yes? Well, he is an intellectual and I am not.' And I would laugh and say, 'Well, you are doing the same thing anyway!'"

The revision of the script resulted in unhappy consequences for the film's intended lead actress, Dagmar Lassander. "Bava and I had rewritten

ALICE is added to John's menagerie after trying on a wedding dress presented as a gift from her employer.

3 Laura Betti, letter to the author, April 23, 1985.

4 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

MILDRED*'s sexual frustrations are maliciously teased by John as a prelude to murder.*

the film so that I was the female lead," recounted Betti. "Dagmar Lassander was sort of . . . 'protected' by the producer, you understand. We were expected to be very kind to her, very nice, et cetera. In Italian scripts, each page is divided in two; on the left is the action, and all of the dialogue appears on the right. What actors are most interested in is their dialogue. So, I think this girl had never read the shooting script—maybe only the columns of dialogue. At a certain moment, she began to realize that I was in the film more than she—that I had all of these scenes without dialogue!—and she began to make awful scenes, accusing Mario in front of the entire crew of being in love with me! Finally, Mario had enough and he told her, in front of everyone, 'Look, make love with as many producers as you like, but in the future, try to read both sides of your script pages!'"

To soothe Lassander's ire, one or two scenes were hastily added to increase her screen time, such as the one in which John introduces his salon's newest model to the eternally envious Inspector Russell.

In terms of her own performance, Betti discovered that working in a low-budget horror film required a different acting discipline than that which she had developed by working in more upscale, "intellectual" fare. "I found it difficult to try to really act in this kind of film," she confessed, "because everything was so over-the-top. It is difficult to maintain a good level of acting—very difficult. The best you can do is to approach everything as if it was true. But I didn't care, because on this film, I was feeling very happy."

Betti's happiness came from her realization that Mario Bava—the name behind the ironic horror films that made her laugh—was himself a serious artist, the equal of any film director she had worked with before, yet wonderfully devoid of ego. "The thing I most admired about Bava was . . . this is very difficult to explain in English . . . you know, when you do everything by yourself, with your own two hands? Mario was an artisan. I can remember a scene in which I was supposed to appear as a ghost. He wanted me to fly instead of walk, which was rather difficult for me! I couldn't quite make it, so I climbed the staircase instead and he placed the camera on the top stair but very low, on the level of the floor, and he kept the focus going in and out, in and out, in and out—and that was the way he made me float in the film!"

While Betti doesn't exactly "float" in the shot described, Bava's camera is successful in suggesting that Mildred's ghost is materializing like a spiteful nebula out of thin air. What is so interesting about this particular shot is that, by being captured "in the camera," without post-production opticals, it has a certain organic quality that makes it all the more believable, especially as a subjective hallucination. Of all the horror and fantasy films directed by Bava, Il rosso segno della follia had the least available time and money for special effects. The film's most dazzling instances of visual trickery—the delirious flashbacks to John's seminal act of matricide—were accomplished entirely within the camera, shot through wavy glass, distorted lenses, faceted crystal, and bisected mirrors that split apart with the onscreen fall of the hatchet. The film's greatest effects expense would appear to be a fog dispenser, which is wed to red lighting to suggest the pulverizing heat of John's boxlike incinerator, and the infernal power of Mildred's ashes, which appear at the top of the staircase after John has scattered them to the four winds, back in their old satchel case, cackling and fuming with smoke.

Betti also remembered that there was no insurance money set aside in case of accidents. "I had a big argument with Mario because they wanted to use a double for the scene where my character was killed," she recalled. "He wanted a big jump down the stairs or something like that. I wanted to do it myself, but he didn't trust me to pull it off, so he hired a double. I took him into another room and I jumped for him. He said, 'That was awful.' I said, 'I'm telling you, it's much better jumping than my double will do!' Mario finally confessed that they had to use the double, because if I hurt myself doing the stunt, the production wouldn't have the money to pay me anything."

It must have been an embarrassing moment for Bava—admitting to the Volpi Cup winner how threadbare their little project truly was, and the level to which he had deliberately fallen in the short time since his break with De Laurentiis.

In the final cut, the jumping stunt doesn't appear onscreen; instead, the scene cuts away at this point to another matricidal flashback—indicating that the entire flashback motif may have been conceived later by Bava and introduced in the editing. By examining her death scene frame-by-frame, the viewer can also see that Laura Betti's argument with Bava must have been solved amicably, as she struggles throughout her set-ups to keep her face averted from the camera. As the hatchet finally fell on Mildred Harrington, with Bava coaxing her performance loudly from behind the camera, Laura Betti couldn't keep herself from laughing.

At some point during the Barcelona filming, Bava had a chance encounter in his hotel corridor with his old friend, Cameron Mitchell, who was astonished to find "Signore Solamente in Italia" on foreign turf.

"The last time I saw Mario was in Spain," Mitchell remembered. "I was doing a film there at the time—I don't remember the title—and, one day in the hotel, there was Mario! I couldn't believe my eyes. I said, 'Mario! What are you doing out of Italy?'

"'Slumming.' That was his answer."

Not all of the film's interiors were photographed at Franco's villa. The discothèque scenes, two interiors and one exterior (as John is thrown out), were filmed at Balcazar Studios in Barcelona. Bava's crew were forbidden to film upstairs at the villa, which necessitated the addition of scenes filmed later at Villa Frascati, one of Italy's perennial horror film locations—a short drive northeast of Rome. This explains why the film's credits list two individuals, one Spanish and one Italian, for some of the key crew positions. In truth, some of the credits exist simply to fulfill co-production quotas; Lamberto Bava, for example, worked as his father's assistant in Spain as well as in Italy, and was also responsible for all the second unit shooting in Paris.

The Frascati footage includes John's encounter with his "inner child" before meeting with Alice afterhours in the salon, the seance sequence with Dr. Kalleway, the scenes in the Harringtons' bathroom and bedroom (note that the camera never moves from the staircase directly into the bedroom), and the scenes in John's toy- and mannequin-haunted menagerie. For the climactic scene of Inspector Russell bursting into the menagerie to save Helen from John, Bava was faced with the problem of inserting a Spanish actor (Jesús Puente) into an Italian location scene where he was not present. This was done by filming Dagmar Lassander reaching toward a similar door that was acquired for the shooting at Villa Frascati, and then cutting to a tight zoom shot of Puente bursting through the door, which was shot back at the Franco villa. By viewing the scene frame-by-frame, the viewer can see that the two doors are similar but not the same. Another instance of Bava inserting an illusion where one is not readily apparent.

JOHN and Mildred will remain married till death do they part—or do their vows endure beyond the grave?

Attentive viewers may also notice that the Harringtons' bed is the same one that appears in the boudoir of the Duchess Du Grand in I vampiri, in Rosy's apartment in the "Il telefono" segment of I tre volti della paura, and also in a scene of Le meraviglie di Aladino. Seen here, the formerly empty area of the ornate headboard has been cheaply filled with a sheet of wallpaper, which rattles visibly when John drops onto the mattress, exhausted.

Despite the Spanish and Italian locations used for Il rosso segno della follia, and the English names given to its characters, producer Manuel Caño decided to further confuse events by setting the story in Paris, the European hub of high fashion. To drive the point home, Stephen Forsyth and a second unit crew led by Lamberto Bava travelled to Paris to capture some exteriors, at which point the production ran out of funding.

"It wasn't really a cheap production," Forsyth insists. "All of the costumes I wore were made specifically for me; they really spared no expense. In fact, I still have the belt I wore in that movie. But they did run out of money after we got to Paris. All of the exteriors were shot in Paris, but if you look closely, you'll notice that my character is always shown in the distance in these shots, because that was a double; I didn't shoot at all in Paris. I stayed in my hotel room because they hadn't paid me for two weeks! They didn't stop shooting; they just put a double into those scenes. But he wasn't able to wear my costumes, because I was up in my hotel room, holding them hostage, while waiting for my check! You see, I had an agreement that I would be paid for each week of work at the end of the preceding week. I made sure I was paid something up front, and then I was paid the balance week by week. By the time we got to Paris, I had already worked one week for nothing and, as we came to the end of another week, I think they seriously didn't have the money; otherwise, I'm sure they would have given it to me. And that was basically how my acting career ended, with me in my hotel room waiting for the check that never came. That's how the movie ended, actually; I never did shoot those last scenes. But I've talked to Lamberto since then, and he's forgiven me for that."

In the final cut of Il rosso segno, not too many Paris exteriors survive. In the end, Mario Bava salvaged the failed Paris shoot by inserting a shot of the Eiffel Tower, grabbed by Lamberto while on location, and a newspaper headline printed in French—the sort of tricks he had used in I vampiri more than a decade earlier.

After his star turn in Il rosso segno—a role that required him to kiss nude department store mannequins and corpses bound for cremation, to slaughter women while wearing lipstick and a bridal veil, and to work for two weeks without pay—Stephen Forsyth withdrew from acting to pursue a new career as a musician and composer.

"It was getting to the point where I was being asked to do stranger and stranger things, things that had nothing to do with acting really, and I was also feeling the frustration of having no control over the outcome of my work," he explains. "Just before Hatchet, I made a movie about LSD [Acid—delirio dei sensi, 1968] and the director [Giuseppe Maria Scotese] wanted me to do a nude scene, wanted to paint my body red and shine strange lights on me, and make me look like an embryo in the womb . . . and I refused. I did the movie anyway, but it wasn't really something I wanted to tell my parents about. To this day, I haven't seen it.

ITALIAN fotobusta collage featuring Stephen Forsyth, Dagmar Lassander, and Laura Betti.

Hatchet was much better for me. Of all the films I did, it's the one people still talk about."

After the production ran out of money in Paris, Il rosso segno della follia had to be left unfinished until more money could be found. In the interim, Bava accepted an invitation to direct another picture, only completing the earlier film months later, after the intermediary project was completed and Manuel Caño had secured additional funding.

Two years later, Bava was still smarting from the experience of shooting at Franco's villa. "I'll never go back to Spain, I promise you!" he railed. "But the film is good; I'm rather pleased with it. It's the same old story about a madman, but I took great care in making it and photographed it meticulously."[5]

Lamberto Bava's feelings about the film are more ambivalent: "It's a very strange film, for which the leading man was all wrong, although he was a friend. The parts with Betti were good, but the screenplay was rather obvious."

Commentary

Actor and director Mel Welles, who knew Mario Bava in the 1960s and was responsible for directing the English dub tracks of several of his films, had a unique opinion of the director. "Bava was the least passionate filmmaker I ever met," he stated boldly. "By which I mean that he was, outwardly, quite stoic for an Italian. He was staid and reserved, not at all passionate. His earliest movie, Black Sunday, I never thought was very exceptional; it doesn't quite prepare you for the brilliance of some of the later movies like Blood and Black Lace. Hatchet for the Honeymoon, in particular, I felt was a wonderfully inventive picture that showed what marvelous things he could accomplish with rather ordinary material."

From its very beginning, Il rosso segno della follia declares itself as one of Mario Bava's most personal films. The declaration, however, is cagey because at this point in his career, Bava had yet to reveal anything of a personal nature to the press, leaving even his most attentive followers in the dark about the relevance of any aspect of his art to his own life. What better place for a shy man to bare his soul than in a low-budget horror film which no one would ever see, much less take seriously?

The film opens with an unusual animated title sequence, in which high contrast photos of Stephen Forsyth (John) and Guido Barlocci (John as a child) are projected onto ever-shifting patterns of blue and pink powders, which repeatedly erode and rebuild the images of the two players. Shown in concert with Sante Romitelli's main theme, though we know nothing as yet about the story to follow, the effect is immediately and woundingly nostalgic. A few years later, Bava reminisced in a rare interview about one of his earliest memories: sitting in the workshop of his father, Eugenio, and playing with heaps of two poisonous chemicals, hyposulfate and potassium cyanide. He was especially fond of assembling the white and ruby-red powders into parallel, alternating lines, which is precisely what happens under the opening titles of Il rosso segno della follia.

ITALIAN fotobusta collage.

Bava's feelings of devotion to his father—only two years dead at the time—are palpable throughout the film, wherein the main character (and narrator) lives and works as an adult in the house where he spent his childhood, a place populated with fashion mannequins whose clothing celebrates virginity, a sanctified state not unlike that of the Saints which Eugenio sculpted. A sense of nostalgia is maintained throughout the film by clever visual rhymes, which reveal the previous scene to have been a reverie. The opening murder on the train cuts to a toy train riding its tracks under John's abstracted gaze, and his incineration of Alice cuts to Mildred shattering his daydream by yelling, "Don't you smell something burning?" and alerting him to the bread burning in the toaster on their breakfast table.

It is telling that the House of Harrington (which John inherited from his mother) is described in the dialogue as a once-failing business, which only became a success when our hero relinquished operative control to his wife Mildred. This recalls another of Bava's public comments, in which he confessed that he became a cameraman because he was a young man caught between two women telling him what to do with his life; his mother wanted him to continue working as his father's effects assistant at the Istituto LUCE, while his wife insisted that he cut his family ties and campaign to become an assistant to Massimo Terzano instead. (Of course, Mario's wife had her way, but he found ways of appeasing his mother and maintaining the professional connection with his father.) Bava's family and intimates attest that his marriage was rockiest during the late 1960s (which would have been mid-life crisis time for a man born in 1914), and John's testy exchanges with Mildred are not too far afield, one imagines, from the rapport he had at home with his wife. It was hardly a coincidence that Bava was showing a new willingness, during this period, to work away from home.

Throughout the movie, Bava employs a number of sly visual gags to indicate John as his alter ego, much as he had done with the camera-oriented crimes of Diabolik. At the breakfast table with Mildred, he taunts her by observing her towering aggression through a negative binocular lens—momentarily rendering her small and insignificant—until she snatches the lens away, regaining her command. Though he wants to strike her, he marshals his anger, storms into his office, and slaps a photograph of Mildred across the room.

As embodied by Stephen Forsyth, John Harrington is also very much the male equivalent of the mannequins he hoards in his private sanctum; he is handsome, cultivated, and fashionable, a character whose facade offers a visual divertissement from his sickly interior existence. Freud once wrote that the presence of statues in dreams may be indicative that one feels unloved; while we can discount such an analysis from the dreams of a man whose boyhood was attended by statues on a daily basis, it may have some relevance to the fictional madness of the fictional John Harrington. Though Bava rewrote the bulk of Santiago Moncada's script, he filmed (and included in the final assembly) scenes of John visiting a private menagerie of nude mannequins and kissing and fondling them behind locked doors, scenes which have nothing to do with the derangement his actions express elsewhere in the picture. Moments before Alice is introduced to his hatchet, a POV shot shows her mimicking the stiff pose of a mannequin. It is obvious from the following shot that this moment is meant to convey the way John sees her, not something she has actually done for his amusement. From these scenes, we can surmise that Moncada's original script may have been the simpler story of a deranged man who feels unloved, trapped in a self-fulfilling phobia of expressing himself emotionally to women made of flesh and blood.

This would also explain the unexplored nature of his impotence, which has turned Mildred into the morbid, frustrated harridan she is. Such an interpretation makes fresh sense of the sequence in which Mildred surprises us by responding ecstatically to John's sexual overtures, which he interrupts by leaving the room and returning in a bridal veil with hatchet gleaming on a silver dining tray. As it plays in the film, John appears to have cruelly led Mildred on, to punish her permanently for returning unexpectedly early from her faked trip to visit her sister. If we accept the mannequin fetish as the original source of his dementia, John's wedding drag becomes a sincere accessory in his preparation for lovemaking. Furthermore, Mildred's reminiscence of their wedding night suggests that John feigned impotence in order to avoid having to reveal this fatal side of himself to the woman who saved the house his mother built.

5 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 249–60.

Instead of being the story of a man compelled to destroy the women who "betray" him by marrying themselves off to other men, a chain of betrayals that began with his mother's marriage to her second husband, Bava's rewrite reconceives John's murder spree into the search for an image, an elusive image capable of telling him something about himself. "Men need different women for different reasons," John says at one point, and most of the women in Il rosso segno della follia are two-dimensional presentations—not because Bava is incapable of depicting women three-dimensionally, but because he resolutely pursues his protagonist's point of view. Even Laura Betti's portrayal of Mildred, while primarily an exception to this rule, succumbs to it in death. When Mildred's ghost materializes, it too occupies the screen in arch poses, her skin bathed in the otherness of blue light, her face framed in a black and glittering hooded shroud—haute couture from the Other Side. It took several viewings of the film before I understood why the image of Mildred's ghost is so jarring in its sudden appearances: her stiff body language, always posed, is the film's only confirmation of John's self-professed paranoia. She looks not as other people see her (as the film proposes on the surface), but as John fears that other people see her.

As John Harrington, Stephen Forsyth projects a similar two-dimensionalism, being the kind of "male model" actor so commonly employed in low-budget Eurohorror. In this case, he is well-cast because of his handsome facade and the introspective blankness of his performance, which is given depth by Bava's careful attention to psychological visual metaphors and philosophical narration. John's opening soliloquy—spoken as he freshens up for a work day, after murdering Rosy Miller and her new husband on a train:

> My name is John Harrington. I am 30 years old. I am a paranoiac. "Paranoiac"—an enchanting word! And so full of possibilities! The fact is, I am completely mad; the realization of which annoyed me at first, but now is amusing to me. Quite amusing. Nobody suspects that I am a dangerous murderer—not Mildred my wife, or the employees of my fashion house, nor of course my customers. [John uses a napkin to rescue a fly from drowning in a glass of water, carries it around . . .] Poor little fly! Why are you so daring? You are so fragile, and yet you're born, you reproduce yourself, and then you die—like men. The difference is that you don't think, and you don't need to remember. You don't fear death because you ignore it. Your insignificant life is a mere biological accident, but death exists, I assure you. And that is what makes life a ridiculous and brief drama. [. . . and then he feeds the fly to his pet parrot!]

There is some awkwardness in the English translation of this soliloquy, and in lines heard elsewhere in the film as well, but the balance of tongue-in-cheek humor, sincere empathy, and cruel irony embodied by this passage is remarkable in the context of an exploitative, drive-in level horror film. The use of an insect as an illustration of life's bittersweet irony further reveals Bava's personal investment in the screenplay, echoing the words of the sage entomologists he had recently created for Nude . . . si muore, and would create again in Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve, or the scientist of human behavior who hosts Four Times That Night. What is most interesting about the film's eavesdroppings on John's inner voice is that they portray him as the film's sanest, most intelligent, and most rational character. Compare his soul-searching remarks to the clumsy probings of the inept Inspector Russell, or the brainless blather of Helen Wood, our supposed heroine:

ITALIAN fotobusta collage.

> "I'm an ordinary girl; I adore luxury, I'm terribly lazy, and I like to amuse myself doing crazy things."
>
> "Like?"
>
> "Well, I just turned 23 and I've had several lovers!"

While the rest of the cast whirls around, pretending to be fascinating, or mopes over scraped toast, so embittered that their only joy is making life a hell for others, John embarks on a path to self-discovery, to make sense of his mad world and to recover his peace of mind. As he tells Inspector Russell, "A madman can also have good reasons."

Bava cleverly externalizes the proposal that murder can be beneficial (at least for John) by having him dispose of the bodies in the incinerator of an adjacent hothouse, where he uses the ashes to fertilize a bevy of gorgeous hybrid flowers. It is the very essence of Bava to transmute images of death into images of beauty, but the source of inspiration here is Charles Chaplin's Monsieur Verdoux (1947), Bava's favorite film by his favorite director. Bava slyly acknowledges his source after Alice's incineration by quoting the eerie shot of Verdoux' hothouse smokestack puffing a mistress' remains high into the sky. Actually, Bava takes the hothouse metaphor farther than Chaplin did, pursuing the metaphoric relevance in the hybrid flora John is raising in his overheated little outback. Inspector Russell, playing Petrikov to John's Raskolnikov, taunts Harrington about his blood-red blooms, claiming to be "attracted to everything that is an alteration of Nature—like the brain of a mental patient. Even that," he continues, "must be something like your hothouse—an oppressive atmosphere, with flowers that are strange, and the birds of crime fluttering about." If nothing else, Inspector Russell understands Bava's uses of mise-en-scène!

Despite the poetic, sensuous, and philosophical appeal of its dialogue, and the appalling germs of matricide and Oedipal longing which are eventually uncovered by the scenario, Il rosso segno della follia (as can be discerned by its original and export titles) finds Bava intent on introducing elements of humor to his work. With few exceptions like La ragazza che sapeva troppo, humor did not become a common element of Bava's work (even in comedies like Le spie vengono dal semifreddo) until the deaths of his parents seemed to teach him something about the essential, random absurdity of life. He seemed to summarize his warm feelings about his parents in the somber, reflective I coltelli del vendicatore, but his subsequent work—Diabolik, the script for Nude . . . si muore, Four Times That Night, Il rosso segno della follia, and nearly all of the films yet to come—contains passages or concepts that push in the direction of black comedy and bitter irony. It is in this movie that Bava's senses of humor and irony are most sharply honed, perhaps because the situations were so close to home, so close to him.

In the film's most talked-about scene, John returns home after an innocent evening with Helen and turns on the television, where he finds in progress a black-and-white presentation of "I wurdalak" episode of Bava's I tre volti della paura. He turns the TV off after noticing an upstairs light, which signals him that Mildred has returned home early, and goes upstairs—launching a sequence of events culminating in her murder. When Inspector Russell shows up, pounding on the front door as the dying Mildred screams for help, John lets him in and explains the screams by turning on the television—which is showing the scene of Rika Dialina, screaming and backing away as Boris Karloff hobbles menacingly toward her. It's a wonderful in-joke, this scene, but it has serious implications, as well. The fact that Bava would make such a reference to his own work indicates that his recent encounters with fans like Luigi Cozzi and Armando Valcauda had made him aware that a small but attentive and devoted audience existed for his films; the scene is a wink at the cognoscenti. On the other hand, by using a clip from one of his own films, Bava encourages the viewer to interpret John's murderous voyage toward self-discovery as a metaphor—for Bava's own creative odyssey, which keeps returning again and again to dark and violent subject matter, to work out something about himself. With this film, Bava not only acknowledges that his work has rated a devoted following, but admits that he really is using this unlikely medium to express and better understand himself.

MILDRED*'s ghost predominates in this Italian fotobusta collage. Veronica Llimera as Betsy is seen at right.*

A COLLAGE of editing room trimmings created especially for this book by Stephen Forsyth.

Mildred's age is never given in the film, but she is clearly older than her husband's 30 years, being a former widow with considerable experience in business and life. All that we are told about the Harringtons' relationship is that it was never consummated, but the seance sequence—in which Dr. Kalleway (the author of Mildred's favorite book, Mediums and Spiritism) helps her to achieve oltretomba contact with her late husband (also named John)—hints at its true substance. As a roomful of rigid, mannequin-like spectators look on, Mildred talks sweetly to her dead mate, who responds friskily to her sustained interest. "Be a good boy," she reprimands him, and then, as his spirit threatens to disappear beyond the veil once again, she appeals to him, "John—my baby!" At this point, her living husband, greatly agitated, interrupts the seance. The scene's meaning is intriguingly faceted, because John might simply be embarrassed by this public display of his wife's affections for a dead man, but there is also a deeper meaning to his agitation—Mildred is speaking to her late husband in exact phrases that his own late mother surely once spoke to him, so he is at once responding to a fear that Mildred might be channeling the voice of his dead mother, and not wanting to admit that Mildred in many ways represents a maternal figure for him.

As these points illustrate, Bava's improvisations were able to invest Moncada's script with a flattering, additional complexity. Nevertheless, the film can also be confusing at times in its failure to completely eliminate the hobgoblins of Juan's obsessions from John's; the mannequin fetish of the original script, still touched upon in the film's first third, is dropped completely as we surge into the second act, just as Moncada's undercover heroine is neglected in the wake of Bava's decision to assert the formidable Mildred and her even more formidable ghost. Another element that doesn't seem to jibe with the final construction is John's botched attempt to murder Betsy, one of the spoiled rich habitués of his salon. For one thing, Betsy is no newlywed, but a kindred spirit who tells John, "If only the girls who deserved these dresses wore them"—meaning, if only virgins had white weddings—"you'd go bankrupt!"

Visually, the scene also looks unfinished, composed of shots of John's peering eyes spotlighted within a darkened recess, Betsy's poodle barking at his sensed intrusion, and Russell's men suddenly bursting in through the French doors, having anticipated an attack for no given reason.

Aside from any film's text, there is also a texture—and this aspect of Il rosso segno della follia is not nearly so accomplished. The budget did not permit Bava the luxury of bringing his usual camera team to Barcelona with him. In fact, so meager was the film's budget that Bava had to act as his own cameraman and operator for the first time since his postwar short films, using the most basic camera equipment; only during the film's Roman shooting did Antonio Rinaldi step in to operate for him. Bava shot a good deal of the film hand-held or with a simple, light tripod. When the schedule did not allow time to seting up individual close-ups and long-shots, Bava forged ahead by recklessly "editing" various scenes in the camera with the help of an overactive zoom lens. This necessitated more generalized lighting, which sometimes went against the grain of his known visual style. The film contains some pretty location photography, as well as a few classic Bavian images (e.g., John kissing the doll-like corpse of Alice as it lay on the bier of his incinerator, the sudden stiffening of Mildred's hands during the seance, the hallucinatory matricidal montages), but in general, the cinematography has an artless quality lacking the magic ingredient that characterizes Bava's cinematography at its best. It was the first film since the stylish La ragazza che sapeva troppo to carry Bava's name as Director of Photography, and he must have been aware—on some level—that its limitations could only detract from his former reputation as one of Italy's greatest cameramen.

Il rosso segno della follia is not generally regarded as one of Bava's outstanding films, but the autobiographical details necessary for its full appreciation have not been available till now. Once we become aware that Bava had grown up among statues (symbols of a family business, much like the gowned figures haunting John's salon), that his own personal empire (i.e., his marriage, his career) was in danger of crumbling at the time of production, that Laura Betti's support and encouragement were helping to re-enforce his self-image, and that even so innocuous a passage as the main title sequence is charged with a deeply personal meaning, Il rosso segno della follia acquires a confessional aura rarely encountered in the horror cinema. While hardly a masterpiece, it has all the personal relevance and revelation one seeks in a masterpiece.

ITALIAN locandina, art by Ercole Brini.

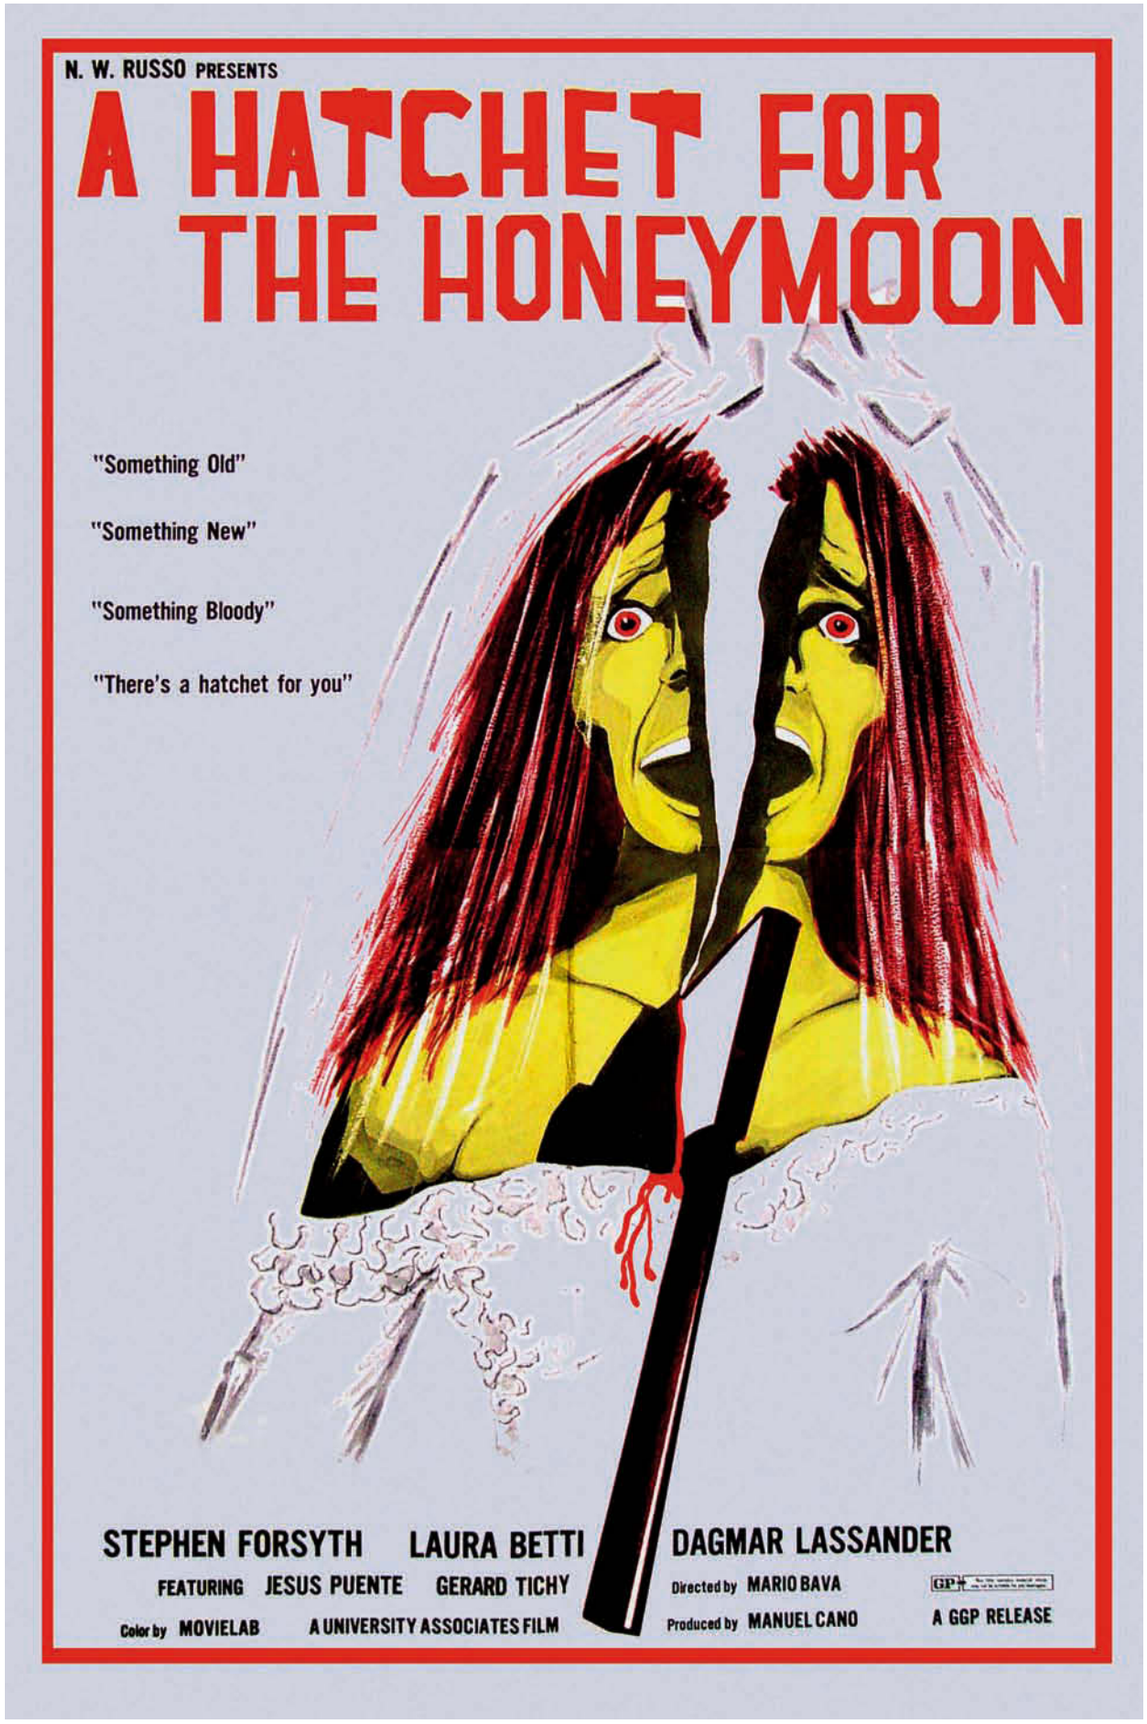
Distribution

Il rosso segno della follia waited nearly a year to be completed, but two years passed before Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer finally gave it a negligible release. No Italian critic of the period seems to have reviewed it, and to this day, it remains one of Bava's least-seen works in his native country. Italian press materials list an original running time of 93 minutes, which is possible considering that Luciano Pigozzi's supporting role as Vences is all but nonexistent in the 89-minute version that abounds, consisting of only one line spoken while he stands in long-shot. Then again, it is possible that Pigozzi's screen time suffered as Dagmar Lassander's did, after Laura Betti's participation pushed the story in different directions. Pigozzi himself remembers nothing particular about the filming.

Of curiosity value is the fact that early Italian publicity materials ascribed different names to the film's characters. Mildred Harrington was "Deborah Windsor" (allowing the salon to become "The House of Windsor"!), Helen was "Susan," and strangest of all, John Harrington was "Oliver Barrington"—also the name of the protagonist in Erich Segal's best-selling novella Love Story, which was filmed in 1970 with Ryan O'Neal in the role.



Il rosso segno della follia suffered from poor distribution in most international zones, though Manuel Caño's influence seems to have resulted in good distribution and advertising in Spain (where MGM's fine posters heralded Jesús Puente's name in bold letters). Though its story had been shoehorned into a faux Parisian setting, the film was never released in France, despite the fact that Bava's films had been consistently popular there since the release of Le Masque du Démon in 1960.

English-speaking countries were also slow in acquiring the film, as they would be with Bava's subsequent feature, Four Times That Night. Four years after Il rosso segno della follia was made, it was finally acquired for British distribution by Tigon, whose president Tony Tenser had co-produced Roman Polanski's Repulsion in 1965. (Perhaps Tenser was attracted to Bava's fleeting homage to Polanski, in which a classroom photo is briefly glimpsed in John's private menagerie, showing his young face already shaded with dark abstraction.) It was distributed in Britain under the title Blood Brides, on the bottom half of a double-bill with The Creeping Flesh, starring Peter Cushing and Christopher Lee. It was reviewed for Monthly Film Bulletin by a condescending Robin Wood, who observed: "Mario Bava's claim to attention arises principally from the fact that, since he usually photographs as well as directs his films, they are very consciously conceived in terms of the potentialities of the camera and as a result are, in a somewhat crude sense, 'cinematic.' . . . The creation of elaborate effects through camera movement, stylized color, focus distortion and the use of varied lenses is, however, no guarantee of quality, and the effects in Blood Brides appear merely self-conscious and self-indulgent."[6] The UK release of the film was reported as having a length of 93 minutes, 5 minutes longer than the US release; it is not known if this count was inaccurate, or what the additional footage contains, if it indeed exists.

The following year, the film was picked up by a fledgling American distributor, GG Productions, whose one-sheet poster was an amateurish, crayon-scratched portrait of a green-faced bride with a V-shape cleaved out of her cranium. A second, superior, but unemptingly basic design of a clutching bloody hand replaced it, also without attracting many viewers. GGP sold its interests in the film one year later to Avco-Embassy Pictures, who immediately consigned it to a package of 16 mm films bound for television . . . where it seldom showed up.

Shortly after Avco-Embassy went bankrupt in 1982, Hatchet for the Honeymoon became unresistingly absorbed in the US public domain, where it became unauthorized fodder for numerous home video labels. Of the many releases, Media Home Entertainment's cassette was the best-looking, and the superb cover art delivered the campaign the film could have US one-sheet poster, unsigned—and deservedly so. Is it any wonder that audiences stayed away?

sorely used when new. Released in the early 1980s, the box also carried a large, atypical boast: "Directed by Mario Bava."

Influence

Il rosso segno della follia stands out as one of Mario Bava's most unsettling yet compelling films. When its English version, Hatchet for the Honeymoon, was shown at the first Mario Bava retrospective in the United States, at San Francisco's Roxy Theater in 1992, it was the only film of the dozen shown that weekend which was not followed by a round of applause. This is a significant detail which, I believe, proves the film's achievement of its goals beyond doubt.

Unlike most of Bava's films, which candy-coat their horrors in harlequin colors or fairy tale fantasy, Il rosso segno is a tall, cold glass of bitters, best-suited for solitary sipping—just the way it depicts John Harrington settling down on his sofa to watch I tre volti della paura on television. One of Bava's darkest and most interior studies of human nature, it brings to light uneasy feelings and emotions which cannot be comfortably absorbed in the presence of other people. A longtime admirer of the film, I was surprised to find my enjoyment of the picture strangely inhibited in an auditorium full of strangers. (This may be the reason why the film was ultimately shown in so few theaters around the world.) To applaud such a film would seem as inappropriate as laughing along with it, though when viewed in a relaxed frame of mind, Il rosso segno della follia reveals itself as a monumentally comic deck of ironies. There is something suspect about an audience that doesn't see the humor of Mildred testily scraping the carbon from her hubby's burnt toast, or John calmly explaining to Inspector Russell—quite truthfully, as it turns out—that the screams he heard were coming from a Mario Bava movie.

While the best of Bava's earlier films were all readily influential to some degree, Il rosso segno della follia waited over thirty years for a film bearing its obvious influence to step forward. That film was American Psycho (2000), Mary Harron's inspired adaptation of Bret Easton Ellis' controversial novel. Ellis' book—which charts the deteriorating inner life of ruthless Wall Street yuppie Patrick Bateman, whose loathing for the world is expressed through random acts of murder that may (or may not) be imaginary—was rejected by its original publisher under the pressure of stockholders, editors, and the press, all of whom failed to see beyond its graphic descriptions of Bateman's serial killings to the layer of satire beneath.

SPANISH handbill, which spoils the film's denouement in its depiction of young John (Guido Barlocchi) murdering his mother.

American Psycho's resemblance to Il rosso segno della follia is immediately apparent in an introductory scene that shows Bateman engaged in his morning rituals, looking outwardly like an ideal of a handsome and successful young businessman, but who is revealed in voiceover to be a psychopath. Like John Harrington before him, Bateman introduces himself to the viewer while addressing his reflection in the bathroom mirror. There is even a reasonable resemblance between Christian Bale, who plays Bateman, and Stephen Forsyth.

The similarities do not end there. There is no shrewish wife, but Bateman is oppressed by the interminable wedding plans proposed by his fiancee (Reese Witherspoon), and like Harrington, he takes refuge in dating an employee (Chloe Sevigny) whom he ultimately turns away, for fear that he might hurt her if she remains with him. There is no ghost angle in American Psycho, but Hatchet's playful approach to Harrington's haunting—is it real, or delusional?—is certainly reflected in Harron's handling of the film's murders, which may be factual or perhaps merely the poisonous daydreams of a stewing sociopath. Both films, too, eschew graphic violence (unlike Ellis' novel), which prevents the audience from becoming too appalled at the hero's actions and turning against him. The similarity between the two films becomes complete in American Psycho's final scene, in which Bateman admits that he is unable to learn more about himself through his acts of murder because he is an empty shell; there's nothing inside to discover. Nowhere else in the film does Bateman mention an agenda of self-discovery behind his murders, so this concluding voiceover has the impact of a dialogue addressed from Harron's film to Bava's film, in which homicide is explicitly depicted as a journey toward illumination.

But the most lasting and pervasive influence of Il rosso segno della follia on cinema in general lies in the visual conceit of having John's actions observed, from the sidelines, by the reproachful image of the child he once was. Bava's film was the first to stage such a scene, and in the intervening years, it has been restaged countless times. To take one example: in a 2002 second season episode of the HBO series Six Feet Under, the sexually addicted character of Brenda Chenowith (Rachel Griffiths) is shown staring across the room while mechanically engaging in three-way sex with two young men, and seeing her actions watched and judged by her childhood self. Psychologically resonant scenes like this prove that Il rosso segno della follia has succeeded well above its intended station, in time introducing an entirely new and profound phraseology of emotional dislocation into the language of cinema.

6 Robin Wood, "Un Hacha para la Luna de Miel (Blood Brides)" review, Monthly Film Bulletin, 1973, 29.

PROMOTIONAL color collage featuring Brett Halsey and Daniela Giordano in FOUR TIMES THAT NIGHT.

Four Times That Night

MADE DURING the interruption in the shooting of Il rosso segno della follia was Four Times That Night, Bava's only foray into that salacious staple of Italian cinema—the sex comedy. The English title is proper, since the film was scripted in English and funded by North American producers.

Primary among these was Dick Randall, a rotund, cigar-smoking, Canadian expatriate who had been co-producing nudie films in France and Italy for America's burgeoning "Adults Only" audience since the early 1960s. Among his first films were Shangri-La (1961), Paris Ooh-La-La (1963), and Primitive Love (1964), which had starred Jayne Mansfield and Bava's Goldfoot cohorts Franco and Ciccio. Born in Ontario on August 14, 1925, Randall sometimes wrote and played cameo roles in his films, and he also occasionally worked under the aliases Robert Randall and Claudio Rainis, the latter (presumably a reference to the star of The Invisible Man) used for his production credits on Italian films.

After Four Times That Night, Randall briefly experimented with producing hardcore sex films like Gola profonda nera/Black Deep Throat (1976), starring the black transsexual actress Ajita Wilson, but returned to standard drive-in exploitation fare like Juan Piquer Simon's Mil Gritos Tiene la Noche/Pieces (1981) and Los Nuevos Extraterrestres (1983), which he had the nerve to film under the title The Return of E.T. He died in London on May 14, 1996, the victim of a stroke, at age 70.

The star of Four Times That Night, American actor Brett Halsey, offers a hesitant but candid appraisal of Randall: "He was a strange kind of guy. It's hard to talk about Dick because he . . . You wouldn't invite him home to a dinner with your mother! [He was] kind of crude. He plays the character of the portiere in the film, and he was playing himself, really. You couldn't have pegged Dick any better than he did himself. He was one of those likeable perverts. A rascal—that's a good word for him. He played pretty fast and loose, but he pulled the picture together somehow."

Randall had a New York-based partner, David B. Putnam (not to be confused with David Puttnam, the Oscar-winning producer of Chariots of Fire), who was financing Randall in exchange for the film's US and Canadian rights. Putnam was the son of George Putnam, the publishing giant who had married Amelia Earhart. According to Halsey, Putnam "raised the money to make the picture—I don't know what the figure was—but he then hired a supervising producer in Rome." This was Zelyko Kunkera, a Yugoslav who had previously co-produced Sid Pink's The Tall Women (1966, with Anne Baxter) and Giuliano Montaldo's heist picture Ad ogni costo (1968, with Janet Leigh and Klaus Kinski). Halsey continues: "What happened was, Kunkera had made a couple of films earlier that hadn't done so well, so he took the money he got from Putnam to pay the bills on his own films. So when the time came to start shooting Four Times That Night, there was no money. Randall had to go out and find other money, a bare minimum just to get it going." [1]

To ensure a more vigilant protection of his financial interests, Putnam assigned a business partner to assist the production in Rome—a man who would become the most significant player in the remaining years of Bava's story. Alfredo Leone was born on November 30, 1926, in Brooklyn, New York. After amassing his initial fortune in real estate, Leone entered show business in 1956, producing a short-lived New York television show called Address the Nation. Filmed in 16 mm, the show was put together by a group of inexperienced tyros whom Leone had hired in good faith. "I began to see the error of my ways when I saw the editor cutting his filmstrips with his bare hands!" Leone chuckles. "'Is that the way you do it?' I asked. 'Yeah,' the guy told me. We did the first two shows like that and they were disastrous. The film jittered and jumped all over the place. So I fired those guys and hired some professionals to come in and do the job right. I did three

MEETING cute, Bava-style: John (Brett Halsey) falls at the feet of Tina (Daniela Giordano), injuring his back.

Four Times That Night

Working title: Una notte fatta di bugie, "A Night Made of Lies"
Filmed at Dinocittà and on location in Rome
October 14 – December 14, 1968
First released: December 3, 1971 (Montreal, Canada)
Eastmancolor, 1.85:1, 81 minutes

Production: Delfio Film (Rome) and Hape Film Gmbh & Co. (Munich). Producers: Zelyko Kunkera and Claudio Rainis [Dick Randall]. Executive producer: Alfred Leone [Alfredo Leone]. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant directors: Lamberto Bava, Claudio Rainis [Dick Randall]. Screenplay: Mario Moroni, Carl Ross. Additional dialogue: Guido Leoni. Continuity: Rosalba Scavia. Director of photography: Antonio Rinaldi. Camera operator: Salvatore Caruso. Camera assistant: Carlo Tofani, Enrico Lucidi. Art direction: Andrea Crisanti. Set decoration: Romeo Constantini. Wardrobe: Annamode, Blanda. Makeup: Massimo De Rossi. Hairdresser: Lidia Puglia. Production manager: Virgilio Muzio. Editor: Otello Colangeli. Music: Lallo Gori. Distributor: Alexia Cinematografica. Distributor: Alexia Cinematografica.

Additional US credits: Producer: Dick Randall. Associate producer: David B. Putnam. Screenplay: Mario Bava and Gene Luotto, story by Charles Ross. Assistant director: Michael Leone.

Daniela Giordano (Tina Bryant), Brett Halsey (Gianni Prada/John Price), Pascale Petit (Esmeralda), Dick Randall (porter), Brigitte Skay (model), Michael Hinz [Robert Oliver] (Giorgio/George), Rainer Basedow (Lorenzo), Valeria Sabel (Tina's mother), Huguette Verton, Sante Lucerlini, Marina Cavorgna, Calisto Calisti.

Canada: Four Times That Night
France: Une Nuit Mouvementée, "An Eventful Night," TV only
Germany: Vier Mal heute Nacht, "Four Times Tonight"
Italy: Quante volte . . . quella notte, "How Often . . . That Night," 7/15/72
US: Four Times That Night, Cinevision Films Ltd., 7/15/72, 83m shows this way and they went over brilliantly. I had TV Guide and all the other magazines praising me and the show, recommending that I enter the picture business, so I did."

Leone formed Paradise Productions in 1959, after acquiring the screen rights to a novel called Women's Barracks by Teresa Torres. His longtime friend Eddie Bracken agreed to star in the film, which was to be produced in Rome, and Leone hired novelist Harold Robbins to write the script. ("Worst thing you ever read," Leone laughs.) Robbins was paid a kill fee of $2,500, which he used to support the writing of his breakthrough best-seller The Carpetbaggers (1961). The second draft was undertaken by the blacklisted Hollywood screenwriter Waldo Salt, but the film was never made. Nevertheless, Leone had made the necessary transition from television to film. Over the next several years, Leone and various partners formed a number of different production companies—B&L and EuroAmerican, among them—through which he co-produced an estimated thirty films.

"David Putnam was my partner; we were involved in other ventures together," Leone explains. "One day, he got a telegram from Randall over in Rome requesting more funds, at which point Putnam requested that I go over and bail them out. I didn't especially want to get involved, but he pressed me. So I went to Rome and looked at some dailies, amounting to maybe eight minutes of film, if that much. I called Putnam and suggested that he walk away and take the loss, but he refused to do that. Instead, he coaxed me into taking over the production."

After screening those eight minutes of footage, Leone met Mario Bava for the first time. He remembers that Bava seemed to him "very kind, very gentle, quiet, unpretentious." Being unfamiliar at this time with Bava's past achievements, he had no idea of his longevity in the Italian film industry, or the professional sacrifices he was making to retain complete creative control of his work. Bava's recent track record was hardly prestigious: I coltelli del vendicatore had been tantamount to cleaning up another director's mess, he had not been paid for directing Operazione paura, the Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs debacle had soured his once prosperous relationship with American International Pictures, Diabolik had been a disagreeable experience, and now even a cheap Spanish side-job like Il rosso segno della follia seemed impossible to finish. With Four Times That Night, the Maestro del colore found himself, not too comfortably, at the helm of what he called "a blue movie."

"I agreed to do it because, at that time in Italy, if you turned down the offer to direct an erotic film, people assumed you were a homosexual," Bava later joked. [2]

In 1967, the "Adults Only" genre was even less reputable than horror; it no longer had the voyeuristic novelty of skin flicks in the late '50s and early '60s, and it had not yet been accepted into the framework of mainstream filmmaking, Midnight Cowboy and The Killing of Sister George being still a couple of years away. But a metamorphosis was definitely taking place. The kinds of pictures that Dick Randall had made in the past—feature-length peep shows given a wonky touch of "class" by being set in Paris or Rome—were being replaced with a more sophisticated form of adult entertainment, spearheaded by an American triple-threat man named Radley Metzger. Having successfully distributed some titillating French features (e.g., The Dirty Girls, Daniella By Night) in America through his company Audubon Films, Metzger had responded to a dearth of suitable product by producing and directing his own features in Europe. Bearing such provocative titles as The Alley Cats and Carmen Baby, Metzger's productions differed from their competition in taking the subject of human sexuality seriously, and conveying eroticism with at least a modicum of style—unlike the Dick Randall pictures, which were basically about getting an eyeful.

Randall's old-fashioned, "dirty old man" approach was no longer cutting it at the boxoffice in 1967, so Four Times That Night may have been conceived as a deliberate attempt to move in a more timely, mature, pseudo-arty direction. The picture was rationalized, to some extent, by invited comparisons to an acknowledged masterpiece of cinema, Akira Kurosawa's Rashomon (1950), which presented the story of a rape/murder in medieval Japan from four different perspectives—that of the rapist, the raped woman, an observer, and the woman's dead husband as reached through a medium. As Bava reasoned, "It was based on the principle of Rashomon—one night spent by two couples, as viewed from the perspective of each of the partners. For once, the abundance of sex had a logical justification."[3]

JOHN takes Tina back to his apartment building, where producer Dick Randall minds the gate.

1 Surprisingly, this matter did nothing to queer the business relationship between Randall and Kunkera, who together subsequently financed Jean Brismée's French/Belgian/Italian co-production La notte piu lunga del diavolo/The Devil's Nightmare (1971).

2 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

Bava now found himself working with proto-pornographers like Dick Randall, but if he had fallen on hard times, so had the Dinocittà studio where he had filmed Diabolik not long before. The studio launched as a proud offensive against the tradition of Cinecittà was now mostly abandoned, a shell of its former self. The "blue movie" Bava was making there in early winter could have turned blue from the freezing cold: he and his cast shot the entire picture in an abandoned, cavernous hangar without heat, electricity, or running water.

TOASTING their first date, John and Tina are doomed to see things differently.

Synopsis

While cruising through the park in his sportscar, male model John Price's roving eye is captivated by the sight of Tina Bryant bending over. He makes a pass, which she ignores, continuing to walk her black poodle—who has the unlikely name of "Coolie" (or in the English version, "Cool Rump"). John's wolfish persistence alarms her, and she takes refuge behind a shrub, where he finds her—seconds before tripping over her dog. This breaks the ice, and the couple set a date for that evening.

John goes to Tina's apartment to pick her up and meets her mother, a somber, strictly Catholic, middle-aged woman in widow's weeds, who explains that Tina may seem outgoing, but is actually a young woman of strong moral principles. John assures her that he has similar convictions; he respects her daughter, and he promises to get her back home by a reasonable time. Tina emerges from her room wearing an expensive blue mini-dress. They go to a discotheque and dance, but John's single-minded concentration on her body makes Tina uncomfortable and she soon asks to be taken home. Leaving the club, they pass three of John's male friends, who speculate, "Where does he meet these broads? And where does he take them?"

When Tina returns home, it is 3:30 in the morning, and her dress is torn at the front. She blurts out to her mother that John tried to rape her, and offers the following story, seen in flashback:

On the way home from the club, John invited Tina back to his apartment, explaining that he was expecting an important business call. She resisted, preferring to wait in the courtyard, but a brief encounter with two gay neighbors—George (called Georgette) and Esmerelda (called Jean-Pierre)—frightened the timid virgin, who preferred to take her chances inside. John's apartment turned out to be the ultimate swinger's pad, with a literal swing hanging from the middle of the living room ceiling. After finishing his call, John went into his bedroom ostensibly to get a sweater, but he emerged wearing only his briefs—and attacked Tina. ("We're at the boiling point! Let's crystallize!") She scratched his forehead in self-defense, freed herself from his embrace and barricaded herself in his bedroom, eventually locking him inside instead, and escaping with her maidenhead intact.

Meanwhile, John has returned to the club, where his friends' curiosity about the scratch on his forehead prompts his own narrative interpretation of the evening's events. According to John, Tina was all over him, a real man-eater, and all too willing to go back to his apartment. She seduced him on the living room couch, again in the shower, and again in his bedroom. (He: "What an insatiable, oversexed piece of libidinous tail!" She: "What a big, beautiful, timid blob of masculine protoplasm!") John is exhausted and not up to a fourth tryst, and his forehead is scratched as he tries to get away from her amorous stroking of his hair. He is saved from her by the unexpected arrival of George and Esmerelda.

A third version of the evening's events is offered in conversation between a milkman and the sex-crazed doorman of John's apartment building (whose private sanctum is a shrine to old Playboy clippings, with October 1966 Playmate Dianne Chandler centrally displayed). According to the doorman—a voyeur who watched the evening unfold from a rooftop vantage, through the living room window—John is actually gay, and he invited Tina to his apartment with the intention of providing company for Esmerelda while he and George were otherwise occupied in his bedroom. (Within the context of this story, Esmerelda tells Tina the story of how she met John, years earlier, at a discotheque called the Club Kama Sutra . . . which turns out to be the story of how she tricked a German girl into posing for nude pictures.) Tina does not believe her story about John's homosexuality, so Esmerelda invites her to peek at him and "Georgette" in the bedroom. ("One man is ugly," she remarks, "but two are absolutely repulsive.") As the disillusioned Tina weeps inconsolably, Esmerelda drugs her drink and takes advantage of her unconscious body. When she wakes, naked and seduced, she screams and races for her discarded dress, which John tries to withhold from her, tearing it. She scratches him as he tries to hold her down on the floor, vulnerable to Esmerelda's next advances.

THIS passionate clinch must be a promotional still, as it doesn't reflect any of the four versions of John and Tina's date depicted in FOUR TIMES THAT NIGHT.

At this point, a nameless, professorial narrator appears, showing a split-screen display of the three different accounts and asking the viewer "Who is the liar?"

With this question in mind, another version of Tina and John's date is unreeled . . .

After making friendly contact in the park, they had a very nice, very ordinary date. John took Tina to his apartment, but the door was kept open at all times. Unfortunately, the gate in the courtyard of John's apartment building has a stuck lock, and the doorman does not respond to their buzzes for assistance. John suggested that Tina try climbing over the fence, with him following. She tried but fell, tearing her dress on the ironwork and scratching his forehead as he gallantly attempted to catch her. They decided to wait on a bench in the garden until someone showed up to let them out. When George and Esmerelda arrived, ringing for admittance, this time the doorman responded, and John and Tina drove away.

At this point, the narrator reaches gigantically into frame and lifts the tiny sportscar into his hands.

"Do you believe it?" he asks. "Do you believe that things went exactly that way?" He returns the car to the road, and it speeds off toward the rising sun. "And despite the tainted figment of our imaginations," he adds conclusively, "they watched the sun rise on a very bright day."

The script of Four Times That Night is credited to Mario Moroni and Charles Ross. Of the two, Ross is the more probable instigator, since both lead actors remember working from a script in English. Ross had been a writer on earlier Dick Randall productions, including The Sexperts (1965) and The Wild, Wild World of Jayne Mansfield (1968).

Mario Moroni was more likely brought in during post-production to write the Italian version's dialogue, which is extremely witty and elevates the picture to a superior level of entertainment. Moroni's first screen credit was as co-author (with Alberto Albani Barbieri) on Anna perdonami ("Forgive Me, Anna," 1953), starring Aldo Fiorelli and Tamara Lees. Moroni seems to have written scripts only for the director of that film, Tanio Boccia, emerging again in 1964 to script two Kirk Morris pepla, La valle dell'eco tonante/Hercules of the Desert (actually a Maciste film) and Il dominatore del deserto, which Boccia directed under the pseudonym Amerigo Anton. After Four Times That Night, in 1971, Moroni would direct one of his own scripts, Il mio nome è Mallory . . . M come Morte ("My Name is Mallory . . . M as in Morte [Death]").

The preceding synopsis follows the American version of the film, which seems most appropriate, as Four Times That Night was produced with American funds and acted entirely in English. Unfortunately, the American version is not very good; Tina's sultry allure is completely sabotaged by a ridiculous, inappropriate Southern American accent, and the dialogue conveys a leering, sophomoric attitude toward sex and a paranoid, provincial view of homosexuality. In contrast, the Italian version—which is now, happily, the standard, thanks to a DVD release from Image Entertainment—comes off as a sly, quick-witted, philosophic comedy of manners.

The Italian version is also slightly longer than the English re-edit. The additional footage consists of a longer animated title sequence; a longer edit of the sequence of Tina's first wait in the darkened courtyard, that focuses more on her increasing sense of insecurity; and an extended finale. There is also more footage of the professorial narrator, who precedes the final scene with a mini-lecture on the slippery, subjective nature of human perception and the mercurial nature of "the truth." He illustrates his point with cartoon portraits of three veterans of the Biblical deluge: Noah's wife, the bird with the olive branch, and a giraffe—each of whom (in voiceover) remember this singular event in markedly different ways. He then proceeds to show photographs of John, Tina and the doorman, recounting their various points of disagreement. When he replaces the sportscar on the road, it rolls in reverse, and we are treated to a bizarre "comic" replay of various shots in reverse, high speed, and still frame. The point being, no matter how much we analyze what someone has said, or from how many angles we study an event, we can never know the whole truth about anything, because—although we are the same species—we are all coming from, going

3 Ibid.

Amber for ever to, and living in, different places, which result in different subjective moods, perceptions, and perspectives. As we see the concluding shot of John's car driving toward the horizon one last time, the professor asks if we really believe that John took Tina straight home—and then he reveals that, on the contrary, he took her to the sea where they watched the sun rise together, while everyone else had an ordinary day.

The significance of this lecture—which, alas, the professor himself fails to express—is that love not only bends the way we perceive our world and ourselves, but it is the only factor capable of bringing our hopelessly divided and disagreeable species to a perfect oneness of mind and heart.

Cast

Cast as the story's male lead was American actor Brett Halsey, born Charles Oliver Hand in Santa Ana, California, on June 20, 1933. After a stint in the US Navy, he worked briefly as a disc jockey before turning to acting, and he spent his earliest acting days as a latter-day contract player at Universal. He took the name Halsey, legally, from his great uncle Admiral Halsey, one of the leading Naval officers of WWII. And "Brett seemed to go well with it," he explains.[4] His Universal days were spent in thankless bit parts in B-pictures, the only one of real historical interest being Jack Arnold's Revenge of the Creature (1955), in which he plays a teenager killed by the Gill Man. When his Universal contract expired, Halsey spent five years as a freelance actor, and then was placed under contract at 20th Century-Fox for three years. One of his first starring roles was in Return of the Fly (1959), opposite Vincent Price—with whom he worked again in 1963's Twice Told Tales. In the early 1960s, Halsey made his first professional trips to Italy to star in two historical swashbucklers for Riccardo Freda, Le sette spade del vendicatore (1962, on the set of which he met Bava, who was directing the lighting of some scenes) and Il magnifico avventuriero/The Magnificent Adventurer (1963).

"While I was making Twice Told Tales, I got an offer to go back to Italy and do four films," Halsey recalls. "I went over, after the four films it became five and six, and the next thing, it had been years and I'd become an Italian actor! I lived in a condominium sort of thing, the top two floors of this condominium in the Pina Clara section. They used to call it 'the American ghetto' because there were so many Americans living there."[5]

The former husband of Italian actress Luciana Paluzzi, Halsey was married at the time to German actress Heidi Bruhl. He worked in a number of different Italian film genres during the 1960s, notably spy pictures (Operazione Polifemo/Spy in Your Eye) and Spaghetti Westerns (Uccidete Johnny Ringo/Kill Johnny Ringo), and actually launched a second career earlier in 1968 when he consented to star in Tonino Cervi's Western Oggi a me, domani a te/Today We Kill . . . Tomorrow We Die!, scripted by Dario Argento—a picture Halsey did "only for the money"—under the pseudonym "Montgomery Ford." Four Times That Night was Halsey's first erotically themed picture, and he explains his reasons for accepting it: "I liked the script. I've always liked comedies. It was obvious that it was a sex comedy, but a mild sex comedy. It had an erotic premise, I'll grant you, but there really wasn't anything to it that would even qualify as softcore."

When the picture went into preproduction as Una notte fatta di bugie, different trade ads announced that the female lead would be played by either Jacqueline Sassard (Accident) or Brett Halsey's ex-wife Luciana Paluzzi (Thunderball). The woman finally cast opposite Halsey was Daniela Giordano, born in Palermo in November 1947, who became a celebrity after winning the Miss Italy competition of 1966. She was only the second Miss Italy to launch a successful acting career; Lucia Bosé had been the winner of the 1947 contest—with Gina Lollobrigida and Gianna Maria Canale among her runner-ups. (Though she was a contestant in the 1950 competition, Sophia Loren—then Sofia Scicolone—won only the honorary title of "Miss Elegance.")

"The qualities needed to win the contest aren't necessarily relevant to the ones you need to pursue a movie career," Giordano observes. "Due to the fact that I had bad quarrels with the director and owner of the contest, in the official history of the contest, it says and I quote, 'she did only very few things in the movie business.' Every year, on the occasion of the contest, I read the same thing in the newspapers! This has been a way which the director of the contest—who is still alive, and now almost 80 years old—took revenge for my disgraceful behavior. From his point of view, he gave me the chance to become rich and famous. Thus, everything he suggested should have been accepted with extreme gratitude, but I was not that kind of girl. I wasn't interested in spending time with the 'right' people—who I found old and boring; I preferred to escape from these 'duties' by hanging out with some not very important young men of my own age. The point was, I was not prepared in my soul to be obligated. For me, the contest was only a new happening. I came from a good family and never had problems with money (my father worked in the Bank of Italy), so I couldn't understand why I should do things I didn't like or have to accept reproaches from anyone." Because Giordano spoke English, she also became the first Miss Italy to be invited to meet the President of the United States. Making a Columbus Day trip to the United States, she met President Lyndon Baines Johnson, as well as New York State Governor Nelson Rockefeller and New York City Mayor John Lindsey. Her indomitable spirit inspired her nickname, "The Wild Girl From Palermo," an epithet she enjoyed.

"When I did this movie," Giordano confesses, "I was 23 or 24 years old. In my mind, I lived on an other planet—I mean, I lived outside the movie business, so I had never heard the name of Mario Bava before. When my agent talked to me about him the first time, he said, with a little grimace, that Mario Bava was a director who often worked on horror subjects. My agent's face was not particularly happy, as it usually was when he had a good offer. I was at a strange point in my career. I still had a certain popularity from the beauty contest; the public knew that I was an actress, because my photos were often in newspapers and magazines; but, for some reason or other, my films had not been so popular. So my agent was worried, because it would have been dangerous for my name to be attached to a big flop. But he added that Bava was a very good cameraman, and so, in any case, to do a film with him could not damage me.

"When I met Mario Bava and Dick Randall for the first time," she continues, "they were excited about this new film. They told me it was something very new—the famous Japanese film Rashomon, retold in modern terms. (I didn't tell them I had never heard of this film before in my life; I just said, 'Ah, fantastic!') They gave me the script. I read it and I was still doubtful. But I was 24 years old, at the beginning of my career, and my agent told me that Mario Bava was a well-known director. Also, I had the main part, and above all, the movie was going to be shot at the De Laurentiis Studios, which at that time was almost a guarantee of success. Many, many years later, I finally saw Rashomon, an old film in black-and-white. Though I didn't like it very much—it's kind of boring—I could understand why it was considered a masterpiece of international cinema. Of course, it has nothing to do with Four Times That Night, except for the schematic of the narrative."

Valeria Sabel, who gives the film's outstanding performance as various versions of Tina's mother, was the wife of Virgilio Sabel—the documentary filmmaker who had collaborated with Bava on the animated short Una lezione di geometria in 1948. Valeria had previously appeared in Sergio

◀ "ONLY you for ever"
The only inscribed photograph of Mario Bava known to exist, from the collection of actor Brett Halsey.

4 Brett Halsey, as quoted in Mike Ferguson and Steve Fentone's interview conducted October 9, 1993, in "Roy Colt Shoots His Mouth Off," European Trash Cinema 12, July 1995, 12–20.

5 Ibid.

Corbucci's Western Navajo Joe (1966) with Burt Reynolds. She would work again with Bava on the Alfredo Leone-produced Baron Blood in 1972, playing the wife of Massimo Girotti. Still active in films and television, her most visible role was as Sister Vincenza in Francis Ford Coppola's The Godfather, Part III (1990).

French actress Pascal Petit (b. 1938), who plays Esmeralda, made her feature debut in Raymond Rouleau's film Les Sorcières du Salem, a prestigious 1957 adaptation of Arthur Miller's play The Crucible scripted by Jean-Paul Sartre, in which she played opposite Simone Signoret and Yves Montand, as well as future Bava alumni Michel Piccoli and Mylène Demongeot. After making French films for such directors as Marcel Carné, Henri Verneuil, and Michel Boisrond, she moved into French-Italian co-productions and Italian features circa 1961, and German films circa 1966, including two of the "Sexy Susan" series featuring Terry Torday. After Four Times That Night, most of Petit's work was in television.

Cast as the naïve young German girl whom Petit persuades to pose nude for her camera at the Club Kama Sutra was Brigitte Skay (pronounced "Bri-ghee-ta Sky"). She was born Brigitte Johanna Riedle in Mannheim, Germany on July 18, 1944, and became an actress in 1967 with the successful Unruhige Töchter/ Sexy Baby, directed by Hansjörg Amon. Four Times That Night was her third film, made when she was under contract to 3 Star Films, a company owned by Brad Harris, Ralph Zucker, and Walter Bigari. Skay has conflicted memories about the filming, but very fond memories of Mario Bava.

"He was a beautiful man, a gentleman director," Skay enthuses. "He was always very polite and very nice to me. There was some difficulty in communicating, because I could speak only German and a little English. Mario did not like to see me naked. When we were shooting Four Times That Night, it was Dick Randall who told me to take my clothes off for the camera. Dick was a very strange man. He was always making strange deals, and asking me to make calls to people for him. He also told people that I was his fiancee." Skay would work once again for Bava, playing the important secondary role of the skinny-dipping girl who runs afoul of one of the many murderers in Ecologia del delitto/ Twitch of the Death Nerve.

The role of the homosexual character George/Georgette—or, in Italian, Giorgio/Giorgia—is credited as being played by German actor Michael Hinz, who has a screen career reaching back to the late 1950s. But, according to Brett Halsey, the role was in fact played by Robert H. Oliver, an associate of Dick Randall who later directed the horror film Il castello della paura/Dr. Frankenstein's Castle of Freaks (1973, a Randall production) and is sometimes listed in genre reference books as "Roberto Olivieri."

"He wouldn't allow his name to be used on the picture, but I knew him as Bob Oliver," Halsey clarifies. "I think his grandfather's name may have been Olivieri, because he was of Italian origin, but Bob was an American and his father was American. I knew them both very, very well. Before Four Times That Night, we had worked on a couple of other pictures together. He later became a master of dubbing and had a dubbing company in Germany that became very successful. But that's how I heard about all the behind-the-scenes trouble that was going on—because Bob told me. If you were to look at Bava on the set, you never would have known there was a problem. Four Times That Night was a doomed project; if it hadn't been for Bava, it never would have got made."

"Bava would get stressed, I suppose," Halsey told Tom Weaver in a separate interview, "but he was very good at handling it. He was the type of director who was 'captain of his ship.' If the ship was going down, he was there at the wheel and trying to keep everything going. You wouldn't know if Bava was stressed or not . . . To Randall's credit, he did scrounge up enough money to make the picture, but we didn't have the money that we really needed. There were short cuts taken, and we were doing this picture not knowing that we were ever going to be able to finish it. There was a constant cloud of, 'Well, are we gonna come to work tomorrow or not?' Well, we did make the picture, and I saw it recently; it looks all right. You wouldn't know that we had the problems that we did."[6]

ARTFUL compositions were required to convey the illusion of nudity in Bava's remarkably coy "blue movie."

Production

Four Times That Night was produced on a very low budget—certainly under $150,000. It was so cheap, in fact, that some of the sets resorted to inflatable furniture and even more illusory furnishings, and the actors were obliged to wear their own clothing in the picture. Brett Halsey commends Bava for his ability to divert the cast's attention from the precarious state of production.

"If I hadn't known about it 'from the inside,'" he says, "I never would have known. [Bava] was always in a good mood, regardless of what was going on. He had a very good rapport with his actors. He let me do a lot of what I wanted to do myself, but his talent as a director may have been in subtly inspiring me to do what he wanted me to do in the first place—and simply! He wasn't an intellectual director; he was just a nice man. Being directed by Bava was kind of like having your father talk to you, or something. He kept everything very light on the set, there was always a good mood, a lot of joking. But things kept getting cheaper and cheaper as we went along. Working at Dinocittà was horrible. There was no heat, and we shot in the winter. It was cold as hell."

For this reason, Halsey remembers the shower scene as being extremely uncomfortable to film: "It was a real problem. They had no hot water in that studio. Actually, there was no power—on every stage, they had to bring in a generator from outside. The water was a problem, too, because for the shower scene, they had to have hot and cold water, because it was really cold in that great big, cavernous, concrete warehouse building with no heat. The problem with the shower was that the controls for the hot and cold water were about, oh, thirty feet away from the shower! So before you could get the proper temperature adjustment, the water had to travel through this long pipe. It took a lot of time, and it was a bit uncomfortable in there! First, the water would be cold and we'd be standing in there freezing, and then they would keep adding the hot water long after it was sufficient, so by the end of the scene it might be scalding hot!"

Daniela Giordano has her own recollections of the meager amenities at the dying studio: "My dressing room facilities consisted of a normal room, but because it was so far from the set—it took a lot of time to go there and to came back—I moved to the first room with a door I could find. The place where the actors got together and talked was the makeup room, and because of this, the makeup men were always angry. As for meals, I don't think we ever went to the studio commissary. We were given a 'cestino' (box lunch) with a dish of spaghetti, a second dish of meat and potatoes, along with some salad and fruit. Usually, we would be given a cestino only when we were filming exteriors, but on this occasion, I think we had them in the studio as well. I remember the De Laurentiis Studios being strangely deserted during this period."

Indeed they were. The Italian production boom which had commenced in the mid-1950s had drawn to a close by the late 1960s. In the early 1970s, Dino De Laurentiis would sell his massive studio albatross to the Italian government that built it, and relocate his production headquarters to New York City.

Having learned to be irritated when working under the eye of an American line producer, Bava was quick to test Alfredo Leone's knowledge of the basics of filmmaking. "My first day on the set, Bava finished setting up a shot and invited me to take a look through the viewfinder," Leone recalls. "I did and I couldn't see a thing, because he had deliberately thrown the camera out of focus! He asked me how it looked, and I told Bava I guessed it looked okay. Bava went over to his assistant and said under his breath, 'Stronzo americano' [shitty American] or whatever. He was testing me. I learned my lesson, and from that point on, I always gave it to him straight. He appreciated that, and we went on to become the best of friends."

As with every Bava film, Four Times That Night was thoroughly pre-planned and storyboarded by the director himself. Though the project was not destined to be among his most visually innovative works, Bava was extremely concerned with using his camera creatively to protect the privacy of his lead actress.

"When we met for the first time," recalls Daniela Giordano, "I told Bava that I would not consent to appear nude onscreen. He told me: 'Don't worry. You will appear to be naked, but you will not be naked.' And he explained me how he planned to use the camera to obtain this effect. Something in his glance and in his tone of his voice convinced me that he was sincere, so I accepted the film. He kept his word, and I must say, he did a very good job from this point of view. I think the film's erotic scenes hold up very well, according to the period in which they were shot."

DANIELA GIORDANO remains well-covered throughout 99.9% of the film.

6 Tom Weaver, Eye on Science Fiction, (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 2003), 128–29.

Brett Halsey confirms that the issue of nudity was "never a problem, because if the actress makes it clear in the beginning that she won't do nudity, the producer and director have two options: they can either hire someone else, or respect her wishes. Well, they didn't want to hire someone else, so it was never really a problem. No one criticized [Daniela] because of it. To be perfectly honest, I don't ever remember her being nude at all. Maybe she was topless in in the shower . . . I don't remember, but I would not have been surprised. Even when I worked with Freda, when I first came to Italy, I can remember him filming bare breasts . . . 'for the South American version.' But who knows? Maybe they were just for his private collection!"

As it happens, for the shots in which Giordano was filmed seminude, her body was always well covered either by her hands, arms, or deliberate obstacles placed between her and the camera; these shots are also very isolated in composition. However, there is one brief topless shot as she is dressing for her date, which one imagines was either obtained clandestinely at Dick Randall's insistence or was intended to be soft-matted in projection to bar Giordano's nudity from public view.

Because there was very little money available to create sets, Bava was also called upon to innovate believable environments out of thin air. Alfredo Leone: "I once saw him hang a bunch of ornaments right in front of the camera lens. There wasn't anything else there, but if you looked through the camera, it looked like there was a whole set! You'd never know that it wasn't." A close look at the Club Kama Sutra sets reveal that there was very little on-set besides a single cage frame, some flashing lights, and a few boxes for extras to sit on; the rest was conjured by arranging pieces of plastic near the camera lens, and by hanging a large makeshift chandelier of paper and beads in the middle field of the shot.

"I don't remember anything in particular about Bava's inventive duties on the set," Giordano offers, "but this doesn't mean anything, because I was not interested in the technical details of filmmaking. Besides, it was almost forbidden for an actor to look through the camera during the shooting of the film, and it was forbidden for us to attend the dailies."

Asked about how Bava seemed to get along with Dick Randall, Giordano adds, "I have nothing to say, really, about the relationship between Bava and Dick Randall. It seemed everything was okay: big smiles, big hugs . . . you know, the usual movie behavior. After each working day, I went home, so I don't know if anyone quarreled after work. On the set, everything was okay. Nobody was particularly excited because we were making a sexy kind of film. Bava was a nice director; we understood each other. He knew how to explain what he wanted. I knew what he wanted. It was enough for him to explain each scene to me only once."

Bava was hiding more from the cast and crew than the precarious nature of the production. The experience of making Four Times That Night was made personally stressful for Bava as he was reaching the end of his close personal alliance with Rosalba Scavia, who had been his production secretary, script girl, personal assistant and intimate since Terrore nello spazio in 1965. It was during the making of this film that Scavia made known that she had decided to withdraw from the film business to pursue a different line of work.

"I wish we had worked together more," Scavia says wistfully, looking back. "But production teams here in Italy—it's a big family thing. And working in the cinema was not how I wanted to spend the rest of my days. Do you know, the films I made with Mario . . . I never saw them, other than the dailies. If I saw them now, I would probably feel great emotion . . ."

The difficult working circumstances were ameliorated, for Daniela Giordano particularly, by the crew of talented artisans Bava had assembled. "The makeup was by Massimo De Rossi, who was the best available at that time," Giordano points out. "The De Rossi family is still providing the best makeup we have in Italy today. Also, the directors of photography and lighting were excellent. The crew was a good one, but you need more than a good crew to make a good film. I'm sorry to say, I didn't like Four Times That Night. It was a good idea, and it could have been a good film—but it didn't work at all."

The production otherwise unfolded without incident, depending on who is telling the story. Daniela Giordano recalls: "I had a scene where I had to kiss Brett Halsey, and the kiss had to be full of passion. I am myopic, so I had to measure the distance between him and me. I got the right position, I got the right place—his mouth, but I did not get the right distance, and so I gave his teeth a good hit with my teeth. He lost three caps in front!" [7]

Halsey, for his part, is perplexed by the anecdote. "I've never worn caps," he insists. "I don't know where that comes from, because I've never worn them. Maybe she's remembering another picture, another actor—but it wasn't me."

The evidence seems to support Halsey's statement, as there is no shot in the final cut that shows the two actors walking into a passionate kiss. It's possible that Ms. Giordano is remembering an incident from another picture. But it seems appropriate that the making of Four Times That Night would result in at least one Rashomon of its own.

Commentary

One of the predominant themes of Mario Bava's career is the nature of illusion: whether or not we can, or should, trust what we see with our own two eyes. As a special effects artist and trick photographer, this subject was of prime importance to Bava, who made a lifelong study of exactly how much the eye needed to see before the mind would believe. His filmography is not only rife with illusions, but with stories that ponder this question on a narrative level. Barbara Steele embodies a walking deception in La maschera del demonio, as do the possessed dead bodies of the astronauts in Terrore nello spazio. As Hercules ventures into the Underworld in Ercole al centro della terra, he is cautioned, "Do not believe in what you think you see," and the whodunit plots of La frusta e il corpo and Sei donne per l'assassino are studies in red herring, casting a wide net of suspicion about suspects who are later proven innocent.

Given its foregrounding of this recurring theme, one may approach Four Times That Night with the hope, if not the expectation, that it might be Bava's ultimate dissertation on reality and illusion. Unfortunately, it falls quite short of this mark, and given the material he had to work with, one doubts in retrospect that Bava ever had such conscious ambitions for the picture. One's ability to appraise the film is further complicated by a vast gulf in quality between the Italian version (a remarkably decent comedy with added shadings of irony and lots of snappy, sophisticated dialogue) and the English-dubbed version (which is simply excruciating). The complication is that the latter version is much more representative of the film as it was shot, because the actors played their roles in English, whereas the whole personality of the Italian version—particularly its delightful dialogue—was concocted largely in postproduction. Though Bava took no screenplay credit, the sense of humor displayed in the Italian dialogue is palpably his own—full of deliberately (and amusingly) melodramatic references to nuns, chastity, morality, horror (John likens himself to Count Dracula several times), and the entertainment business. (A favorite bit comes at the end of George and Esmerelda's first scene, as the decadent, dissipated couple ponder what they will ever do if men start showing an interest in dating women again. "Go on being television producers, I guess," sighs George.)

One of the movie's greatest faults is precisely the same aspect that makes it most attractive to new viewers today: its blatantly artificial look, which could be described as "bargain basement Diabolik." Andrea Crisanti's art direction shows what a little taste can do with even less money at its disposal; John's apartment is predominantly white, with low, squarish furniture and pillows of primary colors and geometrical shapes thrown here and there for accent, and a turntable situated atop a decorative box that flashes meager pulses of psychedelic light; the other rooms seen in the film—the bathroom, the discotheque—are provided mostly by suggestion. At the time of the film's original release, Crisanti's art direction looked hopelessly anachronistic; it was a time when nothing was as abhorrent as phoniness to the young, who were coming out the other end of the psychedelic era with a reawakened interest in the authenticity of nature and natural things. Viewed today, however, it is easier to accept these Pop Art trappings as a kind of retro-chic city of the imagination, though it is doubtful that this was anyone's intention. (The movie's budget did not extend to redecorating John's apartment "subjectively"—everyone remembers it the same way.) Four Times That Night is most interesting when it is most delirious, as during the Club Kama Sutra sequence, but its caged showgirls and mechanically choreographed guitar trio are not nearly as captivating as a similar sequence in Diabolik. In an effort to sustain interest, the viewer begins to dissect individual shots into their component trick elements, like the clever hanging maquette of beads and paper that conceals the catwalks of the studio ceiling at Dinocittà.

COLLAGE of scenes from the film, with Pascal Petit as the central photographer, taken from the original Italian promotional booklet.

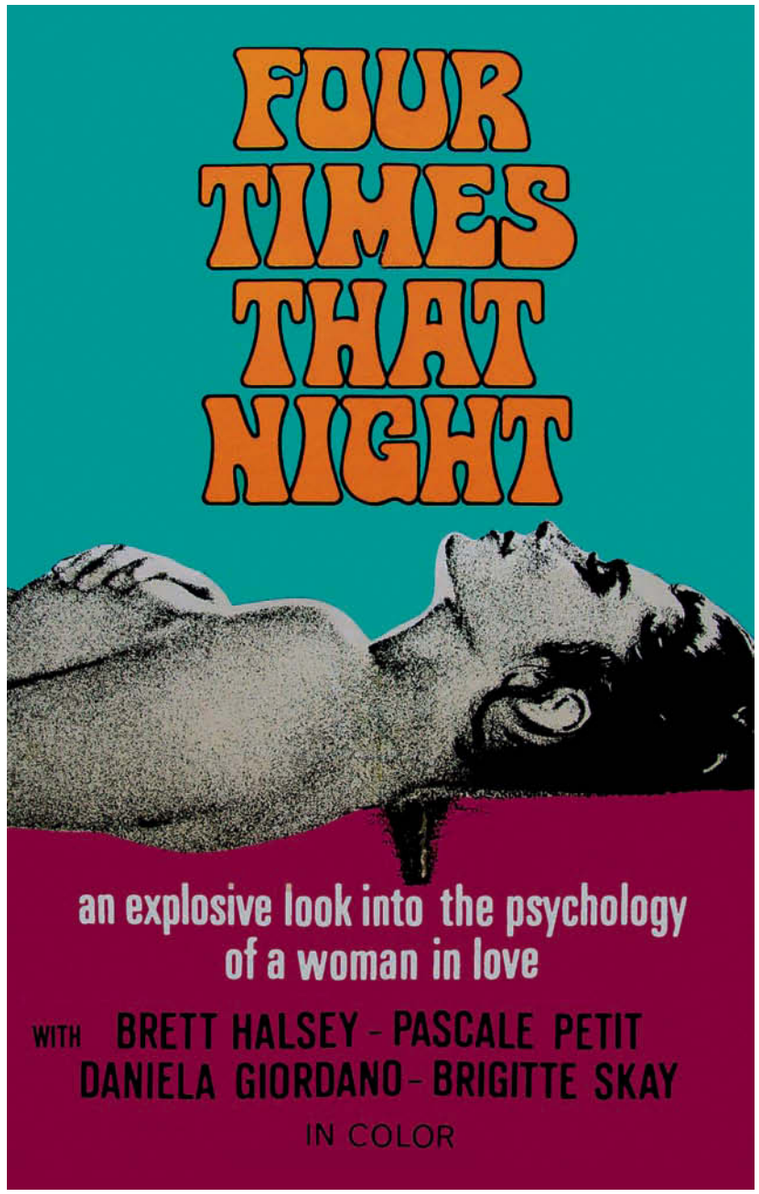
As always, it's delightful to see Bava meet the challenge of breathing life into so little, but isn't the point of telling any lie to make it believable? With each of the characters' versions of the story coming across as equally artificial, the film ponders its heady subjects and the appetites of the body from a stance that is virtually sterile. Though about (and thus seemingly addressed to) young people, Four Times That Night belongs more to the generation of Dick Randall's leering doorman than that of John or Tina; it is a kindergarten lesson in perception to a generation that had already moved beyond Aldous Huxley and Timothy Leary. Perhaps the movie was (as Alfredo Leone says) aiming for a level of unprecedented frankness about sex, but it doesn't do much more with its sparing nudity and openness about sexual diversity than gawk at it and pant after it. Instead, it seems a half-hearted attempt to bring the telefoni bianchi romances of the 1930s up-to-date with post-Pill promiscuity. Other films made in Italy around the same time achieved a more successful fusion of scenic artifice and sexual liberation, notably Piero Schivazappa's Femina Ridens/The Laughing Woman and Pasquale Festa Campanile's La matriarca/The Libertine (both 1969) and, most particularly, Radley Metzger's Esotica, erotika, psicotika/The Lickerish Quartet (1970).

The film's failings have less to do with an absence of Bavian technique, than with the occasionally inappropriate presence of it. "Bava had a tendency to add his sense of mystique to a film," Leone admits. "In Four Times That Night, there's a scene of Daniela waiting in a garden at night, and he made it look mysterious, like a scene from a murder mystery, which it never was." Indeed, Tina's solitary moments in the night-shadowed courtyard outside John's apartment would have had no importance whatsoever, had another director been at the helm, but Bava cannot resist milking them for all the anxiety they're worth. Even slapstick scenes, such as the manic shots of the doorman rushing up and down stairs to spy on the young lovers, are inappropriately bathed in ominous shadows more appropriate to a mugging or a murder. Bava also inserts a number of playful point-of-view shots—such as the one of Tina reclining on John's couch and raising and lowering a red glass in front of her eyes, each peek resulting in John's perceived loss of another layer of clothing—which would seem appropriate to the film's themes of subjectivity, but in this setting seem more expressive of a director trying desperately to engage himself in work that holds no interest. Bava's films were sometimes unfairly criticized for their use of zoom shots, but this is one of the few occasions where such criticism seems warranted. Bava used zoom shots for many reasons—to inject comic strip dynamism into Terrore nello spazio and Diabolik, to beat the clock on hasty projects—but here they are indulged to such an excessive degree that one is tempted to compare them to something more appropriately conducted under the cover of a raincoat.



The film's worst fault is its screenplay, which, for all its Rashomon pretensions, is totally inept at the game it chooses to play. Why do the early scenes of Tina and John's date, which take place before Tina tells her version of the truth, find John behaving like the craven sex maniac described in Tina's account? (Tina, dancing: "Don't look at me—concentrate on the groove!" John, staring at her crotch: "I am!") How are we to believe John's account of the evening at all, when his vivacious description of Tina's mother is completely at odds with the more soberly attired woman we saw before anyone started telling their stories? How can the doorman's story, from its binocular vantage, logically accommodate Esmerelda's flashback story of how she met John—and why does that story end up neglecting this story entirely, as she recounts her persuasion of a German girl to pose for nude photographs? Lastly, if their date went so well, as the "true" version suggests, why would Tina return home and tell her mother that John tried to rape her?

7 Miroslaw Lipinski, The Daniela Giordano Interview, Sinister Tales website at http://members.aol.com/eurosin/sin.htm (February 4, 2006).

One imagines that the film was originally scripted to begin with Tina's 3:30 a.m. homecoming, or perhaps with the meeting in the park cutting directly to her homecoming; this would help to explain John's characterization as a cartoonish sexual predator in the early scenes. But by depicting him this way in the early scenes, which are meant to be objective, it becomes impossible to regard his interpretation of events with any credence, and the account of the oversexed doorman has even less cause to be taken seriously. The strength of Rashomon—aside from the expert filmmaking of Kurosawa—is that each character's interpretation of the story is equally valid, and each performance is uniquely persuasive; thus, the film directly appeals to the viewer's intelligence in sorting out the details and establishing the truth. In Four Times That Night, the characters are so two-dimensional, and everyone's story is so exaggeratedly false, that one loses interest in what really happened, if the viewer is charitable enough to foster any interest at all.

Adding to the film's inconsistency is the character of the unidentified narrator, a kind of Mephistophelean lecturer first glimpsed during the solarized main titles and not again until very late in the picture. It is doubtful that Four Times That Night would have been any more successful had his place in the proceedings been more consistent, but as it is, his half-hearted presence makes the confection seem worse than half-baked.

CANADIAN one-sheet poster, with a surprisingly inexact description of the film's purpose.

Four Times That Night is the least visually imaginative of Bava's fantasy films, and certain handmade elements such as the hanging baubles that provide the discotheque's ceiling offer the only evidence that he was actually behind the camera. The sole remaining in-camera effects shot is the doorman's point of view, as he spies on the goings-on in John's living room from an opposing rooftop. This was achieved by filming the living room set, at a distance, through an unpainted rectangle on a glass matte painting of a modern apartment building exterior—not a particularly magical shot.

More intriguing is the presence of two talismans that meaningfully recur throughout the Bava canon: the swing and the cigarette. In Bava's films, from Operazione paura to Schock/Beyond the Door II, the swing is always depicted as a throne of mischief. When Tina finds one hanging in the middle of John's living room, she immediately tags the double entendre ("Does this mean you're a . . . swinger?"), which is later reinforced when Esmerelda plots her seduction while rocking back and forth on it, and again when Tina's discarded dress is shown draped over its seat. Likewise, beginning with Nora's marijuana misadventure in La ragazza che sapeva troppo, Bava's films almost always use cigarettes as a signpost to guilt or complicity. In Four Times That Night, as in Sei donne per l'assassino and 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, lovers are shown celebrating their post-coital afterglow by sharing a cigarette.

The presence of these totems may be indicative of Bava's discomfort with the film's subject matter. "He didn't like sexy movies and disliked having to film erotic scenes," Lamberto Bava confirms. Daniela Giordano agrees: "Mario Bava was not the kind of director who liked to linger over sexual or erotic situations. As he told me, he preferred to shoot the atmosphere, rather than the crude, erotic situation. That's the reason I accepted the film."

Distribution

Four Times That Night was Bava's first completed directorial effort since the international success of Diabolik, but it would not be the next of his films to be released. Although, in retrospect, the film was as tame and suggestive as an erotic film can be, its release in Italy was blocked by the national censor board, whose members evidently objected to its depiction of homosexual characters and relationships. Ironically, the primary obstacle to the film's acceptance was the board chairman, who happened to be Bava's former mentor, Riccardo Freda.

"I was responsible for approving 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto and for banning another Bava film, Quante volte . . . quella notte [Four Times That Night], which had an erotic lesbian premise," Freda told interviewer Luigi Cozzi. "Quante volte . . . quella notte was a terrible film, so bad that Mario didn't claim it as his own, but he did direct it. By preventing the film from being shown in Italy, I felt I was doing him a tremendous favor."[8]

Freda was mistaken about a couple of things. First of all, the film had a lesbian character, not "an erotic lesbian premise." (Only a year or two later, when Dario Argento began to direct, homosexual characters were a common component of his dramatis personae and experienced no upsets with the censor board.) Secondly, Bava never denied his paternity in regard to the film; in fact, when interviewed in 1971, Bava said of the still-unreleased film, "It didn't turn out half bad."[9]

What is most interesting about Freda's assertion is that he claimed to recognize an element of self-contempt creeping into Bava's work. By his own admission, Freda was hoping to save Bava from himself by barring his latest film from public exhibition.

"In Italy, we never cleared the censor board," complains Alfredo Leone, still resentful of the interference. "They held us back for about three years, and that hurt us worldwide." In the midst of this ordeal, Variety reported that Bava was planning to undertake a modest schedule of pickup shooting, in the hopes of making the film acceptable by replacing its erotic content with horrific scenes of a Black Mass, hallucination and other traditional Bavian traits. Presumably, these inserts would have been used to deflect the true nature of John and George's disappearance behind closed doors, which is revealed in terms of the horrified expression on Tina's face. Instead of witnessing the two men making love, she would have seen them praying to Satan, sacrificing an animal, or something of the sort. But Bava's proposal was never taken seriously enough for him to have discussed it with anyone but the censor board. "I don't remember ever discussing such a move with him at all," reports Leone.

According to Brett Halsey, there were plans afoot in the early 1970s to beef-up the film's erotic content, as Alfredo Leone approached him on the matter. "Leone was a pretty straight shooter," Halsey says. "I was working in New York on a soap opera [Love Is a Many Splendored Thing] and he came to me and said, 'Look, we want to spice up the picture. If we give you $10,000, would you sign a release saying it's okay?' He wasn't asking me to act in the reshoots, he was just asking for my permission. And I said, 'No,' because I always thought of the picture as a comedy, not as a sex picture at all. But I admired Alfredo for that, because most producers wouldn't have asked; they would have gone ahead and done it. Apparently, they didn't do anything anyway. But at least he had the courtesy to ask."

US ad mat from the original Cinevision pressbook.

Though decidedly lower tier Bava, Four Times That Night is very much as Leone describes it: "A film far ahead of its time." Literally. Four years passed before it saw the light of public projection, and by the time it came out, the market for adult films had radically changed. It had entered production before the MPAA Ratings Board was introduced in America, but was not acquired for distribution in America until early 1972, by which time the world had moved well beyond it, into the once-unthinkable realms of Deep Throat and Behind the Green Door.

Alfredo Leone tried to sell the film's US distribution rights for many years without success. It was first acquired in Canada by John Dunning and André Link's Cinépix Film Properties, Inc., who gave the film its world premiere in December 1971 at the Seville Theatre in Montreal, Canada, where it had a two-week run with an "18 Years" restriction. Around this same time, the US distribution rights were secured by Cinevision Films Ltd., a small New York-based company formed by Sam Lang and J. Arthur Elliott, who later became the executive producers of Baron Blood by providing Leone with $125,000 at a time of need. Pressbook ads claimed that Lang and Elliott "presented" Four Times That Night, but it is doubtful that the film was ever "presented" in more than a few theaters, nationwide. Cinevision was out of business within two years. The Internet Movie Database lists a domestic release date of April 1975 for the picture, without any further information about who distributed it.

The film was eventually given a scant release in Italy—as Quante volte . . . quella notte—in the summer of 1972, at the height of vacation season. Not even Bava's friendliest Italian critics remember seeing it, and the film subsequently dropped out of sight until the Italian version was released on DVD as part of Image Entertainment's "Mario Bava Collection" in November 2000. An English-language version of the film exists, but Alfredo Leone deliberately withheld the track from the disc.

"It's terrible," Leone admits of the track. "It was done very badly, giving Daniela Giordano's character a Southern accent and whatnot. It's a very special picture, Four Times That Night. It needs special handling. And I didn't want to include anything that might hurt its chances of finding an audience that would appreciate it."

8 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri, (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 249–50.

9 Volta.

MARIE (Edwige Fenech) is found crucified in a mockery of her earlier "virgin sacrifice" in 5 BAMBOLE PER LA LUNA D'AGOSTO.

5 BAMBOLE PER LA LUNA D'AGOSTO

5 Dolls for an August Moon

ALFREDO LEONE REMEMBERS that Mario Bava approached him with a copy of the Hatchet for the Honeymoon script as the filming of Four Times That Night was coming to a close. This indicates that the picture was still uncompleted at this time, in limbo since the budget bottomed out in Paris; it still needed additional footage to wrap it up. Leone had rescued Four Times at the eleventh hour, so it makes sense that Bava would see if he and his New York partners might be interested in salvaging another. Leone read the Moncada script (which bore only fleeting resemblance to what Bava had actually shot) and "was not impressed," feeling that the material was "ordinary and unworthy of Bava." He declined to get involved, but made it clear that he would be more than happy to work with Bava again—when the right project came along.

At some point between the conclusion of Four Times That Night in December 1968 and the start of Bava's next production, some nine months later, Manuel Caño located the necessary funds for Bava to complete Il rosso segno della follia. What remained to be shot isn't known, but it did not require the participation of Stephen Forsyth.

Inevitably, the summer of 1969 began to edge into autumn, but the events characterizing the season were anything but autumnal. Apollo 11 became Earth's first chariot to the moon, nearly half a million young people flocked to a pasture in New York's Sullivan County for the Woodstock Music and Arts Fair, and in Italy, filmmakers continued to seek footholds in this ongoing era of crisis. By now, the Italian cinema (so healthy throughout the late '50s and early-to-mid-'60s) was in decline; most of the visiting producers from America—Deke Heyward, Larry Woolner, and now Alfredo Leone—had decamped for home, leaving the Italians to their own devices. It was not a happy season for Italian directors in general, and Bava was worse off than most. Though his recent professional choices had been the right ones for him at the time, it did not look well on his resumé that Bava had followed his work for Dino De Laurentiis with a cheap Spanish horror picture, a kinky sex comedy for Dick Randall, and a couple of low-profile moonlighting assignments.

Fortunately, a much-needed native shock wave was about to reactivate the Italian film industry and its need for directors like Bava. Much as Woodstock had given the world a seismic illustration of the sheer volume of the youth market, the Italian cinema was shaken in early 1970 by the release of L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo/The Bird With the Crystal Plumage, the feature film debut of a 29-year-old writer–director, Dario Argento. Born in 1940, Argento was the son of motion picture producer Salvatore Argento and the Brazilian photographer Elda Luxardo. He entered the movie business as a film critic for the leftist daily newspaper Paese Sera—in which capacity he had been among the first to write respectfully about Bava's films.

DARIO ARGENTO, the new hope of the Italian giallo, in conversation with Luigi Cozzi and father/producer Salvatore on the set of his third thriller, 4 MOSCHE DI VELLUTO GRIGIO (1971).

"I particularly liked La maschera del demonio and Sei donne per l'assassino," Argento remembers. "I don't remember reviewing them, but I wrote in some magazines about them. I think some of the irony of Bava influenced me. As in Sei donne per l'assassino, there was something interesting-looking about the sets, the violence, the beautiful girls."

Argento's astute journalism and enthusiasm for B-movies led to a number of minor screenwriting assignments—Westerns and action pictures, mostly—culminating in a shared story credit (with Bernardo Bertolucci) on Sergio Leone's masterpiece C'era una volta il West/Once Upon a Time in the West (1968). L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo—which borrowed liberally from Frederic Brown's novel Screaming Mimi—was co-produced by Salvatore Argento and Artur Brauner's CCC, who sold it to West German audiences as a faux Bryan Edgar Wallace adaptation. It was a bold stylistic amalgam of Antonioni's Blow Up and Bava's gialli—flashy, stylish, violent, but also infused with McLuhanesque cool. Something in the film's combination of its semi-futuristic settings, its Hitchcockian flair, its European existential approach, and cruelly accentuated misogyny galvanized audiences worldwide, reinvigorating the Italian cinema. One of the film's most remarkable narrative devices was borrowed, consciously or unconsciously, from Bava's La ragazza che sapeva troppo—namely, the subconscious witnessing of an important clue to a murderer's identity, which does not surface into consciousness until the final reel. Though Argento denies that this particular film in any way influenced him, this single narrative device made such an impression that it factors, to a greater or lesser degree, in every one of his films.

Though Bava and Argento worked in the same genre, their approaches

5 bambole per la luna d'agosto

"5 Dolls for an August Moon"
Filmed at Dear Studios (Rome) and on location in Tor Caldara and Lavinio
October 1969
First released: February 14, 1970
Eastmancolor, 1.85:1, 79 minutes

Production: PAC (Produzioni Atlas Consorziate, Milan). Producers: Pietro and Mario Bregni. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant director: Mario Bianchi. Story and screenplay: Mario De Nardo. Continuity: Marisa Agostini. Director of photography: Antonio Rinaldi. Camera assistant: Emilio Varriano. Second camera assistant: Gianlorenzo Battaglia. Art direction: Giuseppe Aldebran. Sets and costumes: Giuliani Maffai. Wardrobe: Roberto Ranucci. Production manager: Luigi Alessi. Assistant production managers: Rodolfo Martello, Alfonso Cucci. Production secretary: Franco Tupini. Editor: Mario Bava. Assistant editor: Liliana Serra. Songs: "Five Dolls" by P. Umiliani, sung by Alessandro Alessandroni's I Cantori Moderni (Cinevox Records), "Neve calda" by Jarusso/Simonelli [credited, but not actually heard in film] and "Ti risveglierai con me" by Jarusso/Simonelli/Umiliana, performed by Il Balletto di Bronzo (RCA Records). Sound: Leopoldo Rosi. Music: Piero Umiliani. Stills: Armando Pietrangeli. Distributor: PAC

Ira von Fürstenberg (Trudy Farrell), Edwige Fenech (Marie Chaney), William Berger (Fritz Engel/Gerry Farrell),[1] Teodoro Corrà (George Stark), Maurice Poli (Nick Chaney), Howard Ross [Renato Rossini] (Jack Davidson), Helena Ronée (Peggy), Justine Gall [Ely Galleani] (Isabelle), Edith Meloni (Jill Stark), and Mauro Bosco (Jacques/Charles).

Belgium: 5 Meisjes Tijdens een Warme Zommernacht, "5 Girls on a Warm Summer Night," Cinema International Corporation
France: 5 Filles dans une Nuit Chaude d'Ete, "5 Girls on a Hot Summer Night," Lyre Cinématographique, 11/22/72. Video: L'Ile de l'Épouvante
Spain: 5 Muñecas para la luna de Agosto, Filmax S.A.
Turkey: Yilan Ruhlu Kadinin Ýntïjkami, "Revenge of the Woman With the Spirit of a Snake"
UK: Five Dolls for the August Moon, Border Films, 12/1971, 81m 36s, Certificate "X," passed with no cuts US: 5 Dolls for an August Moon, International Media, 6/2/2002, American Cinematheque Mario Bava retrospective to their material were decidedly different. In the course of his own career, Lamberto Bava has worked as an assistant to both directors. When asked how they differed, he answers simply: "Well, one was Mario Bava and the other is Dario Argento! Argento is more visible to the public and he makes movies that his audience will like. My father, on the other hand, made movies to express himself, so they are more interior, more strange and less commercial. And he made them long before they became fashionable."

Lamberto's son Roy, who has worked more recently with Argento, has his own views on the subject: "Mario started the giallo picture with Sei donne per l'assassino, but it was evolved further by Dario, who loved my grandfather's work but had a different way of looking at the same subject matter. He adapted the form in his own personal way. When Dario did L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo, it was a massive sea change in the giallo format because he was younger, a child of the counter-culture revolution. Dario's vision was more modern than Mario's, who stuck to the supernatural and took things much less seriously than Dario, because he liked irony in his pictures. That is completely the opposite of what Dario likes. Mario was a joker, and although Dario can be funny, I would never describe him as that . . . He's more of a serious person. He's had his fair share of nasty things said about him in the Italian press and he is guarded and on the look-out for that. Mario never cared about that. From Mario's very first movie, they were always speaking badly about him, so it got to the point where he took it with a grain of salt. Dario's press background means that he's more focused on what other people think about him. That was never Mario's concern. He saw it all as a game. The reveal at the end of I tre volti della paura says more about Mario's personality and sense of humor than you could possibly imagine. He used to say that, if you can't laugh at yourself, then you must be a really sad person. In life, you have to laugh about tragedies, because that's what life is all about."[2]

ARGENTO's gialli showed the influence of Bava's SEI DONNE PER L'ASSASSINO by contrasting violent murder with beautiful victims—as in this scene from his debut, L'UCCELLO DALLE PIUME DI CRISTALLO (1970).

Another important distinction between the two men is that Bava always denied being an artist, while Argento never resisted such identification (nor should he); in fact, if anything, his choice of protagonists alone would seem to confirm this definition. Argento's heroes are always confident and successful in their craft, while his murderers are often revealed as people with failed creative impulses. L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo offers a journalist pitted against an art museum curator (as opposed to the exhibited artist); the hero and murderer of Profondo rosso/Deep Red (1975) are both pianists but work, respectively, in a concert hall and at a street corner bistro; the villainy in Suspiria is wielded by aging dance instructors—i.e., failed dancers—against their promising young students; and Tenebrae (1982) is a clash between a best-selling mystery novelist and a group of obsessed readers compelled to emulate the brutal razor slayings described in his latest book. One cannot help but notice his murderers' common inclination to photograph their gory handiwork, to put a feeble frame around it, to interpret their crimes as art—destruction perverted into constructive creation.

At the start of the new decade, it seemed that everyone in Italy was making gialli—except the man most responsible for innovating the form. With three unsuccessful films behind him, his best recent work uncredited, his name associated with a sex film banned by the censor, and now twice the age of Italy's new generation of directors, Bava's rudderless approach to career had painted him into an unhappy corner.

Bava's friend and former interviewer, Luigi Cozzi, befriended Argento during this period and soon became his assistant director. As someone with a serious knowledge of, and affection for, Italian thrillers, it became Cozzi's goal to bring the two Maestri together. "In the '70s, I tried to arrange a meeting between Mario and Dario," he chuckles. "I tried hard to do that, because I considered Mario to be the father figure to Dario, but Mario was not willing to meet Dario because he considered L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo to be a copy of his film La ragazza che sapeva troppo. He had not seen the picture himself, but you see, a lot of people had come to him and said, 'You know, that's your picture!' He was irritated by this, because his picture didn't make any money, and Dario's picture was making a lot of money. So Mario was upset and didn't want to meet Dario at that time. I kept insisting and finally Mario said, 'Okay, okay, I'll meet him'—but he was still not so willing, you know? I don't know when they finally met because, around this time, I went away to work and didn't see Mario or Dario for a couple of years. By the time I came back, they had already met."

According to Argento himself, this meeting did not occur until 1974, during the production of his film Profondo rosso. "I met [Bava] occasionally in the bar," Argento says. "He thanked me, and told me I should be proud, because now it was possible for everybody to work in the giallo; it was no longer a problem. I think it became easier for him to have a film financed, because the distributors began thinking that these were good films."

The meeting was cordial, if a bit unequal, and didn't result in continued contact. Argento may have heard from Cozzi of Bava's trepidation about an encounter. Subsequent to their meeting, Bava actively discouraged himself from feeling any sense of rivalry toward Argento, persuading himself that they made very different kinds of films. He preferred to focus on their differences rather than on the similarities that friends and colleagues kept bringing to his attention. "In Italy," Bava later wrote, "horror films have never made any money, but my movies always made money in America. For some reason, Dario Argento was successful—but he didn't make horror films. He made thrillers."[3]

With the tremendous success of L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo, Italian thrillers were now defined as Before or After Argento. The post-Argento gialli employed enticing, surrealist

1 The main character goes by many names in the various international versions. In Spain, Fritz Engel becomes Frick Hengel, and he has been named as Frank Angel in other references, though I have not been able to determine which versions name him so. I have chosen to stick with the name given him in the Italian release.

2 Roy Bava interviewed by Alan Jones, April 2003.

3 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

titles as exuberantly as Bava's had used garish, impressionistic lighting. Such was the eagerness of the market that screenwriter Mario De Nardo was able to sell 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto—an uninspired, shameless rehash of Agatha Christie's novel Ten Little Niggers/Ten Little Indians[4]—to Produzioni Atlas Cinematografica on the strength of little more than its poetic title, which reflected this current vogue.

The production was planned as a vehicle for the voluptuous French-Algerian actress Edwige Fenech, but it lost its original director only days before the shooting was to begin. Bava remembered the hectic circumstances of his hiring: "The producers [Pietro and Mario Bregni] sent me the script, and I told them it was identical to Ten Little Indians, which I didn't like to begin with. They pleaded with me, so I agreed, in principle, to do it—but I refused to discuss it any further unless I was paid up front. I forgot all about it, because I had other things on my mind. And then, one beautiful Saturday morning, these producers called me into their offices again, handed over a check and a contract to sign, and announced that we had to begin shooting on Monday—the day after tomorrow! I put the check in my pocket, signed on the dotted line, while saying that the script was a joke, that they owed me at least ten days to rework it, to put it right, to prepare myself . . . but nothing doing!"[5]

By reading between the lines of Fenech's filmography, we can surmise the identity of the director whom Bava was hired to replace. Fenech was considered the "discovery" of producer–director Giuseppe Zaccariello, who—as "Josef Zachar"—featured her in several 1967–68 Italian/German coproductions—The Blonde and the Black Pussycat, Sex is a Pleasure, and The Brazen Women of Balzac, to give their English titles. All of Fenech's previous eight films had been directed by either "Zachar" or Guido Malatesta (b. 1919)—best remembered for such pepla as Maciste contro i mostri/Fire Monsters Against the Son of Hercules (1962) and La rivolta dei barbari/Revolt of the Barbarians (1965)—depending on the national origins of the production funds. Therefore, with P.A.C.'s Italian money financing 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, the film's direction was probably first entrusted to Malatesta. Lending further support to the theory is the fact that Malatesta died the following year, 1970, at the comparatively young age of 50, so ill health could have been responsible for his leavetaking.

As mentioned earlier, Zaccariello had worked as a silent production partner on Il rosso segno della follia and his alliance with Fenech implies that he was also unofficially involved with the Bregnis on this project. Therefore, it was most likely he who suggested Bava as an eleventh hour replacement. Bava was hired and put to work so quickly that, for the first time since 1965, his son Lamberto was not available to assist him. (Acknowledging that his father was no longer working steadily enough for him to support his family, Lamberto had accepted a job as assistant director on another film—whose title he doesn't, or claims not to, remember.) The production's cast and technical crew had already been assembled, but Bava insisted on working with his usual camera crew, headed by Antonio Rinaldi.

Bava felt some rivalry with Dario Argento, but he felt no trepidation about being perceived as jumping on Argento's bandwagon. In an interview conducted around this time, he observed: "I like to think of myself as someone who manages to keep working. I don't care about having a big success; I just want to stay active. My father used to say the same thing, and he worked in the cinema since 1906. The movie business has been in crisis, of late; I've seen a lot of people end up badly because they felt they were above catering to the latest trends, or were just too stupid to capitalize on their success."[6]

In the course of this same interview, Bava was asked for his feelings about traditional horror movies—the kind featuring monsters. "Monsters aren't psychologically suitable for [the Italian] public," he opined. "There's always someone ready to talk back to the screen, and they're right to do so. I saw King Kong vs. Godzilla: a big cardboard gorilla waging war against a plastic dinosaur . . .[7] At a certain point, a Jeep carrying soldiers was shown heading in the direction of the monsters—I don't know why, maybe to increase the suspense! Someone in the audience called out, 'They'll nip this in the bud!' Once they said that, it was all over! You must never give the public that kind of opportunity [to get the upper hand] . . . The monster in horror movies doesn't exist any more. We are the monsters now."

EDWIGE FENECH, the sex siren of 1970s Italian cult cinema.

The idea that "we are the monsters now" is actually present in most of Bava's work, going all the way back to La maschera del demonio. His characters are always running afoul of family—wives, parents, relatives—as well as lovers, co-workers (as in the case of Caltiki and Terrore nello spazio), and of course, the demons of their own minds. But in these films, there was usually a supernatural element involved—a vampire, a ghost; this is true even of his most realistic stories—as in the way that Isabella's diary in Sei donne per l'assassino functions as an incriminating voice from the grave. By the late 1960s, however, Bava had largely expunged all consideration of the supernatural from his work. It might be that, since the deaths of his parents, his thoughts of the Beyond became gentler, less fearful, more philosophical and inevitable.

From this point on, Bava's films would depict our waking world, the world of other people, the world of ourselves, as the one most worthy of our fear.

Having already been involved with films with the numbers 6 (Sei donne per l'assassino) and 7 (Sette vergine per il diavolo, the working title of his Cry Nightmare project) in the title, Bava now followed his number 4 (Four Times That Night) with 5: 5 (pronounced "cin-que") bambole per la luna d'agosto.

It bears so little resemblance to the giallo as it was then known that it could almost be described as an "anti-thriller"; there is no emphasis whatsoever on acts of graphic bloodshed and the story's thriller status is conveyed basically through dialogue as it remains resolutely in the heads of its characters, who are almost never allowed to break the film's compositional decorum in outbursts of physical, animal violence. It is (as Bava suggested with his reference to Agatha Christie) a more traditional mousetrap thriller that resembles Sei donne per l'assassino in the sense that it, too, is a tragedy put into motion by greed and romantic betrayal, executed with a flamboyant sense of color and style. It suggests what Bava's Cry Nightmare might have been—namely, a teasing thriller that exists to confuse or deny the viewer's basic expectations. Though a conservative thriller in many ways, 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto anticipates Bava's next picture, Ecologia del delitto/Twitch of the Death Nerve, on so many levels that it can almost be viewed as a blueprint or rough draft that takes an alternative approach to very similar material.

5 bambole per la luna d'agosto is one of the most controversial titles in the Bava canon, due mostly to the fact that Bava himself once singled it out in an interview as "probably my worst film." He was likely speaking in reference to the script he had to work with, or the facts of the production itself, rather than the final product. It is actually quite far from his worst film, and one suspects that—had Bava been inclined to give it a second thought—he would have reconsidered his low opinion. Now in its fourth decade of life, 5 bambole . . . has a remarkable freshness and air of invention about it. Based on the flimsiest of scripts, without any characterization to speak of, the project granted Bava an uncommonly wide berth in which to experiment with technique, to reach for new and untested frissons and visual approaches, and he seized the opportunity with a refreshing lack of inhibition. Though it was made by a grandfather aged 55, 5 bambole . . . rivals Diabolik as the most youthful in spirit of all his works; though it doesn't aspire to their same level of accomplishment, its attractive buoyancy makes even his greatest films seem heavy and lethargic. The light plot actually becomes sublimated in secondary viewings, allowing the traditional role of text to be replaced in function by Piero Umiliani's score, which was given a revolutionary prominence in the sound mix; in this way, the film becomes as endlessly viewable as a good album demands to be listened to again and again, over a lifetime. We

ISABELLE (Ely Galleani) spies on the wild party at the Starks' beach house.

4 Americans are often shocked to discover this, the original title of Christie's first and most famous mystery novel, which was retitled And Then There Were None (and later, Ten Little Indians) for its US publication in 1939. But the title of this classic thriller—which takes place in a house on "Nigger Island"—has remained Ten Little Niggers in the United Kingdom and Australia to this day.

5 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 249–60.

6 Alfredo Castelli and Tito Monego, interview in Horror 1. 1969.

7 In Troy Howarth, The Haunted World of Mario Bava (London, UK: FAB Press, 2002), 307, this interview is presented in a translation by Roberto Curti, which correctly points out that the film released in Italy as King Kong vs. Godzilla was not the Toho production directed by Ishiro Honda, but rather the Daiei production Gamera vs. Guiron, directed by Noriaka Yuasa. While this is true, Bava's mention of a "gorilla" and a "dinosaur" indicate that was in fact talking about the Toho film. Therefore, either he, Cozzi, or the editors of Horror knew what was being discussed and substituted the film's actual name.

MARIE makes a spectacle of herself, dancing around the room to the pop stylings of Piero Umiliani.

can enjoy the procession of images and their musical accompaniment without being bound to the gravity of a tedious and overfamiliar story.

However, at the same time, something new can be seen creeping into Bava's technique, the gremlin of self-sabotage that Riccardo Freda also noticed, that finds him cheating his film (and consequently, his audience) of nearly all of the genre's ritualistic highlights of sex and violence. In taking this approach, Bava may have been unconsciously exorcising his resentment over having to take work on short notice, of being deprived of any preproduction input, by deliberately flaunting his disrespect for the material.

Despite its often in-your-face manifestations of Bava's frustration, and in some ways because of them, 5 bambole . . . is a very special work in his filmography. It is indispensable as a demonstration of what Bava was capable of achieving on very short notice, and it captures this most careful of technicians in a rare, almost wholly improvisational light.

Synopsis

Wealthy industrialist George Stark invites a group of colleagues, along with their wives and girlfriends, to his fabulous island beach house for a holiday of decadent pleasures. Isabelle, the watchful teenage daughter of the island's game warden, has the run of the island while her parents are away. She follows the sound of music to the beach house and spies on a wild, orgiastic party. The Starks' houseboy, Jacques, carries a serving tray around the room, offering each of the guests their choice of a blade. Then, on cue, the lights go out—and when they come back on, the formerly frantically dancing Marie—the voluptuous wife of Nick Chaney—lies still on the ground, a knife planted in her breast. Everyone panics, but Nick sees through the trick and sprays the "blood" off her chest with a jet of seltzer water. Marie laughs and removes the knife from her brassiere—the "virgin sacrifice" has been a joke, because everyone knows that Marie is no virgin.

Stark's guest of honor is Prof. Fritz Engel, whose formula for a new industrial resin is so coveted by George, Nick, and their partner Jack Davidson that they have invited Fritz—and his wife Trudy—to the island to seduce him with whatever temptations they have at their disposal. They make him a collective offer of $3,000,000—a million from each of them—but Fritz is not interested in money; he is more interested in the humanitarian applications of his discovery, especially since his closest friend and associate died as a result of their research. He toys with the idea of giving the formula away at an upcoming scientific congress, but George is firm in his determination to obtain exclusive ownership and voices this in a manner that leaves Fritz feeling threatened. When Nick makes Fritz a covert offer of $1,000,000 "and if you decide to deal with just me, there'll be five more"—the scientist cements his resolve by burning the formula manuscript.

That night, Trudy and Jill (George's wife)—who are secretly lesbian lovers—are meeting on the beach when they see Marie clandestinely climbing aboard the Starks' private yacht for a secret tryst with Jacques, and finds him dead with a knife in his chest. This time, the murder is real. In panic, Marie runs away from the boat—observed by Isabelle—but says nothing to anyone of her horrible discovery. The next morning, Nick asks Marie to do what she can, physically, to persuade Fritz to accept his offer, and she agrees—but their conversation is disrupted by screams from the beach. While going to the beach to do some painting, Jill has discovered Jacques' corpse—moved by someone from the yacht to the shoreline, where it is being nibbled by tiny sand crabs. Knowing now that a murderer is among them, the guests want to leave, but there is no escape from the island. George has supposedly sent his yacht away to avoid a coming storm; the launch has also disappeared, and the phone is out of order. The men wrap Jacques' body in a polythene shroud and hang it in the house's meat locker. Aware of her indiscretions with the houseboy, Nick suspects Marie of the murder, to which she responds, "You forgot—I like men, but I like them to be alive!"

A highstrung artist, Jill is made hysterical by Jacques' death, and George slaps her, fed up with her crying and screaming. As Trudy tries to comfort Jill, Isabelle sneaks into the house and steals a silver lamé shawl. When Nick sees her hiding the garment on the beach, he tries to use the situation to his advantage, grabbing Isabelle—but Fritz happens along in time to stop him. Fritz and Isabelle discuss money, with the scientist insisting that it isn't important and the girl remarking that money is only unimportant to people who have never had to worry about it. But even she allows that not even a million dollars is enough to last for a lifetime.

Returning to the beach house, Nick is angry at Fritz for disrupting his encounter with Isabelle and also for snubbing his $1,000,000 check, which Fritz returned to Nick's bedroom and tucked between the cups of Marie's discarded red brassiere. Nick didn't find the check, so Fritz goes in search of it—and finds Marie waiting for him, inviting him to search the red brassiere, which she is now wearing. Fritz leaves the room in disgust. During the night, Fritz wakes from a bad dream in a solitary bed and traces his wife Trudy to the beach, where she is taking a romantic moonlight walk with Jill. Pausing for a cigarette, Fritz is shot with a telescopic rifle—aimed by Isabelle! The two women hear the shot, find Fritz' body and run for help. Isabelle drags Farrell's body away, seemingly into the sea.

GEORGE STARK (Teodoro Corrà) induces Marie to be the "virgin sacrifice" centerpiece of a practical joke.

With Fritz now out of the picture, the men converge on Trudy for the rights to his formula. When Nick demands the formula and accuses Trudy of stealing his still-missing check, she flips him with a jiu-jitsu move. Jack and his girlfriend Peggy, aloof from the earlier action, make love in their room. When morning comes, Peggy wanders out onto the patio to daydream, and Jack wakes to find her with a bullet hole in her forehead. Peggy is bagged and hung in the meat locker next to Jacques. Distraught, Jack flees the beach house and is sought by the remaining survivors. After many hours of searching, they return home to find Jack passed out in a chaise longue, but Marie has not returned. Her corpse is soon found, ritually slain in a manner similar to her earlier feigned sacrifice—suspended by her wrists from a tree trunk, stripped to her red bra and panties, stabbed in the heart. She joins Charles and Peggy in the deep freeze.

George later discovers Nick rummaging through his bedroom for his stolen check; outraged, the host attacks his guest. Their fistfight upsets a decorative display of glass balls, which spill down the stairs and into a sunken bathtub, where Jill—despondent over the murders—has committed suicide. After Jill joins the other bodies in what now resembles a carousel of death in the meat locker, Nick refuses to stay there like a sitting duck and leaves the house in anger. Jack, George, and Trudy decide to protect themselves by keeping watch over one another. They drink to pass the time. Trudy toys with George's tape recorder, which she drunkenly leaves in record mode before passing out with her two comrades on the floor. Soon after, George's yacht returns to the island and its crew find the entire beach house spotless and empty, with no one lying passed out on the floor. Later, when the three revive, George finds the tape recorder played out and rewinds it to hear the Captain and crewmen searching the house. They cannot understand how the rescue team failed to see them on the floor, and blame Nick—but they find that his dead body has somehow joined the others in the freezer during their black-out.

George offers Trudy $1,000,000 for Farrell's formula, which she reveals still exists on microfilm (the whereabouts of which only she knows), and she accepts the offer. George uncovers the launch he has hidden with palm fronds and, upon returning to the house for Trudy, finds Jack aiming a rifle at him. Jack confesses that he was responsible for all the murders, except Farrell's—a confession which Isabelle overhears. Jack shoots George dead. Terrified, Trudy bargains with Jack, offering the formula in exchange for his $1,000,000 check (she has already pocketed George's). As the microfilm and check are exchanged in the deep freeze locker, Trudy shoots Jack in the face with a pistol secreted in her handbag—and Jack returns fire, killing her. Isabelle enters the freezer to take the check from Trudy, and the microfilm from Jack—but he is not entirely dead yet, and briefly lashes out in a final spasm of greed. Isabella manages to escape with the money and the formula, locking the freezer door behind her.

In a short coda scene, Isabelle—transformed from an attractive teenager into a beautiful young millionairess—visits Fritz (yes, Fritz!) in a prison, where he has been sentenced to death by hanging for murdering his partner, the rightful discoverer of his industrial resin. A brief conversation between them reveals that Isabelle fell in love with Fritz at first sight and, inspired by George's false slaying of Marie, decided to save him from his murderous colleagues by shooting him with a sodium pentothal pellet, which her game warden father uses to tranquilize animals on the island. Unfortunately, because animals do not speak, Isabelle was unaware of sodium pentothal's properties as a truth serum, and when Fritz was given over to protective custody, he confessed to his crimes in his stupor. Isabelle explains to Fritz that she is broke. He is astounded that she has already spent three million dollars, but she explains that only two million has been spent; she needs the number of Nick's private Swiss bank account in order to collect the remaining unspent million. Reasoning that she saved his life, after all, and that he will have no use for the money where he is going, Fritz whispers the account number into her ear. Isabelle skips merrily away, returns to her parked Rolls-Royce, and instructs her driver to take her to Lausanne.

THE CAST (left to right): William Berger as Fritz, Ira von Fürstenberg as Trudy, Teodoro Corrà as George, Helena Ronée as Peggy, Maurice Poli as Nick, Edith Meloni as Jill, Ely Galleani as Isabelle and Howard Ross (a.k.a. Renato Rossini) as Jack.

Cast

Signed to direct this film after it had been cast, Bava found himself working with actors whose names and abilities he did not know. He adapted to his circumstances with a characteristic sense of absurdity: "I often asked the actors who didn't arrive on set at the same time as myself to repeat their names for me, out of simple Christian charity!"[8]

Though Bava had no input into the film's casting, it is hard to imagine him picking a more appropriate or suitable group of actors. Some of the performances may be wooden, and most of them may be two-dimensional, but each of the actors is visually correct and their lack of warmth and personality actually helps to sell them as the soulless business people they are supposed to be, just as their lack of depth brings everything one needs to know about them on a purely visual plane.

German actress and wealthy socialite Ira von Fürstenberg—born Virginia Caroline Theresa Pankrazia Goldina von Fürstenberg on April 17, 1940, in Rome—received top billing as Trudy, and—according to Maurice Poli—was also one of the film's principal investors. Svelte and a full six feet tall, Fürstenberg was born and formerly wed to nobility, being the ex-wife of Prince Alphonso von Hohenlohe-Langenburg, with whom she had two sons. She was always better known for her family's fortune than as an actress, though, at the time of production, she had more than a half-dozen films to her credit, including Alberto Lattuada's Matchless (1966) and Robert Hossein's J'ai tué Rasputin/I Killed Rasputin (1967).

As one of the film's investors, Fürstenberg was positioned front and center in the original spate of Italian advertising materials for the picture, but in re-release, she was replaced by buxom Edwige Fenech, who is certainly the center of attention in the film itself. Born December 24, 1948, in Bône (now Annaba), Algeria, Fenech ascended to stardom after breaking off from Giuseppe Zaccariello, shortly after this film, and allying herself with producer Luciano Martino. Martino's brother Sergio subsequently directed Fenech in a series of gialli which—along with Dario Argento's psycho-thrillers—redefined the genre for the 1970s. Fenech's films for Martino include Lo strano vizio della signora Wardh/Next! (1971), Tutti i colori del buio/They're Coming to Get You! (1972), and Il tuo vizio è una stanza chiusa e solo io ne ho la chiave/Gently Before She Dies (1973). During this interval, in 1972, she married Luciano Martino—who had since divorced I vampiri star Wandisa Guida—and they remained married for ten years, and remain friendly to this day. Italy's reigning sex star of the 1970s, Fenech worked with Sergio Martino as recently as the 1995 TV miniseries Delitti privati. Still in demand as an actress, primarily on Italian television, she currently heads her own production company, Immagine e Cinema.

Seen here with his blonde hair in Einsteinian disarray, William Berger was born in Austria on January 20, 1928, and educated at New York's Columbia University, where he excelled as a track and field athlete. After spending several years in America as a television actor—billed as "Bill Berger"—on soap operas like The Edge of Night and guest series appearances (including Route 66's episode "Lizard's Leg and Owlet's Wing," in which he worked opposite Boris Karloff, Peter Lorre and Lon Chaney Jr.), Berger relocated to Rome. He began his long career in Italian films with Mario Maffei's La grande notte di Ringo (1965) and starred in at least twenty Italian Westerns, including most of the Sartana series. In his private life, Berger was a well-known proponent of communal living and psychedelic experimentation. "Bill was heavily into drugs and it could interfere with shooting, sometimes," admits actor Brett Halsey, who worked with Berger on several occasions. "I can remember we were filming a Western together and we were on horseback, like in a posse. I was talking to him and, as I talked to him, Bill started slowly . . . sliding off his horse. Leaning over until he fell off. Another time, I found him, off in the woods, sitting in a tree and reading a book—but the book was upside down! But he was a nice man and had a sense of humor about himself."

8 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

In 1966, while Berger was playing the lead role in Elio Scardamaglia's La lama nel corpo/The Murder Clinic (1966), his wife Carol was arrested for possession of drugs and, shockingly, died while in custody. "She was put in jail," Halsey explains, "but she was a diabetic, which they didn't know, and died from lack of insulin." Her death had a shattering effect on Berger, who nevertheless continued with his acting career, which he pursued with a lack of ambition, always being more interested in his life and children than in his work, a stance he shared in common with his 5 bambole . . . character. Among his later European co-productions were Tonino Valerii's Mio caro assassino (1971), Jess Franco's Los Ojos Siniestros del Dr. Orloff (1973, in which he played Dr. Orloff) and Liebesbriefe einer Portugiesischen Nonne/Love Letters of a Portuguese Nun (1977), Lamberto Bava's Oceano rosso/Devilfish a.k.a. Monster Shark (1984), Ruggero Deodato's Dial Help (1989), and several other films for Jess Franco—until his death from a heart attack on October 2, 1993. His daughter, actress Katya Berger (b. 1964), appeared in some prominent French films of the 1980s, including Marco Ferreri's Storie di ordinaria follie/Tales of Ordinary Madness (1981) and Jean-Jacques Beineix' La Lune dans le Caniveau/The Moon in the Gutter (1983).

Maurice Poli (not Maurizio, as sometimes claimed) was born in Sfax, Tunisia, in 1933 to Tunisian and Italian parents. He began acting in Paris, where he appeared with his brother Axel in Jean Herman's short film La Quille (1961), which was followed by small parts in Mauro Bolognini's La viaccia/The Lovemakers, The Longest Day and the Steve Reeves peplum La leggenda de Enea/The Avenger (all 1962). This led to a more prominent supporting role in another Reeves adventure, Sandokan la tigre di Mompracem/Sandokan the Great (1963). In 1965, after a successful supporting role in the French television series Belle et Sébastien, Poli took the lead role in a spy series that lasted only one season: Frédéric la gardian. He also played the recurring role of Alfred in Marco Vicario's two "Seven Golden Men" features Sette uomini d'oro/Seven Golden Men (1965) and Il grande colpo dei setti uomini d'oro/Seven Golden Men Strike Back (1966). After his role in 5 bambole . . . Poli would reunite with Bava twice more, most importantly as the leader of the criminal gang in the ensemble crime drama Cani arrabbiati/Rabid Dogs a.k.a. Kidnapped. Poli's later work in films consisted mostly of low-budget Italian erotica, such as Malombra (directed by Bruno Gaburro, the ex-husband of Erika Blanc). Today he is retired and makes his home in the Flaminio district of Rome, where he devotes himself to his lifelong hobbies of geology and archaeology.

Prior to 5 bambole . . . Maurice Poli and Howard Ross had both acted in Italian Westerns under pokey pseudonyms; Poli as "Monty Greenwood," and Ross [real name: Renato Rossini] as "Red Ross" in Bava's Ringo del Nebraska. Born in Rome in 1938, Ross had also co-starred in Guido Malatesta's penultimate film Le calde notte di Poppea (1969), which Malatesta directed under his alias of "James Reed." Ross was the only male cast member of 5 bambole . . . who went on to become a fixture of giallo productions. His later Italian thrillers include Alfonso Brescia's Una ragazza tutta nuda assassinata nel parco ("Nude Girl Found Murdered in the Park," 1972), Giuseppe Bennati's L'assassino ha riservato nove poltrone/The Killer Reserved Nine Seats (1974), and the curiously named Cinque donne per l'assassino/Five Women for the Killer (1972).

Teodoro Corrà (sometimes credited as "Doro Corrà") was also a veteran of Italian Westerns, including Sergio Garrone's Django il bastardo/Django the Bastard and Piero Pierotti's Testa o croce/Heads or Tails (both 1969). Corrà appears to have based his performance as George Stark on Bava himself, employing the director's sly sense of humor and animated body language into his characterization. Bava liked the actor well enough to cast him as the villain of his next picture, Roy Colt & Winchester Jack.

Helena Ronée, an attractive blonde French actress, entered films with Mario Monicelli's black comedy Toh, é morto la nonne (1968) and briefly specialized in lightweight romantic fare. Her most notable screen appearance, BAVA discouraged Edwige Fenech from playing some scenes nude, but she nearly caught cold nevertheless running half-naked on a beach in October.

aside from her role as Peggy, was as one of Blofeld's "Angels of Death" in the James Bond picture, On Her Majesty's Secret Service (1969).

Newcomer Ely Galleani, who plays Isabelle, was—like Ira von Fürstenberg—of noble blood. The daughter of Count de Galleani and a Polish noblewoman, she was born Federica Eleonora De Galleani on April 24, 1953, in Alassio, a district of Savona only a few kilometers distant from Mario Bava's own birthplace of Sanremo. 5 bambole . . . is often cited as her first film, but she had prior experience at working onscreen. "It was, in a manner of speaking, my very first picture," she supposes. "Before that, I did only a couple of films as an extra, and one other little role in cinema. I was very young at the time and Mario really coddled me."

Galleani's billing in the picture is bewildering, to say the least. On the film's first Italian poster design, she is credited as "Federica De Galleani," while onscreen, and also on the locandina and lobby cards, she is identified as "Justine Gall." A program booklet from the first release was printed bearing the name of Federica De Galleani, but was overlaid with a strip of tape bearing the "Justine Gall" name! A variety of screen names is attached to her screen career—including "Elly De Galeani," "Edy Galleani," and "Ely Gall"—which included such films as Lucio Fulci's acid-drenched giallo, Una lucertola con la pelle di donna/Lizard in a Woman's Skin (1971, in which she played Florinda Bolkan's daughter), Corràdo Farina's Baba Yaga/Kiss Me Kill Me (1973), Denis Héroux' Ne pour l'Enfer/Naked Massacre (1976), and two of Joe D'Amato's "Black Emanuelle" films, Emanuelle nera orient reportage/Emanuelle in Bangkok (1976) and La via della prostituzione/Emanuelle and the White Slave Trade (1977). Some sources credit Galleani with playing the witch Elizabeth Holle in Bava's Baron Blood, but this is not true. In 1972, she married Carlo Vanzina, the son of Stefano "Steno" Vanzina, who was destined to become a successful director in his own right. (The best known of his forty-plus films, to American viewers, might be the 1983 giallo, Sotto il vestito niente/Nothing Underneath, starring Donald Pleasence.) They separated only one year later, and this, coupled with some admitted drug problems and the decline in Italian film production, left Galleani with few options to continue her acting career. She retired from the screen in 1978. Today, her old problems now overcome, she makes her living as an accountant in her hometown of Alassio.

Even more bewildering than Galleani's screen credit is the listing of Mario Bianchi as assistant director. Bianchi says he never worked for Mario Bava in this capacity and doesn't know he was credited as such in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto.

Production

Despite the haste of the proceedings, filming commenced with a sense of occasion and the attractive cast was trotted out for a press conference, which was filmed as a newsreel item. In this black-and-white footage, the cast look quite elegant as they stand and pose and whisper amongst themselves under the bombardment of paparazzi flashbulbs—with their camera-shy director nowhere in sight.

Ely Galleani recalls that the film's budget was so low that most of the cast members were obliged to wear their own clothing, as there was no money for wardrobe. "She was me," Galleani says of her character, Isabelle. "I used my own clothes. I was just like Isabelle, too, in that particular moment of my life, so they asked me to wear my real things for the movie. That dress was an awesome gift from a lovely friend of mine, who was French. He had a fabulous striped dog . . . So I went around Paris with this striped dress and the striped dog . . . and yes, I was verrrry sexy!" Given the film's emphasis of the color blue, Galleani's orange-and-yellow striped dress provides a dazzling contrast yet fits in perfectly with its modernistic mise-en-scène.

"My first encounter with Mario Bava was a strange one," remembers Maurice Poli, in reference to Bava's sudden presence on the set as director. "However, he was extremely pleasant and professional—and intelligent. There was an air of serenity when we made this film."

Bava himself remembered the circumstances quite differently. "We worked under horrendous conditions," he shuddered. "It was October, terribly cold, and almost all the scenes were set on the beach as if it were summer."[9] Bava shot the beach scenes on the Torre Astura coastline near Anzio, where he had filmed similar scenes for La frusta e il corpo in 1963. For the night scene in which Marie discovers the murdered body of her lover aboard ship and must run back to the house, Edwige Fenech had to race up the beach and through a palm-lined area wearing nothing but panties and a thin scarf clutched to her breasts, when the sun was not at its warmest—nearly catching her death of cold.

It was on this same beach that Bava created a glass matte to supply the establishing shots of the Starks' fabulous beach house, which occupies the same promontory as Castle Menliff in La frusta e il corpo. The interiors were photographed inside a real, similar-looking beach house that was located not far from the beach. This highly decorous setting for the ugly murders yet to come show that Bava was perhaps better attuned to Agatha Christie's intentions with Ten Little Indians than any of the filmmakers who made authorized adaptations for the screen, as it is the only adaptation or imitation of the novel ever filmed to be staged in the sort of fantastic modern house Christie described. (Old, dark mansions have sufficed for everyone else.)

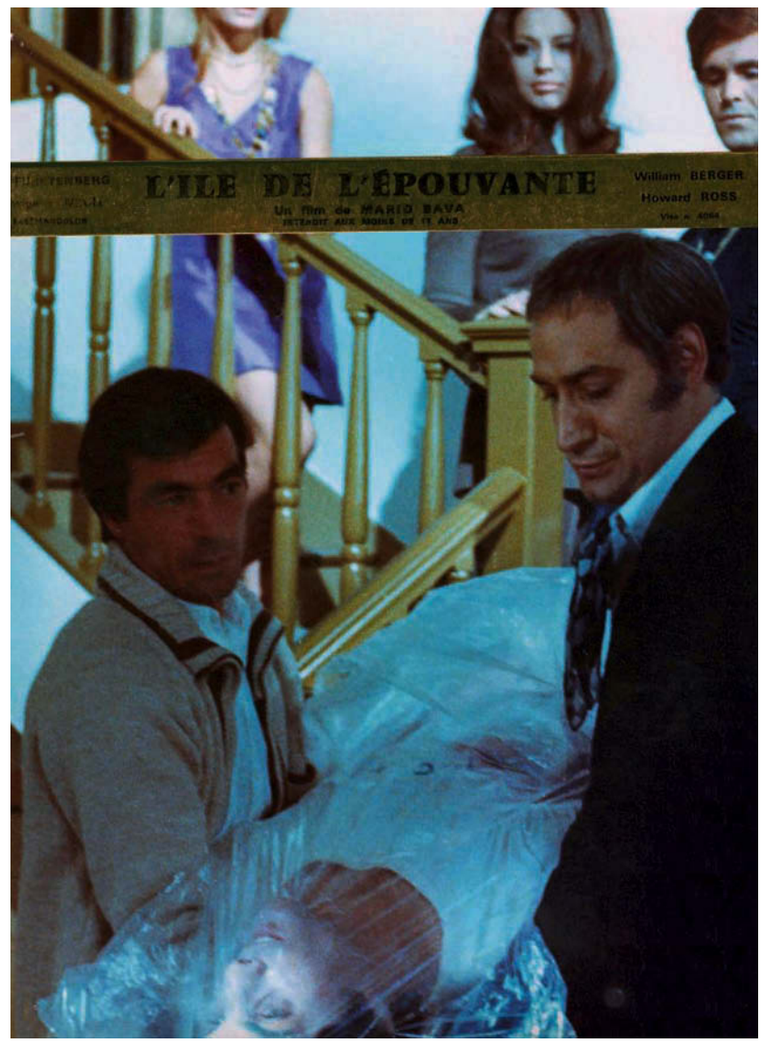
Interviewed near the end of his life, actor William Berger remembered little about the actual filming of 5 bambole, but he retained vivid memories of Bava's camera trickery. "One of the few things I recall," he told interviewer Christian Kessler, "is that Bava loved to play with special effects. He was the first director I worked with who used the matte shot technique, and he painted the glass plates himself. I never saw this with any other director, before or afterwards. He painted a house on the hill, then surrounded it with real foliage, placed it in front of the camera and you really can't see the trick onscreen."

Ely Galleani was impressed by the same spectacle: "Bava was a unique talent and an incredible magician. He personally painted the villa on a sheet of glass—including even the smallest details—and then he fixed the camera and lights, in such a way that the structure appeared to be positioned on the cliff in background. He looked something like the ultimate old-fashioned daydreamer . . . Even if he had to complete a movie with two chips, he was a complete perfectionist; his craftsmanship and visual style of filmmaking were truly terrific and invaluable. The set was quite an exacting place to work, not only because we actors had to be good, but there was also a technical side that had to work to perfection. Those were exhausting days on 5 bambole . . . days that seemed never-ending, but they were unforgettable at the same time."



In the earliest night views of the matte, it accommodates not only a house but black crepe paper silhouettes of the yacht, launch, and pier to the left of the frame. The perfect view of the matte and its positioning can be obtained on the Image Entertainment DVD at 21:30. The glass matte covers the entire field of vision in this shot. William Berger and Teodoro Corrà are on the other side of the glass, seeming to run toward the beach house, which is painted on the glass. Once they gain a certain distance, Ely Galleani steps into the foreground of the shot, on the same side of the matte as the camera, allowing her to block it from view and effectively "sell" it as a piece of actual scenery. But if one steps through the shot, Galleani can be seen reflected on the glass in two or three frames prior to her arrival, as she stands off-camera awaiting her cue.

While on the subject of the film's cinematography, it should be noted that, shortly before the filming of 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, a camera operator named Emilio Varriano joined the Bava squad. Varriano's previous work had included stints as camera operator for directors Alberto Cardone (Mille dollari sul nero/Blood at Sundown, 1966) and Gianfranco Parolini (two "Kommissar X" films).

"I was already familiar with Bava as a cinematographer," Varriano says, "and I would have done anything when they told me there was a chance I might work with him. Before hiring me, though, Bava tested me. With a completely closed zoom, he told me to follow the movements of his hand for a couple of minutes. From that, he deduced that I was up to the task, and I became a part of his crew . . . He had a regular crew, including his chief electrician Antonio Rinaldi, whom he valued a great deal. But it was me, as a cameraman, who kept my 'eye on the hole,' as we used to say. Bava wasn't the typical director who doesn't know anything about cinematography, of course, and you couldn't give him any advice. It was he who told me what I had to do, but I was very happy to work with him because there was a real satisfaction when he sat on the dolly and invented things. He was a bit stern, perhaps, but he was very open with all of us; he was nice. We didn't stop working for a single day."

Varriano's tantalizing comment about the Bava squad's activity during this period is indicative of the fact that Bava was now supplementing his time between feature films with TV commercial and industrial film work, none of which was credited or has been properly catalogued.

Maurice Poli's favorite memories of the picture concern his female costars, particularly Edwige Fenech, who played his wife. "Working with Edwige was great. Here was this beautiful young girl—just out of her teens, having only made a few films, and thrilled to be working with me! She remembered watching me on television in Tunisia when she was a teenager. She said she was so happy to be married to 'a real star' [laughs], even if it was just in a film. So she was quite wide-eyed around me, because she knew me as this French TV star. So we became friends, and stayed friends for years and years. Edwige was very proud of her body—and why not? [Luciano] Martino was a lucky man. However, Mario Bava didn't want any of that. Everything had to be suggested. I remember Edwige coming out of the shower naked and Mario was very embarrassed. 'What are the producers wanting me to shoot now?' I think I remember him saying. But as for me, I didn't mind!"

NICK, Trudy, Jack, and George carry the latest casualty to the meat locker carousel.

9 Cozzi.

Poli also admits to misbehaving on the set, while shooting Nick's attempts to thaw "the beautiful icicle, Trudy" (Fürstenberg). "A very beautiful woman," he remembers. "She had a great figure on her. The problem was, when she walked, she had these unusual swollen ankles that just didn't seem to go with the rest of her body. She wasn't an actress; she was a princess, a real diva. Anyway, I had this scene with Fürstenberg on the beach, where I had to lightly stroke her neck, her chest. I remember Mario saying, when we were going to do this scene, 'Touch her—touch her intimately.' It was a cool day. Mario said, 'Action' and told me to start unbuttoning her blouse. With fast and nimble fingers, I undid her blouse, scooped her breast out and started squeezing! Ahhh! I never felt a finer, more aristocratic breast! Ira was taken aback and squealed over her shoulder, 'Agggh! Mario! Mario! Stop this scene! This wasn't in the script! Cut!' Bava was standing there, next to the camera, and I swear that I saw him smile in a naughty way—maybe even snicker, but I can't be sure."

Working in the cinematic equivalent of a dying man's shoes, Bava managed to assert his vision on two important aspects of the screenplay. He took credit for the idea of having the corpses bagged in polythene shrouds in the walk-in freezer, which is believable considering the similarly shrouded dead of Terrore nello spazio: "In the screenplay, they were buried underground with lots of cross-shaped headstones—like in the Westerns!" [10] He also made the important decision "to change the murderer's identity to that of the hero, thereby sentencing him to a lifetime of hard labor. I had to avenge myself somehow!" he reasoned. [11]

Both William Berger and Ely Galleani, the participants in the new coda, preferred Bava's twist on the ending and were pleased by the measure of substance it brought to an otherwise shallow picture. "I think what is important to understand is that bad things never serve a purpose in life, because they always lead to nothing," Galleani says. "In my opinion, this is a message that Mario—who was a very smart, clever, wise, and tender-hearted person—actually wanted to convey in all of his movies: that the negative energy that people project will ultimately return to them, in the end, to bring them down. It's as simple as that."

MARIE tries to seduce the resin formula out of Fritz, but he's not taking the bait.

Unfortunately, though Bava took an interest in improvising a better ending for the picture, he also left in the final assembly a scene that flagrantly contradicts the movie's most important revelation. Viewers attuned to the narrative logic of the picture will balk at Jack's admission that he was responsible for all of the murders (except Fritz') since he was clearly still in bed when Peg was shot in the head while sitting outside on the patio, and also shown reacting with surprise to his discovery of her dead body. Bava may have thought he was changing the murderer's identity by putting (the presumably dead) Fritz in prison, but the dialogue reveals him to be just a murderer, not the murderer responsible for the entire body count. So, in fact, Bava did not change the murderer's identity; what he did was to add a dimensional layer to the otherwise thin narrative with one of his signature directorial traits: a backstory that reveals the hero to be just as vicious as everyone else in this microcosm of humankind.

One of the most interesting characteristics of the cinematography is its frequent emphasis on a single color, which inspired Pascal Martinet to describe the film as "a veritable symphony of blue." The atmosphere of death, the cold bodies in the freezer, may have led Bava to think of cyan—as in cyanide—and several of the beachside scenes were filmed with blue gel filters, either to emphasize the blue that was already there, or to assert blue where there was none. When Ely Galleani had to change from her orange striped dress to other items of personal apparel, she accommodated her director's color scheme by wearing a blue blouse and blue jeans.

For the first and only time in his career, Bava was required by the film's minimal budget to edit 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto entirely by himself. Evidently, this turned out to be a positive experience, as would Bava later remark that "Editing is the most beautiful thing in the world." [12] Different edits of the picture exist, the longest on record being an Italian version alleged to run 85 minutes. It is doubtful that a print of such length exists. The French and British versions are virtually identical, running about 81 minutes, and appear to be complete. These versions fade to black over the extended end titles with the Il Balletto di Bronzo music, but the version released on DVD in America by Image Entertainment postpones the fade-out, including more footage inside the car as Isabelle is driven away down a winding road. The Image version, being a PAL conversion, runs 25 frames per second and is thus also time-compressed; its 78:10 running time is equal to 81:20 at the correct projection speed of 24 frames per second.

Music

As with most other facets of this production, Bava had no say in the selection of a composer for 5 bambole. The job went to the Florentine jazz composer/musician Piero Umiliani, with whom Bava had previously worked on his first Western, La strada per Fort Alamo, in 1964. While that earlier effort was unlikely to have aroused any enthusiasm on Bava's part, Umiliani was now entering into what many listeners regard as the most inspired phase of his career, and he brought to Bava's film an infectious, inventive score with few parallels in its buoyancy and instrumental color.

With the exception of a quirky carousel theme ("Fantoccio grottesco") that complements perfectly the addition of each new polythene-bagged corpse to the house's walk-in freezer, there is every indication that most of the score—an impish and colorful assortment of cues that work and rework two central themes—was written from the composer's own inspiration, not in response to filmed footage.

The main theme, "5 bambole"—especially as it is heard in full on the soundtrack album—reveals close organic ties to the score which Umiliani had recently penned for Luigi Scattini's mondo movie Svezia, inferno e paradiso/Sweden Heaven and Hell, released in September 1968. Opening with a one-two, one-two-three-four-five beat tapped out on a snare rim with escalating staccato brass accompaniment, the piece initially evokes an atmosphere of espionage. This is dissipated, however, with the introduction of the vocals—heard only on the soundtrack album, not in the film—which are sung over a samba-themed accompaniment. After two increasingly ornamented run-throughs of the "One-two, one-two-three-four-five dolls" vocal, and a middle-eight played by conversing harpsichord and electric piano, a familiar voice enters. It reprises the "Mah-Nà Mah-Nà" vocal (by Alessandro Alessandroni) that would become world-famous as a novelty recording in 1970, following the US release of Sweden Heaven and Hell, when Jim Henson selected it as a pantomime performance piece for his Muppets. Bright instrumentation, particularly from the electric keyboard, keeps the track buoyant, and with the vocals in place, it becomes a classic bit of tongue-in-cheek, a kind of retroactive love letter to the film itself. The theme is reprised throughout the film at different tempi, with different instruments at the fore (tenor saxophone, Hammond organ, sitar, sultry flute) and aft (brass, gently plucked harp strings, stuns of electric guitar, brushes on snare), and its restatements and perpetual reinvention make it an absolute joy.

The other main theme theme, "Luna d'agosto" is first heard under the main titles, and is a lilting piece with harpsichordized electric keyboard playing the main melody over a backwash of gently strummed acoustic guitar. It is also reprised throughout the film in various redressings. One (designated as "M5"), which accompanies the discovery of Marie's corpse, and is a thumping, 4/4 rock variation played by Hammond organ, electric bass, and drum kit. Another is the sublime "Notte di luna," which punctuates the main theme's bass lines with exotic flourishes of harp and celeste, before phasing into a sweetly lazy restatement of the theme, first on solo trumpet over electric jazz guitar, then with the trumpet trading phrases with a flute. "Luna di Piero Agosto" is a lovely, though very brief reprise whistled over a repeated three-note pattern played on sparkling celeste.

"Danza primitiva" is the percussive piece that accompanies Fenech's dance at the beginning of the film, a frenzy of drum and vibraphone percussion that is overcome by a lush foliage of dulcimerized keyboard, quirky sitar, and eventually vocal melismi. "Interludio azzuro" is distinguished by a repeated seven-note riff, which moves from piano to a more rocking Hammond organ interpretation over rock percussion and fluttering guitar. "Interludio Giallo" has a delightfully introspective, eight-note pattern which recurs over an alternating time signature. The soundtrack album also contains a cue not heard in the English-language edition: "Bambola omicida," which accompanies the penultimate scene of Isabelle's visit to Fritz in prison in the Italian version. It opens with a blast of brass, a polyrhythmic drum part modelled on James Brown's 1966 hit "Cold Sweat," and dissonant steel drum percussion before introducing a brassy, up-tempo fanfare reprise of the "Luna d'agosto" theme, which then eases down to a slower pace with smears of Hammond organ coloration.

On first viewing, the music's eccentric ebullience can be distracting, working against the parade of murders onscreen almost to the point of trivializing or making fun of them, and its prominence in the sound mix is initially disturbing in ways that are hard to explain. After my own first viewing, I came away feeling that it was the worst score ever forced on Bava. I have no idea whether or not Umiliani's music was "forced" on Bava, but I have since come to love this score. It is, first and foremost, great jazz, but its range of instrumentation is also quite audacious, especially in this milieu, and it seems to reinforce the specific value of 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto as a confection, a bon bon of abominable acts. Musically, it may go against the film's grain, but in doing

PEGGY is found shot through the forehead.

10 Ibid.
11 Volta.
12 Abruzzese.

JILL, in a striking psychedelic caftan, drops her painting easel and oils as she discovers Jacques' body washed ashore, covered in sand crabs.

so, it lends a distinctive personality to the proceedings that would otherwise be lacking. In a sense, the music doesn't score the film, but rather our own enjoyment of it. Its prominence in the sound mix was a bizarre novelty at the time, but now seems almost visionary in its prediction of such music-driven gialli as Argento's Suspiria (1977) and Tenebrae/Unsane (1982).

When I heard of Piero Umiliani's death from a heart attack on February 23, 2001, my first thought was of this music; I hope he died aware of how many people love it. After being released in a limited Italian 12" vinyl edition in 1969 (now one of the most hotly sought-after Bava collectibles), the music became unavailable until the late 1990s, when an expanded CD release was licensed to Japan. A subsequent, remixed edition with additional bonus tracks was released the following year on the Cinevox label. At the time of Umiliani's death, his 5 bambole score was experiencing this rebirth of interest, just as the film itself was on the verge of its first American release, as a DVD. The availability of the film has only multiplied the number of admirers of this music, which seemed to come into its own with the dawning of the retro-lounge music craze.

None of the soundtrack releases from this film have ever included "Ti risveglierai con me," the song by the Italian progressive rock band Il Balletto di Bronzo which is heard over the end credits of 5 bambole. It appeared on their 1970 RCA album Sirio 2222, as did their song "Neve calda," which is also named in the end titles but which is not actually heard in the movie itself. Although he was not a member of the band at the time these songs were used, Il Balletto di Bronzo's subsequent leader Gianni Leone (who joined around the time of their second album, 1972's Ys) has claimed that the band's music was used in the film without their knowledge or permission.

Release

Released on St. Valentine's Day 1970, 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto was, predictably, not a success at the Italian boxoffice. Its Italian theatrical release was so limited that Roman poster shops were inundated with unused locandinas, which can be easily found to this day. From there, it proceeded to make a painfully slow circuit of the globe. Two years passed before the film was picked up for distribution in France, Turkey, and the United Kingdom. In France, it was marketed under a more aggressively sexy title that translates as "Five Girls on a Hot Summer Night." It was issued in Turkey as one of a series of Edwige Fenech films that were given uniform titles in celebration of what their Turkish distributor perceived to be her unique screen persona. Thus, 5 bambole was retitled Yilan Rhulu Kadinin Yntykami ("Revenge of the Woman With the Spirit of the Snake"), which followed the release of Sergio Martino's 1970 giallo, Lo strano vizio della signora Wardh/Next! as Yilan Ruhlu Kadin: Seks ve Cyanyet ("The Woman With the Spirit of a Snake: Sex and Murder").

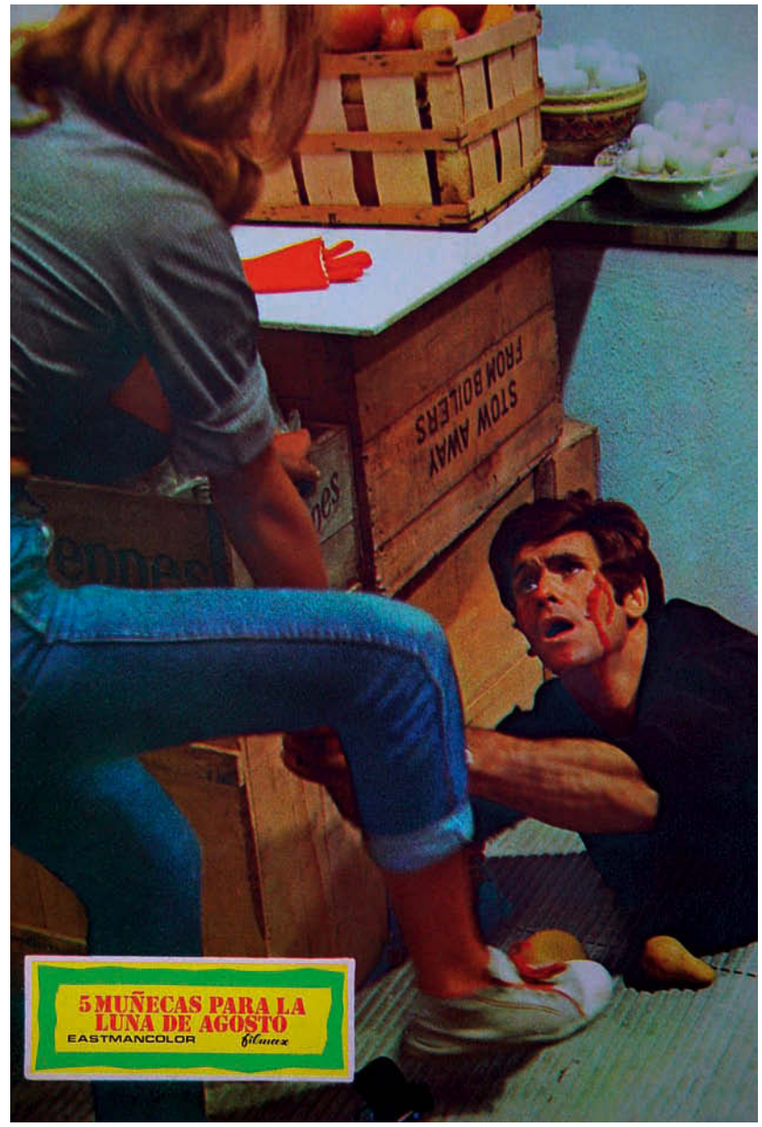
An English-dubbed print was released in Great Britain by E. J. Fancey as Five Dolls for an August Moon, with the numeral spelled out. Reviewing it for Monthly Film Bulletin was Tom Milne, who commented that "despite its alluring title and ingenious ending, this is a rather formulary variation on the Ten Little Niggers theme, and by no means Bava at his best . . . the film is almost totally devoid of suspense . . . nevertheless, as always in a Bava film, each image is superbly designed—George's sudden appearance in a golden, scarlet-plumed demon mask during the wild party at the beginning; the houseboy's corpse wrapped in polythene and hanging on a meat-hook alongside the carcasses of beef in the freezer; a glittery, silvery stole being slowly dragged through a room by a mysterious, coveted hand; above all, the skillful use of crimson stains as a motif in both sets and costumes—making Five Dolls a pleasure to watch even when the plot flags and the zooms proliferate."[13]

Despite the availability of an English print, 5 bambole became the first of Mario Bava's directorial outings to fail to secure distribution in the United States. Some sources report a US release under the title Island of Terror in 1970, but evidence in support of this—posters, stills, etc.—has not been forthcoming. There were no 35 mm prints of the film available to include the picture in the earliest major Bava retrospectives in San Francisco, Los Angeles, New York, and at the British Film Institute in London. This changed when Alfredo Leone acquired the rights to the picture in 2000 and had a beautiful 35 mm print struck as the film was being restored for its DVD release in early 2001. 5 Dolls for an August Moon had its US theatrical debut at the American Cinematheque's Mario Bava retrospective in Los Angeles, in June 2002.

Commentary

Despite its maker's low opinion of it, 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto is neither Mario Bava's worst film, nor as devoid of personal touches as he claimed. Regardless of the script he was given to work with, and his lack of involvement in the preproduction stages, the film is an invaluable chapter in Bava's filmography, as it alone shows what he was capable of achieving without his usual meticulous preparations, without the full support of his usual crew, and when left alone in an editing room.

When Bava's mentor Riccardo Freda saw the film in his role as chairman of the Italian censor board, he was aghast at what he perceived as Bava's flagrant contempt for the material, and his participation in it. "He made 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto and justified his participation by saying that he did it only for the money," Freda observed. "Obviously, we make films to make money, but if we accept this responsibility, we should always strive for the best possible result, even though we work in adverse conditions." [14] Bava himself candidly told the press that 5 bambole left his daughter Elena concerned for his sanity. "My daughter saw it when she was in Padua, and she asked me if I was insane when I made it," he said cheerfully. [15]



But if any of us were to be granted a glimpse of the future, we might well interpret it as a glimpse into madness. With each passing year, 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto seems to stand out more and more as Bava's most contemporary work in both look and feel; it is not inconceivable that, twenty or even fifty years from now, it may be commonly regarded as his most enduring film. In a sense, our world is already catching up with it. George A. Romero's Bruiser (2000), while outwardly a horror film, is really an indictment of the dog-eat-dog business practices that are becoming increasingly common in American business and personal interaction; it dramatizes the necessity of an innocent to "get his hands dirty" in order to get ahead, or at least to earn a face worth presenting to the rest of the world. 5 bambole . . . actually makes many of the same points, and with more restraint, but it originates from a more restrained period. While Romero's film doesn't offer any specific solutions to the problem it poses, other than to roar louder than the person roaring at you, one gets the sense from 5 bambole . . . that art may be the last refuge of our civility.

With nothing to lose, Bava filmed 5 bambole . . . with a greater than usual degree of creative abandon—sometimes reckless, sometimes familiar (when Jacques is found dead on the beach, his camera suspiciously eyes each of the survivors in a manner that recalls Sei donne per l'assassino), and always audacious. Working again with Antonio Rinaldi, who arguably produced his finest work ever in this film, he plays with wide-angle lenses, gels, reflections, distortions, and movement with childlike exuberance. Admittedly, in places, it is an angry, sloppy film, seething with apparent indignation or self-loathing, which is apparent from the way its potential for suspense—the raison d'etre of any thriller, after all—is repeatedly sabotaged by the director. Every corpse is presented as a fait accompli without the traditional foreplay of suspense. When Marie's dead body shows up impaled on the tree—signed, sealed, and delivered, at the end of an outrageous whip pan—and even moreso when Nick is added to the deep freeze while all three survivors are knocked out by drugged drinks, we can feel Bava's impatience with the scenario's mechanical acceleration of the obvious. [16] As Trudy aptly remarks, "Everyone seems to be waiting for something that's not happening." And yet, at the same time, the film manages to portray death in the way it is most commonly felt: as a sudden and inexplicable subtraction from the cast of characters surrounding our own ongoing lives. We watch this movie knowing that a series of deaths is inevitable, we expect to be shocked by them, and Bava keeps both promises while cheating us of the pleasure we expect to take in their commission. Pleasure he reserves for the film's depictions of beauty, color, art, the natural majesty of the seaside.

Although 5 bambole . . . was lensed at a time when Bava could take full advantage of the screen's new freedoms, he chose instead to subvert that expectation, as well. The film's point of view is sometimes deliberately titillating, even prurient—witness the early thrusts of the zoom lens in and out of Fenech's bountiful bosom—but the nudity actually captured on film is so meager as to seem accidental.

As Tom Milne reported, when one looks back on the film, the mind fairly reels with a veritable parade of stunning images—not expensive images, but images concocted with color, taste, and imagination. The character of Jill Stark is a good case in point, as it is likely—given the nature of her dialogue and limited activities—that she was present in the script only to supply George and Trudy with a companion.

AFTER witnessing the final showdown between Jack and Trudy, Isabelle tries to pry the million dollar check from Jack's dead hand-only to find it still warm.

13 Tom Milne, "Cinque bambole per la luna d'agosto (Five Dolls for an August Moon)" review, Monthly Film Bulletin, 39:463, August 1972, 156-57.

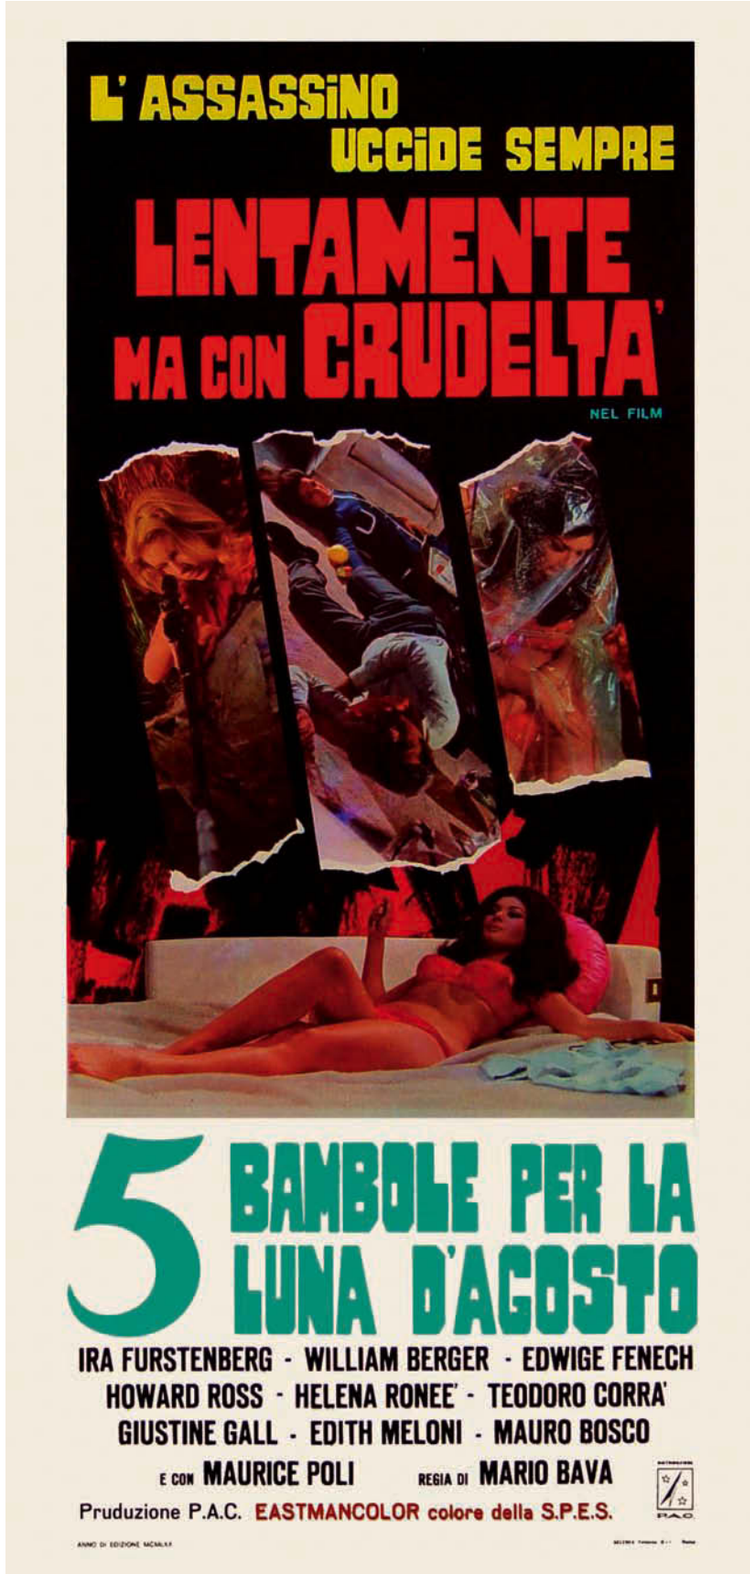
14 Cozzi.

15 Ibid.

16 In Umberto Lenzi's Sandokan, la tigre di Mompracem/Sandokan the Great (1963), a hostage is tied to a tree by Sandokan's (Steve Reeves') men, only to be found the next morning with a dagger protruding from his chest. The framing of this scene is identical to Bava's handling of Fenech's death in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto. In both cases, Maurice Poli is among the actors discovering the corpse!

Bava decided to depict her as a troubled artist, sometimes using her Munchean paintings to venture backgrounded remarks on the foreground action. When she discovers the dead body of Jacques on the beach, she is wearing a caftan of swirling, psychedelic colors, which complements the shot of her fallen tubes of oil paint, squeezed out and merging with the sand and sea. After Marie is added to the deep freeze, the scene cuts to Jill pleading with George to help her get off the island—as a self-portrait of a wild-eyed woman, not unlike Barbara Steele, glowers derangedly from her easel.

The scene of Jill's suicide is perhaps the film's most inspired feat of design and storyboarding. Faced with the prospect of shooting a banal fistfight between George and Nick, Bava made the decision to view the fracas through a grating, thus splitting up our view of the action into dozens of tiny squares. During the fight, a tabletop objet d'art is knocked over, sending countless glass balls of all sizes spilling across a series of different colored floors, so that a screen full of squares literally explodes into a screen full of circles. The camera follows the balls as they roll and bounce down a spiral staircase flecked black, white and gray, roll across a red floor and then plop by the dozens among the soap bubbles in a sunken bath, where Jill is found with both wrists slashed—her blood cutting scarlet swathes across the blue screen. The grating outside the bedroom was a real part of the modernist house in which they were shooting, as was the spiral staircase, which Bava posits in the background as George, Nick, and Jack bully Fritz on the subject of money; in this shot, the staircase with its central pole forms such a literal dollar sign that I didn't grasp the visual pun until my umpteenth viewing.



If there was any negative result of having to work quickly, it is that Bava occasionally falls back on obsessive images we have seen before, and others we will see again: the child on the swing as the zoom thrusts in and out

MARIE joins Jacques and Peggy in the meat locker—an echo of the polyethylene shrouds in TERRORE NELLO SPAZIO.

(Operazione paura, Schock), the bouncing ball that signals danger (Operazione paura, Baron Blood), the murders followed by close-ups of the survivors' paranoid/suspicious faces (Sei donne per l'assassino), the greedy couple dying from mutually inflicted wounds (Sei donne per l'assassino), the dead bodies encased in plastic shrouds (Terrore nello spazio), a shot of a curl of hair on a pillow moving sideways to frame the eyes of a sleepless woman (La frusta e il corpo), the beautifully dressed "widow" visiting her imprisoned lover (Diabolik), and so on.

The opening party sequence, the most common target of adverse criticism, admittedly seems almost hellbent in its determination to alienate any viewer with half an aesthetic sense. It bombards us with what might be termed verbose technique, with its funhouse camera angles, relentless Go Go music, and leering zoom-lens lunges in and out of Fenech's cleavage as she dances on her back, undulating her arms and fluttering her fingers in ways that recall Gaia Germani's oracle Medea in Ercole al centro della terra. It may well be a diversionary tactic for the master illusionist, a big, bearish booboo up front to make everything that follows look better, or it may be Bava's way of telling the audience that he's flying by the seat of his pants here, so we might as well admit the possibility of bad taste and learn to enjoy it. Yet the sequence becomes curiously pleasurable over successive viewings and accomplishes some remarkable things in spite of itself. It manages to introduce all of the characters as well as we ever really get to know them, without anyone uttering a single word of dialogue for a full 5 minutes—an experiment in "pure cinema" that Bava would extend to twice that length at the outset of his next picture, Ecologia del delitto.

By withholding dialogue from the film for so long, Bava establishes from the very first frame that the real lifeblood of this picture is its musical score. Indeed, it is in the revolutionary way that Bava presents—no, emphasizes—Piero Umiliani's score that 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto would exert its greatest influence on the future course of the giallo.

ITALIAN locandina sells the picture with the catch-phrase "The Murderer Kills Again—with Confidence and Cruelty."

Throughout the picture, the defining line which separates score (i.e., composed accompaniment to action) from source music (i.e., incidental music actually contained within scenes) is frequently and playfully erased. The movie opens with Umiliani's music played at a moderate, traditional soundtrack volume as Isabelle approaches the beach house; as she spies on the wild party taking place inside, the camera cuts inside and, as our vantage cuts from outside to inside, the same music (which we have understood till now as "score") becomes the music being played at the party, suddenly played at fuller, you-are-there volume. In other scenes, music perceived as soundtrack cuts off abruptly as a needle is raised from a phonograph, or as the volume control of a portable radio is suddenly dialed down.

Dario Argento would play similar games with soundtrack in Tenebrae and he is often credited as the first director to wed a thundering rock soundtrack to horror cinema, with 1975's Profondo rosso. While this distinction is true to a degree, that degree has a lot to do with whether or not one perceives Umiliani's score as "rock." Certainly, when individual cues played with a drum kit kick in, it is, but most importantly, it is when Umiliani's music is given a strong rock backbeat and cranked up to concert volume (as it is with the discovery of Marie's body, and when Jack stalks Trudy just before the film's climax), or in its closing use of the Balleto di Bronzo track, that 5 bambole really treads into new and brilliant waters. The music grants Bava the space in which to milk images and compositions to a degree that would have been unseemly if wedded to a track of live sound, in a manner not unlike what Ennio Morricone's operatic scores allowed Sergio Leone to do, what they allowed him to become. When conveyed in a rock context, the images become less about story and more about groove. The images cease to convey a sense of real people in a dangerous situation; instead, they purely become fodder for our enjoyment, functioning with the music on the same plane as the colorful and somewhat mad artwork framed on the walls of the beach house—a plane of sheer sensuality.

ITALIAN fotobusta collage featuring Brett Halsey, Charles Southwood, and Marilù Tolo.

Roy Colt & Winchester Jack

PRODUZIONE ATLAS Cinematografica's Mario Bregni rewarded Mario Bava for his last-minute rescue of 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto by offering him another Mario De Nardo script. Bava hadn't thought very highly of De Nardo's script for 5 bambole and the screenwriter's latest effort—a Western—was not much better: a saddle-sore saga of two partners-in-crime who find their bonhomie tested by a treasure map and a beautiful woman. Granted a free hand by Bregni, Bava accepted the job and proceeded to direct his final Western—perhaps the most peculiar entry in his filmography.

The resulting picture, Roy Colt & Winchester Jack (the ampersand is correct; only in pronunciation does the Italian version become "Roy Colt e Winchester Jack"), is sometimes incorrectly described as the first comic Italian Western. As any true aficionado of Italian Westerns knows, the genre was tongue-in-cheek, more or less, from the very beginning. Bava's own early Westerns La strada per Fort Alamo (1964) and Ringo del Nebraska (1966) both featured ludicrous, mocking scenes of an heroic gunslinger entering a saloon and sidling up to the bar to order a glass of milk. A certain poker-faced humor was likewise always part and parcel of Sergio Leone's Westerns, as when Clint Eastwood's Man with No Name (in Per un pugno di dollari/A Fistful of Dollars, 1964) pauses while en route to a showdown to place an order with the village coffin-maker for three coffins . . . and then, after dispatching all of his opponents, pauses again on the way back to call out, "My mistake—four coffins!"

Leone's Westerns became so popular that they spawned parodies, as well as imitations. In 1967, Franco and Ciccio responded to Leone's Il buono, il brutto, il cattivo/The Good, the Bad and the Ugly (1966) with two comedies: Lucio Fulci's Il lungo, il corto, il gatto, and Il bello, il brutto, il cretino ("The Beautiful, the Brutish and the Stupid"), directed by Giovanni Grimaldi. That same year, they also replied to the "Ringo" films with Marino Girolami's Due Ringos del Texas ("Two Ringos from Texas") and Giorgio Simonelli's Due figli di Ringo ("Two Sons of Ringo"). Franco and Ciccio continued to lampoon the more popular Italian Westerns for years, responding in particular to Giuseppe Colizzi's Dio perdona . . . io no!/God Forgives . . . I Don't (1967) with Marcello Ciorciolini's Ciccio perdona . . . io no! (1968),

During this period, and earlier, humor also began to infect the more straightforward Italian Westerns. Sergio Leone's Westerns perspired a bit more, but they were always made with great integrity and fidelity to the feel of American Westerns; but as his successful work began to be imitated by other Italian directors, those men brought their own feelings to the genre and, in time, Italian Westerns became increasingly baroque. The harbinger of this trend was Sergio Corbucci, whose Django (1966) featured a mysterious gunman (Franco Nero) toting an unexpected weapon (a machine-gun) in an unexpected holster (a coffin he drags around with him). After Leone trumped his imitators, and himself, with the magisterial C'era una volta il West/Once Upon a Time in the West (1968), Italian Westerns seemed to embark on an implicit contest to see who could come up with the most flagrantly bizarre characters and situations. The exploration of the physical prowess of gunslingers led to demonstrations of kung fu, and exploitative scenes of rape and gore were added for spice. Gothic themes began to proliferate to such an extent that certain entries, such as Giulio Questi's Se sei vivo spara/Django, Kill! (1967) and Antonio Margheriti's . . . E Dio

ROY COLT (Brett Halsey) dissolves his partnership with fellow outlaw Winchester Jack (Charles Southwood) to search for an honest job in a more honest world.

Roy Colt & Winchester Jack

Filmed at De Paolis Studios, Cinecittà and on location near Rome
November 1969
First released: August 13, 1970
Eastmancolor, 1.85:1, 89 minutes [1]

Production: PAC (Produzioni Atlas Consorziate, Milan), Tigielle 33 (Rome). Producer: Mario Bregni. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant director: Lamberto Bava. Story and screenplay: Mario De Nardo. Continuity: Marisa Agostini. Director of photography: Antonio Rinaldi. Camera assistant: Emilio Varriano. Assistant camera operator: Lorenzo Battaglia. Art direction: Giulia Mafai. Assistant art director: Oscar Capponi. Makeup: Sandro Melaranci. Hairdresser: Sergio Gennari. Firearms: Bruno Ukmar. Production supervisor: Luigi Alessi. Production managers: Arrigo Peri, Alfonso Cucci. Production secretary: Franco Tupini. Editor: Olga Pedrini. Assistant editor: Liliana Serra. Music: Piero Umiliani. Song: "Roy Colt" by Umiliani and Gizzarelli, published by Bixio Sam, performed by I Free Love (Vedette Records). Sound: Leopoldo Rosi. Sound engineer: Guido Felicioni. Sound recordist: Carlo Spagnardi. Post-sync: C.D.C. Stills: Armando Pietrangeli. Distributor: PAC.

Brett Halsey (Roy Colt), Charles Southwood (Winchester Jack), Marilù Tolo (Mahila), Teodoro Corrà (Reverend), Isa Miranda (Mammolla), Lee Burton [Guido Lollobrigida] (Sandro/Sandy, Jack's 1st henchman), Bruno Corazzari (Reverend's 1st henchman), Mauro Bosco (Bellatreccia/Bernstein, Jack's 2nd henchman), Rick Boyd [Federico Boido] (Boida/Blondie, Reverend's 2nd henchman), Piero Morgia (Jack's 3rd henchman), Franco Pesce (old man in scarf), Giorgio Gargiullo (Sam Lewis), Maurizio Laureri, Vincenzo Crocitti (deaf man), Leo De Nobili. Uncredited: Osiride Pevarello, Pietro Torrisi.

France: Roy Colt et Winchester Jack, TV only
Germany: 3 Halunken und ein Halleluja, "Three Rascals and a Hallelujah," AB-Film, 10/13/72, 83m
Spain: Roy Colt y Winchester Jack, Cinedia S.A., 82m US: Roy Colt & Winchester Jack, Libert Films International, 4/75 (unconfirmed)

disse a Caino/. . . And God Said to Cain (1970), had sequences indistinguishable from horror cinema. By 1970, Corbucci's idea of a villain had transformed into a pot-smoking, philosophizing Scot mercenary played by Jack Palance in Compañeros, while Gianfranco Parolini's Indio Black/Adios Sabata (1971) featured Yul Brynner as a hero who felled his opponents with heavy ball bearings flung, shotput-like, from a pocket built into the toe of his boot!

Another good case in point is C'è Sartana . . . vendi la pistola e comprati la bara/A Fistful of Lead (1970), directed by Giuliano Carmineo as "Antony Ascot." Though the film is serious in execution, it features a hero (George Hilton as "Sartana") who is always dressed for a funeral, who carries a bag stuffed with freshly baked loaves of bread (which sometimes disguise a well-aimed gun—a custom job that fires four small projectiles at once), and treats all women with respect. In this film, Sartana's chief adversary is an equally fast triggerman who dresses in white, passes the time by reading Shakespeare's sonnets and Alfred Lord Tennyson's The Lady of Shalott, and never goes anywhere without a frilly white parasol—the kind of fashion accessory which not even a 19th century woman would dare carry around other than on Easter Sunday. Played by Charles Southwood, this marvelous character—named Sabbath (or Sabata, in Italian)[2]—is not depicted as gay so much as an ultra-refined English dandy, which would have meant the same thing to the hard-drinking men of the Old West. As much as any mean, leering, itchy-fingered bully in black, when Sabbath rides into town, he seems to be begging for a fight—and he is more than up to the challenge. Carmineo's film is also of interest to Bava watchers for reteaming Erika Blanc and Piero Lulli for the first time since Operazione paura in 1966, and Federico Boido also has a good scene as one of two psychotic brothers who start leaning on the local bartender.

After agreeing to direct Roy Colt & Winchester Jack, Bava soon realized that, at this point in the evolution (or de-evolution, some would say) of the Italian Western, it would be absurd to film such a meager script seriously. Even before the cameras started rolling, he made the decision to approach the project as a broad spoof.

Synopsis

Roy Colt and Winchester Jack—a pair of self-admitted "losers" heading a gang of would-be outlaws—fight tooth and nail as their bored companions look on. Knocked to the ground, Roy admits defeat and quits the gang, leaving Jack in charge and vowing to find "an honest job."

Meanwhile, in Carton City, a gunman with Tourette's Syndrome (who makes involuntary bird noises) enters a saloon and demands his share of a fortune in gold from Sam Lewis, a man on crutches. When Sam has the crutches shot out from under him, inch by inch, Roy interferes. He shoots the gunman, who dies with a final, convulsive squawk. Sam treats his savior to a drink and asks his name. Roy mentions that he's in search of an honest job, and Sam tells him his search is over.

At his encampment, Jack reads a sentimental letter from Roy ("I miss our fistfights so much . . ."), but the epistolary mood is shattered when two men and a woman ride in. The woman, a Native American named Mahila, is being escorted to a sheriff for killing her husband. Jack is attracted to her and relieves the escorts of their responsibility; they start shooting, and he quickly bests them. As the other men dig graves, Jack and Mahila go off into the woods to make love—but she suggests a more comfortable place. Mahila takes him to a warm cottage, loaned to her by an old woman from her tribe. As her nose gets closer to Jack's bare skin, Mahila unholsters his pistol and orders him to take a bath. Even after he cleans up, Jack's luck doesn't improve: Mahila demands either a vow of marriage, or ten dollars for each sexual favor performed. She then demands an additional two dollars to remove her dress, another two dollars to take off her bra, and refuses to shed her panties unless she is paid "a few dollars more." Fed up, Jack takes her by force, but finds her quite willing. Afterwards, Mahila uses a knife to smooth the notches from her cuenta, a banana-shaped piece of bone which she uses to tally a man's debt to her for sexual favors. Meanwhile, outside, the Jewish member of Jack's gang, Belletreccia, is unhappy about having ROY en route to Carton City.

1 The Image Entertainment DVD of this title is derived from a PAL source running at 25 frames per second, which abbreviates the running time to approximately 86 minutes.

2 Evidently not the same character played by Lee Van Cleef in Gianfranco Parolini's Ehi amico . . . c'è Sabata, hai chiuso! (1969).

to stand in the cold while Jack is warm inside a cottage, making love. He grumbles that things will be different when he's in charge.

The next day, Jack's gang gets into a shootout while trying to rob a coach transporting a payload to a bank. Amid the gunfire, Jack realizes that only one man has the ability to shoot as well as their opponent. Sure enough, it's Roy—and the former partners have a pally reunion. Roy demurs from Jack's suggestion that they split the payload, saying it's more important that he complete the mission to get a good look inside the bank. He tells Jack to ride ahead into town.

Reaching Carton City at the same time as Jack's gang is the outlaw gang led by the Reverend, a Russian socialist outlaw whose weapon of choice is dynamite. Jack finds the gang terrorizing Sam Lewis, who is holding them off with a shotgun aimed from the window of his hotel room. Meanwhile, the Reverend himself sits in the saloon, drinking bad whiskey, and shivering with the cold that has been deep in his bones ever since he fled Russia via the freezing Don River. Jack joins the effort against Sam, during which the entire facade of the hotel is ripped away from his room. Jack tells Sam that the Reverend has placed bombs around the hotel and the bank, and they will be detonated in ten minutes—unless he hands over the map leading to the gold. Sam admits defeat. The Reverend and Jack squabble over who should hold the map, eventually tearing it in two pieces to share. As the thieves ride away, Sam curses the cowardly townsfolk of Carton City who did not raise a finger to help him, and the sheriff and mayor who fled town at the sight of the Reverend. Where is a single man of courage? Just as he poses that question, Roy Colt rides into town with the bank money. Sam proposes that he be made sheriff.

At the saloon, Roy addresses an assembly of local men, explaining that he needs fifty volunteers to join his search for Winchester Jack. He cautions them that they may not return home from this dangerous mission, as Jack is an expert gunman who can shoot a man dead from 200 yards away. The bar nearly empties behind Roy's turned back. The only person who remains isn't brave—he's stone deaf!

MAHILA (Marilù Tolo) sells kisses for a dollar and disrobes for a few dollars more, squeezing every last penny out of Winchester Jack.

Sam recreates the stolen map for Roy. It says that the gold is buried at an old Indian cemetery in the desert near Vulture Canyon. "Do you swear to protect that gold as if it were your own?" asks Sam. "As if it were my very own," Roy promises.

Meanwhile, the Reverend shivers in bed with cold—Sam Lewis managed to shoot him in the buttock as he rode away with the map. Thinking he's dying, he asks Jack to write a letter of farewell to his wife, Conchita. He asks Jack to include something about how beautiful she looks naked, and he complies, praising the Reverend for having found an educated wife who can read. He laughs that his wife is as simple as he, but that she is residing in a convent where a nice nun will read the letter to her.[3] Outside, a fight breaks out between Jack's and the Reverend's men, which the latter stops with a stick of TNT. The two men with the two halves of the map agree to split up and meet at a designated point, Jack's gang leaving first and the Reverend's men following shortly after. While resting in a cave, the Reverend and his gang are approached by a surprise visitor—Roy Colt, who claims the Reverend's map is false. He proposes that they work together and get rid of Jack. "But he's your friend!" the Reverend exclaims. "Reverend, this is business," Roy reasons. He shows the Reverend his badge; he's now the sheriff of Carton City.

Riding toward the gold, Mahila is angry with Jack because he loves only money, not her. Accordingly, she swears her going price will now be doubled; it shouldn't matter to a man who's going to be rich. Belletreccia watches in annoyance as they make love in a sleeping bag, writhing like a snake in the mountains. When Mahila calculates Jack's overnight debt at $40, he throws her cuenta away. It lands in a puddle that reflects Roy's face—and he and Jack have another pleasant reunion. As Mahila snuggles deeper into the sleeping bag, Roy proposes that he and Jack ride ahead into the narrow mountain passage on the map, and ambush the Reverend's gang. Later, Roy makes a pass at Mahila. "I bet you don't want to pay," she says. "I've been paying all my life, but never for that," he replies. So Mahila loses interest.

Belletreccia turns Jack against Roy, predicting that when they reach their destination, he will take both the gold and the woman. While riding on, Roy tells Mahila he can't pay her because he respects her too much. "Then you'll marry me?" But before that question can be answered, the Reverend and his two remaining men ambush Roy and Jack's gang. After discouraging the attack, Jack confronts Roy and Mahila. Roy draws his pistol on Jack—but only to shoot a rattlesnake behind him.

BRETT HALSEY is visited on the set by wife Heidi Brühl (then expecting daughter Nicole) and son Clayton.

The map cuts a path through Wimpy City, the home of one of Roy and Jack's favorite spots, Mammola's bordello. They are greeted as old friends by Mammola, who recommends two Irish girls new and popular at her establishment. They pay their money and are put at the end of a long line. When the current client keeps paying for more and more time, Roy and Jack muscle their way into a room and discover their whores in bed with . . . the Reverend! A knockdown, drag-out fight ensues, and after ejecting the Reverend and his men, they jump into bed with the girls.

Mahila storms into the bordello, finding Roy and Jack in compromising positions, and shames them for spending their money on whores instead of her. The room explodes from a small charge of dynamite left behind by their adversary.

That night, at camp, Mahila wakes and moves away from Jack to Roy. Belletreccio sees this, and listens. "Is it true that you love me?" she asks Roy. "More than my horse," he says earnestly. Bernstein draws his gun on them, but Jack shoots him before he can pull the trigger. Jack realizes Mahila's duplicity, and the three of them exchange stares . . . until dynamite explodes. The Reverend's gang attack until Roy and Jack get the upper hand, then ride on.

Jack can't deal with two enemies at once, so he orders Roy to surrender his gun and ride on. He tells Mahila to go with him, and Roy says she never will; Jack has the gun, so he's the strongest. Jack immediately dismounts and offers Jack his rifle. They fight. The other members of the gang accidentally shoot each other dead, and Roy eventually comes out on top. He asks Mahila who she's going with. "With the strongest, of course." The Reverend's gang hears the bullets and follow the sound. They find the dead men, Jack lying among them. He plays dead until they ride away. Then he whistles for his horse, which runs to him like a dog.

The Reverend's gang find Roy and Mahila drinking water and apprehend them. The Reverend demands the map, but Roy claims he has eaten and already defecated it. Mahila then betrays him, telling the Reverend that he can find the gold without a map. They are tied up and walked through desert. Jack, following at a distance, finds and adopts Roy's black hat. Mahila sweet-talks the Reverend. When he notices her cuenta, she explains it is a record of her prayers. "You are very devout, always praying," he marvels, while eyeing the notches.

Roy leads the Reverend to the Indian cemetery and explains how the burial site of the gold can be located by looking through the hollow eye socket of an ornamental skull on one of the graves. The Reverend's men dig at the designated spot, find the gold, and load a wagon with it . . . then the Reverend tricks them back into the hole and blows them up! He also vows to blow up Roy, but Jack shoots a hole in the last bag of gold, and the Reverend forgets the lighted wick of his explosive as he scrambles to collect the dust. He blows up. "In Hell, you will have all the heat you want," Jack says.

Winchester Jack tells Roy that they will split the gold 50-50, but he insists on keeping Roy's hat, which he found—and so they fight again, over the hat. While the two men are distracted, Mahila takes the reins of the wagonload of gold and shoots the hat off of Roy's head, down the road. She throws them her cuenta, "for company on those lonely nights," and rides away to a life of wealth and independence, as the two men resume their fight.

Cast

Roy Colt & Winchester Jack finds Bava working once again with a number of familiar faces from his recent work. In the lead role of Roy Colt—a rascally Man in Black who facetiously pines for a more honest world—Bava cast Brett Halsey, whose enthusiasm for comic roles had been established by their earlier collaboration Four Times That Night, filmed exactly one year before.

"As one of [Bava's] biggest fans, I was delighted to get to work with him a second time," Halsey enthuses. "Roy Colt became a comedy because the script wasn't very good; it kind of lent itself to having fun with it. I've always enjoyed comedy so much, and had so few opportunities to play it, that when Bava suggested comedy, I went for it immediately. He had the idea in mind pretty much from the time I came aboard."

3 This bit was surely an inside joke from Mario to his sister, Elena.

Bava welcomed Halsey's participation, but the actor was likely chosen by the film's producers, as he was under contract at the time to Produzione Atlas Cinematografica. Roy Colt & Winchester Jack would be the last of three films Halsey made for PAC, but it was the first in which he appeared under his own, well-established name. His previous two PAC films—Tonino Cervi's Oggi a me . . . domani a te!/Today We Kill, Tomorrow We Die and Alberto Cardone's L'ira di Dio/The Wrath of God (both 1968) billed Halsey (who had nearly fifty films, including some big Hollywood pictures, to his credit at that time) under the pseudonym "Montgomery Ford."

Halsey accepts full blame for this. "I wasn't sure I wanted to do the first picture [Oggi a me . . .]," he confesses, "so I just said, 'Let's put another name on it.' I figured it would be some piece of shit that no one would ever notice, but the money was good—put it that way. The picture turned out to be a big success; in fact, it was the second biggest grossing Italian film of that year! Because of the contract I had signed with PAC, they put the [Montgomery Ford] name on another picture too, and I started getting calls from Hollywood: 'What's this, you changed your name?' So when the time came to do Roy Colt, they expected me to use the other name, and I told them, 'No, no—not again! Montgomery Ford is dead!"

Halsey was accompanied on-set by his then-wife, German actress Heidi Brühl (pregnant at the time with their daughter, Nicole), and their young son, Clayton. Just as he had supplied his own wardrobe for Four Times That Night, Halsey arrived on location with several of his own Western accoutrements: "The opening sequence opened on my personal Colt .45 pistol and my fast-draw holster, which I had brought from the States. The black hat, boots, and spurs were also mine, and were used in some of my other Westerns. Although it was strictly forbidden by Italian law, I would often practice my fast draw, against a tree or some other inanimate object, with live ammunition. The pistol, holster, hat, boots, and spurs, are now in my son Clayton's memorabilia collection."

Halsey followed Roy Colt & Winchester Jack by relocating with his growing family to America, where he published a novel based on his observations of the Italian film scene (The Magnificent Strangers, 1973), guest-starred in popular television series like Columbo and made-for-TV movies, and played a number of continuing roles on network soap operas, including Love Is a Many Splendored Thing (1972–73), Search for Tomorrow (1975), The Young and the Restless (1980–82), and Rituals (1984). He then returned to feature film work abroad, starring in several films for Lucio Fulci—including Il miele del diavolo/Dangerous Obsession (1986), Quando Alice ruppe lo specchio/Touch of Death (1988), Demonia (1990) and Un gatto nel cervello/A Cat in the Brain (1990, a film which "samples" his work in earlier Fulci assignments). After making Antonio Margheriti's The Commander (1988) and Esmeralda Bay (1989) with Jess Franco, Halsey returned once again to America, appearing in Francis Coppola's The Godfather Part III (1990). Today, he divides his time between homes in Toronto and Los Angeles.

Halsey's co-star, Charles Southwood, was born in Los Angeles on August 30, 1937. He moved with his family to the state of Oregon in 1945 and stayed there through most of his education, attending Oregon State University, where he majored in philosophy. He completed his philosophy studies at the Sorbonne in Paris, before moving in 1964 to Lyons, France, where he toiled briefly as a dock worker. From 1964–1966, he made his living as an automobile insurance executive; it was also in 1966 that he took his first film-related side job: working as a lighting stand-in for actor Lex Barker on the set of Vittorio De Sica's Woman Times Seven. His first film as an actor in his own right was The Battle of Hastings (1966), in which he played the supporting role of King Harald's brother. In all, Southwood is credited with approximately a dozen films, including Demofilo Fidani's Straniero . . . fatti il segno della croce! (1967) and Mario Amendola's Dai nemici mi guardo io!/I Protect Myself Against My Enemies (1968), both Westerns, and in both of which he was top-lined—apparently due to the inverted iconography of his surname. Lanky, lantern-jawed, yet easygoing, with a look reminiscent of a young James Coburn or Sterling Hayden, Southwood was a natural actor as well as a convincing horseman, and continued to work in the Italian Westerns began to die out, circa 1972. In 1980, he founded the Death Tobacco Company, an anti-smoking organization, and he works today in the Los Angeles area as an independent research physicist. In Roy Colt, Southwood gives a fine performance, sly and virile, demonstrating considerable range over his previous role as the parasol-toting, poetry-reading Sabata.

"That [Roy Colt & Winchester Jack] was the best thing I did over there," Southwood enthused to interviewer Robert Monell. "It was improvised on a day-by-day basis. Mario Bava was the most creative director I worked with. He said the original script was shit and threw it out of the trailer door into a mud puddle—literally! We had a blast working on that film. We made the film up day by day in the trailer. His son, Lamberto, was there; everyone contributed ideas. It was hilarity every morning. We'd make up scenes in the trailer!"

FOUR examples from the Italian fotobusta set.

Brett Halsey was intrigued by his co-star: "We talked a lot during the shooting of the film, but didn't socialize much outside. Southwood was his real name. Everybody thought he picked 'Southwood' because of Eastwood, but he said, 'No, it's my real name.' As I recall, he was American and I think he was in Rome with his wife and family or something. But after that picture, I never heard from, or about, him again. Charles and I performed almost all of our fight scenes ourselves. It may have been foolish of us to do them, and for Bava to allow us to [do them], but we convinced ourselves that we could do them better than the stunt men, so we did. Fortunately, we survived with only minor scrapes and bruises. [My performance] was something I worked out with Southwood and how we played off each other. It was basically my approach to make Roy comic by stressing his tongue-in-cheek 'sincerity.' Southwood was a little more broad, and Marilù [Tolo] was a schemer. Bava had a marvelous sense of comedy, and we all enjoyed playing out the satirical qualities in the script."

Marilù Tolo, the female lead, was born Maria Lucia Tolo in Rome on January 16, 1943. A prolific young actress, she had already appeared in close to forty films at the time of Roy Colt, making her first film in 1959. A sultry, serious-looking brunette, she adapted well to the thrones of various latter-day pepla, including Vittorio Sala's La regina della amazzoni/Colossus and the Amazon Queen (1960), Umberto Lenzi's L'ultimo gladiatore/Messalina vs. the Son of Hercules (1964), and Alberto De Martino's Il trionfo di Ercole/The Triumph of Hercules (1964). She made herself available to international co-productions as well, travelling to France and West Germany. After an unbilled appearance as a TV personality (with Sei donne per l'assassino's Mary Arden) in Fellini's Giulietta degli spiriti/Juliet of the Spirits (1965) and a high profile role in Terence Young's The Poppy Is Also a Flower (1966), Tolo signed a contract with Dino De Laurentiis that resulted in two pictures, Henry Levin's spy film Kiss the Girls and Make Them Die (1966) and the omnibus film Le streghe/The Witches (1967). Tolo had been Bava's first choice to play the role of Eva Kant in Diabolik, but something had happened to sour De Laurentiis on her during Le streghe and he refused to cast her. The loss of her De Laurentiis contract did not slow the actress down; Tolo continued to work unabated, appearing in glamorous and sexy roles in such international fare as The Oldest Profession (1967), Candy (1968), Bluebeard (1972), and The Greek Tycoon (1978). Her screen persona made her the butt of a joke in Fellini's Toby Dammit, which contains a brief glimpse of a busty, but otherwise shallow, actress named "Marilà Lolo." Though she certainly courted a reputation as a cinematic sex kitten, when Tolo was called upon to remove her top for a love scene with Charles Southwood, she insisted on having her nipples covered with white tape, as is plainly visible when they embrace. At the time of filming, Tolo is said to have been dating a number of suitors at the time, including a Spanish prince and the young writer–director who had recently become Bava's heir apparent: Dario Argento. Retired from the screen since 1984, Tolo is somewhat miscast as Mahila—one is tempted to think that Bava turned this film into a comedy after seeing her in Native American makeup—but she overcomes her inauthenticity with a sly, survivalist performance in what is ultimately a cleverly written, feminist role.

GERMAN A1 poster.

TEODORA CORRÀ as the dynamite-tossing revolutionary bad guy known as "The Reverend."

Roy Colt & Winchester Jack was not Tolo's first role opposite Brett Halsey; the two of them had previously co-starred in Tulio Demichelli's Da 077: intrigo a Lisbona/Intrigue in Lisbon (1968) and Julio Buchs' Spanish/Italian co-production I caldi amori di una minorenne/Perversion Story (1969).

"It just so happened that [our pairing in] Intrigue in Lisbon 'worked,'" Halsey explains. "Marilù was a very ambitious girl. I don't think she thought of herself so much as an actress, but rather as a celebrity. I don't mean that in a negative way, but she was more of a performer than an actress. She was very interested in publicity. There was one incident where she tried to talk me into staging something for the paparazzi, so they would see me coming out of her apartment in the morning. And I said, 'Marilù, you're crazy! What would my wife say?' She said, 'Oh, she'll understand!' I said, 'You're crazier than hell—she would not understand!' She later went to Hollywood and married a Frenchman. They got a house and Marilù went on the talk show circuit, doing The Tonight Show With Johnny Carson and The Merv Griffin Show. She spoke passably good English."

The film's villain, the dynamite-throwing Reverend, was played by Teodora Corrà—who had given one of the best and most animated performances in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto as the beach house host, George Stark. Another PAC contract player, Corrà too had worked with Halsey before, in the "Montgomery Ford" Western Oggi a me . . . domani a te!.

Halsey: "I remembered him from the other film—a fine comic actor. He was very inventive, good to work with. As an actor, it's so good to work with other actors! In Italy, this wasn't always the case; sometimes you would find yourself acting with friends-of-friends, girlfriends, and so forth. So whenever I found myself working with real actors [like Teodoro], it was always a pleasure."

GIORGIO GARGIULLO, a dead ringer for director Sergio Leone, plays Sam Lewis, who knows where the gold is buried.

The film's most prestigious casting, curiously enough, was that of Isa Miranda, who was saddled with the unlikely role of the aging madam of a sagebrush brothel. In her day, Miranda was among the most famous and elegant actresses in Europe, the very definition of the Italian femme fatale. Born Ines Isabella Sampietro in Milan in 1909, she was a former model and stage actress who won fame when Max Ophuls catapulted her from obscurity into the lead of his film La signora di tutti ("The Queen of Everything," 1934). Miranda went on to star in Scipione l'Africano (1937), Ophuls' masterpiece La Ronde (1950), Rasputin (1954), La noia/The Empty Canvas (1963), The Yellow Rolls-Royce (1964), Massimo Dallamano's Das Bildnis des Dorian Gray/The Secret of Dorian Gray (1970), and Liliana Cavani's Il portiere di notte/The Night Porter (1974). The wife of Italian writer–producer–director Alfredo Guarini—best-known for producing Roberto Rossellini's Germania anno zero/Germany Year Zero (1947)—Isa Miranda complemented her life as an actress with additional success as a novelist, poet and painter. Bava enjoyed the opportunity of working with her so much that he also cast her in his next picture, in the small but pivotal role as the wheelchair-bound Countess Federica in Ecologia del delitto.

Giorgio Gargiullo, who plays the small but pivotal role of map owner Sam Lewis, was cast owing to his strong physical resemblance to Sergio Leone. His screen credits are limited but include a couple of earlier, outstanding Italian Westerns: Tonino Valerii's I giorni dell'ira/Day of Anger (1967, scripted by Ernesto Gastaldi) and Giuseppe Vari's Con lui cavalca la morte/Death Rides Along (also 1967).

Of Jack's henchmen, Guido Lollobrigida was born in 1929 and began his acting career in the mid-1960s, appearing in Alberto De Martino's Italian/West German co-production Upperseven l'uomo dal uccidere/Upperseven, the Man to Kill (1965), starring Paul Hubschmid, Karin Dor, and Rosalba Neri. Moving immediately into Italian Westerns, he adopted the pseudonym "Lee Burton" for appearances in De Martino's Centomila dollari per Ringo/$10,000 for Ringo (1965) and Gianfranco Baldanello's Uccidere Johnny Ringo/Kill Johnny Ringo (1966), an unrelated Dick Randall production in which he appeared for the first time with Brett Halsey. Among his other film highlights are Riccardo Freda's spy film Coplan oeuvre le feu à Mexico/Mexican Slayride (1967), De Martino's Bond spoof O.K. Connery/Operation Kid Brother (1967), the Dario Argento-scripted Cimitero senza croci/Cemetery Without Crosses (1969), Antonio Margheriti's Gothic Western . . . E Dio disse a Caino/. . . And God Said to Cain (1970), and Terence Young's Red Sun (1971).

AS Jack travels in search of buried treasure, he hemorrhages money every step of the way as Mahila earns her living from him.

THESE glass matte paintings by Bava appear at different points in the film, but make obvious use of the same basic scenery.

Several of Lollobrigida/Burton's Westerns also featured his Roy Colt co-star Franco Pesche, who sometimes appeared in Italian/Spanish co-productions under the name Franco Oliveras.

Mauro Bosco, who plays the rebellious henchman Belletreccio—evidently an Hasidic Jew, who wears his hair in long pe'ot locks over his temples—had previously appeared in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto as the ill-fated houseboy, Jacques. Apart from a few notable features, such as Ettore Scola's Splendor (1988) and Pietro Nardi's Eclisse totale (1992), Bosco has spent most of his subsequent acting career on Italian television.

Finally, appearing under the thinly disguised character name of Boida ("Blondie") is Federico Boido, the tall, gaunt, scarecrow-like actor whom Bava had previously used to intimidating effect in Terrore nello spazio and Diabolik. Given Boido's name, the role of Boida would seem to be Bava's personal tribute to one of his favorite movie faces. When the Reverend scolds him, "Boida! Every time I look through the eye of a skull I see your face, looking back at me like a corpse!" one can't help thinking this was exactly the kind of exchange one might overhear between Bava and Boido on the set.

Production

The credits of Roy Colt & Winchester Jack state that it was filmed at DePaolis Studios, but Brett Halsey believes that only the interiors were filmed there, as he doesn't remember DePaolis having a standing Western town. He isn't certain, but he thinks the town scenes may have been filmed at Cinecittà, as the two studios were "just a short distance from each other, maybe five miles apart."

"We had a lot of fun with Roy Colt," he says. "Some of it worked and some of it didn't, but it was a pleasant experience. Bava was more relaxed and had more fun on that one [than on Four Times That Night]. He was a really nice man, the kind of director you want to work for because you trust him. There are other Italians who . . . well, I don't know how they ever got the job! But Bava was a real pro, and he knew how to handle his people. It's nice to work with someone who knows what they're doing, and is relaxed with it, and knows how to keep his people relaxed. It was made with good, high spirits and camaraderie. Marilù had such a good time that she caused many scenes to be reshot because she would often break up with laughter in the wrong places."

The movie conveys a sense of having been more fun to make than it is to watch, and it was obviously filmed in haste. Antonio Rinaldi's cinematography is unusually chaotic and reckless, zooming frantically in and out of the gunfight scenes, as if hellbent on demonstrating to those critics who had charged Bava and him with overusing the zoom lens what overuse of zoom really looks like. While Southwood and Tolo get their share of close-ups, Halsey's lead role is not so well covered and the subtlety of his work sometimes suffers for it; we're seldom close enough to catch the wink of his performance or the sly laughter in his eyes. "Somehow I seem to remember being disappointed by the picture," Halsey confesses, "and maybe that's why. Maybe because of budget or something, he didn't shoot as much as he wanted to."

Asked to discuss the working relationship between Bava and Rinaldi, Halsey offers: "I thought Rinaldi was a talented guy. It never occurred to me that Bava was, in any way, imposing on him. Of course, as the director, Bava was calling the shots and all of that, but as I recall, Rinaldi was in charge of his own area of responsibility. Bava may have had his own ideas about lighting, but on the two pictures I made, I don't remember too many instances of unusual lighting. Four Times That Night was pretty bright, generally speaking, and Roy Colt we shot mostly outside."

It is true that Roy Colt presented few opportunities for Bava's trademark primary color lighting or macabre visuals, but a close examination of the camera set-ups reveal more signature Bava touches than may be immediately apparent. The only interior scene that feels readily familiar, in terms of style, is a comic episode featuring Southwood and Tolo, in which Mahila insists that the odiferous Jack take a bath before getting into bed with her. The warm upstairs lighting—warm red and amber gels around the fireplace and stove, with cool blue limning the actors' faces whenever they stand near a window keeping out the winter chill—turns more decidedly expressionistic as Mahila snatches Jack's pistol and leads him downstairs to a bathtub at gunpoint, dramatizing both his fear of water (and being clean) and of Mahila's dominance. In the bathroom, the lighting becomes more jagged and the contrasting gels no longer blend naturally, but paranoiacally. The bathtub itself, its old standing water covered with broken shards of ice (cuts sheets of clear polythene floating on the surface—maybe cut-up sections of the freezer bags used in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto!), is revealed in a shock pan movement that reveals it like a Lovecraftian thing of horror. The scene is followed by a bartering scene, with a freshly washed Jack being obliged to pay Mahila not only for sex, but for each item of clothing she removes. Throughout the scene (shot in a single, extended take), Mahila is consistently lighted in warm colors while Jack retains a bluish tinge, which works to underline her proven command of the situation. When Jack runs out of money and decides simply to take sexual charge of the situation, the scene ends with a suggestive shot of the knobby bedpost, rocking back and forth, which ushers Bava's work into a realm of frank sexual metaphor that was entirely new to his oeuvre. Even more suggestive is the subsequent shot, following a brief cutaway, of Mahila furiously scraping the old notches from her phallically upcurved cuenta, which is held just above the level of Jack's abdomen in the framing. For a 1970 film, the frankness of this visual double entendre is truly startling.

LIKEWISE with these two glass mattes, filmed near Bava's favorite location at Tor Caldara.

The only real trick shots employed in the picture occur when the characters have followed the treasure map into Vulture Canyon. These scenes were shot at Bava's favorite location, the beach at Tor Caldara, heavily masked with glass matte paintings of mesas and cacti. For at least one shot, Bava created a glass matte with an illusion of depth: at screen left is a cluster of red rock formations and cacti that appears to be in the foreground, as the actors guide their horses behind it, while at screen right, in the far distance atop a hillside, are some majestic mesa ranges. This was all painted on the same plane of glass.

Halsey notes that some non-matte shots also called for foregrounded cacti: "Those tall cactus trees that you see were all flat, plywood cutouts. Because that type of cactus exists only in the American and Mexican deserts, it had become common practice with the Italian and Spanish Westerns to carry a supply of fold-up cactus cutouts, which the set decorators would run around planting here and there in the background." One of the plywood cacti also figured in a comic shot that occurs late in the picture, when Jack awakens to discover Roy and Mahila kissing; the camera cuts away from the kiss to a tight shot of Jack's angry face—his expression of dumb, smoldering outrage recalls the drunken Lee Marvin character from Cat Ballou (1965)—and then zooms out slightly to reveal the "arms" of a cactus in the background positioned like horns growing out of his head.

The only mechanical special effects in the movie, apart from the dynamite explosions, involved a pair of specially rigged crutches that could be "shot" away, a piece at a time, until Sam Lewis was left lying on his stomach, and a remote-controlled cobra that threatens Jack's life in the desert—a stiff, none-too-convincing robot built for the movie by Carlo Rambaldi. The violent camera shaking that accompanies the detonation of the dynamite was not done "live" but added in post-production via optical printing.

The bordello scene with Isa Miranda hovers in the center of the movie, completely disconnected from any other aspect of the storyline. Considering Roy Colt's brief running time, this sequence may have been added at the last minute to make the film feature-length. Brett Halsey doesn't remember the specifics, but agrees with this assessment: "The bordello scene seems gratuitous and out of place. I can't remember why it was included, but your assumption may be correct that it was added late in production, to bring the running time up to scratch."

Charles Southwood recalls the bordello scene with particular relish: "There's a scene in a bordello where we're all participating in the mise-en-scène. Bava was very laid-back . . . He was having fun; it was not a tense situation for anyone, especially Bava. He'd laugh like a madman after we'd made up a scene out of nothing. I thought we were extremely inventive. It was an extraordinary film!" The actor also remembers that Bava's good cheer didn't diminish, even when the tensions behind-the-scenes overflowed into the production. "In the middle of this film, the production and distribution starting fighting and they shut the film down. Bava threw up his hands and said, 'C'est la vie!'"

BAVA, keeping warm in an Indian blanket, while filming near the beach.

Among Brett Halsey's favorite memories of the two Bava films he made is the personal working relationship that he witnessed between Mario and Lamberto Bava, with whom he would work again many years later.

"I don't remember Lamberto working in the manner of a normal AD [assistant director] at all," he says. "They had a very close relationship; it was more like a son helping his father than a cool, collected AD. I liked their relationship very much. I was a little disappointed later on, when I worked with Lamberto, that as a director, he didn't have his father's charm or his understanding. Lamberto was around the set as one of the producers while we were shooting The Black Cat, which was actually directed by Luigi Cozzi; I somehow remember Lamberto's influence more than Luigi's. As a director, I thought Lamberto was too much of an autocrat—like Freda, but he didn't have Freda's charisma, or his father's sense of fun. He's not his father, but how many Mario Bavas are there?"

Music

As with Bava's previous job for PAC, Roy Colt & Winchester Jack was scored by Piero Umiliani. Regrettably, the result is nowhere near the inventive triumph of 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto. His music for Roy Colt is often brilliantly arranged, with some audaciously bizarre combinations of instruments, but the score itself is generally uninspired, derivative, and inappropriate to a Western or comic context.

One of the few musical high points is the main theme, a somber acoustic ballad titled "Roy Colt," whose performance is credited to the Italian folk-rock group "I [The] Free Love." The composition is jointly credited to Umiliani and Gizzarelli (presumably, the group's lyricist) and contains English lyrics. The piece is so hauntingly melancholy—anticipating in some ways Guido and Maurizio De Angelis' acoustic score for Enzo G. Castellari's Keoma (1976), equally rough-hewn but with more melodic sensibility—it must have been written and recorded prior to the movie changing its course to comedy. Opening with a percussion tattoo that branches quickly from a single high-hat to timbales, congas, and a full drum kit—in effect, imitating the percussion intro of Santana's "Soul Sacrifice"—the piece hits its stride with the introduction of six-string electric guitar (a finger-picked, seven-note riff), acoustic rhythm guitar, electric bass, and continuously clattering percussion. The middle-eight adds Umiliani's trademark Hammond organ washes to the overall group sound. The willowy vocal, sung by single male and female voices buried deep in reverb, bleeds so badly into the accompaniment that it is impossible to discern all the lyrics. "The world is much too hard for me" . . . "I need a cause to serve" . . . "I dedicate my life to you" . . . are some of the more apparent phrases, none of them relevant to the film at hand.

None of the remaining cues on Cinevox's 1999 soundtrack CD release are titled. Two of the film's main themes are first stated in the opening cue, which commences with double-tracked electric guitar, the right channel soon joined by solitary male whistling of the first theme—instantly familiar and, on reflection, absurdly similar to the opening bars of "I'm An Old Cowhand From the Rio Grande." Once this theme is stated, the second is stated by double-tracked banjo and guitar, a five-note melody that sounds like Danny & The Juniors' 1950s rock hit "Let's Go to the Hop," played off-key, and which quickly wears out its welcome. The "Let's Go to the Hop" theme is later reprised, with horns, in a sluggish, mariachi-flavored rendition that seems musically and geographically out of place.

The "Old Cowhand" theme is variously reprised—initially by bass woodwind, over a lovely riff plucked on acoustic guitar. (This riff is identical to a pattern that figures frequently in Umiliani's 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto score, where it is usually played by vibes or electric keyboard.) It is elsewhere repeated by guitar, loping electric bass and caressing effusions of organ, the piece's outdoorsy, nature-loving mood soon shattered by a contemporary-sounding break with low brass and rattling congas, suggesting an intrusion of danger or intrigue.

The film's third major theme is a sentimental one, first heard in the film as an underscore to the words of the amusingly homesick letter written from Roy to Jack. The melody is carried by bass clarinet, giving it a wonderfully woodsy and woebegone quality, accompanied by clip-clopping organ and acoustic guitar; it sounds like the mopey accompaniment to a love story between man and horse. It's actually the inspired choice of instrumentation that makes the cue sound so pitifully dejected and ironic; later in the cue, when the melody is reprised by acoustic guitar, one derives a much better appreciation of the basic sweetness of the melody. This theme is also reprised in other cues with the melody played by a fiddle in the jazz-sweet style of Stephane Grappelli—perhaps by Grappelli himself, who was an experienced hand at studio jobbing.

Representing the Russian soul of the Reverend is a mazurka-like cue—complete with fleeting echoes of "Ghost Riders in the Sky"—that finds violin and percussion joined in a festive, ever-accelerating dervish, while the time-keeping drum kit periodically explodes into jazzier outbursts of improvised rolls and runs.

The "Man and Horse" cue is reprised in a fuller arrangement whose centerpiece is a surprisingly moving (and disappointingly short) Spanish solo trumpet passage, recalling the great arena themes which Ennio Morricone composed for the Leone Westerns. A separate cue gives fuller vent to Umiliani's ideas for the solo trumpet, which soars proudly and tragically over sparkling acoustic and electric guitar support, and an undertow of dissonant organ and rattling bongos.

A score that overstays its welcome on compact disc at a mere 37 minutes, Umiliani's contribution to Roy Colt & Winchester Jack is, if anything, even more tiresome in context. While the "Man and Horse" theme provokes chuckles on the first pass, the humor doesn't endure, and the other cues are plainly unsupportive of the movie's comedic aspirations. Especially when heard in the film itself, Umiliani's use of electric keyboard introduces unwelcome, jarring colorings that would have sounded more at home in a Hawaiian story or ice-skating sequence. With its "Let's Go to the Hop" theme chugging along, one is unpleasantly reminded of the Tijuana Brass-inspired music that underpinned the frantic Luna Park scenes of Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs—and the music becomes akin to a laugh track, having a good time for us. The feeling is neither mutual nor contagious.

Commentary

Often described as a comedy, Roy Colt & Winchester Jack more correctly belongs to the category of farce or satire. It is not a straightforward story with humorous dialogue, but more akin to a feature-length Mad magazine sketch that pokes fun at the traditions of Westerns in general, and Italian Westerns in particular, while wearing a poker face that occasionally becomes comic in itself.

The primary target of Bava's satire is the filmic universe of Sergio Leone, with whom he previously worked at least once, on the 1954 Aldo Fabrizi comedy Hanno rubato un tram, which employed Leone as assistant director. In Roy Colt, Leone is caricatured as Sam Lewis (note the shared initials), a boisterous, loud-mouthed cripple whose crutches are shot out from under him, inch by inch, by a sharpshooter with Tourette's Syndrome, whose violent behavior is punctuated by involuntary bird-calls—a jokey reference to Ennio Morricone's famous music for Il buono, il brutto, il cattivo. We can't be sure of what Bava's feelings were about Leone, nor did he make such intentions known to his cast ("If [mocking Leone] was his intention, I was unaware of it," says Brett Halsey), but there is a bitter edge to both characterizations that is hard to overlook or understand. Actor Giorgio Gargiullo, who plays Sam, is a dead ringer for Leone (as he looked in 1969, not in 1954) and the three characters of Roy, Jack, and the Reverend essentially reprise the roles played in Leone's film by Lee Van Cleef, Clint Eastwood, and Eli Wallach—all three men pooling their resources, none too willingly, to reach a promised fortune in gold buried in a cemetery, each of them gaining (and abusing) the upper hand at least once, and hoping to ultimately cut the other two out of their shares. The Reverend, a Russian socialist (who turns out to be the greediest capitalist of them all) whose weapon of choice is dynamite, suggests an attentive familiarity with Leone's then-current project, Giù la testa/A Fistful of Dynamite, which featured James Coburn as a dynamite-chucking Marxist. Leone's film was simultaneously in production at Cinecittà but not released until October 29, 1971—more than a year after Roy Colt's premiere. Therefore, some of the humor in Bava's film is surprisingly prescient, even when it's not particularly funny.

To make a comedy rooted in one's private feelings can be interpreted as yet another instance, conscious or unconscious, of Bava trying to sabotage his own career. Any viewer coming to Roy Colt & Winchester Jack thinking that they will see an ordinary Western, or even a comic Western in the style of the later Trinity films, has another think coming. This kind of farce involves a deliberate element of grotesquerie, resulting in sometimes overbearing exaggerations of nature, overstated action and distorted performances that are all too easy to interpret unfavorably. Roy Colt contains more artless shots than any other Bava film, but for an artist of Bava's caliber, we must assume this was a deliberate choice, and perhaps a statement in itself about the look of Leone's Westerns, which took a more neorealistic approach than did Hollywood Westerns, arriving at a style that was hot and dusty and as "natural" as manure. In the manner of a George Grosz sketch, Roy Colt exaggerates this aspect of Leone's films and takes that exaggeration way over the top.

A perfect example of this approach is a scene involving the Reverend, whose trembling face and beaded brow are photographed with a wide-angle lens (a modern device that no director would wisely employ in a period Western), greatly exaggerating what would otherwise look like a typically intense Leone close-up. As his cohorts run into the background of the shot and crouch to request orders, the Reverend fumes—we don't know if he is simply angered by their incompetence, or still shivering with cold—but, as the two men leave, the Reverend's face suddenly relaxes with heavenly relief, and we realize that he's been crouching and straining to defecate throughout the entire scene. In essence, the scene mocks Leone's style by implying that his sweaty, hard-faced close-ups made his actors appear constipated.

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by Rodolfo Gasparri.

GERMAN A1 poster.

The film's emphasis on wide-angle (as opposed to widescreen) lensing gives the film a funhouse look of extreme caricature and makes some of its performances, especially Teodoro Corrà's, seem positively ogreish at times. Remarkably, under these circumstances, Bava is careful to ensure that all of the actors look their best and, though the film itself is ultimately a grating failure, sustained only by a few scattered nuggets of interest, they all manage to emerge with their dignity intact. Roy Colt might have been more successful—as a comedy, and as a commercial release—had its humor been more democratic, less privileged and interior, and its satiric elements certainly would have been more effective if Leone's magnificent epics were actually deserving of such severe lampooning.

Roy Colt & Winchester Jack is not one of Bava's signature works, but a close examination of its cinematography finds it generally in keeping with his usual habits. The film either introduces or reprises a number of the transitional habits that Bava was developing with Antonio Rinaldi: shots that open on a detail and zoom back, that commence by fading in or out of focus, or that begin up in the sky or in the trees and gracefully descend to frame the earthbound action. (As these transitional habits also occur in Lisa and the Devil, for which Rinaldi was replaced by another cameraman, we may assume that Bava was operating the camera, or that Rinaldi was following Bava's instructions with such ideas.) The exterior scenes at Jack's gang's campsite also manage to incorporate some familiar Bavian scenery, such as gnarling foregrounded branches to enhance the illusion of a wilderness, or the mystique of whorling smoke from an offscreen campfire. The camera setup underscores Bava's wary feelings about marriage when the first kiss between Jack and Mahila takes place behind the "prison bars" of a patch of tall unfocused reeds, their moment of intimacy slowly revealed as a wall of early evening fog dissipates. Later in the film, when Jack and Mahila are shown making love in a sleeping bag, their coital undulations animate the bag like a serpent—and composer Piero Umiliani comments on the shot musically with an Eastern-tinged cue, not included on the soundtrack CD, that suggests the ululations of a snake charmer. After making love, Mahila proposes marriage to Jack; when he refuses and she retaliates by tallying his debt on her cuenta, he throws the curved bone into a very suggestively shaped pond, positioned between two hillocks of rock. Roy Colt's return is signalled when his inverted reflection suddenly appears in the pool—a shot that quotes similar moments in La maschera del demonio and Ercole al centro della terra when faces made surprise appearances in goblets of wine or pools of blood. A macabre element is introduced with the use of an Indian skull to divine the location of the gold's burial place in an Indian graveyard, the camera set-up showing a bright sun shining from its hollow right socket—which echoes the reanimation of Princess Asa in her Moldavian crypt.

Bava's hand is also in evidence in the pay-off of the bordello sequence, when the Reverend—seized by a group of angry men and pushed through an opaque decorative screen where the silhouette of a curvaceous dancing girl is being projected as entertainment—reveals the "dancer" to be a grizzled old man wearing cardboard cut-outs to put curves in all the right places. It's a genuine shock on first viewing, and one of Bava's most effective admonitions for us not to believe in what we think we see.

But what is finally most captivating about this tale of two men is the woman at its center. The character of Mahila imbues Roy Colt with the hint of melancholy found in Bava's beloved Chaplin comedies. Here, as in many Chaplin classics, the comic male caricatures are buttressed by a somewhat more realistic female character who is alone in the world, with a painful past, who nevertheless meets each day with optimism and a determination to survive. The interior scene of Jack's first attempts to seduce Mahila opens with a close shot of her lighting a lantern—an ordinary domestic act, but the shot is infused with a mysterious sensibility that intuitively relates her to the occult women of Bava's earlier and subsequent features. Over the course of the film, we see Mahila "survive" by leaving one man for another, determined to marry or at least to attach herself to the strongest possible male companion until a true prospective husband comes along. Mahila also recalls the street children of the great neorealist classics, living from day to day in a postwar desolation zone, yearning for stability and security. In its final moments, with her achievement of independence, Roy Colt & Winchester Jack restates Bava's view of women as the wisest sex, the true governors of society, and the ultimate beneficiaries of men's dreams and labors.

Release

When Brett Halsey finally saw Roy Colt & Winchester Jack, more than thirty years after making it, he wrote to me that "I generally liked what I saw . . . I was particularly impressed by the way Bava would use his camera to get the maximum effect from a minimum of production values; Riccardo Freda's influence is quite evident. But the post-production values are pretty poor. Whoever wrote the Italian dialogue couldn't have followed the English script very closely."

In addition to Roy Colt's arcane humor and its occasional, undisguised bitterness toward Sergio Leone and his Westerns, its comic intentions are made even more opaque by an Italian track that effectively destroys any glimmer of verbal humor it may once have had. The film's failure to secure any kind of real or lasting distribution in English-speaking countries has resulted, in the long run, of the loss of its native language and whatever elements of comedy it contained.

"I don't specifically remember whether or not I dubbed the picture," acknowledges Brett Halsey, "but I think all actors want to dub themselves. But it was in our contract that, if we exercised the right to dub our own performances, we would not be paid for it. I mention this because I sometimes did the dubbing for other actors, because for that, I would get paid. It worked out as a kind of bonus for me. My manager didn't give me a lot of freedom with my money, but the money I earned from dubbing I could put straight into my pocket. If a producer presold one of my films to the States, he would want to have my voice used in the dubbing, and I would do this. However, sometimes if the American sale didn't happen, or if it didn't happen until later, there might be a problem because I might be off working on another picture and wouldn't be available. So in those cases, they would have to get another actor to dub it." Roy Colt was one of those films that did not have a standing American distribution deal at the time it was made, so it was likely not dubbed until some time after production wrapped.

After an undistinguished Roman premiere in August 1970, Roy Colt & Winchester Jack waited two years—until after the successful premiere of E. B. Clucher's [Enzo Barboni's] popular comic Western Lo chiamovano Trinità/They Call Me Trinity (1971)—before receiving any kind of international release. In 1972, it was acquired by distributors in Spain, West Germany, and the United States. Though a fumetto adaptation of the film was published in the December 1971 issue of the French Western ciné-roman magazine Star-Ciné Winchester (under the title A Moi l'or à toi le Colt, or "The Gold for Me, The Colt for You"), the film was never given a theatrical release in France and only surfaced there, many years later, on television.

In America, Roy Colt & Winchester Jack was acquired by Cinevision—the company that picked up Four Times

FRAME enlargements from Bava's Mobil Oil commercial, I FUTURIBILI: Title superimposed over a Bava matte painting, actors ascending in an elevator enclosed by windows, the principal actor watching as he ascends higher than the surrounding skyscrapers, and a child's game of football unfolds on the playing field of a domed rooftop.

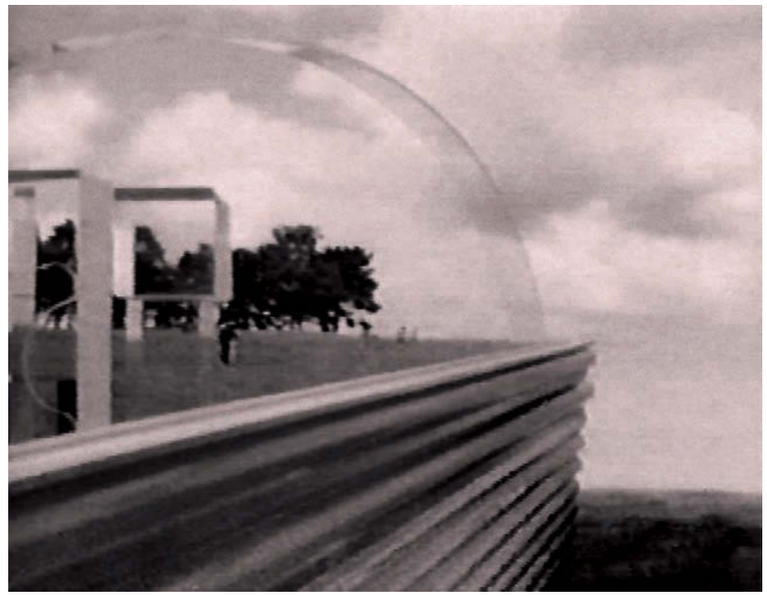
That Night around the same time—but with the possible exception of one or two minor playdates to qualify for a tax break, the film appears to have gone not only unreleased but unpromoted. In thirty years of collecting, I have never seen a US one-sheet poster or pressbook for the title. Some sources, like the International Movie Database, also mention US distribution being handled by Libert Films International—a small and short-lived (1975-76) company specializing in "unexplained phenomena" documentary features. The film's current owner, Alfredo Leone, doubts that more than a few prints of the English-dubbed version were ever struck, and as the film was being readied for its American DVD release in late 2002, no print or negative of the English-dubbed version was found to exist.

Though Roy Colt & Winchester Jack is one of Bava's lesser works, the present lack of an English version nevertheless represents a significant loss. The film's leads gave their performances in English, and some of the film's humor was clearly intended to be linguistic in nature, as indicated by the Reverend's fractured Italian—which cannot be adequately conveyed to English-speaking audiences by subtitles. In short, though Roy Colt & Winchester Jack survives, its true nature may be lost; its already limited interest further stunted by the loss of its basic language and sense of laughter.



I futuribili

It was the beginning of a new decade, and Mario Bava must have experienced pangs of uncertainty as his final working years loomed before him. The glory days of the Italian Gothic cinema were long over, and he was approaching his 60th year at a time when the popular cinema was becoming synonymous with youth. He had spent the previous year filming in Westerns and erotica—two genres for which he had no real affinity—and very quickly fallen to a level of production far below that of Diabolik, which he had directed only two years earlier. It must have occurred to him that he may have been wrong to refuse Dino De Laurentiis' request for a sequel. "I blew it all, right from the start," he confessed in an interview with Luigi Cozzi. (Can you think of any director working today who would be capable of such candor in a print interview?) "I made two big mistakes—first of all, it's impossible for me to be serious for more than a couple of minutes, and if you're a director who doesn't happen to wear glasses, doesn't have a frowning, intellectual countenance, that 'serious' look—well, you aren't going to be perceived as a good director! Second, I always tried to make do with small, shoestring budgets. If I need a Ferrari Dino for a particular scene, but the producer delivers a Fiat 500, should I fly into a rage and raise hell until I get exactly what I asked for? No! When they bring me the Fiat 500, I shrug my shoulders and rewrite the scene so that it works, in spite of it. And what do I get for being nice? Instead of having them say, 'Good work, Mario . . . thanks to you, we came in under budget . . . you really know how to solve problems' and so forth . . . the next time I ask for a Fiat 500, they bring me a bicycle! So I have to make do again. It shouldn't happen this way, but it does, and it's nobody's fault but my own. I don't give a damn, anyway . . ." [4]

While waiting for new feature opportunities to materialize, Bava continued to do uncredited work. It was during this period that Bava accepted an offer from the Ted Bates Agency to write, direct, and photograph a series of black-and-white television commercials—known in Italy as caroselli—for Mobil Oil. ("I did it because they paid good money," he told Cozzi, defensively. "Why should I refuse?") These imaginative spots—each a few minutes in length—shared the common title I futuribili and utilized Bava's genius for economical trick photography. They depicted men and women interacting with various amenities of future life, which Mobil research would make possible. Among the subjects of these commercials were "The University of the Future," "The Telemarket," "Videoradar," and "360° Television."

In one of these commercials, the Manhattan skyline is shown straddled by an elaborate four-legged construction. A young adult man in an elegantly tailored jumpsuit enters a transparent, exterior elevator and ascends over the city to an enclosed rooftop; there he finds his son playing soccer in a natural park preserve. The boy is shown running precariously close to the edge of the rooftop and bouncing his ball off the curve of an invisible, shatterproof dome. The accompanying narration:

Tomorrow's people!

Imagine a different world—dream ahead to what reality will be for the people of the future! Tomorrow's people are just like you—people capable of imagining a different world, using the present to dream of the world their children will inhabit.

With Mobil, you can experience the future today, because we offer Mobil 42, the gas which adds a new gear to your engine—the gear of security![5]

The commercial is a model of economy, personal style and vision. The futuristic panorama shown at the commercial's outset is one of Bava's clever photo mattes, in which New York City is shown straddled by a customized version of the control tower at Los Angeles International Airport. The point-of-view shots of New York skyscrapers as the elevator rises above them were achieved by angling a photograph behind a sheet of trick glass, which distorted the image and created the illusion of receding. The rooftop oasis was shot at a real outdoor location, through a glass matte depicting the domed rooftop ledge. The illusion of the boy bouncing his ball off the transparent barrier was produced by filming the shot through a sheet of glass, on half of which the dome and sky were painted. The camera saw through the clear portion to the child actor, who was bouncing his ball off a wall blocked from view by the matte painting.

Another commercial in the series depicted how tomorrow's boxers might be able to heal their bruised and battered faces by stepping inside a "regeneration machine." This effect was engineered "without cuts or dissolves," according to Lamberto Bava, which in tandem with the black-and-white nature of the photography, suggests that it reprised the red and blue makeup/lighting interaction that Bava had used in I vampiri, Caltiki, and La maschera del demonio.

Ethereally scored by Giulio Sorgini, the I futuribili commercials show that Bava had lost none of his unique talent for pop science fiction imagery, showcased so excitingly in Terrore nello spazio, and makes it all the more regrettable that he was unable to convince producers to fund more of his science fiction projects.

Bava's 1970 interview with Luigi Cozzi took place shortly after his work had been presented to the Italian heads of Mobil Oil. "The other night, they had a big meeting at the company, where they showed my commercials," Bava said with some pride, and even more bewilderment. "There were lots of big shots, guys wearing gold rings and blue blazers, the sort who stink of money, I couldn't understand anything, it was so chaotic, with speeches and presentations and so forth. It was like the premiere of Ben-Hur! But at the end of all this, they showed my cheap little commercials, with all their homemade trick shots. At least they seemed to like them . . ."

Evidently Bava continued to direct commercials on the side during this period—as, indeed, his son Lamberto has done throughout his feature film directing career. Actress Penny Brown remembers Mario Bava directing her in an Italian TV commercial for home freezer units in the early 1970s. For decades, it seemed likely that Bava's commercials would never resurface, but finally, one of them was rebroadcast as part of RAI-3's Bava tribute on January 29, 1995. In June of that year, Marco Giusti arranged for the screening of two I futuribili commercials at a Bava tribute at the 13th Annual Anteprima festival of independent Italian cinema.

Seeing Bava's I futuribili commercials today, we can appreciate once again how his innovative approach proved prophetic and influential even within the field of advertising. In 1994, AT&T launched a similar series of commercials in America, in which AT&T customers were shown selecting first-run movies from a menu on a television screen that filled an entire wall, and writing messages on lapscreens by hand while lounging on the beach; their messages were then transmitted as faxes to the other side of the world. "Can't do these things yet?" the commercials asked. "Some day you will, thanks to AT&T."

I futuribili

"The People of Tomorrow" 1970
B&W, 1.37:1, TV commercials

Production: B. L. Vision. Producers: Sandro Bolchi, Mario Lanfranchi. Director, Script, Director of photography, Special effects: Mario Bava. Music: Giulio Sorgini. Agency: Ted Bates.

4 Luigi Cozzi, Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987), 249–60.

5 Narration translated from the Italian by Luca Rea.

Hellbound

"It is better to marry than to burn."
—New Testament, Corinthians 7:9

BARON BLOOD: This Italian fotobusta detail shows Rada Rassimov in her dual role, as oracle Christina Hoffmann communicates with the spirit of executed witch Elizabeth Holle.

JANO.

DETAIL from Spanish poster art by Jano.

ECOLOGIA DEL DELITTO

Twitch of the Death Nerve

AFTER COMPLETING Roy Colt & Winchester Jack, Mario Bava sensed that the intuitive, improvisational approach he had taken to his career was leading him into a professional cul de sac. If he continued to accept whatever jobs were offered him, he would be nothing more than an artisan posing as a hack. The time had come to take greater responsibility for generating his own projects. With this end in mind, he renewed his acquaintance with actress Laura Betti and the two of them set to work concocting new opportunities for collaboration. A gourmet cook in her private life, the Il rosso segno della follia star began inviting Bava to her dinner parties, and sometimes to private suppers, which he would attend with his aging basset hound, Centi.

Bava was devoted to Centi, but according to Armando Valcauda, taking it everywhere he went was also something of a pretext. During their first meeting, Bava confided to his young admirer that his wife became argumentative whenever he left their house, so in order to keep his social appointments, he had to either wait until she was napping or make the excuse that the dog needed walking.

Appropriately for a project born of kitchen talk, Bava and Betti cooked up a scenario they called either Odore di carne ("Stench of Flesh") or Sapore di carne ("Taste of Flesh"), about cannibalism at a Los Angeles college. According to Lamberto Bava, "Another title of this story was Santanas, referring to the wind that blows in those places, which has similar effects to those of our Italian sirocco." [1] When a roving RAI-Televizione camera happened to corner Bava for a short interview—his first-known television appearance—the uncomfortable-in-the-limelight director took the opportunity to mention it by name. Around this same time, Bava also took some meetings with producer Dino De Laurentiis, who, after the boxoffice success of Dario Argento's L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo and its follow-up Il gatto a nove code/The Cat o' Nine Tails (1971), was flirting with the idea of producing a giallo of his own.

It was while Argento's second film was in production that its young screenwriter, 27-year-old Dardano Sacchetti, was contacted by De Laurentiis. At the time, Sacchetti was involved in a public financial dispute with Argento and his producer father Salvatore Argento, over compensations due him for his involvement in the scripting of Il gatto a nove code. Argento had written the first forty pages of the script, based on an idea he had mapped out with Sacchetti, and the production had been set up on the basis of those pages; therefore, Argento wanted sole screenplay credit. Sacchetti (who received story credit) had no argument with this, but the change of credit also entailed a change in payment that made him quite indignant.

"Dario and I had a big quarrel, so big it made the newspapers, and Dino De Laurentiis called me after reading about it," Sacchetti reports. "He told me that he had a contract with Mario Bava and wanted to make thrillers. He knew that I had collaborated with Dario on Il gatto a nove code, so he asked if I would like to write something together with Bava. We wrote two stories together; one was called Reazione a catena, about children who had been abandoned by their parents and what became of them, and the other became Schock . . ." [2]

Bava and Sacchetti got along famously. "My personal memories of Mario are quite loving," he smiles. "Mario was just like a grandfather—he already had two grandchildren, Georgia and Roy. Mario had the face of a grandfather, always a gentle expression. He never raised his voice. He liked playing cards. I call Mario my 'teacher,' because I had never met anyone of such genius, especially with such a great sense of irony. Mario was the kind of person who could die of fright; to exorcise his fears, he made horror films. I, on the other hand, am afraid of nothing and never have been. My grandmother used to go to my grandfather's grave three times each night to exhume little pieces of his body, to convince herself that he was really dead! When I was 8 years old, she made me go with her to the cemetery—so I, too, have a sense of irony. That's how we were together: one of us absolutely terrified of everything, and the other with absolutely no sense of fear."

Bava and Sacchetti set out to write a giallo in which everyone was the murderer, a story of wall-to-wall homicide that would leave everyone, likewise, a victim. It was a play on the shock conceit initiated by Hitchcock for Psycho (1960), in which he surprised the audience by killing off the lead character, played by Janet Leigh, one-third of the way through the story. "Thirteen characters, thirteen murders!" Bava laughed. "I was [also] interested in depicting a variety of ways to kill, in presenting a veritable catalogue of crime." [3]

Sacchetti had his own goals in mind: "The film grew out of my concept of the evil in children. I'm convinced that children are much crueller than adults, ISA MIRANDA as the Countess Federica, struggling for her last breath.

Ecologia del delitto

"Ecology of Murder"
Working titles:
Così imparano a fare i cattivi "That Will Teach Them to Be Bad," La baia d'argento "The Bay of Silver,"
La baia sanglante "The Bay of Blood."
Script title: Reazione a catena, "Chain Reaction."
Filmed at Elios Film Studios and on location in Sabaudia and Frascati, near Rome
January 18 – February 1971
First released: September 8, 1971
Technicolor, 1.85:1, 85 minutes

Production: Nuova Linea Cinematografica (Rome). Producer: Giuseppe Zaccariello. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant director: Lamberto Bava. Screenplay: Mario Bava, Joseph McLee [Giuseppe Zaccariello] and Filippo Ottoni, with Sergio Canevari, Francesco Vanorio (uncredited). Story: Dardano Sacchetti, Franco Barbieri. Continuity: Patrizia Zulini. Director of photography: Mario Bava. Camera operator: Emilio Varriano. Camera assistant: Lorenzo Battaglia. Art direction: Sergio Canevari. Special effects: Carlo Rambaldi. Wardrobe: Sartoria Mayer. Wardrobe assistant: Rosanna Andreoni, C.S.C. Costume design: Enrico Sabbatini. Makeup: Franco Freda. Weapons: Adalgisa Favella. Production supervisor: Ferdinando Franchi. Production manager: Roberto Cicutto. Editor: Carlo Reali. Music: Stelvio Cipriani. Sound: Carlo Turchi. Sound recordist: Carlo Diotallevi, C.S.C. Stills: Franco Vitale, Studio Massa. Distributor: Nuova Linea Cinematografica.

Additional US credit: Post-sync dialogue: Gene Luotto.

Claudine Auger (Renata Donati), Luigi Pistilli (Alberto/Albert), Claudio Volonté (Simone/Simon), Anna M. [Maria] Rosati (Laura), Chris Avram (Franco/Frank Ventura), Leopoldo Trieste (Paolo/Paul Fosatti), Laura Betti (Anna Fosatti), Isa Miranda (Countess Federica Donati), Giovanni Nuvoletti (Count Filippo Donati), Brigitte Skay (Brunhilda), Paola Rubens [Paola Montenero] (Thérèse/Denise), Roberto Bonnani (Luca/Duke), Guido Boccaccini (Roberto/Bobby), Nicoletta Elmi and Renato Cestiè (Donati children, uncredited).

Argentina: Baño de Sangre, "Bay of Blood," Cinematografica Veneuzuela Pelimex C.A.
Belgium: Bloed in het Meer, "Blood in the Sea," Stellor Films
Canada: Bay of Blood, Ambassador Film Distributors
France: La baie sanglante, Audifilm, 4/3/73, 75m
Germany: Im Blutrausch des Satans, "In the Bloodlust of Satan," Wa Bo Mondial, Apollo Film, 1983
Italian reissue: Reazione a catena, "Chain Reaction," 1972
Spain: Bahia Sangre, Internaccional Films Distribución S.A., 1982
Turkey: Kanli Körfez, "Bloody Bay"
UK: Bloodbath, New Realm Entertainments, 3/80, 81m 3s
US: Carnage, Hallmark Releasing Corporation, 5/9/72. Reissues: Twitch of the Death Nerve, 12/72; Last House—Part II, Newport Releasing, 1977. Video: Bay of Blood
US (Spanish-American): Carnage, Columbia Pictures

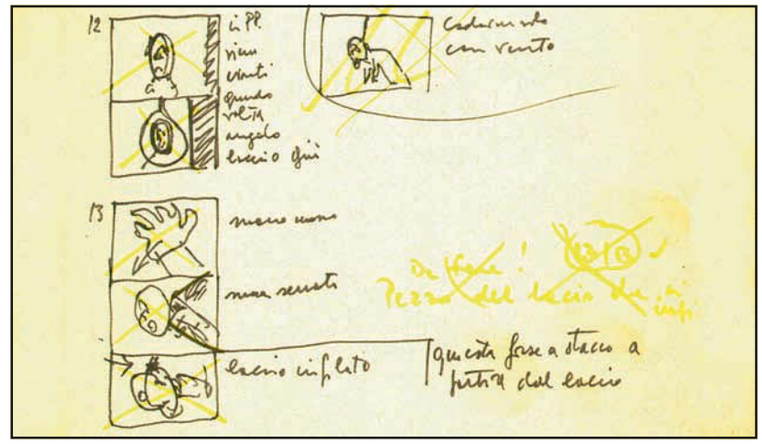
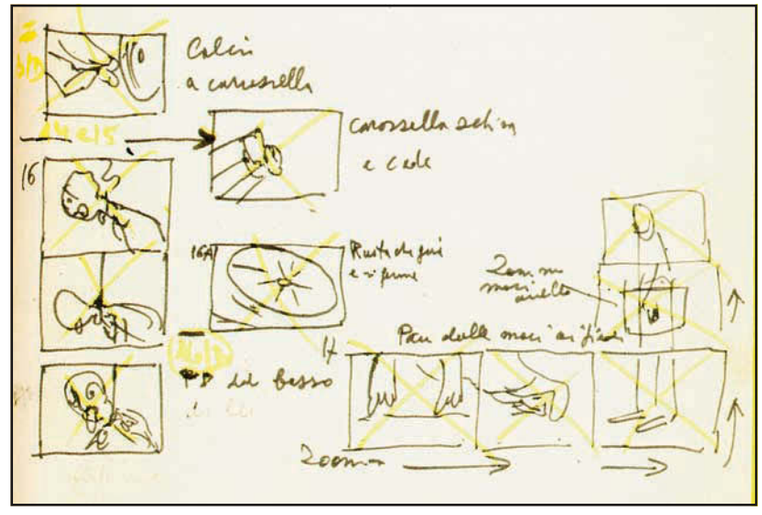
for the simple reason that they must defend themselves against adults; in order to survive, they must be even more violent than their grown-up contemporaries. Our script started out as the story of two parents, who are determined to give their children a good future, and have the idea of killing someone to achieve this goal. Once they have done this, they must murder again and again and again, until the whole thing becomes one long chain and they lose track of how it all started—why they started killing in the first place! That is to say, they forget all about their children, whom they've abandoned for two or three days. In the meantime, the children, on their own, have grown hungry and afraid, so that when the parents return, the children kill them—finishing the chain of violence. [Mario and I] designed every scene as an isolated piece unto itself, as if we were preparing a series of video clips. For example, I came up with the scene of the old lady being killed in her wheelchair, because I liked the idea of someone dying only a few inches above the ground, but still not being able to save themselves. Mario had the idea of the two bodies being run-through with a spear while they were making love; he wanted them to be killed 'as one flesh.' The sequence with the squid in the boat came about because we wanted to play on the idea that the body under the tarpaulin might still be alive, because there was movement beneath it, only to have the tentacles of the squid pop out! Coming up with ways for each of the characters to die posed a great challenge to us both. We were determined to make each and every death as wild and absurd as possible!"

In those days, Sacchetti worked with a writing partner, Franco Barbieri, whose involvement was apparently to blame for Sacchetti not going on to write the shooting script. "Barbieri had many personal problems, and Bava didn't really like him, and there was a sensational argument between the production, Barbieri and Mario," Sacchetti explains. "Barbieri was fired, and since I was a nice leftist boy, I said, 'If you fire him, you must fire me too.' Essentially, I left the film after delivering the first draft."[4]



The original title, an inspired one, was taken from the closing words of the Sacchetti/Barbieri draft, spoken by the Donati children after shooting their parents: Cosi imparano a fare i cattivi ("That Will Teach Them to Be Bad"). As the material continued to be developed by Bava, other writers became involved; some print references list Francesco Vanorio and art director Sergio Canevari as contributors to the script, but the most important contributor was ultimately Filippo Ottoni, who came to the job through its eventual producer.



Dino De Laurentiis lost interest in producing the project when the Italian success of Il gatto a nove code was not repeated abroad, but it was not without a sponsor for long. Bava was able to secure a promise of financial support from Giuseppe Zaccariello, who had been a silent partner in the productions of both Il rosso segno della follia and 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto. Zaccariello insisted on having the shooting script written by Ottoni, whose ambitious screenplay L'uomo scomodo ("The Uncomfortable Man") he had promised to produce before becoming convinced that it was too intellectual and poetical to be profitable, and reneging on the deal.

"The memory that I have of Mario Bava is that of a man obsessed with his taxes, who did this film because he had this deadline with IR," Ottoni says. "At that time, he owed something like 140 million lire [$87,000] in overdue taxes, which was a scary amount of money, so he needed desperately to get a film together. Therefore he approached Zaccariello . . . with this story, written by two young men. I remember Sacchetti; I don't think I ever met the other [writer, Franco Barbieri]. Since Zaccariello had this strange idea that I was a literary writer, his vivid imagination conceived that putting together a literary writer with an exploitation director could produce an extraordinary result. I told him that I didn't even like this genre that much. I knew who Mario Bava was because I had met him a year earlier at the De Laurentiis studio, where I worked as an assistant on Waterloo, which really was a Waterloo. Anyway, I tried to write this story. There was a treatment I had to flesh out, to enrich, especially writing all the dialogues. At the time we were working, I remember reading to Mario a couple of Chekov stories, since we were both lovers of Russian literature—and while listening, he would exclaim, 'What images! Cut here, cut there!' Every sentence for him was an image."[5]

Given the importance of landscape to the final script, Bava invited Ottoni to join him on location scouting expeditions. Ottoni: "We went location scouting in his Jaguar, the inheritance of a happier past, which guzzled about two gallons of gas per mile, so it wasn't cheap to drive. He was a very gentle character, suave and delicate. And the thing that struck me most about him was that, whenever we discussed the gruesome sequences, he got scared. I wondered, 'Is he serious, or is he pulling my leg?' But it was true—he really got frightened! The blade slamming into the man's face, for example, literally horrified him, just the idea . . ." Curiously, although the film's surprise ending was supposedly Sacchetti's contribution and therefore must have existed in the earlier draft, Ottoni has no recollection of it. "The ending, when the two kids kill their ORIGINAL Bava storyboard for Countess Federica's death sequence.

1 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

2 Dardano Sacchetti, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000. All Dardano Sacchetti quotes are derived from this transcript.

3 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

4 Gomarasca and Pulici.

5 Ibid. All Filippo Ottoni quotes are translated from this article.

CHRIS AVRAM and Anna Maria Rosati as the mercenary Frank Ventura and his scheming secretary-lover Laura.

parents, was added later," he says. "I didn't write this part, and it definitely wasn't in the script."

When the finished film was first screened abroad, it met with not only controversy but outright hostility. It must be remembered that the overseas distribution of Bava's films had been spotty for the past half dozen years, so American audiences had not been able to observe Bava's creative evolution step-by-step. In early 1972, Kill, Baby . . . Kill! had been the last of his horror pictures to receive any kind of widespread American distribution, and despite its lurid title which would have been perfect for Ecologia del delitto!), it was very much the sort of film that was expected of him. To be immersed in Ecologia del delitto without prior exposure to Bava's increasingly ironic work in movies like Il rosso segno della follia, 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, or even Diabolik (which Paramount barely released in the US) was to induce a kind of culture shock. As often happens when audacious or prophetic works of art are unveiled, the film polarized Bava's already modest fan base—one side disgusted by the film's over-the-top, almost unprecedented bloody violence and seeming lack of plot, and the other applauding its inventive structure and outrageous, dark sense of humor. Both camps seemed to agree, though, that Bava's work had never been so far removed from the Italian gothic milieu that was synonymous with his name.

Thirty years later, it is now commonly accepted that no other Bava film was quite as lastingly influential as this one, by far the most outrageous horror picture he ever perpetrated. There was very little like it at the time, and in terms of horror cinema, there has been very little *un*like it since. Though not the first "body count" movie—a strain which Bava had innovated earlier with the clearly labelled Sei donne per l'assassino, Cry Nightmare (Sette vergine per i diavolo), and 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto—Ecologia del delitto is now recognized as the smoking gun behind the phenomenally lucrative "body count" movie trend of the 1980s, which began with Sean S. Cunningham's Friday the 13th (1980)—a film that resulted in ten sequels, a television series, and countless imitations and parodies.

Synopsis

Wealthy, aged and invalid, Countess Federica Donati is wheeling herself through the empty rooms of her sumptuous, bayside villa when she is abruptly lassoed and hanged to death by her husband, Count Filippo Donati. On a nearby table, he places a "suicide note" in his wife's own handwriting ("O sweet Death, come swiftly, come silently!") bearing the current date of February 13—it is actually a page torn from her diary[6] of exactly one year earlier, when she was suffering a terrible depression. As he prepares to remove all traces of foul play from the scene of the crime, the Count is stabbed to death by an unseen intruder who absconds with his body.

Frank Ventura, an architect who lives near the Donatis on the bay, is having an affair with his secretary, Laura. Together they have been in talks with the Countess to persuade her to sign a land development deal, allowing her bayside home to be demolished to make way for casinos and other lucrative businesses. She has always refused, wishing to preserve the natural beauty of the landscape. As Ventura prepares to leave Laura's apartment, he mentions the news of the Countess' suicide and her husband's apparent disappearance.

Back at the bay, the amateur entomologist Paolo Fosatti searches the surrounding woods for an insect that has continually eluded his net. He is chided by the misanthropic Simon, a local fisherman who lives in a bayside shack, and the two men have a discussion about killing—Simon arguing that he, at least, eats the squid he catches, while Paolo preys upon insects for nothing more than his own intellectual distraction. Paolo's wife Anna, an occultist and alcoholic, discovers portents of death while reading Tarot cards and warns her uninterested husband that "the sickle of Death is about to strike."

Four fun-seeking teenagers—Duke, Denise, Bobby, and Brunhilda—are out joyriding when they discover the inviting, vacated property of Frank Ventura. They break into his empty cottage for a private party. As Duke and Denise retire to a bedroom, Brunhilda tries to tempt the reluctant Bobby to her side by stripping and going for a swim in the bay. There, she discovers the dead body of Filippo Donati tethered underwater and flees the bay, naked and screaming. Before she can reach the cottage, her throat is slashed from behind with a billhook. Answering a knock at the door, Bobby has the same weapon slammed into his face. While Duke and Denise are making love in Ventura's bed, they are skewered by a tribal spear from their host's collection.

The Count's daughter, Renata, arrives at the bay with her husband Albert and their two children, expecting to inherit her stepmother's fortune and property, which includes the spectacularly scenic bay. She finds her chances complicated when the Fosattis inform her that Simon is actually Federica's illegitimate son. His direct bloodline makes him the rightful heir to her fortune and the bayside wilderness. The Donatis go directly to Simon and confront him about his patrimony. During their conversation, Renata notices movement under the sailcloth in Simon's boat and pulls it back, revealing her father's waterlogged corpse buried under a heap of squids. She is sickened by the sight, and Albert rushes with her to the nearest convenience—Ventura's cottage. As Albert goes for help, Renata looks for a place to vomit and discovers the mutilated bodies of the four teenagers artfully arranged in the bathtub. Ventura appears, holding an axe, and tries to attack Renata, but she shuts herself behind the bathroom door and then thrusts a scissors through its glass panel, stabbing Ventura in the groin. The Fosattis become aware of what's going on, and while trying to summon the police by telephone, Paolo is strangled with the phone cord by Albert, while Anna is decapitated upon discovering Ventura's bleeding body.

Laura arrives at Ventura's cottage and finds him badly wounded. He tells her to go to Simon's shack and fetch him back. Once she is there, Simon locks her inside and it is revealed that Laura seduced not only Simon, but also Filippo Donati to procure their signatures on deals with Ventura, granting him full development rights to the bay.

THE UNHAPPY Fosattis: Tarot-reading Anna (Laura Betti) smirks as husband Paolo (Leopoldo Trieste) admires his latest incect find.

She also persuaded Donati to procure his wife's diary, which Ventura knew contained a dated page that could be passed off as a suicide note, if Donati was to kill her on the anniversary of the day when it was written. Feeling used and betrayed, Simon moves threateningly toward Laura, who flings a boiling pot of water in his face. He grabs Laura and strangles her to death on the floor. Leaving his shack in a state of shock and heartsickness, Simon is abruptly speared to a wall by Albert, who is acting at his wife's encouragement—thus ridding themselves of the only other rightful heir to the property. Returning to Ventura's darkened cottage, Albert is attacked in the dark by a not-quite-dead Ventura, who finally dies in the scuffle.

Renata and Albert survive the massacre and plan to make a discreet escape, returning to the bay once they have been officially notified by the authorities . . . but in a final twist of fate, they are both shot dead by a double-barrelled rifle, which their two neglected children have mistaken for a toy.

The final score card: The Countess was hanged by her husband, the Count; the Count was stabbed by his stepson, Simon; the four teens were slaughtered in various ways by Ventura, whose property they invaded; Paolo was garotted by Albert; Anna was decapitated by Renata; Laura was strangled by Simon; Simon was impaled by Albert; Ventura was killed by Albert, after being stabbed by Renata; and Albert and Renata were shot by their two children with a double-barrelled shotgun—which leaves them to inherit the bay like two innocents given the keys to the Garden of Eden.

Cast

Bava felt that he had "a bit of luck" with the casting of Ecologia del delitto. Carried over from Roy Colt & Winchester Jack was formidable Isa Miranda as the Countess Federica, Bava may have been pulling his own variation on Hitchcock's Psycho stunt by casting her; to Italian audiences, Miranda was simply too big of an international star to be disposed of so quickly—literally within the film's first few minutes. Her role also makes an ironic comment on her starmaking performance in Max Ophuls' La signora del tutti (1934); here, too, she is "The Queen of Everything," owning the acreage which the film's other dozen characters so cravenly covet. Isa Miranda died on July 8, 1982, just a little over a year after the passing of her husband, writer–producer–director Alfredo Guarini.

The film's top-billed star, Claudine Auger was born Claudine Ogier in Marseilles, France, on April 26, 1941. She made her screen debut with two uncredited roles—one of them in Jean Cocteau's swan song Le Testament de Orphée/The Testament of Orpheus (1960)—and worked in mostly pulpy French and French/Italian co-productions until she won her most famous role, as Domino in Terence Young's 6 The diary, bound in red leather and framed in gilt, is identical to Isabella's diary in Sei donne per l'assassino/Blood and Black Lace, which launched its own set of murders.

James Bond blockbuster Thunderball (1965), working opposite Diabolik's Adolfo Celi. Predictably, this achievement was followed by a number of second-rank spy adventures trading on her "Bond Girl" celebrity, the best and most imaginative of which was Alain Jessua's Pop Art satire Jeu de Massacre/The Killing Game (1967). After Ecologia del delitto, Auger appeared in Paolo Cavara's superior giallo, La tarantola dal ventro nero/The Black Belly of the Tarantula (1972). Auger—who declined to be interviewed for this book, having no particular memories of the film today—is well-cast as Renata, a modern Lady Macbeth who pushes her husband onward to greater acts of violence in order to obtain the spoils she believes are her birthright. Coolly attractive, feline, and calculating, Auger brings a believable sense of authority and ambition to the latest of Bava's redheads.

"Of the actresses," Bava averred, "the one I liked best was Laura Betti, the singer. She may be an intimidating woman, as they say, but she is a true animal of the theater. She has an incredible presence, and she's acutely intelligent—and intelligence, as long as we are speaking frankly, does not exactly abound in the cinema. When she did a singing tour of Paris, André Breton declared that she was as fine a stylist as Rimbaud."[7]

As Anna Fosatti, another of Bava's intuitive female characters (and, by far, the most vulnerable of the lot), Betti looks like an art nouveau Medusa, her mask-like face wreathed in coils of black, serpentine hair, as her Tarot deck ironically reveals the Ace of Swords in the wake of the young lovers' impalement. At the moment she sees it, she says, "Death"—an actual misreading of the card, which traditionally heralds the coming of new ideas and motivations. Later, when she discovers Ventura's stabbed body and kneels beside it, she sees the murder weapon—a pair of bloody scissors—and a close-up of her eyes confirms that she has recognized the recurrent symbol and knows this to be her own moment of truth. She does not run or fight, as the other characters have done, but closes her eyes and serenely accepts her fate—which does not keep her waiting.

In the wake of Ecologia del delitto, Betti's film career continued to rise to even greater heights, including such classics of the contemporary Italian cinema as Pier Paolo Pasolini's I racconti di Canturbury/The Canterbury Tales (1971) and Bernardo Bertolucci's Ultimo tango a Parigi/Last Tango in Paris (1972). In 1973, she did the job done by Mercedes McCambridge in the United States and Jeanne Moreau in France: she provided the raspy voice of the demon-possessed Linda Blair in L'esorcista, the dubbed Italian version of William Friedkin's The Exorcist. After the murder of Pasolini in 1975, Betti became his literary executor and founded the Associazione Fondo P. P. Pasolini, an organization dedicated to the protection and preservation of his collected works. In 1976, she gave one of her most acclaimed performances as Donald Sutherland's frightening Fascist paramour in Bertolucci's Novecento/1900, which was followed by Ettore Scola's La Nuit de Varennes (1982). Despite a career studded with lofty achievements, Laura Betti remembered the two films she made with Mario Bava as some of the best times she ever had. She suffered a fatal heart attack while recovering from major surgery on July 31, 2004—what would have been Mario Bava's 90th birthday.

DETAIL from the Italian promotional brochure: Brunhilda (Brigitte Skay) arrives at Frank Ventura's cottage, while Ventura admires Laura's figure.

Luigi "Gigi" Pistilli—born July 19, 1929, in Grosetto—plays Renata's weak-willed husband, Albert. His first notable screen appearance was as an incidental gunman in Sergio Leone's seminal Spaghetti Western Per qualche dollaro in più/For a Few Dollars More (1965, in which he was the last of Indio's men to be killed). He continued to specialize in the genre throughout the 1960s, dabbling in gialli like Romolo Guerrieri's Il dolce corpo di Deborah/The Sweet Body of Deborah (1968) and Riccardo Freda's L'iguana dalle lingua di fioco/The Iguana With the Tongue of Fire (1971). Reportedly distraught over the death of his wife, Pistilli committed suicide in Milan on April 21, 1996.

Like Pistilli, Leopoldo Trieste had previously worked for producer Giuseppe Zaccariello in Elio Petri's Il chiascuno del suo/We Still Kill the Old Way (1967). Born May 3, 1917, in Reggio Calabria, Trieste was one of Italy's most beloved character actors and creative spirits. He had worked previously with Bava when he served as cinematographer of Città di notte, which Trieste wrote and directed. Trieste complemented his writing and directing careers with work as a character actor in such international coproductions as his friend Federico Fellini's Lo sciecco bianco/The White Sheik (1951) and I vitelloni (1953), Vittorio De Sica's A Farewell to Arms (1957), Nicolas Roeg's Don't Look Now (1973), Francis Ford Coppola's The Godfather Part II (1974), and Tinto Brass' notorious Caligula (1979). Delightful in Ecologia del delitto as the fretful and obsessive Paolo Fosatti—a character based on Roberto Omegna, Eugenio Bava's scientific colleague at the Istituto LUCE—Trieste manages to be simultaneously dour and ebullient as one of the film's many unambitious males bullied by a stronger female will. Aged 85, Trieste succumbed to a heart attack on January 25, 2003, at his home in Rome.

The film's most intense performance is given by Claudio Volonté, who plays the Countess' illegitimate son, Simon. The younger brother of Italian actor Gian Maria Volonté (best-known in America as Indio in Sergio Leone's For a Few Dollars More), Claudio had been working on stage and in films—including Antonio Margheriti's rarely seen Contronatura/The Unnaturals (1968)—under the name "Claudio Camaso" since the mid-1960s. Ecologia del delitto marked his apparently reluctant debut under his own name. Bava singled out Volonté for special praise, describing him as "a talented actor in the Japanese style. To me, he's even better than his brother; he attacks his performances with a certain savagery."[8]

Volonté appeared in only a few subsequent films, including Lina Wertmuller's Tutto a posto e niente in ordine/All Screwed Up (1973) and Giuseppe Ferrara's Faccia di spia (1975), in which he played Che Guevara—before personal problems began to get in the way of his career. Though more specific documentation has eluded my research, various interviewees told me that Volonté became a heroin addict in later years, was arrested and convicted of murder after stabbing a man to death in a robbery attempt, and committed suicide in 1977, while in prison.

Chris Avram, who plays the scheming architect Frank Ventura,[9] was born Cristea Avram on August 28, 1931, in Bucharest, Romania. Active in Romanian films since 1960, the course of his life changed when a French co-production—Henri Colpi's Mona, l'etoile sans nom (1965)—came to be shot in Bucharest. He was cast as the lover of leading actress Marina Vlady, and their relationship reportedly blossomed offscreen as well. Vlady arranged for him to leave Romania with her when the filming ended, and in 1968, they appeared together in Bernard Paul's Le temps de vivre/Time to Live, which was followed by a stand-alone role for Avram in Jean Aurel's Manon 70, opposite Catherine Deneuve and Jean-Claude Brialy. A handsome, rugged type with a cleft chin, Avram reportedly augmented his screen career by appearing in fotoromanzi. Though only 40 at the time he made Ecologia del delitto, Avram was already graying and, though still good-looking, could have passed for a man ten years older. His later work fell largely within the softcore category, including L'ossessa/The Sexorcist (1974, which paired him again with Luigi Pistilli) and Joe D'Amato's Emanuelle a Bangkok/Emanuelle in Bangkok (1977). He died on January 10, 1989, at age 57.

A SHOCKING discovery awaits Renata (Claudine Auger) and Albert (Luigi Pistilli) as they interrogate Simon (Claudio Volonté).

Almost nothing is known about Anna Maria Rosati, who plays Ventura's lover/secretary, Laura, except that her filmography includes only one other picture: Sergio Bergonzelli's Silvia e l'amore ("Sylvia and Love," 1968). Though not a very expressive actress, when Rosati re-enters the narrative late in the picture, looking quite voluptuous in her completely white and form-fitting ensemble, her presence amid the otherwise furtive mise-en-scène of dark shadows and bold primary colors is striking.

Brigitte Skay, once again removing her clothes as Brunhilda, had previously worked nude for Bava in Four Times That Night. Since that association, she had starred as the eponymous heroine of Bruno Corbucci's Isabella duchessa dei diavoli/Ms. Stilletto (1969, based on the S&M comic strip by Alessandro Angiolini), and in Homo eroticus/Man of the Year (1971). Footage of her and actor Brad Harris, shot for the Three Stars production Quando suona la compana/When the Bell Rings, inexplicably ended up in Luigi Batzella's La bestia in calore/SS Hell Camp (1977). Skay also recorded a pop single in Germany, "Ich so Sexy bin" b/w "Fritz." Her film career began to falter after her boyfriend Ugo Pirro persuaded her to fire her agent, in an effort to help her move up and out of exploitation movies. One more picture followed, Sergio Gobbi's L'Enfant de la Nuit (1978), which turned out to be her last. In the early 1990s, one of Skay's legs was severely damaged in an automobile accident, which now makes it difficult for her to walk. She lives today in Ariccia, Italy, with two beloved stuffed animals—Heidegunde the sheep and a Teddy bear named Arturo—and earns her living as an artist, creating portraits in fabric.

7 Volta.

8 Ibid.

9 Ventura is the first of a couple of architect characters to appear in Bava's filmography—along with Karl Hummel in his next picture, Baron Blood. The references to this occupation may reflect that Bava's daughter Elena became an architect.

Denise (or Thérèse), the other young woman in the "teenage" group—who manages to keep her face averted from camera for nearly all of her screen time—was played by a young actress billed as Paola Rubens. Rubens was, in fact, a Venice-born nude photographic model named Paola Montenero and Ecologia del delitto was her first movie appearance. In later years, sporting much shorter hair of a darker color, she specialized in hardcore erotic films, including Alberto Cavallone's coprophagic Spell-dolce mattatoio a.k.a. L'uomo, la donna, la bestia (1977), Franco Rosetti's Il mondo porno di due sorella/Emanuelle and Joanna (1979), Dolce gola/Sweet Throat (1980, directed by Lorenzo Onorato as "Lawrence Webber"), and two for Bruno Mattei: La vera storia della monaca di Monza and the horror film L'altro inferno/The Other Hell (both 1980). The former wife of the late director Massimo Pirri—who directed her in Calamo (1975), and later wrote and directed the autobiographical Eroina/Fatal Fix (1983, featuring Bava alumni Giorgio Ardisson and William Berger)—Montenero's career was derailed in the early 1980s by drug addiction and a number of arrests for heroin possession.

Roberto Bonnani, cast as Duke (or Luca), the cruder but more experienced of the two young men, previously appeared in Elio Petri's Indagine su un cittàdino al di sopra di ogni sospetto/Investigation of a Citizen Above Suspicion (1970) and Tito Schipa Jr.'s Orfeo 9 (1970, the first Italian rock musical). He continues to be active in films, and was featured in the Billy Crystal romantic comedy Forget Paris (1995). Additional feature credits for Giovanni Nuvoletti and Guido Boccaccini don't appear to exist.

The red-haired daughter of Renata and Albert—one of the film's two survivors—was played by Nicoletta Elmi, who was born in 1966. "I made my horror film debut when I was 6 years old, and I was lucky enough to start with the very best," Elmi told Loris Curci in 1996. "I have never seen the film—can you imagine that? My parents were not at all concerned about their little kid committing murder in films . . . I don't remember Mario at all—I was too small back then—but I am told that Ecologia del delitto inspired a lot of American horror films, which, alas, I'll probably never get to see."[10]

Bava was evidently charmed by piccola Nicoletta, as he cast her again in his next film, Baron Blood (1972), as the youngest of his intuitive female characters. Elmi went on to play darkly mischievous or malevolent children in Paul Morrissey's Flesh for Frankenstein/Andy Warhol's Frankenstein (1973, in second unit scenes directed by Antonio Margheriti), Massimo Dallamano's Il medaglione insanguinato/The Cursed Medallion (1975), and Dario Argento's Profondo rosso/Deep Red (1975). After a ten-year disappearance from the screen, she returned as the forbidding yet foxy theater attendant in Lamberto Bava's Demoni/Demons (1985). She works today as a children's dentist in Bologna.

Nicoletta's brother was played by Renato Cestiè, a blonde, freckle-faced boy who would later become known as "the Italian Donny Osmond" during his adolescent years. Born in Rome on January 11, 1963, Cestiè made his first screen appearance in Ecologia del delitto, which was just the beginning of a very busy year in films, including Maurizio Lucidi's Bud Spencer Western Si può fare . . . amigo/The Big and the Bad, Sergio Sollima's Il diavolo nel cervello, the Dario Argento-scripted Così sia su, and still other theatrical and television films in 1972. In 1974, he was featured in Lucio Fulci's Il ritorno di Zanna Bianca/Challenge to White Fang and Joe D'Amato's Giubbe rosse/Red Coat. Cestiè had one of his last important roles in Ugo Liberatore's giallo, Nero venezia/Damned in Venice (1977), which roughly coincided with the time Mario Bava approached him with another project, which will be discussed later. Coincidentally, Cestiè and Nicoletta Elmi appeared together again on the popular Italian TV series I ragazzi della Terza C ("The Boys of Third C"—meaning the "C" section of the third and final year of high school), which ran for three seasons from 1987 till 1989. Today, Cestiè is retired from acting and manages a Roman gymnasium.

Production

The film went before the cameras in early 1971 under the Così imparano a fare i cattivi title, but it did not hold for long. Brigitte Skay remembers that the title on the clapboard at the time of her scenes was "La baia d'argento" ("The Bay of Silver," as in money), an ironic title which would have underlined the script's parable of greed, while also cleverly co-opting the name of Bava's chief rival for Italy's Horror crown. Certainly, had the film retained this title at the boxoffice, critics would have been quick to infer that the film's exaggerated acts of violence were meant to spoof Argento's increasingly graphic thrillers. But ultimately, Bava did not wish to remind his audience of the competition, so the title was changed once again, at Giuseppe Zaccariello's suggestion, to Ecologia del delitto. Filippo Ottoni found the title pretentious and opportunistic, seizing upon a word ("ecology") that was fashionable at the time, but it does have a reasoning behind it. "The Ecology of Murder" is the process by which nature preserves itself against the greed of men. It is, or so this story would have it, human nature.

TIMID BOBBY (Guido Boccaccini) tries to temper Brunhilda's exuberance on Ventura's pool slide.

MEXICAN lobby card pictures Brunhilda's discovery of Filippo Donati's waterlogged body—and cannibalizes US promotional art for THE NIGHT EVELYN CAME OUT OF THE GRAVE (upper right corner).

Clearly, the genius of Ecologia del delitto was its hyperbolic extension of the body counts of Sei donne per l'assassino and 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto to darkly comic extremes. One also imagines that Bava was implicitly aware that this story of mercenary cutthroats vying for control of a scenic property was a metaphor for his own relationship to the rapidly changing modern cinema. As this film amply demonstrates with its depictions of graphic violence and frontal nudity, Bava was capable of bending to the commercial demands of the day but, in return, it was necessary that he be allowed to continue expressing himself as an artist, in relative privacy and with complete autonomy. A character like Frank Ventura is not so different to the new breed of unimaginative moneymen then (as now) invading the movie business, for whom money was the sole standard of quality, and who, by raising budgets and exacting rigid control, were making it harder than ever for artisans like Bava to work in the craftsmanlike ways to which they were accustomed. Though Bava would surely have fought against such an "intellectual" interpretation, the bay—literally, a picturesque view—does offer a metaphor for cinema, a cinema poised on the verge of extinction, under siege by hatchet men.

Such times made Bava immensely grateful to Giuseppe Zaccariello. "Sometimes, I've had to work with impossible producers who wanted to meddle in everything," Bava told Ornella Volta. "There have been times when I've found myself standing in the basement, like a sleepwalker, without remembering how I got there, feeling around for a heavy stick or club to brain my producer . . . but, I must say, Giuseppe Zaccariello was extremely brave. He put up the money for this film without any certainty that it would find a distributor. He risked everything that he had." [11]

Bava seemed sincerely appreciative of whatever risks Zaccariello had taken, and made a point of expressing his gratitude publicly—and yet, according to Laura Betti, Zaccariello was hardly the prince Bava portrayed, having abandoned the production before it was completed. "The films I made with Bava were very cheap," she confessed, "and we worked for very, very strange producers. The producer of our second one—Zaccariello—left while we were still shooting, just disappeared, taking the money and everything, but somehow, Bava managed to finish the picture." [12]

Betti maintained that, despite the highly professional quality of the cast and the luster of its visuals, Ecologia del delitto was made with little more than spit, chewing gum, and Bava's own inexhaustible ingenuity. "If Bava had wanted a dolly on that second film, nobody would have given it to him," she said. "So he would figure out ways to 'have' a dolly without having one." The film contains some shaky handheld shots, but only when they are meant to illustrate a stalker's point of view. Elsewhere, the photography is as steady and elegant as you'll find anywhere else in the Bava canon—and it was all captured with no more extravagant means than a tripod and a child's wagon. Once again, the actors had to get items from their own wardrobe approved for the filming, and attentive viewers may notice some recycled props from earlier Bava films on the sets. For instance, the glass balls that bounced downstairs and rolled into the sunken bath where Jill Stark (Edith Meloni) committed suicide in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto can be seen here as a decorative item in Laura's bedroom after her tryst with Ventura.

Bava's good feeling about the picture may have been partly rooted in the fact that its budgetary constraints required that he once again act as his own cameraman, which he had not done since La ragazza che sapeva troppo—with the exception of the Spanish shooting schedule of Il rosso segno della follia. He no doubt felt guilty about not being able to include Antonio Rinaldi in the project, but his guilt was tempered with joy because the results showed him in renewed command of his neglected art. "I'm very enthusiastic about some of the film's photographic details," he later boasted. "For example, the slightly out-of-focus shot in which the screen appears to be filled by the sun but, as the image comes into focus, is revealed 10 Loris Curci, "Child of Horror," Fangoria 150, March 1996, 15. Translation revised slightly to improve readability.

11 Ibid.

12 When Ecologia del delitto was released on DVD in America in the 1990s, in a print bearing the export title Bay of Blood, it carried a 1971 copyright notice by Spectacular Films Co., Ltd., which was a company owned by Bava's Four Times That Night producer Dick Randall. With this in mind, it is possible that Randall stepped in the bail the film out, in exchange for certain distribution rights.

AN UNIDENTIFIED stand-in tests the original, abandoned makeup rig designed by Carlo Rambaldi for the death of Brunhilda.

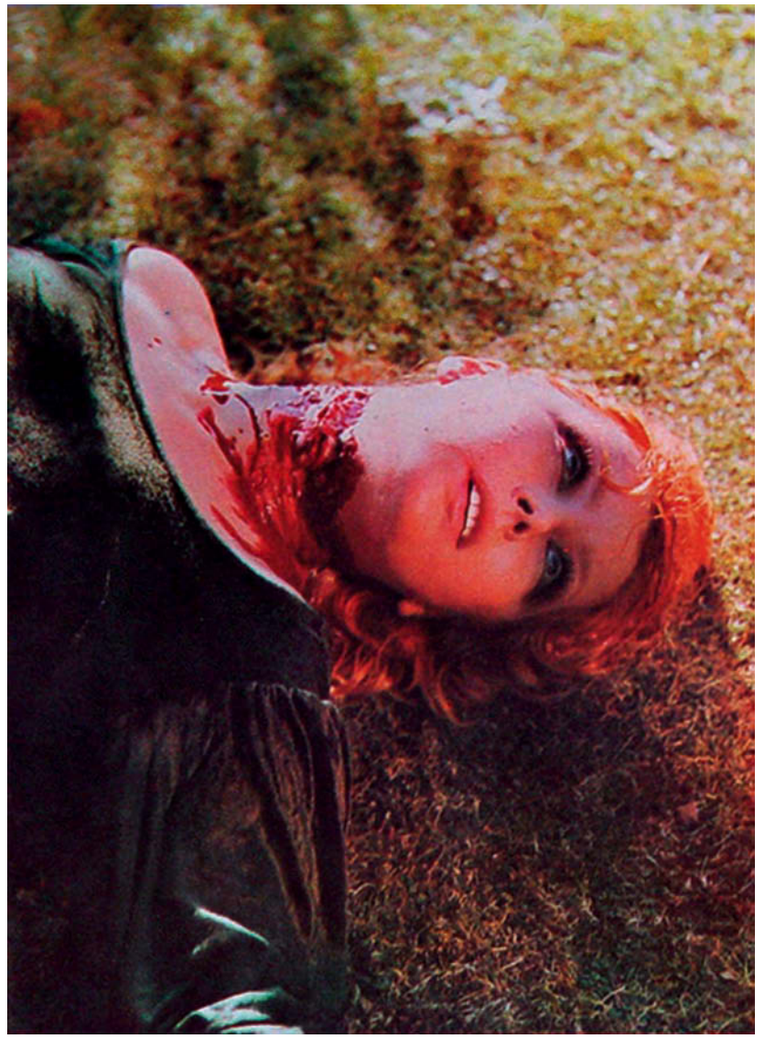
as someone's peering eye." [13] Bava also used the opportunity of shooting this film to begin experimenting with the more languid, searching, elliptic style that was to characterize his final period, pivoting most of the film's edits on shots that lose focus, and then regain it on the other side of the cut.

Some of the interiors, such as the opening scene of Countess Federica being murdered, were shot at Villa Frascati. The scenes by the bay were filmed in Sabaudia, a beachside village on the Tyrrhenean Sea about fifty miles southeast of Rome. The interiors of Ventura's home were filmed in a pied à terre at Sabaudia owned by the producer.

"There were times that I absolutely couldn't continue to act, we were laughing so much," Betti chuckles, still tickled by the memory. "The script was set in the wild—and we needed a real forest, with lots of woods and lots of trees—but in fact, we were at the seaside because Zaccariello didn't have any money. But since he had a house that we could use in Sabaudia, that's where we went to see if we could find some sort of a forest! But there was no forest! Not even trees! Gigi Pistilli was supposed to walk in front of me, and we were supposed to run through this forest, very scared that somebody might want to kill us. And, at a certain moment, when we stood in front of the camera, we were supposed to stop and stare at each other in a devious sort of way. All of this had to occur in the middle of a forest! But where was it? Bava said, 'Don't worry, I will do the forest.' And he found a florist who was selling these little, stupid branches with bits of foliage on them, and he began to make them dance in front of the action—and we had to act terrified standing strictly in front of those branches—if we moved even an inch either way, the 'woods' would disappear! Oh, we couldn't stop laughing—and Mario was laughing, too! Everyone was laughing! And, on the screen, when you see it . . . it is a real forest!"

The appearances of Paolo Fossatti's little friend Ferdinando, the black beetle, also entailed some special effects trickery. For the Fossattis' scene with Renata and Albert, in which Paolo babbles embarrassing endearments to the bug, contained in a tiny clear plastic box, a fake beetle was moved from side to side by means of a slender filament secreted under the bandage on actor Leopoldo Trieste's hand. While on the subject of Ferdinando, Ecologia del delitto contained one shot that caused Mario Bava considerable distress: the pinning of the beetle—a significant shot in that it echoes the earlier shot of Duke and Denise impaled in bed. The man at the helm of this riotous procession of homicides had such a profound respect for all forms of life that he later confessed to being unable to sleep the entire night before filming the shot. By looking at the shot closely, we can see that Bava's sleeplessness ultimately resulted in life winning out over art; the beetle is not pinned straight through, but on its side—and just enough to hold it in place—with the angle of its body in relation to the camera selling the lie.



In charge of the film's splashy special effects was Carlo Rambaldi (credited simply as "Rambaldi," but only on Italian prints), whose innovative work on this picture would patent the way gore effects would be filmed for decades to come. Rambaldi supervised the construction of various wax effigies of the throats, necks, and backs of Anna, Brunhilda, and Denise, each rigged to expulse brightly colored blood during their respective violations. These pieces are primitive by contemporary standards but are given punch by Carlo Reali's superior editing. A superb wax head of Giovanni Nuvoletti was also sculpted for the nauseating shot of squid slimily undulating over Donati's dead face. Perhaps the most successful of the explicit makeup effects is the killing of Bobby, as actor Guido Boccaccini is bluntly slammed in the face with Simon's billhook. Boccaccini can be seen blinking "through" the blade itself, making the effect all the more excruciating, before the weapon is wrested out of the bleeding fissure in tight close-up. Naturally, the moment of impact involved nothing more than a smart edit, from which one is distracted by a sickening sound effect, revealing the mechanized prosthetic; the final shot was achieved by conforming a prop blade perfectly to Bonnani's profile, with a small concave area that matched his eye, allowing him to blink, which was then built up with a deep, putty trench down the middle of his face. When removed, the precut blade, which conformed to Boccaccini's profile, was pulled swiftly out of frame.

Each of the film's death scenes is imaginatively staged, but the murder of Brunhilda—arguably the highlight of the film—involved a greater degree of preparation than the others. As the scene was originally conceived, the killer was supposed to literally slash the dress from Brunhilda's body and then continue slashing away at her bared skin. Carlo Rambaldi designed a false torso front that would split along a pre-scored area, allowing blood to flow from the character's exposed breasts. Test photos exist, utilizing a stand-in, but the concept was scrapped before it went in front of the cameras.

Brigitte Skay reminisces about her involvement in the picture she calls Reazione a catena: "They auditioned a lot of girls, but when Mario Bava saw me, he said he wanted me. He told me I should always wear green, so I wore a little green dress in Reazione a catena, which I bought at Oxford Street, London. At the time of the shooting, some people gossipped that I was having an affair with Mario—not true! Both times I worked with Mario there was difficulty in communicating because I could only speak in German and English. Lucia Magni was the interpreter on set; she now owns a restaurant with her husband Lucio. I did the whole scene by myself. It took all afternoon to shoot. I remember they covered my body in ox fat and made me drink lots of vodka before I went swimming in the sea. I was swimming naked—absolutely bloody freezing!—and there was Mario Bava, in a big sheepskin jacket watching me swim. Mario did not like to see me completely naked. In all of my films, I'm always a little bit nude—it never worried me. Mario wanted to always shoot me from behind [or from the side], so you would not see everything . . . When they are cutting my throat, I did the scene myself. I think the end result is very horrible, but I look beautiful in the film. Isabella duchessa dei diavoli is my favorite film, but [my second favorite] is Reazione a catena. When I watch it, I can see that Mario Bava really knew how to film me. He made me look beautiful. I remember they covered my neck in wax—it took a long time for them to cut my throat! The filming took a long time—they kept on putting more wax on, and cutting my throat again and again. I think, originally, I was meant to be nude for the scene and I think they shot one [take] of me naked, from behind, as I am running away. The man who made the special effects [Carlo Rambaldi] . . . I didn't know he was so famous, but now I know he made E.T., which is one of my favorite films, so that makes me very happy!"

BRIGITTE SKAY in a sequence of still photos documenting Brunhilda's death scene.

Music

Ecologia del delitto was the first of three Bava films scored by Roman composer Stelvio Cipriani. Born August 20, 1937, in Rome, Cipriani wrote his first movie music for Eugenio Martin's El precio de un hombre/The Bounty Killer (1966), a Spanish/Italian Western starring Tomas Milian. He continued to work within that genre for a few years, until his happy affiliation with Tony Anthony on Un uomo, un cavallo, una pistola/The Stranger Returns (1968) rewarded him with an opportunity to transcend genre. Anthony used Cipriani again when he decided to star in a contemporary erotic drama, Cometogether (1971), which was produced by Allen Klein's Abkco Enterprises. The Klein connection enabled Cipriani's first soundtrack release to become one of the first albums issued on The Beatles' new Apple label. Cometogether was quickly followed by Femina ridens/The Laughing Woman (1969), directed by Piero Schivazappa and produced by Giuseppe Zaccariello, a dazzling sadomasochistic tale of abduction for which Cipriani composed one of his most memorable scores. This outstanding work surely resulted in Cipriani getting another THÉRÈSE and Luca (Denise and Duke in the English version) are joined as one flesh by a spear from Ventura's collection.

13 Volta.

BOBBY meets his maker.

call from Zaccariello to score Ecologia del delitto, though by this time the composer had also written two giallo scores for Riccardo Freda: L'iguana dalla lingua di fuoco/The Iguana With the Tongue of Fire (1971) and Estratto dagli archivi segreti della polizia di una capitale europea/Tragic Ceremony in Villa Alexander (1972).

Like his predecessor Piero Umiliani, Cipriani was greatly influenced by jazz and samba music, but unlike Umiliani, his influences were a bit more catholic, encompassing everything from classical music to psychedelic rock and tribal music. Several commentators have noted the resemblance of one of Ecologia del delitto's cues (the one heard on the radio as Brunhilda dances) to Iron Butterfly's1968 Top 40 hit "In-a-Gadda-da-Vida." While Umiliani's best music tends toward the bizarre and humorous, Cipriani's music covers a broader range; it is primarily exotic and romantic, but it can also be strange, druggy and cacophonic, punctuated with tribal percussion, surges of atonality, and stabs of fuzz-toned electric guitar. The music for Ecologia del delitto was composed at roughly the same time that Cipriani was scoring another horror film, José Larraz' Deviation (1971), an Italian/Spanish/British co-production that makes interesting comparative viewing with the Bava film, because both were edited by Carlo Reali and their scores are very similar. One imagines that the two scores grew out of the same studio sessions.

Ecologia's main titles theme is a tense yet sensual and evocative piece, opening with isolated congas, woodblock percussion, and guiro scrapings, all recorded with slight echo, which are leisurely gathered together by electric bass underpinnings and an eerie influx of swirling strings, before an electric piano enters to state the theme. An electric guitar is also added, played percussively rather than chordally, adding a limber choppiness to the music which paints an inviting aural impression of rippling waters. As the theme continues, the percussion becomes increasingly turbulent, while the theme gains added support from organ, flute, and alto saxophone.

RENATA discovers an artful arrangement of dead bodies in Ventura's bathroom.

The Countess' theme, heard as Countess Federica wheels herself through her lonely abode on a stormy night, begins as an elegant, stately solo piano piece, which extends gradually into orchestral bathos, with increasingly fervent, overwrought string and kettledrum accompaniment, as well as alto sax coloring. The music ascends to a fever pitch, and climaxes with a cymbal crash, as her neck is looped with a noose out of nowhere. The piece is touchingly reprised in the gruesome aftermath of Simon's murder, lending an otherwise repulsive scene a startling infusion of spirituality while relating the deaths of mother and son.

Another theme, which tends to accompany views of the bay, is a wistful piece, with flute played over piano and muted strings. Like a metaphor for how human greed can complicate such beautiful simplicity, the cue's early serenity builds to complex involutions in the middle eight, which enrich and darken the theme.

The film's revelations of death—such as the discovery of the corpse in the bay—are usually underlined with stings of electric guitar, electric bass, and rolling conga, Brunhilda's run for her life is a highly percussive piece, with choppy jagged piano and an increasingly icy swirls of Hammond organ. The music comes to a full stop with her death, allowing some natural birdsong to register in the wake of the violence, and gradually a reprise of the romantic bay theme is heard. The cheerful end titles, which features the score's only use of a vocal chorus ("Sha-la, la-la"), was later reused in a sex scene between Paul Naschy and Erika Blanc in León Klimovsky's Una Libélula para cada muerto/A Dragonfly for Each Corpse (1973), whose CAM library score is credited to Angel Arteaga.

After Ecologia del delitto, Stelvio Cipriani would score two more films for Mario Bava—Baron Blood and the unfinished Cani arrabbiati—but, according to Alfredo Leone, Cipriani was not one of Bava's favorite composers. "When I hired Cipriani to write the score for Baron Blood, Bava was opposed to it, saying that his work was unoriginal," Leone says candidly. While one of its cues quotes "In-a-Gadda-da-Vida," and the structuring of another cue suggests that its scene may have been temp-tracked to one of Ennio Morricone's C'era una volta il West/Once Upon a Time in the West cues, the bulk of Cipriani's music for Ecologia del delitto is exactly what the movie needs, encompassing the full range of the beauty and brutality of nature. Though it is ill-served by the film's final sound mix, which causes it some distortion and break-up whenever its sound is fullest, it is the best score Cipriani would write for Bava, and one of the most effective scores Bava ever had.

Cipriani continued to work prolifically throughout the next three decades, eventually providing scores for most of the prominent horror directors in Italy. Among his subsequent accomplishments were the scores for the British film Night Hair Child/What the Peeper Saw (1971, a film with strong narrative similarities to Bava's later Schock/Beyond the Door II), La polizia chiede aiuto/What Have They Done to Your Daughters? (1974), Massimo Dallamano's Il medaglione insanguinato/The Cursed Medallion (1975), Frankenstein all'italiana/Frankenstein: Italian Style (1977), Tentacoli/Tentacles (1977), Solamente nero/The Bloodstained Shadow (1978, a rock score performed by Goblin), Ruggero Deodato's Concorde Affaire '79 (1979), Joe D'Amato's Orgasmo nero/Voodoo Baby (1980), Umberto Lenzi's Incubo sulla città contaminata/City of the Walking Dead (1980), James Cameron's debut feature, Piranha II: The Spawning (1981), and Lucio Fulci's Aenigma (1987) and Voci dal profondo/Voices From Beyond (1990). In 1992, he scored the Ovidio G. Assonitis film Out of Control under the pseudonym "Steve Powder," and most recently, he came out of retirement to write a new score for Alfredo Leone and Lamberto Bava's controversial recut of Cani arrabbiati, Kidnapped (2002).

ALBERT prevents Paolo from summoning the police.

Release

Nuova Linea Cinematografica first released Ecologia del delitto in Italy in early September, but it attracted little boxoffice excitement and soon folded. A month later, it played at the Sitges Horror Festival, held at the Cine Retiro in Sitges, Spain, under the short-lived title Antefatto—l'ecologia del delitto ("Before the Fact—The Ecology of Crime"). [14] An uncredited Variety reviewer caught its October 10 screening and seemed somewhat enthusiastic: "Mario Bava's newest blood-and-gore thriller should titillate horror buffs appreciative of new filmic techniques for mayhem. Using a minimal storyline, Bava unspools a welter of murders which are committed in an isolated country house. Though the motivations are murky and the killings gratuitous, the blood flows with curdling realism . . . Between killings, however, dialogue falters and the non-existent storyline makes for some slow pacing. But before we can become bored, Bava comes up with new ploys for violence and thus, till the final, unsatisfactory denouement . . . Bava's technique is effective enough in the scenes of violence, though the remainder of pic is pedestrian. Acting is stiff and one-dimensional, but this is of minor consequence in a pic relying wholly on stomach-churning horror effects . . . Pic should do well as a double-bill horror filler." [15]

ADVERTISEMENT that appeared in the May 7, 1972 edition of the Boston Sunday Globe.

With the film dependent on foreign sales to recoup its investment, Mario Bava was moved to the unprecedented extent of promoting it by consenting to be interviewed for the distinguished French film journal Positif. Conducted by Ornella Volta, and subsequently reprinted (in abbreviated form) in the Spanish horror fan magazine Terror Fantastic, it would be the longest, only career-length interview that Bava ever granted, not counting the memoir he would later pen—reportedly under duress and at the last possible minute—for the 1979 Cinecittà tributary book, La città del cinema.

Bava's film somehow came to the attention of Steve Minasian, whose Boston-based company Hallmark Releasing Corporation had a US distribution deal with American International Pictures, which enabled AIP to benefit financially from films they considered too violent, adult or crassly exploitative to carry their own imprint. Hallmark's first release had been the notorious Mark of the Devil/Hexen bis aufs Blut Gequaelt ("Witches Tortured Till They Bleed," 1969), a German production co-directed by British film critic Michael Armstrong and German actor–singer Adrian Hoven. An excessively gory account of witch hunts in 18th century Austria, the movie made headlines as the first picture to be released outside the sanctions of the Motion Picture Association of America's ratings system since its inception in 1968. Taking advantage of the MPAA's loophole that no producer was obliged to submit a film for a rating, Hallmark promoted Mark of the Devil as "The 1st Film Rated V for Violence!"—and further emphasized the nature of the film by presenting ticket-buyers with complimentary "vomit bags."

Minasian acquired the US distribution rights to Ecologia del delitto, which by this time became available in an English-dubbed export version called Carnage—a title perhaps informed by the film's roots in Bava and Betti's aborted Odore di carne project. On Tuesday, May 9, 1972, Hallmark booked the film at Boston's Astor Theater for an all-day "Free Public Preview," and placed newspaper ads that put Bava's name (misspelled) above the title and ballyhooed the picture as "The 2nd Film Rated V for Violence!" Large display ads were placed in the Boston Sunday Globe two days in advance of the booking, announcing that "Carnage is the real thing—the first movie that dares to show—'Hard Core Violence.'"

The appearance of this second "V for Violence" campaign (and the resounding success of the first) prompted the MPAA to bring suit against Hallmark, alleging that the company's advertising intruded on their exclusive right to rate motion pictures. After a brief stand-off, Hallmark relented and agreed to never use the campaign again. In the meantime, Carnage was temporarily withdrawn from release. (The MPAA subsequently fine-tuned their rules to state that, while no producer was obliged to submit a film to the MPAA for rating, any film not submitted must carry either a self-imposed X rating—"No One Under 17 Admitted"—or no rating at all.)

By November 29, Bava's film reappeared under the Hallmark banner with an outrageous new title—Twitch of the Death Nerve—and a new gimmick . . . or, more accurately, a refurbished old one, as it was somewhat indebted to the "Coward's Corner" conceived by William Castle for the release of his 1961 shocker Homicidal. Newspaper ads for Twitch announced that "Every Ticket Holder Must Pass Through The Final Warning Station! We Must Warn You Face-to-Face!" The Final Warning Station was a two-color flyer (optional) passed out to ticket buyers, which brought to their attention the following five points:

> Are you aware that Twitch of the Death Nerve contains scenes which may be the stimulus that initiates physiological shock?
>
> Persons under 16 should be warned that they May Not walk away from this one! [16] Young ladies 17 through 19 should be escorted.
>
> During scenes of intense shock, do not attempt to leave your seat. If necessary, close your eyes but remain seated until you have regained your composure.
>
> You should understand that all pictorial materials used in advertising this motion picture have been toned down to meet generally accepted standards. The Illustrations Are Not Indicative of the Stronger Portions of the Film.
>
> There are 13 Periods of Intense Shock. Do Not Subject Yourself to More Than One Strong Reaction.

The Final Warning Station bore the copyright of a fictitious outfit called A/C Audience Control Services, apparently specialists in suppressing theater patron shock by means of exciting incipient audience hysteria.

On the basis of the print advertising for Twitch of the Death Nerve, one might assume that a sample print was drastically cut and resubmitted to the MPAA until it was granted an R rating, forbidding admission to persons under the age of 17, unless accompanied by a parent or adult guardian. But, as anyone who attended drive-in showings of Hallmark films will attest, their actual release prints were often intact and full of X-level material (frontal nudity, sexual violence), leading to various reports of traffic accidents as drivers were distracted from oncoming headlights by adjacent drive-in screen images of teenagers being skewered while making love and naked witches being vaginally impaled on tall, phallic stakes. After a period of controversy, it was left up to drive-in projectionists to edit Hallmark's 35 mm prints themselves, depending on whether or not their screens faced the open road. Wes Craven, whose film The Last House on the Left was released by Hallmark the following year (1972), has confessed in interviews that, after several unsuccessful attempts to deal with the MPAA, his film was finally distributed with an R rating that was cut out of another movie's negative (borrowed from a distributor with offices down the hall from Hallmark) and spliced onto his own! [17]

US one-sheet poster.

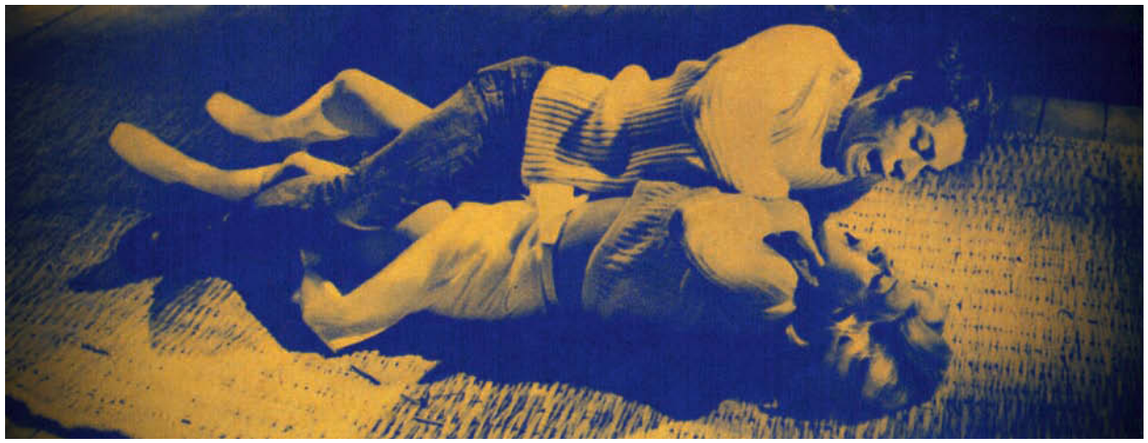
Twitch of the Death Nerve became a Hallmark perennial, and remained in circulation until the prints became so worn, so scratchy, splicy, and incomplete that they probably could have earned an R rating. At some point, Hallmark seems to have tried to beef up the substance of their depleted prints by adding silent, tinted "recap" footage.

"I saw an alternative version of [Twitch] at the drive-in around 1972," reports film journalist Robert Monell. "[It] had 'added scenes' tinted in red (!) . . . These were reprises of murders which had already happened. I have no idea who prepared this version and never saw it again. It was like the reprises in Slaughter Hotel, which was its co-feature. There was at least one scene missing—the machete in the face—and there were other trims. To add insult to injury, these reprises were silent except for an electronic buzz. These loops went on forever, it seemed, and caused quite a bit of horn beeping and guys screaming out of [their car] windows, 'Lousy movie!' You had to be there. I reviewed it for a local weekly newspaper. I timed it, as I did all my review material, with a stopwatch, and took notes on cards which I still have. The entertainment editor heard about this fiasco from a friend, who was [also] at the drive-in, and canned the review as I tried to explain to him who Mario Bava was. If you have twelve of these reprises (and it was at least that many) at 30 seconds a piece, that could add on another 6 minutes. I remember the manager calling this a 'franchise print,' which meant it was not [obtained] from the producer or distributor, but rather from the owners of the circuit who probably had a special version made. It looked incredibly botched and crude, as did many Euro and US low-budget drive-in prints at the time. I doubt if this was ever seen anywhere outside of regional Drive-in Land." [18] At some point during the film's prolonged US distribution, probably around 1977, Hallmark's ragged prints were picked up by Newport



14 "Before the Fact" may seem an odd title for a thriller, but in fact, it was the title of the 1932 novel (by Francis Iles, a pseudonym for Anthony Berkeley) that provided the basis of Alfred Hitchcock's classic 1941 film Suspicion.

15 Anonymous: "Antefatto (Before the Fact—The Ecology of a Crime)" review, Variety Film Annual, October 27, 1971. Also screened at Sitges that year were Kim Kay Yong's Fire Woman, José Luís Madrid's Jack el Destripador de Londres, Eugenio Martín's Escalofrio Diabolico, José Maria Elorrieta's Los Amantes del Diablo, and Michael Skaife's Necrophagus/Graveyard of Horror.

16 This warning implies that patrons under the age of 16 would be admitted, regardless of the fact that it was an unrated picture and thus legally forbidden to anyone under the age of 17.

17 Craven tells this story in one of the on-camera interviews included on MGM Home Entertainment's DVD of The Last House on the Left.

18 Quoted (and somewhat condensed) from a posting on the Mobius Home Video Forum, www.mhvf.net (January 28, 2003).

SIMON punishes Laura for betraying him.

Releasing and put back into active service under the misleading title Last House—Part II.

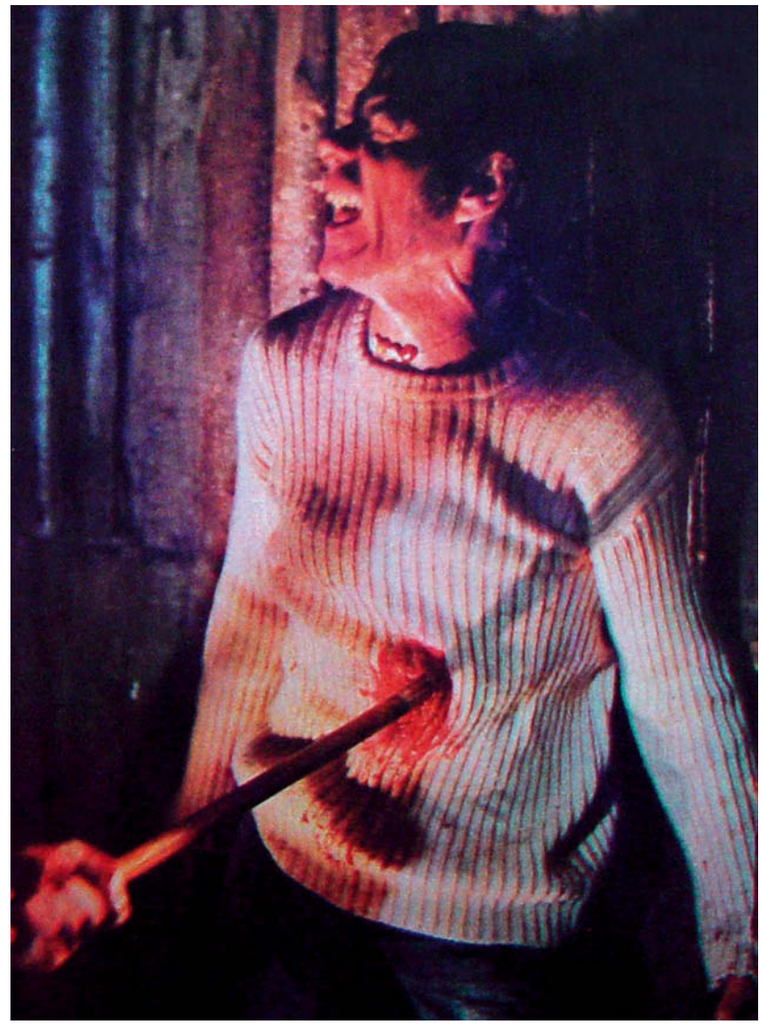
While the film had tremendous success in America, Italian success was harder to come by. One year after its initial theatrical release as Ecologia del delitto, the film was reissued in Italy under the more commercial title of Reazione a catena, but still did not perform well. That same year, the picture was acquired for release in Great Britain by New Realm Distribution and screened for the British Board of Film Classification under the unwise title of Bloodbath. The picture was denied classification at that time and would remain effectively banned in Britain for the next eight years.

Bava's determination to promote his new film extended to his surprise agreement to introduce the picture at the 1st Festival International d'Avoriaz du Film Fantastique (February 9–11, 1973), at the ski resort of Avoriaz, high in the French Alps. Anticipation for Bava's first public appearance ran high, but predictably, the shy director—who had two more films under his belt by this time—disappointed festival attendants with a no-show. Ecologia received mixed jury notices and reportedly revolted guest of honor Christopher Lee, who caught the film to see what his old friend was up to. Though his feelings were apparently shared by the majority of the attenders, who were hoping for another La maschera del demonio, the film received the festival's award for Best Makeup and Special Effects.

Commentary

Ecologia del delitto opens with a death not usually included in the film's body count. After the main titles sequence, which is accompanied by various shots of the bay's natural scenic beauty, before ending on an ironic shot of a TV antenna. Bava's camera aims up and wavers around apace with the frantic buzzing of a fly . . . and then we see a tiny shape plop onto the water's surface, dead as a doornail.

It's an everyday happenstance of nature, a natural death, but in the context of a Bava film, it summons a unique catalogue of memories that reach all the way back to his work on Roberto Rossellini's early short La vispa Teresa (1939), with its highly magnified attention to the life and death spans of the insect world. It also has macabre echoes, such as the fly that tormented Miss Chester in I tre volti della paura's "La goccia d'acqua" (there it goes, dropping in the water) and, even more appropos, the fly that John Harrington feeds to his pet bird during his opening narration of Il rosso segno della follia—the fly whose "insignificant life is a mere biological accident," and whose almost immediate appointment with death "is what makes life a ridiculous and brief drama."



After the two-dimensional, overly cool, stylized schemata of 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, Ecologia del delitto takes a similar foundation—the usual, convoluted parable of greed—but ups the ante in every department. There are twice as many characters; they are more dimensional and interesting as people, and their dialogue is sometimes remarkably thoughtful; the violence is more hot-blooded, to the point of going completely over the top; and the story, more philosophic this time, accentuates the random absurdity of life and death—often to ironic and even humorous effect. The two films have numerous narrative similarities (the waterfront setting, the nouveaux riche characters, the mercenary slayings, the victorious innocent, etc.), and there are also some purely visual correlations. Both films begin with lengthy sequences without dialogue, with Ecologia running almost a full 9 minutes (and three deaths, counting the fly) before its first words are spoken, nearly twice as long as the frantic preamble in 5 bambole. Brunhilda's discovery of Donati's corpse in the bay and her naked sprint from the scene is a visual retelling of Mary's discovery of Charles' corpse aboard the launch. Both films also feature scenes of eyes peering through telescopic devices (binoculars, rifle sites), shock cuts to corpses covered with repugnant forms of sea life (crabs, squid), and artful arrangements of dead bodies (in the freezer, in Ventura's bathtub). In nearly every instance, Ecologia del delitto does it better.

Here, the overcomplicated plot of 5 bambole is reborn as a black comedy of riotous proliferation. Bava's former reluctance with sexual and violent content is overthrown with anarchic vigor; the distancing pop artifice of the earlier film's decor is scrapped in favor of (mostly) natural location settings; the former's cold, mechanical editing is replaced by Carlo Reali's remarkably sensuous plans-séquence, which rank with Mario Serandrei's best work from Bava's classic period.

Moreso than Bava's direction, in this case, the play's the thing in Ecologia del delitto, and this point was not lost on Bava himself. In a most unusual touch, the script receives star billing on the picture, with the screenplay credits directly following the title, and there are no "starring" credits for the actors. Instead, the film that was eventually titled Ecologia del delitto is, first and foremost, a screenplay "with" Claudine Auger, Luigi Pistilli, and the rest. It might best be described as an Elizabethan revenge play, as it might have been staged by madcap cartoon king Tex Avery. Like Avery's work for Warner Bros. and MGM, Ecologia is fuelled by the comic repetition and escalating outrageousness of certain violent acts. For example, in Avery's classic MGM cartoon King Size Canary (1947), a starving cat tries to create a feast for himself by fattening a puny, sickly canary with a bottle of "Jumbo-Gro"—which has the unforeseen effect of turning it into a mountainous, musclebound monster! This surprise disproportionment initiates a war of oneupmanship that ends only when the bottle of "Jumbo-Gro" is emptied and the planet has become too small for their war to continue. Similarly, in Ecologia, the violence escalates in outlandishness until too many cast members have been killed for the story to go on.

SIMON'S murder of Laura originally climaxed in more gruesome fashion than is seen in the final cut.

Asked why he pushed the film's violence to such graphic extremes, Bava replied, "I don't know . . . but I believe it's the same as in life. One tries to support everything with a rational explanation, but no one can really know the depths of such motives. Maybe it's true . . . that a great disproportion exists between the apparent motives and the violence of the crimes—but isn't that usually the case?" [19]

While the murders are undeniably shocking, and were especially so at the time of the film's original release, they possess none of the titillating, misogynist quality that one observes in so many other Italian gialli. The murders in Ecologia del delitto are actually quite conscientious in their depiction of what really takes place in a homicide—the awkward struggling, the heavy breathing, the nausea on both sides of the act—and none moreso than Simon's death at the hands of Albert. This scene hits the viewer as it hits Simon; we are taken completely by surprise as a spear is rammed through his midriff, pinning him to a wall, interrupting his (and our) train of thought. The scene is extremely violent, but knowing that we may have become inured to extreme violence by this point in the picture, Bava pushes it further. There is the usual spurting, twisting, oozing, and groaning, as Simon struggles to retaliate against his attacker, but the scene doesn't make the viewer sit bolt upright until Simon surprises Albert (and us) by vomiting blood onto his hand. That disgusts us. All at once, the scene resonates with accusation and guilt, and we're reminded that murder is a dirty business, that shed blood runs hot, and that violence is an ugly, degrading thing. Then, in an inspired bit of contrast, the scene ends with the camera slowly tracking away from Simon as he stands pinned to the wall, his face haloed in an almost holy light as he looks up, as if beseeching his Maker for an explanation, the awful percussion of murder replaced by romantic, elegiac piano and strings on the soundtrack—the music also heard by Simon's mother in the moments preceding her own death. Before our eyes, this nasty character is relieved of his human burden, perhaps forgiven his sins. And then his head drops down, dead. As always, Bava takes care to show us the angel in the wreckage.

SIMON meets his own end at the hands of first-time killer Albert.

19 Volta.

The Elizabethan connection is supported by the script's characterization and dialogue: Albert and Renata are clearly patterned on Lord and Lady Macbeth, the man being goaded by his ambitious wife to use violence to gain a foothold of property and respect, and they summarize all the preceding carnage at the film's dénouement by saying, "All's well that ends well."[20] Most of the characters here can be traced back to a Shakespearean archetype—the heirs to a fortune, the evil merchant, the oracle—even Simon, the illegitimate (i.e., "subhuman") offspring who lives in a shack by the sea and feeds on the squid he catches himself, seems a distant relative of Caliban in The Tempest.

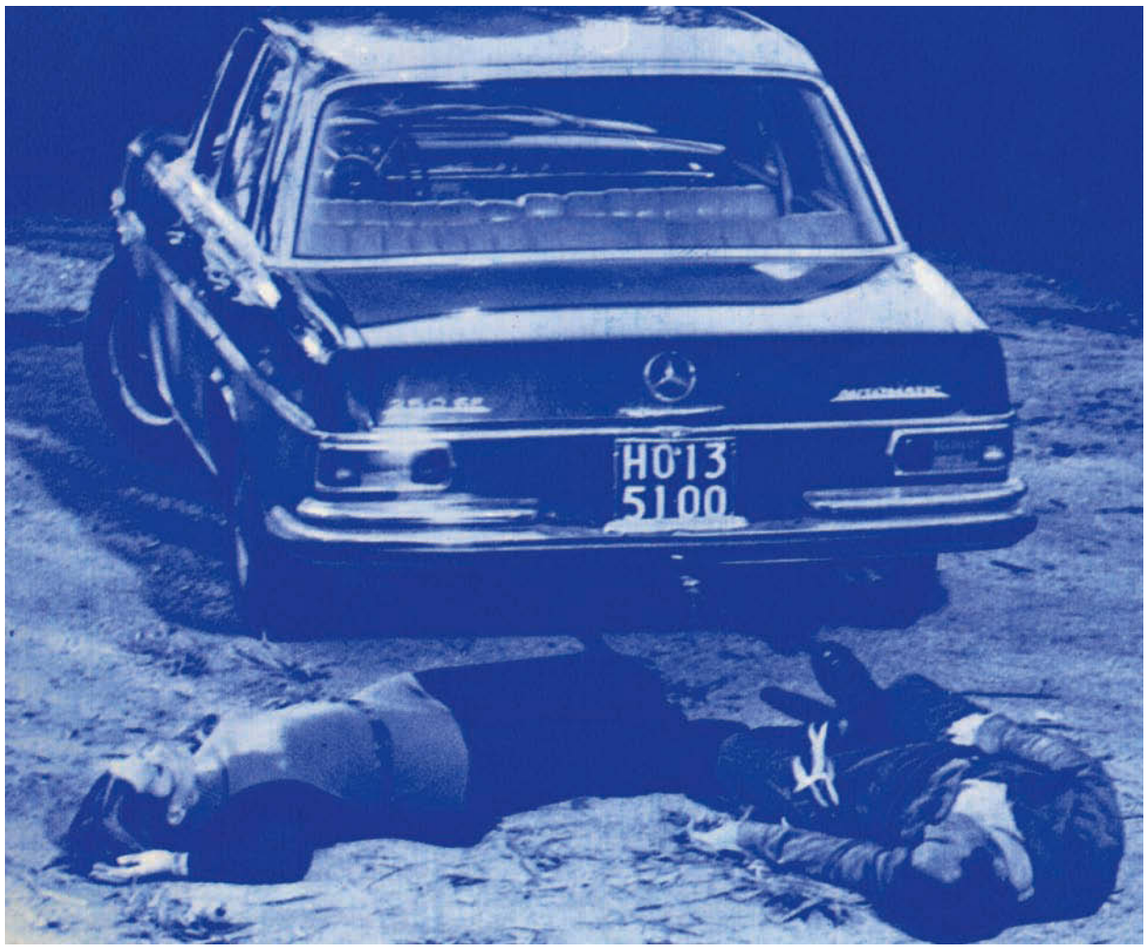
The script also contains other surprising literary allusions, undoubtedly the contribution of Filippo Ottoni. As Ottoni himself noted, after recently seeing the film for the first time, "What struck me was the literary—I won't say 'intellectual'—quality of the dialogue, which is spoken by characters who are nothing like that at all, so that it creates a weird sense of dislocation."

A classic case in point is the following après-sex banter between Frank Ventura and Laura:

LAURA:
Stay a while. Love isn't love without a little cuddling after.

FRANK:
Shhhh!

LAURA:
What is it, darling?



FRANK:
Can't you hear it calling? It was a squonk.

LAURA:
It was, huh? And what is that?

FRANK:
What's a squonk, eh? Well, for your information, a squonk is a . . . dark-colored creature . . .

LAURA:
Oh, Frank, why do you do that?

FRANK:
It's skin is covered with moles. It's equipped with long claws and strong teeth. Clever little beast. But it's still very easy to find. It only gives itself away because a squonk never stops whimpering. And do you know what it does when it's captured? It dissolves into tears. Some of its peculiar qualities are sulkiness, diffidence, and possessiveness . . .

RENATA and Albert's children have the last laugh.

In his observant 1995 booklet Mario Bava, Alberto Pezzotta notes that the "squonk" is a mythological animal catalogued in Jorge Luís Borges' work of fantastical zoology, The Book of Imaginary Beings. The purpose of this reference is to make us catalogue Laura (sulky, diffident, possessive) as a specific type of female personality; once we do this, we begin to take a larger view, a superior stance to the characters and the actions they subsequently perpetrate, and the entire dramatis personæ becomes comparable to the various insects pinned and catalogued by Paolo Fosatti. A number of the characters (Duke, Denise, Simon, Ferdinando) are literally pinned, as well, to make the point unmistakable. The point is not to deny these characters their humanity, but rather to portray how transient and meaningless are the schemes in which they involve themselves, compared to what is truly eternal: the bay, the planet, the heritage that we pass on to our children. For viewers aware of Bava's continued attention over the years to elemental imagery—earth, air, fire, and water—this prominent statement of an ecological theme marks an apotheosis in his work.

Bava also takes the opportunity of his ecological theme to probe the conscience of man's violent relationship to nature, particularly in the first conversation between Paolo and Simon. The latter, who at first glance is the more savage and unsophisticated of the two men, comes forth with the more defensible philosophy when he tells the insect collector, "Man should live and let live . . . at least I eat my squid; I don't kill as a hobby, like you do." Paolo retaliates by saying, "But Man isn't an insect, my dear Simon . . . We have centuries of civilization behind us, you know." Simon's retort provides what may be the most arresting instance of backstory in the entire Bava canon: "No, I don't know. I wasn't there." In other words, Simon is aware that history is bunk, that civilization is a respectable word used to cloak millennia of lies, mayhem, and murder, all committed for the sake of individual advancement. It's an astute observation, and though we may initially believe that Simon was too harsh on poor Paolo, it soon becomes apparent that this (after all) amateur bug collector probably got started in his hobby as a means of escaping the reality of his marriage to Anna—who has likewise escaped into occultism and alcohol. "Your women are queens, Ferdinando," Paolo whines to his prize catch, "not babbling fortune-tellers."

The film contains so many characters existing separately in their own isolated clusters, pursuing their own selfish agendas, that the episode of the four teenagers who invade Ventura's property—which runs mostly consecutively from the time of their arrival till the moments of their deaths—has the feel of being the film's centerpiece, a movie-within-the-movie, though these characters are the film's least well-defined and don't amount to much more than collateral damage. (They might well be leftover from the Sacchetti script's original theme of how the young are abused by the agendas of their elders.) Yet even when observing this microcosm of young society, Bava divides the group into those capable of appreciating the value of the bay and those who can appreciate only the value of its value. When Duke urges the girls to follow him inside, away from the location's scenic beauty, Brunhilda chides him. "You are full of hot dogs and Cadillacs and have no music in your soul!" she cries. Then, indicating the bay with a grand wave of her hand, she adds, "This is music—Sibelius, Mahler, Bach!" To which Duke responds with another of his many impatient remarks about "the kraut girl's" Germanic heritage: "Und Ludwig von Beethoven! Now get your ass up here!" Brunhilda's respect for the bay's natural beauty, a trait she shares with the Countess, marks her for death in a world where people are less concerned with the quality of life than with money and "making a killing."

The sequence of Brunhilda's murder is a feat of montage so impressive that it became the central image of the film's advertising campaigns around the world, most particularly in the United States and Spain. Apart from the shock of the blood spurting from her bare throat as the billhook ratchets around her neck, the sequence is bracketed by celebrations of nature, beginning with Brunhilda's skinny-dip in the bay, and concluding as she lies on the ground, her skirt and legs raised as though about to give birth, the sound of her last breath followed on the soundtrack with trees rustling, birds singing, water lapping—the ambient music of life as it goes on, unnoticing and unaffected.

Bava moves the action further uphill to Ventura's cottage with an unexpected series of shots. Rather than do the obvious thing—which would be to pan up from the body to the cottage—he cuts away from the moment of death to a shot of the sun setting on the bay, then returns to the dead girl, now photographed from a more oblique angle. From here, he uses his zoom lens to traverse the distance from her corpse to a window of the Ventura home; then he cuts to that vantage and zooms again from outside the window to inside, where Bobby is seen occupying himself with a book on the living room floor; after another cut, we are inside with Bobby, and Bava zooms from him to the bedroom, where Duke and Denise are making love; after cutting to a vantage inside the bedroom, closer view of the couple, he zooms away from their lovemaking to a glistening eye observing them—it looks like the shot of the eyes peering through the slatted blinds at Michèle Mercier in I tre volti della paura's "Il telefono." Each of these individual shots lose focus before they cut, blurring into nebulosity, so that each shot seems fluidly, happily, sensuously linked to the next—until this point, when the camera executes a hard, disturbingly undiffused cut to the killer's actual point of view. The subsequent shots of Bobby's death and the skewering of the young couple are all collected with blunt, accelerated cutting that, following such sinuous camera movements, adds to their violent impact. Finally, once the naked couple are shown pinned together, the sequence cuts outside and Bava zooms toward the front of Duke's parked dune buggy, whose twin headlights and crescent fender form a mechanical face grinning with impish delight.

ITALIAN locandina, art by Enrico DeSeta.

20 The line in full, from Shakespeare's play All's Well That Ends Well, is "All's well that ends well, still the fine's the crown / What e'er the course, the end is the renown." The meaning is that, regardless of man's actions, it is what endures that is important—and thus, Bava's message is that we should all serve the best interests of our world, because it will outlast us all. Considering the frequency with which this personal name appears in his filmography, it should be noted that this line is spoken by Helena—or, in the name's Italian form, Elena.

This extended sequence is one of Bava's finest: suspenseful, outrageous, masterfully composed, nastily ironic—and also quite innovative, in that it successfully transposes the giallo from its traditional urban setting—steeped in night and vice and corruption—to a provincial setting of great natural beauty in which most of its murders are committed outdoors, and in broad daylight. As in Sei donne per l'assassino or Operazione paura, where Bava's camera pans away from acts of violence to nearby stone cherubs (thereby comparing the brevity of our lives to everlasting art, or juxtaposing the harsh reality of death to our romantic concepts of the Afterlife), Bava's prowling, insinuating camera seems to float away from each paroxysm of violence back to elegiac views of the bay—the body of water that is mother to all that lives and breathes, the prompter of all this mayhem—its natural beauty unchanged and supremely unconcerned.

As in Sei donne per l'assassino, the violence of Ecologia del delitto is put into action by words entrusted to a personal diary, dramatizing once again the superstitious notion that the written word is not to be trusted, but something capable of coming back to haunt us—or in the case of this film, granting others a license to kill us. Here, as in the majority of his films, Bava seems devoted to illustrating the disruptive power of secret knowledge, which can be as intimate as a diary entry, as biological as Helmut's paternity in I coltelli del vendicatore, or as vast as the guilty fear that governs the rustic village of Operazione paura. The spectrum always results in the violent release of a Demiurge, acting through either natural or supernatural agencies, bent on making its own truth known.

ITALIAN reissue due-foglia.

One area in which Ecologia del delitto transcends both Sei donne per l'assassino and 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto is its plotting, which, though convoluted, never collapses into inconsequence (as in the former) or unintelligibility (as in the latter). That said, there is something inherent in the quality of Gene Luotto's English post-sync dubbing that may discourage us from absorbing anything but the most punched-up dialogue. Like Bava's earlier whodunits, Ecologia adopts the ironic perspective that no one is innocent, which makes it all the more remarkable that the film continues to play by the very rules it is breaking. For example, it takes care to supply a number of red herrings, the best of which follows the skewering of Duke and Denise with a shot of Anna turning over the Ace of Swords in a Tarot reading and rushing off to Paolo's study to share the news, where she finds the pinned Ferdinando kicking its legs in agony.

As Ecologia del delitto continues in the vein of Sei donne per l'assassino, the writings of Luigi Barzini once again become pertinent to our understanding of its characters' approaches to violence and nature. The Italian obsession with symmetry, which seems the correct explanation for the book-ended structure of Sei donne per l'assassino, is boiled down by Barzini to one obsessive word.

"The word for this," he writes, "is sistemazione. To sistemare all things is considered to be the foremost, perhaps the unique, mission of man on Earth. Sistemare means, according to [the authors of the latest dictionary], 'to arrange, regulate, settle,' and sistemazione, naturally enough, 'regularization, arrangement, settlement.' The English terms [systemize, systemation] are not colloquial and are mainly used in official prose, editorials and scholarly dissertations. The Italian words are, on the contrary, as common as bread and cheese. To begin with, sistemare means to defeat nature. Italians sistemano mountain torrents, marshy land, wild animals, spoiled children and unruly populations. 'Va sistemo io' is a much abused threat. It means, 'I will curb your rebellious instincts.'" [21]

Systemation, then, is a word pertinent to the human wish to exert a triumph of will over nature, whether it be human nature or nature itself. The film's Italian title offers every proof that Bava and his collaborators were making a statement about the conflicting natures of human nature and Mother Nature—both depicted here in states of wilderness, one constant and self-sufficient and the other so short-lived as to require immediate material gratification. Ecology is sometimes casually mistaken as a synonym for natural preservation, but it actually designates a branch of biology concerned with the relationship between living organisms and their environment. Frank Ventura can only come to terms with the world outside his villa by recognizing opportunities to make money from it; Paolo Fossatti by preying upon its insects and categorizing them on pinned cards; and Simon sees his inheritance as his only chance to gain the legitimacy he never had. These people have no relationship to their environment, only to their own selfish needs; thus, the environment is no poorer for their loss.

The smaller worlds on view within the film—its families and marriages—are colored by similar imbalances; the weak Albert is coerced into monstrous acts for which he is ill-suited by ambitious Renata; Ventura has molded Laura, his secretary and lover, into a seducer of other men to gain him advantage; and the most amiable union in the film, the Fossattis', is one of mutual harassment and oblivion. The counterpoint for these interpersonal struggles is Simon, who lives alone in a humble shack; he may appear strong and self-reliant, but he is also the only fatally systemized character of the lot, having been twisted by his mother's decision to keep him locked away, like an animal, throughout his childhood—and now lacking the emotional equipment to protect himself from being similarly exploited by Ventura. It is fitting that Bava stages Simon's violent death, speared like St. Sebastian, with the spiritual trappings usually reserved for Saints, bathing his head in spotlight, scoring his last righteous gasps with romantic music, as if, through his gushing blood, this eternal victim has glimpsed his final reward. He is what might have become of Renata's children, had they not intervened with the film's only innocent act.

For all its boldness and thematic richness, Ecologia del delitto is nevertheless in the nature of a flawed gem. The flashbacks that occur late in the film—explaining Ventura and Laura's theft of the diary page, and Laura's seduction of Donati—are too awkwardly and plainly inserted; they might have worked better had they been tinted, to accentuate their status as flashbacks. While the translated English dialogue provided by Gene Luotto works very well in most cases, the lines that he gives to the young carousers seemed twenty years behind the times even in 1971, playing like the repartée from an 1940s WWII shore leave romance, with the sailors and USO girls sporting hippie garb. And, with the exception of Simon's death, the last third of the movie lacks the sheer bravado of the earlier part, with the penultimate murder in the dark adding more confusion and uncertainty than suspense. By leaving this climactic murder to the audience's own imagination, the film obliquely admits the ultimate failure of its own.

That said, the film stays vigorously in the memory thanks to a wealth of wicked details: the spinning tire of the Countess' collapsed wheelchair slowing to a roulette-like stop as she breathes her last; her cold hands hanging down over the face of her dead husband/murderer; the eye gazing at Brunhilda's dance through a hole in a wall of wicker; the surprise cut from Anna's decapitation to a piece of pottery accidentally broken by the neglected Donati children; and the startling moment where Renata and Albert see the known-to-be-dead Filippo Donati "walking" through the woods, which turns out to be Donati's corpse, carried on Simon's back. The surprise ending is a delight, again hearkening back to the finale of La vispa Teresa, in which the triumph of nature over the whims of man is accompanied by a children's song. But the film is at its very best during the opening 9 minutes, and during its murder sequences, when its sense of cinema is most pure.

Considering the many ways in which Bava's life and career paralleled that of Alfred Hitchcock, it is curious that—just as Ecologia del delitto was receiving its earliest screenings and dividing audiences—Hitchcock was receiving universal acclaim for his first British film in more than thirty years, Frenzy (1972), which was greeted as a similarly revolutionary statement from its director. Both films seemed to be the work of men determined to break free of their former conservatism to claim a new generation of viewers, to prove that they were still relevant, by taking full and fearless advantage of the new freedoms available to commercial cinema. Ironically, though Hitchcock reaped the greatest immediate acclaim, the passage of time has proven Bava's film to be the more durable of the two works, and also the most influential.

THIS POSTER from the film's belated Argentinian release in the 1980s combines elements from the poster art for MAKE THEM DIE SLOWLY and another unidentified Enzo Sciotti painting.

Influences

Shortly before the release of Ecologia del delitto, another important title in the history of the "body count" movie debuted. Released by American International Pictures in May 1971, Robert Fuest's The Abominable Dr. Phibes was an art nouveau black comedy starring Vincent Price as a mad musician who avenges himself against the nine doctors he holds responsible for his wife's death, punishing them with elaborate death traps based on the nine Hebrew curses of the Old Testament. The film, inaccurately advertised as Price's 100th film, proved so popular that it spawned a sequel, Dr.

21 Luigi Barzini, The Italians (New York NY: Bantam Books, 1965), 118.

Phibes Rises Again (1972), which found Price and Fuest presiding over another series of more random, yet no less flamboyant, murders. The successful formula was repeated in yet another Price vehicle, Douglas Hickox's United Artists release Theater of Blood (1973), which found a mad Shakespearean actor avenging himself against his critics with death scenes scripted by the Bard.

While Bava's influence on these films is surely coincidental, it is far more palpable in a European co-production filmed after the release of Ecologia del delitto: Edward Dmytryk's Bluebeard (1972), which starred Richard Burton as the infamous wife-killer. Made on location in Hungary, the film was scripted in part by La maschera del demonio's Ennio De Concini, photographed by Gábor Pogány (who shot much of Riccardo Freda's work before and after Bava), and featured a program of murders staged, once again, with the special makeup illusions of Carlo Rambaldi. In one sequence where Burton finds wife Nathalie Delon lying naked with prostitute Sybil Danning, he impales them both with a chandelier constructed from the antlers (and a single protruding tusk) of various hunted animals; the scene very much recalls the "coitus interruptus" scene of Ecologia del delitto. Each of these films is remarkable not only for adopting Bava's scorecard approach to acts of homicide, but for sharing his movie's diabolically dark sense of humor.

But Ecologia del delitto's most notable influence can be traced back to Twitch of the Death Nerve's days as a cash cow for Hallmark Releasing Corporation. Before founding Hallmark, the company's partners—Steve Minasian, Philip Scuderi, and Robert Barsamian—had worked together on an early hardcore sex film called Together (1970), which featured a pre-Behind the Green Door Marilyn Chambers in its cast. It was produced and directed by Sean S. Cunningham, and edited and partially photographed by his associate producer, Wes Craven. Craven and Cunningham later collaborated on a film tailor-made to Hallmark's needs, Krug and Company—which was eventually released under the title The Last House on the Left (1972). Last House regularly played at drive-in double- and triple-bills with Twitch of the Death Nerve, and as previously noted, Twitch was retitled Last House—Part II in 1977.

Just as Twitch (or whatever it was called) was disappearing from American screens in the late 1970s, it was finally cleared for belated exhibition in Great Britain. In early 1980, New Realm Distribution submitted a print of Bloodbath which had been shorn of close to 6 minutes, eliminating all of the gruesome punchlines that propelled Bava's dark comedy from scene to scene. This version was granted an "Adults Only" X certificate and released to theaters in March 1980 on the bottom half of a double bill with Human Experiments, a 1980 American film (originally titled Beyond the Gate) starring Linda Haynes, Jackie Coogan, and Aldo Ray. There wasn't too much of Bava's film left to appreciate when it was screened for Monthly Film Bulletin's Tom Milne, who branded it "an absurdly over-plotted thriller which spends so much time floatingly observing its characters as they wander within reach of assorted lurkers with axes, spears and billhooks that it has no time to bother with characterization, Bava's camerawork and direction provide some striking images, despite (occasionally because of) variable colour processing, and despite cuts which have excised most of the climaxes (a copulating couple transfixed by a spear, for instance). The rest is mechanical in the extreme." [22]

Two months later, in May 1980, Paramount released Friday the 13th, a low-budget, independent pick-up feature directed by Sean S. Cunningham, which Steve Minasian and his partners financed in the autumn of 1979. Confirming that no one ever went broke by underestimating the taste of the public, this turgid and witless whodunit became one of the biggest cash cows of its decade. As many fans and critics noticed, the film mirrored Bava's body count movie in many respects—including its graphically violent murders and lakeside setting, although, despite its title, Cunningham's movie contains quite a bit fewer than thirteen murders. An explanation for the similarity is offered by Martin Kitrosser, who worked as a script supervisor on the first two Friday the 13th pictures and went on to co-author Parts 3 and 5.

THE FRENCH affiche, which mentions the film's award-winning screening at the Avoriaz Festival.

"I was absolutely mesmerized by [Bava's] film," explains Kitrosser, who admits to being such a fan of the director that he named his first-born son Mario Bava Kitrosser. "In the late 1970s, while in college, I purchased a 16 mm projector and rented many 16 mm Mario Bava films from different mail order sources and eventually bought Bay of Blood, as well as Blood and Black Lace, for only 50 bucks apiece, though the quality left much to be desired. In 1978, Ron Kurz—a fellow writer and close friend of mine—mentioned that Sean Cunningham was interested in making a horror movie after seeing Halloween. Ron suggested that I lend my 16 mm copy of Bay of Blood to Sean and another writer, Victor Miller [to study], and lo and behold, here comes Friday the 13th! Later, Sean hired me to supervise Victor's script. He offered me $1,200 or 5% of the profits of the movie. Being just out of college, I went for the cash rather than the profits, because I didn't expect it to be the big hit it turned out to be! Soon afterwards, I was hired again as a script supervisor for Friday the 13th, Part 2, this time with Ron, who this time suggested we pattern the killings after Bay of Blood. I agreed, and also wanted to include a dedication in the closing credits: 'To the Memory of Mario Bava.' Unfortunately, that [idea] was vetoed by the producers."

GERMAN A1 poster.

The enormous commercial success of Friday the 13th—in proportion to its production costs—resulted in a veritable blood flood of imitations: The Burning, Just Before Dawn, Midnight, and Madman (all 1981), to name only a few—all of which followed Bava's blueprint of staging their R-rated (barely glimpsed) mayhem in the midst of contrastingly attractive natural settings. Bava never lived to see Friday the 13th and its countless offspring and never understood that, by veering the giallo into less urban terrain, he was blazing yet another trail in the history of horror cinema. One imagines that Bava would have taken one look at the lush American forests that provide natural backdrops to these films and sighed wistfully, remembering how, on his film, he had been obliged to work without the luxury of real trees.

The influence of Ecologia del delitto was still going strong nearly a decade later, when the Spanish horror star Paul Naschy wrote and directed El Aullido del Diavolo ("The Howl of the Devil," 1988). Conceived as Naschy's tribute to the great masters of horror, the film opens with a title card acknowledging the likes of Boris Karloff, Bela Lugosi, Lon Chaney and makeup artist Jack Pierce, and concerns itself with the young son of a great, late horror star (Naschy) who appears to him throughout the film in the guises of the Frankenstein Monster, the Phantom of the Opera, Quasimodo, and Naschy's own werewolf character Waldemar Daninsky. As the film reaches its climax, Naschy adds Mario Bava to his list of hommages by including a flashback dramatizing the actor's death, as we see him and his wife making love when they are suddenly impaled together by a masked intruder. When the murderer removes his mask and we see that the couple's own son was responsible, the son begins to make sense of his own derangement—thus the sequence works as a tribute not only to Ecologia del delitto, but to Bava's Spanish horror film Il rosso segno della follia.

At the close of his Positif interview, Bava offered interviewer Ornella Volta a forthcoming description of his work outside the commercial cinema. "My current project is a documentary about vivisection," he said. "If you can imagine that, while filming Ecologia del delitto, the thought of having to pierce a live beetle kept me up all night, perhaps you can begin to imagine the effect this project is having on me. If I were dealing with a biopsy performed on a human, I could accept that more easily. But the mere idea of seeing it applied to an animal makes me shiver! When we were working with the dogs, we had to first cut their vocal cords to silence their howls because, naturally, they were never anesthetized . . ." [23]

Bava also occupied his increasingly spare time between features by lending his special effects expertise to a series of television commercials for Perugina's popular candy, Cioccolatini Baci ("Chocolate Kisses"). These commercials had been a staple of Italian television since 1967; each segment built around the same formula: To the tune of a catchy jingle called "Tanti Baci Perugina" ("So Many Perugina Kisses"), a young, arguing couple found their troubles miraculously solved by the intervention of a lovely blonde, chocolate-bearing fairy, known as the Baci Fantina ("Kiss Fairy"). Dutch actress Katia Christine (b. 1946) originated the role after supporting roles in two 1967 films, Don Giovanni in Sicilia and the Louis Malle "William Wilson" episode of Histoires Extraordinaires/Spirits of the Dead (in which she played a nude girl whose body is teased with a scalpel by the sadistic Alain Delon). When Christine became pregnant in 1968, the role of the Baci Fantina was passed on to Elisabetta "Emma" Piccolamini (a British actress of Italian descent), and then to the Akron, Ohio-born actress Sydne Rome (b. 1944). Katia Christine returned to the role in 1971, and traded it off and on with Rome through 1972—at which time Rome won the lead role in Roman Polanski's sex comedy Che?/What? a.k.a. Diary of Forbidden Dreams.

Bava photographed and devised the special effects for six different Cioccolatini Baci spots produced between 1971–72. These black-and-white commercials, created by the Brera Agency, were produced by Giuseppe Brun, scored by Italy's jingle king Franco Godi, and directed by Franco Rossi, Bava's directorial associate on Odissea. Bava did not direct any of the spots himself; instead, his duties were to dream up inventive new ways of presenting la Baci fantina (and her product)—making her glitter, fly through the air, float through forests, and so on.

These commercial projects were a welcome distraction from the fact that Bava's most recent film—still a year away from its first screenings in America—had not appealed to the same Italian moviegoers who were flocking to Dario Argento's thrillers in such great numbers. At home, his luck was nearly exhausted; but fortunately, there was an American producer for whom Bava's name was still synonymous with triumph over budget, and through his timely intervention, Mario Bava was about to embark on the last great creative period of his life and career.

22 Tom Milne, "Antefatto (Bloodbath)" review, Monthly Film Bulletin, 1980.

23 Volta.

BARON OTTO von Kleist emerges from the grave, to the terror of this bystander—a scene not included in the final cut of BARON BLOOD.

Baron Blood

ONE OF THE MOST talked-about publishing events of 1972 was Raymond McNally and Radu Florescu's In Search of Dracula: A True History of Dracula and Vampire Legends. This pop historical text allegedly "proved" that Bram Stoker's literary creation had been based on Vlad Tepes of Wallachia (1431–1476), a bloodthirsty Romanian warrior who impaled his enemies on stakes arranged around his outdoor banquet table—thus winning him the nickname "Vlad the Impaler." The McNally/Florescu book was later turned into the semi-documentary film In Search of Dracula (1974), filmed in Romania by director Calvin Floyd, and starring Christopher Lee. This book, like the burgeoning ecology movement, reflected a growing concern, first within the counterculture and then rippling out into mass culture of the late 1960s and early '70s, about getting back to basics, going "back to the land" and examining one's "roots"—and these ideas naturally found expression in the fields of popular entertainment, including the horror cinema.

Mario Bava's next film, Baron Blood, is one of several horror films which modestly predate the arrival of the McNally/Florescu best-seller but share its interests in seeking out the truth behind an ancient figure of legend. Around the same time, American International Pictures released a spirited independent pick-up called Count Yorga—Vampire (1970, now known under its pre-acquisition title of The Loves of Count Iorga), which took the seemingly novel approach of reviving a centuries-old vampire in a contemporary setting. Actually, it wasn't the first movie to do this—the same could be said of Tod Browning's Dracula (1931)—but it felt like a new twist because the 1970s were more radically different to the vampire's natural milieu than the Edwardian 1930s had been. In Spain, actor–screenwriter Paul Naschy (Jacinto Molina) had already moved in this direction with modern-day appearances of vampires in La Marca del Hombre Lobo/Frankenstein's Bloody Terror (1967), El Hombre que Vino de Ummo/Assignment Terror (1968), and Le Noche de Walpurgis/The Werewolf versus the Vampire Woman (1970) but, for some reason, the trend did not seem wholly absorbed into the genre until Hammer Films responded by resurrecting Christopher Lee's Dracula in a remarkably dated, "contemporary" Chelsea in Dracula A.D. 1972 (1971). Though the McNally/Florescu book was still a year away from publication as Baron Blood went into production, the film anticipates In Search of Dracula with impressive precision, showing that—while it now appears to be an old-fashioned return to Bava's own Italian gothic roots—it was also very attuned to the zeitgeist of its time.

Long before there was a best-selling book to bolster the idea's status, Antonio Margheriti had addressed similar material in an Italian horror film called La vergine di Norimberga/Horror Castle (1963). In this gothic melodrama, based on a novel attributed to "Frank Bogart" and "translator" Maddelena Guy which first appeared in the Italian pulp magazine KKK I classici dell'orrore, Rosanna Podestà played a woman newly wed to a German aristocrat (Georges Rivière) whose castle contains a museum commemorating the horrific deeds of a sadistic 17th century ancestor known as "The Punisher." The film co-starred Christopher Lee and was filmed in the same empty villa where, only weeks earlier, Bava had directed Lee in La frusta e il corpo/The Whip and the Body.

AN ORIGINAL Polaroid location scouting photo of the Museum der Stadt Korneuburg, where BARON BLOOD was filmed.

Baron Blood

Filmed on location in Korneuburg, Austria
September – November 1971
First released: February 25, 1972
Technicolor, 1.85:1, 98 minutes

Production: Euro American Productions (Rome), Wien Film (Vienna). Producers: Alfred Leone [Alfredo Leone], Dieter Geissler. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant directors: Lamberto Bava, Giuseppe Scavuzzo C.S.C. Original screenplay: Vincent G. Fotre, Wilibald Eser, Mario Bava. Continuity: Marion Mertes. Director of photography: Antonio Rinaldi. Camera operator: Emilio Varriano. Camera assistant: Gianlorenzo Battaglia. Art direction: Enzo Bulgarelli, Friedrich Juptner. Set decoration: Stefano Bulgarelli. Props: Angelo Coacchi. Special effects: Franco Tocci. Costumes: Alfonsa Olivieri. Makeup: Sylvana Petri. Special makeup: Carlo Rambaldi [uncredited]. Hairdresser: Rosanna Gigante. Stunt coordinator: Giulio Maculani. Production supervisor: Bruno Frasca. Production managers: Franco Coduti, Pierluigi Ciriaci. Production secretary: Armida Aichino. Editor: Carlo Reali. Assistant editor: Anita Cacciolati. Sound: Carlo Tarchi. Music: Stelvio Cipriani [C.A.M.]. Stills: Francesco Bellomo. Interpreter: Marina Oberreiter. Distributor: Jumbo Cinematografica.

Additional US credits: Produced by Alfred Leone [Alfredo Leone] for Leone International Productions, in association with Cinevision, Ltd. Executive producers: Sam Lang, J. Arthur Elliott. Adapted for the screen by William A. Bairn. Music: Les Baxter. Distributor: American International Pictures.

Joseph Cotten (Alfred Becker), Elke Sommer (Eva Arnold), Antonio Cantáfora (Peter Kleist), Massimo Girotti (Karl Hummel), Rada Rassimov (Christina Hoffmann/Elizabeth Holle), Alan Collins [Luciano Pigozzi] (Fritz), Dieter Tressler (Dortmundt), Nicoletta Elmi (Gretchen), Humi Raho [Umberto Raho] (Inspector), Valeria Sabel (Marthe Hummel). Uncredited: Gustavo di Nardo (Dr. Werner Hesse), Franco Tocci (Otto von Kleist), Kathy Leone (woman on plane), Alfredo Leone (man on plane), Mario Bava (passerby).

France: Baron Vampire, Selection C.A.A.
Germany: Baron Blood, TV only
Italy: Gli orrori del castello di Norimberga, "The Horror of Nuremberg Castle"
Mexico: Camara de Tortura, "Chamber of Tortures"
US: Baron Blood, American International Pictures, 10/27/72, 91m

Baron Blood began as an original screenplay written by Vincent G. Fotre, a Hollywood-based tennis pro who had been dabbling in screenwriting since the late 1950s. Fotre's screenwriting credits were few, despite a lengthy career in the business. One of his short stories was bought as the basis for an episode of Alfred Hitchcock Presents ("The Rose Garden," 12/15/56), and he later contributed to the 1960s ABC-TV series, Honey West. His first feature script was for Richard Cunha's low-budget Missile to the Moon (1958), followed by a US/Yugoslav co-production, Operation Cross Eagles (1969, the only directorial effort of actor Richard Conte); in 1970, a made-for-TV movie called Wild Women, directed by Don Taylor, was based on The Trailmakers, a 1961 paperback original novel by Fotre. Also in 1970, Fotre teamed with actor Keith Larsen to co-script and co-produce a US/Canadian horror film, Night of the Witches, which Larsen directed under the pseudonym "Keith Erik Burt."

Fotre's Baron Blood script was first acquired by independent American producer Jerry Briskin, who had started in the business as an associate producer on the Irwin Allen series Lost in Space and The Time Tunnel. Briskin then brought it to the attention of fellow producer Alfredo Leone in hopes of interesting him in a co-production deal. Leone read Fotre's script, liked it very much, and agreed to pool his resources with Briskin—but it didn't work out that way.

"I met my end [of the deal]," Leone chuckles, "but he couldn't meet his, so I just took over the property."

Leone was excited by Baron Blood because he had been looking for the right vehicle to reunite him with Mario Bava after Four Times That Night—a disappointing project which had nevertheless convinced him of Bava's unique talents as a filmmaker. He now understood that erotic cinema was not really Bava's forte, while his horror films had almost always been international successes. When Leone sent Fotre's script to the man who was "always my Number One choice," Bava surprised him by turning it down. His reason had nothing to do with the script—Bava almost never turned down a script—but one of Leone's production associates, Wien Film of Austria, made it a condition of their "heavy investment" in the project that filming take place in or around one or more of the many available castles in Vienna.

"Solamente in Italia, Leone," Bava said, flatly.

Leone persisted and Bava continued to hold his ground, until the need to direct another feature became overwhelming. Bava had not directed anything since the Cioccolatini Baci commercials and, with the international success of new directors like Dario Argento and Sergio Martino, filmmaking in Italy was rapidly becoming a young man's game. Only a dozen years into his career as a director, Bava was now pushing 60 and Baron Blood was the only offer on the table. Reluctant to leave his secure niche of the world, his hypochondriac wife and the dog he nursed like a baby, Bava bit the bullet—encouraged to do so by his son Lamberto—and flew to Austria to scout locations with Leone.

Bava and Leone spent two or three weeks together, visiting castles and taking in the sights. "Mario was an invaluable help in scouting locations, because he'd had so much experience at location shooting," Leone says. "One of the castles we visited was used in Where Eagles Dare; it was stunning from the outside, but inside, it was completely empty! I tried to convince Bava that we could use it for exteriors, and use the interior of another castle, but he turned to me and said, 'Leone, do you know what it would cost to run cables up and down that hillside?' He was absolutely right. The guy from Wien Film showed us I don't know how many castles, and then he showed us the one we eventually used."

This was the Museum der Stadt Korneuburg, a magnificent castle located about 20 kilometers outside Vienna—a stone's throw from the Danube River. "Not only was the setting fabulous," Leone continues, "but it was furnished from top to bottom with precious antiques! I remember there was one chair valued at over half a million dollars! I asked the guy from Wien Film why he hadn't shown us this place first, and he said he'd held it back because it would be very expensive. It was, but it was worth it. When I told Mario we had a deal for the castle, he threw his arms around me and kissed me! He was beside himself, imagining all the ways he could shoot that castle and everything in it."

The shared experience of scouting locations in Vienna gave Bava and Leone many opportunities for conversation, and they discovered that beyond their professional relationship, they also had much else in common—including a mutual fondness for card playing. Leone also indulged Bava's hobby for collecting English expressions. "I was a great pinochle player in my time," Leone recalls, "and as we played, he wanted me to teach him some profanity in English. So when I won, I'd say—pardon the profanity—'Fuck you in spades, Bava!' And this went on to become a classic phrase of his: 'Fuck you in spades, Leone!' He was a wonderful man; I miss him dearly."

Synopsis

American college student Peter Kleist decides to spend his summer vacation with relatives in Austria, hoping to gain a better appreciation of his family history ("We all want to know where we come from, and from whom"). Peter is already aware of the most notorious leaf on his family tree: Baron Otto von Kleist, a 16th century sadistic nobleman who lived in an ominous castle overlooking his village.[1] Known to the peasantry as "Baron Blood," Kleist was notorious for having locals brought to his castle and tortured in his dungeon, whereafter their battered bodies were impaled on long poles displayed from the high turrets of his forbidding home. Kleist's reign of terror came to an end when a witch whom he had burned at the stake—Elizabeth Holle, the only person whom he truly feared—cursed him before dying, which caused a fire to break out in his castle which burned him alive, as she had been. So strong was Elizabeth's hatred for the Baron

SOUVENIR photo of a festive party held the night before shooting began. Clockwise: Joseph Cotten, Mario Bava, Massimo Girotti, Luciano Pigozzi, Alfredo Leone, Patricia Medina Cotten and Elke Sommer.

1 The description of "16th century" is actually an anachronism, as the Marquis de Sade himself was not born until 1740. For some reason, all references to Baron von Kleist's timeline in Baron Blood's AIP pressbook say "18th century."

OTTO VON KLEIST (Franco Tocci, wearing a mask by Carlo Rambaldi) rises from the grave outside Schloss des Teufels.

that she left behind an incantation that, when recited aloud inside the charred room at the stroke of midnight, would restore the disfigured Kleist to life, so that he might reexperience the agonies of death again and again.

When Peter arrives in Austria, he is met at Flughafen Wien (the airport) by his uncle Karl Hummel, a professor of architecture at the University. Their conversation quickly comes round to the Baron, and Uncle Karl drives Peter to the Baron's old castle, known as Schloss des Teufels ("Castle of the Devils"), which is in the midst of renovation for its reopening as a hotel—"for foreigners, not for the locals," Karl says, implying that Baron's legend is more than a mere fable for the people of his town. They meet Eva Arnold, one of Karl's graduate students, who is overseeing the work of Herr Dortmundt's renovation team as a representative of the Commission for National Monuments, to ensure that the castle's original integrity is preserved. That night at dinner, Karl's young daughter Gretchen amuses Peter and Eva with her stories of having seen the Baron's ghost at the windows of the castle. When Karl mentions Elizabeth Holle, Peter surprises him by producing an ancient piece of parchment that he discovered as a child while visiting his grandfather; it contains the incantation which, according to legends of the witch, will bring the Baron back to life.[2] Uncle Karl cautions his nephew to be wary of the supernatural, but when he retires for the evening, Peter persuades Eva to return to the castle to have a go at the incantation. "Perhaps I can scare up a little family history," he jokes. The parchment also contains a counter-incantation, capable of returning the Baron to his grave, so "If we don't dig him, we'll ditch him."

PETER KLEIST (Antonio Cantáfora) and Eva (Elke Sommer) read the incantation that brings the Baron back to life.

Peter and Eva find the burned room where the Baron died and, using an ancient floorplan of the castle, uncover a secret passage that leads to a room where a portrait of Otto von Kleist hangs, defaced except for its blue eyes. They recite the incantation at midnight, after which the village belltower tolls twice—"2:00 was the hour at which Von Kleist died," Eva remarks in fright. They feel a formidable presence approaching, and see the handle of a door to the room twist and turn . . .

Eva urges Peter to reverse the incantation, which he does. Once the danger has passed, Peter suspects that Fritz—a moronic handyman working at the castle, who likes to tease the easily unnerved Eva—may have been at the door, playing a joke. The next day, Herr Dortmundt reports that Fritz has been fired for stealing from the property. That night, with the main suspect absent from the scene, Peter persuades Eva to test the incantation again. Once again, the belltower tolls twice, but before they can reverse the incantation, a sudden breeze blows the ancient parchment into the fireplace. Outside in the rolling fog, the disfigured Otto von Kleist pulls himself up from his burial place.

His body in bloody ruins, the Baron ambles in pain to the office of Dr. Werner Hesse, who tries to help him. When Hesse says he is obliged by law to phone an ambulance, the Baron kills him. He makes his way back to the castle, after Peter and Eva have fled, and murders Herr Dortmundt—hanging him down the center of a spiral staircase. Fritz, trespassing on the property, finds Dortmundt's body and takes his revenge by prying a ring from his dead finger, but the Baron clubs him, carries the handyman to the castle dungeon, and places him inside a spiked casket, whose lethal lid is dropped just as Fritz regains consciousness. Afterward, the Baron seeks out a secreted trunk, breaking the chains that bind it with his own ruined hands. Inside is a fortune in jewels.

With Herr Dortmundt dead, the castle's restoration cannot continue, and the property is put up for auction, where it is expected to go for "at least $600,000." The high bidder is Alfred Becker, an elderly newcomer to the village who is confined to a wheelchair. As he is congratulated by Karl, Peter, and Eva, he makes known his intentions to reside in the castle and restore it to its former glory. He invites Eva to assist him. They meet again when Eva delivers a tapestry, found in a local shop, that once belonged to the castle. While hanging it from a high mezzanine, Eva confides to Becker the story of the incantation and the parchment's destruction, and suddenly grows dizzy, nearly falling to her death. She excuses herself, but on her way out, she encounters the Baron—cloaked, hatted, horribly disfigured, leering at her. Eva is pursued, but Peter arrives in time to rescue her and drives her back to her apartment. As she returns to her rooms, Eva finds the Baron waiting for her in the darkness, and she escapes through a window into the foggy streets. The Baron hobbles after her, but she manages to reach the safety of Karl's house.

Karl is now convinced that the incantation was successful in reviving the Baron and addresses himself to the problem of how to send him back. Revealing himself to be not only an architect but also an authority on extra sensory perception, he mentions a local woman who achieved amazing scores in ESP testing: Christina Hoffmann, who is not only psychic, but claims to be a medium able to receive messages from the dead. Christina resents humankind ("Once you killed innocent witches and now you bring murderers back to life") but takes Peter and Eva to the place where Elizabeth Holle was burned to death. A bonfire is built, through which Christina communicates with the long-dead witch—with the aid of an amulet that was once her personal property. Elizabeth speaks through Christina, who expresses her gratitude to Peter and Eva for reviving the Baron, so that he may suffer his death agonies a second time. She informs them that "The Baron can be destroyed only by those he has himself destroyed."[3] When Christina returns to her home, she senses a visitation from the Baron, and as her door swings open to the night, she enfolds herself in her cloak to meet inevitable death.

Accompanied by Karl, Peter and Eva go to the police inspector—who is investigating the murder of Herr Dortmundt and the disappearance of the likeliest suspect, Fritz—to tell him the story of the incantation. He scoffs at the supernatural explanation. He also mentions the recent disappearances of a fisherman, a villager, and a peddler who were last seen in the vicinity of the castle[4]—which reminds Karl that Gretchen passes by there every day after school! They rush to her rescue and find her injured in the woods outside the castle, having fallen from her bike while trying to elude the Baron, who was pursuing her. Back at home, Gretchen surprises everyone by announcing that "Mr. Becker is the ghost." Eva reasons that if the Baron is able to return to life after centuries, he may also have the power to change his appearance at will. As they ponder what Elizabeth Holle meant when she decreed that the Baron could be destroyed only by those he had himself destroyed, Gretchen offers, "Maybe she meant the amulet."

That night, Becker invites Peter, Eva, and Karl to the unveiling of his finished restoration of the castle, which is complete to the extent of hanging impaled dummies from the castle turrets—though the "dummies" are actually the impaled corpses of the missing fisherman, villager, and peddler.

JOSEPH COTTEN as Mr. Becker, an illusory disguise for the reanimated Baron.

2 This 16th century parchment is the source of a continuity error that may be rather painful for conservationists of historical documents to observe. When Peter first produces the sheet in his uncle's dining room, it is folded in quarters; later, when he and Eva use it at the castle, it has been folded into eighths! How did this fragile document, handled so casually, ever survive the centuries?

3 In the English version of this scene, all references to the curse place it "300 years ago," which would make it the 17th century—once again, confusing the chronology of this "16th century" sadist.

4 Only one of these disappearances is explained in the film.

Becker also shows them the torture chamber, which he has furnished with stereo speakers that play tapes of voices screaming in pain and torment. Eva is disturbed and they agree to leave, but pause on the way out to share their belief that Becker really is the Baron. He overhears and steps out of his wheelchair, also revealing himself to be impervious to bullets when Karl discharges a small pistol in his direction. Eva later awakens in the torture chamber, bruised and with her clothes torn. Karl is tied to a rack and Peter is being terrorized by his ancestor, who is waving a red-hot poker in his direction. As she stands beside the open casket containing Fritz' punctured corpse, she drops the amulet on the body, which causes it to revive—and suddenly, the Baron's other victims arrive at the dungeon to exact their vengeance, as well. As they engulf the Baron and prepare instruments for his torture, Eva frees the two men and they drive away from Schloss des Teufels. As screams fill the night, the voice of Elizabeth Holle is heard across the centuries pleading with the Baron's murderers to "Save the last blow for me . . . Let me cut into his heart!"

MARIO BAVA and Elke Sommer keeping warm on a cold November night in Vienna.

Cast

A hands-on producer, Alfredo Leone took the liberty of casting Baron Blood himself, and he pleased Bava by assembling one of the most impressive casts he ever had under his direction. For the pivotal role of Alfred Becker, Leone knew that he needed a name actor, preferably someone with a known track record in the horror genre. "First I took the project to Vincent Price, but he wasn't interested," Leone recalls. "I later learned that he and Bava had a bad experience in common, which may explain why. Then I showed it to Ray Milland; he was intrigued but couldn't travel at the time, and turned it down. And then someone asked me, 'Why don't you try Joseph Cotten?' Joseph Cotten! I thought of Citizen Kane and The Third Man and didn't believe for a moment that he'd be interested in doing our type of film. But I took a chance and sent him the script and, needing the work, he accepted. Right after making our film, he made some other Italian horror films. Baron Blood was the start of a whole new career for him."

Born May 15, 1905, in Petersburg, Virginia, pudding-voiced Joseph Cotten was one of the original members of Orson Welles' Mercury Theater who, in addition to many classic appearances on American radio and stage, was featured in such classic films as Citizen Kane (1941), The Magnificent Ambersons (1942), Shadow of a Doubt (1943), Portrait of Jennie (1948) and The Third Man (1948, also filmed in Vienna). In 1960, Cotten made his first Italian film and married actress Patricia Medina, who acompanied him to Vienna. Cotten had made an earlier horror film for AIP, The Abominable Dr. Phibes, in 1971 and Baron Blood was in fact his second Italian horror film, following Mel Welles' Lady Frankenstein (1971). It would be the most commercially successful of his European films, which included subsequent efforts like Sussuri nel buio (1976) and Sergio Martino's L'isola degli uomini pesce/ Island of the Fish Men (1978, released in the US as Screamers, a partially reshot, re-edited version supervised by Joe Dante).

Though a native of Berlin, West Germany, Elke Sommer was actually "discovered" for the cinema in Italy. Born Elke Schletz on November 5, 1940, she was the daughter of a Lutheran minister who died when she was 14. Four years later, while vacationing with her mother in Rome, she entered a competition and won the title of "Miss Viareggio," which entitled her to a small role in a feature film—L'amico del giaguaro ("The Friend of the Jaguar"), directed by Giuseppe Bennati. The young Elke had intended to seek a career as a diplomatic translator, and had been educated in seven different languages, which helped her to become an international sex kitten in movies produced in Germany, Italy, France, and Spain. In 1962, she was cast by director Cyril Frankel in her first British film, Why Bother to Knock? (1963), which opened the door to American films, including the female lead in the Paul Newman spy vehicle The Prize (1963) and Blake Edwards' classic Inspector Clouseau farce, A Shot in the Dark (1964). Sommer's appearance in the notorious turkey The Oscar (1966, scripted by Harlan Ellison) marked the beginning of a long descent into movie mediocrity, of which the highlights were the Bob Hope vehicle Boy, Did I Get a Wrong Number! (1966, in which she spoofed Brigitte Bardot) and The Wicked Dreams of Paula Schultz (1968, a movie featuring several cast members from TV's concentration camp sitcom Hogan's Heroes). Baron Blood, therefore, marked a return to a semblance of class for the actress. It may sound like ballyhoo concocted for promoting the movie, but Sommer claims to be an actual baroness. "I can trace my family back to the year 1120," she has said. "I'm really a baroness, but I don't like to use the title. My father told me, 'Don't use it unless you have to because you didn't earn it; it comes from your ancestors.'" [5]

LITTLE Gretchen (Nicoletta Elmi, foreground) sees through Mr. Becker's disguise.

A veteran at the time of more than fifty features, Sommer had never before appeared in a horror film, and this new ground was one of her primary attractions to the role of Eva. "I was not aware of Mario Bava, at that time, as a heralded director," she reveals. "I met with Mr. Leone through my manager, Bulle Sturgen, and said, 'Yes, I've never done a horror movie, so I am interested.' For me, it was just the fact that we were doing a horror movie. The fact that we were going to be shooting in Austria made it even more enticing, because I could visit my mommy and have a week at home. It was great." [6]

Sommer, a successful commercial artist in her own right, was enthusiastic about Bava as an artist and as a person. "I loved Bava with all my heart," she told Fangoria. "He was very quiet—as quiet as Italians can be—but he had incredible energy. He spoke very broken English, so we always conversed in Italian. His son Lamberto was the assistant director and he loyally followed all of 'Papa's' instructions. Bava was quite a patriarch among the whole group of actors and technicians." [7]

As Sommer later elaborated: "[Bava] was an absolute, brilliant technician and an absolutely trustworthy companion on the set. Mario was like a friend—a fatherly friend, I might say. He was never lecherous; he would never even make a double entendre around me, which is actually the kind of thing I find very funny. Mario was very straight, very professional. He was kind of a Papa figure to me, and he was very dedicated to Leone. We actually thought very much alike—we didn't even have to talk. It was like when I worked with [Peter] Sellers [on A Shot in the Dark]. I had the same thing with Sellers; we had something that was so big, you can't even talk about it. We could just look at each other and know what the other was thinking, what they wanted." Over the next three years, Sommer starred in three Bava films—a record for a lead actress—though, despite the sometimes excellent performances she gave, she was too bright, too golden, to become a symbol of his work, as Barbara Steele and Daliah Lavi managed to do with single performances.

Cast in the role of Karl Hummel was Massimo Girotti (born in Mogliano on May 18, 1918)—a real casting coup for Leone. In the years since he had worked with Bava on such early features as Francisci's Natale al Campo 119 and Freda's Spartaco, Girotti had become one of Italy's most legendary film stars. Among his outstanding screen credits were Roberto Rossellini's Un pilota ritorna (1942), Vittorio De Sica's La porta del cielo and Luchino Visconti's Ossessione (both 1943), Pasolini's Teorema (1968), and Jules Dassin's Medea (1969). Upon completing Baron Blood, Girotti immediately flew to Paris to co-star in Bernardo Bertolucci's Ultimo tango a Parigi/Last Tango in Paris (1972). Girotti continued to act in films for the rest of his life, which ended at the age of 84 on January 5, 2003, due to heart failure.

The cast also satisfied Leone's international co-production agreements with Spain (Antonio Cantáfora), Germany (Dieter Tressler), and Italy (Umberto "Humi" Raho, Luciano "Alan Collins" Pigozzi). Cantáfora, looking quite a bit different, resurfaced many years later in Lamberto Bava's Demoni 2/Demons 2: The Nightmare Continues (1986), playing a role so insignificant that Bava failed to point him out during the audio commentary of a US LaserDisc and DVD release. Baron Blood marked Bava's only collaboration with Raho, who had been a staple of Italian horror/fantasy cinema through his associations with Riccardo Freda (Lo spettro/The Ghost, 1963; Giulietta e Romeo/Romeo and Juliet, 1964), Sidney Salkow (L'ultimo uomo della terra/The Last Man on Earth, 1963), Antonio Margheriti

5 Steve Swires, "Give Her a Hand," Fangoria 110, March 1992, 49.

6 All Elke Sommer quotes (unless otherwise attributed) are taken from a transcript of her audio commentary for Image Entertainment's DVD of The House of Exorcism, and may reflect material not included in the final edit of that commentary.

7 Swires.

(Danza macabra/Castle of Blood, 1964; I criminali della galassia/Wild, Wild Planet, 1965), Dario Argento (L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo/The Bird With the Crystal Plumage, 1970), Emilio P. Miraglia (La notte che Evelyn uscì dalla tomba/The Night Evelyn Came Out of the Grave, 1970) and Giorgio Ferroni (La notte dei diavoli/Night of the Devils, 1972). Baron Blood also marked the final collaboration of Bava and Pigozzi—at his best here as "the Italian Peter Lorre." He worked primarily for Margheriti in later years, before leaving Rome for a decade-long acting stint in the Philippines. He returned to Rome in 1996, where he now lives in retirement.

The film's most impressive performance is given by Rada Rassimov (the younger sister of actor Ivan Rassimov), who plays the dual role of Christina Hoffmann and Elizabeth Holle. Born Rada Djrassimovic in Trieste to Yugoslavian parents, Rassimov has worked primarily on the stage, though she did appear in a few Spaghetti Westerns, including Il buono, il brutto, il cattivo/The Good, the Bad and the Ugly (1966), Non aspettare, Django . . . spara (1969), Django il bastardo/The Stranger's Gundown (1969), and gialli like Per il gusto di uccidere (1966) and Dario Argento's Il gatto a nove code/The Cat o' Nine Tails (1971). A slender, graceful and handsome woman whose arresting gaze she shared with her brother, Rassimov is the most convincing of all the mystical women in Bava's films. Her character is notable—as was Fabienne Dali's role in Operazione paura—for not demonizing practitioners of Wicca, and actually sympathizing with their gnostic approach to life and nature. After Baron Blood, she starred opposite Diabolik's Michel Piccoli in the erotic comedy Grandeur nature/Love Doll (1973), after which her screen appearances become more irregular as she focused on stage work and television. She was also featured (with Mimsy Farmer) in the supporting cast of Fabio Carpi's acclaimed Quartetto Basileus/The Basileus Quartet (1982). Today, she has her own production company, Rada Film, and creates musicals for the stage. In 2000, she executive produced a mammoth real-time staging of Verdi's La Traviata, conducted by Zubin Mehta, which won her an Emmy Award.

LUCIANO PIGOZZI (a.k.a. "Alan Collins") as the prankster Fritz.

For the role of little Gretchen, Bava requested Nicoletta Elmi, the red-haired, 7-year-old actress who had been one of the two survivors of Ecologia del delitto. "I know that Mario Bava was a true maestro of the genre," Elmi recalls, "but I didn't even register that it was a horror film we were shooting. All I remember about that film is that we were all dressed up in heavy costumes and I had no scenes involving blood. Lamberto, his son, was always around, and I was overcome with nostalgia when we met again on the set of Demons." [8]

The casting of Baron Blood also has its share of mysteries. European cast lists mention several players who do not appear at all, while failing to note at least one actor with an actual speaking part. Appearing in the role of Dr. Werner Hesse is the uncredited Gustavo De Nardo, a featured player in La ragazza che sapeva troppo, I tre volti della paura, La frusta e il corpo, and La strada per Fort Alamo. De Nardo's voice was provided in the English version by Mel Welles, who once again directed the English-language dubbing sessions; in nearly every other case, at Leone's insistence, all of the principal roles were dubbed by the actors who played them. Ely Galleani, the young actress who had played Isabella in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto under the pseudonym "Justine Gall," is credited by some sources as playing Elizabeth Holle, and likewise, Maurice Poli (5 bambole, Cani arrabbiati) appears on some cast lists, but does not appear. The blonde young actress who plays Dr. Hesse's assistant Madeline (named in tribute to Alfredo Leone's wife) is uncredited.

RADA RASSIMOV as Christina Hoffmann, the most impressive of Bava's many occult women characters.

Production

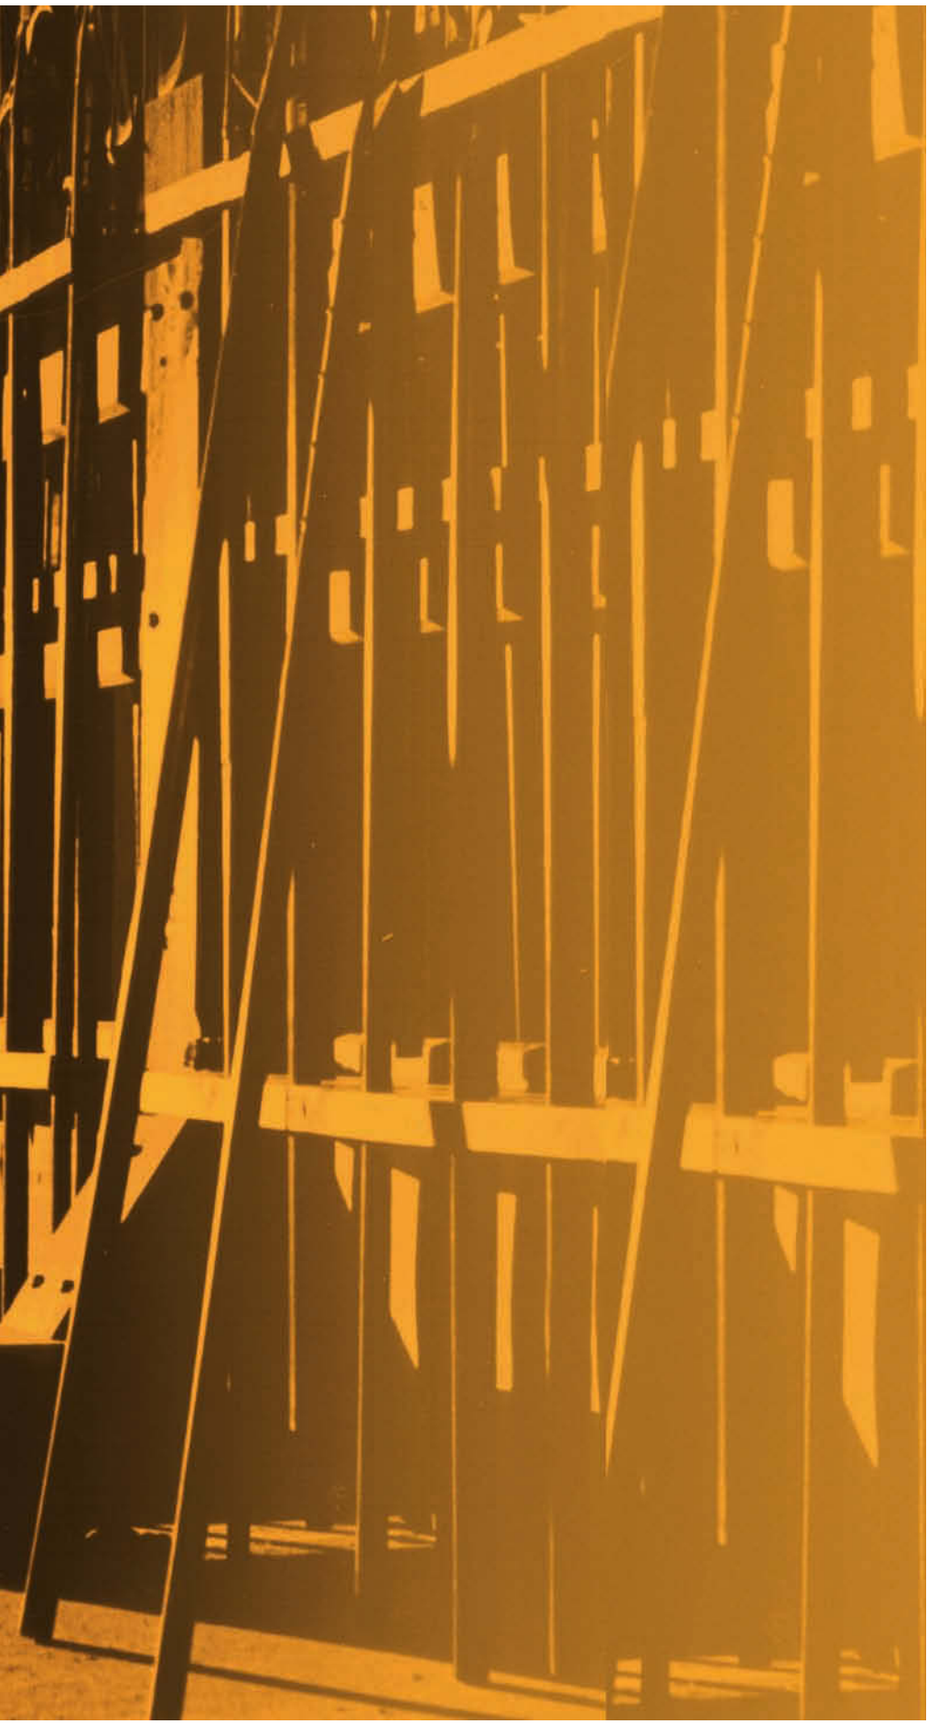
Production of Baron Blood—"always the film's title," says Leone, deflating the provenance of the cumbersome Italian title—began in September 1971 in Korneuburg, near Vienna. Virtually all of the film was shot in or around the Korneuburg Museum, and the cinematography makes it quite obvious that Bava was dazzled by the castle and its seemingly infinite arcane, antiquarian furnishings.

According to Leone, Bava approached the film with absolute dedication. "Mario was the sort of director who would do a storyboard every night, so he would know exactly where his camera was going to be the next day, what he was going to shoot, and at what angles. He was always prepared. Onscreen, the photography is credited to [Antonio] Rinaldi and [Emilio] Varriano, but it was always Mario. He worked mostly with Rinaldi at that time, who worked as his operator and got the second unit shots, and when he and Rinaldi got into some kind of disagreement, he brought in Varriano or somebody else."

Some critics have accused Baron Blood of being badly photographed, with crude zoom shots, but it is probably the handsomest and steadiest of the films attributed to Antonio Rinaldi, and the zoom shots continue Bava's experimentation with ways of visualizing and externalizing the emotional impact of shock. The notorious serial (quadruple) zoom that accompanies Eva's first sighting of the Baron follows a shot in Ecologia del delitto in which Claudine Auger, discovering four corpses in a bathtub, is photographed with three zooms out from her close-up, followed by one last zoom into her close-up.

Bava not only directed the film, wrote additional scenes, and (according to Leone) supervised the cinematography; he also took an active hand in decorating the sets. One production still shows him lovingly applying a mixture of makeup blood and glycerine to the spikes of the casket lid that impales Fritz. For a Bava film, Baron Blood contains surprisingly little in the vein of in-camera optical effects. The only such moment occurs during Christina's vision of Elizabeth Holle, as Rada Rassimov shares the screen with herself—as Christina, foregrounded at screen left, with the remainder of the frame unexposed, and then as Elizabeth, inserted into a bonfire by means of a reflector that merged the actress with adjacently positioned flames. Bava achieved the shot with the rock-steady Mitchell camera he had inherited from his father, to which Lamberto Bava sometimes referred as "mi sorella" ("my sister").

One week into production, Baron Blood suffered a near catastrophe when the source of Leone's funding suddenly bottomed out. "I had a letter of credit which was being discounted by the Bank of America in Rome," the producer explains, embarking on an epic anecdote. "When President Nixon made a speech about surcharges, word spread throughout Europe that America was going broke. Suddenly, you were able to buy American dollars at the Rome airport 300:1. At the time, the exchange rate was 6.25, so at a 50% discount, everyone was selling their dollars. Our crew was on location in Austria—in suburbs of Vienna and at the castle in Korneuburg—so the Bank of America in Rome that had agreed to discount my letter of credit suddenly refused to do it. So I had to come up with some money fast.



"I flew from Vienna to New York on a Thursday, and went to The Lamb's Club in the hopes of meeting some people and raising $125,000. I met with J. Arthur Elliott there, and he arranged for me to have breakfast at 9:00 the next morning with a guy named Sam Lang. I didn't have very high hopes for the meeting because, while Arthur was a nice guy, he was also the kind of guy who was always in trouble, if you know what I mean. I visited my brother—who was a doctor, God rest his soul—and he told his wife to write me a check for everything they had in their joint savings. I asked him if they had $125,000, and they didn't—they maybe had $40,000—so I told him he was a good brother for offering, but I wouldn't be a good brother for accepting. So I went to breakfast the next morning, not expecting very much. I get there, and there's Arthur and Sam. Sam is wearing this wig . . . forget about it! I get a bad feeling about this, but I sit down to breakfast, and Sam says, 'Arthur speaks very highly about you and your MARIO BAVA applies some finishing touches to the spikes that will mean the end of Fritz.

8 Loris Curci, "Child of Horror," Fangoria 150, March 1996, 15.

DELIGHTED with the well-stocked castle acquired for the filming by producer Alfredo Leone, Mario Bava takes a stroll through the armory.

pictures . . . How much money do you need?' I told him $125,000. He said, 'Okay—do you think you could take $40,000 now and come back next week for the balance?' I said I certainly could. Then he asked me if I could take it in British sterling. Absolutely, why not?

"After breakfast, Sam expressed an interest in seeing some of the work Arthur had spoken so highly of, and it so happened there was a print of Four Times That Night over at the Preview Theater on West 43rd St., where I had been screening it, trying to sell the picture. I set up a screening, and Sam called the bank, arranging for a cashier's check to be messengered to us there. We were watching the picture—first reel, second reel—no messenger! Finally, it's going on 3:30 and I'm thinking, 'This guy is full of crap!' I say, 'Sam, where's the goddamn messenger? I have to catch a 5:00 flight back to Vienna.' He called the Chase Manhattan Bank and they told him, yes, the messenger was sent, but he couldn't find the theater! So they agreed to send him back out. Sam goes back to the screening and I wait downstairs for the goddamn messenger to show up! Finally, he comes and he asks me, 'Are you Sam Lang?' 'No, I'm not, but that envelope is for me.' 'I'm sorry, but I'm authorized to deliver this only to Sam Lang.' I'm going out of my mind! 'Have you ever seen Sam Lang? How do you know I'm not Sam Lang?' He wouldn't budge, so I pulled Sam out of the theater again and got him to sign for it. As I'm hailing a cab for the airport, Sam asks me if I could give him and Arthur executive producer credit on the picture. Yes! Yes! I agreed! Only me and my laundry know how nervous I was!"[9]

Leone returned to Vienna on Saturday only to find himself entrenched in more money problems. It was his agreement with actor Joseph Cotten that payment was to be made weekly to his bank account in Rome, but when the actor heard that Leone was in New York trying to scrape together additional production funds, he demanded to be paid right away—in cash that Leone didn't have. Leone had a cashier's check for $40,000, but when he took it to the bank in Vienna, he was told that the bank manager's signature did not match the example in their books. The manager of the New York City bank had included his home telephone number with the check, in case his verification was needed over the weekend, but even though the Vienna office called and received this verification, they still refused to give Leone his money. How could they be sure that the man they had spoken to was really the manager of the New York office? His hands were going to be tied until the following Monday. This was unacceptable to Cotten, who rebelled by walking off the set and flying to London until his dollars were confirmed in his account. "Everyone else understood the situation," Leone says. "We shot without him, the scenes that didn't require him, and we shot around him, until he came back. He was the only problem we had."

Actually, there were other problems, though not related to money. Baron Blood was filmed with the idea that it would be eventually released in America by Allied Artists, with whom Leone had a "pre-sale agreement." One condition of this agreement was that every violent scene had to be shot in two versions: one (anything goes) for theatrical release, and the other (softer) for television. In accordance with this agreement, the final shot of Dr. Hesse's murder was filmed first with the slash across his throat clearly visible, and then with the lapel of his lab coat raised to conceal the fatal wound.

Some of the film's violent set pieces created endless headaches for the crew, such as the murder and hanging of Herr Dortmundt. "That was a difficult scene," Leone groans. "If you'll notice, it didn't come off too well, even 9 Alfredo Leone, interviewed by the author, June 21, 1999.

When Leone flew back to New York one week later to collect the balance of Sam Lang's investment, Lang told him that he and Arthur Elliott were forming a distribution company called Cinevision. He made it a condition of the funding that Cinevision would receive US distribution rights to Four Times That Night and Antonio Margheriti's Spaghetti Western Joko, invoca Dio . . . e muori!/Vengeance (1968), which Leone had also produced.

THE BARON traps Fritz inside an Iron Maiden then lifts the lid from the gruesome result.

in the full version. For some reason or other, the dummy gave us a lot of difficulty." (No matter how many times it was dropped or how many ways its limbs were weighted, as the rope went taut, they bounced about like a dummy's.) This scene was too much trouble to spend time restaging for television, so the TV version simply removes certain shots from the full-strength version: the breaking of Dortmundt's neck, the close-up of his face as the rope is pulled taut, and any shots of his dead face turning toward the camera were removed.

As a producer, Leone was usually in accord with anything Bava wanted to do, but he was also very much a hands-on producer—something Bava had avoided since his unhappy experience with Dino De Laurentiis on Diabolik. "Frequently," Leone admits, "I'd walk over to Bava while he was setting up a shot and we'd talk about ideas I'd had. He never lost his temper. Sometimes he'd say, 'It's a good idea, Leone, but I don't think so.' Then he'd go away to shoot, and sometimes he'd come back and say, 'You know, maybe you have something there; let's discuss it a little further.' On occasion, things would be done my way."

The story behind one of Leone's suggestions paints a telling portrait of their working relationship. While filming the scene in which Fritz is dragged unconscious to the dungeon and placed inside the spiked casket by the Baron, Leone told Bava—who had already storyboarded the sequence—how he thought it should be shot. "I wanted the camera to be placed in the casket, not on the outside," Leone says. "I wanted to see those spikes coming right into the eye of the camera, but it didn't come off that way."

What is interesting about Leone's suggestion is that Mario Bava had built his career on threatening the camera eye with sharp objects—such as the spikes lining the mask in La maschera del demonio—so if Bava had elected not to include a point-of-view angle, it was either because he was hesitant to repeat himself (not likely in a film that quotes I tre volti della paura, Sei donne per l'assassino, and even movies that Bava did not direct) or because he was conscious of the difficulties that such an idea would entail. Though the crew were probably aware of the irony of the situation, Bava never let Leone know that his idea was nothing new, and particularly nothing new to him. It says a lot about Bava's personal nature, and his desire to please Leone, that he proceeded to incorporate his wishes as best he could. The film contains something like a point-of-view shot of the spikes descending, but it was shot outside the casket—not inside, as Leone suggested. The "money shot" occurs just afterwards: a shot of Fritz' screaming face, in profile—a convincing life mask molded and painted by Carlo Rambaldi—as it receives the final slam of the lid with eyes and mouth wide open.

LUCIANO PIGOZZI with the mask of his face created by Carlo Rambaldi.

Another case in point: The script for Baron Blood opened with Peter Kleist's arrival at the airport in Austria, but during production, Leone had the brainstorm of getting some extra publicity for the picture by arranging for it to become the first production to film aboard a Pan Am 747 jet—a double-decker, luxury airliner which had only recently taken to the skies for the first time. Leone remains very proud of this coup. "The opening in-flight footage was stock footage that Pan Am had," he concedes, "but the landing of the jet is the actual landing of a Pan Am. It was the first time the airline allowed a 747 to be used in a film." Not only did Pan Am actually pay Leone $1,500 for this early bit of "product placement," the scene provided Leone and his daughter Kathy with opportunities to appear on-camera. On the plane, Leone can be seen seated directly behind Antonio Cantáfora, who settles next to Kathy. (Speaking of cameo appearances, Bava himself can be seen walking past the camera, slightly hunched in a brown sweater, early in the film—immediately after Karl's car is shown driving toward the portcullis of the castle.) As someone uncomfortable with air travel, Bava saw the 747 shooting as a means of instilling his personal fears and superstitions in the picture from the very first frame.

Leone observed another instance of Bava's superstitions during the filming: "I didn't know this, but Mario was deathly superstitious about owls. For the scene where Rada Rassimov is killed by the Baron, the set decorator [Stefano Bulgarelli] installed a stuffed owl on the set. As soon as Bava saw it, he said, 'Bad luck,' and demanded that it be removed." Perhaps the prop owl reminded him of Operazione paura, made six years earlier, which had run out of money and had to be finished by the charity of the cast and crew. Bava had no problem with allowing a stuffed owl to be featured prominently in that film, so whatever unlucky associations the prop held for him had been acquired since that production.

Demonstrating his customary efficiency under what must have been occasionally stressful circumstances, Bava completed the film under budget and three days ahead of its six-week schedule. The budget, which Leone prefers to be kept off-the-record, was considerably less than its official production cost of "about a million dollars."

By the time the film was completed, the credit on the film's screenplay had grown a bit more convoluted. The main titles of the American International Pictures release read, "Original screenplay and story by Vincent Fotre, Adapted for the Screen by William A. Bairn." According to Leone, Baron Blood's script was almost completely the work of Fotre, with the exception of some additional material devised by Bava, such as the business of the blood creeping under the door during the invocation scene. "William Bairn was a US writer brought on, more or less, as a dialogue coach," Leone explains. "We gave him a screen credit, but he really didn't have too much to do with it." To confuse matters further, European prints extend additional credit to Wilibald Eser. "That was probably done for the benefit of the Italian/German co-production agreement," Leone says. "Eser is just a fictitious name."

Fifteen years after the filming wrapped, at a 1987 Florida book-signing for his autobiography Vanity Will Get You Somewhere, Joseph Cotten was asked about his Baron Blood experience. The actor remembered the film without affection in light of the money incident, but as he signed a Baron Blood lobby card over the objections of his wife Patricia Medina ("You don't have to sign that"), he spoke favorably of Mario Bava, whom he recalled as "a very interesting and talented man." Needless to say, Baron Blood did not rate a mention in the (highly selective) filmography in the back of Cotten's book. The distinguished actor died of pneumonia on February 6, 1994, in Westwood, California.

Leone tells an amusing story about the first screenings of the finished picture at FonoRoma: "The first time we screened it, Federico Fellini came. I believe the film was still on interlock [synchronized playback of separate picture and sound elements] at the time. He stood at the back of the screening room and watched; he was a big fan of Bava's and he told us afterwards how much he enjoyed [Baron Blood]. The second time we screened, I'll never forget . . . it was the first screening of the first answer print. There was a small group of people that Bava invited over to see the picture, and I had a hell of a time concentrating on it because the guy sitting next to me fidgeted through the whole picture! It was driving me crazy! When it was over, people stood up, and I went over to Mario and asked him what he thought, and he was beaming. 'I loved it!' he said. 'What did you think?" he asked me. And I told him, frankly, that I'd had a hell of a time paying attention because of the fidgeting of this guy who was sitting next to me. 'What is it with him?" I said. Bava laughed and said, 'Ah, that's Antonioni! He has tics!' I had no idea what Michelangelo Antonioni looked like, so I hadn't recognized him, and I didn't know this at the time, but he had a nervous condition and made these involuntary movements. Mario took me over, introduced me to him. Antonioni was also very complimentary about the picture. It was an amazing time."

THREE shots illustrating Rada Rassimov's seance with herself: Rada as Christina Hoffmann, standing beside a bonfire; Rada as Elizabeth Holle, photographed against a black backdrop; a double exposure places Elizabeth in the flames, as in this posed publicity photo.

BAVA directs Massimo Girotti prior to filming Karl Hummel's arrival at the airport.

Music / Variant

Considering how perfectly much of Baron Blood recaptures the rapture of Bava's "Golden Age" releases, it is unfortunate that Carlo Rustichelli was not invited to score the picture. Instead, Alfredo Leone hired Stelvio Cipriani, who had followed his work on Bava's Roy Colt & Winchester Jack and Ecologia del delitto with a successful and much-praised score for Enrico Maria Salerno's Anonimo veneziano/The Anonymous Venetian (1970). To Leone's surprise—and to yours and mine, no doubt, considering his fine work on Ecologia del delitto in particular—Mario Bava was unhappy with his selection.

"Bava didn't want Cipriani to score Baron Blood," Leone admits, "but I insisted. I thought he was a prize catch, especially after The Anonymous Venetian. Bava didn't care for his work. He pleaded with me, saying, 'Not Cipriani! He's not original; he copies everything!' But I feel that he gave us an outstanding score." [10]

Despite Leone's enthusiasm for Cipriani's contribution, in contrast to the eerie, samba-flavored music that fuelled Ecologia del delitto, his score for Baron Blood is murky and unmemorable. In a sense, Cipriani's earlier score was able to work because Ecologia was a contemporary story, with a balance of exterior and interior settings; Baron Blood, on the other hand, is primarily an interior set piece, and though it is a contemporary story, its atmosphere is oppressively historical. Cipriani's music acknowledges neither of these conditions; with one or two exceptions (such as the musical sting when Gretchen's ball rolls past the hand of the Baron, watching her from behind a tree), Cipriani doesn't seem to have scored the film so much as supplied it with ready-made tracks that might be called "Travel," "Chase" (very similar to the music heard during the build-up to Brunhilda's murder in Ecologia), and "Mysterioso." A bolder sound mix might have helped, but the tenor of the music is completely passive and it is usually present only in short murmurs. The main theme would make passable cocktail hour music for a classy '60s bar on the Riviera, but it is inappropriate as a mood-setter here, especially when it is reprised over the end titles—after a crescendo of horror that leaves the heroine in hysterics, as though she has been traumatized to the point of madness.

As mentioned earlier, Alfredo Leone produced Baron Blood with the expectation of selling the distribution rights to Allied Artists. However, when he learned—prior to signing his contract—that Allied Artists intended to release the film only as a double feature co-attraction, he declined their offer and shopped the completed picture around.

Leone's first stop was Samuel Z. Arkoff at American International Pictures, where Bava had his first big success with Black Sunday. Newly separated from longtime business partner James H. Nicholson, Arkoff was gratified to be offered a new Mario Bava film so well-drenched in atmosphere as Baron Blood, which looked uncannily like a horror film from AIP's heyday. Without hesitation, he called Leone, told him that it was "a great movie" and paid him $125,000 for the US theatrical rights.

Leone: "Arkoff couldn't get over how good it was! He said to me, 'It's a great picture, Al! How did you get Bava to do it?' I said, 'What do you mean? Bava's a genius! There's nothing he can't do!' And Arkoff explained to me that Bava had suffered a nervous breakdown during the last picture they had done together [Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs], which had not gone so well, and it had frankly put him off working with him again. But Sam admired Bava and was very pleased to see him come back with a good, strong picture." [11]

Despite Arkoff's enthusiasm for Baron Blood, it should come as no surprise to anyone familiar with AIP's past involvement with Bava's films that the picture was subjected to some post-production meddling. Leone remembers that Arkoff called him, requesting permission to show Baron Blood at his in-home screening room, to a test audience of his children and their high school friends. The screening was a moderate success, but Arkoff felt that the film was overlong at nearly 100 minutes and needed to "lose a reel."

The editorial changes imposed on Bava's films by AIP in the past were sometimes constructive, sometimes not, and often completely unnecessary. However, in the case of Baron Blood, AIP's post-production revisions amount to nearly a complete success. Though the European version contains additional exposition, atmosphere, and graphic violence, its leisurely pace dissipates its force; it does not have the impact of the AIP cut. The Euro version seems to contain all the coverage of the Korneuburg Museum that Bava shot; too many scenes are preceded and accented with moody contemplations of the castle's medieval icons and weaponry, its high groined ceilings, its tapestries, its antique ironwork. A little of this would have accentuated the atmosphere—note the remarkable, first interior shot, which Bava makes all the more dazzling and disorienting with a 24 mm wide-angle lens—but a little goes a long way.

Among the material cut from the AIP version:

• Shots of Peter relaxing with a drink aboard the 747 and also deplaning.

• Subjective shots of the drive to Schloss des Teufels, with the discussion of the castle's name placed later in the shortened montage.

• More shots of Karl's Mercedes driving through the castle grounds.

• A jokey moment prior to the reading of the parchment, when Peter spreads his arms and announces, "And now the incantation!" in a camped-up, spooky way which is inappropriate since he immediately objects to Eva's similar pronouncement of "Kunik Sator Holmat," telling her that the incantation must not be read disrespectfully.

• A short dialogue exchange after the reversal of the incantation, as Peter stands outside on a balcony overlooking the courtyard—Eva says, "It had to be Fritz" and Peter adds, "I hope so."

• After the second incantation: footage of the parchment falling into the fire; the plans of the burned room floating out an open window; and more suspenseful build-up to the Baron's approach.

• After the blood pours under the door and the danger subsides, Peter says, "I can't understand it—it's impossible," and Eva blurts out, "Peter, there is something horrible and terrifying out there and we have released it!"

• The shot of Dr. Hesse on the floor after his stabbing was replaced by the softer, TV version of the shot.

• An additional establishing shot of the university where Karl teaches, followed by shots of him parking his Mercedes and the arrival of Peter and Eva in a separate car.

• A brief diversion after Dortmundt approaches the Coca-Cola machine, as he opens a wooden cabinet to the right of the soda dispenser, stashes away some letters he was carrying, and pauses to quickly read one—as the camera zooms over his shoulder to reveal the Baron lurking in the rafters just behind him.

• The extended shot of the spiral staircase after the Baron carries Dortmundt's dead body upstairs, as the rope bannister is pulled up and tied around his neck.

• An overhead shot of the Baron carrying the bludgeoned Fritz away, with Dortmundt hanging in the center of the shot.

• The first part of the castle auction, as twenty crated large-screen color television sets are sold.

• Some unnecessary confusion as Peter drives into the castle courtyard and hears Eva's screams after she comes face-to-face with the Baron inside—he shouts her name and begs her for a hint of where she might be, as the camera points up to pan around the towers of the castle.

• Shots of Peter running inside the castle, up a long flight of stairs and through several rooms before he reaches Becker (the AIP cut makes it seem like Becker was right inside the door, so that it seems odd that he could have traversed such a distance in so little time).

• After driving Eva back to the student hostel, Peter kisses her and they exchange some romantic talk ("Don't say anything; we don't need words.") before he suggests that she move into his uncle's house—but she demurs.

• Inside the hostel, Eva picks up her room key at the register, pauses

ELKE SOMMER takes a lunch break with her director, who seldom ate with his actors.

10 Bava's opinion actually has some validity. A British/Spanish/Italian co-production made around the same time, José Larraz' Deviation (1971) sports a very similar Cipriani score, possibly assembled from outtakes recorded during the Bava film sessions. Likewise, Cipriani's score for La polizia chiede aiuto/What Have They Done to Your Daughters? (1974) was reworked from his earlier score for Roberto Infascelli's La Polizia Sta A Guardare (1973). The earlier arrangement can be heard in the trailer to the later film, and it was even later recycled as the main theme of Ovidio Assonitis' Tentacoli/Tentacles (1977).

11 Though AIP had handled the physical distribution of Twitch of the Death Nerve, Arkoff probably paid little attention to this side of his business, so it is not surprising that he was unaware of handling Bava's previous picture.

to think of Peter, smiles wistfully to herself, then walks down the hall to her quarters.

• Slight trims were made to the "night stalking" scene, including Eva's attempt to flag down a taxi.

• Prior to the Baron's arrival to exact his revenge on Christina Hoffmann, the scene is abbreviated, omitting shots of the medium as the voice of Elizabeth Holle warns her, "Death awaits . . . death, death . . . In you, he sees Elizabeth Holle . . . you cannot escape him, Christina . . . you cannot escape him"—and the camera zooms into the face of the Baron, peering through her window.

• The first part of the scene in the police inspector's office, as he questions Eva about the man in her room, and Peter suggests that he take it easy on her, because she's been through a terrible ordeal.

• Some extra footage of Gretchen staring at the castle, before dropping her apple.

• An addition, as the sound of howling dogs was added to the unveiling of the impaled corpses hanging from the castle turrets—recalling the moment in "I wurdalak" when Gorka's dog howls at the scent of the severed head in his travelling bag.

• The overhead shot of Peter, Eva, and Karl fleeing the torture chamber, as Eva shrieks, "Look behind you, he's coming for us!" which is followed by a scene in the main room of the castle where Eva seems hysterical to the point of madness.

• The shot of Peter and Eva inside the car plays differently in the Euro version, with Peter calming her by saying, "Don't look back, Evie"—which is dubbed differently in the AIP cut.

• And finally, prior to the end titles, the shot of the Baron standing on a balcony of Schloss des Teufels is freeze-framed before the credits roll whereas, in the Euro cut, the Baron vanishes into thin air as Elizabeth Holle begs for the right to cut into his heart.

UNCLE KARL takes aim against the undead.

The AIP version, which is approximately 7½ minutes shorter than the European cut, carries no mention of who supervised the US edit, but it was likely Salvatore Billitteri, the editor of the AIP version of Black Sunday, who continued to provide post-production services of such AIP titles of the period as Frogs (1971) and Blacula (1972). Overall, the pruning was judicious and strengthening. The de rigueur romance between Peter and Eva adds nothing to the picture, and after the removal of the kiss, there is nothing in their later interactions to suggest that it ever took place. The only truly regrettable cuts are the violence trims (including the impressive overhead shot of the hanging Dortmundt as Fritz is being dragged away) and the extended version of the "night stalking" sequence which, in the Euro version, goes on only slightly longer but crosses that invisible line where FRITZ emerges from his spike-lined coffin in a classic Italian gothic shot.

FRANCO TOCCI in two stills affording a better look at Rambaldi's Baron Blood mask.

Eva begins to seem lost in a metaphysical realm where the past and present blur. Seen in its original form, the sequence looks ahead to the early sequence of Lisa getting lost in an unholy Toledo in Lisa and the Devil.

"After making the cuts," Leone remembers, "Arkoff felt there was still something lacking, which he attributed to the soundtrack, the music score. He asked me how I would feel about changing it, and I told him I'd have to rely on his expertise—after all, AIP was the horror company in those days. They had a guy running the company named Dick Zimber who, in his own way, told me that I'd better think long and hard about this, because it could be a mistake. But I was not too astute on distribution, so I trusted Sam's instincts and allowed the score to be changed."

And so, as had happened many times in the past, Arkoff hired Les Baxter to hurriedly compose a replacement score. The last-minute nature of this decision is reflected in the fact that AIP's theatrical trailer for Baron Blood utilized the Cipriani score, as Baxter's was being composed right up until shortly before the revamped film's October release.

Baxter's replacement score is a triumph. An immense boon to the picture, it makes us feel from the very first shot that we are watching a horror film of epic ambition. Baxter underscored the sequences set in and around the castle with a French horn fanfare that is at once regal and mellowed yet ominous, and he added greatly to the film's metaphysical presence with atonal stings and accents. There were performed with aberrant instrumentation like strummed piano wires, Moog synthesizer, and piano and guitar played back at varying tape speeds (sometimes with added reverb), producing a quivering abyss of sound evocative of the Beyond. He also introduced leitmotifs into the picture, so that minor French horn parts heard during our initial views of the castle are repeated and reinforced by full orchestra at the time of the Baron's resurrection. Likewise, the music heard as the amulet revives Fritz also infuses the scene with the occult presence of Christina Hoffmann and, by extension, Elizabeth Holle. Attentive touches like these give the AIP version a resonance that Bava didn't put there (but surely would have approved) and show just how lazily Stelvio Cipriani had approached the assignment.

Release

Though they were made nearly a decade apart, the narrative similarities between Baron Blood and Antonio Margheriti's La vergine di Norimberga were not lost on Bava's Italian distributor. When the film was released in Rome on February 25, 1972, it made its bow under the title Gli orrori del castello di Norimberga. Adding a bewildering touch of the bizarre to the coincidence is that the advertising campaign subsequently devised at American International Pictures for the film's US release cribbed extensively from the promotional art which accompanied the German release of Margheriti's film under the title Das Schloß des Grauens ("The Castle of Terrors").

ITALIAN fotobusta showing Mr. Becker torturing Uncle Karl on the rack—a scene not included in the final cut.

At the time Baron Blood was made, AIP was one of many independent film companies whose product seemed to be singled out for editorial interference from the Motion Picture Association of America. Financed by Hollywood's major studios, the MPAA always seemed willing to play ball with the pillars of the studio system, while cracking down on independent exploitation releases. Seen today in its uncut form, Baron Blood seems almost too tame in its violence to qualify for a PG-rating, but the MPAA branded the near-bloodless film with an R rating on its first pass. AIP wanted a PG rating to maximize the film's commercial reach, and resorted to using the softer version of Dr. Hesse's death (with his coat lapel blocking the view of his slashed throat, which Bava had filmed for the TV version) in the theatrical cut. They also darkened certain shots, such as the Baron raising the lid of the spiked casket from Fritz' punctured body, rendering the shot less brightly gruesome.

"The picture was ready to open in July, but AIP's additional work on the picture pushed our opening back to October—so we missed the [summer] drive-in business," Leone complains, still annoyed by AIP's mishandling of the film. "Not only did we miss the drive-ins, but by October, AIP had released the first black horror films—Blacula, and so on—and they started a fresh trend. The old type of horror film had suddenly become passé!"

In an effort to make the film seem more graphic than it had been even before it was cut, AIP test-marketed the alternate titles The Thirst of Baron Blood and The Torture Chamber of Baron Blood. The latter stuck in all of AIP's print advertising—with the exception of lobby cards, which pluralized the title to The Torture Chambers of Baron Blood—but the onscreen title remained, simply, Baron Blood. The print advertising also trumpeted the picture as "An Alfred Leone Film." As Baron Blood hearkened back to the style of AIP's horror films of the early '60s, so did the print campaign, which contained this Special Notice: "The Management disclaims any responsibility for patrons who suffer A.) Apoplectic Strokes, B.) Cerebral Hemorrhages, C.) Cardiac Seizures, or D.) Fainting Spells during the shockingly gruesome scenes in this film."

Unusually, upon its release, Baron Blood received a notice in Time magazine, whose critic Jay Cocks opined: "Director Mario Bava has made a great many other films of this sort (Black Sunday being perhaps the best known), each displaying a formidable interest in interior decoration matched by a lofty disregard for intelligence. Hitchcock has his staircases, Bertolucci his interludes of dance; Mario Bava likes to bring on the Iron Maiden as a particularly personal touch. Here, as always, he makes appropriately ghastly use of it." [12]

Variety critic "Murf." gave the picture a conflicted, but ultimately passing nod: "Baron Blood is an okay horror exploitationer . . . [it] has some strong visual assets, which help overcome weak acting and some plot limps . . . Mario Bava's direction has many good moments of mood, but excessive use of zooms is self-defeating, and some shrill histrionics by Cotten and Sommer often send the film into dated meller [melodrama] orbit, even for the film's potential audiences. Supporting players are adequate. Les Baxter's eerie music helps in many places." [13]

For many years, the AIP cut was standard in America, and it was this version that was released by Thorn HBO Video in the 1980s and on LaserDisc by HBO/Image Entertainment in 1991. This changed when the film's US rights reverted to Alfredo Leone in 1992. In 1996, Leone sold the US video rights to Elite Entertainment for three years, and at that time, the Euro version made its American debut on LaserDisc as part of a double bill with Bava's Lisa and the Devil. Since then, it has become the standard American version, with subsequent VHS release by Anchor Bay Entertainment. When Elite's contract expired in 1999, Leone licensed the film's video rights to Image Entertainment, who released the European cut on DVD.

The AIP version of Baron Blood currently resides in legal limbo. AIP's rights to the film expired a decade ago, and even if Alfredo Leone wished to resurrect the AIP cut, he would have to make financial arrangements with MGM to acquire their materials, which he is not likely to do. The negative materials of the AIP version are almost certainly in the vaults at Sony, who currently own most of AIP's classic library, but Sony is in a similar bind: They no longer have any right to release the picture, yet they do have a unique version, with its own unique soundtrack. As Leone has shown with his copyrighted editions of public domain fare like La maschera del demonio, it is possible to assert copyright by changing a film's soundtrack. However, Baron Blood is not a public domain title; it is owned by Alfredo Leone, and this puts the AIP version in deadlock. At present, only if Leone sells the film back to Sony in perpetuity is this alternate cut likely to resurface.

Commentary

Coming at this point in Mario Bava's career, Baron Blood is analogous to John Coltrane's Ballads album—which was recorded after a series of adventurous "free jazz" releases to prove to more conventional jazz listeners that the brilliant saxophonist could still play traditional jazz if he chose to do so. Ballads is a lush, beautiful album—fine enough to have made another musician's career, had anyone else recorded it—but coming after Giant Steps and My Favorite Things, its assured familiarity seemed a regressive, time-marking, and therefore unsatisfying statement. Like the Coca Cola machine in Schloss des Teufels, Baron Blood is an anachronism: a '60s style matinee shocker in the style of Black Sunday or Black Sabbath, the movies upon which Bava's reputation as a horror specialist were founded. Baron Blood proves that Bava—if he wanted to, or had to—could do what many horror buffs at the time hoped he would do, and bring back the more conservative, gothic horror of AIP's heyday. The look is there, the feel is there, sometimes even the heart is there, but coming from a director who has shown us scenes of real terror, real shock, in increasingly inventive guises, Baron Blood gives us Mario Bava imitating Mario Bava. Like Peter Kleist, he is communicating here with his own past.

Baron Blood is one of the few films in which Bava stoops to slavish imitation, including self-imitation. The shot of blood burbling under the locked door after the Baron's resurrection quotes a shot from Jacques Tourneur's The Leopard Man (1943), and the night chase scene is virtually a shot-by-shot remake of a similar, classic scene involving Vincent Price and Phyllis Kirk in Andre de Toth's House of Wax (1953), a film in which the disfigured villain also disguises himself as a cultured older gentleman in a wheelchair and returns to his old haunt after his "death." Leone confirms that Bava was responsible for introducing both scenes to the film, and curiously, both of these quotations refer to directors with whom Bava had previously worked as a cameraman and uncredited co-director. [14] The incantation and chase sequences are marvelously executed, but for anyone familiar with the originals, they compare unfavorably. During the scene of Dr. Hesse's death, Bava even quotes himself—or rather, Sei donne per l'assassino—by placing a swinging telephone receiver in the background of a shot. The film also quotes I tre volti della paura when Fritz meets his death after stealing a ring from the finger of the dead Dortmundt, and the storyline also echoes La maschera del demonio in many ways, being the story of a noble European family terrorized by an evil, resurrected ancestor immortalized in portraits (the burned room of von Kleist is analogous to the Vajda family's ruined chapel), and a curse bellowed across centuries by a witch burned at the stake. The actress who plays that witch gives a dual performance, and the resurrection of Baron von Kleist is similar to the famous shot of Javutich climbing out of his muddy grave.

ITALIAN manifesto depicting Fritz' gruesome reawakening as Christina's amulet works its magic.

However, by comparing Baron Blood to these other films, one can see how much more juice Bava was capable of squeezing from spent grapes. If Bava's approach to this film was not wholly original, there are several factors that could explain this. For one thing, it was "work for hire"—"An Alfred Leone Film," as the picture's American ads say—a project that did not originate with him, that was not particularly close to him, that he had not instigated himself. Secondly, working on the picture forced him to leave the home environment in which he was most comfortable while working, so his creative adjustment was compounded with a more significant personal one. But, in a greater sense, Baron Blood must have seemed like backpedalling to Bava, after making a film as shocking and innovative as Ecologia del delitto. [15] This is all the more frustrating because Baron Blood seems to promise much more mayhem than the previous film did, and fails to deliver. Production photos exist that show Becker torturing Karl on the rack in his torture dungeon, but there are no such scenes in the film; indeed, the murders that are committed onscreen do very little to reinforce the Baron's legend as a connoisseur of inflicting pain. Only one scene conveys a powerful sense of this monster's capacity for cruelty: when Becker shows the principals how he has decorated the castle turrets as the Baron did, with impaled bodies. Our heroes are led to think that these are merely effigies, but as they return inside the castle from the balcony, Bava cuts away to a memorable close-up of one victim's profile that shows a telltale gleam of humanity in his dead, staring eye. This moment also quotes a scene from an earlier picture: Arne Mattsson's Mannekäng i rött (1958), one of the likely influences on Sei donne per l'assassino.

Another reason for Bava to revisit his cinematic past in this context is to underscore the theme at hand, which is the importance of preserving and 12 Jay Cocks, "Baron Blood" review, Variety, March 5, 1973. In fact, no true Iron Maiden appears in any of Bava's films, not even Baron Blood.

13 Murf., "Baron Blood" review, Variety, October 25, 1972.

14 Bava photographed and co-directed Tourneur's La battaglia di Maratona/The Giant of Marathon (1959), and contributed uncredited work to de Toth's Morgan il pirata/Morgan the Pirate (1960).

15 Also, as some of his friends and colleagues have noted, Bava had been trying during this period to work in other genres, to break away from the horror genre. It could be argued that all of his films since I tre volti della paura had been attempts to rework or transcend the horror genre, but Baron Blood had no ambition other than to be a commercial success.

FRENCH affiche.

respecting the past. It is in this context that Baron Blood is most interesting. The subplot about the refurbishment of Schloss des Teufels into a tourist trap hotel parallels the threat of "development" overhanging the bayside property in Ecologia del delitto. When Alfred Becker completes his own authentic restoration of the castle, Eva questions his decision to restore the only known portrait of Otto von Kleist without also restoring the part of the canvas that was slashed to erase his facial features. Becker sensibly replies, "Artistic integrity, dear Eva. Since no one knows what the Baron actually looked like, would you have a painter give him a face that was not truly his own? I've restored not only the furniture of the castle, but its atmosphere, the personality of its owner." While this was supposedly Eva's own task as the previous supervisor of the restoration, Becker's question exposes the essential frivolity and irresponsibility with which she and Dortmundt undertook that venture. And so the plot boils down, once again, to Bava's outrage that something of beauty, like Schloss des Teufels, would be compromised for the sake of making a profit.

Similarly, the earlier shot of Dortmundt walking through a series of ancient corridors laden with centuries of exquisite craftsmanship to reach a Coca-Cola machine speaks volumes of auteuriste disdain; when the Baron's ravaged hands twist Dortmundt's neck to a curt snap, the product placement in the shot makes the scene about more than what is happening in it. Peter's idle curiosity about his ancestor is portrayed as a different kind of disrespect toward history because his interest is rooted at once in narcissism and in his glorification of villainy, without cognizance of the tremendous suffering his ancestor caused, or sympathy for his victims. When Becker responds to Peter and Karl's suggestions that Otto von Kleist was insane and a sadist, he calls these words "matters of terminology," meaning that the accusations are relative, and just as applicable to the fools who summoned him back.

Three sequences in particular find Bava working at the peak of his powers. The first is Peter and Eva's discovery of the hidden room within the castle, where they encounter the slashed, web-strewn portrait of Otto von Kleist. Only the penetrating, ice-blue eyes of the Baron remain intact, and seem to gaze balefully at them across a gulf of centuries; Bava accentuates this sense of communication with reverse shots of the couple, standing on the other side of the web, with only their eyes visible in the darkness. Viewers of the film will notice that the painting shown in close-up differs from the one shown in a long shot. According to Leone, the latter—which is shown hanging on the wall of the castle—was executed prior to filming by someone on the film's art crew, according to Bava's instructions. This painting did not lend itself to the effect Bava had envisioned for the close-ups, so after the production wrapped, he painted and photographed his own version in Rome and included these pick-up shots in the editing room. Bava's lucid, classical rendering of the Baron's cold eyes peering from a faceless darkness provides the film with its most poetically unsettling moment. Equally effective, especially in the Les Baxter-scored AIP cut, is the second incantation scene, which conveys a palpable sense of dread and panic. The power of the scene is badly deflated in the Euro cut, which presents it without music and reduced to the ambient sounds of wind, rattling windows and the creaking of the turning, rusty door handle.

The other highlight is Rada Rassimov's appearance as Christine Hoffmann, the last in a long line of supernaturally inclined women who figure in Bava's films, beginning with Lidia Alfonsi's red-cloaked sybil in Le fatiche di Ercole in 1958. These characters appear so forcefully, and with such frequency, in Bava's films that we must assume they had great personal significance for him, but it is difficult to tell whether his feelings about them were positive or negative. In the context of his historical and mythological films, Bava's oracles are helpful guides with the power to verbalize for mere mortals the dictates of Destiny; however, in his horror films, these women are mostly depicted as lonely, isolated creatures who have embraced the supernatural as a substitute for sexual fulfillment or out of a thirst for revenge. As Uncle Karl cautions Peter about the occult in the course of introducing Christina, "One's obsession with it could be the real danger." Nevertheless, as played by Rassimov, Christina is an example of a woman wholly empowered by her occult knowledge, a significant return to the authentic, all-powerful oracles of the Hercules films. Though a solitary soul, Christina is in no way diminished by her solitude; indeed, she speaks as though her mind has risen above the needs of the flesh and become equally attuned to all points in time—past, present, and future—and her movements have a weirdly graceful choreography that adds greatly to the impression she makes. When Baron von Kleist enters her room (the camera curiously cutting away before we can see more than the edge of his garment), Christina submits to death as serenely as Anna Fosatti did before her in Ecologia del delitto—as though she has seen it foretold a million times. She crosses her braceleted arms above her head, enfolding herself in her black cloak, and waits for the blow to fall. Art director Enzo Bulgarelli also deserves acknowledgment for his contribution to Rassimov's scenes, as the furnishings of Christina's dwelling are every bit as arcane as the antiques of the Korneuburg Museum.

ITALIAN due-foglia, art by Piero Ermanno Iaia.

MEXICAN lobby card, picturing the Baron stalking Gretchen outside the castle.

Of the film's other performances, Antonio Cantáfora makes a fair impression as Peter Kleist, despite being somewhat miscast; his American college student is shown smoking and drinking aboard the 747 like a debonair European man of the world. Cantáfora takes pleasing advantage of opportunities for humor, such as his reaction to Herr Dortmundt's hope that he hasn't inherited any of his forebear's sadistic proclivities ("One never knows!"), and to a menu of those proclivities ("Sweet guy!"), offering glimpses of wit and humor that one wishes were more pronounced in the picture overall. Peter's early fascination with the Baron, the amusement he takes in visiting his ancestor's dungeon, and his unexplored obsession with resurrecting him, hints that Peter has probably inherited some of his ancestor's dark traits, but unfortunately, this aspect goes unexplored.

Joseph Cotten is better at playing Otto von Kleist than Alfred Becker, which, despite the wheelchair, is a role that he simply walks through. It doesn't help that (as in House of Wax) the invalid Becker's true identity is never in question; as he stands and steps out of his wheelchair, the revelation carries no charge whatsoever. Needless to say, the 65-year-old Cotten did not wear the Rambaldi-designed latex mask and gloves of the disfigured Otto von Kleist; those scenes were played by Franco Tocci, who was given a "special effects" credit on the picture. When not playing the Baron, Tocci was in charge of on-set effects, like the malfunctioning dummy of Herr Dortmundt, and providing a flaming brazier in the Baron's torture chamber.

Elke Sommer's performance suffers from bad writing, miscasting, and some of the most distractingly garish wardrobe ever worn by an actress in a '70s movie. Sommer was 31 at the time of filming, yet her character is written like a petulant college intern, alternately imperious, bland, or helpless. This was Sommer's first horror film, and her reactions to horrific situations are without subtlety or nuance—she actually shoves her fingers into her mouth when she screams—which makes her as startling as the things provoking her reaction. Also, the way Eva and Peter's relationship vaults suddenly from playful flirtation to serious love after he rescues her from Baron von Kleist is hard to swallow, and both Sommer and Cantáfora seem to know this. However, by working with Sommer, Bava intuited her real strengths and put them to much better advantage in their next collaboration.

Massimo Girotti gives a good, earnest performance in the face of some absurd dialogue—such as when his professor of architecture mentions, "As you know, part of my work here at the University involves research in extra-sensory perception!"—and Luciano Pigozzi is a welcome presence, adding to the film's sense of tradition and providing the film's greatest single image of graphic horror, as the spiked body of Fritz is revived by Christina Hoffman's amulet. Piccola Nicoletta Elmi is an almost obnoxiously cloying presence, saying, "Good night!" three times as she leaves a room, and forever being fawned over by the adult characters. Gretchen is the least subtle of Bava's many psychically attuned child/female characters. One of the movie's most grating moments is when the adults are trying to make sense of Christina Hoffman's assurance that they have the power to defeat the Baron, and Gretchen peeks around the side of a door and drones, "Maybe . . . she meant . . . the amulet!" The dubbing of Gretchen (which the monolingual Elmi performed herself) is excruciating throughout, due in part to Leone's insistence that the actors speak their lines in English, phonetically if need be, to be post-synched later. However, this particular moment contains another of Bava's references to his earlier work, namely Operazione paura, as Gretchen is clutching a ball.

Gretchen's name, incidentally, may have been inspired by the title on a book prominently carried by Girotti in one scene—and kept too prominently in frame for its selection to be irrelevant: Thassilo von Scheffer's 1938 reference Die Kultur des Griechen ("Greek Culture"). Bava characterized himself, in a late interview, as "very Greek for an Italian . . . more heretic than Catholic," [16] which may explain his unusual open-mindedness toward pagan religions and the compassion he shows for the witches who were burned to death by good Christians like Otto von Kleist. One of von Scheffer's other books, Hellenische Mysterien und Orakel ("Hellenic Mysteries and Oracles," 1948), covers this very ground.

Despite its faults, it must be acknowledged that Baron Blood—whichever version you might see—is an atmospheric, old-fashioned above-average horror movie. Alfredo Leone's support and the sheer production value of the Korneuburg Museum resulted in a more expensive-looking product than Bava had created in many years—glossy, well-cast, and unmistakably commercial. His production skills raised Bava back to a level of respectability in the Italian film industry that he had not occupied since the completion of Diabolik. Unfortunately, much of the film's original luster is lost in the currently available, fairly drab home video transfers. Bava and Leone complemented each other well, and the films they made together rank high among the most sumptuous-looking pictures Bava ever made. But it is in the AIP version of the film, currently unavailable, that their collaboration here is most effective, and one hopes it will resurface in the years ahead.

Leone remembers Bava on pay day: "He was a very humble person. When I paid him, he said, 'You know, Leone, I feel guilty and ashamed to be taking this kind of money.' He didn't believe that he was entitled to it, that he had earned it. And he was underpaid, if anything!" Leone demurred from revealing Bava's exact salary, saying, "I don't think that would be fair. He was well-paid, but compared to what directors are earning today? My God, it was criminal!"

As Baron Blood went into release and sought its fortune around the world, Bava continued to keep himself occupied by accepting occasional uncredited day jobs on other directors' films. One known project dating from this period is La vita a volte è molto dura, vero Provvidenza?/Sometimes Life Is Hard—Right, Providence? (1972), an Italian Western directed by Giulio Petroni and starring Tomas Milian, Janet Agren, I vampiri's Paul Müller and 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto's Maurice Poli. In the movie, Milian plays a pool shark whose mastery of the stick causes billiard balls to defy any and all physical laws. The special effects involving the unnatural movements of the balls were Bava's contribution. With Bava's time between November 1971 and September 1972 otherwise unaccounted-for, it is likely that he accepted several other such advisory jobs during this period, which have remained as secret as he wished them to be.

Gli orrore nel castello di Norimberga grossed 262,741,000 lire [$164,000] during its Italian release—not on the level of Le spie vengono dal semifreddo, but not significantly less profitable than Diabolik. Though meager in contrast with what the film earned in other countries, the film's Italian earnings were sufficient for it to qualify as Bava's most profitable horror film ever in his home country.

Despite its loss of summer drive-in revenues in the States, and the off-the-top expenses of Americanizing the picture with a re-edit and a new score, Baron Blood triumphed with a memorably gruesome ad campaign and a nationwide opening in hundreds of US theaters just in time for Halloween. "Was I happy with how well Baron Blood performed?" laughs Alfredo Leone. "I was absolutely delighted. That film made me a fortune!"

American International Pictures was sufficiently impressed by the film's domestic boxoffice returns to extend a formal invitation to Bava and Leone to relocate to Los Angeles and make films exclusively for them.

"Sam Arkoff wanted Mario and me to come back here and sign a contract," Leone says. "I pleaded with Bava to come to the States, and he considered it. Working in Vienna had helped him, I think, to overcome his superstitions about flying. In the last ten years of his life, he flew to Spain, to England, even to Israel. I really don't think the flying problem existed at the time of his death . . ."

But it was too soon to expect so much from Bava—too soon, and at the same time, too late. Bava may have considered a short trip to America, but to change countries for the sake of his career—especially now that he had grandchildren—was unthinkable to him. Beyond that, there was something naïve, something Old World in Bava's personal character that he cherished, which he knew might be destroyed by crossing the Atlantic—so he never went. Bava's rejection of the offer must have rankled Leone, who had been working for years to achieve such an invitation, but he also understood that he might never have received it, if not for Bava. So he took satisfaction where he could, in knowing that Baron Blood had been a boxoffice success in America and most other world markets—except Germany, where the movie was, ironically, never given a theatrical release. [17] The important thing was to keep his association with Mario Bava going, whatever it took.

16 Mario Bava, posthumously quoted in Levin Safao, Libération, May 5, 1980.

17 According to Alfredo Leone, the German distribution fell apart when Cinerama's going bid of $75,000 was topped by Sam Lang and J. Arthur Elliott's $125,000 to have the film distributed in Germany by their fledgling Cinevision company. Leone accepted their high offer, but Cinevision went out of business before the German release could take place.

LISA AND THE DEVIL

CELEBRATING THE GOOD fortunes of Baron Blood, Alfredo Leone and Mario Bava continued their friendship off the set. "We became more like relatives than producer and director," Leone describes. "We were fond of one another and we began to socialize during the week, going out to dinner. He took me to special places he knew, out in the country. He had a dog that he loved, a big basset hound that was kind of old and sad-looking. Mario would comment how dogs often resembled their masters, and say, 'Look at the dog and look at me!' He complained frequently about the care and attention that he had to give the dog. He took it with us to the restaurants and the owner would have to make a special dish for the dog, and he'd sit there, feeding it! It was wonderful!"

A COLLAGE of faces from LISA AND THE DEVIL (clockwise): Telly Savalas (framed by that familiar headboard!), Elke Sommer, Alessio Orano (twice), and Sylva Koscina.

DO PETS resemble their masters? Mario Bava poses with Centi at Tor Caldara.

At one of these get-togethers, Bava and Leone spoke expansively about their professional dreams. "Mario said that he had never had carte blanche on a film and he wished that, someday, he would find a producer who would give him what he wanted," Leone recalls. "I said, 'If you had that, what would you do?' He told me about a story outline that he had—I think it originated with someone else—and I told him to go ahead with it. I gave him all the freedom he wanted, but that was Bava's problem, you see. Give Bava a restricted budget of $500,000 and he would come back and present you with a brilliant picture. Give him carte blanche and he was in trouble."

Bava's carte blanche picture, Lisa and the Devil, is the pivotal chapter of his career. It is the most ambitious of his films, and also his most personal and oblique; it is also a film for which, at the time, no audience existed. It was a horror film and also an art film, which made it effectively neither in terms of marketability. As a result of this lack of niche, it was never given a legitimate theatrical release except in Spain and, after its initial screenings for distributors, it disappeared from circulation for nearly a decade. Bava himself would never live to see the film released as he intended it to be seen. Since Bava's death, the film has been shown on television, and subsequently revived on home video, where it has attracted a dedicated cult following. But during Bava's lifetime, Lisa and the Devil was at once his masterpiece and the battleground for the greatest artistic conflict of his life.

Synopsis

Lisa Reiner is an attractive young member of a bus tour visiting Toledo, Spain. As a tour guide lectures to her group about a medieval Christian fresco depicting the Devil carrying away the dead, Lisa is charmed by the fetching melody of a distant music box. She follows the music to an antiques shop, where she sees a bald man—identical to the Devil in the painting—carrying the life-sized dummy of a man. She admires the music box—a carousel with six rotating figures—and asks its price, but the shopkeeper explains that it belongs to the bald man. Regretfully withdrawing from the shop, Lisa finds that she cannot retrace her steps back to her tour group, to the fresco, or even back to the store, but becomes ever more lost as she wanders desperately through a labyrinth of streets where no one is willing to speak to, or acknowledge, her.

In an empty square, Lisa encounters Leandro—the bald man from the antiques shop—and his dummy. She asks for directions back to the fresco of the Devil and the dead, but his instructions don't lead her there—but rather to a keyhole-shaped passage, on the other side of which she is approached by the exact, living twin of the dummy carried by Leandro. He seems to know her, but addresses her as "Elena." Frightened, Lisa repels his urgent familiarity, accidentally

Lisa and the Devil

Working title: I diavoli e i morti, "The Devil and the Dead"
Filmed at Villa Frascati (Rome), another villa "on the outskirts of Madrid," Barcelona Airport, and on location in Toledo and Madrid, Spain
September 10 – November 28, 1972
First shown: May 9, 1973 (Cannes Film Festival's Market)
Eastmancolor, 1.85:1, 96 minutes

Production: Leone International (Rome), Tecisa (Madrid) and Roxy Film (Monaco). Producer: Alfredo Leone. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant director: Lamberto Bava. Screenplay: Alfredo Leone, Mario Bava (US); Roberto Natale, Giorgio Monlini, Mario Bava (Italy); Natale, Monlini, Bava, Leonardo Martín, Jose G. Maesso (Spain). Director of photography: Cecilio Paniagua. Production manager: Bruno Frascà. Music: Carlo Savina, "Concerto d'Aranjuez" by Joaquín Rodrigo, performed by Paul Mauriat (Philips Records).

Elke Sommer (Lisa Reiner/Elena), Telly Savalas (Leandro), Alida Valli (Countess), Alessio Orano (Maximillian), Sylva Koscina (Sophia Lehar), Eduardo Fajardo (Francis Lehar), Gabriele Tinti (George, the chauffeur), Espartaco Santoni (Carlos), Franz von Treuberg (antiquarian), Kathy Leone (tourist).

France: Lisa et le Diable, TV
Germany: Der Teuflische, "The Bedevilled"
Spain: El Diablo se Lleva los Muertos, "The Devil Carries Away the Dead," Procinor S.A., 11/25/74
US: Lisa and the Devil, Allied Artists TV, c. 1983

LISA REINER (Elke Sommer) is lured into a strange adventure by the melody of a music box.

knocking him down a flight of stairs. He lies there like a broken doll; his pocketwatch spills from his vest, its hands crossed like a crucifix. Afraid of what she's done, Lisa hurries away.

She continues to walk the empty streets until night falls. The distant headlights of a car lead her to an encounter with Francis and Sophia Lehar, a bourgeois, middle-aged, married couple, whose chauffeur George is trying to repair their broken-down Packard. Lisa begs a ride from them but, as they eventually drive away together, she senses a palpable but unspoken tension between the other passengers. Almost immediately, the car breaks down again—this time, outside a resplendent villa where they are soon met by the resident majordomo—Leandro! Lisa recognizes him and, instinctively, tries not to be noticed. The lady of the house, a nameless Countess, demands that the visitors be sent away, but after seeing Lisa, her adult son Maximillian pleads with his mother to let them stay. She finally agrees, but insists they not be admitted "in here—show them to the cottage."

As Leandro escorts the guests to their rooms, he speaks confidentially to Lisa, impressed by the coincidence of their earlier encounters. Once settled in, Lisa bathes and Sophia sneaks away to an assignation with George, which is witnessed by someone prowling outside their bedroom window.

Later, dinner is served by Leandro, who formally introduces the Countess to her four guests. The Countess demands to know where the fifth guest is, her question answered by a sudden noise directly upstairs—in the empty study of the Countess' late husband and Maximillian's stepfather, Carlos. After the main courses, Leandro unveils a cake "with chocolate sprinkles." Maximillian excuses himself, taking the first slice to someone upstairs, someone whom the others have not met. He takes the dessert into a secret room behind a mirrored wall, where he addresses someone named Elena, hidden behind the dark curtains of a canopied bed. Max addresses her scornfully, saying, "He's come back . . . but you'll never leave this room—never!"

After dinner, the Lehars invite Lisa to accompany them when they leave, but Leandro intercedes, announcing that Lisa will not be going with them, as she has been invited to stay by Maximillian. The Countess enters the room and asks Leandro to describe Lisa to her, shocking everyone with the revelation that she is blind. As he offers a lyrical description, Maximillian visits Carlos' empty, dusty study, opens a book, and finds a vintage photograph of Elena tucked inside, lovingly inscribed . . . to Carlos. She is Lisa's twin. Max strikes a match, sets fire to the picture and watches the flames consume it.

Francis discovers Sophia outside, looking for George, who was last seen working on the Packard. They argue, Francis slaps his wife and she is knocked against the car, causing the door to open, releasing the dead body of the chauffeur, his throat slashed and bloody. Inside the villa, the Countess handles a pair of long, blood-drenched scissors. The body is taken inside, and Leandro presides over a funereal procession; he later meets confidentially with Mr. Lehar and suggests that he go at once with his wife, and leave the corpse at the villa for discreet disposal. Sophia, distraught by the loss of her lover, does not wish to abandon George; Francis insists and pushes her into the car, but Sophia rebels by getting behind the wheel herself and running over her husband repeatedly until he is dead. Leandro calmly observes the murder from an upstairs window.

LISA meets Leandro (Telly Savalas) in the antiques shop.

In her room, Lisa accidentally knocks over a pocket watch and its broken hands cross, as they did during her earlier encounter with the amorous stranger, who is now revealed to be Carlos. Within moments, she sees Carlos peering at her through a frosted window and flees the cottage in terror. Outside, she runs toward the villa but sees Carlos marching toward her, stiffly and mechanically, like a doll; she changes direction and runs into the embrace of the living Carlos, who rhapsodizes, "For years, I've waited for this moment." Lisa breaks free and is intercepted by Maximillian, who sweetly compliments her beauty and encourages her to stay. Lisa is more responsive to Max, but their encounter is cut short by the arrival of the Countess, who lures her son back to the villa. Left alone, Lisa witnesses some furtive movements outside, as Leandro is carrying something through a side door. She spies through a window as Leandro prepares a body for burial—presumably that of George, but soon revealed to be that of Carlos—his head split open! Lisa screams and runs inside the villa to tell someone, but stumbles upon a large room filled with wax figures. Carlos steps out from among them, grabbing her arm, and she faints. Carlos romances the inert Lisa on a fur rug in the mannequin room, calling her "Elena." He is so intent upon his lovemaking that he fails to hear another person, mantled in scarlet, enter the room behind them. The intruder clubs Carlos to death, the blood splattering on Lisa's blouse.

LEANDRO surprises Sophia (Sylva Koscina) and Lisa by producing the music box melody on a cassette recorder.

The murder is witnessed by Sophia, who is pursued by the crimson-cloaked assassin into a small room where she is bludgeoned to death. Lisa is found by Leandro, who sets about repairing the broken head of his Carlos dummy like a skilled artisan, and then measures Lisa's body—as though in preparation for building a similar mannequin of her. Once all of her measurements have been taken, he awakens her. She is stunned by the sight of the Carlos dummy, his face cracked exactly where his death blow was struck. Leandro assures her that the dummy is just a dummy, built for a rehearsal of Carlos' funeral—but he adds, curiously, that Signor Carlos is dead. Leaving the room, Lisa discovers the Countess kneeling over the battered, bloody form of Sophia and flees into the arms of Maximillian. He asks her to help him leave the villa, to escape the jealousy of his mother. He tells her she is beautiful, comparing her to Elena, whom he then proceeds to introduce to her. As Max pulls back the drapes of the canopy, the bed-ridden Elena is revealed to be a skeletonized corpse in a wedding veil. As Lisa screams, Max chloroforms her. He then strips off her clothes, and his own, and mounts her, determined to reach the corpse of the woman lying beside her through the agency of Lisa's soft, warm flesh ("It will be different with you . . . I know it will!"). But as he struggles to consummate his passion, the imagined cacklings of Elena doom his efforts to failure.

The smell of death hangs heavily over Max, and in a last effort to become a man, he goes on a rampage, overturning the funereal trappings of the villa, cursing his mother and exclaiming, "I can't live like this, in your shrine of death!" The Countess responds to his cries and tries to comfort him, urging him to admit his love for her. As she moves to embrace him, the Countess is penetrated by a sharp lance, thrust by Max, killing her. In the wake of his matricide, Max has a vision of all his victims—all the people who tried to take Lisa (his second and last chance), away from him—seated at table in an obscene mockery of "The Last Supper," with the skeletal remains of Elena herself in the place of honor. The only one missing is the Countess, who appears and walks stiltedly toward Max until, in recoil, he plummets from the window to his death on the arrowheads of an iron gate. The Countess is revealed to be another of Leandro's dolls, carried by him.

Lisa awakens—as if from a strangely decadent, romantic dream—in the century-old ruins of the villa, her nude body covered with vines and fallen leaves. She dresses and escapes in the first rays of morning, stepping over a broken, adult-sized doll that resembles Maximillian. Emerging from the villa, she sees a group of children playing with a ball in the street. It rolls to her feet, but as she offers it back, the children withdraw in fear, saying, "She's a ghost—no one has lived in the castle for 100 years!" With the ball in hand, Lisa is able to find the keyhole-shaped archway that led her to the villa, and she passes through it, finding her way back to the town square in Toledo. Leandro watches her go, and is approached by the antiques shopkeeper, who carries a lifesize replica of Lisa. Leandro no longer has any need for it and lets her go, murmuring "It's all too late, my friend. All too late."

Lisa boards a 747 jet to return home, but shortly after takeoff, she realizes that she is the only passenger in her compartment. She walks toward the back of the plane, one empty section after another, until she finds herself in an area occupied by the same corpses previously present at "The Last Supper"—now with Maximillian among them, but with Elena missing. Screaming, Lisa bolts toward the front of the plane, but the seating areas repeat and repeat in an inescapable loop. Finally, she reaches the front of the plane and climbs the spiral staircase to the pilot's cabin, where she pounds at the door for help. The door opens, revealing Leandro at the controls. As he turns to face her, tipping his pilot's hat in greeting, Lisa collapses on the floor like a doll—like Elena—and the Devil spirits away the dead.

Background

The English version of Lisa and the Devil credits only Mario Bava and Alfredo Leone with the screenplay, while the Spanish release prints credit Roberto Natale, Giorgio Monlini [sic], and Mario Bava, as well as Leonardo Martín and José G. Maesso, the last two almost certainly for translation or quota purposes only. Roberto Natale was one of the screenwriters of Operazione paura, and he recalls that his writing partner on that earlier film, Romano Migliorini, was also involved in Lisa's germination. The erroneously named "Giorgio Monlini" was in fact actor–writer Giorgio Maulini. Leone, who disavows any knowledge of these other contributors, remembers the source simply as "a story Bava had; I think he had it for awhile."

"I worked together with Romano Migliorini and, after Operazione paura, we wrote this other story for Mario," explains Roberto Natale. "I later heard that two different films had been released, Lisa and the Devil, the one by Mario, and La casa dell'esorcismo, the one by Mario together with Alfredo Leone. We wrote the script with Giorgio Maulini and his fiancee Chicca—unless I'm mistaken, she came up with the original idea, but didn't want any credit. It was titled La casa del diavolo ("The Devil's House"), and started with a fresco in a chapel, representing a demoniac scene, in front of which an American tourist was suddenly taken ill. It was surely Bava who conceived the idea of the fresco; I remember this clearly. In some prints of the film, neither I nor Migliorini are credited, and this astonishes me."

Learning that Lisa and the Devil grew out of an idea nearly ten years old helps to explain its ethereal character. Had it been filmed closer to the time of its original conception, it might have had a more rigid and discernible narrative, but it was in Bava's nature to relax such structures once they were in place, to subject them to spontaneous impulse through improvisation. He thus had many years in which to toy with this daydream project mentally and make it a catch-all for pet shocks and imagistic conceits he could apply nowhere else. "Lisa and the Devil had a wonderful setting and this was perhaps more interesting to my father than the script," allows Lamberto Bava. "As a screenplay, I think it had weaknesses, with gaps in the narrative. A complex story like that needed a good rewrite and some additional ideas; there were things that, in the end, were impossible to explain. From all that, it turned out to be a visually splendid film, which—let's be honest—was missing something."

THE FUNEREAL procession for George the chauffeur (Gabriele Tinti).

In its final form, Lisa suggests a compendium of original and borrowed ideas that, somehow, adds up to an almost inscrutably personal statement—what French critic Pascal Martinet aptly described as "une sorte de testament spirituel" ("a sort of spiritual testament").[1] The film is like a core sample of Bava's own subconscious, in which a variety of unrelated pieces come together in a panorama of scenes from films he may have feared, at this autumnal stage of his career, he might never make.

We can identify some of these influences by retracing Bava's steps through the few interviews he granted. For example, Bava once mentioned to

THE BLIND Contessa (Alida Valli) beside the open casket of her late husband Carlos (Espartaco Santoni).

Ornella Volta his desire to direct a film about Viktor Ardisson (a necrophile profiled in Krafft-Ebing's famous book Psychopathia Sexualis), adding, "But how do you make a producer understand that this is a story full of romance and poetry?"[2] This rhetorical question comes very close to describing what Lisa and the Devil would become. The character of Maximillian is a romanticized version of Ardisson, in real life a disfigured, half-witted young man who dug up the unresisting cadavers of young women, to obsessively suck at their cold, unresisting breasts for some semblance of the affection his mother denied him.

In the same interview, Bava expressed his longing to someday adapt for the screen something by his favorite author, H. P. Lovecraft. In Lisa, there are images plucked from the pages of Lovecraft—particularly from his story "In the Vault," including overturned coffins, heads bashed in, and a creative way of fitting a tall man into a short man's second-hand coffin. The moment when Lisa gasps at the sight of Leandro breaking the long legs of a corpse by folding them backwards at the shin, refers directly to the startling final sentence of Lovecraft's tale.

The climactic scene in which Maximillian chloroforms Lisa and attempts to have sex with her beside the remains of the dead Elena was apparently inspired by a scene in a short story attributed to Gilles de Reys, which provided the basis of Il terzo occhio ("The Third Eye," 1966), starring Franco Nero and Erika Blanc, and directed by Mino Guerrini, who had co-scripted La ragazza che sapeva troppo. I have not read the story, but Guerrini's film contains a scene in which Nero pretends to seduce a young woman who is the twin of his dead wife, whose body he has preserved and kept behind a veil in the master bedroom. While romancing the woman in the bed, he suddenly pulls back the veil to reveal the woman's embalmed twin and—at the moment she registers shock—chloroforms her. This still-astonishing study in necrophilia—later remade by Joe D'Amato as Buio omega/Beyond the Darkness (1980)—could almost be mistaken for a Bava film, and it is possible, considering Bava's past connection with Guerrini, that the Maestro had some unofficial involvement in it . . . but this has not been possible to confirm.

LEANDRO ponders how to make a tall man fit into a short casket.

In a 1971 interview with Luigi Cozzi, Bava mentioned another idea as his "latest project," giving it the title of Era una foglia . . . ("There Was a Leaf . . ."). "It's the story of several ghosts haunting a villa and trying to rehabilitate the last surviving member of their family, a decadent and perverted man, before it's too late. It's a comedy; I wrote the script myself." One doubts that Bava would have produced a finished script on his own; it would be more likely that he had jotted down some ideas and perhaps drawn some storyboards, at most. Giving an interview at a not particularly busy phase of his career, it was best to seem busy. While Lisa and the Devil is not a comedy, it does share some elements with Era una foglia . . . such as the villa full of ghosts and the decadent young man who, in this case, himself yearns to be free of his sins.

Other aspects of Lisa and the Devil suggest a bird's nest of subjective references, disparate elements that had personal meaning for Bava and craved a common repository. Bava's love for Russian literature is represented, according to Lamberto Bava, who has confessed that some of the film's dialogue was cribbed verbatim from I diavoli—the Italian translation of Fyodor Dostoevsky's classic 1871–72 novel The Possessed (currently in translation as The Devils). Incidentally, one of the major characters of Dostoevsky's novel is a beautiful young woman named Liza, who has been left scarred by a former romantic relationship with Stavrogin, the mentally disturbed son of a strong, domineering woman of great wealth, whose social isolation and sense of privilege enabled him to mature without any sense of right or wrong, or moral accountability. Reportedly, the author intended Stavrogin to be the novel's main character, but the account of his crimes was considered too obscene to publish at the time, requiring the author to select another character for its focal point. The omnipresence of statues in the film, and its depiction of the characters as mortal shells manipulated by the Devil, reinforces Dostoevsky's personal interpretation of evil and possession. It was the novelist's belief that none of God's creatures was inherently evil, though they could be seized by evil forces and caused to perform diabolical acts; it is one of the themes of his novel.

The name of the character played by Eduardo Fajardo—Francis Lehar—makes explicit reference to Hungarian composer Franz Lehar (1870–1948), who is best-remembered as the composer of the 1905 operetta Die Lustige Witwe/The Merry Widow. The wife of the real-life Lehar was named Sophie, or Sophia, as is Sylva Koscina's character in the film, which confirms that Bava was more than passingly familiar with their story. The Lehars were wed in 1921, after Sophie's divorce from her first husband, though she and Franz had been having an extramarital affair since 1906. Because of Sophie's Jewish background, and Hitler's enthusiasm for her husband's work, the Lehars spent most of World War II in lavish isolation in a richly appointed villa in Bad Ischi—while the composer's Merry Widow librettists, Fritz Grunbaum and Fritz Lohner, also Jewish, spent their final days in concentration camps. Perhaps Bava chose the name of Francis Lehar to make another of his veiled, ironic comments about the woes of married life (and the joys of widowhood), but by including Sophia in the metaphor, the evocation of these historical figures cuts deeper. Dostoevsky's The Possessed is a political novel, and it is considered "prophetic" for the way its story of young revolutionaries predicted the "demonic forces" that would begin to infest Russia in the 19th century. In a similar way, Lisa and the Devil uses the Lehars and its distinctly isolated, turn-of-the-century Italian milieu, to depict—as Visconti was doing at the same time—the self-interested, upper-class decadence that passively allowed the rise of Fascism in Europe.

In this context, Leandro becomes distinctly Mussolinian. The robust performance of Telly Savalas—loud and posturing, bald as a bust of marble, outwardly a servant to decadent aristocracy while inwardly a death merchant—could easily have been based, whether consciously or unconsciously, on the example of il Duce. His aloof, darkly amused, almost philosophical observance of the crimes of passion being committed all around him, in a dreamlike setting that bodes it has all happened before and will happen again, recalls Mussolini's statement, "Blood alone moves the wheels of history."

Another distinctly possible forebear of Leandro can be found in A. Merritt's classic novel of dark fantasy, Seven Footprints to Satan (1928). In that book's fourth chapter is the following description: "The voice was strangely resonant and musical, with a curious organ quality . . . [His] eyes were of the deepest sapphire blue and they were the alivest eyes I ever beheld. They were large, slightly oblique, and they sparkled as though the very spring of life was bubbling up behind them. Gem-like they were in color, and gem-like they were in their hardness . . .

LISA is astonished to learn that Carlos is neither alive nor dead, but a life-sized doll made by Leandro.

1 Raoul Walsh, as quoted in Pascal Martinet, Mario Bava (Paris, France: Edilig, 1984), 17.

2 Ornella Volta, "Conversation avec Mario Bava," Positif 138, May 1972, 44–48.

The head above them was inordinately large, high and broad and totally bald. It was an astonishing hemisphere whose capacity must have been almost double that of the average. The ears were long and narrow and distinctly pointed at the tips. The nose was heavy and beaked, the chin round but massive. The lips were full, and as classically cut and immobile as of some antique Greek statue . . . His body, what I could see of it, was unusually large, the enormous barrel of a chest indicating tremendous vitality." The words offer a portrait of Merritt's Satan, but they also provide an ideal description of Telly Savalas, particularly in the role of Leandro.

It also piques one's curiosity that Bava would choose to identify his heroine with a name so closely approximating that of an actress with whom he worked at least twice in the 1950s. Lia Reiner (or Rainer; she is listed with both spellings in different references) played supporting roles in three Aldo Fabrizi comedies, including two which Bava photographed: La famiglia Passaguai fa fortuna (1952) and Hanno rubato un tram (1954). She also worked for director Mario Costa in Pietà per chi cade (1953), at a time when Bava was still intermittently serving Costa. Her filmography appears to extend to only a few more films, the last one being Giuseppe Fina's Pelle viva/ Scorched Skin (1962). Whether the character's name is sheer coincidence or a personal tribute, we may never know.

A COLLAGE from the original promotional brochure: a portrait of Elke Sommer as Lisa and the passionate tryst between George and Sophia.

Alfredo Leone doesn't claim to know everything that Lisa and the Devil is about, but he remembers that Bava was forthright about at least one of his intentions. "He wanted to make a film that would pay tribute to his father," Leone confirms. "His father was a sculptor and Bava used to tell me how he grew up surrounded by statues, and how they excited his imagination. He wanted to use the film to pay his respects."

"To pay his respects" is an appropriately sepulchral phrase. Lisa and the Devil has a distinctly funereal atmosphere, and it represents the culmination of a morbid strain that can be traced back to the sickly interiors of Villa Graps in Operazione paura, further back to the dead medium's rooms in "La goccia d'acqua" episode of I tre volti della paura, and even earlier to the bedroom of Aunt Ethel in La ragazza che sapeva troppo. One can relate part of this mood to Mario's feelings about his father, but only part of it. In Mario's childhood imagination, his father presided over the raw materials of stone, clay, and resin, from which he fashioned likenesses indistinguishable from the dead; he never forgot the day when, while his father was away, he entered his workshop and found a lifeless body in repose inside a long cabinet drawer. Just as Mario's fears and imagination were stimulated by such an environment, so were those of his grandchildren, who today harbor particularly strong memories of the period when Lisa and the Devil was in production.

"I first discovered that my father and grandfather made horror movies when they were making Lisa and the Devil," recalls Georgia Bava. "I must have been 5 or 6 years old . . . We shared a bedroom, my brother Roy and myself, and there was a small corridor outside and I had to cross the corridor to get to my father's room. And all along the corridor, there were four mannequins they used for special effects—but that, of course, I didn't know. One day when I woke up, I wanted to go to my father's room, and as I opened the door, I saw these scary things! One of them had an eye popping out, another one had a scar and was very bloody, and I just screamed! I ran and jumped into my father's bed and said, 'What are those things out there?' He said, 'Never mind, they're like dolls.' I said, 'But my dolls don't look like that!' And he said, 'No, no—we're using them to make a film.' I said, 'What kind of films do you make?' And he said, 'Films where all the evils and the bad things come out.' I was amazed, because I had only seen films made for children. Then I saw one, and I realized what they were doing. It was fascinating; it was nice."

Georgia's younger brother Roy has similarly disturbed memories of living among those wax figures. "At the time, I think I was 4 years old. I was on the set of Lisa and the Devil and I remember the severed heads . . . dead bodies . . . It was quite a kind of scary thing. Even today, it would be scary. Lamberto liked these heads so much that he asked everybody, 'Do you want them, or shall I take them?' Mario said, 'Of course you can take them—what would I do at home with something like this?' I came home and saw Lamberto putting these two heads near the entrance of our house, on some columns. I was quite scared by them. They were made by Fabrizio Sforza, one of the leading special makeup effects people working in Italy today. He later worked with Lamberto on Fantaghirò, and he also worked on The Last Emperor and Tai-Pan. Lisa and the Devil was his first work ever in the movies. It was very bad for me, because to go from my bedroom to the bathroom at night, I had to pass by those heads—so, no way would I go to the bathroom! It became a kind of problem for me! Later, when I met Fabrizio, he was delighted when I told him how many sleepless nights he had given me as a kid!"

On a more personal level, Bava may have used Lisa and the Devil to vent some of his increasing concerns and frustrations over his wife Iole and the state of their marriage. Asked to describe her grandmother, Georgia Bava says, "She liked to stay at home. She was quite suspicious concerning people, and did not like to socialize at all. She never liked travelling, going to the theater, the cinema, to parties, or the opera or anything like that, but she loved to be at home with her family, cooking and chatting. She was a great person too, but in a completely different way to Mario."

MAXIMILLIAN (Alessio Orano) chloroforms Lisa, whom he plans to use as a sexual annex to his dead love, Elena.

Iole's absence from the world stage led to rampant speculation. "You never saw this person, so you couldn't help thinking that something must be incredibly weird," chuckles Andrea Piazzesi, a friend of the family. "It was impossible not to fantasize about her! You would wonder if she had a tail or something, but this wasn't the case. You never saw the wife, even if you were in her own house, because she stayed in another room. She was a very strange woman, always hiding herself. I finally met Mario's wife, after he died, because [her daughter] Elena convinced her to come out and say hello. I said hello and shook her hand. Later that night, I told Dario Argento, 'Today I met the wife of Mario!' and he said, 'You met her? You must tell me how she looks!' He was so curious. Everyone was so curious."

Iole's suspicion of people was only part of her problem. Her reticence to leave the house, her increasingly sedentary life, and her love of sweets conspired to make her obese in her older years. Shy, reclusive, and embarrassed by her weight, Iole withdrew to a private room whenever Mario received guests at home, and her seclusion worsened to the point where she reportedly became a hypochondriac, an agoraphobe, and increasingly morbid.

AN IRONIC recreation of Da Vinci's "The Last Supper" as Maximillian is confronted by the wreckage of his past deeds.

"My grandmother was not at all thin," Georgia admits. "To me, she was always my grandmother, so I never even thought of her as a young woman. She had beautiful legs and beautiful blue eyes, but that was about all [the beauty] I could see. One day, when I was already a grown woman, I was helping her to move some boxes from one place to another and, suddenly, she showed me some photographs of her when she was young, maybe 25 or 30 years old. Believe me, she was absolutely beautiful! She even told me that, when she once went to visit Mario [on location] in Pola [Yugoslavia], [3] she got off the ship and all the people standing around started saying, 'Here's the actress—she has arrived!'"

"She loved sweets, so she was very fat and nervous, and always complaining about being sick," says Piazzesi. "She was always saying to Mario, 'I'm going to die! I'm going to die!' while Mario, who never complained, was the first to die. This woman never wanted to go anywhere with him, never go to any sort of party—which must have been a problem for him in terms of his career because, as a director, if you show up in certain circles where you can meet producers, your luck comes much easier than if you live privately."

Mario, whose professional skill involved making the most beautiful actresses in the world look even more glamorous, bitterly missed the shapely and beautiful woman that he married. During the making of Lisa and the Devil, Bava was heard by one colleague to chant "I want a skinny wife, I want a skinny wife!" in his frustration, so the matter of Iole's obesity certainly did oppress him. One does not have to look too deeply into the scene of Maximillian trying, unsuccessfully, to make love to the more fully fleshed Lisa while fantasizing about the skeleton lying beside her, to find a macabre and quite naked parallel to his anguish. Yet, from the day they were married to the day of his death, Mario remained committed to Iole and the home and the family they had created together. After thirty-five years of marriage, their relationship had become essentially platonic . . . yet something happened during the editing of Lisa and the Devil that inspired Mario to bring romance back into his marriage, and an offstage renaissance took place. To the surprise of everyone—not least of all her husband—Iole responded to Mario's renewed attentions by making a concerted effort to overcome her morbid ways and become more outgoingly supportive of him, even to the extent of leaving the house and joining Mario for dinner with Alfredo Leone and his wife, Madeline.

Leone remembers that Bava "used to bullshit about sex a lot, like any other guy. I remember there was a woman who worked in the editing room, a redhead who looked like Susan Hayward. She was a lesbian, very beautiful, and we were both crazy about her. We talked about her all the time . . . but it was all just talk. In all the time we worked together—and I think I knew Mario better than anyone—and I never knew him to be anything other than an absolutely faithful husband. Maybe there was someone else before I met him, but I didn't know about that. His wife, when I finally met her, I found to be a very plain, unpretentious woman . . . not at all on the level of his intellect, but a good person. Our wives got along famously well—even though my wife did not speak Italian and his wife did not speak English! They were both jovial, jolly, good women—wives and homemakers—and shared many of the same habits. Mario called them 'The Twins.'"

VARIOUS shots of Telly Savalas, Elke Sommer, Mario Bava, and Alfredo Leone enjoying each others' company at a pre-production party.

So, while no one in Lisa and the Devil quite succeeds in escaping "the smell of death," Mario and Iole were more fortunate. Bava rededicated himself to making his marriage work and strengthening his family ties—coincidentally, at the same time his son Lamberto was experiencing increasing difficulties within his own marriage. This personal renaissance could not have happened at a more opportune time for Mario and Iole because, within the year, they would have children in their home once again.

Cast & Crew

For Lisa and the Devil, Alfredo Leone entered into a co-production deal with an accomplished Spanish producer, José Gutierrez Maesso. Born in Azuada, Badajoz, in 1920, Maesso started out as a screenwriter and director, making his first films in 1955. In the 1960s, most of his work was in the popular realm of Spaghetti Westerns; he was one of the credited writers of Sergio Corbucci's Minnesota Clay (1964, one of Bava's uncredited side projects) and Django (1966). Maesso became a producer in 1962, and at the time Lisa and the Devil was going into production, his most recent production was Estratto dagli archivi segreti della polizia di una capitale europea/ Tragic Ceremony in Villa Alexander (1972), directed by Riccardo Freda under the pseudonym "Willy Pareto."

Leone assembled another top-drawer cast for Lisa and the Devil, consisting of international stars and exceptional local talent from Italy and Spain. Because the film was made in late 1972, before the immense success of Telly Savalas' CBS-TV series Kojak (which premiered about a year later, in October 1973), top billing went to Elke Sommer. With her golden hair and doll-like beauty, Sommer is perfectly cast as Lisa/Elena, and she gives what is likely the performance of her career.

Entering fully into the romantic, literate spell of the picture was Greek-American actor Telly Savalas. Born Aristotle Savalas on January 21, 1924, in Garden City, Long Island, New York, his earliest jobs were as a casting assistant and senior news director at New York's WABC, In the late 1950s, Savalas turned to acting, giving one of his earliest on-camera performances (with hair) in "Murder and the Android," a live dramatization of an Alfred Bester short story which ran on the NBC series Sunday Showcase. He made his first feature film appearance for director John Frankenheimer: The Young Savages (1961), which led to his casting in Birdman of Alcatraz (1962), opposite Burt Lancaster, for which Savalas was recognized with a Best Supporting Actor nomination. After Birdman, the balding Savalas made the decision to shave his entire head, a distinction that helped him to stand out in subsequent, meaty roles in The Greatest Story Ever Told (1965, as Pontius Pilate), Genghis Khan (1965), The Dirty Dozen (1967), Kelly's

3 Perhaps for the filming of Agi Murad, il diavolo bianco/The White Warrior in 1958.

SYLVA KOSCINA as Sophia Lehar, who has uses for George other than fixing the car.

ALIDA VALLI as the Contessa.

Heroes (1970), and On Her Majesty's Secret Service (1969), in which he gave a definitive performance as James Bond's arch-enemy Ernst Stavro Blofeld.

Savalas made his first films in Italy in the mid-1960s, but found most of his work there as the '60s turned into the '70s, appearing in the Gina Lollobrigida comedy Buona Sera, Mrs. Campbell (1969), Sergio Sollima's outstanding crime picture Città violenta/The Family (1970, with Charles Bronson and Jill Ireland), Silvio Narizzano's Senza ragione/Redneck (1972), Tonino Valeri's Una ragione per vivere e una per morire/Massacre at Fort Holman (1972), and Panico en el Transiberiano/Horror Express (1972), an above-average, Spanish-produced fright vehicle for Christopher Lee and Peter Cushing. Weirdly, in a 1975 interview with TV Guide, Savalas claimed that Bava's film was based on a script he (Savalas) had written himself, which he wrote to "expose the greatest villain who ever lived: Sigmund Freud."[4]

At the time Lisa and the Devil went into production, Savalas—whose "tough guy" image had been limiting him to playing cops and gangsters in American films—enjoyed a tremendous ratings success as the star of a made-for-television police procedural, The Marcus-Nelson Murders, in which he starred as New York police lieutenant Theo Kojak . . . without sucking a single lollipop. "We gave Savalas his first lollipop," boasts Leone. "In the original script, Leandro was always popping gumdrops in his mouth. Savalas didn't like gumdrops, so he went to Bava and asked for something else. Mario said, 'What's the difference? You might as well use a lollipop!' When I saw Savalas on the set with this lollipop in his mouth, I said, 'What the hell's he doing, Bava?' Mario said, 'Humor me; it may work.'"

Savalas was trying to quit smoking at the time and liked the lollipops so much, he subsequently carried them over as a trademark prop on CBS' spin-off series Kojak, which ran from 1973–1978, and later won sports headlines as the owner of a champion race horse, which he dubbed "Telly's Pop." The stepfather of actress Nicolette Sheridan and godfather of actress Jennifer Aniston, Savalas died of prostate cancer on January 22, 1994—one day after his 70th birthday. After his death, it was discovered that Savalas had been a bigamist, married to more than one woman and the father of more than one family. Coincidentally, though he managed to conceal it in most of his onscreen appearances, Savalas had a short, misshapen index finger on his left hand, which accounts for the white gloves he wears in much of the film, and the odd, Germanic manner in which he holds his cigarette in Lisa and the Devil.

Of working with Savalas, Elke Sommer has little to say: "I have no good memories; I have no bad memories. The same with Joseph Cotten [on Baron Blood]: Cotten left me neither warm nor cold. Savalas left me neither warm nor cold. He did his job, performed well—more power to him! No friendship arose, not even simpatia. He had his people around him, his girlfriends and so on, and I had my friends—and that was that."

Leone agrees: "He was a total professional who came in, did his job, and moved on to the next. Years after we made the picture, I bumped into him at the airport, walking around with this big entourage, and he didn't recognize me! I told him, 'Telly! Don't you remember—it was me and Bava that gave you your first lollipop!' He finally remembered, but that's the kind of guy he was—he had his own circle, his own world. But he was a very creative guy, did his job beautifully. He made a great Devil for us, and I have absolutely no complaints."

As with Baron Blood, Leone set his sights high when casting the net for the film's supporting roles. He first approached Bette Davis for the part of the blind Countess, and at one point Variety reported that Anthony Perkins would play the role of Maximillian ("We had hopes," Leone says), but both finally turned the project down. The role of the Countess went instead to Alida Valli, one of the great beauties—and one of the truly international stars—of the Italian cinema. Born Alida Maria Altenberger on May 31, 1921, in Pola, Italy, she made her first film in 1930, Her early films were made for such directors as Carmine Gallone, Mario Soldati, and Max Neufeld, who shaped her screen persona as a grand tragedian with glamorous, smoky looks and a penetrating gaze. Her triumphs included the title role in Manon Lescaut (1940), Enrichetta in Le due orphanelle (1942), Giulia in Giuseppe Fatigati's version of I pagliacci (1943), and the title role in Soldati's Eugenia Grandet (1946). In 1947, David O. Selznick cast her in her first American production, Alfred Hitchcock's The Paradine Case (1947), in which she was credited with the Garboesque soubriquet "Valli." The single name credit continued throughout memorable roles in Carol Reed's The Third Man (1948), Irving Pichel's The Miracle of the Bells (1948), and Robert Stevenson's Walk Softly, Stranger (1949, which recast her with Third Man co-star Joseph Cotten), but she reclaimed her full name upon returning to Rome. She played herself in the peculiar Siamo donne (1953), an omnibus film purporting to offer looks into the personal lives of five actresses, including Ingrid Bergman, Isa Miranda, and Anna Magnani. In 1954, she gave one of her signature performances as Countess Livia Serpieri in Luchino Visconti's Senso, after which she disappeared from films for several years, returning with Pier Paolo Pasolini's Il grido/The Cry (1957). Here, and in her subsequent career, Valli's choices of films show great powers of discernment, encompassing Georges Franju's Les Yeux sans Visage/Eyes Without a Face (1959), George Marshall's The Happy Thieves (1962), Claude Chabrol's Ophélia (1962), Pasolini's Edipo re/Oedipus Rex (1967), Bernardo Bertolucci's La strategia del ragno/The Spider's Stratagem (1970), and Mario Caiano's interesting giallo, L'occhio nel labirinto/Blood (1971). In later life, Valli became the recipient of two David di Donatello awards, one in 1982 for her supporting performance in Marco Tullio Giordana's La caduta degli angeli ribelli and another in 1991 in recognition of her entire filmography. Bringing her career full circle, she was also honored with a Golden Lion Award at the Venice Film Festival for her lifetime achievement—bookending a celebrity which had essentially begun with her 1941 winning of the Best Actress Golden Lion for her performance in Mario Soldati's Piccolo mondo antico. When she passed away on April 22, 2006, at the age of 84, Valli was granted the ultimate accolade of a public funeral in Rome's city hall, for which the entire city seemed to turn out in mourning.

Although they had been simultaneously active in the Italian cinema for over thirty years, Bava had never worked with Valli, and as one of Rome's most glamor-conscious cameraman, he must have yearned for such an opportunity. When Leone told Bava that he had cast Valli in the film, the two men became so giddy with nostalgic visions of the actress in her prime that they joked together like two hormone-driven teenagers.

PROMOTIONAL image of Elke Sommer and Telly Savalas.

Leone: "When I told Mario that I had cast Alida Valli, he couldn't believe it. He said, 'Valli! I've always loved Valli! How I'd love to . . . !' 'After me, Mario,' I said. That's the way we were, always bullshitting with each other. On the set, of course, Valli was treated with the utmost respect, and I believe she had a great appreciation for Bava."

Valli may have occurred to Leone as a result of working with Joseph Cotten in Austria on Baron Blood, but she was absolutely the perfect choice to play the nameless Countess. In her previous roles, Valli had been cast as a noblewoman (frequently), a murderess (real or accused), and as an incestuous mother. After Lisa and the Devil, Valli continued to go the route taken by such grand actresses as Bette Davis and Joan Crawford in America, trading on her hardening good looks to play evil, demented, older women in such horror pictures as Alberto De Martino's L'Anticristo/The Tempter (1974), Pierre Grunstein's Tendre Dracula/Tender Dracula (1975, with Peter Cushing), Giulio Berruti's Suor omicidi/Killer Nun (1978), Al Festa's Fatal Frames (1996), and of course, Dario Argento's Suspiria (1977) and Inferno (1980).

In the years since she had last worked with Mario Bava on Le fatiche di Ercole and Ercole e la regina di Lidia, Sylva Koscina (credited here as "Silva Koscina") worked in dozens of adventure and swashbucklers—the best being her brief turn as a circus aerialist in Georges Franju's fantasy Judex (1963)—before dedicating herself to becoming what was known in the 1960s as "an international sex star." Mino Guerrini's Amore in quattro dimenzioni/Love in Four Dimensions (1963) and L'idea fissa (1964) were turning points in this regard, as were her glamor roles in a number of spy pictures, including Ralph Thomas' Hot Enough for June/Agent 8 ¾ (1964), Mario Mattoli's Cadavere per signora (1964), Carlo Lizzani's Thrilling (1965) and Maurice Clochet's Baraka sur X-13/Agent X-77 Orders to Kill (1965). In 1966, she made an enchanting appearance in Fellini's Giulietta degli spiriti/Juliet of the Spirits, which was followed by her bids for American stardom in Three Bites of the Apple (1967), 4 TV Guide, February 22, 1975.

The Secret War of Harry Frigg (1968, with Paul Newman), A Lovely Way to Die (1968), and a revealing pictorial in Playboy magazine. Koscina kept up with the times, baring her body in various sex comedies of the late '60s and 1970s, including L'assoluto naturale/ He and She (1969), Homo eroticus/ Man of the Year (1971), and Rivelazioni di un maniaco sessuale al capo della squadra mobile/The Slasher is the Sex Maniac (1972), a giallo thriller that was later supplemented with hardcore sex footage in America and reissued as Penetration. In the wake of Lisa and the Devil—and the stronger sex footage from the filming which was later added to The House of Exorcism (1975)—Koscina continued to appear in fairly explicit, if otherwise insubstantial roles in Lucio Fulci's horror comedy Il Cav. Costante Nicosia demoniaco ovvero Dracula in brianza/ Dracula in the Provinces (1975, in which a vampire feeds on her bare bottom), and Franz Antel's Casanova & Company/Some Like It Cool (1976, opposite Tony Curtis). In the 1980s, though in her 50s, the actress was still playing scenes in the nude on the Roman stage. "My body is still okay," she told an interviewer, "so why cover it up?" Sylva Koscina, one of the Italian cinema's great beauties, died of a heart ailment on December 26, 1994, at the age of 61.

Cast as the husband of Koscina's character was Spanish actor Eduardo Fajardo. Born on August 24, 1918, in Mostiero, Ponteverda, the 54-year-old Fajardo was already the veteran of more than 100 films. He began acting in 1947 and made his first Italian picture—Mario Caiano's Erik il vichingo/ Erik the Viking—in 1965, which was followed closely by his greatest role, as the cold-blooded villain Maj. Jackson in Sergio Corbucci's Django (1966). After Django, Fajardo was featured in literally dozens of Italian Westerns, including Corbucci's Il mercenario/The Mercenary (1968), Tulio Demichelli's Arriva Sabata!/

A FASCINATING overhead shot of the filming of the dining room scene. At the bottom end of the table stand Mario (at left) and Lamberto Bava (gesticulating, at right), while director of photography Cecilio Paniagua stands beside the camera.

Sabata the Killer (1970), and a rare horror turn in the curiously titled I due volti della paura/The Two Faces of Fear (1972), also directed by Demichelli. After Lisa and the Devil, Fajardo stayed busy, appearing in several films per year, including John Gilling's La Cruz del Diablo/The Devil's Cross (1975), Umberto Lenzi's enjoyably silly zombie picture Incubo sulla città contaminata/City of the Walking Dead (1980), and a pair of films with Jess Franco, La tumba de los muertos vivientes/Oasis of the Zombies (1982) and Bangkok, cita con la muerte (1985).

Gabriele Tinti was recommended for the role of George, the chauffeur, by actor Ivan Rassimov—the brother of Rada Rassimov, and a veteran of Terrore nello spazio—who, after winning the role decided that he didn't want to play it. Tinti had also worked with Bava before, when he played the supporting role of Samuel in Esther and the King. Prior to Lisa, he had been a very busy actor, working in Edgar G. Ulmer's L'Atlantide/Journey Beneath the Desert (1961), Robert Aldrich's Sodom and Gomorrah (1962), Riccardo Freda's Trappola per un assassino/Roger La Honte (1966), and the early mondo film L'occhio selvaggio/The Wild Eye (1967). A hopeful trip to America in 1968 landed him roles in Aldrich's The Legend of Lylah Claire and an episode of the CBS series Mayberry R.F.D. (unquestionably, his strangest credit). The ex-husband of Terrore nello spazio star Norma Bengell, Tinti later became increasingly active in erotic films, including The Sexorcist (1974). In 1975, he and his second wife—Eurasian actress Laura Gemser—formed a professional liaison with director–cinematographer Aristide Massaccesi (a.k.a. "Joe D'Amato") that lasted for nearly a decade. Beginning with Emanuelle nera/Black Emanuelle (1975), Gemser became the international sex star of all of the "Black Emanuelle" films, ending with Blade Violent/Emanuelle Escapes from Hell (1983). Tinti continued to work in films, sometimes under aliases like "Peter Gabriel," until he was felled by a heart attack on November 12, 1991.

Alfredo Leone remembers Espartaco Santoni as "a gambling buddy of Savalas, who asked me to give him a part as a personal favor." However, the debonair Spaniard came to the role of Carlos with credentials that were not unimpressive. In addition to his previous roles in nearly twenty films—including Javier Seto's The Castilian (1965), José Maria Elorrieta's Las Amantes del Diablo/Feast for the Devil (1971), and Jorge Grau's Ceremonia Sangrienta/The Legend of Blood Castle (1973) and Pena de Muerte/Night Fiend (1973)—Santoni had produced several pictures between 1961 and 1971, including León Klimovsky's Sartana Western Su le Mani Cadavere, Sei in Arresto, and Rafael Moreno Alba's Las Melancólicas (both 1971)—the second of which, like Lisa and the Devil, was subsequently recut and reissued in America after the success of The Exorcist, under the title Exorcism's Daughter in 1975. He was also briefly married, at one time, to Diabolik star Marisa Mell.

Production

Lisa and the Devil was shot on a six-week schedule and, Alfredo Leone remembers, ran slightly over. It began with interiors shot at the Villa Frascati near Rome, included some location shots filmed in Toledo, and concluded with exterior photography in Barcelona, with some additional interiors shot in Madrid.

For the first time in his experience, Bava was contractually required to use a Spanish cinematographer, to satisfy a co-production agreement with co-producer José Maesso. The job went to Cecilio Paniagua, a distinguished cameraman whose career reached back to 1935 and included service on a number of major international co-productions, such as The Fall of the Roman Empire (1964), Mel Welles' intriguing horror picture La Isla de la Muerte/Island of the Doomed/Maneater of Hydra (1966), Custer of the West (1967), 100 Rifles (1969), Patton (1970), The Hunting Party (1971), The Light at the End of the World (1971), and the Orson Welles version of Treasure Island (1972).

Alfredo Leone: "Mario insisted that, if he had to use a Spanish D.P., he was going to use Paniagua, whose work he much admired. After we got him, we discovered that Paniagua was very, very slow. He used old-fashioned lighting systems, the brutes and what-not, taking up to an hour to light a single shot, whereas Mario knew how to do the same set-ups in maybe 10 minutes! But there's no question that Paniagua was brilliant—certainly among Spain's top craftsmen. His approaches took longer and slowed us down, but we still came out pretty much on time."

Left in the lurch by the hiring of Paniagua was Antonio Rinaldi, Bava's credited cameraman since 1965's Terrore nello spazio. Rinaldi quarrelled with Bava and it appears that the two never worked together again. Emilio Varriano, the second camera assistant on Baron Blood (in charge of pulling focus and loading the camera), filled the breach as camera operator.

Though the production was obliged to leave the direction of the camera team to Paniagua, the Spaniard had nothing to do with the storyboarding or lighting of individual shots. "It was always Mario," Leone stresses, insisting that Bava was still the de facto architect of the film's final look. Bava's decisive control over the content of each shot is evident from the number of set-ups which open in the sky, or in the treetops, before descending to the action, which contrast timeless art with small-minded intrigues, or quote from Bava's own earlier work—for example, the shot of Carlos peering through the window at the startled Lisa, which recalls Melissa Graps appearing at Nadine's window in Operazione paura.

BAVA camping it up with Elke Sommer between takes.

BURT LANCASTER pays a surprise visit to the Lisa set.

The proverbial icing on the cake was delivered by art director Nedo Azzini, whose talent makes Lisa and the Devil, like Baron Blood, one of Bava's most ornate and sumptuous-looking films. Azzini first worked in films as a set decorator for Camillo Mastrocinque's comedy Totò, lascia o radoppia? (1956, which featured Lisa's Gabriele Tinti), which was followed by stints on such pictures as Nunnally Johnson's The Angel Wore Red (1960) and Luigi Zampa's Anni ruggenti/The Roaring Years (1962). Advancing to the position of art director in 1963, he brought luster to Luciano Salce's Le ore dell'amore/The Hours of Love (1963, with Barbara Steele), Paolo Heusch's Totò comedy Il comandante (1963), Massimo Pupillo's Bill il taciturno . . . Django uccide/Django Kills Softly (1967), and Lucio Fulci's Una sull'altra/One On Top of the Other (1969, with Marisa Mell) and Una lucertola con la pelle di donna/Lizard in a Woman's Skin (1971). Beginning that same year, Azzini took a simultaneous step backwards and forwards, becoming the assistant art director–set dresser to the renowned production designer Ferdinando Scarfiotti on three major motion pictures: Bertolucci's Il conformista/The Conformist (1970), Visconti's Morte a Venezia/Death in Venice (1971), and Billy Wilder's Avanti! (1972). After making Lisa and the Devil, Azzini designed the production of Liliana Cavani's Il portiere di notte/The Night Porter (1975) and Al di là dei del bene e del male/Beyond Good and Evil (1977). Remarkably, some of the furnishings collected by Azzini make reference to Bava's own past body of work—the rocking chair seen in Carlos' study is the same one that briefly seats the medium's ghost in I tre volti della paura's "La goccia d'acqua" and the bed's headboard seen in Leandro's workshop—which also frames Telly Savalas' smiling face during the film's main titles—is the familiar one from I vampiri, Le meraviglie di Aladino, I tre volti della paura's "Il telefono," and Il rosso segno della follia.

Another crew member—a silent associate, as his name appears nowhere on the picture—was Giuseppe "Joe" De Blasio, who had previously worked with Bava during the preproduction stages of the ill-fated Cry Nightmare. Although Bava had abandoned that production after a dispute with Lawrence Woolner, he was evidently still on good terms with De Blasio. "He was an old-timer who had worked on Cleopatra [1963], and was well-known and respected within the industry," Leone explains. "I was always in and out of town, flying back and forth between Italy and New York and leaving the Rome office unattended, so Mario recommended that I hire De Blasio as our general manager. But he turned out to be a total deadweight; he did absolutely nothing. When we were working on Lisa and the Devil, he introduced me to another production assistant, Fausto Luppi, who did everything Joe should have done on that production. Joe just sat in the production office every day and looked at the numbers in his telephone book." Leone's remarks may seem gratuitous, but they are important in setting up events still to come in this story.

At one point early in the filming, De Blasio arranged for one of his old friends to visit the set—Burt Lancaster, whom he had first met during the filming of The Crimson Pirate (1952), while still a young executive at Warner Bros. Initially hopeful of securing a role in the film for his daughter, Lancaster was complimentary about what he saw happening on the Lisa set, which encouraged Leone to offer him the role of Carlos, at this point still uncast. (Leone's first choice for the role, Louis Jourdan, had turned the film down.) Lancaster quickly fell in with Leone's and Bava's fondness for bawdy humor, and pulled Leone's leg by suggesting that he might be persuaded to appear in his picture—if certain favors were rendered.

"I went to Bava and told him, 'Lancaster says he'll do the picture if Elke gives him a blow job,'" Leone chuckles. "Mario's eyes lit up and he said, 'If Lancaster will do the picture, I'll give him a blow job!' I said, 'Me, too!' So, as a gag gift, the three of us posed for a Polaroid, Elke, Mario, and me—with our mouths open! Lancaster loved it!"

Sommer, surprised by Leone's willingness to share this off-color story, remembers in turn that Bava and Leone were still harping on the joke long after Lancaster's departure. "They would walk around the set, like little boys, talking with their mouths open, saying, 'Have you theen Burt Lancathter? Where ith Burt Lancathter?'"

As these stories illustrate, while the film's tenor was somber and funereal, the atmosphere on-set was actually happy, ribald, and lighthearted.

It is one of the prevailing legends of cinema history that movies made about the Devil are typically plagued with misfortune. Lisa and the Devil was no exception to the rule.

"The very first shot we did was of Elke running into a room," Leone recalls. "She slid as she turned the corner and fell right on her fanny, hurting herself. Bava turned to me at once and said, 'We will have difficulties on this picture.' A few days later, when Alida Valli showed up on the set wearing a purple gown, Bava took one look at it and said, 'Now I know we will have difficulties on this picture!' The color purple, for him, was unlucky. Sure enough, we had problems throughout the film."

"I believe there is a demonic force, and none of us got out of there unscathed," reckons Elke Sommer, whose personal ordeals continued after the shoot relocated to Madrid for villa exteriors (and some interiors). A case in point is the day when the film company travelled from Madrid to the airport in Barcelona, where Leone had arranged a day's shooting aboard a TWA 747 jet airliner. It was in this unlikely setting that the film's surreal finale was filmed.

"The ending was my conception," Leone points out. "Mario had suggested something to me; I forget exactly what he said, but it gave me the idea. I told him about it and he said, 'You're crazy, Leone.' Then, a minute later, he turned around and said, 'You know . . . I like it!'" It is a peculiar ending, which sits not entirely comfortably within the story, but it allowed Bava once again to explore and exploit his own fear of flying.

Leone had negotiated with TWA for the use of a 747, which he obtained for six hours on the condition that he shoot the scene two ways—once so that the TWA logo could be seen, and again so that would not be seen. "That jet was actually on call," Leone adds, "so if any 747 had broken down anywhere in the area, it would have been taken away from us, so we never knew how long we were going to have it. It was a gamble that I took." As it happened, the jet was not taken away, but an anticipated six-hour shoot dragged on, through technical misadventure, into ten, twelve, fourteen hours. Elke Sommer's then-husband, writer Joe Hyams, could see her exhaustion and began to loudly complain about how such overwork was forbidden by the Screen Actors Guild and other Hollywood unions.

TWO POLAROIDS taken during the filming of Sophia's mourning scene. Below: Alfredo Leone kisses Telly Savalas' bald head for good luck as the film enters production.

GEORGE'S body is prepared for his funeral procession.

LEANDRO must repair a bad break in Carlos' head after Maximillian brains him in a violent act of jealousy.

"I finally told him to 'go off,' not to say something else," Sommer recalls, with a sly smile. "He wasn't helping. I think unions are pretty horrendous, quite honestly. Of course, I could have said, 'No more' after twelve hours. I was exhausted—and a little concerned about how I was going to look on camera in the morning with dark circles under my eyes, and there was very little room to move around inside that 747—but I was just so damned impressed that Leone got it! Mario was incredibly understanding. He said, 'Do you want to lie down?' I said, 'No, no.' However, I was very tired, and I fell over backwards on this battery box in the plane and one of the very sharp edges went into my spine. It broke a vertebrae. This is not very dangerous or life-threatening, but it was very painful."

As bad as these physical mishaps were for the film's lead actress, worst of all was the near-miss. While the crew was shooting at the airport, Madrid was hit by heavy rains—so heavy that the roof of the villa in which they had been filming collapsed, demolishing the rooms just below. "Our dressing rooms, wardrobe rooms, and makeup rooms were all right there," Leone says. "If we hadn't gone to shoot that scene on the jet, the entire cast and crew could have been killed!"

The production continued in Madrid despite the damages, everyone grateful to be alive. As the filming found its stride, the atmosphere of bad luck seemed to wear off and the participants began to get excited about the movie they were making. Elke Sommer entered into her character as though falling under a spell.

"The amazing thing is, Mario would never direct me," she reveals. "He would say, at the most, 'Do it as you always do it, Elke—do it as you feel it.' Technically, he was a genius with the lighting, with creating the environment. The morbidity of the environment was enough to induce your performance, even without direction. To me, it was a dream. And I continue to have these dreams, even though they are completely unrelated to my daily life. You know, I play golf, I have five dogs, I cook dinner for my husband, I clean the house, I plant flowers in my garden. I am a totally physical, outdoor person; I am not a morbid person, but I have something morbid in me."

With this statement, Elke Sommer offers a remarkably astute and comprehensive explanation of Bava's directorial approach, as it concerned actors. Whereas a number of Bava's actors felt "left alone" by his attention to the camera and the time he lavished on the provision of atmosphere, his most spiritually attuned actresses—Barbara Steele, Daliah Lavi, Laura Betti, Daria Nicolodi (and I can make this call, having interviewed each of them)—have all remarked that their performances for Bava were summoned forth in response to a palpable "feeling" created on the set. Whereas Steele admits to being frightened by the "vibrations" she intuited while lying in her crypt, the others—Sommer included—were delighted by the dramatic situations they faced, approaching their roles with a sense of adventure, accepting this odd realm of experience as a necessary part of life. Given Sommer's testimony, it seems that Bava's unverbalized approach to direction was more subtle, more intuitive, than merely picking the right people, or faces, and leaving them to it. The environment, the atmosphere provided by Bava, was intended to serve as an almost supernatural inducement of the performance he required. Just as he declared himself to be most fascinated "by the fear of a single person alone in a room," he presided over his films as a conductor of morbid atmospheres. Rather than impose a wholly preconceived performance on an actor who might ring false to them, and therefore look wrong onscreen, he preferred to extract performances through the more elemental catalysts of environment and instinct.

Bava did not see Lisa and the Devil as an opportunity to stage the kinds of gratuitous sex and violence he had presented in Ecologia del delitto; he intended it as an exercise in classical restraint. This led to some disagreements with Leone, who felt it was important that the film be contemporary in every possible way. Whereas Bava wanted to view the tryst between George and Sophia through a chandelier, or reflected on the silver lid of an opened cigarette case (shared cigarettes once again serving as Bava's favorite symbol of adultery), or to view the climactic act of pseudo-necrophilia through the mottled haze of a dark veil enclosing the canopied bed, Leone wanted to show some skin. He was so insistent about it that, while he allowed Bava to shoot the first coupling his way, he took over as director long enough to get some uncovered "coverage" in the can. This footage, which actually got released as a supplement on Elite Entertainment's "double feature" LaserDisc release of Baron Blood and Lisa and the Devil, and on Image Entertainment's "double feature" DVD of Lisa and the Devil and The House of Exorcism, shows Sylva Koscina and Gabriele Tinti, engaged in the bare-assed scrabble of fevered foreplay. Leone remembers: "Sylva Koscina had an abortion about a week or two before, and when the time came to shoot that scene, she was hot to trot. Bava refused to have anything to do with it; he set up the shot, called 'Action!' and left the room." In Bava's cut of Lisa and the Devil, the scene unreels without any noticeable nudity.

The most striking eroticism in the film occurs in the moments immediately preceding Sophia's murder, after she witnesses a spectral re-enactment of Carlos' murder. As Carlos is bludgeoned, a startling effusion of blood squirts across the screen, a trick made possible by projecting a blood flow onto a piece of glass positioned before the camera. When Sophia screams, the camera zooms in to her, and there is a reverse shot of the murderer cloaked in cardinal red, striking his final blow, which chromatically restates the outburst of blood. Sophia runs away to a disused room, bluish and peeling, where a panel of the wall suddenly juts open with a sharp creak, revealed as a secret passage. She screams again, as a man's hand, sleeved in red, creeps around the edge. The shot that follows shows Sylva Koscina, her back against the wall, screaming as the camera reveals her dress, its straps having slipped off her shoulders, hanging precariously low to bare more than just cleavage, without quite baring her breasts. Indeed, her dress appears to be entirely held up by the icy terror stiffening her nipples. Revealing without being explicit, it is the most erotic image in the movie and a most convincing case for Bava's argument that less is often more. According to Lamberto Bava, his father allowed him to direct this scene using his (Mario's) storyboards.

MARIO BAVA confers with crew members in preparation for the dummy repair scene.

LEANDRO witnesses Sophia's hit-and-run murder of her husband in this beautifully baroque frame enlargement.

In regard to the climactic, semi-necrophilic scene played by Alessio Orano and Elke Sommer, the actress remembers that Bava approached it quite gamely. "I talked a long time about the nude scene with Mario, and he was not opposed [to it] at all. I live in a secluded house, so when I do my gardening or my painting, I don't wear much, so I am totally cool with that. My personal feeling about this is: I see absolutely nothing wrong with nudity onscreen, as long as it doesn't move. I think it's tremendously wrong to do a nude scene where you move; you flap around and jiggle and it becomes vulgar somehow. But I felt totally pure during that scene."

Bava's cut of this sequence eschews any obvious nudity, cutting away before Sommer's unbuttoned blouse is opened, and showing her breasts only from a distance, her nipples always obscured by the placement of her necklace—just as Helena Ronée was filmed during her tryst with Howard Ross/Renato Rossini in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto. Bava appeased Leone by shooting some nude coverage, and he also shot the scene of Sommer's disrobement through the black veil and, once again, without it. The nudity and the unobscured view of the scene were not used until the film's later reincarnation as The House of Exorcism.

Alfredo Leone admits to taking charge of the direction briefly when he and Bava had a disagreement about how explicitly the scene should be shot. Bava filmed the scene the way it appears in the final cut, but Leone shot additional footage of Orano feigning attempted copulation with Sommer. "Orano surprised me," Leone recalls. "He didn't understand the concept of impotence! He would be thrusting away at Elke like a champion, and I'd shout, 'No, Alessio—Maximillian is impotent. He can't make love to this woman!' He said, 'How can I not make love to this woman? She is beautiful!' I said, 'It's not that you don't want to make love to her—you do—but your body won't cooperate.' I couldn't make him understand it, so I finally said, 'Haven't you ever been unable to do something you wanted to do?' And we finally got through the scene that way." The additional Leone footage was eventually used in The House of Exorcism.

Bava was similarly disinclined to extend the film's violence into vulgarity. George's murder, for example, occurs offscreen; the last time we see him, he is peering under the hood of the Packard, his face near the whirring blades of the car's fan belt. On second viewing, knowing that his death is imminent, one may wonder why his murder was never filmed. Leone blames the omission of this key scene on another of the mysterious, diabolical instances of "bad luck" that plagued the production. "Some of the film's footage we couldn't use because, as Technicolor reported to us in a series of telegrams, there were unexplainable flashes—like fire—running through the shots," he says. "The ruined footage included various shots we had done in Madrid, revolving around the murder of the chauffeur."

However, the murder itself was never shot. "No, it was never shown," Leone confirms. "As Tinti is tinkering with the motor, I wanted a hand to come up behind him, forcing his face into the blades of the fan belt. When I suggested this to Mario, he said, 'Leone, you don't realize what's involved. First of all, we'd have to dismantle the radiator, then we'd have to made special blades made out of rubber . . .' so we decided the time and expense would be too great. We did without. It wasn't necessary to show the murder, since we had the element of surprise by having him tumble out the door of the car when Koscina falls against it."

Even without filming the actual collision of man and machine, one imagines that an extension of George's last shot—with the red-cloaked figure creeping up behind him, grabbing him at the base of the neck, and pressing his face closer and closer to the fan—would have paid higher dividends than simply having George tumble dead out of the car, a fait accompli, followed by the gratuitously misleading cutaway shot to the Countess fondling a pair of bloodied scissors (the evident murder weapon).

Although an exceedingly brutal scene, Sophia's murder of her husband—hitting him with the Packard, and running over his body several times, in drive and in reverse—manages to pack a punch without shedding too much blood. The extremely convincing physical effect, sold to a great extent by Fajardo's performance (and a simple blood capsule, bit at just the right moment), was achieved by placing the actor in a shallow ditch, his midsection positioned slightly lower than his head and feet, and having some crew members roll a lightweight, wheeled platform over his body.

With Bava not in complete control of the camera, Lisa and the Devil did not provide him with a wealth of opportunities for in-camera effects, but there are a couple. Mario used his "water glass" to insert a subjective shot, of Maximillian from Lisa's perspective as she loses consciousness. For the scene of Lisa emerging from the ruins of the villa, Bava executed a magnificent glass matte painting.

"There's a shot where she exits the villa and its totally destroyed, a hundred years later," says Leone, setting the stage. "Bava created that ruin on a sheet of glass. He sent the still photographer to take a shot of the villa, had a large black-and-white print made, and then asked to be left alone for two days. What he did was cut-out the photo of the villa, scissor out areas to make it look destroyed, and paste it onto the plate glass, and then he painted a second glass plate to give the first a sense of dimension. Elke Sommer stood on a platform in the distance behind them, with a marker to show her exactly where to stand, and when. On the screen, it looks like she's stepping out of an ancient ruin. It's a brilliant piece of work."

BAVA'S uncanny matte painting of Lisa's emergence from the villa. Elke Sommer was standing in the middle of nothing on a square of cardboard to mark her place in the composition.

In every way, the production appeared to be a triumph. Alfredo Leone confesses to having had daydreams of Oscar night, the cast were pleased with their work, and Mario Bava was openly proud of what he had achieved for one of the few times in his career. Little did anyone suspect the future path the film would take, or that with only four more directorial assignments left to add to Mario Bava's filmography, Lisa and the Devil would be the last film he would complete as a director entirely on his own.

Music

The memorable score for Lisa and the Devil was composed and conducted by Carlo Savina. Born August 2, 1919, in Turin, Savina scored his first film—the comedy Totò cerca pace—in 1954, but spent most of his early years in the film business as a conductor of scores by other composers. Among his early conducting assignments were Mio figlio Nerone (1956) and Le meraviglie di Aladino (1961) for Angelo Francesco Lavagnino, and Le fatiche di Ercole (1958) and Ercole e la regina di Lidia (1959) for Enzo Masetti—all Bava-related pictures. As a composer, Savina was experienced at pepla, Spaghetti Westerns, and horror pictures throughout the 1960s and '70s—some of the most notable being Camillo Mastrocinque's La cripta e l'incubo/Terror in the Crypt (1964), Amando de Ossorio's Malenka/Fangs of the Living Dead (1967), and several for Antonio Margheriti, including Contronatura/The Unnaturals (1967), the Bava-related Nude . . . si muore (1968), and . . . E Dio disse a Caino/ . . . And God Said to Cain (1970). He was also the musical director of such important films as Antonioni's Desierto rosso/Red Desert (1964), Fellini's Giulietta degli spiriti/Juliet of the Spirits (1965), and De Sica's Il giardino dei Finzi Contini/The Garden of the Finzi-Continis (1970), and the conductor of Franco Zeffirelli's The Taming of the Shrew (1967), Francis Ford Coppola's The Godfather (1972), Fellini's Amarcord (1974), and Roman Polanski's The Tenant (1976) and Tess (1979). Savina died on June 23, 2002, at the age of 83.

Savina's conducting assignments were inarguably more prestigious than his composer credits, but his work, whether he is writing or conducting, is always characterized by a certain silvery sheen—a romantic sweep—that is unmistakably his own. This sound is ideally suited to the lush, decadent imagery of Lisa and the Devil, to which Savina responded with a misty masterpiece of his own.

The main theme, heard under the opening titles, reflects the story's dislocated timeframe by wedding the instrumentation of a pop group and a classical orchestra. Electric bass and a drum kit provide a subtle but propulsive rhythm, under a background wash of strings, while the main theme is stated by a female vocalist (Edda dell'Orso, best-known for her work with Morricone on Sergio Leone's C'era una volta il West/Once Upon a Time in the West) who sings a lilting melisma—that is, a melodic line without words. The melisma is underlined by lush strings and stabs of electric piano and harpsichord-treated keyboard, which ultimately responds to the melody with fluttering, flamenco-like patterns that prophesy the guitar lines of the Rodrigo piece heard later. This piece recurs later in the film, with the bass and drums more accentuated in the mix, during a flashback to Elena cavorting with Carlos on the grounds outside the villa,

This cue was originally recorded with a music box theme introduction, played on celeste, which was removed and incorporated into the narrative as the accompaniment to the carousel-like music box that lures Lisa away from the fresco in Toledo. The piece can be heard in its original form on Savina's easy listening album Summer Dreams, where it appeared under the title "Theme for You"—and as a bonus track on Digitmovies' dual soundtrack release of I vampiri and Caltiki il mostro immortale.

SPANISH one-sheet poster, art by Francisco Fernandez Zarza Jano. Unfortunately, the only poster campaign ever created for the film.

The music in Lisa, when given a close listen on its own terms, sounds re-edited in many instances, making it difficult to judge the cues on their independent musical merits as a whole. That said, some individual cues lend immeasurable character and atmosphere to the proceedings—for example, the short but evocative cue that opens with willowy woodwinds, whose avian call is answered by a string section whose part seems to twist and ascend with each reply. Equally striking is a more lengthy piece commencing with a three-note pattern that screeches from a bold, medieval sounding viola, which segues into an electric piano restatement of the main theme. Elsewhere in the film, there is another cue—seemingly a continuation of the viola piece—in which the viola returns to play a two-note ostinato over churning, ascending strings and a discordant but strangely complementary keyboard pattern; this, in turn, melds into the reprise of the music box celeste, heard over a subtle backwash of strings that seems to rise, like excited breathing, with volume, truth, and lyricism. During the scene in which Lisa is startled by the apparition of Carlos at the window, Savina contributes a somewhat incongruous piece of chase music, with spy film overtones, distinguished by the use of vibraphone percussion.

The most inspired of Savina's musical contributions are those which can be easily mistaken for a collaboration of music and dubbing. The first of these is heard as Maximillian approaches his secret shrine, where a soft, sighing orchestral treatment of the music box theme is heard under the distant, almost spectral sound of a woman's weeping. It was not until I recorded a copy of the film's soundtrack for isolated study that I realized that the weeping was actually a musical component, a lachrymose melisma performed (again, by Edda dell'Orso) in time with the accompaniment—one of the great vocalist's most unusual performances. Similarly effective, but more likely a collaboration between the music and sound departments, is the vastly melancholy theme, pregnant with regret, that is heard as Lisa awakens in the ruins of the villa. This piece consists of orchestral strings playing a five-note pattern in a manner that rises and falls, joined by tenderly played piano providing a tender, articulate response between the sighs of violins. As Lisa moves among the ruins, the music is joined by the velvet voice of Maximillian, beseeching Lisa not to go, which is spoken in time with the music in such a way as to effect a lyric accompaniment.

As fine a score as this is, its true appassionata is derived from a borrowed component, a Phillips recording of Joaquín Rodrigo's "Concierto de Aranjuez" performed by French composer/conductor Paul Mauriat (best-known for his international hit of 1968, "L'Amour est Bleu/Love Is Blue"). Rodrigo was born in 1909, and this, his most famous composition, was first performed in Barcelona in 1940—around the time Bava had graduated from being an apprentice to becoming a cameraman in his own right. The "Concierto de Aranjuez" was no stranger to modernist interpretation; Miles Davis and Gil Evans made it the centerpiece of their seminal 1959 jazz album Sketches of Spain. Whereas that rendition is alternately grand and melancholy, the Mauriat recording is full of tenderness, vulnerability, passion, and bravado. It's lushly orchestrated, but never tasteless; a pop rendition, but a faithful and moving one.

The Mauriat recording was Bava's own discovery. Not only did he impress a copy of the record on Savina, who quoted it in the composition of his music box melody, but he took the unprecedented step (for him) of bringing the music to the set and using it to inspire the actors' performances and to give Cecilio Paniagua's cinematography indications of the elegiac mood he wanted onscreen.

"When we were making Lisa and the Devil, Bava kept playing the 'Concierto de Aranjuez' throughout the shooting, from beginning to end," Leone remembers. "Everyone was fascinated; it was hypnotic for them."

Though Rodrigo's composition seems to permeate Lisa and the Devil, it is actually heard only twice in the film—for the first time, as the blind Countess runs her fingers over Lisa's face and asks Leandro to describe her.

COUNTESS
The eyes, Leandro . . . What color are the eyes?

LEANDRO
Changeable, milady, but by candlelight—blue.

COUNTESS
And the hair, Leandro? Tell me of it. Tell me of the hair.

LEANDRO
Light, milady, and gently flowing.

COUNTESS
Golden? Like a field of wheat?

LEANDRO
No, milady—brighter still, and haloing an equally beautiful countenance. Oh, she's a very lovely creature, milady.

Again, the dialogue (which may well be among the film's literary borrowings, given its exceptional quality) works in concert with the musical accompaniment, like a dramatic reading. The piece is reprised at the moment of Maximillian's failure to achieve a sexual climax with Lisa's inert body, and when we take these two applications into account, one feels that Bava may have been making a statement about the inability of the artist to achieve, or be worthy of, the true perfection found in nature.

My correspondent Henrik Hemlin wrote me something interesting about the background of this piece of music: "For a long time, Rodrigo told the story that the second movement relates to the wind in the trees at the summer palace of Aranjuez. (I also read it relates to an annual religious procession in Seville.) There is certainly an element of aristocratic dreaming and 'the poetry of the garden' in this beautiful, melancholy piece of music. But, apparently, Rodrigo kept secret for a long time what the slow movement really represents. The Aranjuez was written at the worst time of the composer's life. He and his wife, Turkish pianist Victoria Kamhi, had just lost their first baby. The second movement is a conversation with God. The repetitious guitar chords signifies the pulse of life. The melody, going through the various instruments of the orchestra, is all the emotions felt by Rodrigo: his love for the baby, his love for his wife, his entreaty to God not to take her. When the guitar comes back at the end, it's the acceptance of God's will, the feeling of peace, and the movement ends with the ascension of the soul of the baby . . . Anyway, be it gardens, religious processions, death and the ascension (or *de*scension, in this case) of the soul . . . it kind of suits the movie, doesn't it?" [5]

MAXIMILLIAN introduces Lisa to the lady who likes her cake with chocolate sprinkles.

Though Rodrigo was alive at the time of filming (he died in 1999), there is no record of his reaction to his signature composition being used as an accompaniment to Lisa and the Devil. Of course, Bava never spoke of his own relationship to the piece, leaving it as one of many personal, unexplained, perhaps unknowable touches that lend a particular fascination to this film, whose fluid and virtually unconscious narrative nominates it as the most musical of all his works.

A NEW LIFE . . . or death? Lisa awakens from her adventures as if from a frightening romantic dream, naked as the day she was born.

Commentary

After experiencing Lisa and the Devil, one realizes that Mario Bava's yearning to have "carte blanche" on a film had nothing to do with money and everything to do with ideas. The film has a lavish appearance, but realistically speaking, it looks no more lavish than Baron Blood or any of Bava's most important works of the early 1960s; Alfredo Leone used to tally the film's budget at $1,000,000 (remember, this is when $1,000,000 was a lot of money . . .), but he admits today that it actually cost quite a bit less to make, that it was Bava's ability to stretch a dollar onscreen which made it look like a million. What Bava craved, and had evidently not previously experienced in his career as a filmmaker. was a supportive framework that would offer him the absolute freedom to pursue his Muse. Lisa and the Devil was that once-in-a-lifetime opportunity.

In the history of horror films, there have been many classic movies that blend terror and poetry—Jacques Tourneur's Cat People (1942) and I Walked With a Zombie (1943), Georges Franju's Les Yeux sans Visage/Eyes Without a Face (1959), and Jack Clayton's The Innocents (1961), to name a few. A far more select number have dared to push the envelope to such unusual extremes that they resemble a kind of waking dream—Carl Dreyer's Vampyr (1932), John Parker's Dementia/Daughter of Horror (1955), and Robert Altman's Three Women (1977) come to mind. Lisa and the Devil fits well into both categories, and yet, while the titles representing the first group deign to stagger their poetry with passages of mundane reality, Lisa does not. Likewise, the titles in the second group may appear to be function on a subconscious or unconscious level at times, but nevertheless make some concession to logic or the elucidation of character psychology; again, Lisa does not.

Here, the normal compass points of time and place and character come unfixed, as though the hands of the clock have broken and crossed. The film eventually reveals its central timeframe as sometime in the 1870s, yet while Lisa inhabits that past, that alternate reality bends to accommodate her 1970s manner of fashion, modern conveniences like gaffer's tape, and even 20th century confections like the lollipop (invented circa 1908). Furthermore, Lisa's memories of her past life as Elena, which come to her while she inhabits this peculiar plane of existence, should be placed even further in the past but seem to take place in an inverted past where her clothing looks vaguely futuristic, if not the clothes one wears only in fantasy. This world knows what she knows, consciously, subconsciously, unconsciously, and in lives already lived. Each scene seems to melt and recede into the next, as we attend this beautiful, doll-like heroine on her metaphysical odyssey through the capital concerns of art, sex, death, and identity.

If we must apply a logical interpretation of the film's events, there are at least a couple worth pursuing. One is that, with this film, as with La ragazza che sapeva troppo in 1963, Mario Bava may have anticipated Dario Argento by depicting a character in the grip of what has become known as "the Stendhal Syndrome." In his travel memoir Rome, Naples et Florence in 1817, the French writer Marie-Henri Beyle (1783–1842), publishing for the first time under his nom de plume "Stendhal," described the experience of feeling overpowered, dislocated from himself, even to the point of losing consciousness, when exposed for the first time to the direct impact of great works of art while visiting the museums in these regions. This phenomena is common enough, apparently, for the Uffizi Gallery in Florence to maintain a room of cots where visitors can recover themselves, and for a psychologist to have written a book about contemporary sufferers of the malady, which Stendhal, in his less enlightened age, ascribed to his overly romantic nature. The moment that Lisa steps outside herself is the moment when she first sets eyes on the medieval fresco of the Devil and the dead, and the image of the Devil resonates with her throughout the rest of the narrative, appearing in the antiques shop, in the labyrinthine plaza outside the shop, in the villa of the Countess, and finally in the cockpit of the 747. Argento explored his own ideas on the subject in La sindrome di Stendhal/The Stendhal Syndrome (1996), but aspects of this phenomenon appear in Bava's work as early as La maschera del demonio, in which Princess Katia admits to a lifelong disturbance under the gaze of her ancestor's portrait—and the malevolent gaze of a family portrait recurs in Evil Eye (Bava's cameo as the lecherous uncle's photo), Operazione paura, and also Baron Blood. In most cases, the portraits in Bava's films symbolize a truth—Katia's fateful resemblance to Asa, Monika's identity as Melissa's sister, the true face of Otto von Kleist. The truth communicated by the fresco in Lisa and the Devil may be a feeling of déjà vu, that Lisa has been in Toledo before.

As the above synopsis shows, the film has a storyline, but the story is not what the movie is about, just as a painting is not always "about" the sunset or the nude arranged within the frame, but about the movement of the brush, the color values of the paint, and the energy of the overall piece, In a way, Lisa and the Devil is about the process of watching Lisa and the Devil—not in the sense of being a mise-en-abîme or having a self-referential, Chinese box construction, but in the sense of encouraging its viewers to drift along inside its rococo architecture at their own pace, to waft like ghosts at the side of its protagonist, to "get lost" with her and react as she does to its unbidden mysteries, with head-to-foot flushes of fear and pleasure. It is less a movie than a reverie, an original experience that somehow feels re-experienced on the first pass. Thus, it is a film that stubbornly resists being inhabited except by its own dramatis personæ. Not even the characters themselves seem to presently inhabit the story, wherein they all speak and act from displaced perspectives; Maximillian yearns to recapture the love in which he believed before Elena betrayed him; the Countess speaks to her adult son as though he were still a child; Carlos seems unable to accept the fact of his own death and pleads with Lisa to run away with him, as if this lost fulfillment could put breath back into his lungs; the Lehars comport themselves like a contented bourgeois couple, while their private behavior indicates a desire to be rid of each other; and much as Princess Katia is unnerved by the portrait of her evil, twin ancestor in La maschera del demonio, the villa awakens the possibility, otherwise dormant in Lisa, that she may, or may not, be the reincarnation of Elena. Every character is comparable to a dead and damned soul, puppets condemned to re-enact their past sins throughout eternity, until they learn from these mistakes, and thus gain the wisdom necessary to move forward.

DAGMAR LASSANDER as she appears in the 1968 German film ANDREA—WIE EIN BLATT AUF NACKTER HAUT/THE NYMPHO . . . an inspiration for Lisa's awakening?

5 Henrik Hemlin, email to the author, April 24, 2003.

In the penultimate scene, Lisa—who truly is the reincarnation of Elena, if we are to trust the memory awakened by the music box—is seemingly spared the Hell of dying once again in Maximillian's bed . . . but is she? Her subsequent awakening in the ruins of the villa, nude in a garden, suggests a rebirth and the possibility that the sincerity of her love for Maximillian, this time around, has finally loosened the Devil's grip on her soul. According to Alfredo Leone, the film—as Bava conceived it—was originally supposed to end with this scene. However, the final scene—Leone's own contribution to the script—takes Lisa aboard another of Leone's 747 jets. Just as we think we've finally found our bearings, the setting changes, but the metaphor remains constant—the dead are being carried away. But if the dead are being carried up into the heavens, as this metaphor suggests, who is the pilot? What saves the final fade-out from seeming like a cheap, ironic effect is the possibility it raises that God and the Devil may have the same face, be two sides of the same coin. Wherever they may take us, we're still clay in their hands. We're still dead.

MARIO BAVA offers Elke Sommer a half-hearted rescue from the Devil's clutches, as Alfredo Leone looks on in delight.

When asked for her own interpretation of Lisa's plight, Elke Sommer responds firmly. "I don't think she is reviewing her previous life," she says, refuting the most common critical interpretation of the story. "To me, [the film] is a dream, with the possibility that something like this happens when you pass away. I have a strong belief—a strong hope, let us say—that when I pass away, everything I have learned in my life will not be for nothing. The good things, the fine things I have inside me—and the shitty things, as well. When I was playing Lisa, I approached her story totally as a dream." Sommer's interpretation is consistent with my own Stendhal Syndrome theory; the film could be a dream, a reverie, a glimpse of the past, provoked by exposure to a work of art that speaks directly to Lisa.

But Lisa and the Devil is also about the relationship between art and death, and perhaps the triumph of art over death. The film is a veritable minefield of metaphors for death. Lisa's adventure begins when she wanders away from her tour group. The music box whose melody lures her into the antiques shop displays a procession of figures based on the 14th century morality poem "The Dance of Death," in which individuals of various social stations, beginning with the highest—the Pope—enter into dialogue with the Devil. Attentive viewers will notice that many of the figures present among the carvings on the music box also appear as full-sized mannequins in Leandro's studio, including the Pope, identified by the crimson mantle that Maximillian dons prior to committing his murders. The six figures are also echoed by the presence of a circular, columned gazebo on the villa property.

The first words Leandro addresses to Lisa (in the antiques shop) are "Do you think black is too severe, Miss?" which at once refers to the outfit worn by the dummy of Carlos, but also seems to question the traditional color of mourning and our society's generally humorless view of death. Lisa's immediate disorientation upon leaving the shop—indeed, finding the exit she used only a minute earlier suddenly sealed—is disturbing because it cuts off her return to places she has known, while the labyrinthine landscape and the recurring presence of Leandro and the dummy effectively places her within the ancient fresco she saw earlier. Her discovery of the broken-down Packard is introduced with the radiant emanation from its headlights (as she runs toward it, we see her "going into the light"), and the way it carries her and the Lehars to a common destination, recalls a redressed ferry ride with other dead souls across the River Styx. As Lisa and the Lehars are escorted by Leandro to the cottage, they are shown traversing a bridge ("crossing over"), and so on. In the Countess' villa, we see many semblances of the dead, in the forms of sculptures, statues, even photographs, while their models are either entirely absent, present in ghostly form, or skeletonizing in seclusion.

The film's oneiric texture is sustained by its leisurely pace, which was decided to some degree by its use of Rodrigo's "Concierto de Aranjuez," and perhaps to another degree by the casting of Alida Valli. If one looks for antecedents to Lisa and the Devil, one great, inevitable comparison would be to Luchino Visconti's Senso (1954), set in 19th century Venice, in which Valli played another Countess, Livia Serpieri, whose unwise love for a handsome young officer in the Austrian army (Farley Granger) mirrors the Countess' romantic betrayal by Carlos in Bava's film. Both films are operatic tragedies, opulently staged in authentic period villas, made all the more striking by their deliberate pacing and the subtle relationship between their camera movements and musical accompaniment. Further hommage was paid to Valli in the way Elke Sommer played Lisa's death scene aboard the 747. If one compares the two scenes side-by-side, it becomes apparent that Sommer was copying exactly the way in which Valli played her death scene in Franju's Les Yeux sans Visage.

One of the film's most impressive sequences from the standpoint of design is the funeral procession for George, in which Leandro is shown pulling the dinner cart-cum-bier, followed by the Lehars, Lisa, and Maximillian, who pass into silhouette behind an opaque stained glass panel—again echoing the carousel figures, and thus seeming to pass from the realm of life into art; then the camera lowers, surprisingly, to reveal a candelabra in the foreground, holding as many candles as there are figures in the procession, each one melting down or extinguished, each one a metaphor for the short wick of life. Another is the shot of Leandro observing Sophia Lehar's murder of her husband—a low-angle shot that sandwiches him between an art nouveau window and a rococo ceiling, a combination of styles to which Savalas adds a swirling plume of exhaled cigarette smoke. ("Where there's smoke, there's fire," as he comments elsewhere.) The complex, layered beauty of this shot is particularly effective as poetic counterpoint to a scene of violence.

An important cinematographic touch that is lost in current video transfers of the film is Leandro's skin tone, which was intended to be a hot orange tone, marking him as the Devil he is. A special makeup base was applied to Savalas' own tanned complexion each day to complete the effect, but when most telecine operators see this pronounced redness, they adjust the color levels to make it look normal, compromising not only this important visual detail but generally devaluing the potent color richness of the overall work. To see Lisa and the Devil on video is to be pleasantly intrigued and mystified, but to see it on the big screen in a proper Technicolor print, with its color scheme intact, is to be thoroughly entranced.

Throughout his career as a director, Mario Bava insisted that he was a technician rather than an artist, that he had no respect for directors pretentious enough to express themselves through their films. Lisa and the Devil appears to contradict those statements, which certainly were an imposture to some extent; more to the point, it depicts a filmmaker who was maturing, as an artist and as a man, beyond frontiers he had previously claimed for himself. Baron Blood had been a commercial and technical success, but to Bava, it offered few opportunities to solve new problems or to break new ground. Considering the strength of Bava's opinions on the above, it is unlikely that he approached Lisa consciously as a platform for his own self-expression; no film this obliquely stated can be regarded as ego-driven. It is much more likely that he felt, especially after Baron Blood, a need to force an evolutionary change in horror—if the genre was to survive and give him the status and longevity he hoped to achieve as a director. The irony of this is that, without knowing it, he had already made the film that would dictate the future course of the horror genre for the next thirty years: Ecologia del delitto. Lisa's only mistake, as far as the rest of the world would be concerned, was in trying to raise the genre out of a perceived gutter, to use horror and the macabre as the basis of what is difficult to regard as anything but an art film.

Premiere

Lisa and the Devil premiered on May 9, 1973, at the Cannes Film Festival's Market, where producer Alfredo Leone hosted three screenings at the Paris Theatre. "While we were making the film, we thought we had Academy Award material going for us," he recalls, "and we had a tremendous turn-out for the first screening. No one left the theater. We had additional screenings, also to packed houses—but there were no buyers. The best offer I had at the time was $6,000 for the Far East—for the entire Far East, can you imagine?"

Despite its failure to attract serious distribution interest at Cannes, Lisa and the Devil might have had a happier ending had Alfredo Leone not tried to bluff his way through the poker game of distribution. According to Leone, Samuel Z. Arkoff offered him $250,000 for Lisa, sight unseen—twice what he had accepted for Baron Blood—but Leone, bowled over by the film Bava had given him and convinced that it had the quality to vault him into the Big Leagues, stubbornly held out for $300,000. Arkoff was so eager to continue his association with Bava and Leone that he flew to Rome to meet with Leone personally at the Hotel Excelsior. There, over breakfast, he took a check for $250,000 from his pocket and handed it to Leone. The producer handed it back, insisting on $300,000. Arkoff, drawing back, replied that he could not offer that kind of money without the approval of American International's board of directors.

"C'mon, Sam," Leone bickered. "You are AIP."

"But I have investors to answer to," Arkoff countered, "and $300,000 is a hell of a lot of money. So is this," he pointed out, waving the check.

"Not enough," Leone said, firmly. ("I was a fool," Leone admits today. "I should have taken it.")

Remember, this offer was made sight unseen. Arkoff bristled at having his ante upped and told Leone, "Well, for that kind of money, I'd have to see the picture." Leone set up an immediate screening, his pride in the film not allowing for the possibility that Arkoff would withdraw his offer—which is exactly what happened. Emerging from the screening room, the rotund, cigar-chomping executive took the opportunity to let Leone have it. He lambasted Lisa and the Devil from all directions, itemizing the many changes he would doubtless have imposed on the picture anyway, had money actually traded hands. Among his complaints: the film was too talky, too arty-farty, and he hated the necrophilia scene almost as much as he hated Telly Savalas' lollipops, which he felt needlessly trivialized the film's most menacing figure.

"Al, you've got to understand," Arkoff lectured, "the horror fans take these films very seriously; they don't go for camp." This from a man whose biggest pictures at the moment were Blacula and The Thing With Two Heads.

Arkoff walked away from the picture. It was the end of Leone's brief association with American International.

Variant

In the meantime, thanks to the efforts of co-producer José Maesso, Lisa and the Devil was given a Spanish release in a variant cut entitled El Diablo se Lleva los Muertos—literally, "The Devil Transports the Dead." This version, which arrived in Barcelona theaters on November 25, 1974, runs approximately 4 minutes shorter than the official cut and contains some notable differences. The Spanish main titles are longer and more detailed; the producer is listed as José G. Maesso, and the screenplay is credited to a longer list of Spanish names, as well as Bava. Alfredo Leone's name appears nowhere on the picture. Made at the time Generalissimo Francisco Franco was still in power, and maintaining a wholesome standard for his national cinema, all of the sex scenes and nudity are missing from the picture. Curiously, the bludgeoning death of Sophia is intact, as it no longer is in the domestic release (for reasons that will be detailed at the close of the House of Exorcism chapter). Perhaps the most curious omission is the scene of Lisa exiting the villa, frightening the children playing in the street, and walking away as Leandro and his antiquarian friend look on. The Spanish version also features a slightly different editing in the climactic 747 sequence, omitting the slow track up to the pilot (here, the shot begins as the pilot turns around, revealed as the inescapable Leandro) and also the later shot of Lisa collapsing to the floor like a pallid corpse.

According to Leone, Lisa and the Devil was also released in Portugal, most likely in the version sanctioned by Maesso. Mario Bava would go to his grave thinking that his masterpiece had permanently joined the ghostly ranks of lost films. It was not until the early 1980s that it resurfaced, first in incomplete form on television, and then in the late 1990s, 99% intact, on videotape and LaserDisc. But before it could be reborn as itself, Lisa and the Devil would share the fate of its own protagonist, and be reincarnated into a form no one could have predicted.

The Shadow Guest . . . and Other Guests

The making of Lisa and the Devil had framed a period of rejuvenation in Mario Bava's professional and personal lives. However, the period immediately following its production—as the film failed to secure distribution in all but one market—was a time of disappointments, personal upheavals, and creative distress.

In late 1972, Bava was approached by Fulvio Lucisano to direct a film based on an American novel he had optioned, The Shadow Guest by Hillary Waugh. Waugh—no relation to the great British novelist Evelyn Waugh—was born in New England in 1920 and began his career with well-received police procedurals such as Last Seen Wearing (1952). In the 1960s, he turned to Gothic mysteries in the style of Daphne Du Maurier, such as The Late Mrs. D and The Eleventh Mrs. Bluebeard; The Shadow Guest was one of these.

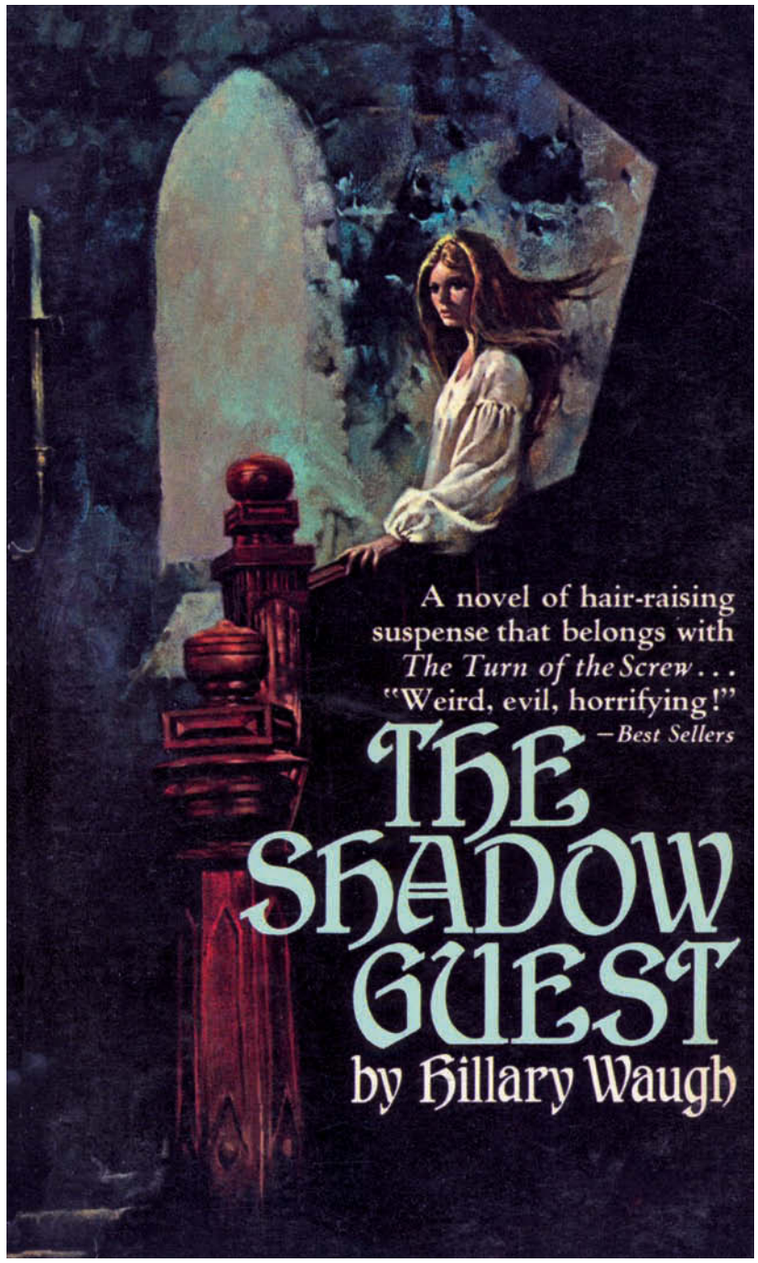
It isn't known whether Bava actually read the novel, but he agreed to direct the film on the basis of a screenplay written by Ecologia del delitto scribe Dardano Sacchetti. It was evidently a liberal adaptation, as Variety soon announced the film's title as Al 33 di via Orologio fa sempre freddo ("It's Always Cold at 33 Via Orologio")—"Via Orologio" meaning "Clock Street." As Alfredo Leone busied himself with trying to sell Lisa and the Devil, Bava spent most of 1973 in preproduction on this project. Though she doesn't remember the title of the film (which was always changing), the expatriate American actress Mimsy Farmer recalls auditioning for the lead in the autumn of 1973, when she appeared in two screen tests under Bava's direction. Later in the year, Variety announced that the cumbersome title had been changed to La casa 8 ("House Number 8") and that Sylva Koscina would star. The picture was never made, but Bava's and Sacchetti's ideas for the film would nevertheless continue to evolve, and mutate into another, separate project before Bava's career reached its end.

Then came 1974, which—in personal and professional terms—was almost certainly the most tempestuous of Bava's postwar life. It was then, after years of marital discord, that Mario's son and assistant Lamberto Bava filed for divorce from his wife Fiamma. The legal proceedings would drag on, gruelingly, for a full year, during which time Lamberto's children—Georgia (age 9) and Fabrizio, called "Roy" (age 7)—resided with their nonno e nonna in their house in the Northern part of Rome, at Via Valgardena 3.

As someone who had remained resolutely committed to his own wife, despite an often stifling and tempestuous marriage, Bava must have felt conflicted by his son's decision to divorce. But to have children in his house once again was a great source of joy, and their arrival came at a time when Mario was in need of the special brand of distraction they could provide.

Georgia describes the setting: "My grandparents lived in an upper middle-class residential area. Their house was quite big and there was wood everywhere—even wooden floors, parquet. My grandmother loved flowers, and I remember their big balcony with plenty of flowers. We lived there for a year."

Both grandchildren have vivid memories of their nonno's personal library. "He had many, many books—loads and loads of books!" Georgia marvels. Roy, who would later inherit Mario's personal library, is more specific: "His favorite reading was Russian literature like Gogol and Turgenev, but also French writers like Guy de Maupassant, and generally, literature of a fantastical bent, like Poe and Lovecraft. He loved science fiction. In Italy there is a publisher [Edizione Mondadori] who used to publish a weekly collection—now it's every fifteen days—of science fiction stories [Urania], and he had them all. He also had books by Arthur C. Clarke, Robert Heinlein—everybody, really. The same publisher used to publish thriller collections—gialli—every two weeks, and he had them all. In Italy, science fiction used to be regarded as a minor form of literature, and my grandfather was very insistent that it wasn't minor at all. Every time a new collection was published, he would sit down with it at night and read it straight through in three hours. He would be up at three or four o'clock in the morning, reading—and he would still get up early. He would watch television at night with us, but only for a little while. When he was working, he would come back late at night and we would usually see him only on the weekends."



Sometimes, with Roy, Mario adopted the role of a paternal sage. "He once told me that there were three rules to finding happiness in life. First: Don't ever get married. Second: Never own a dog. And third: Do not work in the movie business! So he was preaching something, but also going against his own preaching!"[6]

As the homemaker, Iole Bava naturally bore the brunt of caring for the children, but whenever he wasn't working—and sometimes when he was—Mario took pleasure in keeping them amused. As Roy recalls, "My grandfather was the kind of person who liked to play a lot with younger people. He was always trying to challenge me in a certain way to create interests in me, like having me read a lot of books, and going around with him. He would take me and my sister along with him, whenever he could. He would play ping pong with me, and he also loved to play cards. The nice thing was, when we used to play together, he would let me win. We were playing with money, you know, so he used to let me win so that I would feel like I was earning my money. He didn't often go to the movies, only when he was taking me and my sister. So he would be seeing Disney, Spaghetti Westerns, or science fiction—this kind of movie. I remember going with him to see THX 1138 by George Lucas."

At the time, Mario and Iole's daughter Elena resided in the same area, as did Lamberto, who lived on the Via Imperatore, in the center of town. According to Georgia, Mario "was the center of our family. I loved him a lot because, every time I was invited to a party by my friends, he wanted me to go. My grandmother, on the other hand, was very strict and didn't want me to go. He was very liberal; he let us do whatever we wanted to do. He was like a big friend. We were close to him, and we could talk to him about everything."

Roy agrees. "I remember him as a very positive person. He used to pick me up at school and take me shopping. He spent a lot of time playing with me, and he liked to get me involved in his games—meaning, his work. Sometimes he would give me things after he was finished using them; for instance—something I no longer have, unfortunately—the miniature of Diabolik that was used for a shot in a parachute. Sometimes he would ask me and my sister to draw something, in the hope that he would find in our work something that might inspire him, because he was always interested in drawing and painting. "

Mario's grandchildren were also able to observe his relationship with Iole at first hand. Georgia describes the marriage as "very strained; I don't think they were all that happy, quite honestly. If my grandfather had married another woman, he would have been happier, and vice versa. They were quite different to one another in every way. He liked reading and the work he was doing, but when he was around her, he tried to hide [his interests]. She didn't understand his kind of movie. She liked romantic films; she didn't care how a special effect was made. You know how it is; when you hear about nothing else all day, you get tired of it. My grandfather lived mainly for the cinema, and my grandmother didn't understand this. She was very proud of having a husband who was a director, but that was it."

Since becoming a director, Bava had acquired a number of homes away from home, as he enjoyed an occasional change of scene. Until the late 1960s, he kept a pièd à terre apartment near the Piazza del Popolo, where he could meet with associates from the film business without disturbing Iole's need for privacy. He also had a small house in Velletri, near the Frascati wine country. "It was just like a country house," Roy remembers, "but we seldom went there. We would go sometimes on the weekends, but we wouldn't sleep there."

The grandchildren were particularly fond of Mario's summer house in Tuscany—a three-hour drive from Rome—which was located in a little village called Abadia San Salvatore, on Monte Amiata. Each summer, before and after the period when Georgia and Roy lived with their grandparents, Lamberto and his youngsters would drive out to Tuscany to spend a vacation of 15–20 days with Mario and Iole.

Roy describes the family's Tuscan retreat: "It was a big building that was erected in the center of this village. It was twelve stories tall in the middle of a place where nothing was taller than three floors. He had a very big terrace overlooking the whole area. I don't know how long they had it, because when I was only 1 year old [1968], they already had it. The interior was more rustic than it was at their place in Rome. My grandfather was very fond of English antiques, and he had a collection of miniature trains. He also had a small collection of ancient Roman smoking pipes, just a few."

For Iole, the Tuscan climate was calming to her heart palpitations. For Mario and Georgia, Monte Aniata was a good place to hunt for mushrooms—but inevitably, the easygoing life began to chafe at Mario and he would grow depressed.

"Sometimes in the mountains," Roy observes, "he would have liked to be in the middle of some different action; the vacations were too relaxing for him. It probably wasn't very intellectually stimulating—you know, a village in the mountains . . ."

6 Roy Bava, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

FATHER MICHAEL (Robert Alda) must rid the hospitalized Lisa Reiner (Elke Sommer) of Satanic influence in THE HOUSE OF EXORCISM.

The House of Exorcism

AN ENTIRE YEAR passed without takers for Lisa and the Devil. With allegedly more than $1,000,000 of his own money sunk into this accursed, carte blanche white elephant, Alfredo Leone decided that something had to be done to lend it some boxoffice gunpowder. The course of least resistance was obvious: Leone had in his hands a very high-quality picture involving the Devil at a time when the hottest film in the world was about demonic possession: William Friedkin's The Exorcist (1973). In fact, the William Peter Blatty novel upon which the Friedkin film was based had been dogging Leone peripherally for some time. During the filming of Lisa and the Devil, Elke Sommer's husband Joe Hyams happened to mention it.

LISA suffers a sudden violent seizure after visiting an antiques shop in Toledo, Spain.

Leone: "Hyams said, 'Al, there's a book out called The Exorcist—it's your kind of story.' I said, 'Joe, I've got my hands full with this thing; I'm not looking to buy another book.'" And later, a waiter friend of mine in New York. who always wanted to be in show biz and wanted to invest with me, said to me one day, 'Why don't you forget that picture of yours and do something with The Exorcist?' That's how the idea for House of Exorcism was born." [1]

Alfredo Leone's instincts about how to salvage his investment cannot be faulted, as several other Italian producers were thinking along similar lines at the same time. Within a year of The Exorcist's nationwide release on December 26, 1973, the international film market was glutted with Exorcist imitations from Italy, Spain, Belgium. Ovidio Assonitis' Chi sei?/Beyond the Door, Alberto De Martino's L'Anticristo/The Tempter, Amando de Ossorio's La Endemoniada/Demon Witch Child, and Mario Gariazzo's L'ossessa/The Sexorcist were all in theaters before the end of 1974. "Exorcist Fever" ran so high at the American boxoffice, in particular, that a number of unscrupulous, low-end film distributors seized the opportunity to repackage some older, unprofitable imports with new monikers like The Devil's Nightmare, The Long Night of Exorcism, and Voodoo Black Exorcist.

Friedkin's film had not yet been released in Italy, and it was Leone's idea to quickly produce an imitation work that could be distributed in Italy and other European countries in reasonable advance of the original. If half or more of the existing Lisa footage was used, the majority of the picture would already be in the can.

Bava was not happy about the idea of painting a mustache on his masterpiece—much less having it vomit a frog—but he felt an obligation to Leone to help him recoup the money he had lavished on his dream project. Since it wasn't possible to see The Exorcist in Italy, Leone persuaded Bava to make his first and only trip to Great Britain. In the company of production managers Bruno Frascà and Frederick "Fritz" Muller, Bava flew into London, went straight to the theater where he caught an afternoon screening of The Exorcist, taxied directly to the airport, and flew right back home again.

With The Exorcist fresh in his mind, Bava screened Lisa and the Devil several times, looking for places where existing scenes could be rewritten or new ones might be inserted. Leone remembers Bava phoning and pleading with him to reconsider: "It's too beautiful, Leone! We are not going to touch it!"

Leone was upset as well. "Mario," he told him, "we are going to touch it, because the way it is, I can't sell it and I sure as hell can't eat it!"

"We had no alternative," Leone says defensively. "Of course, Mario wasn't happy about making the changes, but being a man of compassion and understanding, he said, 'Whatever it takes to regenerate the investment' and that he would be available."

A Hollywood screenwriter residing in Rome, H. A. L. Craig (1925–78, best-known for Waterloo and Airport 1975), was paid $35,000 by Leone to prepare a new script based on the existing footage, but his work was deemed "absolutely embarrassing" by the producer and thrown out. Leone subsequently caught a showing

The House of Exorcism

Reshoots filmed in Barcelona and Rome
April 2–18, 1974
First released: April 2, 1975
Technicolor, 1.85:1, 92 minutes

Credits same as Lisa and the Devil, with these exceptions: Director: Mickey Lion [Mario Bava and Alfredo Leone]. Screenplay: Alberto Cittini, Alfredo Leone. Additional photography: Mario Bava (uncredited). Production managers: Frederick "Fritz" Muller. Bruno Frascà. Additional music: "The Rites of Spring" by Igor Stravinski.

Cast additions: Robert Alda (Father Michael), Carmen Silva (Temptress).

Canada: The House of Exorcism, International Film Distributors, 1976
France: La Maison de l'Exorcisme, Selection C.A.A., 9/28/77, 90m. Video: La Maison de l'Exorcisme: Le Vengeance de Satan
Germany: Der Teuflische, 1975, 86m
Italy: La casa dell'esorcismo, Transeuropea Film S.p.a., "Technicolor and CinemaScope," 4/2/75
Mexico: La Casa del Exorcismo, 1977
Poland: Bom eqzoi'cyzmow, "The Home of Exorcism," Filmservice opal
Spain: La Casa del Exorcismo, 1975
UK: House of Exorcism, Scotia-Barber Distributors, 2/77, 93m 5s, Certificate "X, " passed with cuts US: The House of Exorcism, Peppercorn-Wormser Releasing, Color by Movielab, 7/9/76, 92m. Video: The Devil in the House of Exorcism of The Exorcist himself, at the Paramount Theater in Manhattan's Columbus Circle, and returned to Rome, where he presided over a series of script meetings with Italian screenwriter Alberto Cittini, Lisa's art director Nedo Azzini, and Bava, with the intention of hashing-out a new storyline. As Leone admits of these sessions, "We had many, many misunderstandings and disagreements." Bava repeatedly threatened to wash his hands of the project, but was ultimately compelled to see it through, fearful of entrusting his Lisa footage to the hands of some uncaring hack. As the meetings continued, dominated by Leone and Cittini (who share credit for the final screenplay, which was written first in Italian, then translated into English), Bava oscillated between anger and a passive-aggressive gloom.

Roy Bava, who was residing with his grandfather during this period, remembers The House of Exorcism period very well. "He was coming home very pissed off, all during the period of that movie," he laughs, with a bit of a shudder. "I never saw him that angry about anything before!"

As The House of Exorcism drew closer to production, Leone decided to cut the going price of Lisa and the Devil in half. Bryanston Films—who had successfully released the Carlo Ponti productions Andy Warhol's Frankenstein and Andy Warhol's Dracula—expressed an interest in the film to the tune of $150,000. Leone was tempted, but sensing that the company was "on shaky ground," he resisted.[2] A reward for his patience soon materialized in the form of a $200,000 offer from Allied Artists—whose ground would ultimately prove just as shaky, though Leone didn't notice. To his ever-lasting regret, he sold the North American rights to Lisa and the Devil to Allied Artists, using the income as seed money for his Exorcist knock-off, which would ultimately cost somewhere in the neighborhood of $300,000.

1 Alfredo Leone, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

2 Leone's suspicions turned out to be well-founded. The company went under in 1975.

Synopsis

Lisa Reiner and her friend Kathy are part of a tour bus group visiting Toledo, Spain. As their tour guide lectures to them about a medieval fresco depicting the Devil carrying away the dead, Lisa is charmed away by the melody of a distant music box. She follows the music to an antiques shop, where she sees a bald man—identical to the Devil in the painting—carrying a life-size dummy of a man. She admires the music box and asks the price, but the shopkeeper explains that it belongs to the other customer. When she leaves, the shopkeeper comments on Lisa's resemblance to someone else and extracts a dusty bust of her twin, which the bald man slaps on the forehead. Outside in the street, as if struck on the head, Lisa is knocked down and suffers a violent seizure. A priest, Father Michael, emerges from the crowd and accompanies Lisa and Kathy to the hospital.

As the ambulance speeds away, Lisa laughs demonically—while another Lisa, the inner Lisa, wanders lost through a city of the soul. In an empty square, she encounters Leandro—the bald man from the antiques shop—and his dummy. She asks for directions back to the fresco of the Devil and the dead, but his instructions lead her instead to a keyhole-shaped passage, on the other side of which she is approached by the exact, living twin of the dummy carted around by Leandro, He seems to know her, but addresses her as "Elena." Frightened, she repels his urgent familiarity, accidentally knocking him down a flight of stairs. She then hurries away, thinking she has killed him. A pocket watch spills out of his vest, its broken hands crossed.

At the hospital, Lisa demonstrates a formidable strength and uses obscene language in a beastly, guttural voice. Kathy expresses concern to Father Michael, who advises her to rejoin her tour group, or she'll miss her flight back to America. Father Michael hears Lisa chortling "It's her turn now! Finally a body, a living body! She will suffer now and not I! It's her turn!" When he questions her by name, she answers, "I'm not Lisa, and I never was Lisa!"

Meanwhile, the inner Lisa encounters a middle-aged married couple, Francis and Sophia Lehar, and their chauffeur George, who is trying to get their deluxe Packard working. She begs a ride from them, but the car breaks down again outside a resplendent villa, where the door is answered by the resident majordomo: Leandro. The lady of the house, the Countess, wants the visitors to be sent away, but after seeing Lisa, her son Maximillian pleads with her to let them stay. She agrees, but "not in here—show them to the cottage."

RESISTING Father Michael's help, Lisa becomes violent and verbally abusive.

The doctors can find no physical cause for Lisa's problem, causing the priest to speculate that it must be rooted not in her physiology, but in her soul.

As Leandro escorts the guests to the cottage, he speaks confidentially to Lisa, reminding her of their earlier encounters. Once settled in, Lisa bathes and Sophia sneaks away to a sexual assignation with George, which is witnessed by a shadow at their window.

The doctors examine X-rays of Lisa's skull but can find no physiological causes for her behavior. Their attempts at diagnosis are disturbed by a violent ruckus in her room, where they find her performing unreal gymnastics. Dangling upside down, she bites the crotch of one of the interns struggling to subdue her. She is restrained and wheeled away, cackling, "Dinner is served!"

Dinner is served at the villa by Leandro. After the main courses, he unveils a chocolate cake and Maximillian takes the first slice to someone elsewhere on the property—a woman named Elena, who is kept in a darkly veiled canopy bed in a secret room behind a mirrored wall. He addresses her scornfully, saying, "He's come back . . . but you'll never leave this room. Never!" After dinner, the Countess asks Leandro to describe Lisa to her, revealing to everyone that she is actually blind. As he voices his description, Maximillian opens a dusty book in the secret room to reveal an antique photograph of Elena, who looks exactly like Lisa.

At the hospital, Lisa—possessed by the Devil, and by the damned soul of Elena—rants: "Impotent! Maximillian was impotent and that's why I had to fuck Carlos! Do you know how horny a virgin gets?" She tells Father Michael that she, Elena, married Maximillian as a young virgin, but he was rendered impotent through hatred of his stepfather, Carlos, and incestuous jealousy of his mother. Unable to be satisfied by her husband, Elena succumbed to the charms of Carlos, and when the two fell in love and decided to run away together, they were murdered. "There's nothing you can do," she says. "It's already happened, and it's going to happen again."

Francis discovers Sophia outside, looking for George, who is found dead inside the Packard, his face torn as though pushed into the car's fan belt. Leandro supervises as the body is taken inside, and he suggests that they leave the disposal of the body to him. The Packard is now working again, but Sophia does not wish to leave George; Francis insists, but she rebels by getting behind the wheel herself and running over her husband until he is dead. As if relating this story, the hospitalized Lisa/Elena asks Father Michael, "Can that white host of yours erase the darkness of crime?"

ITALIAN manifesto.

Upset by this turn of events, Lisa—in her room at the cottage—knocks over a pocket watch and its broken hands cross, as they did during her first encounter with Carlos. Within moments, she sees Carlos peering at her through a window. She runs back to the main house, and sees Leandro furtively carrying a man's body behind closed doors. She peers through a window and watches him preparing the body for burial—snapping its legs back at the shin to fit it inside a too-short coffin. Shocked to discover that the corpse is that of Carlos, she bolts for help inside the villa, where she finds herself in a room stocked with mannequins. When Carlos—alive—steps forward from among them, she faints.

Lisa/Elena, her mouth matted with dried vomit, begs Father Michael for a drink of water. As he pours it for her, the cup tumbles onto the floor and rolls away, accompanied by the sound of screeching tires and crashing metal. The priest flashes back on an incident from his past, before he was a man of the cloth, when his careless driving resulted in the death of his beloved, Anna. Lisa/Elena assumes the form of Anna, naked and alluring, to seduce the priest, but he resists.

Meanwhile, Carlos romances the inert Lisa on a fur rug in the mannequin room, calling her "Elena." He is so intent upon his lovemaking that he fails to hear another person, cloaked in scarlet, enter the room. The intruder clubs Carlos to death, the blood splattering on Lisa's blouse, The murder is witnessed by Sophia, who is pursued to a closet-like space where she, too, is bludgeoned to death. Lisa is found by Leandro, who sets about repairing the broken head of his Carlos dummy like a skilled artisan, and then measures Lisa's body in order to make an accurate facsimile of her. When all her measurements have been taken, he awakens Lisa, who is stunned to see the dummy of Carlos, who, Leandro assures her, is dead. Leaving the room, Lisa discovers the Countess leaning over the battered, bloody form of Sophia, and flees into the arms of Maximillian. He asks her to help him leave the villa, to escape the jealousy of his mother. He tells her she is beautiful, comparing her to Elena, whom he then proceeds to introduce to her. Elena is a skeletonized corpse in a wedding veil, kept in this bed for many years. As Lisa screams, Max chloroforms her and strips off her clothes, and his own, determined to reclaim his potency with the help of her warm flesh—"It will be different with you . . . I know it will!"—but as he tries to consummate his passion, the imagined cacklings of Elena doom his efforts to failure.

Angrily, Max goes on a rampage, overturning the funereal trappings of the villa, cursing his mother and exclaiming, "I can't live like this, in your shrine of death!" The Countess comforts him, urging him to admit his love for her. As she walks toward his embrace, the Countess is penetrated by a sharp lance, thrust by Max, killing her. He then discovers a macabre shrine of all his victims—the people who tried to take Lisa, his second chance, away from him—seated at a table in an obscene mockery of "The Last Supper."

MEXICAN lobby card. The topless woman at bottom center is Carmen Silva.

The only one missing is the Countess, who appears and pursues Max until, recoiling, he topples from the window to his death on the arrowheads of an iron gate. The Countess is revealed to be another of Leandro's dolls, carried by him.

Her story told, Lisa/Elena confesses to Father Michael that all these events happened fifty years ago in a villa he knows well. She directs him to it, and he prays for her as she lies strapped to her bed, weeping and vomiting toads in a torrent of green bile.

As if freed from her possession, Lisa is shown escaping the villa in the first rays of morning, stepping over the broken doll of Maximillian. Leandro watches her go, and is approached by the antiques shopkeeper, who carries a lifesize replica of Lisa. Leandro decides to let her go, murmuring, "It's all too late, my friend. It's all too late."

Father Michael finds the villa and commences his exorcism of the long-vacant property. Elena's bed appears out of the dust of the floorboards, her skeleton hurling snakes at him. Although the valiant priest perishes in the attempt, the exorcism is ultimately successful.

Production

The process of revising Lisa and the Devil for the commercial market was clearly traumatic for Mario Bava. After the temporary upswing of Baron Blood, his directorial career was once again in dire straits. Just as he had found himself working again in low-budget horror one year after directing Diabolik, the biggest movie of his career, he now found himself celebrating the completion of his productive work by debasing it. Under the circumstances, it is a testament to his personal character and their personal relationship that Bava was able to control his temper and cooperate with Alfredo Leone for as long as he did.

The House of Exorcism was shot over a 3½-week period in late 1974. The new location shots were lensed entirely in Barcelona, while the hospital interiors were filmed in a sanatorium on the outskirts of Rome. The climactic exorcism sequence was not filmed at the original interior location—which had since been repaired and modified into a foreign embassy building—but at Villa Frascati, where the Villa Graps interiors of Operazione paura were filmed almost a decade earlier.

The reshoots required the presence of only two of the original cast members: Elke Sommer and Leone's daughter Kathy, a recurring ornament of Leone International productions. Both were eminently available and affordable: they worked for free. "When I am making a movie, I become like one of the crew," declares Sommer. "I am not an actor–actor, who keeps their distance; I feel like part of the crew, and I am happy to do whatever it takes. If I am doing a play and riding the bus to the theater in the next town, and the bus breaks down ten miles from town, then I am damn well going to walk those ten miles to town, carrying wardrobe and scenery if I have to, and be on the stage when the curtain goes up—and this has happened in my life not once, but many times. This film I did out of friendship for Alfredo Leone and Mario Bava, because I felt damned good in their company."

Cast in the role of Father Michael[3] was Robert Alda. Born Alfonso Giuseppe Roberto D'Abbruzzo in New York City in 1914, Alda had previously worked with Bava on Robert Z. Leonard's La donna più bella del mondo in 1955, but Bava was unimpressed with the actor's abilities. "Bava threw a fit when I hired Robert Alda," Leone confesses. "'But he can't act, Leone!' he would tell me. But we needed a name for the picture, and I thought he would be perfect in the role of the priest. In fact, I think Bava got Alda's best performance ever out of him—and his son, Alan Alda, agrees." Although their names have not been recorded, Alfredo Leone further remembers that the ambulance attendant was played by a young actor brought to his attention by Antonio Cantáfora, and that the doctor presiding over Lisa's case was an American amateur, hired more for his facility with languages than for his acting ability.

Lisa cinematographer Cecilio Paniagua is credited as The House of Exorcism's director of photography, primarily to fulfill the earlier cut's coproduction quota arrangements; in fact, he had nothing to do with the Barcelona reshoots. Bava himself acted as the D.P. for most of the filming, with the camera being operated by Emilio Varriano.

The film's direction is credited to "Mickey Lion."[4] Some published sources have reported that the pseudonym was used because Leone was the sole director of the reshoots, but this is incorrect. In fact, Bava agreed to direct the material for Leone on the condition that his name would not appear anywhere on the finished product, as he did not wish to endorse it. Bava approached The House of Exorcism with the distaste one feels for an unpleasant task that must be done, for better or worse; he had so little personal interest in this version that he allowed Leone more creative input than was usual. It was, after all, going to be his film.

"Bava and I 'co-directed,' you might say," Leone offers. "I never interfered, but he was a very open-minded man. He wasn't the typical director who doesn't like advice or suggestions. Frequently, in the middle of a shot, or in the setting-up of a shot, I'd get his ear and say, 'You know, Mario . . .' He'd never get upset; he would take my advice and expand on it, take it from there and make it useful."

Leone describes his own particular value as a co-director: "Whatever Bava did, he gave it 100%, but he was primarily a technician, you see. That was his genius, moreso than as a director of actors; he could not get a maximum performance out of an actor. I'll give you an example from House of Exorcism: You know the scene where Robert Alda is exorcising the house and he has to sweep the snakes away? When Bava was directing that, it came to light that Alda had a terrible fear of snakes. He dipped his hand down very rapidly and then pulled it back up; it looked cowardly. I stepped in and said, 'Look, Alda, you're the priest and it's important that you show absolute conviction, absolutely no fear whatsoever.' I had to step in and illustrate—little things like that. Other than that, Bava did most of it."

According to Leone, the exorcism sequence was built around materials brought to the production by H. A. L. Craig, though his screenplay was not used. "Craig got us a tape of an authentic exorcism and a photograph of the possessed person's face, which provided the model of the image blasted onto the wall at the end of the film. Mario and I listened to that thing a dozen times to prepare for House of Exorcism."

As the reshoots proceeded, Bava's collaboration with Leone again grew strained when it came to filming scenes involving blunt, lascivious language or nudity. "There was a combination of hospital scenes involving Elke Sommer that Bava refused to shoot," Leone explains. "It was very difficult to get him to agree to these changes to begin with, but at certain points during the filming, he would absolutely refuse to go any further, particularly where foul language was concerned. Bava would take Elke aside and plead with her not to say those words, the profanity and whatnot. At these points, I had to take over. What else could I do?"

ITALIAN fotobusta.

Sommer: "Mario talked to me about his sister, who was a Mother Superior, and it was one of many things we had in common, in a way, because my father was a Lutheran minister. He probably would have looked upon my doing these devilish things—not in an upset way, but in an interested way, because you either have it, the belief—the real belief—or you don't have it. I don't believe in the Virgin Mary, because she doesn't make sense to me, but I do believe in God. And I believe in the Devil. I don't mind using a four-letter word, when I'm on the golf course and something goes wrong; I'm like one of the boys. Leone wanted me to do these things because they were fashionable, and at first I didn't understand—I had not seen The Exorcist when I made this movie—but then I realized that Leone was right. If a woman was possessed by the Devil, she might do anything, be totally different that she ever was herself, to curse, even to defecate! So I had no problem. But Mario, at the beginning, was against it [the cursing]. I said to him, 'Mario, excuse me, but if all this green shit comes out of your mouth, you are going to curse—and I don't feel in any way belittled or humiliated by this.'"

FATHER MICHAEL fights back against a torrent of bile and obscenity.

Still, Bava resisted. When these scenes had to be shot, he would leave the scene in Leone's hands and smoke a Marlboro in the outer corridor. "He would turn his back and sulk," Leone says. "Please understand: at no time did I replace Bava on the set. It was just that, on occasion, he [refused] to do certain scenes because of his religious beliefs, superstitions, or whatever. So that responsibility fell to me."

Considering Bava's own personal enjoyment of profanity and the torrent of obscenity heard in his next film, Cani arrabbiati/Rabid Dogs, one doubts that strong language was the real issue here. Perhaps most disturbing to Bava was the script's sadistic abuse of its Catholic priest hero. When Father Michael dons his purple stole, for example, and begins to read "The Lord's Prayer" over the possessed Lisa, she projects vomit all over him and scoffs, "There's your daily bread! Eat it! Eat it like you did those whores' cunts before you became a priest!" This sort of thing was beyond the pale, of course, and Bava was no doubt particularly sensitive in that these words were ostensibly being put into Lisa's mouth by the damned soul of a woman named Elena—whose name was shared by his daughter and sister, the Mother Superior.

"Other stuff—the nudity, the girl [Carmen Silva] who gets out of bed—that's not Bava, that's me," Leone confirms. "He wouldn't have any part of that, yet occasionally his respect and love for film was so strong that he'd go against his own will, against his own grain." Meaning that Bava made the effort to remain professional under these circumstances, and filmed more than he would have liked to do morally, but when confronted with certain offensive material, his personal inhibitions won out.

The way Sommer remembers it, Bava was eventually won over by the results captured on film. "When he saw the performance I gave [in the dailies], he came to me and said, "Grazie, eravate bella. Andiamo a pranzo." ["Thank you, you were beautiful. Now let's go eat."]

In all fairness, it must be noted that Lamberto Bava remembers the circumstances of filming The House of Exorcism somewhat differently than has been described here. According to him, "There was a big love-hate relationship between my father and Alfredo Leone. Around the time we were finishing the movie, The Exorcist had a big successful world release, so Leone went to my father and told him, "Why don't we add a nice exorcism?" along with another three or four ideas. My father didn't know what to say and, on the spot, replied: 'I'm not interested in this procedure. If you want to do it for the States, I have no problem about that; I can ask Lamberto to help you.' And he sent me to assist Leone, to keep himself well removed from all the bullshit. Then, when my father saw what had been done, he got very angry and there were serious litigations, with letters exchanged by their lawyers. Some things in The House of Exorcism were directed by Leone, and from a technical perspective, I told him how to realize them."[5]

Lamberto's remarks make it sound like Mario never got anywhere near the set during the reshoots, and was surprised by the direction Leone took, but we have Elke Sommer's testimony, as well as Leone's, that Mario Bava was there. Unhappy, not always

3 This character was named in honor of Alfredo Leone's son Michael, credited in some sources as a second assistant on the picture, who passed away in the early 1990s.

4 The "Mickey" of Mickey Lion was another tribute to Michael Leone.

5 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

cooperative, but there . . . until some line was crossed that made Bava's continued presence on the set no longer tenable.

While interviewing Alfredo Leone for this book, persistent questioning paid off in an important victory over memory. During our initial talks, Leone remembered Bava abandoning The House of Exorcism in protest over the scenes he did not wish to shoot. However, in time, it became clearer that Bava's departure had nothing to do with The House of Exorcism—as supported by Sommer's recollections of his gameness—but rather the sudden presentation of what seemed, at the time, a better offer. Bava's leave-taking had less to do with his own anger than with Leone's.

LISA adopts the nubile form of a woman (Carmen Silva) from Father Michael's past to weaken his religious armor.

To better understand the dissolution of this important partnership, we must backtrack to the period of optimism following the completion of Lisa and the Devil, as Mario Bava and Alfredo Leone were looking forward to its world premiere at the 1973 Cannes Film Festival. Lisa had been an exhilarating film for Bava, and for Leone as well. The producer was determined to continue his professional alliance with Bava, who was that rare director not only affordable at his level, but capable of delivering films that looked like they cost millions of dollars when the actual outlay was closer to the mid-to-low six-figure range. Leone had every expectation that the picture would be his ticket from the international exploitation market to The Big Time. What he did not yet know was that with the Bava touch came the Bava luck.

As Cannes loomed, Leone turned his thoughts to possible future collaborations with Bava and Lisa's Spanish co-producer, José Maesso, with whom they had both felt in good association. Against the strong objections of his general manager Joe De Blasio, Leone entered into a three-picture deal with Maesso, and they decided that their next collaboration would be a script in Leone's backlog with the unprepossessing title of Henry and Janet.

"It wasn't much of a story," Leone describes, "the usual old-miser-with-greedy-relatives-out-to-get-his-gold story. But it was a period piece set in the horse-and-carriage days, just the kind of picture Mario could have brought to life. The opening scene showed a beautiful girl jumping on stage at the Crazy Horse Saloon and doing a striptease, from which we cut to a Maserati speeding through the streets of Paris. A guy screeches to a halt, gets out, grabs the girl right off the stage, and throws her into the car. This is her lover, who also happened to be the chauffeur of the old miser. He takes her home and the Old Man [Leone envisioned this role played by John Marley] is watching from the window, sees his chauffeur wooing her and drawing her into an embrace. When she comes in, he slaps her and calls her a slut and, in the process, has a heart attack . . . I changed the title to Last Will and Testament . . . it had a lot of plot twists, similar to Ten Little Indians."

As we will remember from the making of 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, Bava was no fan of Ten Little Indians, and the scenario described by Leone bears an additional similarity to the romantic triangle provided in Lisa and the Devil by Francis Lehar, his wife, and their chauffeur. It should come as no surprise that "Mario didn't want to do it," as Leone admits.

It was during the filming of The House of Exorcism that Bava discovered, in the course of his nightly reading, a short story that he felt had the makings of a great movie—the kind of movie that could be cheaply made, yet have the power to turn his career around.

During this period of the early 1970s, the stories published in Mondadori's monthly giallo magazines had begun to move away from traditional murder-mystery fiction toward more hard-edged crime stories. It was from his steady diet of such reading that Bava had discovered a short story by the Ukrainian-born Italian novelist Giorgio Scerbanenco entitled "L'uomo che non voleva morire" ("The Man Who Didn't Want to Die"). Bava was enthusiastic about the story and had hoped to film it in 1972. In this story, a wealthy art collector finances a heist of paintings from another private collection, including Pierre-Auguste Renoir's 1888 masterpiece "After the Bath." During the heist, Giovanni, the youngest of the thieves, becomes exhilarated to the point of personal greed, cutting the Renoir from its frame for himself, and returning to the crime scene to rape a buxom housekeeper. During the rape, another bound captive succeeds in kicking Giovanni, shattering his skull. Found by his fellow thieves, the incapacitated Giovanni is rolled up in a carpet and abandoned in the woods, but he is found the next morning and taken to hospital. His partners, learning of his survival and his theft of the Renoir, attempt to kill him in his hospital bed, but get the wrong man. Giovanni survives and, with the help of his girlfriend, avenges himself. In the end, however, all the thieves end up violently killed, and the Renoir finds its way to the covetous collector, whose own hands were never dirtied by violence. Bava succeeded in developing a script with Rafael Azcona (a frequent collaborator of Marco Ferreri) and Alessandro Parenzo, in which Marussig Productions showed interest—but the project was set aside indefinitely as Bava began to concentrate exclusively on the filming of Lisa and the Devil in 1973. Fifteen years later, Lamberto Bava directed this abandoned project as a TV-movie, and it became one of his finest works.

THIS ITALIAN fotobusta offers a collage of images from LISA AND THE DEVIL.

In retrospect, Mario Bava's resignation of L'uomo che non voleva morire was a strategic disaster, not only because of what became of Lisa and the Devil, but because the story—showing how the aesthetic appreciation and desire for something beautiful, like a work of art, can arouse the worst, most bestial behavior in people—would have been the perfect follow-up to Ecologia del delitto, and the ideal overture to his next film, the extraordinary crime thriller Cani arrabbiati/ Rabid Dogs.

Lamberto Bava recounts the origins of this next project: "My father discovered the story . . . in a back issue of a Giallo Mondadori, which he always bought, though he never read the novels. Instead, Papà loved to read the short stories that came at the end of every issue, under the byline of Ellery Queen. The basis for Cani arrabbiati was found precisely this way, when he read one of those short stories. In one of the back issues was an American story entitled 'L'uomo e il bambino,' if I remember correctly."[6]

"L'uomo e il bambino" ("Man and Boy") was the Italian translation of a story by Ellery Queen [the nom de plume of writing partners Frederic Dannay and Manfred B. Lee], and not a recent one. It originally appeared under the title "Kidnapped!" in the July 8, 1951 issue of This Week. It was later reprinted under the title "Child Missing" in the August 1958 Australian edition The Ellery Queen Mystery Magazine. Bava fell in love with the story and took it directly to Alfredo Leone, pitching it as something they should make together.

"Mario became very obsessive when he read something that he liked," Leone relates. "I wanted so much to continue our association that I worked very hard to acquire the rights to this story. I even had a verbal commitment from the copyright owner or his lawyer; I was in Rome, but would be coming back to the States in ten days, so we agreed there was no need to mail any legal documents back and forth; I would be in his office before the check could get there. We had a deal, in my view, and I told Mario that we would do Last Will and Testament first, with Maesso, and then follow it immediately with [what we called] Man and Boy."

Leone continues: "Joe De Blasio had pleaded with me not to enter into the three-picture deal with Maesso, telling me that, 'as my general manager,' he was advising me it was a bad move. Even though there was no economic reason for me to not honor that agreement, he finally persuaded me. It turned out to be a real disaster, too, because it broke my very good relationship with [Maesso] and slowed my company down. De Blasio, it turned out, had an ulterior motive. Mario came to me one day and said, 'You told me that you had the rights to 'Man and Boy,' but De Blasio has them!' I explained to Mario that I had a verbal deal, that the rights were mine, and I would close the deal as soon as I got back to the States. He told me that I was too late, that De Blasio had arranged for an American distributor, Bryanston Pictures, to acquire the rights for him. He said he hoped that I would understand that he had to make this picture."

Leone believes that De Blasio, who was in his office at the time of his phone call to the author's agent, eavesdropped on the conversation and recognized what is now known as "a window of opportunity." He evidently shared the overheard information with Vince Parisi, who ran the Italian office of Bryanston Films. For years, Bryanston had specialized in rough-and-ready exploitation fare, but in 1974, the company's profile took an upward swing with the releases of Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre, John Carpenter's Dark Star, and Paul Morrissey's Italian-made Flesh for Frankenstein and Blood for Dracula (retitled Andy Warhol's Frankenstein and Andy Warhol's Dracula for arthouse cachet), all of which received serious critical attention. The company had been impressed with the classy horror of Lisa and the Devil and made Leone a respectable offer for the US distribution rights. Feeling wary of the personalities involved, Leone turned them down. ("The people behind the company were the same people who were involved with Deep Throat, so that should give you an idea of where they were coming from," he explains.) It would appear that Bryanston was determined to establish a partnership with Leone or Bava, one way or another.

Joe De Blasio is now deceased, so his side of the story cannot be told. What is known for certain is that Leone reacted so strongly to De Blasio's subterfuge and to Mario's seeming lack of loyalty, that his already sorely tested relationship with Bava finally snapped—and Bava walked.

6 Lamberto Bava interview, "Mario Bava, Mio Padre" in Luigi Cozzi, Il Cinema Gotico e Fantastico Italiano Vol 1—Mario Bava, I Mille Volti Della Paura (Rome, Italy: Mondo Ignoto/Profondo Rosso, 2001), 149–56.

VENTURING into the derelict villa where Lisa's adventure took place, Father Michael is assailed by its unclean spirits.

"When Bava decided to go with De Blasio to do Man and Boy, I felt betrayed," Leone admits. "I was furious. We argued, and in the end, he walked away from [The House of Exorcism] entirely. I had to complete it myself. Consequently, Bava had nothing to do with the editing or the final assembly of the film."

Post-production

In Bava's absence, Alfredo Leone took creative control of The House of Exorcism, fine-tuning the rough cut with Carlo Reali, who had been editing Bava's work since Ecologia del delitto. Leone beefed up the picture with as much exploitative material as was on hand, incorporating the stronger versions of the two erotic sequences filmed for Lisa, which included more nudity of Sylva Koscina and Elke Sommer and more graphic coupling. Unknown to Leone at the time, Reali was in constant, covert touch with Bava to keep him abreast of what was happening to his movie in the editing room.

Incredibly, The House of Exorcism had commenced production without any firm notion of how the new footage would be integrated with the existing narrative of Lisa. Leone claims that the solution to this dilemma was purely serendipitous: "Reali and I were watching the footage on an interlock, with the sound passing in advance of the picture, and the doctor's voice was commenting on something in the previous scene, which also seemed to apply to something we were seeing in the next scene. And I said, 'That's it! We'll have the dialogue overlap these cuts!' And we began to look for images that related to images from Lisa, places where we could cut from one scene to another, like the spilled wine that cuts to the puddle of vomit, and so on. I became very excited, and we reshot some scenes and added some others to make these transitions easier, like the shot where Elke's being wheeled down the hospital corridor shouting 'Dinner is served!' I didn't know this at the time, but Reali was telling Bava about what we were doing, like some kind of double agent! And I think Mario was becoming interested."

As a visual thinker, Bava would certainly have responded favorably to this creative method of reconstruction. Throughout the film, the new footage cuts to the Lisa material on the cue of rhyming images: the zoom into the broken, crossed hands of Carlos' fallen pocket watch cuts to a doctor's wristwatch; the doctor turns off the light of Lisa's hospital room, cutting to a night exterior of a brightening street lamp; Leandro's locking of the villa's gates is matched to an X-ray of Lisa's ribcage, a shot of a marble bust of a smiling child cuts to an X-ray of Lisa's grinning skull, and so on. This inspired approach is wholly consistent with the sense of déjà vu that tugs at Lisa throughout Lisa and the Devil, beginning with the fresco's resemblance to Leandro, and continuing through a series of images (like the broken hands of the pocket watch) whose significance is eventually explained by the fact of their recurrence. Such transitional methods were also used within the reshot material, as when Lisa is knocked down in response to Leandro slapping the bust of Elena, or when the overturned cup rolls across the floor accompanied by the sound of screeching tires, signalling the flashback of the car accident from Father Michael's past. Other transitions were evidently considered, but ultimately not included—a good case in point is the shot of Lisa being wheeled down the hospital corridor on a gurney, shrieking "Dinner is served, dinner is served!" which cuts to Leandro talking amiably to "Mr. Rabbit" (a stuffed hare) while preparing the dinner cart—not, as one might expect, while he is actually wheeling the cart around the table, as he does a few moments later. The visual connection is too explicit to have been overlooked, but it was apparently sacrificed in order to preserve the charming ad libs of Savalas.

When the House filming wrapped, Elke Sommer experienced what she believes was one last demonic punishment for participating in this exposé of the Devil. "The movie was finished, and my then-husband Joe and I decided to drive from Barcelona to Germany, We wanted to make it a really nice ride—it was a Jaguar X-KE, and I'm a very fast driver. We got as far as the border of France, somewhere in the armpit of the world in the south of France, and I looked over at Joe and saw that he was looking extremely bad. I gave him a Kleenex from my pocket and told him to cough into it, and then I saw that he was spitting up blood into it. We stopped and he coughed blood, urinated blood—and there was no pharmacy open in France at 9:00 in the morning! We had a thermometer and he had a temperature of 104° Fahrenheit. He nearly didn't make it, but we found a hospital and I pulled a doctor out of an ear operation, saying, 'Please, my husband is dying!' It's a long story, but he made it. It turned out to be a sickness which had not occurred in Germany for over forty years, something called Morbus Weil [or Leptospirose], which means that the water in the ice cubes he had been drinking had been contaminated with rats' urine, which probably came from Toledo. The microbes could have eaten up everything—his intestines, everything."

Distribution

Even for the newly commercialized The House of Exorcism, the road to distribution was not without obstacles. There was immediate interest in the picture from Dear Film, an Italian distribution company that had a long-standing relationship with Warner Bros. which ended just as The Exorcist was becoming available. "They had a falling-out with Warners [and lost The Exorcist], so they wanted House of Exorcism," Leone recalls. "They offered me a tremendous deal, but they wouldn't give me any money up front. I was stuck for a lot of money at this point, and I was looking for dollars to bail out. They offered me 200 million lire [slightly more than $124,000]—again, nothing up front—but they would handle all the prints and advertising, and that was unheard-of for an Italian distribution company. I said, 'No way," and that was a big mistake."[7]

Allied Artists' investment in the picture guaranteed them the right to first refusal for America, which they exercised in the negative. "They were flabbergasted by the picture," Leone says, "but, for some reason, they wouldn't take it. I couldn't understand why. Paramount was in the same building, so I invited them down to see the picture—and they wanted it. Universal heard about it and asked me to fly out, which I did on Labor Day weekend. They were telling me that they did such a great job with Jaws, they should have this picture, and they sold me on the idea of them having it . . . but it never took place. At the last minute, all the deals fell through. I discovered later that Allied Artists was calling them all and saying 'You can't have this picture—we have first refusal rights and we haven't refused it yet.'"

With few other options available to him, Leone swallowed his pride and took the picture to Sam Arkoff at AIP. "When Sam saw it, he called me up and said, 'Al, I don't know what you did, or how you did it, but it's brilliant!' He said, 'I want that picture!' But again, the deal was never consummated."[8] Leone eventually filed suit against Allied Artists' alleged obstruction of his efforts, a case that remains in legal limbo to this day.

Had Arkoff followed through, The House of Exorcism would have become one of the last films ever distributed by American International. The following year, 1978, AIP merged with Filmways (minus Arkoff), and after several unsuccessful stabs at mainstream success, the new company filed for bankruptcy in 1981, at which point their holdings were taken over by Orion Pictures. In the meantime, Arkoff set up his own production outfit, Arkoff International Pictures, under which banner he announced a full roster of forthcoming movies (including remakes of some "classic" AIP titles), none of which ever came to fruition. Over the next ten years, Arkoff was billed as producer or executive producer on less than a dozen films—some profitable, like The Amityville Horror (1979) and Dressed To Kill (1980), but most of them forgettable failures. As a series of in-title-only AIP remakes, produced by his son Lou, were being prepared for cable broadcast, Samuel Z. Arkoff died of natural causes on September 16, 2001, at the age of 83—within months of the death of his wife, Hilda.

The American distribution rights to The House of Exorcism were eventually sold to Peppercorn-Wormser, a New York-based company active since the late 1960s, when they distributed Orson Welles' Falstaff/Chimes at Midnight (1965) and various other spicy foreign pick-ups. At the time of their acquisition of Leone's film, their recent releases (all imports) included Love and Anarchy, Bamboo House of Dolls, The Sensual Man, and Le Sex Shop. Released in the Summer of 1976, nearly three years after the initial impact of The Exorcist, The House of Exorcism was not exactly in the vanguard of the exorcism trend, but neither did it carry its train. The "rip-off" phase of the cycle finally culminated with the Independent-International release of Elo Panaccio's Un urlo dalle tenebre/Naked Exorcism and Al Adamson's Nurse Sherri (1977), though the publication of various Exorcist-inspired best sellers subsequently led to a fresh spate of film adaptations on the "possession" theme which flourished into the 1980s, including Stuart Rosenberg's The Amityville Horror (1979), Sidney J. Furie's The Entity (1981, released 1983), and Damiano Damiani's Amityville II: The Possession (1982).

7 Leone.

8 Ibid.

A 91-minute version of the film eventually opened in Great Britain, where it was advertised with art depicting a frog leaping from a woman's mouth. It was greeted in kind by Monthly Film Bulletin's Richard Combs, who called it "a fair old witch's brew from a pseudonymous Mario Bava, which would require the services of a powerful exorcist to drive out all its clatteringly crude and incoherent script ideas. Not that it matters . . . as his tongue is planted so firmly in cheek that it is in danger of coming out the other side. The humour for the most part is signalled by . . . Telly Savalas . . . humming ironically to himself and popping lollipops as if he had just dropped in from rehearsals on another show."[9]

Mario Bava and Alfredo Leone did not put their past disputes behind them until life—or rather, death—intervened. Shortly after the Peppercorn-Wormser deal was made, Alfredo Leone's father died. Considering that Leone had bankrolled the film Bava had intended as a tribute to his own father, it was the sort of loss that could not be overlooked in good conscience.

"Mario came by the house to pay his condolences," Leone recalls. "He brought a fruitcake, I remember, which is an Italian custom—something to sweeten your period of mourning. Anyway, we talked about various things and then, after a quiet moment, he said to me, 'You know, Alfredo, if you want to put my name back on the film, it's okay with me.'

"I said, 'Mario, if you want your name back on the film, ask me to do it and I'll do it, but I can only do it for Europe now, because it's too late for America.'"

Bava agreed, and the story is verified by the fact that Bava's name appears as director on the film's European prints and advertising materials. The House of Exorcism was sold all over the world—even in Germany, where Baron Blood had failed to secure distribution—and became the biggest commercial success of Leone's career.

ITALIAN due-foglia.

Commentary

"La casa dell'esorcismo isn't my film, although it carries my name," Mario Bava said in a 1976 interview. "It's a story too complicated to explain, similar to that of the cuckold who discovers that the child who bears his name isn't his own. There's nothing to be done about it." [10]

Bava's name appeared on the Italian release because he had mended his fences with Leone, and though he had objected strongly to the film's most blasphemous and prurient aspects while it was in progress, his comments suggest that he came to regard this career episode more philosophically as time passed.

Critics, especially those specializing in the horror genre, would not be so forgiving or forgetting. As Leone laments: "I've been criticized, in the history books and throughout the motion picture industry, for 'butchering'—as they call it—a beautiful film. Well, I never thought I butchered it. I thought the work we did should have been complimented . . . not because I did it, but because it was a good piece of work. However, I understand where the critics are coming from; they're speaking of art and culture, and there was no art or culture in House of Exorcism. True. True. It was done for commercial purposes . . . but I think it was done well." [11]

Leone does not overstate his case. Of course, viewed side-by-side with Lisa and the Devil, The House of Exorcism cannot help but compare miserably. It must be remembered that, at the time it was first released, such a comparison was not possible because House literally replaced Lisa in circulation for quite a few years, and this fact became inseparable from its stigma. Now that nearly three decades have passed, and Lisa and the Devil has survived to find an audience and be recognized as the special achievement it is, the time has come to admit that The House of Exorcism is far from the worst that could have happened.

UK quad poster, which just about says it all.

When House was first released, Lisa had not been seen except for its screenings at the 1973 Cannes Film Festival; therefore, House offered to the general public its first glimpses of this important work. Leone was careful to leave Lisa's most beautiful scenes essentially intact, but they were left to float in a bilious broth of ugly, commercial hard-sell. Those of us who saw House during its initial run, with no knowledge of the earlier film, could tell that we were in the presence of a compromised, schizophrenic work, but this could be defended as an inventive approach to a movie that was about the internal struggle—the schizophrenia—of demonic possession. But once it became public knowledge that the most striking material in the picture were remnants of a suppressed film, possibly a masterpiece, the new footage became an even greater offense. Until Leone gave his first interview on the subject to this author in 1984, it was also assumed that Mario Bava had no active involvement in the creation of The House of Exorcism. It seemed fitting that, in Woody Allen's Annie Hall (1977), a Los Angeles movie theater marquee advertising The House of Exorcism was included in a humorous montage of sights illustrative of the decline and fall of Western civilization.

Unlike most movies that take a commercial route, The House of Exorcism is, in some ways, even more complex than the difficult film from which it was made. For all its oneiric qualities, Lisa follows a single character on a singular journey, while House splits its tormented protagonist, early on, into two characters: one strapped to a hospital bed, and another who walks freely through the circles of Hell that comprise the hospital patient's disordered soul. The moments of macabre beauty in The House of Exorcism are by no means limited to the excerpts from Lisa and the Devil; the climactic moments of the film, in which Father Michael is momentarily thwarted in his exorcism of the villa by the sudden appearance of Elena's rematerializing bed (a Bava trick shot of the bed collapsing, filmed in reverse, with a subtle glass matte foreground to hide the fallen frame from view), is as elegantly shot as anything in the former picture. And though it is not the same bed, or even the same villa, Bava was able to present the available setting in such a way that it appears consistent with what was shown before.

The House of Exorcism doesn't entirely hang together as well as it should, and the writing in the new scenes is often execrable (Father Michael: "Where do you come from?" Lisa: "From a cunt, you jerk!"). And yet, regardless of its faults, it is also cleverly edited, well-produced, sometimes visually arresting, and more ambitious than much of its kind.

9 Richard Combs, "La Casa dell'Escorcismo (The House of Exorcism)" review, Monthly Film Bulletin, 1977.

10 Giuseppe Lippi and Lorenzo Codelli, Fant'italia (Trieste, Italy: XIV Festival Internazionale del Film di Fantascienza, 1976), 152–54.

11 Leone.

Aftermath

Beginning with Rosemary's Baby and continuing through The Exorcist and beyond, it became a common practice for publicists of motion pictures about demonic possession to connect the accidents and deaths of various participants to a "curse" overhanging the production. In the case of The House of Exorcism, the maleficiary of all the bad luck was Lisa and the Devil.

During the post-production of The House of Exorcism, Leone sent Lisa's original color negative to Technicolor, to be dismantled and integrated with the House inserts, to prepare an original negative of the new film. When the negative was not returned after a reasonable period of time, Leone approached Technicolor and learned that his company contact had died and that the negative of Lisa and the Devil had gone missing. It was never recovered.

At this point, the best surviving material on Lisa and the Devil was the CRI [color reversal internegative] which Leone had left with Allied Artists. Upon contacting them, Leone learned that Allied had played the film for one week in one theater to qualify for a tax shelter deal;[12] then they dropped their plans for a theatrical release, distributing it directly to television. As the film was being edited for television, some scenes were snipped out entirely, while others—particularly violent scenes—were cheaply censored by optically freeze-framing the image, in an irritating stop/start fashion, while the soundtrack continued to play.

Upset with this arrangement, Leone sued Allied Artists for fraud, and in a court settlement, he agreed to return his $200,000 payment in exchange for the return of Lisa's North American rights. The deal was done, but the footage removed from Allied's TV print—the bludgeoning death of Sophia, for example—was now missing from the CRI returned to Leone, a fact that went unnoticed until years after Allied Artists' dissolution. As a result, the slow zoom into Sophia's bloodied, battered, mannequin-like head that ends in a dissolve now appears in Lisa and the Devil only from the point of the dissolve, though the entire shot appears intact in The House of Exorcism. When Image Entertainment was preparing a joint DVD release of the two films in 2000, attempts were made to transplant the footage from House back into Lisa, but because the two films were scored differently, the results were considered too distracting and unsatisfactory, so Lisa was left in its incomplete state.

US one-sheet poster.

The colors of the CRI are also more muted than the bold Technicolor hues Bava intended. The difference between the currently available video editions of Lisa and the Devil and The House of Exorcism is the difference between real life color and three-strip Technicolor. In House, Savalas' skin tone has the desired "hot" look, while in Lisa, he sports a duller, more natural color that obscures an important detail that was deliberately worked into his on-set makeup. According to disc producer Don May Jr., when Alfredo Leone saw the final transfer of Elite Entertainment's LaserDisc release of Lisa (later reused for Image Entertainment's DVD release), he was furious—though the degradation of the image was due entirely to the improper storage of the original elements. Before his death in 1995, Carlos Sylva prepared a single 35 mm restoration print, in which the color was finally perfected, although Sylva Koscina's death scene remained abbreviated. This print was shown at the 1993 Mario Bava retrospectives in Los Angeles and New York City, before being shipped back to France. Its current whereabouts are unknown.

When Mario Bava died in 1980, he was under the impression that Lisa and the Devil—his most personal film, the film in which he had invested and confessed so much of himself, in essence the film in which he finally admitted to being an artist—would never be shown again. Fortunately, in 1983, Lisa and the Devil mysteriously surfaced on American television, in syndication through Allied Artists, and from that moment, its reputation began to grow.

The House of Exorcism had served its commercial purpose, becoming one of the top-grossing grindhouse and drive-in releases of the summer of 1976. But it was Lisa and the Devil that would stand the test of time.

L'Ospite dalle due

In July 1974, about a month after his break with Alfredo Leone, RAI-TV extended an invitation to Mario Bava to be interviewed on afternoon television, in advance of the first repeat broadcast of the Odissea miniseries since 1968. To deflect attention from himself as much as possible, he brought along Carlo Rambaldi and an arsenal of his mechanized special effects props to the television studio and proceeded to give his second, longest, and last television interview on the program L'Ospite dalle due ("The Guests At 2:00"), hosted by Luciano Rispoli. Joining Bava and Rambaldi on the daïs were actress Silvia Monelli and the young filmmaker and critic Gianfranco Angelucci, who for many years worked as a personal assistant to Federico Fellini.

The black-and-white videotaped program found Rambaldi demonstrating a series of robotic props, including a crocodile, a large spider, a flapping bird, and a copy of the mask of Polyphemus from Odissea. Silvia Monelli also modelled a latex mask likeness of actress Paola Pitagora, presumably made by Bava, which had been worn by a stuntman during a dangerous scene in one of her (unnamed) pictures. For his part, Bava demonstrated how I vampiri's trick lighting transformation effect was achieved (with the help of Monelli), explained some other effects secrets in brief, but mostly squirmed under the scrutiny of the television cameras in a sportcoat and turtleneck sweater.

Bava was exceedingly reluctant to expose the secrets of his craft to the general viewing public, often fending off the host's queries with unconvincing demurrals like "It would take much too long to explain." At the same time, he is known to have been exceedingly generous when it came to explaining his effects to other technicians, so it was not for proprietary reasons that he was evasive. He seriously wanted to preserve the magic of the completed work for audiences to enjoy.

AN UNCOMFORTABLE guest on afternoon television, Mario Bava squirms under the studio lights on RAI-TRE's L'OSPITE DALLE DUE.

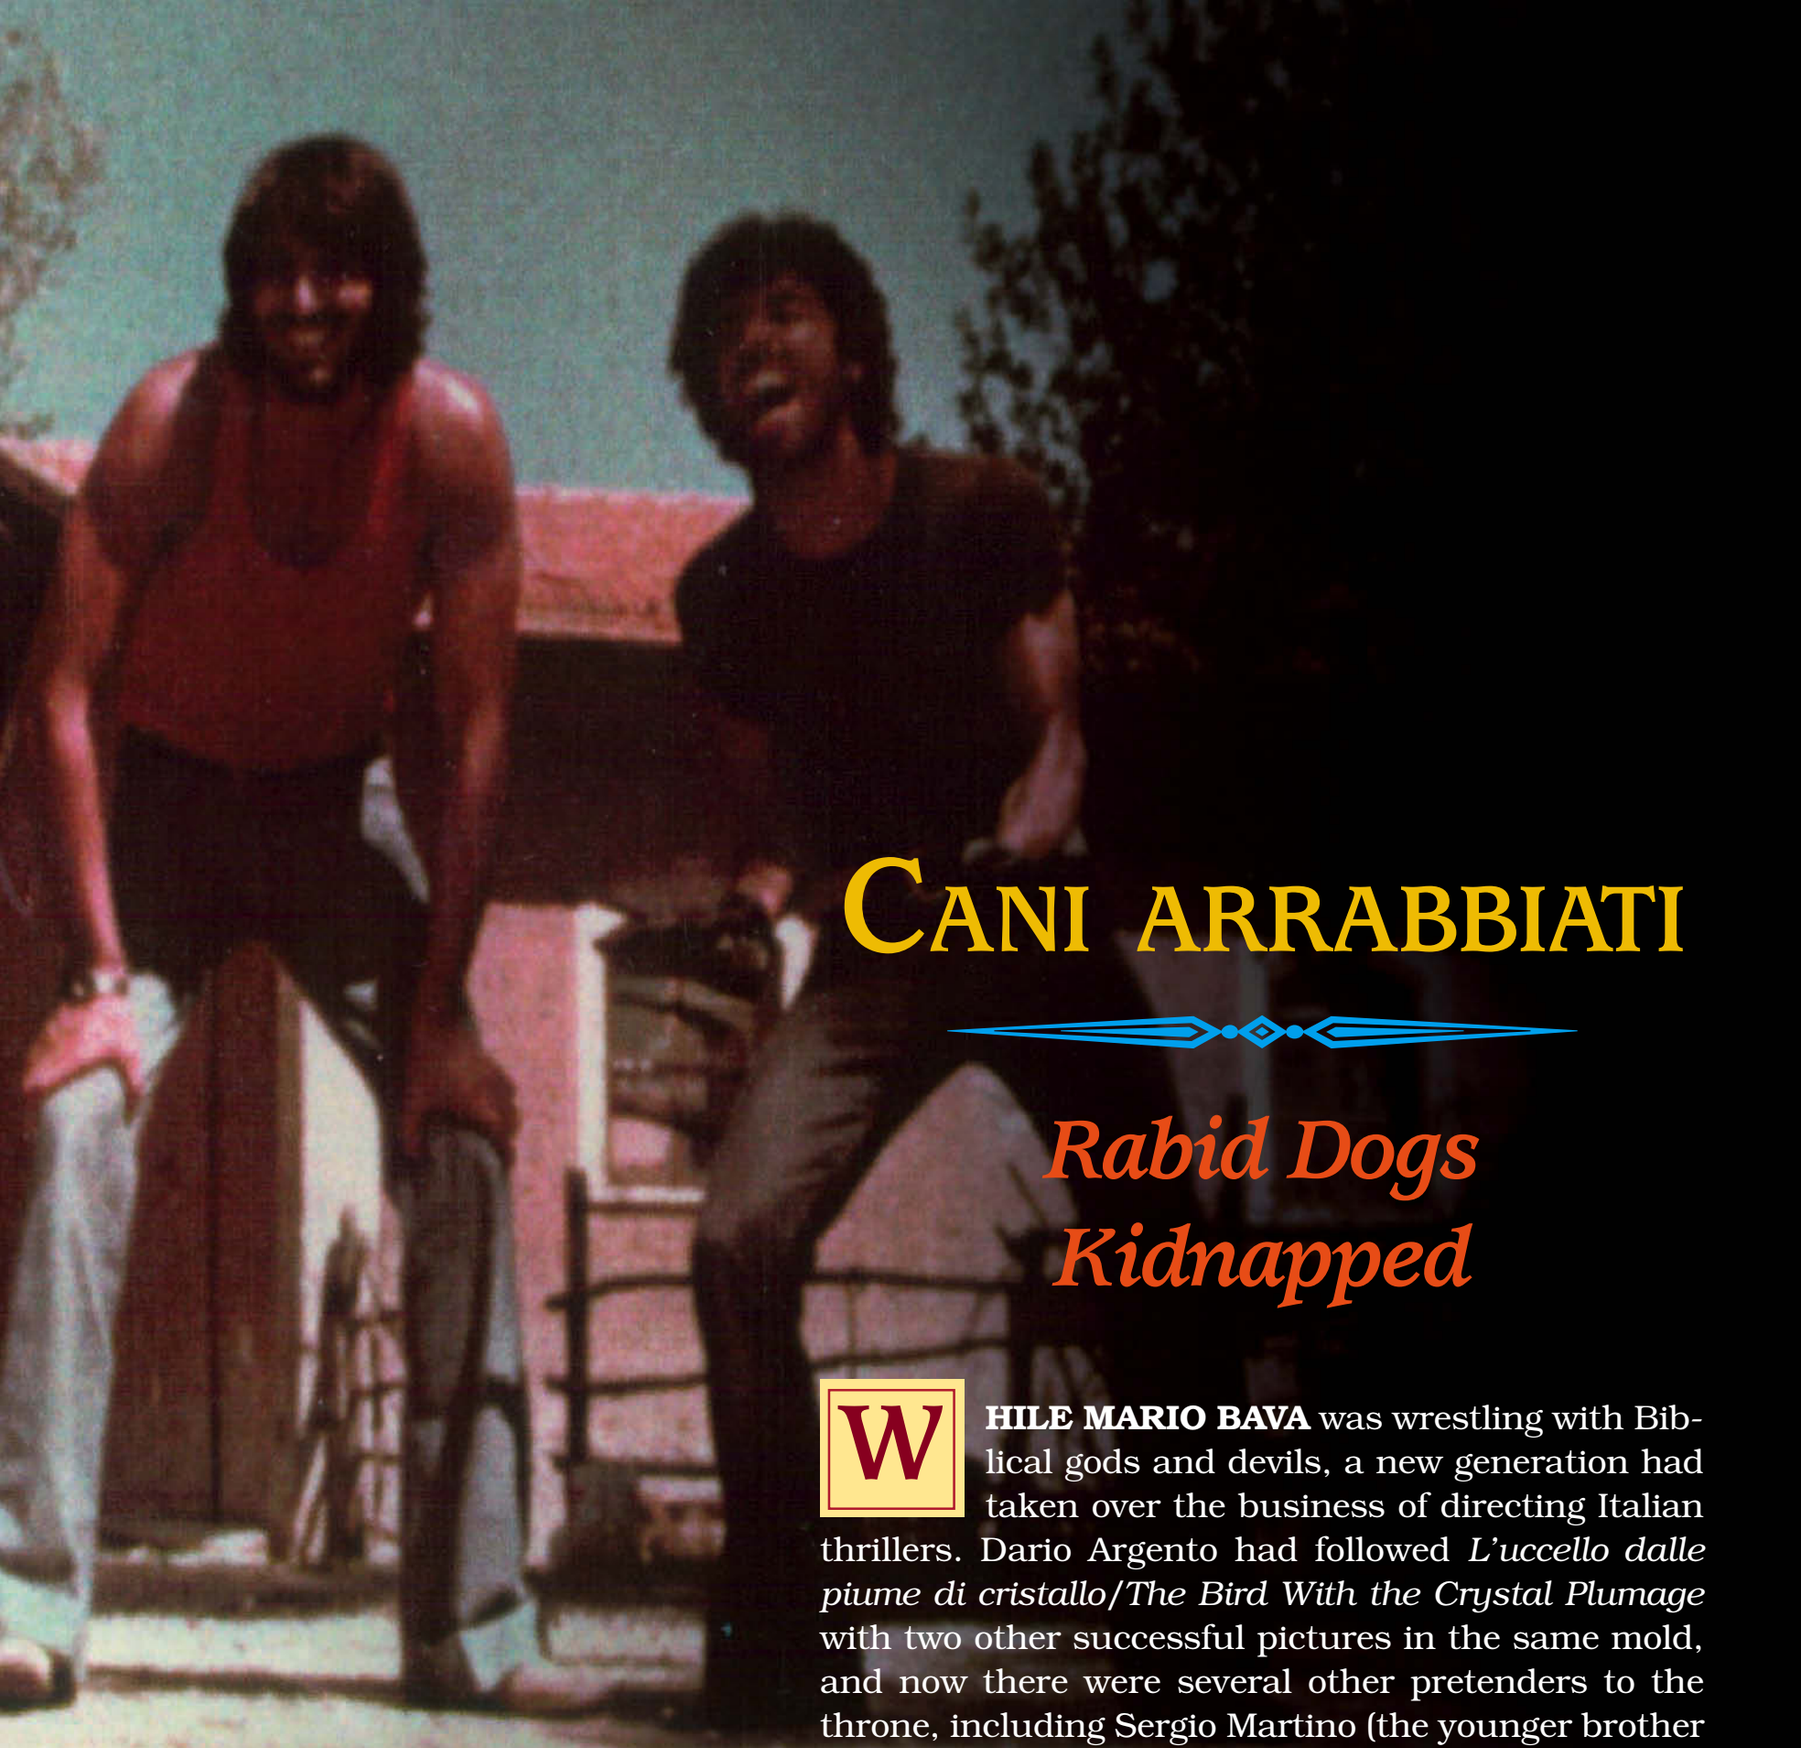
Today, the people who go to movies are much more sophisticated and tend to be familiar with at least some of the technical words and phrases pertaining to special effects, but things were different then. Bava was not being as disingenuous as he may seem when he found difficulty explaining the minutiae of his work. Rispoli's comments showed that even he, the host of a national television program, was generally mystified by the subject, and his closing remarks suggested there may have been a popular view that special effects were some kind of supernatural alchemy. At any rate, Bava came away from the experience disappointed in his own performance.

"Trick shots are very difficult to explain, and they wanted me to do this on television," he later complained. "I'm afraid I made a rather poor showing on L'Ospite dalle due. The worst of it is that they stick you in an uncomfortable armchair and you're always seeing your own nose on the screen in front of you. Explaining trick shots is a no-win situation as well, because if you notice them, it means they didn't work and, if you don't notice them, then nobody knows it's a trick! To understand them, it's necessary to watch as somebody does them. I well remember the amazement on the faces of people who stood around while we were making movies." [13]



However discouraged Bava may have been by the broadcast, the appearance made a favorable impression on the academic community. It was in the wake of L'Ospite dalle due that Bava received a letter from a new university for the performing arts in Bologna, inviting him to teach in their cinema department. Bava replied with a letter explaining that he could not accept the job, in all good conscience, since he would undoubtedly learn much more from the students than he could possibly teach them. [14]

12 This single exhibition most likely took place in Toronto, as the Ontario Censor Board lists a submission for the picture of October 28, 1976. The author has also heard rumors of a brief, unheralded run in New York City in the late 1970s.

13 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

14 Roy Bava, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

TRENTEDUE (Luigi Montefiori) and Bisturi (Aldo Caponi a.k.a. Don Backy) force Maria (Lea Lander) to urinate for their amusement in CANI ARRABBIATI.

CANI ARRABBIATI

Rabid Dogs Kidnapped

WHILE MARIO BAVA was wrestling with Biblical gods and devils, a new generation had taken over the business of directing Italian thrillers. Dario Argento had followed L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo/The Bird With the Crystal Plumage with two other successful pictures in the same mold, and now there were several other pretenders to the throne, including Sergio Martino (the younger brother of producer Luciano Martino) and Aristide Massaccesi (a.k.a. "Joe D'Amato"), both of whom had worked as second unit directors under Bava in the early 1960s.

Bava must have watched their ascent from the sidelines with mounting frustration. His own recent track record, after all, was not nearly as respectable as Argento's, or even those of his former assistants. Between 1970 and 1975, Sergio Martino had directed fifteen films; in the past ten years, Bava had directed only a half-dozen pictures, which had occupied him for approximately 18–20 months out of 120. That body of work consisted almost entirely of Italian boxoffice failures, some TV commercials, a film that failed to secure distribution anywhere in the world, and now The House of Exorcism, his most visible picture in many years and the one of which he was least proud. Bava's career difficulties were compounded by the fact that he was now in his 60s and associated with more classical forms of horror at a time when the genre was becoming more synonymous with rough-and-tumble independent efforts like Tobe Hooper's The Texas Chain Saw Massacre (1974). He had made some recent pictures that, from today's 21st century perspective, may look fresh and full of youthful vitality—Diabolik and 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, for example—but at the time, these films looked off-puttingly artificial to young audiences, who were then seeking greater realism and greater truth in cinema. As for the profoundly influential Ecologia del delitto, it was not a commercial success in Italy, and subsequently went by so many different titles that even industry insiders could not tell that the film hadn't simply vanished down the sinkhole of the earth.

Bava had enjoyed a significant alliance with Alfredo Leone, but in the midst of the upsetting compromise of The House of Exorcism, and with the uninspired Henry and Janet/Last Will and Testament staring him down from the horizon, Bava can be forgiven for assuming that their association had seen its best days and was already deteriorating into an extended apology for the one film he knew they had done right. After reading "L'uomo e il bambino"—a translation of the 1951 Ellery Queen story "Kidnapped!" in the back pages of a Mondadori giallo magazine, Bava experienced the eureka of an altogether different view of his future. The story presented him with an opportunity to make exactly the kind of thriller that contemporary audiences wanted: violent, realistic, relentless, transgressive, shocking. He saw it as an opportunity to reinvent himself and give his dwindling career a new lease on life.

Lamberto Bava witnessed his father's excitement: "My father fell in love with that story and transformed it into a scenario, a somewhat singular script in the way all of its vicissitudes were carried out in real time; that is, the film's events took place in the same amount of time that it took to run the film. It told what happened during a holdup and afterwards, in the course of the criminals' escape." [1]

The challenge posed by filming a story in "real time" is one that has engaged the imaginations of many filmmakers over the years. In a sense, the earliest documentary films ever made by Lumière and Pathé Frères were representative of "real time," but to stage a dramatic story in a manner that chronicles its events in the length of time they are meant to occur is very difficult. In 1932, the British novelist Edgar Wallace, while working in Los Angeles as a screenwriter on King Kong (1933), conceived a project he called Eighty Minutes, which he did not live to pursue. Other films that unfold in "real time" are Alfred Hitchcock's Rope (1948), High Noon (1952, for the most part), 12 Angry Men (1957), Cash on Demand (1961), Nick of Time (1995) and Running Time (1997), while other films contain sequences of authentic chronology, notably Thirty Seconds Over Tokyo (1944). At the time Cani arrabbiati was made, such examples were globally rare, and unheard-of in terms of Italian cinema.

Cesare Frugoni, one of the screenwriters who worked with Bava on the adaptation, recalls that all but the essence of the Ellery Queen story was discarded: "The original plot wasn't used. The only thing that came from the story was the idea that the perceived victim of the bad guys is actually the real culprit. The story ended with the man getting out of the car, making a call and saying: 'Dear Sir, if you want your son back alive, we have to make a deal . . .' I remember very well when I went to Parenzo's [the home of co-screenwriter Alessandro Parenzo] to work on the script, that Bava gave me notes, especially at the beginning. It was obvious that we had to invent everything before the film could be made, since it was based on a story that was three pages long. Bava always had ideas, always kept things under strict control; he was a collaborative and thinking director. You could say that this was a screenplay written by three people. It's true that this was quite a different film to the ones Bava had made before, but he was willing to be flexible."

Once he had secured the rights to the short story and confirmed Bava's attachment as director, Joe De Blasio—who already had a distribution agreement with Bryanston

Cani arrabbiati

Working title: L'uomo e il bambino, "Man and Boy"
Filmed on location near Rome
August 1974

First public screening: as Semaforo Rosso, "Red Traffic Light," Brussels, 1995 (14th Festival of Fantastic Film, Science Fiction and Thriller)
Technicolor, 1.85:1, 97 minutes.

Production: Loyola Films (Rome). Producer: Roberto Loyola. Director: Mario Bava. Assistant director: Lamberto Bava. Screenplay: Alessandro Parenzo and Cesare Frugoni (uncredited), inspired by the story "Kidnapped!" by Ellery Queen [Frederic Dannay and Manfred B. Lee] (uncredited). Dialogue coach (English): Dawne Alstrom. Continuity: Antonella Ballasio. Director of photography: Mario Bava. Camera operator: Emilio Varriano. Camera assistant: Gianni Modica. Special effects: Sergio Chiusi. Wardrobe: Wayne Finkelman. Wardrobe assistant: Maura Zuccherofino. Makeup: Angelo Roncaioli. Production director: Lucio Orlandini. Production secretaries: Naldo Nibbi, Cesare Coromaldi. Production administrator: Carlo Farris. Key grip: Franco Tocci. Machinists: Cosimo Barbera, Vittorio Monterosso, Quinto Proietti. Electricians: Toto Rinaldi, Massimo Rinaldi, Flaminio Tabbarini. Editor: Carlo Reali. Music: Stelvio Cipriani. Sound: Roberto Albrigdini. Stills: Giuliana De Rossi. Unreleased.

Riccardo Cucciolla (Riccardo), Aldo Caponi [Bisturi/Blade—Rabid Dogs/Stiletto—Kidnapped], Luigi Montefiori (Trentadue/"32" Altoviti), Maurice Poli (Dottore/Doc), Lea Lander (Maria), Marisa Fabbri (Maria Sbravati, the hitchhiker), Erika Dario (Marisa), Luigi Antonio Guerra (employee), Francesco Ferrini [Gustavo De Nardo] (gas station attendant), Emilio Benucci (taxi driver), Pino Manzari (tollbooth collector), Ettore Manni (bank director), Mario Bava (man in parking lot, uncredited).

Italian dubbing cast: Riccardo Cucciolla (Riccardo), Renato Cecchetto (Dottore), Gabriele Durina (Trentadue), Riccardo Rovatti (Bisturi), Miriam Spera (Maria).

Additional 1997 DVD credits: Producer/director (main titles only): Peter Blumenstock. Associate producer: Dieter Bosch. Director of photography (main titles only): Juergen Haller. Editing/digital post-production: Peter Blumenstock, Michael Frense. Subtitles: Tim Lucas (English), Peter Blumenstock (German), Sukri Mehemet (translation). Digital audio remastering: Fir Suidema. Nina Gueltzow ("Mother of Tears").

Additional credits for Kidnapped: 95m. Completed with the collaboration of Lamberto Bava, Mauro Bonanni, Roy Bava, and Walter Diotallevi. Production: International Media Corporation, Kismet Entertainment Group. Producer: Alfredo Leone. Directors: Mario Bava, Lamberto Bava. Executive producers: David Allen, Harmon Kaslow.Story and screenplay: Alessandro Parenzo. Second assistant director: Mario Carriba. Continuity: Vanda Tucci, Antonella Ballasio. Camera assistant: Giuseppe Alberti. Wardrobe: Maura Zuccherofino. Costumes: Ferroni. Hairdresser: Marisa Marconi. Administrator: Carlo Fabbris. Production inspector: Ugo Valenti. Production secretaries: Nando Nibbi, Cesare Coromandi. Key grip: Vittorio Biseo. Music (2001): Stelvio Cipriani. "Hold On to Me," words by Myriann D'Antime, music by Stelvio Cipriani, sung by Simona Petitucci. Sound: Mario Bramonti. Sound effects: Sound Track. Sound mixing: Franco Coratella (Dolby Stereo 2.1). Boom: Giuseppe Muratori. Post-synch: Fono Roma Film Recording. English subtitles: Titra. Development and printing: Crest National. Transportation: Romana Trasporti. Permissions: Franco Ponzo. Additional cast: Fabrizia Sacchi (Signora Gionotto).

First public screening: May 29, 2002 (American Cinematheque "Haunted World of Mario Bava" retrospective), Director's Guild of America Theater, Los Angeles CA.

Films in America—entered into a partnership with producer Roberto Loyola, with whom Bava had been in preproduction talks about Al 33 di via Orologio fa sempre freddo, the adaptation of Hillary Waugh's The Shadow Guest. Around this time, Variety jumped the gun by reporting: "Roberto Loyola emerging again after a year or more of financial straits, during which he produced [a number of films, including] Mario Bava's chiller Wild Dogs, all under the banner of Roberto Loyola Productions. Meanwhile, producer talks of fresh financing and production schedule to start with another thriller by Mario Bava, It's Always Cold at Number 33, Street of Clocks, for Leopard Films." [2]

Loyola's previous films included Siro Marcellini's La legge dei gangsters/Gangster's Law (1969, starring Klaus Kinski, Maurice Poli, and Susy Andersen), Sergio Corbucci's J&S—storia criminale del far west/Sonny & Jed (1972, starring Tomas Milian and Susan George), and Joe D'Amato's erotic Canterbury no. 2 nuove storie d'amore del '300 (1973, with Bava alumni Rik Battaglia and Federico Boido). Lamberto Bava remembers Loyola as "a strange but very likeable guy who didn't have much money, but against all odds, somehow managed to use what little money he had to keep everything moving forward."

Additional funding was provided by an unidentified elderly gentleman who had made his fortune as the owner of a chain of cinemas in Turin. His support came with one string attached: his girlfriend, German actress Lea Lander, whom he wished to play the lead female role. This was acceptable to Bava, who had worked with Lander once before, when she—under the name Lea Krugher—had portrayed Greta, the fifth victim of 1964's Sei donne per l'assassino. Bava's screen story was developed into a finished screenplay by Alessandro "Sandro" Parenzo (a former art director who had written a couple of Laura Antonelli vehicles, Peccato veniale and Malizia) and newcomer Cesare Frugoni, who later wrote La montagna del dio cannibale/Slave of the Cannibal God (1978) and L'isola degli uomini pesce/Screamers (1979) for Sergio Martino.

MARIO BAVA, conspicuously grayer since filming LISA AND THE DEVIL, poses with Luigi Montefiori and Aldo Caponi.

Synopsis

As $70,000 in cash is being transferred to the Boldrini Pharmaceutical Bank to pay the weekly wages of its staff, a group of thieves known as the Ajaccio Street Gang—Dottore (the leader), Bisturi, Trentadue (32) and Fagio—attack the security guards and abscond with the payroll. After shooting four men, they flee the scene in a waiting getaway car. Bullets fired from behind puncture the gas tank and kill Fagio, the driver. Dottore takes the wheel, but the car quickly runs out of fuel. The gang look for another vehicle in a nearby parking garage, where they are cornered by police. Bisturi and Trentadue seize two women as hostages, one of whom is accidentally knifed in the throat by the overzealous Bisturi. Taking the other woman (Maria) with them, the gang shoots their way to freedom and commandeer a car waiting at a red traffic light. The driver, a meek-looking man named Riccardo, explains that he is driving his son Agostino—sweating in heavy blankets—to the hospital for emergency surgery. No matter: Held at gunpoint, Riccardo has no alternative but to drive where he is told.

Dottore orders him to get onto the autostrada, where it will be easier to lose any other cars that may be in pursuit. The ride is gruelling: it is the height of summer, but Dottore insists that Riccardo keep all the car windows rolled up. The rising temperature inside the car, combined with the gang's shock over the loss of Fagio and their exhilaration at their new wealth, brings out the worst in Trentadue and Bisturi. The unconscious child is placed in the back seat with these two, who taunt Riccardo and Maria by threatening to castrate the child and present his testicles to Maria (whom they call "Greta Garbo") as earrings. At one point, Bisturi pretends to stab the child, a shock that helps Riccardo to find the courage to announce that, if the boy dies, he will deliberately crash the car and kill them all. In the midst of all these threats, Maria cringes, eventually announcing that she needs to stop. She relates her need delicately, but Trentadue forces the issue into blunt expression: "Do you need to take a piss or a shit?"

Let out on the edge of a cornfield, Maria spies a house in the distance and, as the others are momentarily distracted by a passing truck, bolts into the field. Bisturi and Trentadue race after her, but she eludes them in an empty, shadowy barn. When she

1 All Lamberto Bava quotes in this chapter are from "Mario Bava, Mio Padre" an article appearing in Luigi Cozzi, Il Cinema Gotico e Fantastico Italiano Vol 1—Mario Bava, I Mille Volti Della Paura (Rome, Italy: Mondo Ignoto/Profondo Rosso, 2001), 149–56.

2 Variety, May 8, 1974. In fact, Cani arrabbiati did not begin filming until August 1974.

senses the time is right, she runs to the rear of the farmhouse and bangs on the door, pleading for sanctuary, but no one answers—except Bisturi and Trentadue, who laugh cruelly at her predicament. Together, they force her to remove her panties and urinate in front of them. Cowed and humiliated, she returns to the car with her captors.

Now seated between the two maniacs in the back seat, with the child in front between Riccardo and Dottore, Maria is mauled by Trentadue, who explains his nickname by exposing himself to her. A radio bulletin identifies the Ajaccio Street Gang as the perpetrators of the morning heist. After passing successfully through a roadblock, Riccardo notices the boy stirring and says that he must have water to administer another pill to him. They pause at the next rest stop, where Riccardo is unexpectedly confronted by a co-worker, Marisa Altoveti, who notes that he was supposed to be somewhere else this afternoon and coyly accuses him of having an affair. Riccardo insists that this is not the case, and introduces her to Trentadue ("He is not a woman, as you can plainly see . . ."), who is very impressed by Marisa's bosom and nearly invites her to join them.

Back in the car, still aroused by the memory of Marisa's breasts and fuelled by a bottle of J&B scotch, Trentadue proceeds to maul and rape Maria. This attracts the attention of other vehicles on the road, who honk and berate Riccardo for running "a motel on wheels." Dottore orders Trentadue to stop, and when he refuses with violent anger, the leader senses that he must exert authority or lose control of his men. He takes advantage of a road tunnel to shoot Trentadue. He is left not quite dead, but catatonic ("Nothing will kill him—he'll never die!"), and Bisturi is left emotionally shattered by the violence directed against his friend.

The car is now low on gas, forcing a stop at a service station. The attendant is having his siesta and refuses to open, until Maria is recruited to plead the child's urgent need of hospital care. As the tank is being filled, a woman—also named Maria—appears, begging for a lift. Even though the car is already crowded, she can't be discouraged. She also proves to be a most annoying, talkative passenger, and while trying to get everyone to sing along with a radio broadcast of "It's a Long Way to Tipperary," she discovers that the sleeping passenger is actually a gunshot victim and Bisturi silences her by stabbing her in the neck.

BISTURI accidentally murders a hostage in the car park, to the horror of Dottore (Maurice Poli) and Maria.

DOTTORE and Bisturi hijack Riccardo's car while it is paused at a red traffic light.

With two (or one-and-a-half) corpses aboard, Dottore soon declares it is time to dispose of them. At a secluded spot, Trentadue and the hitchhiker are carried downhill into a quiet valley with tall grass, where Bisturi puts a bullet through the forehead of his incredulously staring best friend. As they drive away, Bisturi feels sick and orders Riccardo to pull over at a vineyard just ahead. After vomiting, he rinses his mouth with some white grapes and finds himself face-to-face with the owner of the field, who calls him a thief. Bisturi apologizes and shoves a wad of stolen cash into the astonished farmer's hand.

From there, it is just a short distance to the secluded place where Dottore has left another car of a different make in waiting. Riccardo realizes that Dottore plans to kill them all when he is ordered to take the child out of the car. Riccardo hesitantly obeys, but to everyone's surprise, he shoots Dottore with a gun secreted under the boy's blanket. Bisturi is also shot, but not before he manages to shoot Maria with a bullet intended to stop Riccardo. This leaves only Riccardo and the boy, who drive off with the stolen payroll.

Riccardo stops to place a call from a telephone booth at a Chevron station. He speaks to a Mrs. Girotto—"finally"—and demands 3 billion lire for the safe return of her child. He promises to phone with further instructions later, and walks back to the car—where the body of the boy, probably dead, has been secreted in the trunk.

Cast

Cast in the important role of the driver was Riccardo Cucciolla, who despite roles in nearly sixty films over a forty-year period was principally regarded as one of Italy's finest stage actors and dubbers of foreign film actors. Born in Bari, Puglia, on September 5, 1924, Cucciolla made his screen debut in Anton Giulio Majano's La domenica della buona gente (1953), starring Maria Fiore and Sophia Loren. One or two roles later, he began to focus on the theater and his filmography stops until 1965, when his name resurfaces high on the list of credits for Nello Santi's war drama Italiana brava gente/Attack and Retreat, directed by Giuseppe De Santis and scripted by Ennio De Concini, among others. He narrated Elio Piccon's 1965 documentary L'antimiracolo, inaugurating his long and successful side career as a voice actor. Cucciolla's career in crime pictures began with Giuliano Montaldo's successful heist drama Ad ogni costo/Grand Slam (1968), which featured him in the distinguished company of Edward G. Robinson, Janet Leigh, Klaus Kinski, and Adolfo Celi. This was followed by Alberto De Martino's Roma contre Chicago/Bandits in Rome (1968), Lucio Fulci's erotic giallo thriller Una sull'altra/One On Top of the Other (1969), and the biggest roles of his career—as Nicola Sacco, in Giuliano Montaldo's Sacco e Vanzetti/Sacco & Vanzetti (1971),[3] for which he won the Best Actor prize at the Cannes Film Festival, and as Paul Weber in Jean-Pierre Melville's Un flic (1972). After Cani arrabbiati, his career consisted mostly of supporting roles (including several in made-for-television productions, including 1980's Sophia Loren: Her Own Story and the 1982 miniseries Marco Polo), more voice work, and many stage successes. His last feature film was Krzysztof Zanussi's Our God's Brother (1997), which roughly coincided with his long-postponed dubbing of his role in Cani arrabbiati.

Identified onscreen by his real name of Aldo Caponi, the actor who played Bisturi is most famous in Italy as Don Backy, the name he has used professionally as a singer and songwriter since 1959. Born August 21, 1939, in Santa Croce sul Arno, Pisa, Backy discovered his calling in 1956, when he saw James Dean in Rebel Without a Cause, and Marlon Brando in The Wild One, and first heard the music of Bill Haley and The Comets in Richard Brooks' Blackboard Jungle. An impressionable young man, he was also influenced to become a body-builder after seeing Le fatiche di Ercole in 1958. "When I saw Le fatiche di Ercole, I was interested only in the body-builder Steve Reeves; I never asked myself who the cameraman might be, so I never knew," Backy confides. "I would have liked to speak to Bava about it, had I known, but now that opportunity has passed."

Backy's celebrated recording career began in 1960 with the 45 rpm

3 Perhaps as a nod to Cucciolla's famous role, Cani arrabbiati has the radio news announcer mention that the name of the pharmaceutical company's treasurer, killed during the robbery, was Armando Vanzetti.

single "Volo lontano." By 1962, he took the then-unusual step of composing his own music with "La Storia di Frankie Ballan," making him analogous to the precocious young Italian-American singer/songwriter, Paul Anka. Backy was then "discovered" by fellow singer Adriano Celentano (La ragazza che sapeva troppo's "Furore"), who signed him to his "Clan" label, where Backy recut "La Storia di Frankie Ballan" to greater success. That same year, he appeared (as himself) in his first movie: Stefano Canzio's pop musical Canzoni canzoni. Other films followed, for directors Lucio Fulci (Uno strano tipo, 1963) and Sergio Corbucci (Il monaco di monza, also '63), and Backy recorded L'amore, his first full-length album, in 1965. He struck gold in 1967 with the triple release of L'immensità as a feature film (starring himself), album and hit single. As musical trends changed in the late '60s and early '70s, Backy began to act more and record less, earning his principal living as a night-club performer. Prior to the making of Cani arrabbiati, he was appearing primarily in historical erotic pictures like G. P. Callegari's Le calde notti del Decamerone ("The Hot Nights of the Decameron") and Alfonso Breschia's Poppea, una prostituta al servizio dell'impero ("Poppea, a Prostitute in the Service of the Emperor," both 1972). He gives a remarkable performance in Cani arrabbiati, full of bravado and unpleasantness, yet also projecting a curiously broken and sensitive personality in Bisturi's devotion to Trentadue. The cover of his 1970s RCA album Io più te pictures him in character as Bisturi, making this nine-song collection something of a Bava collectible. After working with Bava, Backy made only a few more pictures before retiring from his acting career, which he later resumed in 1993 with the TV movie Il viaggio . . . secondo Matteo. Having released his last 45 rpm single in 1983, he also resumed his recording career as Don Backy around this time, in 1994 releasing an album that included "Buon Natale" ("Merry Christmas"), an improbable duet with the famous Italian mouse puppet Topo Gigio. Since 1996, he has been working as a successful writer of fumetti and nonfiction, publishing a trilogy of books about the Italian pop music of the early 1960s, concluding with his own memoirs of the Clan years.

Asked why he appeared in Cani arrabbiati under his real name, Backy replies, "It really wasn't my decision. The film wasn't given a theatrical release at the time we made it, and I don't even know in what form it is released now, or why they used my real name. I had no voice in the matter." Backy insists that he didn't act under his real name as a method of protecting fans of his music career from seeing him in a different, potentially disturbing light. "My singer–composer and acting careers have always been separate, so, when I played Bisturi, I went about creating the character without any thought of the possibile reactions of my fans as a singer. I wanted to depict a schizophrenic person . . . I think I succeeded."

Actor–writer–producer–director Luigi Montefiori played the role of Trentadue under the most common of his many screen names, "George Eastman."[4] Born in Genoa on August 16, 1942, he made his film debut in Maurizio Lucidi's Western Due once di piombo/My Name Is Pecos (1966), and his massive build and lusty features quickly stereotyped him in the roles of Western villains and spy movie henchmen. His big break came with Fellini Satyricon (1969), which cast him as the Minotaur, a role for which he accepted credit in his own real name. Typically, Montefiori was credited as Eastman, unless it was a film of which he was particularly proud, as in the case of Cani arrabbiati or Pupi Avati's Bordella (1976). Among his most popular credits are Corràdo Farina's Baba Yaga/Kiss Me Kill Me (1973, likely the film that brought him to Bava's attention), Lamberto Bava's Blastfighter (1984) and Le foto di Gioia/Delirium (1987), Bruce Beresford's King David (1985, in which he plays Goliath to Richard Gere's David), and a great many pictures for "Joe D'Amato" [a.k.a. Aristide Massaccesi], including Emanuelle e Françoise le sorelline/Emanuelle's Revenge (1976), Emanuelle—perché violenza alle donne?/Emanuelle Around the World (1977), Porno holocaust (1979), Antropophagus/The Grim Reaper (1980, which he co-produced, and in which he infamously rips a fetus from a pregnant woman's womb and eats it), and Antropophagus 2/Absurd/The Monster Hunter (1982). In 1976, he contributed to the screenplay of Enzo G. Castellari's classic Italian Western Keoma, and he directed his first film, Anno 2020—I gladiatori del futuro/2020 Texas Gladiators, in 1982. He has also written many other screenplays, most notably for Michele Soavi's outstanding directorial debut, Aquarius/Stagefright. Today, Montefiori continues to work principally as a writer for Italian television drama series.

In addition to Lea Lander and Maurice Poli, whose biographies are detailed elsewhere in this book, prints of Cani arrabbiati curiously list a number of actors who do not appear in the film at all. A role credited to Francesco Ferrini is conspicuously played by an uncredited Gustavo De Nardo, who appeared in more Bava films than any other actor (at the time, most recently as the doctor in Baron Blood). Erika Dario, whom Lea Lander remembers as an American actress, is credited with playing the hitch-hiker Maria, though the role is actually played by familiar Italian character actress Marisa Fabbri.

A CLAPBOARD shot from the filming of the movie's penultimate scene. Left to right: Maurice Poli, Riccardo Cucciolla, Lea Lander.

Most conspicuously, the skewed credits of Cani arrabbiati omit all reference to the Ellery Queen short story that inspired it. Possibly, as Cesare Frugoni suggests, the storyline was so fundamentally altered in its adaptation that the script became an original work and acknowledgment was no longer deemed necessary.

Production

The production of Cani arrabbiati was threadbare, but rich in enthusiasm. The entire picture was shot on location over a three-week period, with most of the action taking place inside a moving car. The film's only set was the getaway car, but in order to accommodate different camera set-ups, prop reductions of the same car model were also used—one split down the middle, another with the front end cut off, and yet another with the back end removed. All of the driving scenes were photographed with the car and camera positioned on the rear platform of a flatbed truck that drove up and down the highway between Rome and Florence all day. To make the car appear to move took nothing more than Bava's usual ingenuity.

"As you know," explains Andrea Piazzesi, a friend of the Bava family, "if you are going to film in the streets, you need permission from the police to stop traffic and barricade people out of your way, and it can be quite expensive to hire policemen to cover the streets for you. What Mario did was to take a big truck and remove the rear section, so that it was completely open in the back. In this truck, he put the car, the camera and his entire crew, which consisted of maybe six people, and it was constantly moving. Because there was no shooting from the street, he needed no official permission [to make the film this way] because he was shooting in his own exclusive territory, so to speak!"

THE SCENE as it appears in the film.

Bad luck set in right away when Italian-American actor Al Lettieri (b. 1928, New York City) was initially cast as the driver. The burly, mustached Lettieri was a name star of the moment—his role as Virgil "The Turk" Sollozzo in The Godfather (1972) had led to nasty criminal roles in Sam Peckinpah's The Getaway (1972), Richard Fleischer's The Don Is Dead (1973), and John Sturges' vehicles for John Wayne and Charles Bronson, McQ and Mr. Majestyk (both 1974)—but he turned out to be more trouble than he was worth.

"Al Lettieri would have added an international flavor to the film; however, he was always drunk when he turned up on set," explains Maurice Poli. "He literally stank—mainly of whiskey. I remember seeing Mario give him direction and when he would turn to Mario, Mario would actually recoil; his face would screw up and he would recoil from the stench of alcohol coming from Lettieri's mouth. After a very short while, it became impossible for the rest of us to work with him and he was fired. He didn't look the part, really—spectacles and a little black mustache. It was unusual to see Lettieri in such a role; he was usually a gangster, and this role was so completely different. He was there for just one week." Within three months—on October 18, 1975—Al Lettieri was dead of a heart attack at age 47.

Lettieri was then replaced by Riccardo Cucciolla. With him (literally) at the wheel, the production ran much more smoothly. "Cucciolla was called in at the last minute," Poli remembers. "He was a very dear person and extremely professional, did everything to the letter."

One thing about which all the cast members agree is that, while Bava was as genial a director as he could be, the working conditions were every bit as uncomfortable as they appear onscreen. "It was a stifling film to shoot," Poli grimaces. "All of us confined in a car, closed in. It was summer, too—very hot, boiling. I think we shot both in English and in Italian, two different versions. There was a problem in that Cucciolla couldn't speak nor could he understand English. So we would be driving along and he would be reading his lines, in English, from the script, which was stuck to the windshield or the rear-view mirror of the car, in front of him. Even with the script, sometimes he was only able to say his lines in Italian."

"The film was shot in August, on the autostrada outside Rome," agrees Lea Lander. "As with Sei donne per l'assassino, Mario Bava was wonderful to work with and very understanding. He wanted to create a hot, stifling atmosphere—a tiring atmosphere, exasperating, with extreme situations. He wanted to create this, otherwise we could have stayed in air conditioned cars."

4 The others include John Cart, Alex Carver, Lew Cooper, Richard Franks, George Histman, Larry London, Tom Salina, and various misspellings of his own true name.

Don Backy concurs: "The shooting was difficult, because the whole film takes place inside a car. And because it was summer, we all suffered from heat and discomfort. I also suffered because of my scruffy beard, which was particularly aggravating in the heat. But Mario Bava was a very nice guy, a real non-conformist, funny person, aware of the fact that movies should be fun, especially for the director—at least on that occasion. He was very friendly and very receptive to the actors' suggestions and ideas. When he was in a particularly good mood, he loved to sing a particularly filthy song, written to the tune of 'The Ride of the Valkyries,' and we all sang in chorus with him like a bunch of merry companions!"

Maurice Poli offers his impressions of his co-stars: "Gigi Montefiore was a very simpatico guy, as was Al—the singer, Don Backy. They were always sitting in the back of the car. They were both good fun, always fooling around. They would be cutting into the backs of the seats of the car, everyday, snipping a little away—for a laugh, of course. Lea Lander? Well, she wasn't an actress; she was a *re*actress. She just used to scream a lot and react to situations. But she and I had a mutual simpatia throughout the film.

"Mario was fantastic to work with," Poli continues, "even though the whole thing was doomed from the start. Mario was not really a director of action, but he took everything in his stride. He did a good job. He didn't worry about working with extremely professional actors, just people who were capable. He was a great technician, too. Some actors would have seen him as eclectic, eccentric. He believed in letting you get on with it. He was very tranquil, pacific . . . He wasn't always ready to bite your dick off, you know?"

Not long after Al Lettieri was fired, Bryanston Films withdrew their financial interests in the film, so what started out as an international co-production suddenly became a purely Italian production. As with Bava's previous troubled movies, the cast were generally kept in the dark about the precariousness of the shoot, with Bava distracting them with his jokes and ribald songs and upbeat attitude. More seasoned cast members like Luigi Montefiori had an inkling of what was really going on and protected their interests accordingly.

TRENTEDUE taunts "Greta Garbo."

"Only when the film was about to wrap were we finally made aware of the producer's financial problems," says Don Backy. "Luigi Montefiori insisted on being paid at the beginning of every week, before shooting. I worked anyway, even without getting paid. I just wanted the film to get finished and never made a fuss that might hold up the shooting."

Backy's acquiescence was not enough to safeguard the film against interruptions, as Lamberto Bava recounts: "I remember that we worked under very painful conditions; if you have only three weeks, working is already difficult; it's a very short time, considering that the time it normally takes to shoot a film is somewhere between 6–9 weeks. Our producer, Loyola, had so many money problems that, after the first week of the shoot, the crew stopped cold because their checks had not been dated. Everybody stopped cold for a couple of days, and then Loyola came and settled his accounts for the previous week, whereupon the technicians resumed working. But after a few more days, they stopped again because their dated checks started bouncing! It was torture to make that film!"

Not knowing what else to do, Bava arranged for a third party (possibly editor Carlo Reali, who went directly from The House of Exorcism to Cani arrabbiati) to apprise Alfredo Leone of the situation. "I got word that they had run out of money and was indirectly approached to see if I would be interested in stepping in," Leone reveals. "Of course, after all that had happened, I wasn't. I would have done anything to help out Mario personally, even though I was upset with him, but the quality control on that film was not the quality control I exercised within my own organization. They allowed the actors to speak their dialogue in Italian, which I did not. When I was talking to Bava about doing the picture, I was thinking about Ernie Borgnine, or maybe Marty Balsam, who was living in Italy at that time, for the driver. [5] They got Al Lettieri, who was drunk all the time—so they had to fire him, scrap everything they had done, and start over with Riccardo Cucciolla. He's wonderful in the picture, but I wouldn't have used him; he was not a name actor. And the girl, Lea Lander, had been forced on the picture. She wanted to be in the picture very badly, and she had a boyfriend—a very elderly, very wealthy man, maybe forty years older than her—and she got him to invest in the picture so she could play the role. I would have gone for someone like—well, like Elke Sommer, why not? I looked at the footage they had and, in my opinion, it was just not salvageable."

Leone's views on the film would later make a rather dramatic U-turn, but at the time, his decision may have been motivated by a need to slap a couple of wrists. ("Their picture was in trouble?" he chuckles. "I was thrilled.") Whether sincere or biased, his reasons for not getting involved were professionally valid, and Bava accepted them.

The film continued to struggle along without Leone's assistance, until it hit the kind of speed bump that could not be ignored. Erroneous newspaper reports of the time led to rumors that the unfinished film was impounded following the death of producer Roberto Loyola in a traffic accident. This is actually a complex falsehood composed of various truths. In fact, when the picture was shut down, the principal shooting was only two or three days shy of completion.

"Loyola went bankrupt," Lamberto Bava recalls. "He wasn't bankrupted by my father's film, you understand, but because other films which he had produced had not done well and failed to return his investments, so he ran out of money. Cani arrabbiati was seized, its materials were seized, while the usual, interminable legal procedures that happen in such circumstances began to be activated." Among the materials impounded was a rough cut of the film that Carlo Reali had been assembling throughout the production, which had been deliberately shot in chronological sequence.

"Everything came to a stop while the film was being edited," Don Backy confirms. "The creditors required the balance, so they stopped the film. Because of that, I was never paid what I was owed, but I was especially sorry because the film wasn't theatrically released and, for me, it would have been a good opportunity. What a shame . . ."

It is also true that the production was disrupted by a death, but it was not Roberto Loyola who died. "It's ridiculous when people write that he is dead," laughs Lea Lander. "He still lives near Rome and works as an artist. Also, he was not my husband," she adds, referring to another oft-reported misconception.

Alfredo Leone reveals what actually occurred: "Joe De Blasio died—on the toilet. One day, I got a call from a friend in the American colony in Rome, who said he was taking up a collection to bury Joe De Blasio. I said, 'What are you talking about?' De Blasio died of a heart attack while he was in the bathroom. His checks were bouncing, everybody was ganging up on him, and one day, I guess his heart just gave out."

In the wake of De Blasio's sudden death, the production's unpaid bills kept piling up until his partner Loyola was forced to declare bankruptcy. His private holdings were impounded until his outstanding debts were paid. Among these properties were the original camera negatives of Cani arrabbiati, Reali's rough cut positive print, and a reel of Stelvio Cipriani's demonstration recordings for his proposed score. When the axe fell, principal photography had essentially finished, with only the equivalent of second unit material still unfilmed. What remained to be shot included a short main titles sequence, as well as various cutaway shots of helicopters and passing police cars to support the notion that the kidnappers were being pursued. Everyone involved in the production was terribly disappointed.

"It was a fantastic opportunity for me to work as a lead," sighs Maurice Poli. "I had a stupendous part in this film. If it had been released then, and been a success, I might have had a bigger, more exciting career. Oh, well . . ."

"It was a movie I counted on a lot," agrees Don Backy, "but it didn't happen. I think my performance was good. I wanted to create a lowlife character—I wanted him to be disgusting so that he couldn't be followed as an example—but I also wanted to give him some humanity, to mean that maybe, even in the most despicable person, there's a heart that can be rehabilitated. At least that's what I hope."

Resurrection 1976–97

Understandably, Mario Bava was devastated by this latest in a long line of creative defeats. "My father was very depressed," Lamberto Bava relates, "because he had not successfully completed this film and it meant a great deal to him. In the years that followed, he tried more than once to regain possession of the picture. He also sent me to speak with the bankruptcy curator, to see if there was some way of acquiring the film from the court, if only to finish it—but I'm afraid I wasn't very helpful in negotiating an agreement. In the end, it so happened that Lea Lander, the German actress who had a role in the film, succeeded in obtaining it from the court. I can't help but wonder how she managed to do this, considering how hard I had tried without getting anywhere. In any case, she succeeded and became the new owner of Cani arrabbiati."

Lamberto's remarks gloss over the serious march of time. By the time Lander assumed possession and ownership of the impounded elements, twenty years had passed since the last day of shooting; Mario Bava had been dead for fifteen years and Lamberto himself had launched a successful directorial career of his own. Lander, who saw Cani arrabbiati as the major acting assignment of her career and the perfect advertisement for her talents, formed a production company called Spera Cinematografica to raise money for its completion. In the meantime, the elements remained in storage at Technicolor laboratories in Rome, inaccessible until the accumulated storage fees were paid.

Circa 1996, Lea Lander made the acquaintance of a young German film journalist and entrepreneur, Peter Blumenstock (b. 1973). In his early 20s, Blumenstock had founded his own record company, Lucertola Media, which began releasing classic Euro cult movie scores on limited edition compact disc in 1994, and this success led to his hiring by Crippled Dick Hot Wax, for which label Blumenstock conceived the immensely popular "Euro lounge" soundtrack CD Vampyros Lesbos Sexadelic Dance Party and the Beat at Cinecittà series. Blumenstock was introduced to Lander by Italian director Umberto Lenzi, because during an interview, he had expressed to Lenzi his interest in further expanding his business horizons.

"Lea had the rights to a number of different films, not just Cani arrabbiati," Blumenstock explains. "She called me to see if I would be interested in producing a film based on a script that she had, which Lenzi would direct. I went down to talk with her, and we discussed Lenzi, and then she mentioned Mario Bava, whose work I had always loved. She told me that she had appeared in two of his films, Blood and Black Lace and Cani arrabbiati, which surprised me, because I had not seen either of them at that point. I had heard of Blood and Black Lace, of course, but it was impossible to see at that time, especially in Europe. I became especially intrigued by Cani arrabbiati when she explained that it was a Bava film that had never been released. So we quickly forgot about the Lenzi project and focused our full attention on Cani arrabbiati."

The first important task was to raise the money necessary to liberate the film elements from the vaults at Technicolor and to finance the film's post-production. With the help of this author, letters requesting assistance were sent to the offices of various filmmakers who were known to appreciate Bava's work, all of which went unanswered. At the same time, Peter Blumenstock approached various Italian filmmakers in the hope of obtaining their assistance, also without success. "It was always the same story," Blumenstock shrugs. "It was very hard to get anyone involved, and if someone did respond, once they linked up with Lea, nothing happened."

Lamberto Bava counters that he did try to involve himself, upon learning that Lander had successfully obtained the film elements from the courts: "I met with her in the hope of reaching some agreement. Many years had passed and my father had died in the meantime, so I wanted very much that this film—the last film he directed entirely on his own—should be completed exactly as he imagined it. I knew that there were still things that Papà wanted to do: it would have involved no more than another couple of days to shoot those inserts. The dialogue had already been written by my father and was ready to be used for the dubbing, and there were also demos of the music which had been approved but had yet to be recorded in their final form. In brief, I was prepared to complete Cani arrabbiati in way that would make my father's spirit live again. I wasn't expecting to be paid—absolutely not! I merely wanted to work closely with her to ensure that the film would turn out as my father had envisioned it and prepared it to be. My only wish was to respect the spirit my father had invested in the film. In the end, I couldn't be sure that this would happen because—perhaps to avoid any additional expense—Lea Lander refused my offer of assistance and completed the film herself, against my wishes."

5 Ernest Borgnine never starred in Cani arrabbiati, but he would later star in an Italian Western with the remarkably similar title of Cani arrabbiato/Manhunt (1984), directed by Fabrizio De Angelis as "Larry Ludman" and photographed by Guglielmo Mancori, Bava's D.P. on Ringo del Nebraska/Savage Gringo.

Lander was finally able to scrape together enough money to recover the materials from storage and to initiate a very basic restoration of the film. Some of the funding came from Blumenstock, who wanted to obtain the video rights to the film. "But," he explains, "Lea had so much riding on it that her ideas about its commercial appeal were completely unrealistic. She wanted hundreds of thousands of dollars for the VHS rights, if you can imagine that! It was completely crazy. Then, in a moment of inspiration, I asked her, 'Well, what about the DVD rights?' And I could not believe my luck because she agreed to sell me the DVD rights very cheaply, almost for nothing. Maybe $3,000. This is because DVDs were just being introduced to the market at that time and she had no idea what a DVD was!" Lander empowered Blumenstock to produce a limited edition of 2,000 discs.

The efforts that went into the film's reconstruction have variously been credited to Lander, Blumenstock, and even to this writer, but Blumenstock—who never set foot in the editing room—recalls that Lander worked on the project with an associate based in Milan, whom he never met. "I am certain that he, whoever he was, was mostly responsible for the outcome, because with Lea, nothing ever gets done. I was in touch with her throughout the process, so I know that they had to strike a positive print from the negative, which was then edited to match the content of various positive fragments [the Reali rough cut assembly] also in her possession, which were in extremely bad shape. But knowing what I know now, I don't think you could really call what they did a 'restoration.'"

The existing elements were without sound, so it was necessary for Spera Cinematografica to foot the bill to create a completely new soundtrack—inserting sound effects, hiring voice actors to loop the film in Italian (only Riccardo Cucciolla dubbed his own performance), and scoring the picture with Stelvio Cipriani's crude demonstration recordings.

Blumenstock: "I don't think they knew what they were doing, because they went about the restoration completely the wrong way. They edited the film on video—PAL video, at 25 frames per second—and also cut the sound in PAL, then tried to synchronize it to the negative, which was film, which runs 24 frames per second. It must have been a nightmare!"

Once the film had been assembled into releasable form, Lander bestowed upon it one perplexing final touch—the new title of Semaforo rosso ("Red Traffic Light"). Her rationale for choosing this title—a phrase that means "halt" for a film that does nothing but "go, go, go!"—was that Riccardo's car is commandeered by the gang while pausing at a red light.

It was under this bizarre moniker that Cani arrabbiati had its world premiere at the 14th Brussels International Festival of Fantasy, Science Fiction and Thriller Films in 1996. A 35 mm print was struck for the occasion and actor Riccardo Cucciolla was flown in to introduce it.

In the audience was Bava fan Alwin Dewaele, who published these observations of the event in the British magazine Flesh & Blood: "Unfortunately, the world premiere screening of Semaforo rosso at Brussels was sullied by the very worst examples of ignorant behavior and audience reaction. The Festival is well-known for audience participation, the crowd cheering at the slightest showing of gore or violence, and hooting and whistling at the merest hint of kissing or sex. This could be entertaining or enlightening in accompaniment with the latest Clive Barker or Peter Jackson entry, but surely not Bava's long-awaited masterpiece! The audience's behavior during this film was the worst I've ever witnessed here in Brussels, painfully ruining the film's most violent and intense moments with wild cheering, whilst other scenes were just hooted away. It is a shame that the first public screening of this film had to suffer the insults of a puerile audience who didn't have the slightest clue to who its director was and what other films he had made. A positive note, though, was the invitation of the film's lead actor Riccardo Cucciolla, who was briefly interviewed on stage before the film began (the usual clichéd questions, of course)."[6] Only a few years after attending the premiere, Riccardo Cucciolla died unexpectedly on September 17, 1999.

The film subsequently received wide critical acclaim, but in the opinion of Lamberto Bava—who knew better than anyone else the kind of movie his father had planned to make—Semaforo rosso was a travesty.

"I have seen it," Lamberto remarked at the time, "and I must tell you that, although the editing reflects my father's work, it was a mistake to leave it that way because, for Papà, this was only his rough cut. In fact, he fully intended to make additional cuts and other small modifications, before arriving at the final cut. Also, I must also report that Lea Lander did all of the post-production work (the voices, the music, the sound effects) as cheaply as possible, so that the film feels like one of those made-for-TV movies or soaps that play in the afternoons on the smaller private television stations—not like a film to be shown at the cinema. This obviously makes me very unhappy, and as for my father, I can assure you that he would be very pissed-off."

TRENTEDUE and Bisturi fight over the rights to Maria.

Don Backy, who finally saw the film more than two decades after giving his outstanding performance as Bisturi, was similarly disappointed: "I saw the film on a VHS tape that a friend (who managed to buy it) gave to me as a gift. It was I who came up with the title of the film.[7] I thought of it and proposed it to Mario Bava, who liked it, so I wasn't happy to see that the title on the VHS had become Semaforo rosso. The final result didn't seem very good to me, mostly because of the editing: too slow. I don't know who cut the movie, but if Mario had supervised the final editing, the result would surely have been better. I'm certain that he had a more frantic pace in mind. Perhaps some of the tense situations inside the travelling car are still missing, and the ones that are there are not sufficiently tense. I also felt that Maurice Poli was out of character. There's no reason why the two fierce characters played by George and me should fear the reaction of a boss who doesn't project a clear personality."

For his part, Maurice Poli admits, "I have never actually seen the film. I remember seeing the rushes, but everything was silent. I know the film was recently re-released, but no, I have never seen it. Apparently, it has a cult following around the world. Otherwise, you wouldn't be here to interview me, no?"

BISTURI is unhinged after Dottore shoots Trentedue in the neck.

Music

As finally heard in Semaforo rosso, Stelvio Cipriani's score for Cani arrabbiati is akin to an unfinished score for an unfinished movie. The composer was hired to provide a score early in production, and he developed the main theme either on the basis of reading the screenplay or seeing some of the early dailies. The score also bears a very strong similarity to another he composed around the same time, for Massimo Dallamano's crime thriller La polizia chiede aiuto/What Have They Done to Your Daughters? (1974)—so strong, in fact, that one can easily believe that both scores were written generically, to accompany any random Italian crime scenario.

The main theme of Cani arrabbiati is an intense, incantatory piece built on a three-note ostinato which is played thrice in ascending keys, before cycling back to the beginning. As we first hear the piece, the pattern is played on a harsh, spidery harpsichord—also the main instrument of the Dallamano score—accompanied by a small, brass-augmented jazz combo (the brass eventually overtakes the harpsichord) with sustained electric guitar. The arrangement is charging and momentous, but as the film progresses, the same piece is heard in different arrangements: a slower and more somber version (with the ostinato played on synthesizer to an unsettling, weightless effect), a light jazzy rendition heard on the car radio, and also a version closer to the original arrangement, in which the noodlings of a sawtoothed electric guitar take instrumental precedent. In this respect, Cipriani was following the model of Hitchcock's esteemed collaborator, Bernard Herrmann, who once scored an entire picture—Roy Boulting's psycho thriller Twisted Nerve (1968)—with different arrangements of the same music, which gave the movie an extraordinarily obsessive flavor.

Before the production ran out of funding, Cipriani was able to record demos of no more than three or four tracks, one of them being an oddball jazz arrangement of Schubert's "Ave Maria." Other Cipriani cues—written and recorded for other pictures—were recruited as temp tracks, including a cue written for Bava's own Ecologia del delitto, which is utilized three times in the picture: first as Riccardo takes the exit that leads to the rest stop, next during the killing of the hitchhiker, and finally as the car pulls to a halt at the ruined church where Dottore's second car has been parked in advance.

The score suffers a bit from its coarse recording quality—as Lamberto Bava has stated, it was meant to be re-recorded later, with greater studio polish (as indeed it was, judging from the 2006 Digitmovies CD release)—but Cani arrabbiati is a coarse film, and the grittiness of the music does not unreasonably compromise what is essentially a good match.

Rabid Dogs

After the film's premiere in Brussels, Peter Blumenstock patiently awaited the delivery of the DVD master promised to him by Lea Lander.

"I wanted a master in a decent format," he remembers, "but the first thing she gave me was a Super VHS copy—for DVD! I pressed for something better, like a SuperBetacam master, but finally all that she could deliver was a Betacam recording—which is an analog master rather than digital, but . . . you know, acceptable. I took it to a post house with a friend and we fixed the color and edited together a trailer. Given the facilities at my disposal, it was the best I could do; I couldn't invest any more money in the project, because in addition to what I had paid to Lea, there were the additional costs of authoring, duplication, packaging, and distribution, which involved an expense of well over $20,000. For a small, unknown film on a format that had yet to hit its stride, it was a huge financial risk for me to take."

6 Alwin Dewaele, with the assistance of Nigel Burrell, "Mario Bava's Bleak World View: The Nihilism of Semaforo Rosso," Flesh & Blood 7, 1996, 7.

7 Although production stills show that the clapboard carried the title L'uomo e bambino, Mr. Backy must be mistaken about this, as a Variety report dated May 8, 1974—well before the shooting commenced—reported the Cani arrabbiati title.

BISTURI and Riccardo dispose of the not-quite-dead body of Trentadue.

Thus, Blumenstock's company Lucertola Media ventured—for the first and only time—into the realm of DVD production. "In reconstructing the film," Blumenstock explained in an article included on the disc, "the only problem was the absence of the opening title sequence, which was present in the script but never put on celluloid. We considered some no-frills alternatives—putting plain titles on a black screen, for example—but we finally decided to film a new opening scene, following Bava's posthumous directions."

Bava's annotated script describes the planned sequence as a slow zoom-out shot of a weeping woman, her silhouette visible through a transparent, billowing curtain. Bava's idea was that, on second viewing, the viewer would realize that this unexplained figure was in fact the child's despondent mother, reacting to the news of her son's abduction. Like the opening shot of Dario Argento's Profondo rosso/Deep Red (shot the same year), the sequence would go unexplained, entering into the viewer's subconscious as the story got underway, only to be summoned back to conscious attention when later events elucidated its true and critical meaning. It was an afternoon's shoot for Blumenstock, who filmed the shot in 16 mm. Though attractive and well-intended, the sequence doesn't really work because the imagery is stylized in a way that the remaining footage is not; in its stark artifice, it looks more like an Argento shot than a Bava shot). Also, the track-out is too slowly paced and the pose of the crying woman (Nina Gueltzow, the girlfriend of one of Blumenstock's coworkers at Crippled Dick Hot Wax)—is too stationary to seem genuinely upset or hysterical.

As the DVD entered its final stages of production, Blumenstock took some last-minute measures to ensure that the text screens and subtitles would read smoothly enough to please its principal audience in English-speaking countries. He asked me, Tim Lucas, to polish the English subtitles and the wording of the supplementary files, which I was pleased to do. Because my own knowledge of Italian was (and remains) limited, I was provided with a very rough translation of the film's scripted Italian dialogue by Sukri Mehemet, which was the foundation of my rewrite.

My original role was to polish this existing translation for co-credit; however, it soon became apparent that the film would not be well-served by Mehemet's strict translation. In English, the street language sounded too stilted and formalized—and this was perhaps caused by Mehemet's decision to translate the dialogue as scripted, rather than as spoken. The original dialogue was violent and crude, but also rich in character (and occasionally, humor), much of which was lost in literal translation. So I approached the dialogue as a novelist, studying the actors carefully and writing the dialogue with their emotions in mind, striving to make every line as true to their performances as to the scripted dialogue. I also took some minor liberties to make the dialogue sound as vivid and contemporary as possible. The original Italian dialogue contained a surprising amount of profanity for an Italian film of this period, but I added even more, because this is the way criminals speak on the screen today, especially in the wake of directors like Martin Scorsese, Oliver Stone, and Quentin Tarantino. The last thing Rabid Dogs wants to be is a restrained film.

I also added to the dialogue in a couple of ways, but only when it would not alter or detract from original meanings. For example, I chose to have the car radio announcer refer to a "robbery and kidnapping" (not just a robbery, as in the script), because this could be interpreted as a reference to the hostage Maria on first viewing, and understood on subsequent viewings as a foreshadowing of the film's bleak dénouement. The character names also required me to take certain liberties. In Italian, the word Dottore connotes an educated man, but there is no precise counterpart in English. It would have been misleading to have the others address him as "Doctor" or "Professor"—and these also seemed too cumbersome to be used as nicknames—so I settled on "Doc." It seemed critical to leave the name of Trentadue untouched, but since "32" would suggest a frightening, impossible endowment in America (where we continue to resist the metric system), I took the liberty of inserting a brief metric explanation. Bisturi means "scalpel" in Italian, which called for a synonym that could trip more easily off the tongue, so I renamed him Blade.

The Lucertola Media DVD of Rabid Dogs was released in January 1998. It was the first feature film to be released exclusively on DVD and, as such, it provided the incentive needed by numerous reluctant video collectors to embrace this new medium, which is today regarded as the fastest growing home entertainment market ever.

"I am very proud of what we accomplished with that DVD," Blumenstock says. "It was the very first Mario Bava DVD, and now nearly all of Bava's films are available in the format, which is unimaginable to those of us who remember how difficult it used to be, even to see one. And if you look at the DVD market today, there are so many great European horror films available, with never-before-seen footage and alternate cuts, it is amazing to realize how quickly the market and its audience have grown. And Rabid Dogs was pretty much the beginning of it all!"

Wild Dogs

In 2001, a somewhat expanded cut of Cani arrabbiati appeared on DVD in Germany by Astro Records & Filmworks under the slightly amended title of Wild Dogs. Carrying the onscreen title of Wild Dogs semaforo rosso, this disc eliminates the Blumenstock title sequence (or rather, repositions it as a supplementary item) and opens with a newer, more state-of-the-art title sequence patterned after the crude video-generated titles which accompanied Lea Lander's original Semaforo rosso print. It also concludes with some extra footage that begins with the shot of the child in the trunk of the car (actual motion footage, not the freeze-frame under the end titles of the Lucertola disc), cuts back to Riccardo shutting the trunk again, climbing into the car and driving out of the Chevron station, as the screen fades to black and the credits roll. An alternate take of this footage is also provided in the supplementary section. Although the Astro disc provides only Italian and German subtitles with no English option, this cut of the picture is marginally more satisfying. According to Alfredo Leone (who now holds the world rights to the title), this DVD is an unauthorized release.

US promotional poster. A welcome return to the "School of Saul Bass" poster design.

Kidnapped

The tangled web of Cani arrabbiati's production history was dealt a new twist in 2002 with the completion of Kidnapped, a re-edited and re-scored version of the picture produced by Alfredo Leone, with new scenes directed by Lamberto Bava.

In late 2000, Leone acquired the rights to Cani arrabbiati from Lea Lander. The transaction brought him into the possession of Bava's annotated script, which mentioned numerous changes that were never put into effect in the existing workprint. Armed with these notes, Leone mapped out what needed to be done to complete the picture according to Bava's specifications, scripting a few short additional scenes. "The picture was unreleasable as it was," he opines. "It had no continuity, but it had great potential."

In early 2001, Leone travelled to Rome where he supervised the taping of some new video footage to provide a "rough draft" of his intentions. Among these scenes were cutaway shots of autostrada traffic, police helicopters hovering over the highway, and two dramatic scenes—one of which provided a new closing image for the picture, a zoom-in and freeze-frame of the boy's mother's face as she breaks down, upon hearing the terms dictated by his kidnapper.

In March, Leone screened this material for Lamberto Bava—with whom he had not been in touch since the 1970s—in the hope of persuading him to oversee the filming of the final supplementary footage. Lamberto had thoroughly disapproved of Lea Lander's earlier Semaforo rosso cut of the picture, and the experience had left such a bad taste in his mouth that he initially resisted Leone's invitation.

"It was The House of Exorcism all over again!" Leone laughs. "At first, Lamberto didn't want to do it. He was superstitious about touching it, maybe because it was something of Mario's. But he finally decided it would be better for him to do it than somebody else. I couldn't have been more pleased."

Lamberto Bava directed the additional scenes on location in Rome in late April and early May. "It was amazing," Leone marvels, speaking with genuine nostalgia. "We got together a small crew of people, most of whom had worked for Bava in the old days, when they were young and just starting out, but now they're all known professionals in their field. The cameraman used to be the assistant to Emilio Varriano, the original cameraman, and so on." Leone was also successful in soliciting a completely new score from the film's original composer, Stelvio Cipriani, including an original vocal ballad to accompany the end credits scroll.

Though the reshoots took less time to film than to prepare, not everything went smoothly and Leone occasionally noticed history repeating itself. "Just like I had trouble with Mario on The House of Exorcism, I had trouble with Lamberto!" he laughs. "The ending of the picture . . . I wanted the final shot to end with a zoom and a freeze-frame. Lamberto didn't want to do it. On the set, I told him, 'Remember, a zoom-in and a freeze-frame." He didn't give it to me! I finally had to do it in the lab as an optical! He was very stubborn about some things. But afterwards, when he saw the finished picture, he called me and he said, 'Leone, I apologize. It's a wonderful picture, and I was wrong to challenge you.' What can I say? Like father, like son!"

Lamberto Bava believes that he and Leone were successful at reconstructing the film into a form closer to Mario's original intentions. "I re-edited the footage, trying to approximate what my father planned to do. There were some scenes that still needed to be shot and I shot them, doing them a little bit different, but always with a spirit close to what the film had to be. For example, I added the mother in the final phone call; I shot these with my son Roy. But, most importantly, I made some revisions, cutting some things my father didn't like. I think I knew my father better than most people, and I tried to imagine what he really wanted to do. Besides that, I had been his assistant during the production and I was the only one who had the script of the film. The problem was that we couldn't cut the original negative because we don't know where it is, so I was only able to re-edit the existing cut. My editor Mauro Bonanni helped me, and we also recovered some stock material from PAC, which gave us some shots of police cars from the 1970s. These were all things that weren't in the film at the time; luckily, I still had a list of things I was supposed to shoot as the film's second unit director [at the time the plug was pulled on the original production]."[8]

The Kidnapped cut omits the subjective cutaway to the pinball game as the camera slow-zooms into Bisturi's face after the shooting of Trentadue (which is missed), as well as Erika Dario's annoying "It's A Long Way to Tipperary" sing-along (which is not). As re-edited by Mauro Bonanni (though Carlo Reali still receives the only onscreen editing credit), Kidnapped generally plays more tightly than Rabid Dogs, but not to an extent that incriminates the earlier cut quite to the degree suggested by Lamberto Bava's remarks.

Lamberto's completion of the picture is seamless, incorporating stock shots of traffic and helicopters dating from the period in which the film was shot. It works as a whole and shows sound judgment in terms of what it removed. What it added, however, is not always so judicious. Viewers familiar with Rabid Dogs may question whether the film was well-served by Kidnapped's occasional cutaways outside the getaway car, which diminish the earlier version's sense of sweaty claustrophobia and universal criminality.

Contrary to Lamberto's comment about being forced to re-edit the existing cut, Kidnapped picks up some shots not found at the time of the Rabid Dogs assembly. One of these is a shot of the bank manager phoning the police after the opening heist, which confirms Ettore Manni's previously inexplicable presence in the cast list.

The new material, featuring Fabrizia Sacchi as the kidnapped child's mother, is well-played but causes the film to tip its hand too early—and the closing scene of Roberto's call from the telephone booth is weakened by the insertion of Sacchi's emotings. In some ways, Riccardo Cucciolla's performance in this final dialogue scene is his most important moment in the picture; he was the film's star—and, at the time of Kidnapped's release, its late star—and it's regrettable that his ultimate delineation of character would be punctuated and undercut by cutaways to a performance by an unknown. The scene works better if the viewer imagines the mother's distress through the steely calm of the kidnapper.

Alfredo Leone had final cut on Kidnapped, but its faults cannot be laid entirely at his doorstep; he was working in good faith from Mario Bava's surviving notes. Of course it is possible, had Bava lived to guide the film through its final editing stages, that he might have had second thoughts about the cutaways to the police and the distressed mother, but his notes show that he did intend them while the film was in production. If the overall effect of Kidnapped is not entirely an improvement, it is a smoother ride and Lamberto Bava's completion of the film is seamless and a professional yet loving job.

Of all the revisions found in Kidnapped, the most lamentable is the replacement of Stelvio Cipriani's original, propulsively anxious score with a new one, also by Cipriani. "We were preparing the film for a contemporary release," Leone explains, "so we felt we needed to get away from the original music. It wasn't bad for its time, but today, it sounds very dated, not like something you'd hear on a new picture. So I went to Cipriani and explained what we were doing, and he agreed to deliver an entirely new score. I think he did a wonderful job."

Cipriani's new score has a completely different character to his previous effort. The music of Kidnapped is light, calm, elegant if bland, middle-of-the-road music with a delicate dance beat. In no way does it reflect the tensions or suspense of the images onscreen, even turning Maria's desperate bid for escape into an opportunity for the score's dance track to stretch out like a sleek cat. Only during the climactic scene of Roberto's gunning of his abductors do the soundtrack and film feel emotionally in synch. Worst of all is the end credits song, "Hold On To Me," an old-fashioned Oscar-bid of a theme song (compared by some to The Poseidon Adventure's "The Morning After") whose hopeful lyrics stand in defiant contradiction of the bleak cynicism otherwise characterizing the story's world view. It is impossible, too, to figure out whom, among the film's characters, the song's plea is meant to represent.

Disliking the film's original title, which he felt gave the impression of retroactively ripping-off Quentin Tarantino's Reservoir Dogs (1992), Leone settled on a surprising new title: Kidnapped. ("It was good enough for Robert Louis Stevenson," he reasoned at the time—to say nothing of Ellery Queen.) This revised, rescored version had its World Premiere at the Egyptian in Los Angeles on May 31, 2002, at the American Cinematheque's second Mario Bava retrospective. Alfredo Leone and Lamberto Bava were in attendance, and according to Internet reports, the screening was followed by polite, lukewarm applause. A Q&A session scheduled after the movie prompted no questions from the audience, so the American Cinematheque's Dennis Bartok filled the breach with questions of his own.

Both Leone and Bava professed to be satisfied with the film's reception. Lamberto later told the magazine Nocturno: "I attended the screening in Los Angeles, in Italian with English subtitles, and I must say that the film—now finished as it should have been—was not only remarkably different from my father's other films; more importantly, it had a raw quality that didn't exist in the other versions available previously."

At a private party following the screening, Bava was treated to an unexpected reunion. According to film historian David Del Valle, who was present, "I saw Lamberto standing there, not talking to anybody, and I walked up and introduced myself and said, 'Have you seen Barbara Steele?' His English was a little rough, but he said, 'I saw her when she was making the movie La maschera del demonio of my father.' And I said, 'Well, if you just walk with me around that corner over there, you'll see her again!' So we walked over together and I had the great pleasure of reintroducing Lamberto Bava to Barbara Steele. They took each other by the hands and she kissed him; it was a very special moment. He hadn't seen her since he was a starstruck teenager visiting the set of La maschera del demonio, and he seemed quite emotional. Afterwards, he told me that, for the first time since his father died, he could feel his presence in the room. It was a great party."

As responses to the American Cinematheque screening continued to accumulate on the Internet, it became apparent that, while Kidnapped was strongly disliked by some audience members who were familiar with the cut preserved on the Rabid Dogs DVD, those who had not seen the earlier version found it most impressive. When told that the film had been recut and given a new title, actor Don Backy responded, "I just hope that Lamberto improved the editing to give the entire movie a faster pace."

Leone considers Kidnapped to be "Mario Bava's crown jewel." Lamberto Bava agrees, albeit somewhat more tentatively: "It is now the film that Mario wanted . . . I think . . . I hope!"

Reviewing the Kidnapped cut of the picture under the title Rabid Dog [sic], Variety's Dennis Harvey noted that the picture "resurrected after twenty-eight years on the shelf, might well be Mario Bava's most atypical picture . . . Also known as the much-less-vividly-titled Kidnapped, feature . . . merits specialized distribution as a major '70s rediscovery . . . Perfs range from over-the-top (Caponi) to subtly ambiguous (Cucciolla), but all fit neatly into an overall mise-en-scène of gruelling realism. Only wrong note in restored pic's package is a rather cheesy soundtrack by Stelvio Cipriani, which regrettably recalls the sounds of synth-score 1980s direct-to-video cheapies." [9]

RICCARDO carries more than a child under this blanket as he gambles on his survival.

Commentary

Mario Bava's intentions for Cani arrabbiati were undoubtedly different from the results that were achieved by others working with his materials after his death, but his achievement is nonetheless remarkable. Regardless of the form in which it is viewed, Cani arrabbiati is to Bava's career what Detour (1945) is to the filmography of Edgar G. Ulmer: a minimalist noir road picture that stands as a definitive example of what a talented and experienced filmmaker can achieve onscreen with a lot of imagination, and little or no means. Bava had far less to work with than Ulmer—not having the luxury of PRC's studio sets and rear-screen projection facilities—yet he produced arguably superior results. The difference may be that Ulmer (who was forced to work for insignificant studios after being blackballed by Universal in the 1930s) worked with minuscule budgets because he had to, whereas Bava did so because he responded to the way low-budget filmmaking forces one to think and solve technical problems creatively. Ulmer was equally proficient, but slumming; Bava was in his element.

A headlong, deeply unsettling thriller from start to finish, Cani arrabbiati would be an impressive feature coming from any director, even from a young one feeling his oats, but coming from Bava—who had just turned 61 and was only five years from the end of life and career—it is an unexpected 180° turn away from the dead end necrophilic concerns of Lisa and the Devil, a forceful reassertion of his vitality and resourcefulness. Screened for the first time almost two decades after its director's death, it is the most Promethean film of Bava's career—not his best, but certainly his most externalized, energetic, and alive picture. It stands as a remarkable reinvention of his directorial persona, a film like no other Bava ever made—a story about the kinds of characters never acknowledged by his earlier work, in which stylish criminals committed brutal yet beautiful murder on the cool and unperspiring bodies of women torn from the covers of Italian Vogue.

Cani arrabbiati is also the only Bava film which takes place entirely in the real world, in real time, on real locations. The only other Bava films that could begin to make such a claim, La ragazza che sapeva troppo and Ecologia del delitto, take place less in the real world than in stylized realms of paranoid fantasy and avarice. Given the arrival of Cani arrabbiati in his filmography, Bava's earlier films—so commonly perceived as extreme with their aspects of sado-masochism, gruesome murder, and necrophilia—are suddenly unmasked as conservative fantasies from which every trace of reality was banished. However transgressive his earlier films may appear to be, the blunt, unglamorized and relentlessly cruel Cani arrabbiati exposes them all as the escapist entertainment they are.

Martin Scorsese has astutely pegged Bava as a 19th century horror director, [10] and it could be argued that Bava's most modernist works (Diabolik, 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, Ecologia del delitto) are more 21st century than of their own time, given their vaguely futuristic art direction and the fact that they are only beginning to find a widely appreciative audience now. Therefore, the real distinction of Cani arrabbiati is its courage in reflecting—for the first and only time, honestly and without subterfuge—the 20th century world in which Bava actually lived, the roads he actually drove.

With his usual opportunities for stylized lighting denied him by his story's setting, Bava was free to devote more attention than usual to matters of performance. The result puts the lie to the frequent charge that he was not "an actor's director." First of all, if a picture's success is almost entirely dependent on successful casting, the acting ensemble shows impeccable judgment on Bava's part. The performances of Riccardo Cucciolla and Maurice Poli are skillfully subtle and mutually dependent, as the personalities of these two "idea men" seem to stand on equal footing (despite the

8 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

9 Dennis Harvey, "Rabid Dog (Canni arabbiatti)" [sic] review, Variety, March 3–9, 2003, 46.

10 Martin Scorsese, quote "Bava seems to me 19th century . . ." in David Thompson and Ian Christie, eds., Scorsese on Scorsese (London, UK: Faber & Faber, 1989), 103.

BAVA makes a comic grab for Luigi Montefiori's . . . thigh in this gag shot, to the amusement of Aldo Caponi.

driver's disadvantage in this situation) for reasons that only become apparent in the final reel. It is one of the film's greatest pleasures to watch these two undemonstrative types locked in a quiet bid for control, as more demonstrative violence breathes down their necks from the rear—the division of front and back seats diagramming the separation of calculated reason and savage animal impulse. Cucciolla is to be particularly commended for a characterization that is wholly deceptive on first viewing, though it is completely supportive of its ultimate truth when studied in subsequent viewings. The film's success rests mostly on his shoulders, and he carries it with honor.

Luigi Montefiori gives a larger-than-life, bestial performance as Trentadue, blood-chilling yet funny, and also occasionally poignant and pathetic. More complex still is Aldo Caponi's multi-faceted Bisturi. The character manages to present shadings of the psychopathic, sociopathic, philosophic, sadistic, and comic, but there are moments that offer glimpses of a man ruined by bad company and worse opportunities, and his adoration for the "indestructible" Trentadue hints at homosexual devotion. Lea Lander gives a reasonable performance, but her hard-faced demeanor is a closed book; she doesn't permit the viewer many glimpses of Maria's true nature, or of her thinking process as she finds herself enclosed by clashing personalities, as she focuses her attention entirely on looking too hysterical to think and too frightened to move. Far worse is Erika Dario as the shrilly overbearing hitchhiker; as successful as she is at evoking the desired emotions, one can't help feeling that they could have been more subtly and effectively provoked.

Though it is more earthy, confrontational, and unpleasant than Bava's other work, Cani arrabbiati should not be mistaken for a return to neo-realism. While it does present us with a real-time drama of realistic situations, realistic settings, realistically profane dialogue, and—perhaps most uncharacteristic of all—consistently realistic lighting, it cannot be called destylized. Its action scenes, such as the opening bank robbery and the hostage situation in the parking garage, consist of carefully storyboarded camera set-ups, composed and edited with a dynamism that suggests comic book art. The use of wide-angle lenses, spreading various tight or narrow quarters across the screen, also lends to this quality, as does the startling metaphorical insert of the silver ball ricocheting through the works of a pinball machine as Bisturi struggles to comprehend the unimaginable shooting of Trentadue. A cutaway to an adding machine might have been more literal, as the vicious hoodlum tries to calculate what has just taken place in front of him, but somehow the pinball machine conveys the same thought.

Despite the severe limitations of scenery, the script manages to incorporate an impressive number of suspenseful situations: the presence of the sick child in the car; Trentadue and Bisturi's sadistic teasing of Riccardo, Maria, and the boy; the close encounter with a passing squad car; the tollbooth episode; Maria's escape (her gasp-inducing collision with the scarecrow guarding the cornfield prophesies a similar moment in Bava's Schock); Riccardo's unexpected encounter with a co-worker at the rest stop; the back seat rape, witnessed by other passing cars, which signals Dottore's loss of control; the gas station episode, as Maria must persuade the attendant to serve them while hiding the blood staining her blouse; the addition of the loudmouthed hitchhiker to an already overburdened human equation, and of course, the final sequence, which takes place in that favorite Bava setting: a ruined church. The script is not unlike a stove top where several different pots are set to boil at different times: Riccardo's anxiety as he is prevented from getting the child to the hospital, the hysteria of Maria, Bisturi's trauma at sitting beside Fagio at the moment he was shot in the head (and the seconding of this trauma when Dottore shoots Trentadue in the tunnel), Trentadue's alcohol-fuelled lust, the men's lighthearted cruelty toward the comatose boy, Dottore's concern over losing control of his crazed partners, and so forth. With so much tension involved, the film might well have been unendurable without some element of humor, which is provided in good quantity by Bisturi and Trentadue, both exhilarated and slap-happy at surviving the robbery. Even Lea Lander's dour, immovable expression of torment is tapped for humor, when Trentadue remarks on her knit-browed resemblance to Greta Garbo and Bisturi mimics her most famous line, "I want to be alone." In this humorous, trivia-tinged dialogue, and in other lines of deliberately shocking crudity—and cruelty, as when Bisturi describes how he once started to peel the skin from a cadaver but didn't complete the job . . . "What do you think I am, crazy?"—Cani arrabbiati anticipates the raw yet hilarious dialogue that Quentin Tarantino would later provide for his criminal characters in Reservoir Dogs and Pulp Fiction.

By having 90% of its action restricted to the interior of a moving car, Cani arrabbiati posed a technical challenge for Bava that finds one of its few counterparts in Alfred Hitchcock's wartime drama Lifeboat (1944). A not-quite-real-time screenplay initiated by John Steinbeck, Lifeboat attended the personal and political conflicts of a group of people after rowing free of a torpedoed ship; it never leaves the confines of the titular vessel for most of its 96 minutes. Bava's film beats it on the grounds of authenticity, as Hitchcock's film was shot entirely in the studio. The quantum leap taken by Cani arrabbiati into the realms of obscene language, sexual cruelty and humiliation has another Hitchcockian parallel in Frenzy (1972), a film which had prompted Hitchcock's former associate and personal friend Norman Lloyd to exclaim to Mrs. Hitchcock after a preview screening, "It's the film of a young man!" But while Frenzy provided a climax of sorts to Hitchcock's career, it was not as audacious a statement as he had made earlier with Psycho (1960), simply a more overt one. No young person could ever mistake it for the work of a young man. Cani arrabbiati, on the other hand, is precisely that: a hellride with all the energy, profanity, nihilism, and rebellious anger of youth. [11]

MARIO BAVA makes one of his many faces for the camera, flanked by an unidentified companion and Aldo Caponi.

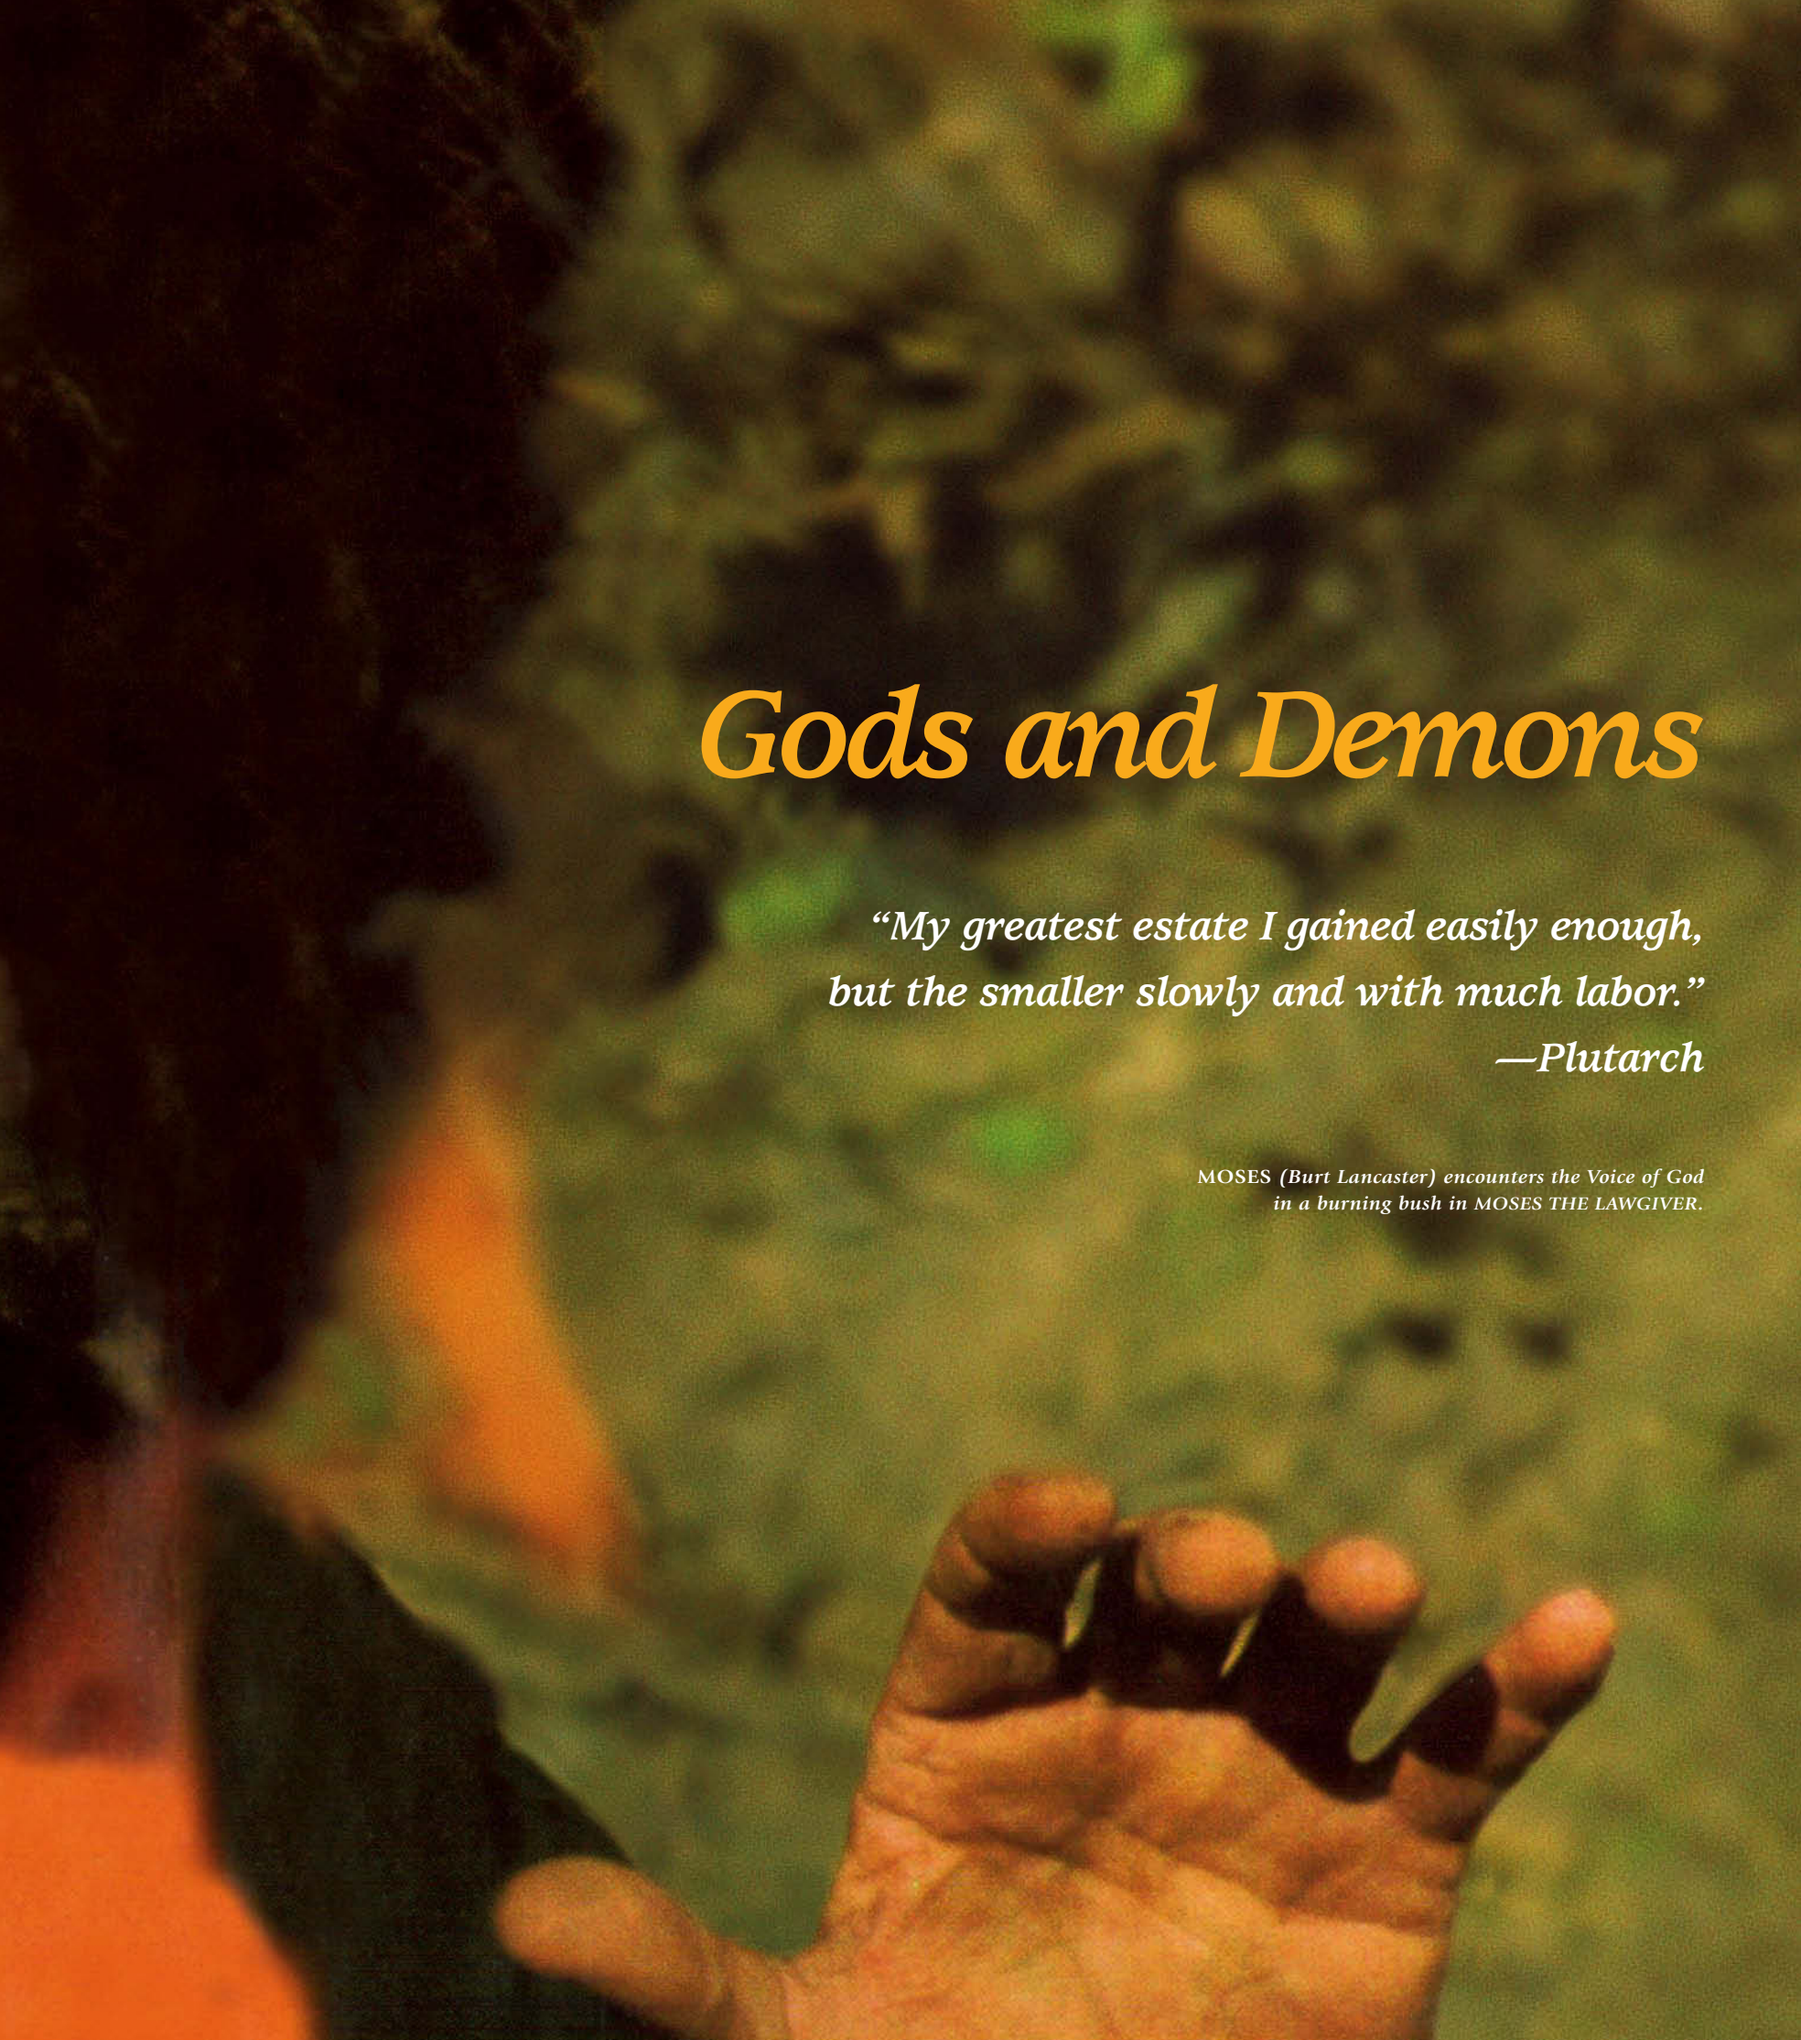
Where did this revitalization come from?

At the time of production, whether he let it show or not (he did not), Bava must have felt like a gambler all too aware that he might be rattling his last throw of the dice. Although everything about the production was reductive, Cani arrabbiati was very much a bid to change lanes on the autostrada of the Italian film industry, to leave the ghetto of horror movie production—in which his work was then developing a reputation of being old-fashioned—for the fast lane where all the young turks were breaking the rules. Some of the dialogue in Lisa and the Devil ("I can't live like this, in your shrine of death!") can be read in support of what some friends have said about Bava privately expressing a wish to break free of the horror genre. If he could not transform the genre, as he had tried to do, then he would set his sights on escaping it altogether. The raw emotion of Cani arrabbiati may have been fuelled by Bava's anger and desperation at having to deface the unreleased film which had been his grand summation; at losing the professional support of his valued colleague, Alfredo Leone; and at his disadvantage of being an older man in what had become a young man's world. Bava was surely hoping that this new project—so unlike anything else he had ever done—would redefine him in the eyes of producers and audiences as a viable, contemporary, hard-edged filmmaker, ready and able to adapt to reality. Unfortunately, greater realities were in the cards.

An important footnote that must be appended to any discussion of Cani arrabbiati is that, regardless of which version we might see, none of the extant editions represents a final cut approved by Mario Bava. The notes in his handwriting are a chart of his ideas during production, not necessarily a list of changes he was determined to make; if he had been able to shoot the opening sequence of the character whom Peter Blumenstock has dubbed "Bava's Mother of Tears," it is possible that he would have later decided not to include it, after all. As exciting as the Semaforo rosso/Rabid Dogs/Wild Dogs versions are, Don Backy has complained that their editing is not as tight as Bava intended, which is an important detail. While the Kidnapped version tightens the film's pacing, its improvements in this area are effectively undone by a flaccid score that insists on working against the grain of the film's pressure-cooker tensions.



Regardless of which version you see, and despite the absence of a genuinely definitive cut, the remnants of Cani arrabbiati leave little doubt that it would have been recognized as one of the best crime pictures of its decade, had it been completed and released as planned in 1976. But such a happy ending would have been inconsistent with a career inexorably tied to death and irony.

11 There is also another curious coincidence linking Frenzy and Cani arrabbiati, though it doesn't appear to be a very meaningful one, and thus is being demoted to footnote status. In one of the less successful scenes of the Bava film, the hitchhiker Maria attempts to involve her fellow car passengers in a jolly sing-along of "It's a Long Way to Tipperary," the 1912 composition by Jack Judge and Harry Williams that became the prevailing anthem of World War I. Maria doesn't know the correct words of the song, which is about an Irish soldier's yearning for home, and simply repeats "It's a long way to Tipperary / It's a long way to you . . ." until we in the audience practically want to knife her ourselves. The parallel has to do with the song's actual chorus, which goes, "It's a long way to Tipperary / It's a long way to go / It's a long way to Tipperary / To the sweetest girl I know! / Goodbye, Piccadilly! / Farewell, Leicester Square! / It's a long, long way to Tipperary / But my heart's right there!" The title of the novel upon which Hitchcock's Frenzy was based (by Arthur LaBern) was entitled Goodbye Piccadilly, Farewell Leicester Square. An interesting, but almost certainly meaningless parallel—what would be more valuable to know is whether Bava chose the song for sentimental reasons (it was the biggest song of 1914, the year of his birth, selling over a million copies), or because it was the most annoying song he could think of.

Gods and Demons

"My greatest estate I gained easily enough, but the smaller slowly and with much labor."
—Plutarch

MOSES (Burt Lancaster) encounters the Voice of God in a burning bush in MOSES THE LAWGIVER.

MOSES THE LAWGIVER

MARIO BAVA'S APPEARANCE on RAI-TV prompted an offer from the company to supervise the special effects for the network's most ambitious production to date: a lavish, $6,000,000 TV miniseries based on the Old Testament books of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, entitled Moses the Lawgiver.

An international co-production, the filming was financed jointly by RAI-TV, the British networks Associated Television (ATV) and Incorporated Television Company (ITC), and CBS Television in America. The series was the brainchild of producer Vincenzo Labella (b. 1937)—a Biblical scholar who had previously served as a technical advisor on Michael Curtiz' Francis of Assisi (1961) and Carol Reed's The Agony and the Ecstasy (1965)—and writer–director Gianfranco De Bosio. Born September 16, 1924, in Verona, De Bosio wanted to tell the story of Moses as it had never been told onscreen before—in wholly realistic dimensions.

FILMED indoors on a sound stage, this burning bush "exterior" is one of the many illusions engineered by Mario Bava for MOSES THE LAWGIVER.

YOUNG Moses (William Lancaster) attends the death of his adoptive mother, Princess Bithia of Egypt (Mariangela Melato).

One of De Bosio's principal collaborators in this venture was Anthony Burgess (1917–1993), the Manchester-born author of A Clockwork Orange and some of the finest comic novels and literary criticism of the 20th century. Burgess had become increasingly involved in Roman topics after marrying an Italian linguistics professor, Liliana Macellari, in 1968. The couple had initially moved to the island of Malta, but relocated to Rome after becoming fed up with Maltese censorship of their incoming and outgoing mail. The multilingual Burgess, who had done documentary work in British television, quickly made himself available to Italian television and supervised the production of a successful docudrama about Michelangelo. Moses the Lawgiver became the third title in what Burgess called his "TV Tetralogy"—preceded by the Michelangelo docudrama and another on William Shakespeare and followed by the celebrated miniseries Jesus of Nazareth (1977), directed by Franco Zefferelli. His work on Moses the Lawgiver would make Burgess something of a celebrity in Italian film circles, and he was subsequently invited by Federico Fellini to write the dialogue for his "first film in English," Casanova. In fact, this 1976 production was scripted first in Italian by Bernardino Zapponi—who also wrote the Italian dialogue for the Moses project—and filmed without direct sound recording, just like any other Fellini film. Burgess was contracted to write the English teleplay for Moses the Lawgiver as early as 1973, and was originally asked to work in tandem with De Bosio and Vittorio Bonicelli, who had previously scripted John Huston's La Bibbia/The Bible . . . In the Beginning (1966), Roger Vadim's Barbarella (1968) and Mario Bava's previous miniseries Odissea.

"I found collaboration difficult and was forced to work entirely on my own, leaving emendation, addition and subtraction to be more or less improvised . . . while filming proceeded in Israel," wrote Burgess. [1] To free himself from the formidable baggage of Biblical scripture, and to develop a feel for the language and pacing for his teleplay, Burgess got down to work by writing an entire epic poem, which was later published (in 1976) as Moses: A Narrative. It was on the bones of this impressive work that he subsequently fleshed-out his teleplay for the six-part miniseries.

Moses the Lawgiver

Filmed at Cinecittà, Safa Paladino and on location in Israel, Morocco and Italy
Fall 1974
First broadcast: June 21, 1975
Technicolor, 1.33:1, 360 minutes (miniseries),
141 minutes (feature version).

Production: RAI-Radiotelevisione Italiana (Rome), Sir Lew Grade, Associated Television (ATV, London), Incorporated Television Company (ITC, London). Producers: Vincenzo Labella, Bernard J. Kingham. Director: Gianfranco De Bosio. Teleplay: Vittorio Bonicelli, Anthony Burgess, Gianfranco De Bosio, and Bernardino Zapponi. Director of photography: Marcello Gatti. Second unit director: Ken Globus. Art direction: Francesco Cinieri, Pier Luigi Basile. Special effects: Mario Bava. Costume design: Enrico Sabbatini. Hairdresser: Giancarlo Marin. Choreography: Oshra El Kayam. Production accountant: Alicia Rivera Frankl. Editors: Gerry Hambling, Peter Boita, John Guthridge, Alberto Gallitti. Assistant editor: Noel Rogers. Music: Ennio Morricone and Dov Seltzer (songs and dance music), conducted by Bruno Nicolai. Sound recordist: Luciano Welisch. Sound editor: Win Ryder. Makeup: Vittorio Biseo. Dialogue director: Leslie Hodgson. Dubbing mixer: Paul Carr. Stills: Pierluigi. Post-production by Roger Cherrill, Ltd. (London). Distributor: RAI-RadioTelevisione Italiana.

Burt Lancaster (Moses), Anthony Quayle (Aaron), Ingrid Thulin (Miriam), Irene Papas (Zipporah), Aharon Ipalé (Joshua), Joseph Shiloach (Dathan), Marina Berti (Eliseba, Aaron's wife), Shmuel Rodensky (Jethro), Mariangela Melato (Princess Bithia), Laurent Terzieff (Merneptah, the Pharaoh), William Lancaster (young Moses), Jacques Herlin (magician), Mario Ferrari (Ramses II), Simonetta Stefanelli (Cotbi), Melba Englander (Merneptah's wife), Antonio Piovanelli (Koreh), Paul Müller (Merneptah's teacher), Umberto Raho (2nd magician), Michele Placido (Caleb), Yassi Warjansky (Eleazar), Paul L. Smith (goldsmith), Amos Talshir (1st thief), Haim Bashi (2nd thief), Haim Banai [Chaim Banai] (3rd thief), Galia Kohn, José Quaglio, John Francis Lane, Paul Varni, Dina Morrone, Giancarlo Badessi, Marco Steiner, Cosimo Cinieri, Renato Chiantoni, Didi Liekov, Enzo Fiermonte, Andrea Aureli, Percy Hogan, Fausto Di Bella, Richard Johnson (narrator).

Germany: Moses, 10/28/76, 131m
Hungary: Mózes, 4/20/89
Italy: Mosè, 10/16/76
Turkey: Musa, Akun Film
UK: Moses, Royal Premiere, 3/1/76, 141m
US: Moses the Lawgiver, CBS TV, 6/21/75. Moses, Avco-Embassy, 3/26/76, 140m

Synopsis

Part One: Fearing the fertility and number of the Levites, Pharaoh Ramses II of Egypt decrees that they be enslaved, and subsequently orders their male children to be taken away and slaughtered. As the captive children cry, one of the Israelite women gives birth to another male, who is taken by his clever sister Miriam to the Nile in a basket of reeds and sent downriver in a maneuver to save him. The basket is found by Bithis, the barren daughter of the Pharaoh, who adopts the child as her own and names him Moses, which in her tongue means "my son." Ramses II eventually dies, and Moses grows to young manhood as a Prince of Egypt, an older friend to the new Pharaoh, his young cousin Merneptah. One day, Moses is punished by Merneptah—disappointed that his older cousin did not keep his appointment to take him crocodile hunting—and sent to oversee the slave workers. When one Jew, Dathan, is whipped for interfering with an Egyptian guard who was trying to rape his wife, Moses interrupts the punishment and accidentally kills the guard. Moses is then taken into the confidence of the settlement and meets Miriam and his brother Aaron, who reveal his true identity and past. Confused, Moses decides to flee Egypt and "find himself." He rides into the desert on camelback and, after many days of sojourn, must slay his camel to quench his thirst and cure his hunger. At the foot of Mt. Horab, Moses finds the encampment of Jethro, banished by his own people for his refusal to acknowledge their religious idols, who lives there with his seven daughters. Moses stays and, in time, becomes husband to Zipporah, the eldest, with whom he has a son.

Part Two: Many years pass, and Moses has become a legend among his own people, who tell stories about his preordained survival of the mass slaughter and how he will return someday to lead his people to freedom. But they are losing faith now, ending their stories with "someday, they say, he will come back . . . but I think he's dead now, in the desert, his white bones picked clean." Meanwhile, the now adult Pharaoh also finds himself thinking about Moses and decrees that he should be found in the desert and welcomed back to Egypt, his crime forgiven. A royal messenger finds Moses in Jethro's encampment, but he declines the invitation, sending back his compliments and the explanation "I have my own Kingdom."

In response to his action, thunder erupts atop Mt. Horab, summoning Moses. He climbs up and finds a burning bush, which instructs him in the Voice of God to return to Egypt and lead his people to freedom. When Moses expresses skepticism about his ability to make others believe, God demonstrates mysterious feats of transformation—Moses' rod into a snake, his hand diseased and made well again—and intones, "Through this power, they will believe." Being slow of speech, Moses worries about his powers of persuasion and God commands that his brother, Aaron, will be his voice. After descending from the mountain, Moses continues to resist his calling and greater storms erupt as God demands his obeisance. When Moses rails verbally against God, rejecting his calling, he is struck dead—and Zipporah desperately volunteers to sacrifice their son in his place, then reconsidering: "Not a life, but a token"—and performs the first circumcision, a gesture which quells the thunder and brings breath back into Moses' lungs.

Meanwhile, Aaron is beset by symbolic dreams of his brother's imminent return. He shares them with Miriam, who advises him to go and meet Moses in the desert, giving him silver she has collected from the fallen purses of Egyptian guards to bribe the ferryman. Days pass in the desert, but as the discouraged Aaron collapses under the direct sunlight, pleading silently, "Show me a sign, brother," he recovers to find himself cradled in his brother's arms. He hears in thought, in his brother's voice (or perhaps the Voice of God), "Add no word. It is the sign."

Part Three: In Egypt, Moses is warmly greeted by Miriam and her family; they bathe him and he looks forward to getting to know his siblings, and their children, better. Aaron, based in his instruction by Moses, instructs his people in the knowledge of their destiny as decreed by "the one true God, the God of the Israelites." Ironically, Dathan—the man whom Moses previously saved from unjust punishment—readily informs an Egyptian guard of Moses' return, in hope of remuneration. Moses is brought to the Pharaoh, to whom he expresses the realities of the man he has become. "It's a simple matter, Majesty," he says. "I've discovered where I belong." The Pharaoh corrects him, imperiously: "You belong to us."

PORTRAIT of Burt Lancaster as the mature Moses.

Moses and Aaron soon petition the Pharaoh with a request to let their people go into the desert for three days to make sacrifice unto their God. Their request is denied. A persuasive miracle is required, so they later attend a ceremonial occasion on the Nile, which is miraculously transformed to a river of blood. Merneptah scoffs from his throne that this is the sort of trick his magicians could perform. So the ante is upped, and what Moses calls "the dance of numbers" begins—the curses of frogs, locusts, pestilence, boils, and plague. When water is poured by an Egyptian, it becomes blood; when that same blood is poured by an Israelite, it becomes water again. The Pharaoh's favorite horse dies. He is persuaded by his advisors to grant the Israelites their religious observance, before he appears to be cowed by their power—but Moses and Aaron surprise him by raising the stakes. When the Israelites leave, they insist on being able to take with them all their beasts and goods and exit Egypt as free men. The Egyptian ruler refuses, and on the night of the first Passover, Death claims the sole heir to his throne as the Pharaoh covers his son's body protectively with his own—the Israelites having put Death off their own scent by sacrificing lambs to God and daubing the animals' blood on the doors of their homes. Bitterly, the Pharaoh mourns his son, damns his own gods as false, and orders the Israelites to go and take their goods with them. And so the Israelites leave Egypt, not to return but to go in search of the land promised to them by the lord God.

1 Anthony Burgess, Moses: A Narrative (New York NY: Stonehill Press, 1976), from the Introduction.

After three days, Merneptah joins his army in the desert to bring them back and sees his soldiers killed after following the Israelites into the parted waters of the sea. The two-faced Dathar praises Moses' leadership, but he disavows any suggestion that he is above the others: "Never forget the Lord God." Feeling his friendship thrown back in his face, Dathar fumes.

ITALIAN manifesto for the theatrical release, picturing the Pharaoh Merneptah (Laurent Terzieff) at the moment of his son's death, the court magician (Jacques Herlin) in attendance.

Part Four: Moses leads his twelve tribes into the desert, where their search for the promised land of Canaan—which God has described to him as his people's inheritance—must begin. As Moses has forewarned his people, the search for the promised land does not come easily. After a brief period of rejoicing, and a seeming confirmation from above when a cloud in the likeness of a sacrificial lamb passes overhead, water becomes scarce and the young and thirsty begin to prey on the old and prudent. One of the younger men in the tribe speaks confidentially to Moses, pointing out that they are in fact moving away from Canaan, which lies to the east; Moses replies that he knows this, but that the approach to the city is perilous, being well-guarded by the people of Canaan and its neighbors, and would mean certain death. So the Israelites continue to move toward Canaan by moving away from it. When an oasis is sighted, their relief becomes anger as the water is found to be salty and undrinkable. Perseverence eventually delivers them to an even larger oasis, an unclaimed paradise of drinkable water, vegetation, and animal life. Some want to stay, but Moses insists that they cannot, as this is not their promised land. They continue to wander across the desert, the lack of food and water making them irritable and doubtful. In frustration, Moses promises them "meat in the evening, and tomorrow, bread to the full." His prophecy is fulfilled by a migration of quail at nightfall, and the discovery of tamarist trees in the morning, which bear a fluffy resin that tastes like bread. Their next settlement is raided on horseback by a nomadic tribe called the Amalakites, who fulfill Moses' bitter prophecy of bloodshed. One of the men in Moses' tribe proposes a strategy, which enables them to defeat their enemy and regain the road that will take them to Canaan.

Part Five: Moses and his tribes arrive at the base of Mt. Horab, where he is at last reunited with his wife Zipporah, his young son, and his father-in-law Jethro, now white-bearded. The reunited couple's lovemaking is interrupted by Joshua, who has need of his governing; a fight between two brothers, Judah and Reuben, over the wife of one has resulted in the murder of the other. Moses is called upon to decide the manner and gravity of the murderer's punishment, as these wanderers have no laws of their own. It is suggested that the killer pay for the life he's taken with his personal goods, but Moses objects, explaining that a human life is too precious, too spiritual, to be weighed in terms of material possessions. "We can value a human life," he reasons, "but only on its terms . . . a life for a life." But when Moses is asked to state when and how the murderer will pay for his crime, he hedges; it is beyond him to decide.

Thunder erupts atop Mt. Horab and Moses knows that he is being summoned. He understands that the point of this visitation will be to determine the future laws of his people, and he gathers them to announce his imminent leavetaking, and recites a number of laws for their collective approval, including those sanctifying the Sabbath as a day of rest, and against coveting a neighbor's goods, worshipping graven images, and taking a human life. This, if they approve, he says, will be their "covenant with God." The tribes respond favorably, and Moses begins his ascent with Joshua, whom he considers his "right hand." Before continuing to the summit without him, Moses tells Joshua that, should he not return, he must govern in his place. Joshua objects, thinking Aaron the more appropriate choice, and Moses replies, "I must look to the young, the new."

In Moses' absence, his people—agitated by the rabble-rousings of Dathan—begin immediately to ignore the code they have agreed to observe. Adultery, work on the Sabbath, and other banned activities become commonplace, and Aaron—whose ambitious wife Eliseba senses that Moses will pass him over for promotion in favor of Joshua—finds it beyond his powers to dissuade these misdeeds. The ignoring of the common code leads to open jeering, in the guise of a puppet show for children that burlesques Moses' conversations with God. Joshua returns and destroys the puppets, citing them as graven images and asserting that there is danger "even in children's play." As more time passes, Dathan initiates the rumor that Moses is dead. In desperation and fear, the tribes demand to see their collective wealth, given to them by the Egyptians, and then insist that it be divided equally among them. When Aaron reasons that this is impossible, he is overthrown and the golden objects and jewels are melted down and cast into the likeness of a golden calf. Aaron tries to put a good face on his defeat, explaining, "This idol is not God—but it will remind you of God each day, as you pass by it . . . What you see is an image of our unity as a people!" But the idol excites lust among the Levites, which erupts into a terrifying orgy that culminates in the stoning of Miriam and the rape and murder of an adulteress atop the calf. As morning comes, Moses descends from Mt. Horab, carrying the lovingly inscribed tablets of the law. In disgust, he confirms his people's breaking of the covenant by smashing the tablets against a rock. "We must start again," he says, wearily.

Part Six: Moses' people vow not to repeat the same mistakes, and Moses determines to climb Mt. Horab once again and bring back a newly inscribed covenant. In reverent apology, the tribes build a house for the tablets, and upon his return, Moses tells Aaron that this will be his house, as he will be called "priest" and be the source of God's voice. Aaron views this as a punishment for his failure to control the people in Moses' absence, as he used to be his brother's voice, but Moses tells him to "take it in the spirit of a promotion." Miriam, laid low by her wounds, enters into delirium and dies as the tribes renew their transit. Soon, the promised land of Canaan comes into sight beyond the mountains. Moses sends a group of young spies to enter the country and return with food and an account of its people.

ITALIAN manifesto depicting Moses and brother Aaron (Anthony Quayle) making their appeal for freedom to the Pharaoh.

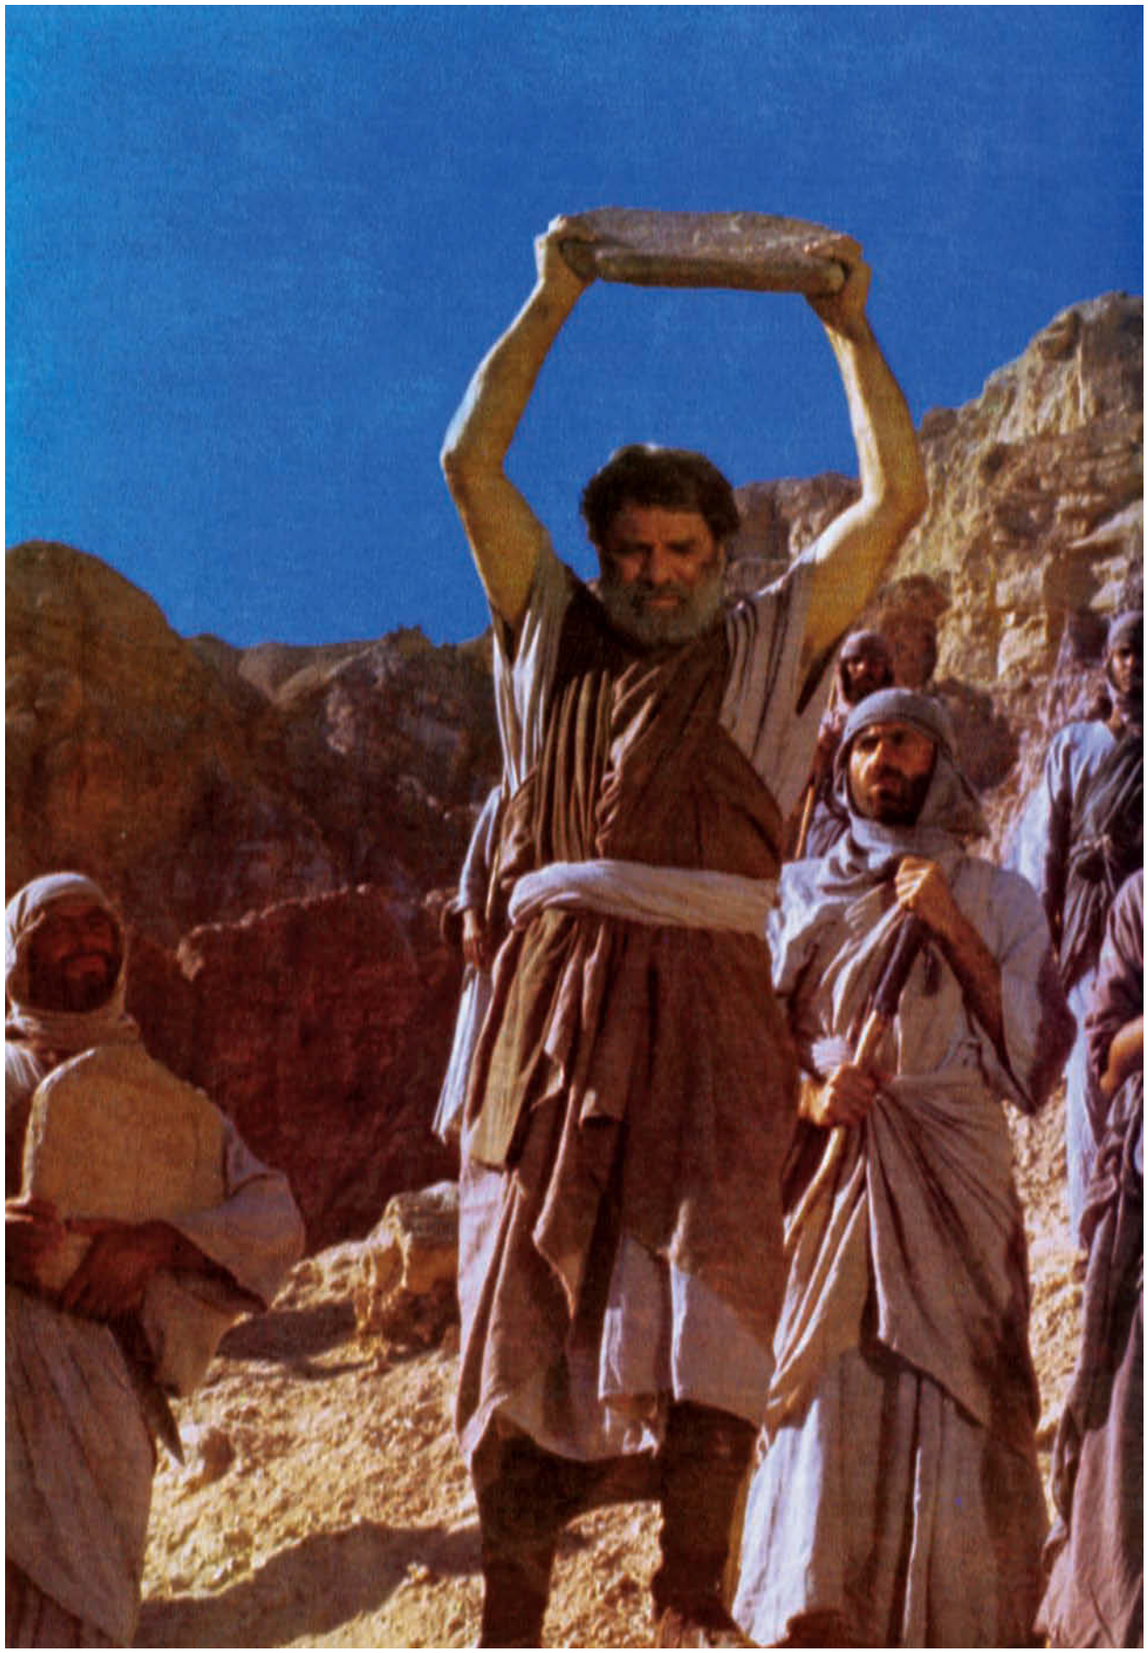
While awaiting their return, Moses is informed of the failure of some men to observe the Sabbath and is asked to set a punishment. Unable to weigh one law more than another, and reasoning that it is a rejection of God's law like any other, he decrees that the violators of the law should be stoned to death. The tribe is outraged, but ultimately bow to his judgment. Now more than ever, Dathan mocks Moses' authority openly. When left alone, Moses prays to God, pleading with him to "let thy servant go." The voice of God responds by telling Moses that He will ride him like a horseman rides his horse, and as punishment for his uncertainties and his plea to be released, he shall never be allowed to set foot in the Promised Land.



The men sent into Canaan return with a wealth of ripe fruit and confirmations of Moses' vision of "a land overflowing with milk and honey," but they warn it is a place of walled cities, inhabited by a large-built and war-like people. Moses addresses his people, explaining that this land is their God-given right, even if they must fight for it: "Freedom never comes easily." The tribes object, and Dathan protests most loudly of all, suggesting they nominate a new leader to guide them back to Egypt; as this "most obdurate" of Moses' children raises his voice in challenge to God's declarations, the sky darkens and the ground opens beneath him, swallowing him up. Moses stares down at his body in the pit and admits "I will miss your thorn in my side." He then banishes all of Dathan's followers back into the desert with their children, where they too must perish for rejecting the Lord's word.

The remaining Israelites declare war on the people of Canaan and launch a campaign of surprise attacks against them. When Moses is petitioned for consideration by the daughters of Zelafad, after their father and brothers are killed in this Holy war, he notices a flaw in the existing laws and amends it, so that a man's property will be passed along to his daughters in the absence of a son. Aaron dies of injuries sustained in travel. Visited in his tent one night by Aaron's son Eleazar, Moses initially mistakes him for his father and shows his age by addressing him as Aaron. He reflects that Aaron's sin was to love the people too much, and his own sin to love the people too little, by loving the law more.

When the battle is finally won, Moses scales a tall hillside under the guidance of God, who gives him the first view of the land that is now their own. God declares Moses' task finished. Beaming with achievement through a white beard, Moses lies down on the mountainside, forbidden to walk further, and rests—until the time he is called home.

Adaptation

"Right from the beginning, we deliberately forced ourselves to forget every Biblical film we'd ever seen," said Gianfranco De Bosio in 1975. "This wasn't particularly difficult since our film had nothing in common with such productions. I set out to tell the story of Moses in terms of the history of mankind. It is the plight of the people of Israel which fascinated me, and there are many analogies between their suffering then and what they have had to endure over more recent times."[2]

It was De Bosio's basic concept to liberate Moses, as much as possible, from the overblown, melodramatic religious spectacle of films like Cecil B. DeMille's The Ten Commandments (1956)—to depict Moses not as a bearded, stentorian superhero with a magic rod, but as a human being who has been ordered by destiny to rise to the challenge of achieving something extraordinary. His Moses is a simple man, halting of speech, who is burdened with a great vision, and great doubts as well; he must not only overcome the tyranny of Egypt, but the tyranny of the Egypt within himself, in order to deliver his community to freedom.

Moses adapted well to timely reinvention. He is depicted as a tribal hero, a bearded, long-haired champion of the young, who challenges imperious, war-waging authority that would knowingly order the slaughter its nation's young men; the idea being that a more relevant hero would help to make the ethics and ideals underlying the Hebrew faith more approachable to the average person, whether predisposed to sympathy or skepticism. When one of the younger Israelites use the word "progressive" to describe their move across the desert in search of the promised land, Moses echoes, "Progressive. It's a good word, progressive. It means to move forth." Moses' name is bestowed upon him by Bithia, in whose tongue it means "my son," but it is later revealed as meaning, in Hebrew, "to bring forth." (In one of many such ironic moments present in the humanistic script, Moses' birth parents "shrug Jewishly"—Burgess' phrase—when the word of his name is carried back to their home.) Thus, Moses is depicted as a progressive model for progressive times.

To tell Moses' story realistically, it was necessary for De Bosio to rationalize the miracles performed and claimed by Moses, according to legend, in equally plausible ways. Psychological explanations were provided to make certain Biblical passages explicable on a more comtemporary, humanistic level. For example, Moses' encounter with the Burning Bush immediately follows the coming of a messenger bearing an invitation from the Pharaoh that he return to Egypt. When the bush speaks to Moses, the voice of God is depicted indistinguishably from Moses' own inner voice—thus, its instruction is available to interpretation as Moses providing an excuse for himself, delusionally, to go back to Egypt and resolve his own dogging sense of guilt about the man he killed and the family he left behind.

DESCENDING from Mt. Horab and finding his people in sinful chaos, Moses shatters the Tablets of the Law.

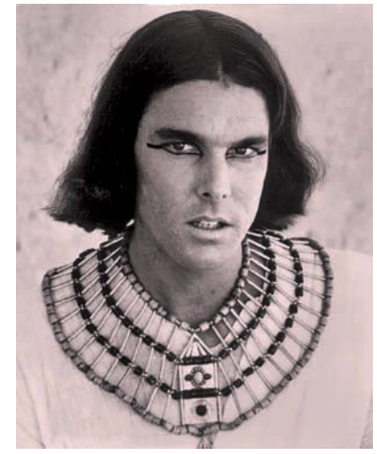
"The same applies to the Tablets of the Commandments," De Bosio continued. "Moses goes up the mountain and carves the Commandments in stone after having reasoned with himself and his people, after having interpreted various of his dreams and after having verified the needs of his people within the context of the times in which they are living."

Other miracles were given practical, educated explanations. When Moses promises his people that tomorrow they will have "bread to the full," he makes the promise aware that they will shortly reach an area of the desert populated with tamarist trees; thus, the miracle of "manna from Heaven" is explained in terms of the fluffy resin that grows on such trees, peeled away and carried by the desert winds, which is edible and has the taste of bread.

Likewise, the sea doesn't exactly part, at least not as spectacularly as it has done in other tellings of this story; instead, a strip of land is revealed by the divergence of the tides, allowing the Israelites to cross, and when the Egyptians follow, the tides rush back in resumption of their usual course, drowning these men and their horses. De Bosio theorized that the body of water crossed by the Israelites was misidentified in the King James edition of The Holy Bible as the Red Sea, believing it to be a mistranslated reference to the Sea of Reeds.



"It is a well-known fact," he said, "that a strip of land exists in the Sea of Reeds which appears and disappears according to the tides. Also, high waves can appear quite suddenly when the wind strengthens. It is perfectly possible that Moses led the Children of Israel across the exposed strip and that, immediately afterwards, a storm blew up and drowned the pursuing Egyptian horsemen. I am not saying that the storm was not sent by God; I only wish to show that the event could have occurred without God's help." Consequently, the parting sea of De Bosio's story is never identified—neither as the Red Sea, nor as the Sea of Reeds.

If anything, by removing any direct evidence of God's intervention from the storyline, De Bosio strengthened his story's emphasis on faith. And by approaching the miracles of the story from a rational direction—as simple illusions, psychological delusions, and as moments in which reality briefly intersects with the inexplicable, as through the inspirations of dreams—his orientation was perfectly in keeping with the filmic universe of Mario Bava.

Cast and Production

On the basis of Gianfranco De Bosio's original treatment, Moses the Lawgiver attracted a world-class star in Burt Lancaster. Born November 2, 1913, the once-athletic, robust actor had gracefully aged into an eloquent, graceful, elder statesman of the cinema. Moses was just one of a few major Italian productions in which Lancaster agreed to star during this period; it was immediately preceded by Gruppo di famiglia in un interno/Conversation Piece (1974), his reunion with Il gattopardo/The Leopard director Luchino Visconti, and followed by another of his greatest performances, as the landowner Berlinghieri in Bernardo Bertolucci's Novecento/1900 (1977).

Full-bearded and solid of build, the 62-year-old Lancaster explained his reasons for accepting the role of Moses to a publicist visiting the set in Israel: "The treatment was excellent, beautifully constructed and with a timeless feel to it . . . [The script] reaches some good conclusions on what the Jewish character and moral values should be. In the Israelites' confrontation with God, they were a fractious people but filled with vitality. It is this characteristic which has kept the Jewish race alive through the centuries." Lancaster himself was a self-avowed athiest.

LEFT TO RIGHT: Anthony Quayle as Aaron, Irene Papas as Zipporah, Ingrid Thulin as Miriam, Laurent Terzieff as Merneptah and William Lancaster as the young Moses.

Though not Jewish himself, and inclined to keep to himself when not needed on the set, Lancaster nevertheless won the admiration and respect of the Italian crew with his love of opera, earthy language and unexpected acts of generosity. After completing his last scene in the picture, Lancaster surprised the crew with individual baskets of fruit as a parting gift. According to the film's pressbook (which is hardly under oath), the actor bade farewell to the Israeli members of the unit by saying: "The Promised Land was just a dream to Moses, but you have made the dream a reality. I only hope that, through this motion picture, the world will better understand the Jews and what Israel stands for."[3]

2 Moses pressbook, Avco-Embassy, 1976.

Anthony Burgess, who spent much time on the set, said that Lancaster entered so fully into the role that he actually was witness to an occasion when the actor performed a live, on-set miracle. While appearing on The Dick Cavett Show in the early 1990s, Burgess recalled the filming of the scene in which Moses was under attack by his followers, who were dying of thirst in the desert; Lancaster was supposed to strike a rock in anger, which would break and unleash a natural flow of water. According to Burgess, the special effect rig didn't work, take after take. Exasperated, Lancaster cursed and struck at another rock with his staff, and actual water came flowing out. Burgess was so impressed by Lancaster, as an actor and as a man, that he dedicated his next novel, The Clockwork Testament, or Enderby's End, to him—adding an unattributed line from James Joyce's Ulysses: ". . . deserves to live, deserves to live . . ."

Just as Lancaster had tried to arrange a part for his daughter in Lisa and the Devil, he ensured that the role of the young Moses would be played by his son William (b. 1947). Though William Lancaster looks the part, is an able-enough horseman, and acquits himself well in the role, Moses the Lawgiver marked the beginning and end of his acting career. In 1976, he sold a screenplay that became the Paramount comedy The Bad News Bears. It was a boxoffice success and resulted in a sequel also written by Lancaster, The Bad News Bears Go to Japan (1978), as well as a spin-off television series. Despite launching this franchise, the young Lancaster's greatest claim to fame was his screenplay for a remake of the science fiction classic, The Thing From Another World, which developed a reputation as one of the best unmade scripts kicking around Hollywood before John Carpenter finally filmed it in 1982. Though Carpenter's adaptation is widely held to be one of his best films, as well as an acknowledged turning point in the history of motion picture special effects, those who have read Lancaster's actual screenplay claim The Thing would have been a far better film had Carpenter stuck more closely to it. After almost two decades of apparent inactivity, Bill Lancaster died on January 4, 1997, at the age of 49—just a few years after the death of his father, on October 20, 1994.

Other cast members familiar from the Bava dramatis personæ include Irene Papas (with whom he had worked on Odissea) as Moses' wife Zipporah, I vampiri's Paul Müller as the teacher of the young Pharaoh, and La frusta e il corpo's Jacques Herlin and Baron Blood's Umberto Raho as two of the Pharaoh's court magicians.

THE PARTING of the sea—not the Red Sea, in Gianfranco De Bosio's interpretation.

MARIO Bava's original storyboard for the filming of this sequence.

Special Effects

Though a good deal of Moses the Lawgiver was filmed on location in Israel's Negev Desert, Morocco and Italy, Mario Bava and his special effects unit (which included Carlo Rambaldi) worked close to home, either at Cinecittà or at the studios of Safa Paladino. It was during this period that Mario's grandchildren, Georgia and Roy, were living with him; on some days, to give his wife a rest, Mario took the kids to work with him.

One of Roy's earliest memories of his grandfather dates from the set of Moses the Lawgiver. "I remember him working on the burning bush, with the mountains in the background," he says. "He had built a model of the mountains and then he used a rippled 'water glass.' That's all I remember, because I was very young."

Though absolutely convincing as a location shot, the Burning Bush sequence was shot entirely indoors at Safa Paladino. The bush was an artificial tree built around a system of gas jets arranged in a branch-like formation; the fire could be increased or decreased as needed. When God's voice instructs Moses to drop his staff to the ground, his subjective view of the rod being transformed into a snake is rippled through Bava's "water glass," which he always used to denote subjective hallucinations. There is no transformation shot, as such; the rod is replaced by the snake, and vice versa, during cutaway reaction shots of Moses. Reportedly, Bava didn't even stop the camera, but let it roll as he kicked the rod out of view and dropped the snake into frame. Likewise, when the voice instructs Moses to place his hand inside his bosom and to remove it, the subsequent views of his hand—at first leprous, and then healed—are also filtered through the same distorting glass that was used to create Baroness Grap's mediumistic trances in Operazione paura and John Harrington's mind-bending flashbacks in Il rosso segno della follia.

Bava also supervised the filming of the various plagues that befell the Egyptians as they refused their permission for the Children of Israel to venture into the desert for their religious observance. A number of these effects are frankly unspectacular—which attracted a good deal of critical complaint against Bava—but this is the way De Bosio wanted them. For the plagues of flies, frogs, locusts and pestilence, and even for the "pillar of smoke" sandstorm in the desert, Bava resorted to documentary stock footage (as he had done on several effects jobs in the 1950s), which he occasionally augmented with original effects shots.

Georgia Bava has vivid memories of accompanying her grandfather to the effects workshop at Safa Paladino: "There were frogs jumping everywhere—and mosquitos! They were putting mosquitos on a kind of plastic circle, with mosquitos and bugs all in a row." Georgia may be misremembering the locusts seen in the film as "mosquitos," but they were affixed to a large, plastic disc that could be spun like a wheel in front of the camera as the actors flailed about, appearing to be under attack by a veritable storm of insects. The plague of frogs is introduced with a palpably Bavian shot of several frogs, silhouetted in a glass bowl filled with water tinted with a strong magenta light. Bava shot a great deal of footage for the plague sequences, but De Bosio reduced it to a minimum in the editing, and was particularly merciless with shots that might have been too fantastic in execution, as these were divergent from his central thesis.

Bava worked very closely with the production's director of photography Marcello Gatti, who had assisted him more than ten years earlier on Le meraviglie di Aladino. "Listen," Gatti says, "Bava was one of the greatest geniuses in the whole history of Italian cinema. Nobody had the ability to do certain technical things like he did! We followed his instructions and tried to figure out what he was doing in certain shots, but we never really understood what the hell he was doing—we just waited for the dailies to finally discover what we had really shot! He was great when we shot the parting of the Red Sea [sic] for Moses. He did a series of drawings, explaining to me everything about every single shot that we had to do, including a series of incomprehensible—for us!—close-ups of high and low tides, shot at certain precise times of day. He explained all of this with scientific precision, as though every detail was perfectly clear in his mind, even though his requests seemed very strange to us. Then he worked by himself on the editing of this footage and the final result was—the parting of the Red Sea! Incredible!"

Roy Bava remembers that "the parting of the sea was shot on a beach close to Lavigno called Coccia di Morto. They built some big slides to throw a lot of water down from a big container, and made shots of Egyptian troops riding with a lot of water falling down on them." These shots were then integrated into the final montage, sometimes as double exposures with shots of turbulent waves seeming to crash over the soldiers toppling from their mounts. A side view of the soldiers crossing the parted sea was also filmed, with actors on horseback riding along the very edge of the beach with the sea visible behind them; Bava shot this action on the top half of the full aperture frame, with the bottom half masked. He then masked the top half and filled the bottom half with a shot of tides rolling in a different direction.

Roy continues: "With Carlo Rambaldi, Mario also built some mechanical horses that could move by themselves, which were photographed crossing a scale miniature of the sea, which was built in a swimming pool at Safa Paladino. There was a little railway down the middle of the pool, with a lot of these little soldiers. On one side, they had built a little cliff that was one of the two shores of the Nile, with trees, and the railway went slightly underwater. There were also huge fans to create the waves on either side of the pool. The little soldiers were toy soldiers, just like you would buy for children in a store, but Mario modified them—their costumes and weapons—to look like Egyptians. When he was busy creating miniatures, he very often tried to involve me, by having me paint the little puppets or cutting the fabrics for their robes. When he was finished, he gave some of the surviving soldiers to me, as a gift. They were really very good, even the very small ones. Unfortunately, I don't know where they are now . . ." [4] The mechanical horses and their doll riders were submerged as water drums were emptied into the pool from both sides, whipped into waves by the fans. For the initial scene of the waters clearing a central path, the same process was repeated but filmed in reverse.

BAVA on location with Anthony Quayle and various crew members.

3 Ibid.

Bava also supervised some optical inserts for the film, some of which involved the small carving of a bird-headed stone idol that appears quite gigantic in the scenes it shares in blue-screen and forced perspective shots with actor Laurent Terzieff. He was also required to join the film crew on location in Israel, where he created the illusions of the storm atop Mt. Horab, a miniature Israeli village, the view of the city of Canaan in the distance, and other location-based effects shots. Though he is not credited as such, it is possible that Bava was also recruited to direct some second-unit footage to help keep the production on schedule. "He went to Israel for a few months," Georgia confirms. "In fact, it may have only been a few weeks, but it seemed like a long time to me!"

However long it really was, Bava's stay in Israel felt like an eternity to him, as well. He grew so bored on location that not even his usual distraction of bazzica scopa could sustain him, and he reportedly advanced to more compulsive forms of gambling.

"I never had a single problem with Mario," says Marcello Gatti, "but there was one little thing about him that made me nervous sometimes. Whenever we weren't working, he always wanted to bet—continuously! On anything! He would put 10,000 lire [$6.00] on the table and say, 'Come on, Marcello, let's bet . . . If the next person that comes around that corner is a woman, I win; if it's not, the money is yours.' And I would shout, 'Goddamn it, Mario! Can't you leave me alone sometimes and forget about your fucking bets?'"

GERMAN A2 poster.

Actress Irene Papas, who played the role of Moses' wife Zipporah, and remembered Bava from the days of filming Odissea. "He had been on the set of Odissea quite often," she told interviewer Kit J. Gavin, "always in discussions with director Franco Rossi. Bava was warm, very quiet, and a real gentleman. I met him again when we were making Moses the Lawgiver together, and I was very impressed by his ability. I told him that he had such vision that he should be making movies—not just assisting directors and doing the special effects. He laughed and embraced me, and told me that he had been making movies for a long time—both for himself and with other people's names on them. 'But I was always there,' he told me—with a twinkle in his eye."

Commentary

Moses the Lawgiver was one of Mario Bava's few commercially successful projects of the 1970s, though it was not viewed by many as a success for him. Nearly every review of the miniseries and its subsequent feature-length reduction that bothered to mention his contribution bemoaned the "uninspired" lack of spectacle in Bava's special effects, thus missing the entire point of the production. The miniseries, as a whole, received considerable critical acclaim, but the expectations of any new title in this genre, by critics and public, had been formed by a different kind of Biblical epic, so De Bosio's fresh approach was commonly perceived as an inability to compete on equal ground with the likes of DeMille.

Taken on its own terms as a humanistic, historical drama of how an oppressed people were driven toward freedom by the inner voices and dreams of one man, Moses the Lawgiver is an extraordinary, rich achievement. By making its characters believable, first and foremost, as people, with all their attendant flaws and inconsistencies and humor, it brings the true solemnity of religion within reach of its audience and helps us to better appreciate the terrible human cost of defining the tenets of a belief, tenets which today we feel free to embrace, overlook or disregard entirely. By making its characters more human and approachable, one might expect the religion espoused by the film to be similarly diluted or relaxed, but Moses the Lawgiver is one of the most inflexible, unforgiving and resolutely Old Testament of Biblical epics. A director as nakedly manipulative as DeMille would never have depicted Moses ordering the stoning to death of men who failed to observe the Sabbath, but it is absolutely necessary to De Bosio's vision of a man who loves the law of the Lord more than his own people, for whom he has surrendered everything. There are times when Moses' behavior invites the viewer to question his sanity, but his devotion—and his results—cannot be questioned.

The cast is exemplary, with Lancaster and Anthony Quayle giving performances that rank among their very best. The lesser-known Joseph Shiloach also deserves special mention as Dathan, whose contrary, spiteful, jeering voice is a source of refreshment in a genre that tends to over-reverence; his antagonism confronts the endlessly patient Moses with unattractive aspects of humankind that most anyone will find all too familiar. After Moses shepherds his people safely across the parted sea, Dathan enthusiastically commends his leadership, but when Moses denies his status as their leader, cautioning Dathan never to forget the Lord God, a slow zoom into Dathan's spurned expression underscores a crucial political fumble for Moses, which will lead to endless problems later on.

If the cast is memorable, this is due in part to Anthony Burgess, who gave them wonderful words to speak. Moses the Lawgiver may well be the most eloquent film of its kind, as it is hard to think of another religious film so wonderfully weighted with quotable wisdom:

> "A miracle, I suppose, is something you need, happening when you need it."

> "You've been recalled to reality, Moses."
> "Called. Not recalled."

> "Gratitude is not a word; it is the desire to keep saying the word."

Burgess' script also knows when to speak without speaking, as when the meeting of Moses and Aaron in the desert is underscored with the profundity "Add no word; it is the sign." At times, the profundity of Burgess' language puts the lie to Moses' protestations of being ineloquent and needing his brother to carry his voice to the people, but Quayle does proves himself even more adept at speaking with persuasive reason. The peak of Quayle's contribution is in his pained delineation of the ultimate truth that, while Aaron has the gift of speech, and the belief to follow and bring others along, he does not finally understand the Holy Word brought to him by his brother and cannot sustain the unity of this would-be nation in his absence.

Also gracing the film is a major score by Ennio Morricone, which was released as a soundtrack album at the time and has subsequently been issued as an expanded, two-CD deluxe edition. The main theme is a mournful, stirringly reverent piece accompanied by a deeply beautiful melisma by Gianna Spagnulo; it conveys all the striving, aspiration, and doubt of the story to come. There is also a recurring, exultant, slightly shrill vocal piece entitled "Israel" which is used to accompany moments of success and confirmation. The score includes a number of tribal songs, heavily percussive and reliant on voice and instruments of unusual antiquity. While not one of Morricone's top scores as a whole, the two main cues are standouts in his discography and commonly included in anthologies of his best work.

As for Mario Bava's contribution to the film, it is more successfully realized than may be apparent at first or even second glance. By all accounts, he worked a great deal on the production, but his work is not as evident to the eye as one would expect. Bava did take some disappointing short cuts, such as the use of stock footage to depict the pillar of clouds (a dust devil) and the onset of pestilence (cicada infestation), but this was De Bosio's call; he was determined to de-emphasize traditional movie special effects while aiming for plausible explanations for the phenomena covered by the story. In cases like this, Bava's know-how was more archival than special effects-related. Other contributions, like the addition of Mt. Horab to shots filmed outside the Sinai peninsula, or the long-shot of Canaan nestled in a peaceful valley, are technically impeccable and as invisible to most viewers as they were meant to be. In those scenes where Bava's effects are most elaborate, such as the parting of the sea (which is never actually called the Red Sea or the Sea of Reeds), the results are excellent in some respects, but overdone in others. The use of double exposures to increase the presence of water in the shots of the Egyptian soldiers falling off their mounts into the sea seems unnecessary; the overlays accentuate an artifice that does not exist in the basic effect. Only in the sequences of the curse of frogs, and Moses witnessing the transformation of his rod and hand, stand out as being executed in true Bavian style.

This does not change the essential fact that Moses the Lawgiver is one of the finest films to carry Bava's name, even if—in the end—his presence is not so strongly felt.

US campaign poster art.

Moses The Feature

After the Moses the Lawgiver miniseries was completed, the producers decided to generate additional profits by following in the footsteps of Odissea and making a condensed, feature-length version available for theatrical release.

Titled simply Moses, the film was shortened to approximately 142 minutes and lost many of the miniseries' most compelling scenes, including Aaron's dream-inspired trek through the desert to meet his long-lost brother, and Moses' soliloquy as he walks through the streets of Pitom, his expressions of self-doubt contrasted with backgrounded friezes of lust and evil among his own people (children fighting and coveting one another's possessions, couples fornicating). It also contained quite a few rough edges. In the miniseries, as young Moses interferes with an Egyptian's whipping of an Israelite slave, he shouts, "I said, stop it!" In the feature version, Moses offers no vocal protest, though it was precisely this daring that made Moses legendary among his native people. By the same token, later, when the members of the exodus get lost in the desert, one of Moses' followers admonishes him, "You said you knew this place as well as you know the back of your hand"—but the earlier line referenced is no longer present. The stately narration of Richard Johnson—a constant in the original production that gave it much of its warmth and nobility—disappears from the feature version for long stretches; it is heard mostly during the first and final half hours.

4 Roy Bava, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

When Moses was released in America by Avco-Embassy Pictures—the Joseph E. Levine company founded on the success of Hercules and Hercules Unchained in the 1950s—some critics noted the presence of additional violence and glimpsed nudity in the PG-rated release, but these, too, judging from the film as it appears on videocassette, were illusory. On the contrary, the theatrical version contained none of the scenes of Yokebed breast-feeding the infant Moses, nor the scene introducing Dathan, as he interrupts an Egyptian caught in the act of raping his wife—which had also been omitted from the CBS premiere, but were subsequently reinstated for the miniseries' TV syndication broadcasts. While Avco-Embassy's domestic prints were issued in standard monaural sound, the prints distributed in Great Britain by ITC were reportedly graced with four-channel stereo that the company's ads trumpeted as "Super Spectrasound."

"Pit.," reviewing the condensed feature version for Variety, reported: "Moses is another attempt at compressing a big slice of Biblical drama, and once again the inevitable result is superficial storytelling. The Avco-Embassy release . . . has Burt Lancaster in a restrained and sometimes moving portrayal . . . whether the market is ripe again for a Biblical epic is sheer guesswork. The judgment here is for an indicated strategy of saturation playoff primed with heavy promotion, with the film's PG rating as a positive factor for some situations . . . pic strikes a reasonable balance between spectacle and narrative intimacy . . . Marcello Gatti's camera direction is at its best covering the desert and mountain terrain. Mario Bava's special effects are fine, notably his parting of the waters—more realistic than predecessor efforts."[5]

Baby Kong

Shortly after the broadcast of Moses the Lawgiver, Mario Bava was approached by Dino De Laurentiis, who offered him $100,000—probably more money than had been waved under his nose in his entire life—to come to the United States and supervise the special effects unit of his proposed $24,000,000 remake of King Kong for Paramount.

ORIGINAL promotional art by Enrico DeSeta.

Bava turned the offer down, recommending in his stead Carlo Rambaldi, who seized the offer with both hands. Rambaldi's work on the picture was highly controversial; $2,000,000 was eventually spent on the creation of a life-sized robotic Kong that failed to work on cue and would ultimately appear onscreen for a single shot. When Rambaldi won the Academy Award for Best Special Effects, stop-motion animator Jim Danforth (7 Faces of Dr. Lao, When Dinosaurs Ruled the Earth) resigned from the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences in protest. If the Oscar deserved to go to anyone, it was Los Angeles-based makeup artist Rick Baker, who wore a remarkably articulated ape costume of his own creation for 99% of Kong's appearances in the picture. In 1981, Baker became the first-ever recipient of the Academy Award for Best Makeup, for his work on John Landis' An American Werewolf in London.[6] As for Rambaldi, he subsequently redeemed himself with magnificent animatronic contributions to Steven Spielberg's Close Encounters of the Third Kind (1977) and E.T. The Extra-Terrestrial (1982). One can't help but speculate that, had Bava accepted De Laurentiis' invitation, Rambaldi's opportunities to contribute to these American classics might well have become Bava's.

When his grandson Roy asked Mario why he didn't accept De Laurentiis' offer, Bava reasoned, "I don't like to fly"—but his reasons ran deeper. "If you knew him," says Luigi Cozzi, "you would understand why Mario couldn't have worked elsewhere. He was not an international guy. He was so deeply Roman-rooted, the way he spoke was with such a strong Roman accent, it was difficult to imagine him anywhere else—not even in northern Italy! It really wasn't because of his age, it was because of the way he was."

Lamberto Bava begs to differ: "It's not that my father was scared to fly—in fact, he loved to travel—but he wasn't thrilled about the idea of spending six months in some foreign place. He was happy to stay at home with his books, near the fireplace, with my mother in the room nearby. His careerism was the opposite of some other film people."

While De Laurentiis' King Kong was still in production, the hype surrounding the picture inspired a number of low-budget filmmakers to announce or proceed with giant ape sagas told on a smaller scale. Universal was the first to announce a competing feature, The Legend of King Kong, which was advertised as coming but ultimately never made. The void was subsequently filled by Frank Agrama's parody Queen Kong, Paul Leder's *A*P*E and even a Mexican film, Las Muñecas del King Kong, all made between 1976 and 1978. It was in the summer of 1976 that Mario Bava was approached by Luigi Borghese, a producer affiliated with 3B Cinematografica, who wanted to make a film that would not only ride this bandwagon, but proceed it. Borghese's plan was to make a film that could beat King Kong's projected December release by opening in November.

A screenplay was written, locations were scouted on the island of Ponza, and Bava drew more than twenty pages of storyboards for the production. 3B Cinematografica took advantage of the growing celebrity surrounding Renato Cestiè by signing the 14-year-old singing idol to star. Already a veteran of nearly twenty features, the blonde, freckle-nosed Cestiè had worked with Bava once before, pulling the trigger on Claudine Auger and Luigi Pistilli at the end of Ecologia del delitto.

In the hope of attracting international distribution deals, 3B Cinematografica produced a four-color flyer announcing the production for that year's MIFED film buyers market. A full-page advertisement utilizing the same promotional art also appeared in the October 20, 1976 issue of Variety. The Baby Kong flyer is such a riot of bad English and other misdeeds that it isn't surprising that the project never got off the ground. Identifying itself as "The Italian Reply to American Productions," it boasts that the film will be "Starring by: A FANTASTIC CHIMPANZEE—RENATO CESTIÈ," which not only manages to give the film's intended star second billing to a chimp but fails to distinguish between the two. Furthermore, as if admitting that few outside Italy would know Cestiè's name, the brochure explains him as "the same actor boy of many Italian dramatic films." (We haven't even reached the synopsis, and the document is already a catastrophe.) What follows is the film's synopsis, exactly as it appears in English on the document. By reproducing it verbatim, my intention is not to ridicule the copywriter's poor command of English, but to better illustrate how the concept's unfortunate mishandling contributed to its inevitable defeat:

Erik is a 12-year-old boy who lives with his mother, Mrs. Helen, in a little island in Aegeus where she works as English citizen attached to the Weather-Station.

Erik spends most of his time with his best friend, Baby—a chimpanzee and they organize to play jokes on the natives.

The island is a vulcan and the natives live on the sole possible side, where there is a little sea-port where a ferry-boat arrives once in a month.

In the hardest side of the islands, among fumaroles, rocks and grottos, a strange sciencist lives: Mr. Rupert Allenkraab and his servant, Mathias.

They live near an ancient Greek templus, on the highest hill. When they arrive to the village, once in a while for supplyings, their behaviours provoke curiosity everywhere, as it is impossible to understand what these two fellows really do so far away and alone. The natives say that Allenkraab is a strange scientist and somebody assures that he makes very strange experiments on animals and plants; and all that scares the inhabitants.

Intact Allenkraab has created animals that act as plants and plants that "move" and "live" as animals but the dream of the scientist is to prove his theory on the body of an animal, the nearest to the mankind, therefore he always watches "Baby" for capturing. He and his servant Mathias are waiting for a good circumstance to catch the chimpanzee.

A day there is a violent storm and all the inhabitants refuge into the houses; Erik is not island for studying. The scientist and his servant take this occasion and capture Baby and fire the shunty of the animal. When Erik turns back to the island, his mother says all the story but supposing that a rainbow distroyed the shunty and quite surely the animal dead in the fire. But the little Erik does not find the mortal remains of the animal therefore he believes that Baby is alive. His suspicious is in the exact way: the scientist. But Mathias captures the boy and consigned to Allenkraab who beats violentely Erik. Erik shuts for grief and a terrific yell replies from a grotto. Suddenly everything around has been destroyed and flight away and a monster appears but with Baby face. Allenkraab and Mathias refuges themselves into the laboratory. The scientist infact has not able to control the growth of the animal. Erik is scared but realizes that the monster is Baby, then he shuts "Allo, Baby!"

Immediately the monster has an intelligent lamp on his eyes; he reminds the boy and hand Erik near his face. There is a very touching moment between Baby and Erik. They are both happy to be back together. But Allenkraab comes out from the laboratory and handling a weapon and fire against the monster.

The shots noises Baby who has a destroying reaction; with a single cloup he cancels the laboratory and tre scientist.

Baby now is in danger having killed Allenkraab and Erik convinces him to refuge into a grotto also because all the village will persecute him as he has destroyed buildings, streets, killed animals. Baby infact doesn't realize how much strong he is and this fact brings him to provoke disasters on his passage.

There is a lot of action of suspense; Erik trying to save Baby and the inhabitants to catch him with any kind of weapons.

Most of the dangers made by Baby happen as a joke for the animal as he reminds when he was playing with Erik when he was normal tall. Cars destroyed, boats taken on the air with people in and then killed. There is terror on the island also because the normal weapons cannot stop him. It is impossible to call other islands as the radio station has been destroyed.

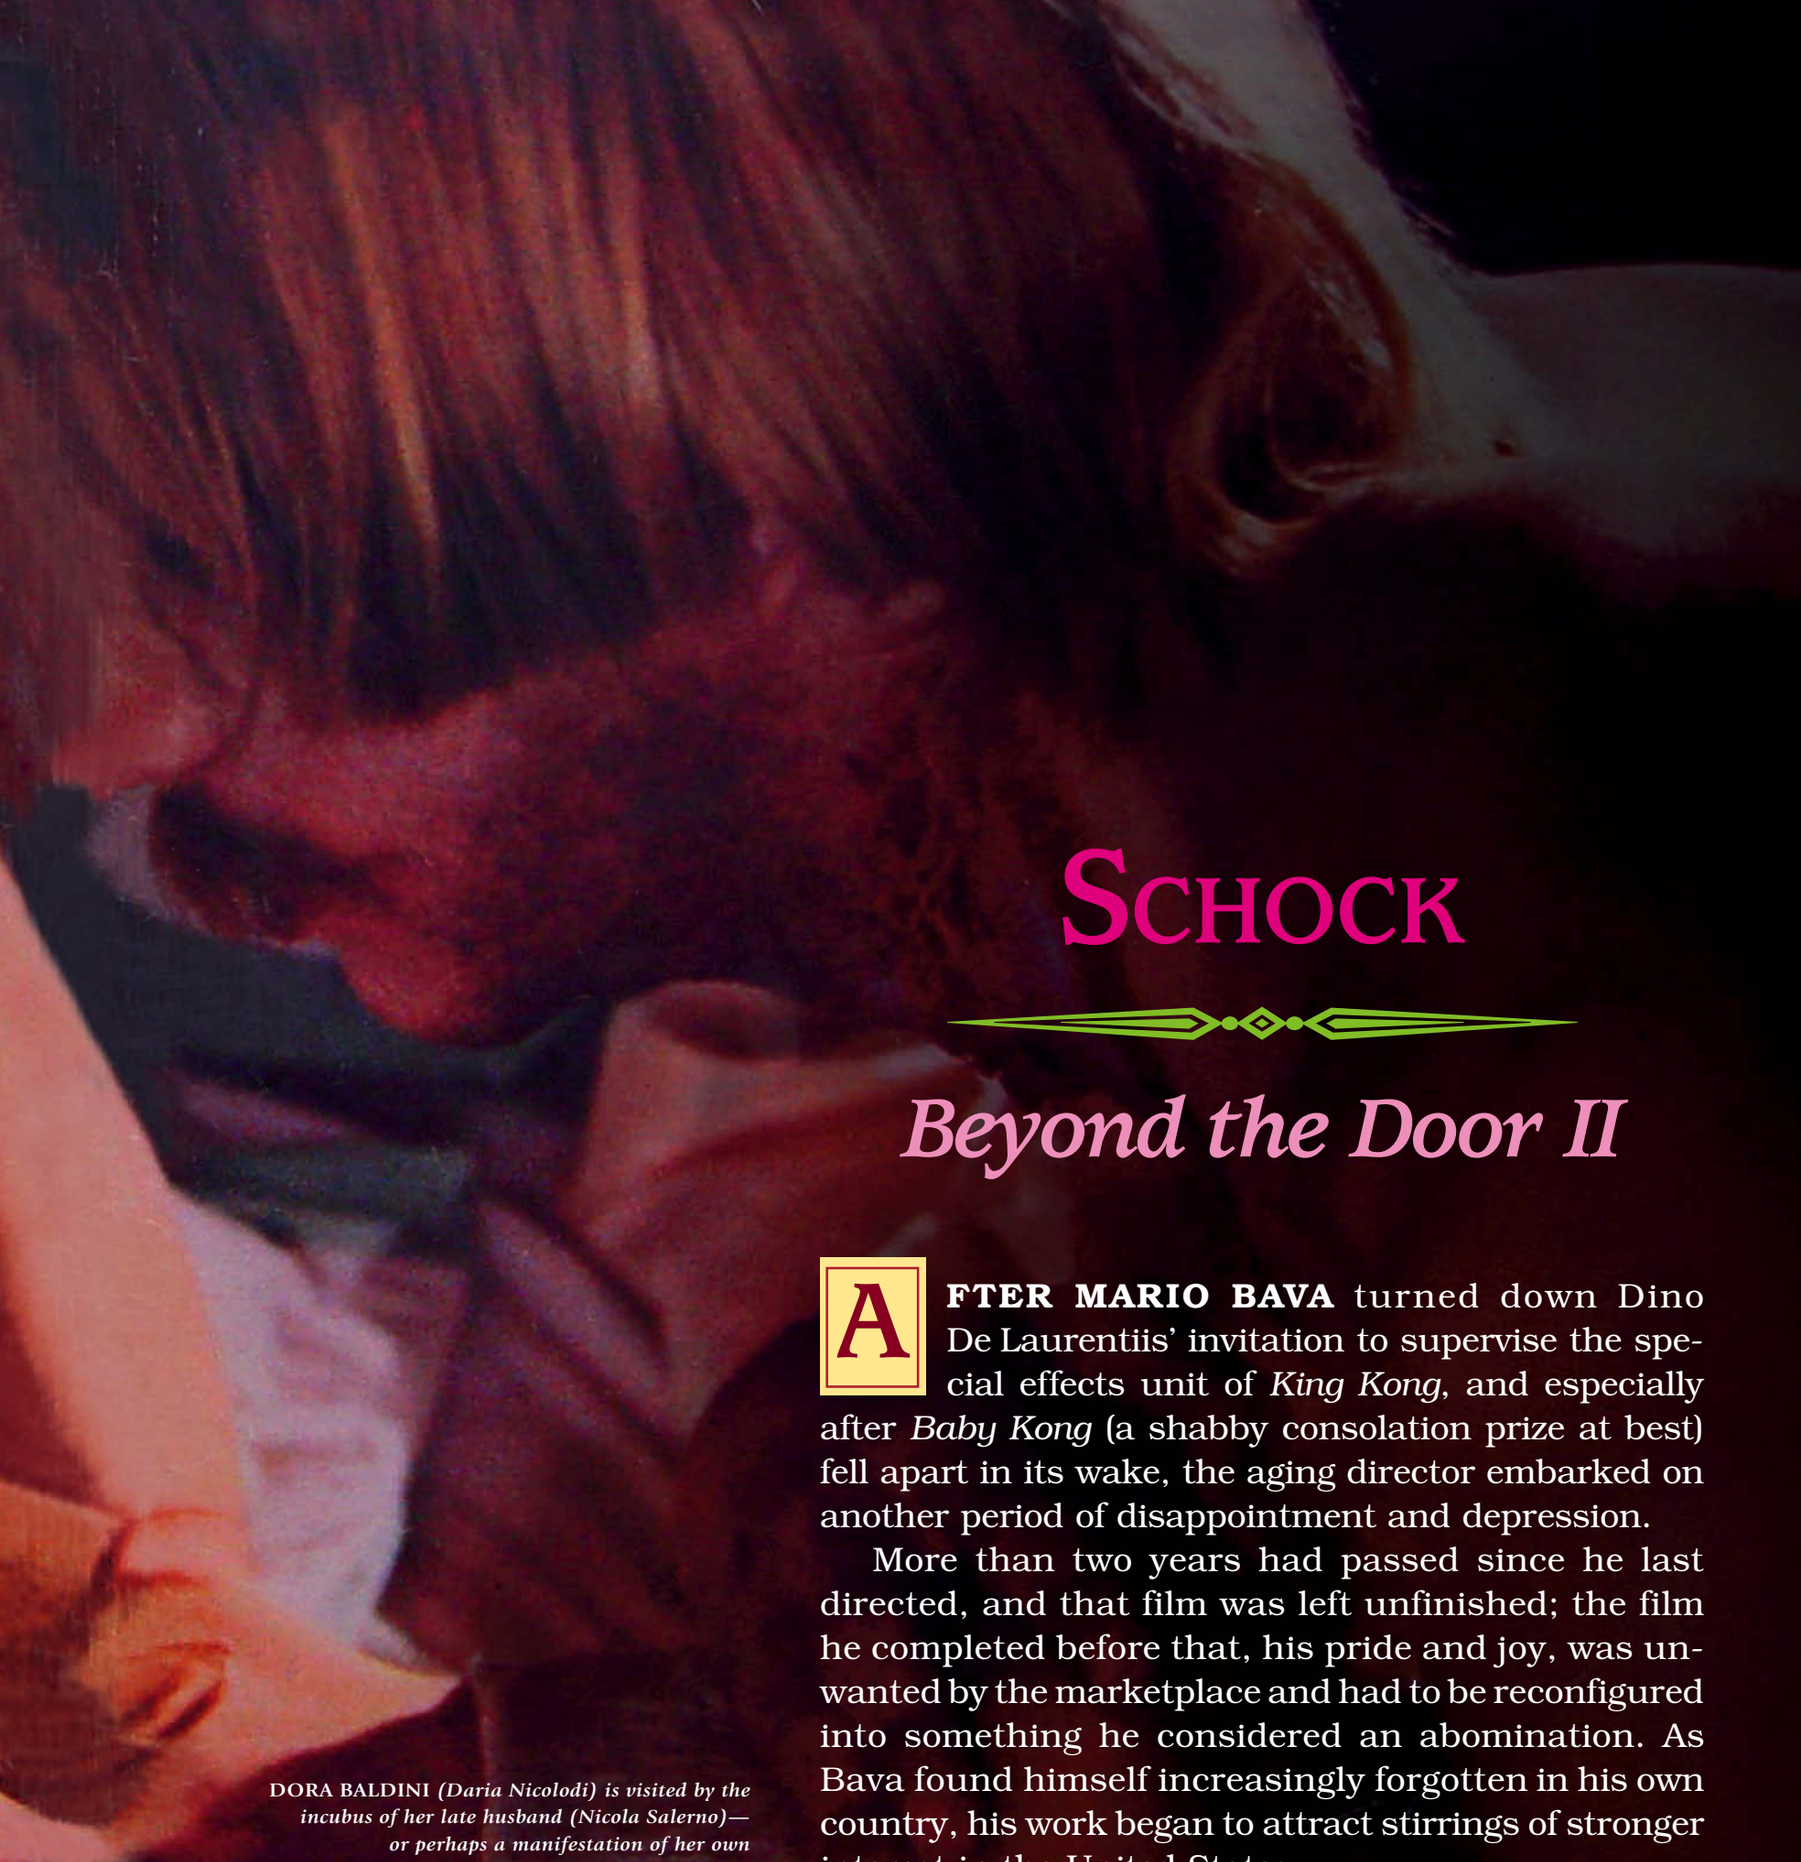
The sole way to kill the monster is to bomb his refuge so that all the mountain shall be his tomb. Erik refuses to contribute.

By the way everything is ready for the explosion. Erik does not know anything about this further tentative to kill Baby. The area around the grotto is full of soldiers ready to make explosion. Erik realizes that Baby now is really in danger. The boy now is running towards the grotto among the initial explosion and fire. Hundreds of rocks are burying the monster, who resists to let Erik to escape and save himself. As Baby sees that Erik is save, relaxes in the last breath and dies among explosion and eruptions of the vulcano waked up.

The monster has been killed as victim of human presumptuousness.

Locations were scouted, miniatures were built, but shortly before the giant arm of Baby Kong was due to be constructed, Luigi Borghese decided not to proceed with the filming. "When I went to America," he told the Italian magazine Nocturno, "De Laurentiis told me that it was better not to do Baby Kong. He told me to send him a number of scripts, that he would produce a film for me, but nothing happened. It was just idle talk." [7]

Reading the film's synopsis, one can't help feeling that Baby Kong was a disaster waiting to happen. If it had been made, chances are that it would now be regarded as an unfortunate disruption of the otherwise daring, adventurous works that composed Bava's final decade as a director. The title predisposes one to expect a comic spoof—a sort of Honey, I Blew Up the Chimp—but the intention was obviously to play the story at least somewhat straight, with Baby's oblivious rampage resulting in a number of accidental deaths. Of course, this is not to say that it couldn't have become a comedy; with Bava, there is every possibility that the script would be regarded as nothing more than a blueprint, a narrative foundation from which to improvise, or that it might even be discarded altogether. Certainly, the film would have given Bava the opportunity to demonstrate what could still be achieved with his "magic lantern" brand of special effects—in fact, anyone familiar with Bava's other works can easily visualize how some of the trick shots described in the synopsis would have looked onscreen: the ancient Greek temples on the hilltop near Allenkraab's laboratory, the emergence of Baby Kong from the whorling smoke of the grotto, the toy cars in Baby's hairy grip as the chimp ambles down the street of a miniature city, the actors inside those cars screaming against a blueback plate, the miniature explosions. All this, and bad late '70s dubbing, to boot.



Bava would have given the picture at least a memorable scene or two, but one seriously doubts that a concept as essentially old-fashioned as this (belonging more to the naïve mid-1960s of King Kong Escapes than to the post-Star Wars 1970s) could have been a commercial success. More importantly, had Bava proceeded with Baby Kong, it might have prevented him from making Schock or La Venere d'Ille or both, which would have been a very great loss.

5 Pit., Variety, February 26, 1976, 22.

6 Earlier special Oscars had been awarded to William Tuttle and John Chambers for their respective makeups for 7 Faces of Dr. Lau and Planet of the Apes.

7 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

DORA BALDINI (Daria Nicolodi) is visited by the incubus of her late husband (Nicola Salerno)—or perhaps a manifestation of her own murderous guilt—in SCHOCK.

SCHOCK

Beyond the Door II

AFTER MARIO BAVA turned down Dino De Laurentiis' invitation to supervise the special effects unit of King Kong, and especially after Baby Kong (a shabby consolation prize at best) fell apart in its wake, the aging director embarked on another period of disappointment and depression.

More than two years had passed since he last directed, and that film was left unfinished; the film he completed before that, his pride and joy, was unwanted by the marketplace and had to be reconfigured into something he considered an abomination. As Bava found himself increasingly forgotten in his own country, his work began to attract stirrings of stronger interest in the United States.

In 1975 the American horror film fanzine Photon published the first substantial essay in English about his films: "Mario Bava: The Illusion of Reality," written by Alain Silver and James Ursini. [1] In his editorial "Emanations," Photon's Mark Frank related: "Our Italian correspondent, Luigi Cozzi, was able to visit Bava shortly before the completion of this issue. His report makes the unfortunate observation that "the years have not been kind to the aging director. Bava has been replaced by Dario Argento as Italy's king of terror, with the former's films considered old-fashioned and dated. He confesses to having made most of his movies out of dire financial need, despite the fact that he recognized them to be poorly written with ridiculous stories." [2]

During the period of 1976–77, Bava was occasionally asked by colleagues for technical advice—for example, director Pupi Avati called him while preparing his film Bordella (1976) for pointers about the best and most economical means of creating the illusion of an invisible man—but otherwise he seems to have spent the better part of these two years out of work.

Without the therapeutic distraction of his vocation, Bava became embittered about the Italian cinema that was continuing without him, and he vented some of his harsh feelings in a 1977 interview with the French newspaper Libération (which wasn't published until after his death). Asked to share his views on the contemporary Italian cinema, Bava held nothing back: "If you mean those orphans of Rossellini who clog the streets of Rome shooting in Super 8mm, it's a moribund cinema. If you mean the Italian cinema that is known in France, that's just the mainstream cinema: Rosi's imitation thrillers, Comencini's phony melodramas, the trivial fictions of Scola, and Fellini's baroque forgeries . . . It's all been watered down to make it more palatable to the wretched masses who don't get the joke of the plastic sea in Casanova because they actually believe it's real." [3]

Mario Bava's next (and final) theatrical feature came about as a result of his son Lamberto's determination to raise his father out of his slump. "He wasn't working or doing anything," Lamberto remembers. "Also, because he wasn't a writer, and would rather do anything than write, he had no project. So I resolved to do whatever I could to provide my father with a project."

ONE of Dora's housewarming party guests is her former psychiatrist Dr. Aldo Spedini, played by Ivan Rassimov.

Schock

Working title: Al 33 di via Orologio fa sempre freddo,
"It's Always Cold at 33 Via Orologio"
Filmed at Vides S.p.a. (Rome) and on location
Spring 1977
First released: August 12, 1977
Eastmancolor, 1.85:1, 93 minutes

Production: Laser Film S.r.l. Producer: Turi Vasile. Associate producer: Ugo Valenti. Directors: Mario Bava and (uncredited) Lamberto Bava. Assistant director: Lamberto Bava. Story and screenplay: Lamberto Bava, Francesco Barbieri, Paolo Briganti [Alessandro Parenzo], Dardano Sacchetti. Continuity: Rosanna Rocchi. Director of photography: Alberto Spagnoli, A.I.C. Camera operator: Giuseppe Maccari, A.I.C. Second assistant camera: Giuseppe Alberti. Unit manager: Naldo Nibbi. Art direction: Francesco Vanorio. Assistant art director: Nicola Salerno. Special effects: Carlo Rambaldi. Wardrobe: Massimo Lentini, Franca Lulli. Makeup: Maria Luisa Tilli. Production manager: Giuseppe Mangogna. Grip: Sergio Serantoni. Gaffer: Sante Federici. Editor: Roberto Sterbini. Assistant editors: Sandro Broglio, Mario Recupito. Music: I Libra. Sound: Pietro Spadoni. Stills: Giuliana De Rossi. Distributor: Titanus.

Daria Nicolodi (Dora Baldini), John Steiner (Bruno), David Colin Jr. (Marco), Ivan Rassimov (Dr. Aldo Spedini), Nicola Salerno (Carlo). Uncredited: Paul Costello (man at party).

France: Les Démons de la Nuit, "Demons of the Night"
Japan: The Shock, Herald Films
Spain: Shock, Hispamex Films S.A., Technicolor
UK: The Shock, Eagle Films, 8/17/80, 86m 33s, Certificate "X," passed with no cuts
US: Beyond the Door II, Film Ventures International, Color by Deluxe, 4/79, 87m

Mario's semi-retirement had already pushed Lamberto into pursuing employment outside the family. In 1974, he worked as assistant director on Mario Lanfranchi's Il bacio ("The Kiss"), an erotic period piece starring Martine Beswick, and in 1975, he sold an original screen story that became Ruggero Deodato's Un'ondata di piacere/Waves of Lust. This erotic thriller starred John Steiner and Elizabeth Turner as a decadent couple who invite another twosome (Silvia Dionisio and Al Cliver) to accompany them on a yacht cruise for a ménage a quatre, not suspecting that they have murder on their minds. Lamberto got along very well with Deodato, whose primary work during this period was in television commercials, and subsequently joined his company as a production assistant. "He was without a doubt the most competent assistant I ever had," Deodato enthused, "and when I returned to filmmaking, we continued our association and made four or five films together." [4]

Primary among those films are Deodato's notorious, but undeniably accomplished Ultimo mondo cannibale/The Last Survivor a.k.a. Jungle Holocaust (1977) and Cannibal Holocaust (1980). Unlike his travel-wary father, Lamberto had no trepidation about following Deodato into the jungle hells of Kuala Lumpur in Malaysia, or to Mindanao in the Philippines. "I remember while shooting Ultimo mondo cannibale, [Lamberto] was bitten by a snake and we had to race him to a hospital by canoe," Deodato laughed. "We didn't know that the Indios had removed the snake's venom before the shoot!" [5]

Upon Lamberto's return to Rome, Mario would have just cause for taunting his son's adventurousness in travel—but something more than work came of the experience. While working as Deodato's assistant, Lamberto met and fell in love with script girl Rossanna Rocchi, who would become his second wife.

Safely returned to Rome, Lamberto turned his thoughts to generating a project for his father. There were a couple of stillborn projects dating from the time immediately following the catastrophe of Cani arrabbiati, which Mario had worked up with Cesare Frugoni and Alessandro Parenzo. One was a film on genetic mutations called L'uomo topo ("The Rat Man"), an idea proposed by a film producer named Francesco Merli. "Bava's intention was to realize it using subliminal techniques, never showing the monster," Frugoni recalls. "It was a very complicated story, with an atmosphere typical of the late 19th century, very dark. It was set in modern times, but there was a mood à la Arséne Lupin; it was a French nocturne, but it would have to be shot in a Pasolinian way, very hard, in slums and awful dumping grounds. A strange operation, indeed."

More to Lamberto's liking was a project entitled Radici di paura ("Roots of Fear"), which was based on Giungla domestica ("Domestic Jungle"), a science fiction novel by Gilda Musa. Cesare Frugoni remembers the premise: "A botanist is killed in his greenhouse by a gang of robbers, and his plants—which have souls and are able to express their feelings—trap these criminals inside the greenhouse, causing them to die of asphyxiation and, after having breathed all the air, dying themselves. It was a very expensive movie, kind of a Spielbergian idea, so to speak. This was a project that Mario owned completely; he often spoke about it. He had also collected extensive material on the possibility of life and relationships between plants." Lamberto worked his father's pooled ideas for the project into a treatment and succeeded in interesting Titanus in the project.

Somehow Titanus could never locate the funding to push Radici di paura forward, so Lamberto turned his attention to updating Dardano Sacchetti's 1972 screenplay for Al 33 di via Orologio fa sempre freddo ("It's Always Cold at 33 Via Orologio"), his liberal adaptation of Hillary Waugh's The Shadow Guest. Lamberto toiled on the script at night, after putting in full days at Deodato's advertising agency.

"Lamberto worked on the screenplay for almost two months, locked in his study," his son Roy remembers. "It was my first screenplay, the first one I signed with my own name," Lamberto notes. "From time to time, my father called me or came to visit, saying: 'Read this fantastic story that I've found.' One of the stories he suggested was 'The Horla' by [Guy de] Maupassant, and perhaps the first seeds of Schock were sown there. I remember that [Mario] told me that he liked very much the idea that the furniture was moving about and was the protagonist of the story. My father didn't care much for actors and was always saying that he would love to make a film in which the objects were the actors." The finished script, retitled La casa 8 ("House Number 8," the number signifying infinity), was acquired by producer Turi Vasile of Laser Film. By the time it went before the cameras, the screenplay would be credited to different writers: Lamberto Bava, Francesco Barbieri, Dardano Sacchetti, and Paolo Briganti, the latter a pseudonym for Alessandro Parenzo. ("I've signed many films as Paolo Briganti," Parenzo confesses. "It was the name of a friend of mine. I don't remember what kind of game he lost, but we had a bet and he lost. I was looking for an alias, so I took his name—I won it!") According to Lamberto, he wrote the script "with Sacchetti," but it "was later revised several times."[6] Sacchetti, on the other hand, remembers writing the script that became Schock[7] immediately after Ecologia del delitto in 1971, "but it was not made until 1977, after many modifications had been made to my original scenario."[8]

To trace the development of Mario Bava's final theatrical feature, we must go back to The Shadow Guest . . . but first, it will be useful to be forearmed with the synopsis of the film at hand.

Synopsis

After being away for seven years, Dora Baldini returns to the house where she once lived with her husband Carlo (a suicide), accompanied by their young son Marco, and her new husband Bruno, an airline pilot. Marco feels an immediate, strange bond to the place, and is drawn to the cellar in particular, which Bruno promptly locks. Marco asks his parents if they "are going to live here forever," which inspire thoughts of inevitable death in both parents. When they ask why he wants to know, he replies, "Just in case anyone asks me."

While cleaning the house, Dora finds the icy blue fingers of a large porcelain hand buried in the cushions of the sofa. She removes it and places it on a mirrored shelf unit, while Bruno builds a swing for Marco on a tree in the yard. That night, Marco insists on sleeping with the light on. Dora turns his light off after he falls asleep, but as she and Bruno make love on the living

DORA is concerned about the aberrant behavior of her sensitive son Marco (David Colin Jr.).

1 The essay has been reprinted many times, and was later amended, updated, and retitled ("Mario Bava and the Baroque Image") for its appearance in Silver/Ursini's book The Vampire Film, now in its third edition from Limelight Books.

2 Mark Frank, "Emanations," Photon 26, 1975, 4.

3 Levin Safao, Libération, May 5, 1980.

4 Luca M. Palmerini and Gaetano Mistretta, Spaghetti Nightmares (Rome, Italy: M&P Edizone, 1996), 56.

5 Ibid.

6 Palmerini and Mistretta, 27.

7 The film is sometimes misidentified in reference sources as Schock (Transfert-Suspence-Hypnos), which is based on a misreading of the film's original poster art, connecting the title and its underlining ad copy—much in the same way that Lucio Fulci's L'Aldila/The Beyond is sometimes incorrectly referenced as . . . E Tu Vivrai nel Terrore! L'Aldila. Strangely, there are no such words as "transfert," "hypnos," etc. in Italian, though they do exist in French. Also, the Italian word for "shock" is "shock," without the additional letter C found on the Italian posters.

8 Palmerini and Mistretta, 131.

room sofa, Marco awakens and curses the animal sounds of their passion: "Pigs!" The porcelain hand shelved above the couple abruptly shifts, threatening to fall on the lovers.

The next day, while playing in the yard, Marco falls atop Dora and pantomimes intercourse with her. Dora distracts the child with a trip to the park, where they see a puppet show about ghosts, a subject that fascinates Marco. Afterwards, while visiting the seashore, Marco asks why his real father never comes to see him any more. Dora explains that Carlo was a great adventurer who liked to visit strange, faraway places; she explains that he is dead, and Death is the ultimate voyage from which we never return. That night, in Bruno's absence, Dora allows Marco to sleep in her bed. In the night, Marco wakes, rises, and looks through the window at his swing, which seems to move by itself. Returning to bed, Marco removes the sheet from his sleeping mother's body and reaches out. She is fondled by the rotting hands of a dead, adult male.

Dora hosts a housewarming party and invites some old friends, to Marco's disapproval. He expresses dislike of her friends, whom he has never met. Bruno returns home and greets Marco warmly. ("Been taking care of your mother for me?") That night, at the party, Dora talks briefly to her former psychiatrist, Dr. Aldo Spedini, and other guests gossip about how she hardly seems the type who would drive a man to suicide, though Carlo was crazy and on the needle well before he met her. Marco's strange behavior comes to a head: He seems resentful of Bruno ("He's not my father," he corrects a guest, "he's my mother's second husband") and reacts to a kiss between Dora and Bruno by swearing to Dora that he must kill her. Dora sees Marco brooding outside on his swing. The motions of the swing awaken thoughts of a metronome, leading to delirious images of laughing pianos, images of syringes, unpleasant memories of Carlo.

JOHN Steiner as Bruno, framed by an ominous piece of sculpture.

The next day, Dora cuts her finger on the piano and finds a razor blade secreted between the keys. She finds Marco exiting the cellar, which had been locked. Marco watches Dora in the shower and steals a pair of her panties. Later, Dora finds Marco in the cellar, huddled against a brick wall. ("My God, your skin's like ice!") She rushes the boy into a warm bed. Looking for something to cover him, she finds her panties slashed to ribbons. Marco then jumps up and down, boasting of having fooled her, and runs away. Dora pursues him and trips over a garden rake on the lawn, hallucinating that the rake is a dead hand clutching at her ankle.

Marco cuts Bruno's picture from a portrait of him and Dora. Dora is angry with Bruno for having talked her out of selling the house, and they discuss her past nervous breakdown. Bruno tries to talk to Marco about why he's tormenting his mother, but the boy insists that he is innocent of wrongdoing: "She's changed a lot since we've moved here . . . she's no fun any more."

While Bruno busies himself with changing the lock on the cellar, Dora wakes from a nap in a cold sweat and is approached by a sliding, ominous wardrobe cabinet. The knob of the bedroom door turns, and the dead hand reaches inside, a cutting blade in its grip. She forces the hand outside the door and locks it, but when she pulls back the curtain from her window to escape, the window is bricked over—identical to the brick wall in the cellar!

WHILE playing with Marco outdoors, Dora trips over a rake—and imagines that a decomposing hand is clutching at her leg.

The blade returns, hovering in midair, swooping and slashing at her. It cuts her nightgown, and she awakens with a start. It was a dream . . . or was it? Her nightgown is torn.

The next morning, Bruno departs for a flight to London. When Dora says, "See you tonight," Bruno replies, "Unless the plane crashes!" Dora is upset by his humor, and at that moment, she is nearly decapitated by the window screen as the sash cord frays in two, apparently under Marco's fierce concentration. That afternoon, Marco attaches the cutout of Bruno's head to his swing and gives it a push; simultaneously, Bruno's flight experiences extreme turbulence. A bouquet of seven roses arrives for Dora, but she is upset when she reads the card, made out in a child's handwriting: "Una per ogni anno: nonostante tutto sei ancora mia." ("One for every year: in spite of everything, you will always be mine.") Bruno calls; he is grounded in London until it can be discovered what went wrong with his jet.

Dora takes Marco to her former psychiatrist, Dr. Spedini, who has the boy draw a couple of pictures. He explains to Dora that the drawings show him to be "balanced, and quite mature for his age," though a picture of him and his mother indicates that "the child needs more affection, or feels rejected." Thus, the blame is turned on Dora. Spedini discusses in brief some of her past history, including her six months in a sanatorium, which included electro-shock therapy.

Marco takes a pair of scissors to a doll's throat, just as Dora cuts her hand on a broken medicine bottle. Dora thinks she hears someone playing the piano and goes downstairs; there is no one there, but a record has finished playing on the turntable. She sees what appears to be blood on the keyboard—but, on second glance, it comes into focus as a rose petal from her dropped bouquet of flowers. As she reaches out to gather them, the piano lid slams down near her hand. She hears Marco calling "Mama," but when she runs to the stairs, she sees the "Mommy" mechanism that Marco has cut from his doll's throat walking down the stairs toward her. A child's drawings of a gruesome murder bespatter the floor. Marco seems to float toward her, tears in his eyes: "Why, Mama? Why did you kill Papa?" Suddenly, Dora's consciousness is filled with a memory of Carlo reaching toward her, over the porcelain hand, to inject her with heroin. She remembers killing him with the cutting blade.

"MAMA, I'll have to kill you!" threatens Marco at Dora's housewarming party.

On Bruno's return, Dora tearfully confesses to the murder, but Bruno insists that Carlo killed himself. ("Once he started on the needle, it was already the end of the line! You were only a victim!") Bruno sedates his hysterical wife, and she dreams once again of the brick wall, blood seeping through its thick mortar. Hand-like shadows pull her covers down, exposing her nude body, and she is ravished by the incubus of Carlo. Dora awakens, and the house itself seems to be revolting against her—appliances shock her, apparitions of Carlo in mirrors threaten her. As Marco lies in his own bed, his eyes open and discolored as though possessed. Dora drifts downstairs into the cellar, where she finds Bruno dismantling the brick wall with a pickaxe. She realizes that Carlo's body must be hidden there. Bruno explains that, when he found her in a trance above Carlo's dead body, he concealed her crime by interring the corpse behind the cellar wall and pushing Carlo's boat out to sea, knowing that he would be declared legally dead after seven years. Until this moment, Dora has suppressed the traumatic memory of the murder. Sounds of activity inside the wall attract Bruno, and seem to confirm Dora's fears that Carlo is still alive. "Don't touch him," she warns, and as Bruno peers inside the wall, she kills him with a pickaxe and dumps his body inside the wall. The true noisemaker within—a rat—escapes and races up her nightgown, terrifying Dora, before darting away.

Dora is now completely insane. She returns upstairs, where the porcelain hand creeps toward her from its shelf, falls, and shatters. She goes to Marco and finds Carlo, his throat slashed, in his bed. Marco runs toward her from the end of the hall and becomes Carlo. A falling chandelier knocks her downstairs into the cellar. Here, the animated armoire stalks her, backs her into a corner. The doors of the cabinet open, revealing the murder weapon, in the grip of the dead hand. It approaches her and cuts a fatal slash across her throat . . . while held in her own hand.

Outside, the boy happily stages a tea party with the ghost of his father. "Now what game shall we play?" Marco asks.

Background

The story of Schock originated with Hillary Waugh's The Shadow Guest, first published in 1971. Waugh's novel tells the story of an American architect, Howard Whelan, who falls in love with a young actress he discovers on the New York stage. He begins to date the young woman—Angela, a naturalized American citizen born in Britain—and after a whirlwind courtship, they marry. The project of a lifetime forces Howard and Angela to relocate to London, where the oppressive weather, isolation, and reliance on servants cause Angela to feel useless and self-conscious, and inspire a deep depression. Howard finds her the best available psychiatrist in Britain, a Dr. Armstrong, and she begins therapy—around the same time that her workaholic husband suffers a heart attack. With complete rest prescribed for him, and Dr. Armstrong's discovery of Angela's need to run a household, Angela begins to look for accommodation outside the city. She finds Heather Cottage two hours outside London, in the rustic coastal town of Wildhurst. The place has a strange ability to brighten Angela's darkened spirits, but Howard is appalled by its damp, depressing aspect. He is also incredulous that she managed to find the cottage, when it was so far out of her way; she admits to driving in a daze, and somehow finding herself there. Being more interested in Angela's psychological recovery than his own physical one, Howard agrees to lease it.

The Whelans soon discover that the cottage is haunted, according to local legend. Three years earlier, the only daughter of the Crimalins (the previous residents of Heather Cottage) was killed when she and her soldier boyfriend Theron Hastings drove off the bluff overlooking the coastline, after he failed to observe a steep turn in the precarious road outside the cottage gates. At night, the Whelans hear unpleasant laughter emanating from their downstairs rooms, and on the third anniversary of the Crimalin girl's death, they hear her fatal accident reenacted outside their home—though the phenomenon goes unheard by their neighbors. Worst of all is the sudden appearance of a shadowy male apparition on the grounds below their bedroom window, wearing a British soldier's overcoat. Angela is attracted to the mysterious visitor, but Howard feels a potent emanation from this "shadow guest" of pure evil.

When Angela begins having bad dreams about the dark figure seated at the walnut secretary desk downstairs, Howard and she investigate it, but they turn up nothing. A subsequent nightmare attunes the focus of her fears to a certain drawer, where Howard finds a hidden letter, dated 1944. Addressed to "Emmaline," it is a letter from a British soldier, reprimanding the woman for having married an American during his wartime absence, noting that he is aware that she's had a child by her Yank husband, and swearing to avenge her betrayal whether it be in this lifetime or the next. The letter is signed Theron Hastings—the name of the soldier who died in the car with the Crimalin girl three years ago. To make matters eerier, Angela tells Howard that her mother's name was Emmaline and that she was born in early 1944. Somehow, her thoughtless driving in the car that day brought her to the very cottage where her parents lived before they relocated to the United States, perhaps to escape the threats of her former suitor.

MARCO'S behavior becomes unmanageable after the family moves back to the house where his late father lived.

Howard does some more investigating and discovers that no physical trace of Theron Hastings was found in the wreckage. He is torn between two possibilities: (1) that Hastings' ghost is indeed bent on luring the child of his thwarted love to her death, or (2) that Hastings is still alive and committed to the same end. Howard sets a noose trap in the yard, to catch any tangible intruders. That same night, Angela is found walking in her sleep toward the bluff and, when Howard wakes her by gripping her arm, she tells him that the ghost walked right through his trap without springing it.

Howard determines that they should leave Heather Cottage without delay, but Angela is adamant that her presence there is essential to her well-being. When he insists, she begins to show signs of her former depression. He summons her psychiatrist from London, and after some complaining, Dr. Armstrong finally agrees to spend a weekend with the Whelans to observe her condition at first hand. The first night of Armstrong's stay, Howard keeps a close watch on his wife, but falls asleep—only to be awakened by the doctor's urgent banging on the bedroom door. Angela is sleepwalking toward the bluff! Howard runs outside, only to see the shadowy apparition standing alone at the edge of the bluff, looking victoriously down over the edge. Thinking his wife dead, Howard tackles the ghost's coat and goes over the edge, hanging onto an empty coat and a supporting wire! It was an illusion put there to trap him!

Hanging on to the wall of the bluff, Howard listens with disbelief to the voices above—of Angela and Dr. Armstrong, who are actually lovers who concocted the whole scheme in order to arrange his death and their inheritance. Thinking Howard dead, they walk back toward the house and blunder into his trap. Built to support the weight of only one person, the bowed tree cannot support two, and it is uprooted after dangling the murderous couple precariously over the other side of the bluff, killing them as Howard is left hanging on for dear life.

This is only a bare bones outline, but as one reads The Shadow Guest in all its detail, it becomes obvious that the novel was the seed from which Schock grew and mutated. In common, they share the location of the house by the sea—complete with a swing in the front yard and ghost-like sheeted furniture within—which turns out to be the location of a repressed traumatic memory; both heroines suffer psychological breakdowns as a result of their isolation and environment; the ghost that beckons to Angela is a soldier in the British Navy, while Dora's husband is described as an adventurer lost at sea; Angela is tormented by nightmares of being chased by a walnut secretary desk, while Dora is pursued by an armoire cabinet; and whereas Angela discovers a clue to her past inside a drawer in the persistent secretary, the weapon used to commit the murder whose memory Dora has suppressed is found inside the armoire—Angela's discovery leading to the revelation of her birth, Dora's leading to her inevitable self-annihilation.

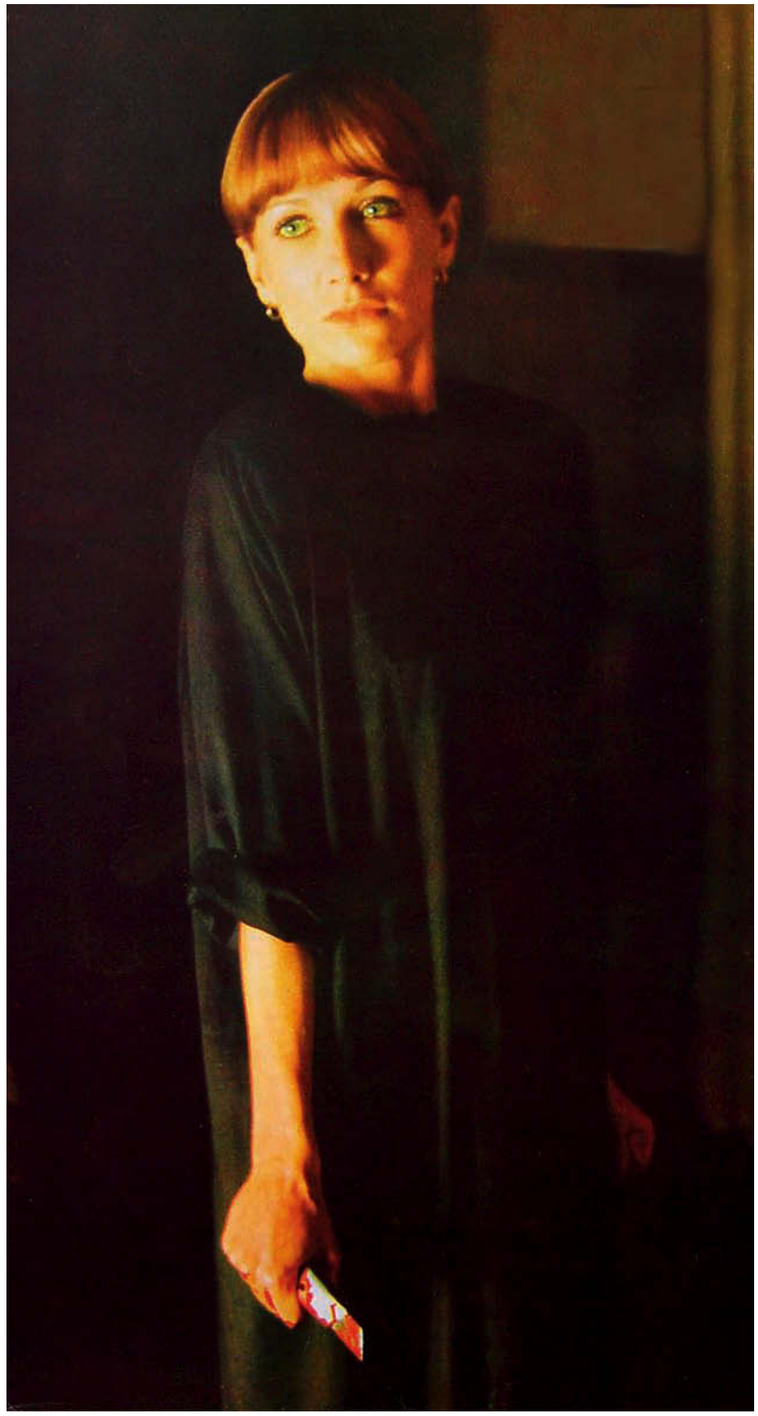
Given Bava's repeated interest in showing his characters becoming trapped in their own murderous snares, the novel's highly visual, ironic finale must have been one of its key attractions for him. It would also have given him on opportunity to end a film in the way Hitchcock had begun his 1958 classic Vertigo, with his protagonist dangling from a very great height.



While Waugh's novel and Bava's film culminate quite differently, the direction taken by Schock is actually suggested in the novel, in an offhand way. In one instance, Dr. Armstrong tries to make Howard realize the absurdity of his fears by saying, "So a threatening letter was found in the desk. So a grave was found in the cellar." [9] In fact, Waugh oversteps himself here; no grave is found in the cellar in the novel—Armstrong was using this image to show Howard how hyperactive his imagination had become—but such a discovery is precisely what precipitates Dora's psychological breakdown in Schock.

Dardano Sacchetti admits that he was initially hired to adapt The Shadow Guest as a screenplay, and that his script was subsequently rewritten, by Lamberto Bava and others. As it changed hands between one producer and another, it ceased to resemble the original source. Of the two narratives, Schock is most satisfying, because its enticingly ambiguous interplay of crime, psychology, and the supernatural is far more compelling—and, in fact, more believable—than the hackneyed, gold-digging one given us by Waugh's novel.

Lamberto has said that he and Sacchetti, being young men in their 20s at the time, "wanted to make a different kind of horror film, something more contemporary; we were influenced by Stephen King." [10] While crafting the screenplay, they took care to include material that would provoke a favorable response from Mario, for whom it was intended. "We liked the idea of including a child," Lamberto says, "because my father used children in many of his movies—spooky children, ghostly children, using them as an annex to the supernatural. We liked the idea of a child that would rebel against his mother and say, 'Mama, I have to kill you!'" [11]

The character of Marco may have found his genesis in King novels like Carrie and The Shining, but in terms of its characters and story, Schock has another strong parallel in an earlier feature: Night Hair Child/What the Peeper Saw (1971), co-directed by James Kelley and Andrea Bianchi, and starring Britt Ekland and Mark Lester. In this British/Spanish co-production, Lester (best remembered for playing the title role in Carol Reed's Oliver!) plays the similarly named Marcus, a psychologically disturbed child of a man (Hardy Kruger) who remarries after the death of his first wife. The new wife, played by Ekland, becomes increasingly aware of a sexual tension between herself and the boy, whose flirtations become more open until, rebuked, they become murderous in character and lead her to suspect that the child may have been responsible for his own mother's death. Lamberto denies any knowledge of the film, but the similarities between the two films are striking.

Some observers have also speculated on the possible influence of August Derleth's classic ghost story "Mr. George," written in the 1940s under the byline Stephen Grendon. In this story (which was adapted for a second-season episode of Thriller), a 5-year-old girl named Priscilla is placed in the care of three money-hungry relatives after the deaths of her wealthy widowed mother and her companion, Mr. George. As the child's life is endangered by her caretakers, Priscilla finds herself protected by the DARIA Nicolodi gives a stylized, "silent movie" performance as Dora slips into madness.

9 Hillary Waugh, The Shadow Guest (New York NY: Dell Publishing Co. Inc., 1972), 209.

10 Lamberto Bava interview, Anchor Bay Entertainment DVD of Shock, released 2001.

11 Ibid.

PHOTO collage of John Steiner and Daria Nicolodi from an Italian fotobusta.

"invisible hands" of Mr. George. While it is doubtful that Lamberto knew the story, it is possible that Mario had read it somewhere in translation.

Considering that Schock is so different from The Shadow Guest that it ceases to be an adaptation—and thus, was neither required to credit nor compensate its author—it says a lot about Bava's feelings of responsibility toward his collaborators that Sacchetti's early work on the original screenplay is acknowledged in the credits. Despite Sacchetti's primacy as screenwriter of the early drafts of The Shadow Guest, Lamberto Bava appears to have been most responsible for the final shape of the scenario that became Schock.

"Schock was written with many other people," Lamberto acknowledges. "The real writers were Sacchetti and myself. Francesco Barbieri helped a little, and the other writer [Alessandro Parenzo] wrote the final draft, which I later amended. But most of the film's basic ideas were mine. I—along with other men of my age—thought at the time, albeit mistakenly, that my father's horror films could be improved upon, or at least modernized in some way. What I wanted most of all was for my father to make a more contemporary horror film. I always thought, as a young man, that I could improve upon all of his films, even his best ones . . . which I now see was presumptuous on my part. Schock contains more of my ideas than any of his other films; I directed about 25% of it . . . but now, I don't think it's one of my father's best films." [12]

Cast

The principal role of Dora Baldini, one of the most challenging to be found in Bava's filmography, was awarded to Daria Nicolodi, an increasingly visible figure in Italian horror whom Bava affectionately called "the new vamp of all vampires." [13] Born June 19, 1950, in Florence, Nicolodi entered the cinema in 1970 and played small roles in films by Francesco Rosi and Elio Petri before her fateful, accidental meeting with Italy's young maestro di gialli, Dario Argento.

"We met in an airport long before we got together," she relates. "I was with my first husband, he was with his ex; I was going to South America, he was going to Africa; he was unhappy with this woman, and I was unhappy with this man. Our eyes, you know, met and I thought, 'Oh shit, I should go with this man to Africa rather than with this other to South America,' but then everyone went to their own destiny. Then we met again, maybe one year later, for the casting of Profondo rosso, and we remembered those glances, the locking of our eyes." [14]

Nicolodi was promptly cast as Gianna Brezzi, the trouble-making feminist reporter heroine of Argento's Profondo rosso/Deep Red (1975), in which she played opposite David Hemmings. Funny and flirtatious, Nicolodi's performance was like His Girl Friday remade with spidery gestures; she brought warmth, wit, and sparkle to Argento's hitherto cold and formalistic universe. She would soon bring much more. She became Argento's lover, the mother of his second daughter, Asia (born September 20, 1975), and next his collaborator—which is where their troubles began.

According to Nicolodi, she had actually known Mario Bava socially for "two or three years" before he hired her to star in Schock. They met as a result of a renewed friendship between Dario Argento and Lamberto Bava, who—one night during the filming of Profondo rosso—invited his father to join the three of them for dinner. Just as Dario and Lamberto, former classmates, rediscovered their common bonds, so did Mario and Daria discover a close kinship. During their first meal together, Bava feigned disbelief that Daria was an actress, exclaiming, "But . . . you're an intelligent person!"

"When he made films, he never ate with his actors, always with the crew," Nicolodi observes, confirming what others have said. "He told me that I was one of only two Italian actors that he did not mind eating with—the other was Aldo Fabrizi. He said that actors were many times stupid."

Mario and Daria found an instant rapport, and when they reunited to make Schock, it was as though no time had passed since their previous meeting; it was, she says, as though they had known each other in a previous life. During the filming, Nicolodi's connection to Bava became very deep because she found herself playing the role of this very vulnerable woman at a time when she was feeling extremely vulnerable herself.

After the enormous success of their collaboration on Profondo rosso, Nicolodi had persuaded Dario Argento to make a movie about an uncharacteristic subject for him—witchcraft—and had given him the basic plot, many of the situations, and even the title of his next triumphant success: Suspiria (1977).

Nicolodi: "The title Suspiria comes from De Profundis by Thomas de Quincy, which I was reading at the time—so beautiful—and then I went to Dario and said, 'Do this! Do Suspiria!' And he said, 'It's an astonishing title.' And from the title to all the occurrences within the story, to the final scenes, to the magic side—it's mine. It comes from my grandmother, who was the inspiration of Suspiria. She was a great white magician; she could cure little children, old people, and her voice was always passionate and beautiful and pure, echoing her purity. She really had this experience, going to a place . . . I can't say it still exists; it burnt down in the 1930s . . . on the borderline between Germany and Switzerland. She went there to play piano . . . and she discovered that, in this school, they were in fact teaching Black Magic. She was always telling this story to me when I was a child, and it was fascinating to me—more than Pinocchio, more than Snow White."[15]

As Suspiria took shape, however, Nicolodi suffered a series of disappointments—including having the lead role she had hoped to play given to the American actress Jessica Harper—and her relationship with Argento did not survive the strain. In the wake of their separation, Nicolodi—by her own account—suffered a nervous breakdown and became anorexic, deteriorating to a weight of only 84 pounds, which explains why her ribs are so prominent during her nude scenes in Schock.

Nicolodi: "My agency called me one day and asked me, 'How would you like to work with Mario Bava? He would like you to play in his next film.' I said, 'Mario Bava!'—for me, a total myth! On my knees, 'Me? Really?' I went to meet with him, like a pupil in a school, and he looked at me and said, 'This is the script; you can play this.' It's a beautiful role . . . I immediately said yes, without reading it, because I wanted to work with him, and then I looked from the window—[we were on] the second floor—and he was sitting down, and he said to me, 'You look beautiful from down here; I will make you an image like this.' It was a total

DAVID COLIN Jr. as Marco.

DORA pleads with Bruno to believe that she's not losing her mind.

12 This quote is a conflation of a telephone interview conducted by the author in 1983, and Lamberto Bava, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

13 Safao.

14 Daria Nicolodi, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

15 Ibid.

spiritual adventure with him. He was so beautiful, you know? His soul was so pure and his imagination so high . . . I was reading at the time a novel by Robert Louis Stevenson called The Gardener, and he [writes about] a man saying that he was like a padrino—a Godfather, but 'Godfather' sounds like the Mafia—anyway, like the grandfather in a fairy tale, you know? Bava was like this kind of person; he had this spirit of a beautiful person, and a great, great soul.

"He was so funny," she continues. "He had a big, humorous side, and he was never one to make big dramas out of little things. His spirit was not very Italian, capito? One day, I was afraid of shooting one scene, very afraid, and he said to me, 'Don't worry, I will say to you what I once told an American actor, who was really bad . . . He was terrible,' he said to me. 'I will shoot the back of your head and cut immediately to another thing, maybe a dog." Bava made her laugh with this remark, putting her at ease. [16] (At one point in the movie, Marco asks Bruno, "Can I have a dog with long hair like Mommy's?"—a line which Bava added to the script as an affectionate wink at Daria, who wore her hair in an unusual, half-straight, half-crimped style as Dora.)

Cast as Dora's husband Bruno was British actor John Steiner, born in Cheshire, England, on January 7, 1942. After making his first appearances on stage, he landed his a highly visible role in a 1962 episode of the ITC series The Saint. He scoared a great critical impression in the premiere New York company of Peter Weiss' Marat/Sade, Steiner recreated his role in Peter Brook's 1966 film of the play, which was followed by small parts in Stanley Donen's Bedazzled (1967) and Peter Hall's Work Is a Four-Letter Word (1968). "The one place where Marat/Sade had been a really huge success was in Rome," Steiner recalls. "So I went there and discovered that everyone knew who I was! I was instantly offered a whole lot of work. I felt very grand and snooty in those days and didn't want to do a lot of it; then I decided I'd see what would happen and started it, and one thing led to another. It went on, and that's how it worked. It found me, really. I didn't go to Italy with the idea of making a career. I arrived to find I was already known there." He was billed third from the top, under Tomas Milian and Orson Welles, in Giulio Petroni's Tepepa (1968), and after that, the work never stopped. One of Steiner's most frequent employers was Bava's old friend, director Lucio Fulci, who used him in Zanna Bianca/White Fang (1972), Il ritorno di Zanna Bianca/Challenge to White Fang (1974), and the vampire comedy Dracula in Brianza (1975). In 1975, he starred in Mario Girolami's acclaimed crime thriller Roma violenta and in Ruggero Deodato's erotic thriller Una ondata di piacere/Waves of Lust, written by Lamberto Bava.

DORA in conversation with Dr. Spedini.

THE HAND of the dead reaches out to caress Dora's face as she sleeps.

David Colin Jr. was born in 1968 and made his screen debut in Ovidio Assonitis' Chi sei?/Beyond the Door (1974), playing the disturbed 7-year-old son of a demonically possessed Juliet Mills. Though Colin's character was called Ken in the English-dubbed export version, he was called Marco in the Italian version. He goes by the same name in Schock—which was called Beyond the Door II in America, but the two characters are unrelated. Colin makes his home in Rome today.

So minimal was the cast of Schock that its only other featured role, that of psychiatrist Dr. Aldo Spedini, was played by the menacingly handsome Ivan Rassimov. The first child of Croatian parents, he was born Ivan Djrassimovic in Trieste on May 7, 1938, and is the older brother of actress Rada Rassimov (Baron Blood). After graduation from the University of Trieste and performing his military service, Rassimov decided to become an actor. His first film was Super rapina a Milano (1964), which had several Bava connections—it featured La maschera del demonio's Andrea Checchi and Cani arrabbiati's Don Backy (a.k.a. Aldo Caponi), and was directed by its star, Adriano Celantano, who sang "Furore" for La ragazza che sapeva troppo. This was followed by the bit part of Carter in Bava's Terrore nello spazio. After another small role in Damiano Damiani's La strega in amore/The Witch in Love (1966), an excellent adaptation of Carlos Fuentes' supernatural tale "Aura," Rassimov became a star of Italian Westerns, a setting for which he adopted the nom d'ecran of "Sean Todd." Under this name, he was toplined in Eduardo Mulargia's Cjamango (1967), Sergio Garrone's Sei vivoi vivere . . . spara/If You Want to Live . . . Shoot! (1968), and Non aspettare, Django . . . spara/Don't Wait, Django . . . Shoot! (1968), also for Mulargia, which featured his sister Rada (under her own name). In 1970, he played a redefining role in Sergio's sexy giallo, Lo strano vizio della signora Wardh/Next!, in which he was cast as a man with strange, penetrating eyes who stalks the shapely Edwige Fenech, the only lover who understands her "blood fetish." So memorable was Rassimov's fierce presence and chemistry with Fenech that he was cast opposite her twice more by Martino, in Tutti i colori del buio/They're Coming to Get You (1972) and Il tuo vizio è una stanza chiusa e solo io ne ho la chiave/Gently Before She Dies (1972). Again his career took a new turn with Umberto Lenzi's Il paese del sesso selvaggio/Man From Deep River (1972), a dark adventure film—inspired in part by A Man Called Horse—that cast Rassimov as an American explorer who is captured by an Amazonian tribe, subjected to a series of gruelling tests meant to gauge his strength of body and character, and finally confronted by another tribe of cannibals. The scenes of torture, actual animal slaughter, and gory acts of cannibalism proved a popular dare with audiences the world over, and inspired in turn the Italian cannibal films that proliferated later in the 1970s and '80s. Rassimov would be featured as an iconic element in two more of these, Ruggero Deodato's Ultimo mondo cannibale/Jungle Holocaust (1977, assistant directed by Lamberto Bava) and in Umberto Lenzi's Mangiati vivi/Eaten Alive a.k.a. The Emerald Jungle (1980). Rassimov subsequently retired from acting to work as the director of a publishing house specializing in fumetti. He passed away after a short illness on March 13, 2003.

The spectral Carlo, Dora's other husband, was played by Nicola Salerno, whose principal job on the picture was assistant art director.

16 Ibid.

Production

Schock was filmed over a five-week period in the spring of 1977, on a remarkably meager budget of only $60,000. The exteriors and most of the interiors were shot at the modern Roman villa of Nicola Salerno's famous father, actor Enrico Maria Salerno.

"Salerno's companion at the time, Marisa Valenti, was the sister of the associate producer, Ugo Valenti—I think that's how it happened," surmises John Steiner. "Salerno knew who Bava was, and it was kind of a family thing. That's the way pictures were made in Italy—a sort of family arrangement. The weather was quite nice, actually, and it was a very nice villa. I remember Salerno walking around with a kind of boiler suit on."

Other scenes, including those set in the dank cellar of the family home, were filmed at Vides. The mere mention of the studio causes John Steiner to gasp. "I wonder if Vides still exists!? Oh my God, Vides were really sort of . . . shacks! They were the last of the low-end studios, and very little was being shot. I think we were the only movie being shot there at the time. Those were the last years of the Italian movie business, really. Video hadn't quite caught on yet, but was beginning to. When I first came to Italy in 1967, they were making 300 movies a year, but by the time I was working with Mario, the movie industry was sort of coming to an end—this was certainly true of movies that were made for theatrical distribution. After that, it was all movies made for video."

The cheap studio provisions were made more tolerable by good company, particularly Bava's warm humor and the simpatia that Steiner, as well, discovered in the company of Daria Nicolodi. "Well, you meet people in your life for whom you have a real close affinity," he says, "and for me, Daria was one of them. I felt I knew Daria from the second I first met her. I don't think that has anything to do with ability or whatever; she was just somebody who was 'in my world,' as it were. The minute I met her, I relaxed and was sort of comfortable, you know? Interesting woman, I think." On the subject of young Master Colin, Steiner waxes more philosophically: "I remember, when I was at drama school, we had an actress—an aging actress who was quite well known in the West End—and she always used to say about acting with children and animals, 'Remember, dears, they are going to upstage you, whatever you do. Therefore, the secret is . . . to ruin them in rehearsal! When the time comes to perform, they will be so tired, they won't know what they are doing!

PLAGUED by accidents and apparitions, Dora suffers a nervous breakdown.

That's the only way to defend yourself.' Well, I didn't really have any problems with that, but of course, the movie is about a little boy and kids are always going to take the attention away from the adults. You know—the law of the land. [David] was a little kid. He was really quite smart, actually. But I was much more interested in Daria Nicolodi than in him, you know?"

Nicolodi recalls the filming as a tremendous challenge, supremely difficult, but ultimately joyous. When she first arrived on the set, she was feeling vulnerable and unattractive as a result of her breakdown. "You had to be there to feel this," she says, "but at the beginning, I felt that [Mario] didn't like me very much the first two days. [I thought] he was used to another type of actress, maybe more beautiful and with more of a classical approach to acting, you know? And then, on the second day, I told myself, 'I am not here to be loved . . . I have to give him all that I can'—and I had a scene in which I screamed, fell down, and was running . . . , and I did it so strongly that he understood, and that's how we came to understand and appreciate each other."

The actress' insecurities were such that she telephoned Dario Argento, prevailing upon her estranged lover to visit her on the set. "I visited the set of Schock many days," Dario Argento confirms. "It was one of the first films Daria made without me, and she asked me to be there to give her support." At some point during the filming, Nicolodi took Bava into her confidence and told him the story of her falling out with Argento and her resulting breakdown, and admitted to her anorexia. This brought them closer together as friends and collaborators, and Bava helped her to use her experience as valuable reference in playing Dora Baldini, which was to become the most impressive performance of her career.

It is now well-known that Schock was partially directed by Lamberto Bava, and one naturally wonders how this division of labor was initiated. Lamberto's friend and former assistant, director Michele Soavi (La chiesa/The Church, Dellamorte Dellamore/Cemetery Man), explains: "When I first met Daria Nicolodi, I asked her a great many questions about Schock, because I was an admirer of Mario Bava and had a special interest in this picture. She told me that Bava started out directing the picture normally, but after a few days, he began to complain that he wasn't feeling so good. He would continue to work a while, and then go home, leaving the direction to Lamberto for the rest of the day. Daria said that she loved working with Mario in the mornings, because he made the atmosphere on the set like a party—but when Lamberto took over, he was so nervous that he made everyone else feel nervous and a little sick! She felt quite certain that Mario was faking his illness; it was his method to give Lamberto some experience at directing."

IN HER hallucinations, Dora is stalked by her husband's ghost, determined to end her life with this cutting blade.

After listening to Daria's viewpoint, John Steiner responds: "Interesting . . . Yes, really interesting, and in some ways, I would agree. What it was, I think—I think that Lamberto, certainly when the two of them were working together, you felt that here was the son coming along in the shadow of his father. He was less experienced, and so forth. I don't think Mario was frivolous at all; he was just down-to-earth and confident and knew what he was doing. I mean, yes, he used to arse around and lark about, and I think that did make for a kind of party atmosphere. Lamberto . . . I don't think he felt pressured by the need to prove himself or anything, but he didn't have his father's enormous experience, and therefore wasn't quite as relaxed. Mario was always joking. He would be telling dirty jokes all the time, and he loved his crew. He was always joking with his crew. He'd been behind a camera all his life, and had come up as a lighting cameraman . . . he was like a part of the crew. Mario really didn't care what the script was. He had the story in his head, and he knew the effects he was going to create. If you wanted to change something in the script, it didn't make any difference to him at all. He knew that, whatever you did, he could just fix it in the dubbing. Lamberto, I think, was more interested in the script—what's there, how it's going to work."

Lamberto offers his own version of events: "At one point, like a good father to his son, he let me direct some scenes. He gave me the scenes that he knew I couldn't screw up too much. I got to shoot a lot of scenes, actually, because my father would say, 'I'm tired—you shoot the scene.' It wasn't true—he wasn't really tired; he let me do it because he probably felt it was time I started directing on my own." [17]

Despite their marked differences in temperament on the set, Lamberto's approach was sometimes preferable to Mario's technique for an actor like John Steiner. Like Stephen Forsyth before him, Steiner had the impression that Mario was not terribly interested in matters of performance, and generationally removed from his accustomed way of working. "I think I got closer to Lamberto, who was more my age, then I was to Mario," Steiner admits. "Lamberto, being younger, was slightly more modern in his approach to actors. I think the old Italian school of directing has always been highly influenced by Fellini, who believed it didn't matter who the actor was, as long as he looked right, and it didn't really matter what was coming out of his face because you could always give him the telephone directory to read and dub him later. I found that particularly frustrating, and I think that's why I never worked with Fellini—nor did I ever have any desire to work with him, for that reason. He was a man of incredible genius and enormous charm, but not, I would have thought, much fun. I don't think Fellini had a huge regard for actors."

Though Lamberto's nervous disposition communicated his creative tensions to the cast and crew, this was not the case with Mario. Despite having to deal each day with dark, psychological terrain, none of the actors felt particularly affected because Mario had such an extraordinary gift for alleviating troupe pressure. "Mario was always joking," Nicolodi effuses, "so nothing I did with him was painful, not even something risky like falling down the stairs. I had big furniture falling all around me, I had cuts on my body, I was full of bruises—big black things—in the scene where the bureau cabinet comes closer and closer to me. It was very tiring work and took a lot of energy, but it was always fun." [18]

"I don't think anybody ever took the material terribly seriously, you know," adds Steiner. "It's like back when I was doing Marat/Sade, people would say, 'Oh, but doesn't it affect you?' Well . . . no! I mean, I was very young then, and I remember we were doing two shows a night, I was in New York, a 25-year-old kid with everything at my feet—I mean, I didn't sleep! I would be up all night and maybe catch a couple hours of sleep in the afternoon, go to the theater and do all that, and then go out and party!

NICOLA Salerno frightens the wits out of Daria Nicolodi—and audiences worldwide—in the film's most successful scare.

17 Lamberto Bava, Shock DVD.

18 Nicolodi.

DORA, now completely insane, stands over the murdered body of husband Bruno.

That's all you really thought about. And then people would ask, 'Oh, but that material! Didn't it wear you down?' Well, by the end of the run, I nearly had a nervous breakdown, but that had nothing to do with the material! It was 'cause I'd been burning the candle at both ends! Likewise with Schock, I frankly can't remember . . . well, even what the movie was about, really! I just remember it being very, very enjoyable. It was very relaxed; we were sitting up at the villa most of the time; Daria was wonderful company; Mario was fun; the crew was great—it was a fun movie! I remember it being very enjoyable to do—apart from the day I had to wear the axe."

What about the day he had to wear the axe?

"It's all so vague now," laughs Steiner, "and you know, the funny thing is, I was always getting chopped by axes! I did another one [Dario Argento's Tenebrae, which also featured Daria Nicolodi] where I get chopped by an axe, so one's sort of blurred into the other. I remember walking around for a morning with this axe sticking out of me, which was extremely uncomfortable; it had this sort of metal thing that went 'round my chest and held the axe, and then my shirt was all steeped in stage blood, which stinks. It was very uncomfortable!"

Lamberto proved that he also wasn't without humor by agreeing to make not one, but two cameos in the picture. He first appears as the moving man in the opening scene, carrying a box into the house and later shaking hands with Bruno before driving away with two other men in the moving truck, and he later appears on the left side of the screen during a shot of the distressed airline passengers on Bruno's turbulent transatlantic flight.

Special Effects

One of the most interesting aspects of Schock is its charmingly naïve, yet effective use of what might be called "magic lantern" special effects—a brand of illusion so antiquated it has almost no other counterpart in the sound era of motion pictures.

Particularly evocative is the shot that begins with a phantasmal apparition—vaguely evoking the shape of the porcelain hand sculpture—that appears to float forth from the brick wall in the cellar, across the room, until we see that it is not a supernatural emanation at all, but rather the result of Marco shining a light through the hole he has cut into a photograph of Bruno and Dora, by removing Bruno from it. This shot, and another showing two luminous, disembodied hands creeping up Dora's bedsheets and pulling them from her body, were created by shining light through a simple stencil—a technique dating back to the shadowplays of Robertson (a.k.a. Etienne-Gaspard Robert, 1763–1837), the macabre showman who delighted in projecting illusory imps and demons from a lantern onto the walls of tombs in 18–19th century France. It also recalls the celebrated shot in F. W. Murnau's Nosferatu (1922), in which the taloned hand of the vampire rises up the front of the cowering heroine's nightgown in silhouette, and squeezes her heart.

Daria Nicolodi remembers the preparation of this scene with amazement: "We had no money, you know, but Mario said, 'Never fear, the phantasm is easily done!' He took a section from the daily paper, La Carta Spesa, and with his scissors—he always had his scissors—he made a hand. It looked like a hand cut out of the paper, but when you shone light through it, it became the phantasm!" [19]

The remainder of this "phantasmal" sequence—in which Nicolodi's hair is seen to come alive, moving weightlessly about, as the spirit of Carlo invades her body—involved the most elaborate pre-planning of all the film's live effects. For this shot, Nicolodi was secured horizontally to a mattress affixed to a revolving platform with a 35 mm camera mounted directly above her face. As the camera rolled, the platform was turned like a rotisserie. Because Nicolodi was so thin, the shot evinces absolutely no shifting of gravity and only her hair appears to be moving, Medusa-like, around her pleasured eyes and salacious lip-licking as she is possessed by the ghost. "When Mario drew the storyboards, he included a diagram that showed exactly how the shot was to be achieved," says Lamberto Bava. "The way the scene was shot was exactly how it was designed on the drawing board."

BAVA'S diagram for the apparatus needed to film Dora's incubus visitation in SCHOCK.

The subjective sequences of Dora's hallucinations were also shot live: rippling the image by photographing it through Mario's "water glass," stretching the image by filming it through glass that could be tipped toward or away from the lens, and stacking the image into totems by filming the actors' reflections in the mirrored shelves positioned below and above their faces.

"The great thing about Mario Bava," John Steiner emphasizes, ". . . he just had fabulous technique. His effects were amazingly simple, usually done with lighting effects or clever cutting. I remember there was one thing he did, which was fabulous. He had a little piece of glass, which he had obviously had made for him, and it had a ripple on it. He would take this piece of glass and just move it up in front of the camera as it was shooting, and it looked as if a wave of water—or optical water, as it were—came down and veiled the scene. I was very impressed by that, I remember. Spagnoli was probably operating the camera, and Bava would be holding a rippled sheet of glass, manipulating the glass, by hand, in front of the lens, bringing up the ripple at the time he wanted it to appear. Bava wasn't a writer, per se, but he had this great eye for visual effects—always very simply done—which came out of an innate sense of knowing how things work on the studio floor."

Other live effects include the animated empty swing and moving porcelain hand (both operated by invisible strings) and the rat Dora encounters in the cellar (a rubber prop was animated by a two-string system which, when the two threads were pulled apart, caused it to dart forward). Most memorable of all the trick shots is also the simplest: Marco runs down a hallway toward his mother, disappears below frame, and is replaced by the suddenly uprising apparition of Carlo.

19 Ibid.

MARCO appears to be genuinely possessed by the restless spirit of his dead father, interred behind a brick wall in the cellar.

"Lamberto actually filmed this shot," Michele Soavi confided to me in 1983, "but he takes no credit for it, because he was simply following his father's storyboard. It was entirely Mario's conception." [20] However, by the year 2000, Lamberto Bava was taking credit for directing the shot—and its conception. "I remember my father used to tell me that the best trick shots are the ones executed most simply. This was a great revelation to me. I learned how to make trick shots, like the scene where the child runs toward the mother . . . I rehearsed this shot with my son Roy and his babysitter; I saw that it could work. I mentioned it to my father and he agreed, saying it was great. We shot seven or eight takes and most of them didn't work, because the timing was off; we're talking fractions of a second, but the right take is very scary. I remember we had a screening of Schock in Rome, twenty years ago. There were 8,000 people. I stood at the back of the theater and watched 8,000 people jump backwards, like a wave, because of the fright of that moment!" [21]

THIS objective shot shows that the cutting blade wielded by Carlo's ghost is, in fact, wielded by Dora herself.

"It's so simply done, but it's unbelievably effective when you're watching it," praises John Steiner.

Mario Bava believed in the value of occasionally dispensing with suspense altogether. If a film had already succeeded captivated its audience, it wasn't necessary to continue baiting them. "If a door is creaking and someone is slowly walking down a corridor, before the scene has time to play itself out, the audience has already begun to tear it apart with their jokes," he explained. "But, on the other hand, if the shock comes suddenly, the audience will jump out of their seats . . . really jump!" [22]

Lamberto remembers hearing similar advice from his father. "[He said that] in order to make a good horror film, the audience must jump out of their seats at least four or five times. That was our motto: If the audience jumps, the film is good. There are any number of ways to make an audience jump; it can be as simple as a door opening unexpectedly with the right sound." [23]

US one-sheet poster.

Music

Shock's resolve to embody (in Lamberto Bava's words) "a more contemporary horror film" is most obvious in its choice of musical soundtrack. While Schock was not the first Mario Bava film to be scored in a rock (or semi-rock) style, its music is unique in his filmography for the extent to which it reveals the unmistakable influence of Goblin's "into the red" scores for Dario Argento's Profondo rosso and Suspiria. In fact, at the time of the film's release, it was widely speculated that I Libra—the band credited with composing and performing the score—were the Argento-sponsored group Goblin working pseudonymously, as they sometimes did as studio musicians.

I Libra (Italian for "The Scales") were actually a spin-off congregation of musicians led by Walter Martino, Goblin's original drummer, who left the band prior to their recording of the Profondo rosso soundtrack in 1975. The group consisted of Sandro Centofanti (keyboards), Dino Kappa (bass), Carlo Pennisi (guitars), and Walter Martino (drums and percussion). A former member of the band, Maurizio Guarini, has also claimed to have provided additional keyboards and synthesizer programming to the Schock recordings.

Composed by Martino, the Schock score bears some striking similarities to Goblin's Profondo rosso score, at least in its broadstrokes—an ebullient synth-and-percussion-dominated main theme, a recurring lullaby motif, and an emphasis on eerie electronic atmospherics (these are particularly effective during the "incubus" scene). But whereas Goblin was a progressive rock unit greatly influenced by other keyboard-dominated "prog" acts such as Emerson Lake & Palmer and Tangerine Dream, I Libra—on the evidence of the Schock soundtrack album, their only issued recording—were more intrigued by free-form experimentation and tonal exploration, showing an alliance with avant-garde experimenters Edgar Varese and Karlheinz Stockhausen, though they were still capable of rising to the challenge of an occasional, full-sail, prog rock team effort. When performing in this mode, I Libra's liking for jagged rhythms, unpredictably shifting time signatures, and a balance of keyboards, guitar, trebly bass, and jazzy percussion revealed a guiding affinity for the music of Yes.

The title theme, "The Schock," heard frequently throughout the film, opens with a wash of supernaturally flavored synthesizer, followed by the tentative steps on the high strings of an electric bass which state the initial theme. This theme is then punctuated by a staccato synth attack, underscored by rolling percussion; this phase is then abruptly replaced by a charging rhythm of bass and drums, accompanied by brisk guitar as the synthesizer takes the lead. As involving and well-structured as this piece may be, it appears to have been recorded before the band could compose a proper musical resolution; instead, the instrumentation continues to build to a point of meltdown, ending in chaos after barely more than 4 minutes.

The acoustic guitar piece by Carlo Pennisi that accompanies the Baldini family's outdoor play and the testing of the swing built by Bruno is titled "L'altalena rossa" ("The Red Swing") on the soundtrack album. This cue unfolds from a single acoustic guitar to a tuneful, double-tracking of the instrument, followed by the appearance of a third track in which the instrument takes a melodic line over the sparkling, mountain water-flavored 20 Michele Soavi interview, Anchor Bay Entertainment DVD of Shock, released 2001.

21 Lamberto Bava, Shock DVD.

22 Alfredo Castelli and Tito Monego, interview in Horror 1, 1969.

23 Lamberto Bava, Shock DVD.

backwash. Though attractive, this lilting folk effort sounds like little more than a sketch or demo for a fuller band recording, with the third guitar suggesting a vocal line. Distinctly out of character with the electronic tense of the rest of the score, this piece sounds inappropriate in the context of the film itself.

The next piece, a musical triptych called "Transfert I/Hypnos/Transfert II," reveals I Libra in their most experimental mode. "Transfert I" is performed entirely by Walter Martino, and begins with stark, tribal percussion that is quickly processed with reverb, and then double-tracked to create a dribbling impression; "Hypnos" is a psychologically hued synthesizer wash played by Sandro Centofanti, highly prophetic of the Frippertronics and Soundscapes solo recordings made by King Crimson founder Robert Fripp in the late 1970s and 1990s, peppered with disconcerting surges of church pipe organ and distorted guitar; and "Transfert II" renews the initial solo percussive dribbling, joining it with synthesizer and a second percussion track, as the two erupt in pocket calculator-like beeps and sonic squiggles.

"La Baia," heard during Dora's conversation with Marco about death, is recorded over the literal backwash of incoming tides. In contrast to this sound effect (which may have been generated by synthesizer, though it's indistinguishable from a location recording made at the beach), Sandro Centofanti's piano initiates a theme; however, his performance never quite sails out of its introductory mode to allow it to develop. Consequently, though the cue works sufficiently well in film context, when audited on its own, it sounds like an improvision rooted more in technique than inspiration, bolstered with sound effects in an attempt to lend substance to its meanderings.

It is followed by a diptych, "La Cantina/The Schock (ripresa)." In Italian, "cantina" means literally "a little song," and this is the tinny, synth lullaby/music box piece heard throughout Schock. A cycling pattern of 19 notes, the monotonal line is joined at 0:35 by a sawtoothed synth line that shadows each of the notes with a slight discordance. At 0:56, a third, still more dissonant synth element is added, and the three lines play essentially in concert until the individual pieces accelerate or decelerate, overriding and perverting the innocence of the initial track until the piece sounds as if it's being literally pulled apart between our ears. At 1:55, the performance is spliced to a reprise of the charging climax of the title theme, ending after slightly more than 1 minute on a neat slide down the synthesizer keyboard.

ITALIAN due-foglia poster—compared with the uncredited cover art for Popular Library's paperback edition of a Shirley Jackson novel.

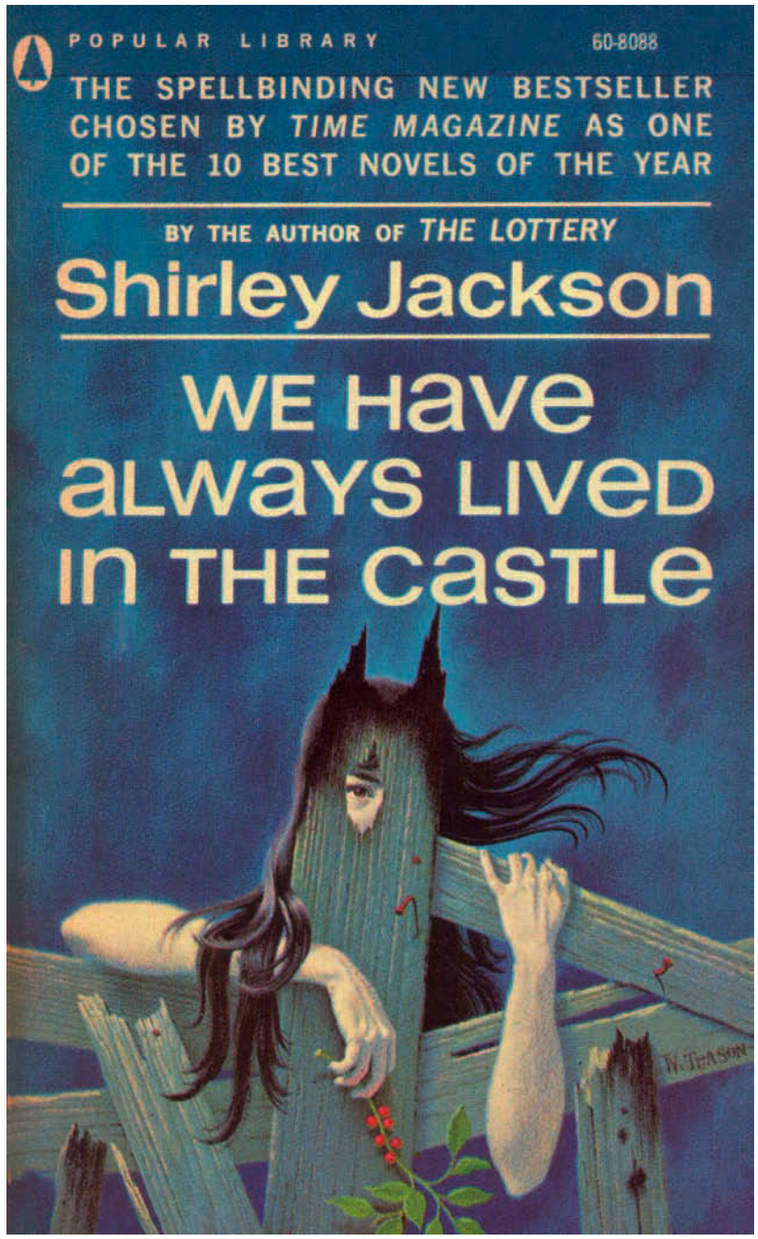
"Tema di Marco" ("Marco's Theme") is another diptych, whose two parts share the same name. Here the cantina is reprised, with the second synth entering at 0:17; these are then joined at 0:26 by surging, sighing synthesizer parts, which effectively weds the divergent themes of child psychology and the spectral. At 1:05, I Libra startle the listener by exploding into the most fully achieved and sustained band performance of the entire recording. The double-time thumping of Martino's bass pedal leads into a turbulent, cyclical piano part, which in turn introduces Dino Kappa's heroic, striving bass line, a somewhat romantic guitar lead by Pennisi, and an escalating chorus break that culminates in a resumption of the initial piano and rhythm section parts. Here, Martino maintains an accelerated heartbeat pounding under the music which adds to its insistent character. This splendid piece is heard in the film under the end credits.

"L'incubo" ("The Incubus") is the experimental centerpiece of the album. Opening with bullying, avant-garde tapping and zapping, with bursts of blowtorch synth, Martino's percussive intro is given soul with the introduction of Centofanti's baleful, chilling, viola-like synth, rendered with lots of right-to-left phasing. Building into strange atmospherics of whooshing winds, ghostly surges, and pipe organ smearings, it becomes a montage of ethereal atmospheres, ghostly and oppressive. As a piece of electronic music, it actually beats anything written by Gino Marinuzzi Jr. for Terrore nello spazio.

"Transfert III," as the title suggests, is another overdubbed percussion piece. In any other context, it would be accused of self-indulgence; here, especially given its brevity, it seems merely inconsequential.



"Il Fant. Suona Piano" is, in some ways, the highlight of the album and is the cue most frequently used in the film itself. It begins with Centofanti's solo piano beautifully and eloquently restating—in unaugmented terms—the unsettling, opening synth chords of "The Shock." In this context, as the piano is supported by an underlayer of highly colored synth, the theme sounds more sensitive, melancholic and tormented, and Centofanti's performance not only hearkens back to the psychologically rich cues of Carlo Rustichelli, but actually prophesies the basic tenor of the score that Keith Emerson would subsequently compose and record for Dario Argento's Inferno. It's he most essential component of the Schock soundtrack; one's only regret is that it lasts less than 2 minutes.

The final track is another diptych: "Transfert IV/Tema di Marco II (ripresa)." The first part offers the only vocal on the album, as various subverbal mutterings, mumbles and harsh breathing accumulate in a taunting, increasingly hostile reverb environment, soon joined by a synthesizer undertow. From 1:29–1:51, the cantina re-enters, then is overcome by synth dribblings and other curious sound elements, all playing at different speeds until the listener feels bullied into disorientation. This continues till 3:02, at which point the piece erupts into multi-channeled laughter (heard in the film as the voice of the "laughing piano"), and at 3:10, the band come together one last time for a very short reprise of the closing theme, this time with the synth adding a flutish flavor. The performance breaks down after less than a minute, resulting in a most unsatisfying conclusion to a most uneven album.

Schock is a peculiar score, avant-garde and trend-following in equal measure, played by a band with perhaps more musical talent than sense of direction. In scoring the film, Mario and Lamberto Bava used all of the band's cues to some extent, but clearly favored the less challenging fare, emphasizing "The Shock," variations on "Tema di Marco," and especially "Il Fant. Suona Piano." The I Libra music provides an enjoyable accompaniment, but we must question whether a pulse-pounding prog rock score is what this tragic story called for. It certainly adds to the film's entertainment value, especially on repeat viewings as the music becomes an increasingly central part of the experience—but it also cannot help but seem to sensationalize, even trivialize, the film's violence rather than underline the emotions of the story. With the exception of the poignant "Il Fant. Suona Piano," the score does not underline Dora's breakdown with the more complex shadings of anxiety, dread, and morbid romanticism that a classical or neo-classical score could have provided.

In short, I Libra's Schock is a skilled but immature score that lends pleasure to the film while also limiting its depth, too often making these scenes from a woman's private hell seem . . . kind of cool.

Distribution

Schock was first released in Rome in August 1977, where it was promoted with poster art that had nothing to do with the movie itself, but was brazenly based on the cover design of Popular Library's 1963 first paperback edition of Shirley Jackson's novel We Have Always Lived in the Castle. The original art pictured a sorcerous dark-haired woman half-obscured by a ragged driftwood fence, her slender arms entwined with the planks—one of her hands lazily gripping a weed—and peering through a knothole with one plainly deranged eye.[24] The Italian poster art replaced the weed with a Stanley cutter blade, stained with blood. The campaign misspelled the title of the film as Schock, a word underlined with a triple-punch promise of "Transfert—Suspence—Hypnos," which has subsequently been listed as the film's complete title in dozens of misinformed reference books.

Schock earned a disappointing 99 million lire [$62,000] at the vacation-season Italian boxoffice, so international sales were not quickly forthcoming. Nevertheless, the film was honored at the 1978 Catalonian International Film Festival at Sitges, Spain, where Lamberto Bava was awarded the Sitges Medal for Best Screenplay. An American release would not follow until December 1978, when it was acquired by Film Ventures International (a company co-owned by Edward L. Montoro and American Bandstand host/producer Dick Clark) and promoted with heavy television and newspaper advertising. The low-market, Los Angeles-based distributor retitled the picture Beyond the Door II—an allusion to their previous hit, Beyond the Door (a.k.a. Ovidio Assonitis' Chi sei?, 1974), which also featured David Colin Jr. in a minor role.

In retrospect, it's hard to understand how any company could still be trying to make a buck with "demonic possession" campaigns six years after the release of the William Friedkin's The Exorcist (1973)—two years after The House of Exorcism!—but that's exactly what FVI's campaign promised. The film performed surprisingly well under the circumstances, and it was followed more than a decade later by another Ovidio Assonitis production, Jeff Kwitny's Beyond the Door III (1989)—a US/Italo/Yugoslav co-production, starring Bo Swenson. Of course, its story had nothing to do with either of its predecessors.

Prior to release, Film Ventures tightened the film by removing a small amount of footage, and ensured the temporary confusion of their audience by leaving a key bit of exposition—the note that is delivered to Dora, attached to seven red roses—in Italian. More than twenty years later, when the film 24 During this period, Barbara Steele is said to have singled out Jackson's We Have Always Lived in the Castle for praise, saying that it was a book that she would dearly love to turn into a film. One can't help but wonder if she was attracted to the book because she saw herself as that character on the book cover.

was resurrected in America on DVD by Anchor Bay Entertainment in 2000, their restored version (bearing the original title) proved that Bava had in fact taken care to film an insert that showed the note written in English: "One for each year—in spite of all you are still mine."

Commentary

Lamberto Bava admits to feeling a sense of guilt about how his own personality dominates his father's last two films, Schock and La Venere d'Ille, which he co-authored and co-directed. "From the mid-1960s onwards, I began to think that horror was something other than what my father was filming at the time," he explained. "In fact, Schock is completely different to my father's other films; it's a psychological horror film that revolves around a woman whose whole environment turns against her."[25]

In all fairness to Lamberto, survivors of the dead always find excuses to feel guilty. No matter how hard he may have consciously tried to make something unlike his father's "traditional" approach to horror, Schock is perfectly in keeping with Mario's earlier films, particularly the romantic La frusta e il corpo, with its murderous heroine succumbing to the phantasmal projections of her own guilt. For both Dora and Nevenka, and other characters in the Bava canon, their delusions culminate in an act of suicide that essentially cements their relationship in the hereafter. These same preoccupations will be found still at work in La Venere d'Ille. From the very first shots of Schock, as the camera prowls along a beach and the empty rooms of the Baldini home, the film is imagistically imbued with Bava's familiar sensibilities, which are further confirmed by the tongue-in-cheek spookiness of the first narrative shot—in which a piece of covered furniture has its ghostly white sheet pulled away by an unseen hand (as happens in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto with the purloined scarf) and the foregrounded cobwebs are swept away by a broom that appears to be wielded by ourselves. There are also scenes and dialogue in the film that seem to speak, biographically, on Mario's behalf. A case in point is this poignant discussion between Dora and Marco:

JAPANESE poster.

"Look, Marco—you're old enough to understand, I think. You know your father was a man who liked to travel a great deal. He loved airplanes, sailboats, and he loved to visit faraway places. Well, one day he went on one of his voyages and never came back. Your Daddy is dead, Marco."

"What is death, Mama?"

"It's like going on a trip, darling, except one doesn't come back. One goes away forever. . . Death is a part of life and we must learn to accept it."

This exchange (which illustrates a parallel between Carlo and Bruno, both being voyagers, and thus establishes the possibility of history repeating itself) is also redolent of Bava's own recurring themes and autobiographical concerns. It provides a plausible explanation for Mario's own fear of travel—a fear of dying, which he very nearly did while filming Le meraviglie di Aladino in Kairouan, Tunisia. It also recalls the long sea voyage that Mario's father Eugenio took with Mussolini's sons, when Mario was still a child. During this voyage, or one of Eugenio's other frequent disappearances, did young Mario worry that his father had actually died and that his mother was keeping the truth from him?

Another biographical element can be glimpsed in the frightening pranks Marco plays on his mother—jumping out of nowhere, hiding a razor blade in the keys of a piano, and feigning illness—as the young Mario himself had done on the occasion he fooled his mother into thinking his foot had turned to stone. These and other family stories were well-known to Lamberto at the time he wrote the script, and though not consciously incorporated, he knew his father well enough to tell the kind of story he might have written himself, had he been more verbally inclined. Since the very beginning of his directorial career, it was the object of Mario Bava's cinema to focus on the psychology of fear, to chronicle the crumbling of a world of delusion around a single character, exposing them to the truth about their world, their family, their past, themselves.

Schock goes so far as to quote a classic moment from I tre volti della paura, as Dora finds Marco in the cellar, kneeling beside the brick wall where his father is buried and crying, "Mama, I'm cold!" Marco's swing also conveys connotations of Melissa's graveyard swing in Operazione paura, and Ely Galleani's swing in 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto. These may be borrowings from older films, but they never feel stale or suggest a tired artist resorting to self-imitation. The challenge is to reinterpret these points of resonance so that they vibrate anew, and they do. Thus—despite Lamberto's feeling that he may have let his father down somehow by asserting himself creatively on this project, despite the replacement of the toppling suits of armor with toppling suites of furniture and the fact that all the picture frames on display are minus their paintings—Schock remains very much a Mario Bava film.

Schock can also be seen as the culmination of Mario Bava's longtime fascination with Guy de Maupassant. The author of over 300 stories, one-tenth of which dwelled on horrific subjects, Maupassant—like Bava—was an essentially frightened man whose art was repeatedly drawn to the subjects of madness and the fear suffered by a single person alone in a room.

"I'm afraid of myself! I'm afraid of fear, afraid of my panic-stricken mind, afraid of that horrible sensation of incomprehensible terror. Oh, you can laugh if you like, but it's terrible—and incurable. I'm afraid of the walls, of the furniture, of familiar objects, which seem to me to take on a kind of animal life. Above all, I am afraid of the horrible confusion of my thoughts, of the way my reason becomes blurred and elusive, scattered by a mysterious, invisible anguish . . .

"I experience the horror of everything that is, to the point of longing for death."

These were not the words of Mario Bava, but they might easily have been excerpted from one of his rare interviews. These were the words of Maupassant, whose example not only influenced the flavor of Bava's work, but also the tenor of his life and his philosophic views of the world. The first part of the quotation comes from Maupassant's 1883 short story "He" ("Lui"), and the last is derived from his personal correspondence. Maupassant's macabre stories appeared to spring from his imagination, but as this juxtaposition of quoted fact and fiction proves, his stories had their origin in the real world as he encountered it. The same is true of Mario Bava's films.

Literary scholars claim that Maupassant's ironic, frightening and frightened work was greatly influenced by his observations of the Franco-Prussian War and its effects on the bourgeoisie and working classes. In reviewing the life and career of Mario Bava, we can see immediately that his childhood, and the years of his early adulthood, coincided with the disruptions and ruptures of world war. Just as Maupassant survived his own country's defeat and witnessed the deposition of French emperor Napoleon III, so did Bava witness the occupation of his country and the trial, court-martial and public execution of Benito Mussolini, who was not only Italy's duce but a personal acquaintance—a man closely associated with his father, and indeed the bedrock of his family's professional life. The work of both artists, Bava and Maupassant, can be said to occupy a shattered world that may outwardly appear to be moving toward recovery, but is haunted underneath by guilt, shame, corruption, and the spectre of inevitable death.

UK poster.

When Dora Baldini accepts the cutting blade from the wardrobe cabinet—much as John Harrington accepted the cleaver from the cabinet in Il rosso segno della follia—and uses it to cut her own throat, she is committing suicide as Maupassant himself once attempted to do. After cutting his own throat, Maupassant was sent to an asylum where he suffered from continuous hallucinations until his death on July 6, 1893, at the age of 43. Suicide at the imagined hands of another: a cause of death that also befalls Miss Chester in I tre volti della paura, and Nevenka in La frusta e il corpo.

Schock is most noticeably unlike Mario Bava's earlier work in terms of its cinematography, which is remarkably formulaic and tame, considering the talent placed in charge of it. The film was shot in Eastmancolor by Alberto Spagnoli, with Giuseppe "Beppe" Maccari operating. Spagnoli was a talented man and had a notable career; he had started out as the camera assistant of Carlo Di Palma, working on such films as Elio Petri's L'assassino (1961) and Michelangelo Antonioni's Deserto rosso/Red Desert (1964), and graduated to camera operator on Mario Monicelli's L'armata Brancaleone (1966), the historical adventure infamous for its scene of Vittorio Gassman flogging a topless Barbara Steele. His first work as a director of photography was Emilio Miraglia's giallo, La dama rossa uccide sette volte/The Red Queen Kills Seven Times (1972), and a few films later, he earned his international stripes photographing Daisy Miller (1974) for Peter Bogdanovich. Pursuant to Schock, Spagnoli would be the cinematographer of Antonio Margheriti's Killer Fish (1979), Joe D'Amato's Orgasmo nero (1980), Enzo G. Castellari's Jaws rip-off L'ultimo squalo/Great White (1980), and Luigi Cozzi's Ercole/Hercules (1983) and Le avventure dell'incredibile Ercole/Hercules II (1985). After a clearly declining career, he died in 1985. His operator Giuseppe Maccari had, if anything, an even more distinguished career, having worked in this function on Il gattopardo/The Leopard (1963), La Bibbia/The Bible . . . in the Beginning (1966), Candy (1968), Fellini's Toby Dammit (1967), Satyricon (1969), and Carnal Knowledge (1971), before becoming the talented cameraman of Carlo Vanzina's Sotto il vestito niente/Nothing Underneath (1982), Christopher Coppola's Dracula's Widow (1989) and Dario Argento's segment of Due occhi diabolici/Two Evil Eyes (1990).

Schock's use of color is also not what one expects from a Bava film, being at once subdued and heavily anchored in an autumnal color scheme of browns, greens, and russets. Furthermore, the camera is often disappointingly immobile and some shots demanding an extra measure of control, such as the chaotic scene aboard Bruno's malfunctioning jet, are uncharacteristically poor. Only in the subjective, delusional imagery of Dora's breakdown, as pianos laugh and the faces of Dora and Carlo are stretched like putty, do Bava's signature tropes reassert themselves, echoing techniques previously explored in Il rosso segno della follia. On earlier films with low budgets, such as Il rosso segno . . . and Ecologia del delitto, Bava conserved money by acting as cameraman himself—a choice which could have only helped Schock. However, by agreeing to photograph the film, Bava's presence on the set would have been compulsory throughout, which would have worked against his hidden agenda of handing the project over to Lamberto. It was a gesture similar to what Riccardo Freda had done for him twenty years earlier on I vampiri and Caltiki il mostro immortale.

25 Palmerini and Mistretta, 27.

The film's bonding ingredient is Daria Nicolodi, whose emotionally and physically demanding performance compares well to that of Catherine Deneuve in Roman Polanski's Repulsion (1965)—a similar record of a woman's descent into madness, but a much cooler disengagement from reality. It is crucial to a proper appreciation of Nicolodi's work to view her performance in Italian, where her words (and wonderfully deep, smoky voice) are in closer register with her actions; witnessed here, it is one of the finest performances Bava ever presided over—in fact, two fine performances, as Nicolodi also does a remarkable job of recreating the emotions already recorded on film in her Italian looping. To see the film at its best, one must watch Schock in Italian.

Though her work in the last half of the film easily qualifies as a tour de force, Nicolodi's performance is not as ideal in the first half. "My grandfather liked to tease Daria," remembers Roy Bava. "He said that she was very good in scenes where she had to be frightened, but that in the normal dramatic scenes, she was too 'actressy.'" This judgment is more than a tease; it is absolutely correct. Nicolodi has lovely Renaissance features, a naturally elegant bearing, and a personal sense of style that make her a pleasure to watch onscreen. In the scenes of Dora's mental disintegration, she is riveting, bringing a stylized edge to her madness that shows a potent, even elemental understanding of cinema. It is—like Daliah Lavi's work in La frusta e il corpo—a silent movie performance in the best sense. In moments of passivity, she is also good; but in the scenes of ordinary interplay with her family, Nicolodi often looks self-conscious, overacting and working too hard to communicate the inner life of her character. Despite these minor criticisms, it must be repeated that Nicolodi's performance should only be judged by the way it appears and is heard in the Italian version, which she dubbed herself. Schock has never been a favorite among Bava fans in the United States, and its lukewarm reception is undoubtedly due to the mostly lame, sometimes harsh character of the dubbing, which conspires to diminish Nicolodi's fine work and completely wreck David Colin Jr.'s.

FULVIO LUCISANO, Lamberto Bava, and Mario Bava pay a surprise visit to the special effects workshop of Armando Valcauda (center).

It doesn't help that the family unit of Nicolodi, John Steiner and David Colin Jr. is itself unconvincing. Steiner is the most naturalistic of the bunch, but—despite their offscreen rapport—he shows no real chemistry with Nicolodi, and in terms of his ultimate guilt, the film tips its hand much too early with shots of a suddenly grim Bruno covertly locking the cellar door and drugging Dora's drinks. This sort of thing is permissible with red herrings, but not with actual guilty parties. It doesn't help that the idea of a body buried in the basement has been so well covered in literature, and in the cinema, since Poe's The Black Cat and The Cask of Amontillado . . . or that the mortaring of the brick wall looks so amateurish as to rouse the viewer's immediate suspicion. An inconspicuous brick wall would have been a far more effective point of revelation. (One suspects that Bruno's "layover in Baltimore" during his flight to New York might be another covert hommage to Poe.)

David Colin Jr. makes a more complicated impression. He is quite good at suggesting a mature presence in a child's body; he can work his face into some nicely sinister expressions, and he exhibits many of the diverse moods to which children of Marco's age are prone. Unfortunately, his performance suffers in English from awkwardness and over-aggression, which make it impossible to accept him as a happy-go-lucky child. This is equally the fault of the scripting, as Marco's dialogue, his doll-laden bedroom décor and Oshn-Kosh clothes seem more befitting of a 4–5-year-old, than the 8–10-year-old Marco would have to be, in order to have any memories at all of his biological father. As with Nicolodi, Colin's performance is kept in much firmer, more likeable register in the original Italian dub, where Marco comes off as believably boisterous, yet also sensitive and capable of speaking quite beautifully about the mysteries of life and death. In Italian, his performance is surprisingly effective. Colin appears to have spoken his lines mostly in English, with some specific lines in Italian ("Porco! Porco! Porco!").

There are a couple of scenes that don't come off quite as planned. The most noticeable case is the sequence in which Dora is lured downstairs by the sound of someone playing the piano. The piano is seen covered with dust in the film's opening moments, but the film never connects Carlo with the instrument. Secondly, rather than have Dora hear a unique piano piece, the film simply replays a piano track from the I Libra musical soundtrack, and because it is just as loud upstairs as it is when Dora stands beside the piano, the viewer never reasons that it was meant to be anything other than the movie soundtrack until the piece ends and we, along with Dora, trace the music to a record on the downstairs turntable. In this case, the film's own sound man doesn't seem to have understood the point of the scene.

There are also some unusually careless continuity gaffes. When Marco is shown clipping Bruno from a photograph of his mother, the photograph is the same shot, but not the same photo as is found stolen from a vertical 8x10 frame in a previous scene; it is a larger, 11x14 horizontal shot. Likewise, Marco proceeds to cut Bruno's head from the photograph, later affixing it to his swing to exert a voodoo-like control over Bruno's transatlantic flight. However, when the image of Bruno's head is shown attached to the swing, it is a completely different shot of actor John Steiner. Lastly, though the sequence of Marco cutting the voice mechanism out of his doll's throat is disturbing (especially the shot that shows his small hands ripping lengths of red fabric from the "wound"), it ultimately fails to convince because the device extracted from the doll is not a voice-box at all, but a toy familiar to everyone in the audience: a Slinky. It also obvious from the action that the doll's voice was meant to be mistaken by Dora for Marco's cries, but it doesn't sound anything like Marco's voice.

Regardless of such errors, there is no question that Schock mines the most disturbing territory of child/parent relationships to be found in Bava's filmography. Its depiction of incestuous desires—e.g., Marco going through the motions of sexual intercourse atop his mother when she falls in the yard, his fondling her sleeping body with the putrescent hand of his dead father—remain unsettling decades later, even if they do follow similar scenes in Night Hair Child by several years. There is nothing intrinsically horrible about a child innocently imitating an act he has observed or overheard, or in touching the body of the person who represents his closest human relationship; what is horrible in this context is the malignant spirit of a vengeful ghost using an innocent agent to dole out sexual aggression and murderous hatred.

Asked if Carlo's ghost was really responsible for these transgressions, or if they were all in the mind of his mentally ill heroine, Lamberto Bava chuckles and says, "This should be left unanswered . . . ambiguous." That Schock works regardless of its interpretation, and that it achieves a sense of ambiguity that is satisfying and pleasingly mysterious rather than frustrating, is a testament to its ultimate success.

Today, both Daria Nicolodi and John Steiner point to Schock as their finest work in the horror genre. "Oh, it's my favorite of those kinds of movies," Steiner declares. "Some people like Tenebrae, but I much prefer the one I did with Bava. I had a meatier part in it, and I loved working with Daria."

"I love very much the film I shot with Bava," Nicolodi says warmly. "It was an incredible adventure, you know? Five weeks together with Mario Bava, from 6:00 in the morning till almost midnight . . . His presence was really something."[26]

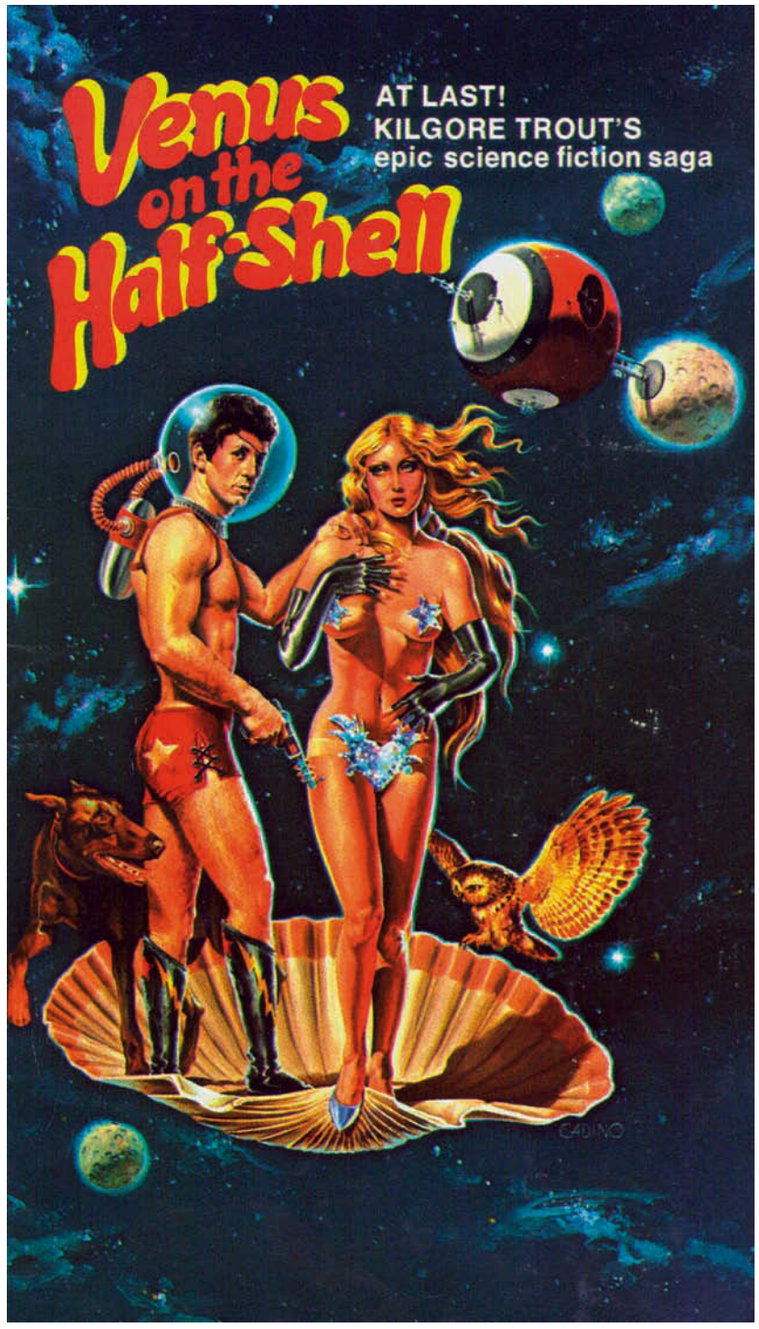
For Bava, the feeling was mutual. He would reserve a place of honor for Nicolodi in his next and final directorial effort, La Venere d'Ille.

26 Daria Nicolodi.

Star Wars all'italiana

The field of special effects entered into an exciting new evolutionary phase in 1977, when George Lucas' Star Wars was first released. It was a matinee that Mario Bava attended with his grandchildren.

"He was amazed when he saw Star Wars," Roy Bava remembers. "He had a lot of fun watching that movie. He thought the story was just an adventure, kind of simplistic, but he really liked the special effects a lot. He was also pleased to see the recognition of special effects technicians that took place after that. He considered that film a quantum leap in terms of the development of that area."



Although there had been various attempts in the 1960s—some of them quite commendable—neither the Italian film industry, nor the Italian public, had embraced science fiction as a national genre. Bava, as well as people like Ernesto Gastaldi and Luigi Cozzi, had been trying to interest producers in science fiction projects for many years, without success. But overnight, the extraordinary success of Star Wars changed everything because, if the Italian film industry had any rules at all, Rule #1 was "Imitate What is Successful."

Luigi Cozzi, who had once interviewed Bava as a teenage admirer, had since advanced in the business from acting as Dario Argento's assistant to becoming a film director in his own right with two gialli: the TV thriller Il vicino di casa (1973) starring Laura Betti and Mimmo Palmara, and L'assassino è costretto ad uccidere ancora/The Killer Must Strike Again (1975), featuring George Hilton and Lisa and the Devil's Eduardo Fajardo and Alessio Orano. A true science fiction enthusiast, Cozzi had two proverbial irons in the fire at the time the Star Wars kettle came to a boil—a pair of screen treatments entitled Stella Starr (which became the film Starcrash, 1979) and I cavalieri delle stelle (which literally means "The Star Knights," but was provisionally called Star Riders in English).

Cozzi explains: "In the beginning, Stella Starr was being produced by Sam Arkoff at AIP. Arkoff came to Italy and I met with him. At the same time I was writing Stella Starr, I wrote another treatment called Star Riders for Fulvio Lucisano. But being in Italy, Lucisano lost some time in sending that screen treatment to Arkoff. When I gave the screen treatment for Stella Starr to Nat Wachsberger,[27] he just flew to LA and met Arkoff and made the deal. A couple of weeks later, Arkoff got the other treatment from Lucisano. He liked it very much and would have loved to make that picture, but he had already made the deal for Stella Starr, which was going to be AIP's one big science fiction exploitation picture that year. So I started shooting Stella Starr, which became Starcrash, and when Arkoff next came to Italy, he decided to go ahead and make Star Riders with Lucisano anyway. Fulvio asked Mario to direct it, so he came to the set where we were working and met Armando Valcauda, who was creating the special effects for my film. Valcauda was an old acquaintance of Bava's, but they hadn't met each other in years. After seeing Valcauda's work, Mario invited him to be in charge of the special effects on Star Riders."

Valcauda recalls how he came to work for Luigi Cozzi, and the day Bava visited his workshop: "In 1976, while I was doing some work with animated puppets and cartoons in my home studio, I read about Cozzi in a magazine. He was releasing some rare old fantasy films in the most important town in Italy. I wrote to him about my interest in the movies of Ray Harryhausen and the not-so-happy state of my career. He called me one day and visited my studio, and I showed him some shots combining some animated skeletons and live action, which he liked. We talked about producing a test reel for his next project. We made some interesting sequences involving spaceships and monsters, in a sort of imitation of [Harryhausen's stop-motion process] Dynamation. In 1977, Luigi got the money to produce Starcrash and called me for another test reel. It was successful, so I set about building some spaceships in Turin. About a month later, I went to Rome and production began in September. In October, the executive producer visited my workshop with two electricians to see my spaceships and robots—and with them were Mario Bava and his son

FIRST US paperback edition.

Lamberto! I was surprised to meet Bava on this occasion. He told me that he and Fulvio Lucisano were preparing a similar kind of movie. Bava liked my materials and promised to visit me the following week. We subsequently met three times, always at Cinecittà and always after lunch, because he was scared to death of his wife and wanted to be certain that she was sleeping soundly before he left the house! We always talked about effects, about painting on glass or applying cut pictures to glass. He was moved to nostalgia by the DeBrie camera I used for my stop-motion photography, because he still had the DeBrie he once used."

"Mario began to work in the preparation of the screenplay," Cozzi continues. "I am sure that he must have done some sketches. I gave the option to Lucisano, but I really don't know what happened after that, because I was working on my own picture. All I know is that, a few months later, I was called by Fulvio. He said he wanted me to write a script for Star Riders and also to direct, because the deal with Mario had fallen through. I don't know why."

Luigi Cozzi's Starcrash—its direction credited to "Lewis Coates"—was eventually distributed in the United States not by AIP but by Roger Corman's New World Pictures. Thanks to its modest budget, it enjoyed a considerable commercial success, but despite this, for reasons no one cares to remember, Star Riders was never made, though Cozzi claims that his script was novelized by A. E. van Vogt and published under that same title in America. There are several Internet websites devoted to the writings of van Vogt, but none of them list such a book in his bibliography.[28]

Another science fiction project that Bava and Lucisano envisioned during this period was Il vagabondo dello spazio/The Space Bum, based on the American science fiction novel Venus on the Half-Shell, which first appeared as a two-part serial in the December 1974 and January 1975 issues of The Magazine of Fantasy & Science Fiction; it was published simultaneously in mass-market paperback by Dell. The author, Kilgore Trout, was a pen name adopted by the renowned American science fiction novelist Philip José Farmer, who, suffering from writer's block, sought to alleviate it by writing under a liberating pseudonym. The name "Kilgore Trout" was derived from the works of Kurt Vonnegut Jr., who first mentioned Trout—a fictitious science fiction novelist doomed to commercial failure but exercising tremendous influence on a select few readers (not unlike Bava himself)—in his 1965 novel God Bless You, Mrs. Rosewater. (The name was inspired by that of science fiction novelist Theodore Sturgeon.) Trout's phony galaxy of work was also referenced in Vonnegut's 1969 novel Slaughterhouse Five, and the character eventually took centerstage as the main protagonist of Vonnegut's 1973 novel Breakfast of Champions.

Farmer obtained proper authorization from Vonnegut (with whom he shared a publisher) to use the name, and reportedly wrote the entire book in ninety days. Venus on the Half-Shell contains no references to Vonnegut, but is preceded with a short biographical sketch that provides the following overview of Trout's work: "As of 1974, Trout has written 117 novels and 2,000 short stories. Yet until recently he was little known. This regrettable situation is due to Trout's extreme reclusiveness and his indifference to the publication of his stories. He was ill-advised in his choice of publishers, the chief one, World Classics Library, being a firm specializing in pornographic novels and magazines." [29]

Vonnegut was not pleased by the novel, especially after reading published reports that it had become Farmer's best-selling work to date: "This Farmer wanted to forge on and write a whole series of books 'by' Trout—and I understand he's capable of knocking out a pretty decent Vonnegut book every six weeks. I hardly know Mr. Farmer. I've never met him and most of our contacts have been indirect, so I asked him, please, not to do it. And I asked my publisher, please, not to publish any more of his Trout books because the whole thing had become very upsetting to me. I understand he was really burned up about my decision. I heard he had made more money in that one 'Kilgore Trout year' than he had ever made before . . . In case you're too polite to ask, I didn't get any of the money."

According to Farmer, who responded to the reprinting of these remarks on a now-defunct Kilgore Trout webpage in 1999, Venus on the Half-Shell was a success but less so than the volumes of his renowned Riverworld series. He also avowed that he did not receive quite as much money as his publisher asserted in press releases, and that he had intended to write only one more Trout novel (The Son of Jimmy Valentine, mentioned in the biographical sketch) before retiring the byline. So, at Vonnegut's behest, there were no more Kilgore Trout novels. Vonnegut later restaked his claim on the character in 1997 with the publication of Timequake, another novel positioning Trout as protagonist.

Venus on the Half-Shell was published in Italy as Venere sulla conchiglia, translated by Angela Campana, in Mondadori's science fiction monthly Urania 93, 28 March 1976, which is undoubtedly where Bava discovered it. It is easy to see what attracted Bava to the novel; it is pulp science fiction—more accurately, a caricature of pulp science fiction—and also a Swiftian satire of human yearnings and fallacies, written with humor and mythic underpinnings. It's the story of Simon Wagstaff, a one-eyed, banjo-playing immortal of Earth whose longterm companions are a dog named Anubis, an owl named Athena, and a female robot named Chworktap (whom he meets stepping out of an alien ocean, a dead ringer for Botticelli's Venus). While having postcoital conversation about art and poetry with a young woman atop the great Sphinx of Giza, Simon is astonished when, in a flash, Earth is covered by great destructive tidal waves, washing away all human life and accomplishment. Making his way back to his spaceship, the Hwang Ho, he embarks on a voyage with his fellow travellers to search the universe for a definitive answer to the ultimate question: "Why are we created only to suffer and die?"

Each chapter of the novel takes Simon to a different planet, allowing Farmer/Trout to design alternative creatures who live alternative lifestyles, but all of the planets on the Space Bum's itinerary have one thing in common: a monolithic structure in the shape of a giant valentine heart, which each planetary culture remembers was placed there, countless eons ago, by a race known as the Clerun-Gowph. After surviving countless love affairs with extraterrestrials, and tens of thousands of years of prison sentences for thoughtlessly broken alien laws, Simon sets interplanetary sail for Clerun-Gowph, where the eldest living creature awaits him to answer his question. The interview, needless to say, is disappointing.

The rollicking narrative is inexhaustibly inventive and scholarly, tackling existential and humanistic issues directly and in metaphorical guise, yet Farmer/Trout always uses his erudition in the service of down-to-earth wisdom like "Immortality is a pain in the ass." The novel's meticulous attention to detail, its mythological parallels, its Rabelaisian stew of philosophy and human plumbing, and its combined wit and lack of pretentiousness, all would have made the book immensely appealing to Bava—though one cannot begin to imagine how he could have pulled it off.

After reading the novel, Bava pitched it to producer Fulvio Lucisano, and before long, trade ads announcing Il vagabondo dello spazio/The Space Bum began to appear. The film was supposed to have starred comedian Paolo Villaggio (then under exclusive contract to Lucisano) and a screenplay was going to be written by Lucio Manlio Battistrada, author of the effective Italian thrillers L'etrusco uccide ancora/The Dead Are Alive! (1972) and Macchie solari/Autopsy (1973). It was Bava's idea to have Villaggio play the lead not as Simon Wagstaff, but as his recurring, all-purpose character of Ugo Fantozzi (introduced in 1975's Fantozzi/White Collar Blues and revisited as recently as 1999's science fiction spoof Fantozzi 2000—la clonazione) who, in the year 3000, wanders through the farthest reaches of space looking for the meaning of it all. "There were going to be a lot of alien creatures, but I would have kept them all offscreen," Bava said. [30]

Lamberto Bava: "My father wanted so much to make this picture that he drew many set sketches, and also several storyboards. It was going to be a science fiction story about a future society in which the universe had achieved a state of absolute entropy and degradation, when everything had gone down the tubes . . . It was a galaxy populated only by beggars and street people, with very few spaceships that still flew because nobody knew how to repair them any more or how to make them go. Against this evocative setting, the rest of the film was developed as a kind of space version of the classic Christie thriller Ten Little Indians." [31]

Though the setting of the film sounds very promising, the prospect of reducing Farmer's flamboyant satire to yet another variation of Ten Little Indians, with the myriad weird life forms of the novel kept offscreen, makes one vaguely grateful that the picture wasn't made. There is also good reason to believe that the project never actually progressed very far beyond the point of nebulous discussion. When I corresponded with her about this project, Philip José Farmer's wife Bette—who has kept track of all her husband's professional sales throughout his career—was unable to remember, or find any record of, the film rights to Venus on the Half-Shell ever being sold to Fulvio Lucisano, Italian International, Mario Bava, or anyone else.

Despite Bava's failure to get Il vagabondo dello spazio off the ground, his young admirer Armando Valcauda landed a job as a special effects designer on another Paolo Villaggio comedy set in outer space, entitled Tre tigri contro tre tigri ("Three Tigers vs. Three Tigers," 1977). Working on one particular sequence of this picture provided Valcauda with an unexpected opportunity to renew professional contact with his mentor.

"It was a comic sequence involving some spaceships and monsters," Valcauda recalled. "For four months, I lived and slept at Cinecittà to create this sequence. In the end, the director [Sergio Corbucci], the producer [Fulvio Lucisano], and the editor [Amadeo Salfa]—none of whom was an expert in this type of material—refused to accept my work! They gave me many long and complicated reasons why my work would have to be redone. Then I remembered Lucisano's friendship with Bava, and I asked for them to let my work be judged by Bava. I told them that I was prepared to redo everything, if Bava agreed it was necessary. Mario came in and watched my reel, gave a little applause, and suggested only one improvement. The others sat there with green faces!" [32]

27 Nat Wachsberger (1916–92), producer of numerous European co-productions since 1955, whose most recent work at this time included the legendary unreleased Jerry Lewis film The Day the Clown Cried (1972) and Val Guest's Killer Force (1975).

28 Nor does the book appear to have been published pseudonymously. A novel by Josephine Pulleine-Thompson, entitled Star Riders of the Moor, was published in the UK in 1976, making it a bit too early, and a later novel, The Star Riders of Ren by Calvin Miller, was published in 1983 but was the second volume in Miller's "The Singreale Chronicles" series.

29 Kilgore Trout (Philip Jose Farmer), Venus on the Half-Shell (New York NY: Dell Publishing Co. Inc., 1975).

30 Alberto Abruzzese, et al., La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979), 83–89.

31 Lamberto Bava interview, "Mario Bava, Mio Padre" in Luigi Cozzi, Il Cinema Gotico e Fantastico Italiano Vol 1—Mario Bava, I Mille Volti Della Paura (Rome, Italy: Mondo Ignoto/Profondo Rosso, 2001), 155.

32 Armando Valcauda, letter to the author, April 27, 1990.

FAUSTO DI BELLA as Alphonse, who foolishly places a wedding ring on the finger of LA VENERE D'ILLE.

La Venere d'Ille

MARIO BAVA MADE his final film as a director for Italian television. Once again, the opportunity came about due to the industriousness of Lamberto Bava, who again co-scripted and co-directed, this time sharing the directorial credit with his father for the first and only time.

Based on an 1829 short story by Prosper Mérimée (1803–70), La Venere d'Ille was shot in 16 mm, on a very tight budget and schedule, with a crew consisting largely of friends and family; it thus represents a near-complete return to the basics of cinema that were at Mario's disposal when he photographed his first shorts at the side of Roberto Rossellini, forty years earlier.

Mérimée's story was not exactly an original, but one of those legendary tales that writers throughout the centuries have told and told again. In a preliminary note to his comic novella The Eve of Saint Venus (1950/published 1964), which follows very similar narrative lines, Anthony Burgess traces its history thusly: "This is based on a tale told by [Robert] Burton (The Anatomy of Melancholy: Pt. 3, Sec. 2, Mem. I, Subs. I), which he got from Florilegus, ad annum 1058 . . ." [1] Burgess does not mention Mérimée's contribution to this chain of events, though as a musician he must have been aware of it; Mérimée was most famous for writing the original story upon which Bizet based his world-famous opera, Carmen. An early master at the melding of horror and eroticism (one of his story collections bears the title Tales of Love and Death), Mérimée considered "La Vénus d'Ille" (the story's French title) the finest of his many short stories. In addition to the Bava version, the story has been twice adapted for French television: first in 1957 by writer Jean-Claude Youry and director Pierre Badel, and again in 1980 by the writing/directing team of Jean-Jacques Bernard and Robert Réa.

The teleplay by Lamberto Bava and Cesare Garboli follows Mérimée's story faithfully, with the minor exception of replacing the story's original narrator (Mérimée himself) with a fictional observer named Mathieu.

Synopsis

While uprooting a dead tree from the grounds of the De Peyrehorade estate, a pair of workmen uncover a human hand. M. De Peyrehorade, the landowner, arrives on the scene and helps them unearth an ancient Greek bronze statue of Venus, the Goddess of Love, which dates from before the birth of Christ. Its beauty astonishes him. As the workmen lift it from the ground with ropes, it falls, crushing the leg of one of the workers. De Peyrehorade believes the find to be important and summons Mathieu—an accomplished artist and "authority on all beautiful things"—to verify the statue as a masterpiece. Mathieu's arrival coincides with the marriage of De Peyrehorade's son Alphonse to Mlle. Clara De Puygarrig, who recently inherited a vast fortune following the death of her aunt.

Mathieu is immediately sensitive to Clara and sees that Alphonse, an empty-headed athlete and ladies' man, is marrying her only for her money. ("My woman isn't made of bronze," he boasts, "She's made of gold . . . lots of gold.") Alphonse is also proud of his wedding ring, a family heirloom of two interlaced hands inscribed with the words "Yours forever," which he has augmented with $2,000 worth of diamonds. On his first night, from his bedroom window, Mathieu sees two local boys daring one another to touch the "unlucky" idol; when one of them throws a stone at the statue, the rock bounces off and strikes the offender, scaring the children away. Mathieu's attempts to capture the Venus in a drawing are likewise thwarted, as he finds himself drawing Clara's likeness instead.

On the morning of the wedding, Alphonse is lured into a game of pelota (badminton) and, for safekeeping, slips his wedding band onto the ring finger of the nearby Venus. He is pulled out of the game by his angered parents and dragged to the ceremony, forgetting the ring and placing a humble substitute instead on his bride's finger. That night, a drunken and carousing Alphonse confides to Mathieu that, when he returned to the statue to retrieve the ring, he was unable to pry it from her finger. Mathieu ventures outdoors to retrieve the ring himself and finds Clara in the garden, her mood darker and more solicitous than usual. "You still don't know who I am," she taunts him. They kiss, but Mathieu is reserved. "You're just like all the rest," she criticizes. "You don't know how to surrender yourself to love." Mathieu returns inside, leaving Clara in the garden, but finds her inside at the party.

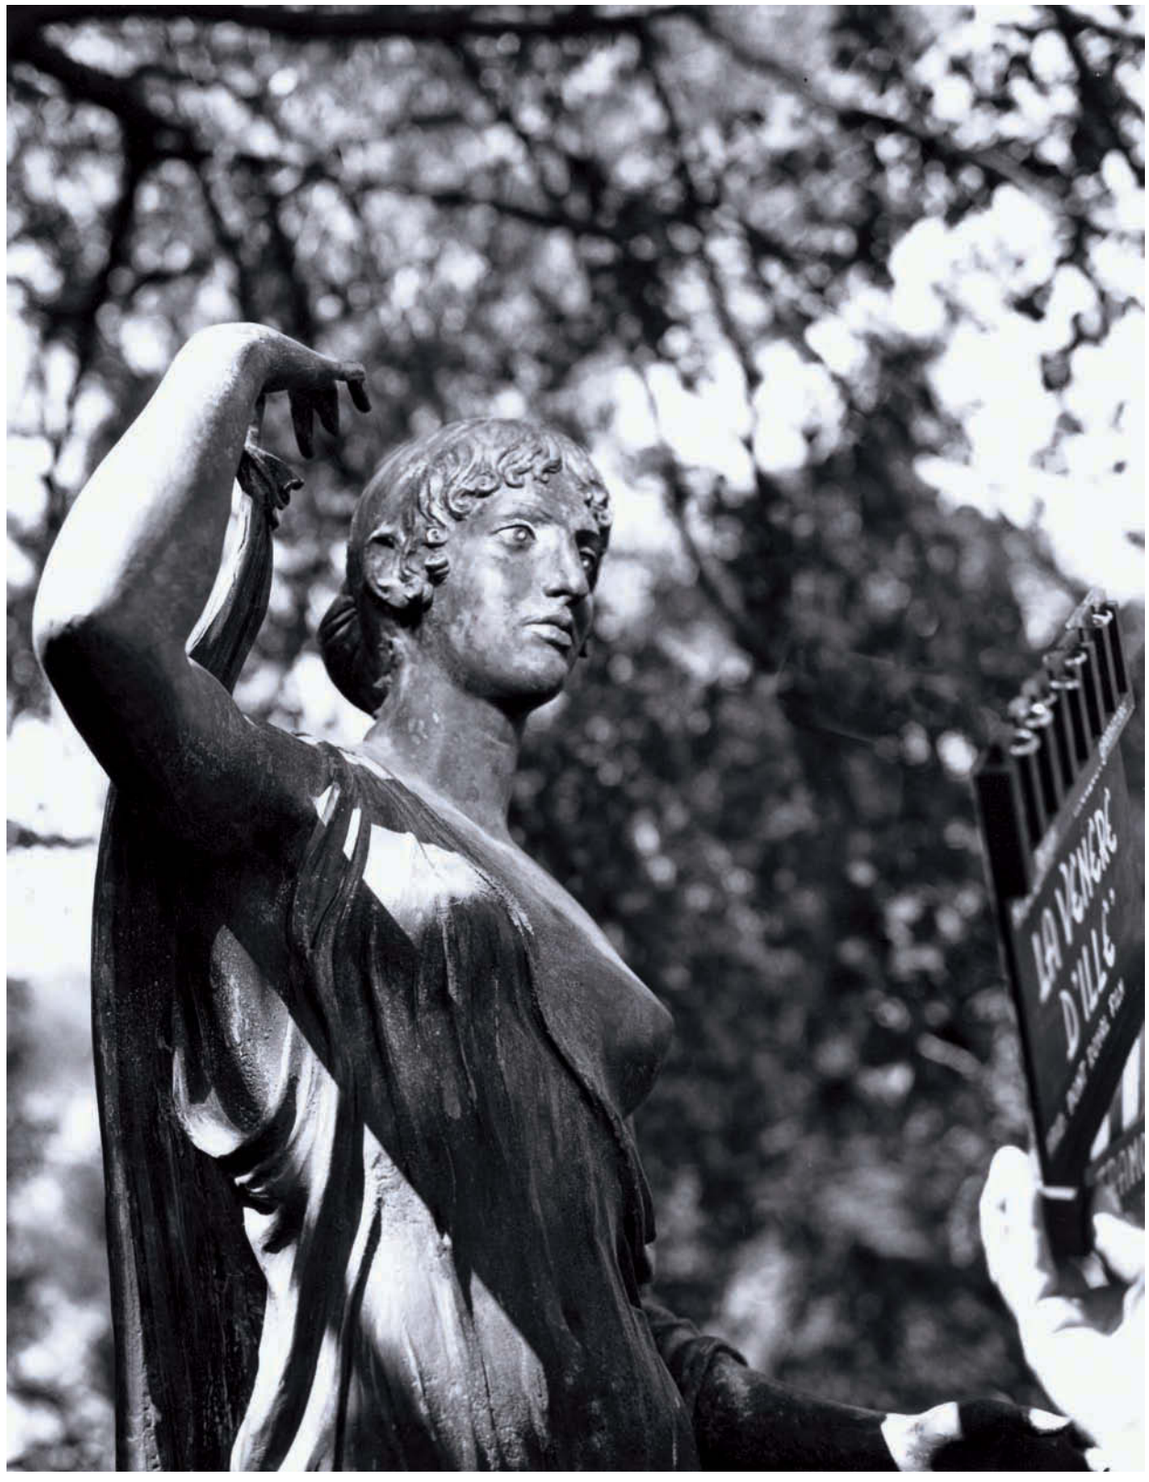
That night in his room, Mathieu hears heavy footsteps walking down the corridor toward the wedding chamber, and imagines Alphonse drunkenly heading for bed. Clara waits timidly for her groom in a veiled four-poster bed, but jumps out and crouches in fright on the floor as a towering silhouette intrudes. The floorboards groaning under its weight, the shadow disappears behind the veils of the bed. Clara watches, too aghast to speak, as Alphonse arrives and undresses for bed, only to be pulled behind the veils into a spine-crushing bronze embrace. The next morning, the De Peyrehorades discover their son's broken, bloody body sprawled across the bed, his flesh and blood bride reduced to a state of madness. On the floor, Mathieu finds the wedding ring which Alphonse had placed on the finger of Venus.

Some time later, Mathieu receives a letter from M. De Peyrehorade, informing him of Mme. De Peyrehorade's death, and the fact that he will be named as a beneficiary in his will, as the recipient of his art collection—with the exception of the Venus, which he has sent to a church to be melted down and recast into a bell.

Production & Cast

La Venere d'Ille was filmed as an episode of a projected RAI-TV series entitled I giochi del diavolo: storie fantastiche dell'800 ("The Devil's Notebook: Fantastic Tales of the 19th century"), which adapted supernatural tales from classic (read: free-for-the-taking) literary sources. While the production itself went without a hitch, the finished product suffered the same indignity as the other films made during Bava's unluckiest decade. Incredibly, RAI shelved the entire series for three years, until RAI-2 dusted it off for a six-week run in May-June of 1981—over a year after Mario Bava's death.

The series consisted of only six episodes: Giulio Questi's L'uomo della sabbia (5/20/81), based on a tale by E. T. A. Hoffmann; La Venere d'Ille (5/27/81); Marcello Aliprandi's La mano indemoniata (6/17/81), based on a story by Gérard de Nerval; Piero Nelli's La presenza perfetta, based on Henry James' Sir Edmund Horne, and Tomàso Shermàn's Il diavolo nella bottiglia, from a story by Robert Louis Stevenson (both aired 6/23/81); and Giovanna Gagliardo's Il sogno dell'altro (6/24/81), an adaptation of H. G. Wells' Mr. Elvesham. Those who caught the entire run of episodes agree that the Bava episode was the series' finest achievement.



Lamberto Bava admits to directing the greater share of La Venere d'Ille. "Here, as in Schock, I took care of most of the pre-production. I chose the cast, spoke with the architects . . . then my father came in and, if he didn't agree with something, we talked about it. He and I divided the scenes between us: 'I'll do a part of this and you do another part.' Sometimes two heads are better than one. I directed all the kitchen scenes, which have a more realistic touch; I don't think my father would have filmed them the same way. I had the good fortune of having, as my writing partner, the great Cesare Garboli. I wrote the first part, he wrote the second, and then we put it together. We had already talked so extensively about all the really essential

La Venere d'Ille

"The Venus of Ille"
Filmed at Castello Giuliano and on location
June 1978
First broadcast: May 27, 1981.
16 mm, Color, 1.37:1, 60 minutes

Production: Pont Royal Film TV, RAI-2. Producers: Franco Franca, Carlo Tuzii. Directors: Mario Bava, Lamberto Bava. Screenplay: Lamberto Bava and Cesare Garboli, based on the story by Prosper Mérimée. Continuity: Rosanna Rocchi. Director of photography: Nino Celeste. Camera operator: Fabio Conversi. Art direction: Sandro Dell'Orco. Wardrobe: Sandro Bellomia. Makeup: Massimo Giustini. Hairdresser: Corràda Cristofori. Production manager: Bruno Ricci. Production assistants: Massimo Alberni and Gianni Federici. Editor: Fernanda Papa. Music: Ubaldo Continiello. Sound engineer: Raffaele de Lucas. Sound dubbing: Pierangelo Livera.

Marc Porel (Mathieu), Daria Nicolodi (Mlle. Clara De Puygarrig), Mario Maranzana (M. De Peyrehorade), Fausto Di Bella (Alphonse De Peyrehorade), Diana De Curtis (Madame De Peyrehorade), Adriana Innocenti (Maria, the servant girl), Fabrizio Bava (boy under table), Francesco De Federico (Giovanni).

THE BRONZE statue unearthed on the property of M. De Peyrehorade.

things, that the first draft was approved and there were very few things left to fix. We're talking about a TV movie, about a statue that kills someone, so we couldn't show much, but in its basic characteristics, even if it was a Gothic, it was a step in a different direction from my father's other films."[2]

Lamberto recalls that the film was shot in summertime. "I remember that Daria Nicolodi wore a perfume that attracted wasps and bees, so definitely summer, and the leaves of the trees were large, so it was surely June," he deduces.

Giving a fine, understated performance in the lead role of Mathieu is Swiss actor Marc Porel. Born Marc Landry in Lausanne on January 3, 1949, he broke into French films while still a teenager. His dark, romantic, sincere look echoed the appeal of another young achiever, Jean-Pierre Léaud, but could also convey the insolence of Alain Delon. Some of Porel's earliest appearances were in Costa-Gavras' Un homme de trop/Shock Troops (1967), Henri Verneuil's Le Clan des Siciliens/The Sicilian Clan (1969), and George Lautner's The Road to Salina (1970), the last film to star Rita Hayworth. In 1972, after appearing in Luchino Visconti's Ludwig, Porel played a homicidal priest in Lucio Fulci's Non si sevizia di paperino/Don't Torture the Duckling, generally considered to be the finest of the shreckmeister's thrillers. After this success, Italian films became the norm for Porel, including one last collaboration with Visconti in L'innocente/The Innocent (1976), a film for the great director's nephew (Eriprando Visconti's Una spirale di nebbia, 1977, another thriller in which he played a deceptively handsome killer), and some attempts at type-smashing like his turn as a detective in Fulci's Sette note in nero/The Psychic (1979) and a series of trashy erotic films, including Enzo Milioni's La sorella di Ursula ("Ursula's Sister," 1978) and Cesare Canaveri's Delitto carnale ("Carnal Crimes," 1981). Porel was also a writer; his screenplay Un Officier de Police sans Importance/A Police Officer Without Importance was filmed by Jean Larriaga in 1972. Porel shocked his coterie of fans when meningitis cut his life short in Casablanca, Morocco, on August 23, 1983. He was only 34 years of age.

In the role of Clara, Daria Nicolodi gives a markedly different performance to the one she gave in Schock, breathing life into a somewhat cipherish character that speaks volumes

1 Anthony Burgess, The Eve of Saint Venus (New York NY: W. W. Norton & Company, 1970).

2 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

about this timid woman and her small town lack of choices for a suitable mate. The chemistry between herself and co-star Marc Porel is delicate and well-sustained, making the viewer implicitly aware from the outset that their mutual, unspoken attraction is doomed, at the very least, to be a missed opportunity.

"They were both controversial films," Daria Nicolodi says of Schock and La Venere d'Ille. "Personally, I love them, but I know that Dario [Argento], for example, doesn't particularly like either of them. Looking back now, I feel a great nostalgia . . . although we had to work with very limited means, working with Mario Bava was a wonderful experience."[3]

After completing La Venere d'Ille, Nicolodi worked once again with Bava—after a fashion—by appearing in Dario Argento's Inferno (1980), the second of the "Three Mothers" films she had inspired, for which Bava devised several effects shots. Minor roles followed in Sergio Citti's Il minestrone (1981, starring Roberto Begnini) and the miniseries Verdi (1982), and Nicolodi eventually renewed her rocky relationship with Argento, resulting in a secondary role in Tenebrae (1982) and after breaking off again, a downright insulting one in Phenomena (1984), in which she admits to "being 30, playing 50, and being made to look 60," while delivering lines like "These are the things that can happen in a woman's life." In 1985 came perhaps her biggest break, being third-billed under Jack Lemmon and Marcello Mastroianni in Ettore Scola's Maccheroni/Macaroni, but the role was not really creative enough to be worthy of her, or to liberate her image from its close alliance with Argento. She worked one last time with Argento in Opera/Terror at the Opera (1987, in which she was given one of the most memorably staged deaths in his oeuvre), and then worked twice for Lamberto Bava, in the sex thriller Le foto di Gioia/Delirium (1987) and his excellent TV movie Il gioco ("The Joke," 1989). Also in 1989, she played a supporting role in the terrible Paganini Horror, directed by Luigi Cozzi, with whom she shared credit for the screenplay. Acting only sporadically through most of the 1990s, which she spent mostly by raking over the past in various documentaries about Argento, Nicolodi recently started accepting mother roles, as in Mimmo Calopresti's La parola amore esiste/Notes of Love (1998) and Scarlet Diva (2000), in which she plays the mother of its star (and director), her real-life daughter Asia Argento. In the fall of 2006, it was announced that Nicolodi would be joining her daughter in the cast of The Mother of Tears, Dario Argento's long-awaited climax to the trilogy begun with Suspiria and Inferno.

DARIA NICOLODI as Clara.

ALPHONSE introduces his fiancee Clara to visiting artist Mathieu (Marc Porel).

Mario Maranzana gives a touching performance as the exuberant, yet sensitive and ultimately tragic M. De Peyrehorade. Maranzana first achieved popularity on Italian television, playing the regular role of Lucas on a series devoted to Georges Simenon's detective hero, Inspector Maigret, which ran from 1964–1972. He acted opposite Steve Reeves in his final film Vivo per la tua morte/A Long Ride From Hell (1968, co-scripted by Operazione paura's Roberto Natale), and opposite Franco and Ciccio in their Spaghetti Western parody Ciccio perdona . . . Io no! ("Ciccio Forgives, I Don't!" 1968); he won plum roles in the English-language Goodbye Mr. Chips (1969) and Lady Caroline Lamb (1972); and he paid his dues in various Italian exploitation films and comedies of note, including Armando Crispino's L'Etrusco uccide ancora/The Dead Are Alive! (1972), Lucio Fulci's La pretora (1976), Walerian Borowczyzk's Interno di un convento/Behind Convent Walls (1977), and Ruggero Deodato's Concorde Affaire '79/The Concorde Affair (1979).

Fausto Di Bella, who plays Augusto, had previously appeared in a dozen or more pictures in minor roles, including Sergio Martino's violent giallo, I corpi presentano tracce di violenza carnale/Torso (1973), Emanuelle nera orient reportage/Emanuelle in Bangkok (1976), and Pasquale Festa Campanile's thriller Autostop rosso sangue/Hitch Hike (1977). He had previously worked with Mario Bava on Moses the Lawgiver in 1974.

La Venere d'Ille also marks the screen debut of the fourth generation of the Bava family to work in the cinema. For a scene requiring a young boy to crawl under a table during the wedding feast and steal Clara's garter to the uproarious amusement of the room, Mario recruited Lamberto's son Roy, who is billed under his birth name of Fabrizio Bava.

"It's the movie of Mario's that I remember best," he says. "I used to go to the set quite often, when they were shooting in Castel Giuliano, near Rome. Lamberto and Mario found a lot of nice, supportive people to work with them. There was a wonderful atmosphere on the set; in all the years since, I've never known such a nice atmosphere on a movie set."

Cinematography & Special Effects

The film's special effects are few, but highly inventive. The startling trick-shot of the Venus bouncing a hurled rock back at two abusive boys was created in the editing; the three shots in the montage are a long-shot of the rock being thrown, a medium close-up of the rock bouncing off the statue, and another long-shot of a rock being thrown at the children. Only when one studies the montage frame-by-frame does one notice that the rock is thrown in the last shot from slightly above the Venus.

In the film's penultimate shot, M. De Peyrehorade watches the Venus staue being carted away on a wagon. At first glance, the shot seems to have been achieved by placing a small camera aboard a wagon; on closer inspection of the frame, it becomes evident that there was no wagon at all. The shot—quite possibly the most convincing of all Bava's matte shots—is composed of an extreme low-angle shot of the Venus, its back wreathed in hay, receding from a background view of actor Mario Maranzana. The statue was in fact photographed from below, with hay arranged about its shoulders; the photo was then mounted on a sheet of glass that was attached to a makeshift dolly and wheeled away from Maranzana, with the sound effect of a wagon dubbed in!

Commentary

What is most remarkable about La Venere d'Ille are the ways in which it brings Bava's directorial career full circle, back to elements of his debut La maschera del demonio. Both films are based on classic short stories of the fantastic, both are set in the 19th century, and both focus on the exhumation of a female character, a link with the distant past, whose allure is manifest in the form of a double. The evil Princess Asa, a disciple of ancient pagan religion, and her virginal descendant Princess Katia, are mirrored in La Venere d'Ille by the Greek statue of Venus (described as "dating back before the birth of Christ") and by Clara De Puygarrig. Clara is not a literal lookalike to the statue, but a subjective one. After seeing Clara at a distance, Mathieu's nascent feelings for her seem to crystallize as he sits to sketch the statue. He finds he cannot draw a proper likeness because his attempts to draw the statue always turn out looking like Clara.

"I can't seem to capture her expression," he complains to M. De Peyrehorade (from whom he conceals his attempts). "Look at those lines . . . the way the mouth is fixed . . . the empty gaze of her eyes . . . her inflection . . . her contrasts. It is as if the artist sought to accentuate her wickedness. There is something ferocious in this Venus. If such a woman truly existed, she would take your breath away."

The two men proceed to haggle over an inscription found on the base of the statue, which De Peyrehorade interprets as meaning "Take care of those you love," speculating that it may have been dedicated to a woman who suffered in love. Mathieu, of the opinion that the inscription was engraved later as a baleful warning, perhaps by a past owner, translates the words to mean "Beware of those you love." Humorously, De Peyrehorade responds by saying, after a beat, that he thinks he will stand by his own interpretation. In this exchange, Bava seems to be declaring his own final decision in the matter, after twenty years of contemplating the two faces of Woman as a director, and as a man. The film's sweet air of gentle resignation may be Bava's own, deciding to take care, rather than to beware, of the woman in his own life.

Women are the chief protagonists in Bava's filmography, even when his male characters take the apparent lead (e.g., Operazione paura, Roy Colt & Winchester Jack), and La Venere d'Ille offers his final thoughts on the complexities of womankind, and also their vexing simplicities. In Bava's mind, this dichotomy may also encompass the gulf between art and reality. In one of Mathieu's first conversations with Clara, Bava dramatizes the very real pain of an artist confronted with a woman whose soul is shallow compared to the depths of her beauty:

MATHIEU
Why did you pick Alphonse to be your husband? A man so unlike you. You're sensible, delicate—not . . .

CLARA
Look at him. Take a good look. I like him. Is it true you're going to draw my portrait?

MATHIEU
Who told you that?

CLARA
Alphonse.

MATHIEU
No. I don't believe I shall. There's something strange about you . . . something I don't understand. No, I don't think I could draw you.

CLARA
But why? I'm not such a difficult subject. What's wrong with me?

MATHIEU
I don't know . . . I can't get a fixed image of you. There's something about your eyes. You're like two people.

CLARA
You're complicated. That's why I prefer Alphonse.

The reference to Clara's eyes is complemented with a brief, concentrated burst of montage unlike anything else in the Bava canon, as the camera captures isolated details of her face noticed fleetingly by the artist: an eye looking up through a spray of long lashes, soft lips parted in surprise and almost mocking amusement. The changeable quality of her eyes, noted by Mathieu, is also a characteristic of the Greek statue, mentioned earlier by Giuseppe, the workman who escorts Mathieu to the De Peyrehorade home: "Her eyes stare vacantly . . . sometimes, they gleam like gold; other times, they're as dark as dirt." The scene also leaves us pondering Clara's own name, which suggests a level of clarity or simplicity that may be enviable in some ways, while also carrying certain bovine associations.

If the schism that exists between Asa and Katia can be reduced to a diagram of the Madonna/Whore complex, that which exists between Venus and Clara is a diagram of Woman as art and reality. The women of flesh and blood in La Venere d'Ille are superficial; it is the woman of bronze who has infinite depth. Clara is introduced as a mysterious, Brontëan figure on horseback, lovely and heroic and inscrutable, seemingly worthy of comparison to the Venus. Later, however, when Mathieu witnesses how Alphonse ignores and abuses Clara by carousing with other women at the wedding party, making no secret of his intention to betray her with them, he dares to confront her with the question of why she has settled for such a man, and she responds by accusing him of being overly complex and stating her preference for simpler types like Alphonse.

There is something universal in this form of rejection, which surely every artist has experienced at one point or another, when an expression of empathy, thoughtfulness, or simple candor has been thrown back in their face by someone who regards depth as an repugnant quality. As this film shows, personal complexity may well make life more difficult, may even make personal happiness more elusive, but it is only by cultivating a complex view of the world that we can hope to avoid the various traps which life puts before us. Clara, one feels, has chosen to marry Alphonse due to a lack of available options in her small village. When Mathieu arrives, he is obviously better suited to her, and would have been capable of bringing out her better qualities, but he arrives in her life too late; Clara's predisposition to offense may well arise from the feelings of disappointment in her choice, which Mathieu's presence makes known to her. In other words, Mathieu provides the counterpoint to Alphonse that the Venus provides, in his eyes, to her.

3 Luca M. Palmerini and Gaetano Mistretta, Spaghetti Nightmares (Rome, Italy: M&P Edizone, 1996), 215.

CANDID shots of Mario Bava (with ever-present pack of Marlboros) and Daria Nicolodi conversing on the set.

In his boorish simplicity, athletic and amorous, Alphonse also proceeds through life incautiously, giving no thought to his actions or their consequences. He marries Clara only to gain access to her fortune, making no pretense of loving her. The truth of his feelings is expressed by the careless gesture of placing his bride's wedding ring on the statue's finger for safekeeping, which is a conscious act only in terms of his concern for the value of the ring (which he covers with his coat), but not in its symbolic value, which would take a more "complicated" soul like Mathieu to properly appreciate. Alphonse is thus not truly married to Clara (on whose finger he places a ring given to him by a past indiscretion) but to the Goddess of Love, in all her pagan variety. The wedding is furthermore held on a Friday, the day consecrated to Venus, which arouses the superstitions of some villagers, while M. De Peyrehorade responds, "What better day for a wedding?"

The figure of earthly woman is also criticized via the supporting characters. Mme. De Peyrehorade is a comic figure, forcing food onto a courteous but resisting Mathieu; the servant girl, Maria, does the name thing figuratively by making a display of her breasts, barely concealed by her low-cut dress, to every man in sight. By extension, the film depicts food as something repugnant, foisted by women on men from the cradle to the grave; we see it in various stages of preparation, all framed in a deliberately revolting way, as hogs are gutted, hares are skinned, and paws and trotters are hacked from meaty limbs with befouled cleavers on the butcher's block. The camera observes these details with such a jaundiced eye that they look less like parts of an appetizing meal than like the predigested form of feces.

Food never claimed much attention in Bava's earlier work, but La Venere d'Ille is smothered in it. In the 1960s, Bava loved to go to restaurants, to drink wine with fine food, but in the late 1970s, all that had changed. He no longer took much pleasure in food, lost a great deal of weight, and seemed to have aged dramatically. "Mario was super-skinny," his friend Andrea Piazzesi confirms. "He would never eat anything; you could invite him to the best restaurants in Rome and he would order nothing. And he didn't care for people who liked food, either; he accused them of having a pig's mentality. He felt that an egg was a sufficient meal."

Daria Nicolodi, who had by now known Bava for several years, also noticed this change in his character: "When I first met him, in the early 1970s, he ate and drank normally. Later, he ate very few things, and he didn't drink at all. Yet he smoked a great deal and sometimes, he complained of cramps in his legs—like a waiter in a restaurant, or a director who spends a lot of time standing on their legs without rest."

Considering the way that La Venere d'Ille equates food and marriage, one cannot help but suspect that Bava may have been punishing himself, starving himself, denying himself, in response to his sublimated anger and frustration over his wife's obesity. The relationship of food and marriage is given direct comment in an exchange between Maria and an older cook during the preparations of the wedding feast:

> MARIA
> We'll remember this day for years to come! I've never seen so much food!
>
> COOK
> This is nothing. I can remember the wedding feast of the De Peyrehorades. We cooked for forty-eight hours, without sleeping! Those were the days . . .
>
> MAN
> Go on, get back to work! When we finish—then you can cluck like hens!

Curiously, Alfred Hitchcock's penultimate feature Frenzy pays similar emphasis to the subject of food. Hitchcock himself was a life-long gourmand whose father worked in a London produce market, and Donald Spoto remarks in The Art of Alfred Hitchcock that, "Food, in Frenzy, is a basic visual metaphor for the devouring abuses of man-against-man."[4] In contrast, Bava always inverted the subtext of man's inhumanity to man to be his main text; his subtext could usually be reduced to a common thread of greed—the most material urge of a material world.

In La Venere d'Ille, greed lay at the heart of Alphonse's cold-blooded marriage, but more carnal forms of avarice are evident in his infidelities, as it is in the women's attitudes toward food—a form of pleasure that 19th century women governed. Art and beauty, the loves that enter us through the eye, are treated as the only sources of true spiritual nourishment. Had Bava made this film when he was a younger man, he might have invested his vision wholly in such a latitude—but as La Venere d'Ille was made at the end of his life, he was experienced enough to understand that art and beauty serve different functions when a man is in his 20s, like Mathieu, or in his 60s, like M. De Peyrehorade.

Mathieu's absorption in the Venus, like his reaction to his first glimpse of Clara, is silent and stoic because it is deeply personal. When we see him wrestling with the task of sketching a likeness of the Venus on paper, we understand that he is in fact dredging the depths of his inner self, tracing the feelings awakened by the Venus. We never learn where he comes from (perhaps Rome, given M. De Peyrehorade's mocking description of him as a "tiger from the capitol") or about his past relationships; we are only told that his pocketwatch, which Alphonse admires, was "a gift . . . a gift from Venus." Thus, this is not a first encounter for Mathieu, just as the deliberate past burial of the idol indicates this is not the first time this unhappy story has unfolded on the De Peyrehorade property. History repeats itself, as one replays the details of a trauma in an effort to exorcise it of its power.

In the case of M. De Peyrehorade, who has outgrown the primarily sexual phase of life and marriage, the Venus is a less complicated thing. It is something to be admired, purely and simply; it does not represent anything deep within his soul, nor does it represent his doom. Even when it does destroy his son, he stands incredulous, unable to comprehend how such a thing could happen. Perhaps because he is an art collector, rather than an artist, he takes art materially rather than personally. Though the story's postscript is handled elliptically, it is nevertheless tragic to see the once-robust M. De Peyrehorade parting with his Venus, after it has laid waste to his entire family, because we remember how its discovery brought him such joy—perhaps the last jolt of sexual joy he will know in his lifetime. The fact that he sends it to a church, with orders that it be melted down and recast as a bell, recalls the central sequence of creation in Andrei Tarkovsky's epic film Andrei Rublyov/Andrei Rublev (1969), which details the painstaking process of casting a bell and is considered by many to be the greatest film ever made on the subject of what it means to be an artist.

The opening of the film, with the groundskeepers discovering the Venus buried underground, also hearkens back to La maschera del demonio by suggesting an entire backstory that is never told and doesn't need to be. The attentive viewer will intuit at once that the statue was deliberately buried by an earlier generation of landowners as a means of banishing its evil, and the inscription found on its base (engraved later, as Mathieu theorizes) stands as a warning to anyone who would resurrect it. Once again, also, we have an example of (in context) the present resonating with the past, as with Princess Katia's resemblance to the painting of her evil ancestor; not only does Mathieu perceive a resemblance between the statue and Clara, but when the statue briefly assumes human form to be romanced by him in the garden, Venus is played by Daria Nicolodi—in a more poised and stylized manner than she plays Clara. Whether this encounter really takes place with Clara or Venus personified remains ambiguous—but not too ambiguous. The introduction of Nicolodi in the garden is filmed with a telling, tracking camera move that seems to deliberately recall an earlier shot of the statue, in which it was moved apace with the camera, tightly framing its face and illuminated eyes, in an example of how its gaze seems to "follow" its admirers.

La Venere d'Ille puts the final piece to the puzzle of Bava's career and makes explicit that which has been implicit in his oeuvre all along. The degree of stylization which Bava brought to his earlier films was, consciously or not, his expression of the spiritual dimension he knew to exist in life—the internal, eternal truth that can be externalized only through expressions in art. It is always there, unseen by his carnal characters, mocking their butchery as they murder for money, as they prey upon the blood of lovers and family, and it is there to receive them all at the moments of their deaths. As such, La Venere d'Ille functions as a much more satisfying summation of intents than Schock.

The impressive quality of La Venere d'Ille contradicts the supposed dishonor of concluding one's directorial career with a shared credit on a made-for-television movie. From a technical standpoint, it is one of Bava's most perfectly realized creations; from a creative perspective, it is a remarkable distillation of everything he chose to express, directly or indirectly, in his twenty-year career as a director of motion pictures. In addition to everything else it achieves, it boasts an impeccable recreation of 19th century rural life and its people. It contains more warmth, heart, and romantic yearning than any other Bava film, and it feels like one of his most autobiographical pictures, with Bava himself twinned between the characters of Mathieu and M. De Peyrehorade. Coming after the similar disclosures of Lisa and the Devil, which approached them in more furtive fashion, one feels the impact of Cani arrabbiati on his art—Bava can now speak less obtusely through his art and embrace his characters without stylizing them to abstract degrees. It is a tantalizing sample of a sensibility he would have brought to subsequent projects, had he lived and been able to continue making films, horror or otherwise, despite the increasingly moribund state of the Italian cinema.

Here is Mario Bava again once among the statues, pursuing art and beauty through the eyes of "a romantic artisan," and loving not wisely but too well, from afar.

4 Donald Spoto, The Art of Alfred Hitchcock (Garden City NY: Dolphin/Doubleday, 1976), 436.

INFERNO

DETAIL of the rare UK quad poster, picturing Mater Tenebrarum's triumphant transformation into the spectre of Death.

AFTER LA VENERE D'ILLE, Mario Bava returned to semi-retirement and odd consultation jobs, hoping that the forthcoming broadcast of his film would bring more opportunities to direct. In the meantime, he stayed at home, read a lot—and smoked a lot.

During this listless period, circa 1978, Bava's beloved dog Centi finally died, succumbing to advanced age and renal failure. "Mario and Centi were absolutely close," says Georgia Bava. "He refused to buy another dog, but my aunt Elena [Mario's daughter] had a female dog called Tappo, who had three puppies. Elena kept two females from the litter and gave away the male. One of the two females, the one called Isotta, was given to Mario—and returned to Elena after his death."

Bava's professional activities during this period are generally unknown, even to his son Lamberto, who was then preoccupied with his own burgeoning career as an associate in film and advertising at Ruggero Deodato's production company. Triestene film critic Lorenzo Codelli remembers trying to reach Bava by telephone in 1979, and finding him uncharacteristically out of town. Bava returned his call from Spain, where he may have gone to meet with director Frank Agrama, who had invited him to create the special effects for his forthcoming film Dawn of the Mummy. Bava may have given Agrama some technical advice, but he did not work on the picture, which ultimately did not go into production until later in 1980, after Bava's death.

It was also in 1979 that the young special effects designer Armando Valcauda met Mario for the last time when he and Fulvio Lucisano surprised him by visiting the set of Aldo Lado's L'umanoide/The Humanoid. [1]

BAVA photographed with Dario Argento on the set of INFERNO.

"Bava was also in this place, always with Lucisano, but their science fiction project [Il vagabondo dello spazio] never got off the ground," recounts Valcauda. "When Mario saw me, he would cry 'Ciao, Armando! My nephew!' and I cried, 'My dear uncle!' Lucisano was not very amused . . ."

Though Bava was obviously tiring of the actual job of directing, he held onto the illusion of being a director, occupying his mind with stories and busying his hand with sketches for films he would never make. It was during this fallow period that he renewed his acquaintance with I tre volti della paura screenwriter Alberto Bevilacqua, who was in the process of writing an essay about British author D. H. Lawrence.

"One day, I told Mario about this essay, and that, strangely enough, the last thing written by Lawrence—and I say 'strangely' because it's not well known—was Apocalypse. At the end of his life, with a devouring illness, hated by the critics, Lawrence arrived at the point of being betrayed by his wife, who cheated on him with his most abusive critic; and, on top of all this reality, there was his madness. I told Bava there was this extraordinary story by Lawrence, and I gave it to him to read, together with [other material by] the apocalyptic writers of the 14th and 16th centuries. The apocalyptic tradition is rooted in this: a man, all of a sudden, is forced to see the contradictions of his life; he sees it happening through the rebellious forces of nature . . . through a billion-year-old sun that suddenly explodes . . . through the appearance of strange, non-human characters. This thing excited Mario, and he asked me, always looking for something new, as he used to do when he spoke about things that were important for him: 'If the Apocalypse were to come, would it also come to an ordinary house?'—he was a maniac for houses—and I told him, 'Yes, sure.' 'Why don't we do a film set in a common house,' he proposed, 'with ordinary people, with ordinary habits, and all of a sudden, this terrifying event of the Apocalypse happens?' I replied, 'It sounds to me like an extraordinary film, and one that you could do very well!' But unfortunately, this idea coincided with the dwindling of his career, and I think he no longer had the clout to get a film rolling. And so our L'apocalisse remained no more than a treatment, which we developed over the course of a few months." [2]

Inferno

Filmed at INCIR–De Paolis and Elios Studios, and on location in Rome and New York City
Summer 1979
First released: February 7, 1980
Technicolor, Technovision, 1.85:1, 107 minutes

Production: Intersound Productions. Producer: Claudio Argento. Director: Dario Argento. Assistant directors: Lamberto Bava, Andrea Piazzesi. Screenplay: Dario Argento. Director of Photography: Romano Albani. Art direction: Giuseppe Bassan. Special effects: Mario Bava (uncredited), Germano Natale and Pino Leoni. Editor: Franco Fraticelli. Music: Keith Emerson, Giuseppe Verdi, conducted by Godfrey Salmon. Distributor: 20th Century-Fox in all territories unless otherwise noted.

Leigh McCloskey (Mark Elliot), Irene Miracle (Rose Elliot), Eleonora Giorgi (Sara), Daria Nicolodi (Elise Stallone Van Adler), Sacha Pitoëff (Kazanian), Alida Valli (Carol), Veronica Lazar (Nurse/Mater Tenebrarum), Gabriele Lavia (Carlo), Feodor Chaliapin (Varelli), Leopoldo Mastelloni (John, the butler), Ania Pieroni (musical student/Mater Lacrimarum), James Fleetwood (Cook), Rosario Rigutini (Man), Ryan Hilliard (shadow), Paolo Paoloni (music teacher), Fulvio Mingozzi (cab driver), Luigi Lodoli (bookbinder), Rodolfo Lodi (old man), Lamberto Bava, Andrea Piazzesi (passersby).

France: Inferno, 4/16/80
Germany: Horror Infernal, Feuertanz der Zombies, "Hellish Horror, Fire Dance of the Zombies," 9/12/80
Turkey: Cehennem, "Inferno"
UK: Inferno, 4/80, 106m 15s, Certificate "X," passed with cuts
US: Inferno, Key Video, 10/86 (video only)

As Mario floundered about in search of the right energizing idea, Lamberto decided to offer his services as assistant director to Dario Argento, who was preparing to make Inferno—the hotly anticipated follow-up to the internationally successful Suspiria. Argento enthusiastically accepted his proposal. Then, as the demands of the movie came into clearer focus during preproduction, Argento suggested that Mario join them, too. "I knew we were going to have big problems on Inferno," Argento recalls, "because, at that time, it was before the digital age, so we would need glass shots, mattes, and so forth to recreate New York. It would be difficult, very complicated—and I thought Mario would be good to have around, because he was the father of this. He was tired and not working. So I asked Lamberto if he might help us, and he asked him."

Mario joined the production for two or three weeks, to the best of Argento's recollection, working with a small crew of three people. He agreed to supervise the film's matte and maquette effects on the condition that he would receive no screen credit. "He didn't want a credit," Argento explains. "He said, 'I'm a director, I don't want to be [known as] a special effects designer.' He was there because he liked to work with his son and with me. He liked to be out of the house, working."

IRENE MIRACLE as the poetess Rose Elliot, about to be plunged into the mysteries beneath the soles of her shoes.

Since his initial success with L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo, Dario Argento had become a major force in Italian film production. His second feature, Il gatto a nove code (which, like its predecessor, copped ideas from Fredric Brown's novel Screaming Mimi), was again visibly steeped in the influence of Michelangelo Antonioni, but with Quattro mosche di velluto grigio/Four Flies on Grey Velvet (1971) and Profondo rosso/Deep Red (1975), Argento succeeded in finding his own voice. He began rewiring the giallo for a younger, thrill-seeking audience. He achieved this by saturating his fragmented, cubist imagery with exaggerated color, violence, and style, and by choreographing these images to the compelling beat of progressive rock music—whose volume in the mix was guaranteed to repel anyone old enough to also be repelled by his graphic brand of violence. It was a formula that enabled Argento to achieve the kind of local success that always eluded Bava himself. Argento's films were huge in Italy and throughout Europe, but ironically, after L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo, they did not perform well in America, where they were acquired by small distributors and often heavily truncated for release. More than half an hour was trimmed from the American release of Deep Red, which was exhibited in some areas under the crass title The Hatchet Murders.

American audiences rediscovered Argento in a big way when 20th Century-Fox acquired the international rights to his first true horror film, Suspiria (1977), a tale of witchcraft at a German dance academy conceived by Daria Nicolodi. If L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo was influenced by Bava's La ragazza che sapeva troppo, Suspiria used an antiquated three-dye Technicolor process to resurrect the eye-popping, saturated color lighting techniques of I tre volti della paura and Sei donne per l'assassino, as well as the look of the film which had most influenced Bava and Freda in evolving the look of the earliest Italian horror films: Walt Disney's Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs. Suspiria achieved worldwide success, though it was an embarrassment to the executives at 20th Century-Fox, who sent the picture out carrying the logo of a hastily invented sub-division company, International Classics.

Argento and Nicolodi decided to exploit the keen interest in the picture by announcing that Suspiria was only the first segment of a projected series, which they dubbed "The Three Mothers Trilogy." The first sequel, entitled Inferno, was scripted by Argento and Nicolodi—but the actress was finally uncredited. Working from Nicolodi's central concept, Argento began writing the script in New York City in a small hotel room overlooking Central Park. While directing the film, Argento was stricken with hepatitis and actually directed some of the picture lying down. Though the film is a favorite with Argento's admirers, Inferno is cited by the director himself as one of his least favorite pictures because his memories of the filming are colored by the memory of his deathly illness.

When Argento's brother Claudio secured co-production funds from Italian and German consortiums, as well as from 20th Century-Fox in America, Inferno—budgeted at $3,000,000—was ready to roll.

Synopsis

April in New York.
A knife.
A brooch attached to three keys.
A book—The Three Mothers, by E. Varelli.

Rose Elliot, a poetess living in Manhattan, uses the knife to cut the pages of the book, which she has acquired from a lame antique bookseller named Kazanian, and prepares to translate the Latin text. Varelli, an architect living in London, writes that he met the Three Mothers of all earthly sorrows and built for them three houses from which they would rule the world with sorrow, tears and darkness: Mater

1 The English-language version of this film, which starred Richard Kiel, Barbara Bach and Arthur Kennedy, is credited to Lado under the pseudonym "George B. Lewis."

2 Manlio Gomarasca and Davide Pulici, "Il Talento di Mr. Bava," Nocturno Dossier 24, July 2004, 6–32.

ROSE immerses herself in a subterranean pool to retrieve a fallen brooch.

Suspiriorum (the Mother of Sighs, the oldest) lives in Freiberg, Germany; Mater Lachrimarum (the Mother of Tears, the most beautiful) rules from Rome; and Mater Tenebrarum (the Mother of Darkness, the youngest and cruellest of the sisters) resides in New York. The land where the houses are built, Varelli warns, will eventually become vile and plague-ridden, making the air around them reek horribly; this, he instructs, is the first key to their discovery. The second key can be found hidden in the cellars under these houses: a picture and the name of the Mother living in that house. "The third key," the book says obliquely, "can be found beneath the soles of your shoes."

Inside the book, Rose finds a sketch of one of Varelli's houses that looks exactly like the apartment building in which she resides. She writes a fretful letter to her brother Mark, a musicologist studying in Rome. After mailing the letter, Rose visits Kazanian to discuss the book he sold her. He scoffs at her curiosity, and when she asks about the strange, sickly sweet smell of the neighborhood, he explains it as an emanation from a nearby cake factory. Unsatisfied, Rose leaves and, seeing an underground entrance in the alley beside her building, remembers the line, "The second key is in the cellar." She descends, and while examining a watery hole in the floor, her brooch drops in, lodging on what appears to be a submerged chandelier. Unable to return home without her keys, Rose lowers herself through the hole and swims down to retrieve her keys, finding a fabulous underwater ballroom adorned with the Latin names of the Three Mothers. She retrieves her keys, but is frightened away from continued study of the room by a floating corpse. She swims up and out. In the wake of her departure, a black gloved phantom steps out of hiding.

In Rome, Mark reads Rose's letter in music class, while listening to Verdi's "Va piensera" from Nabucco. As he reads, he is troubled by a beautiful woman, who stares at him, whispering urgent words he cannot hear, while stroking a cat. An immense wind blows through the music room, and Mark puts Rose's letter away, unread. When he looks up, the beautiful stranger and her familiar have gone. Mark pursues her, leaving Rose's letter behind. It is read by Sara, Mark's girlfriend and fellow student, its content attracting her female curiosity.

While riding home in the rain, Sara asks her taxi driver to take her to Via Dei Bagni 49, the Biblioteca Filosofica Fondazioni Albertini—a library of mystical books in a neighborhood with a pungent, sickly sweet smell. She finds a copy of Varelli's book, just as the library announces its closing time. Trying to abscond with it, she uses a different exit, which leads her to an alchemist's laboratory, full of sinister, bubbling pots. The alchemist spies the title of the book in her hands and pries it from her hands before she escapes.

Returning home, Sara meets Carlo, a sports writer, in the elevator and pleads with him to accompany her to her apartment. He agrees. While entertaining him with a record from her collection—"Va pensiero"—Sara phones Mark and urges him to come right away. The lights begin to flicker in Sara's apartment. Carlo is murdered while attempting to repair the fusebox, and Mark arrives in time to find only fragments of his sister's letter . . . just before Sara falls through a screen . . . stabbed to death by a black-gloved hand. As he exits the building, Mark sees the beautiful girl he saw earlier in the music room, driving by in a taxi.

ROSE'S brother Mark, played by Leigh McCloskey.

A heavily distorted telephone call from Rose prompts Mark to go to Rome. Before he can get there, Rose is chased from her apartment by two intruding silhouettes. She cuts her hand on a broken doorknob, leaving a trail of blood as she descends the stairs to the floors under her building. There she is grabbed by two demonic hands—the same scaly, taloned hands as seen on the alchemist in Rome—which pull her under a broken window, whose pane is used as a makeshift guillotine.

Mark arrives at Rose's New York apartment building and notes a plaque on the outside, stating that the philosopher G. Gurdjieff lived there in 1924. Inside, he greets the concierge, Carol, who quickly covers several pounds of fresh meat before he can see it. Taking the elevator to Rose's apartment, he meets the mute Prof. Arnold and his garrulous nurse. Arnold scratches the word "Mater" into his leather portfolio case, Mark notices later. He makes the acquaintance of Rose's friend and neighbor, Elise Delombre Adler, a Countess who has lived alone in the building for 5 years, her husband a constant traveller. She is a drug addict, administered by her sinister butler Gian.

That night, the black gloved phantom enters Kazanian's shop and steals three copies of The Three Mothers from his shelves. Investigating the theft, he is attacked by a cat, who destroys a valuable antique. Meanwhile, Elise has sneaked back next door to tell Mark about Rose's interest in the Three Mothers. She explains what she knows of their legend, and her disclosure is overheard by a presence within the building. She and Mark discover Rose's blood trail, which Mark follows downstairs. In the depths of the building, he is overcome by the smells of the "cake factory," and dragged away by the phantom—who leaves him when he spies Elise watching. Fleeing the scene, Elise is attacked by cats and stabbed to death by the black hand.

Mark is discovered by Carol and the nurse, and he complains of a severe heart ailment. They give him heart medicine, and he dreams of the sea. He awakens in Rose's apartment, apparently recovered, and notices a profusion of ants crawling over his woodwork. He tries to contact Elise, and finds that she has disappeared. He speaks to Kazanian about the three keys, but finds him uninterested. He tells Mark that there is going to be a lunar eclipse that night, the first in forty-six years.

As the eclipse approaches, Kazanian catches a cat and bags it, along with many others. He takes the bag to Central Park under the dark of the eclipse and drowns the cats in the lake. His crutch slips in the water and he falls face-down in the lake, and is attacked by rats. He screams for help as they begin to devour him alive, and a nearby butcher hears and races across the lake in his direction. When he arrives, he uses his knife to hack at the nape of Kazanian's neck, and kicks the gimp's body into an open sewer pipe alive with rats. The eclipse ends.

Elise's butler Gian, ignorant of the Countess' death, discovers her hidden jewels and delivers them to Carol, with whom he plans to run away. He is soon after seized by the alchemist's hand and killed. When Carol discovers his body, she inadvertently starts a fire, catches fire herself, and tumbles through a glass stratum to her death deep in the bowels of the building.

As the inferno gathers momentum, Mark finally makes sense of the third clue and tears up the floorboards of Rose's apartment to explore the realm "beneath the soles of his shoes." He finds a scroll of paper, written in Italian, signed by Varelli. He follows the crawlspace under the floor to the apartment where Prof. Arnold lives with his nurse. Speaking to Mark through an electrical device, Arnold reveals that he is, in fact, Varelli. He wants to be forgotten. Varelli pleads with Mark to come closer, so as not to be overheard by the Mother of Shadows. He lunges out, tries to inject Mark with a chemical, which Mark succeeds in sucking out of his arm before it can take effect; Varelli, however, falls over in the scuffle and is strangled by his voice synthesizer. He apologizes for the attack, explaining that he has become the slave of Mater Tenebrarum.

Mark follows Varelli's dying directions to another chamber, where he faces the diabolical taunts of Mater Tenebrarum—the woman who has posed as Varelli's nurse. She reveals herself to Mark as the spectre of Death, just as the house begins to collapse and disintegrate around them, granting Mark an opportunity for escape.

Production & Special Effects

Though Mario Bava's involvement in the production of Inferno was uncredited, it did not remain a secret for very long. Over the years, much confusion has been generated by his affiliation with the film, and Bava has been credited by the fan press with many scenes in which he had no actual involvement. The breakdown of responsibilities among Inferno's special effects units is actually quite simple. The film's two credited special effects workers—Germano Natale and Pino Leoni—supervised the film's many on-set effects (fire, breaking glass). Meanwhile, as always, Bava worked as a unit unto himself, devising the film's "in camera" effects.

Though the two men were rivals of a sort before they met, Bava and LAMBERTO BAVA, producer Salvatore Argento and his son Dario on location.

FRENCH actor Sacha Pitoëff as Kazanian, venturing into Central Park at night to drown a sack of cats.

Argento got along well, by all accounts—perhaps because Bava had now resigned himself to his fate. "There was a very gentle feeling between them," observes Andrea Piazzesi, who worked as Inferno's second assistant director. "If you were to ask Mario about Dario, he would say that Dario was very smart, that Dario was a much better director than he, had many more successes than he, that Dario was one of the few good directors in Italy. If you spoke to Dario about Mario, he would say that Mario was a Maestro, that everything he learned came from Mario and, that if Mario had wanted to become famous, he would have become famous. You see, Mario was incapable of jealousy. He may not have respected the work of some other artists, but he would always say they did the best they could, that it was their business. He would never express any negative energy toward anyone."

Bava focused on his work and didn't concern himself with the film's direction or cinematography. One of his principal tasks was to create the illusion that Inferno had been filmed in New York City. Despite appearances to the contrary, very little of the movie was actually shot on location. The New York apartment building where Rose Elliot resides and disappears was based on an actual building that stands on Riverside Drive, in Manhattan's Upper West Side. However, the building itself was never filmed; it was still-photographed and recreated on a sound stage at INCIR–De Paolis Studios in Rome.

"At no time when the camera is facing the building do you see New York City," explains William Lustig, who worked on the film as a production coordinator. "But when you face away from the building, that's New York City." In other words, the mailbox across the street from the apartment complex, where Rose deposits the letter to Paul, is the real mailbox at the edge of Riverside Park, with the West Side Highway visible in the background. The view out the window of Rose's apartment was shot, at Argento's request, from the window of the New York hotel room where he conceived the storyline, and shows scenery that isn't visible from Riverside Drive: New Jersey's Palisades Park, across the Hudson River.

The building seen in the movie is a brilliant illusion consisting of a two-story facade built by Giuseppe Bassan's talented art crew, which Mario Bava extended to a fuller height with the use of a hanging maquette. This was then optically inserted into an equally illusory, surrounding cityscape, an angled glass reflection of an adjacent tabletop arrangement of boxes and milk cartons covered with photographs of prominent New York buildings. Bava's hanging maquette—a large scale miniature—was also utilized by the other effects unit for the climactic shots of the building in flames.

Lamberto Bava brought his son Roy to the set on occasion to visit his grandfather, who lost no time in putting the boy to work. "I helped him when he was creating the whole skyline of New York with the big fire," Roy remembers. "He used pictures of the city to recreate the skyline. I was helping him to draw around the buildings with ink, with light coming through from the back. He also did matte paintings, and he was always retouching the one he was working on. I think he regarded it as a hobby, because he always had fun doing this kind of thing. The thing that he used to tell my father—and also to me since I was 10 years old and became interested in these types of things—was, 'The best solution to a problem is usually the easiest.' And as I watched him work, I began to see he was right, that even the thing that appears crude on the set will look perfect on the screen."

Another of Bava's duties was to create a series of glass matte paintings of the moon—in its fullest phase, and in various stages of eclipse. It was a trick that dated back, in Bava's own filmography, to Ercole al centro della terra and Giacomo Gentilomo's Maciste e la regina di Samar. In Inferno, Argento presents the moon as a kind of Greek chorus, subtly appearing in the background of the earliest scenes (e.g., over Irene Miracle's shoulder as she opens the celler grate) and slowly evolving a mystic significance, culminating in the eclipse that heralds the death of the man responsible for spreading the truth about the Three Sisters, the lame bookseller Kazanian. The moon had not been portrayed in such an inspired way since the "moonstruck" scene in David Lean's Hobson's Choice (1954). Bava was also responsible for two shots of the moon, framed by two different windows—one occurs immediately prior to the shot of Gian preparing Elise's bath, the other immediately follows the shot of Carol's fiery demise.

Andrea Piazzesi cites this moon as a valuable index to Bava's personal character and his thorough knowledge of the camera: "What was incredible about Mario was that he was never cautious about revealing his professional secrets. He would talk about them openly with anybody. In the film, a moon appears behind many of the scenes, and he made this moon himself. Mario took a piece of glass and designed this moon, which did not look so good on the actual glass but, on the screen, becomes—believe me—a perfect moon. As Mario told me many times, when actors are wearing their makeup, they look awful in person but, on film, they look beautiful! So it was a matter of knowing what colors and designs would result in something that would look real only on film. So he had no need to keep trade secrets; his secret was not a secret of knowing how to bring them to life. He was not like an illusionist in the circus who takes rabbits out of his hat—this was an expression he liked to use—because, even if he were to reveal his secrets to you, you would need a lifetime of experience before you could take his job.

MARK flees danger through a portal flanked on either side by glass matte paintings of stone carvings, executed by Mario Bava.

"Mario always maintained that the best way of achieving an effect was to shoot something directly, rather than with a lot of artificial superimpositions," Piazzesi continues. "Putting pictures on glass looks very easy, but the tough part is balancing the lights. If you measure the quality of light with instruments, it can change in a second. Mario had two lamps and balanced the light by sight. This can come only from a very great sense of experience."

A notable instance of Bava's masterly manipulation of light is the trick shot in which Mater Tenebrarum stands before Mark and beside a mirror in which she is reflected, and vanishes into thin air, while her reflection remains visible in the mirror. This was a simple matter of projecting actress Veronica Lazar into the shot by capturing her off-camera, illuminated reflection on a pane of angled glass. By dimming her lights with a smooth accustomed movement, Bava caused her to vanish from the shot—exactly as he caused Javutich to materialize out of thin air in La maschera del demonio twenty years earlier, on the other side of his directorial career. Lazar's mirror reflection was in fact her stunt double, standing on the other side of an empty frame, outside the set.

Though Bava was responsible for the special effects of the lunar eclipse, he was not present during the actual filming of the eclipse sequence, which was filmed on location in New York City's Central Park. In the summer of 1979, Dario Argento brought the production (including cast members Irene Miracle, Leigh McCloskey, Sacha Pitoëff, and Daria Nicolodi) to New York City, where several scenes and insert shots were filmed. Filmmaker William Lustig—later the director of such films as Maniac, Vigilante and Maniac Cop—worked on the New York shoot of Inferno as a member of Andrew Garroni's Cinerex Associates, the production service company that arranged the film's locations, hotels, and crew.

"It was a ten-day shoot," Lustig remembers. "Basically, what was shot was most of the Central Park sequence, all of the shots looking away from the apartment building (like the shot of Irene Miracle crossing the street to the mailbox), some helicopter footage of the roads—some of which ended up in Maniac, I can admit, now that the statute of limitations has expired! Also, the shots of Leigh McCloskey looking out the window of his apartment at the city, and the stuff of the Fire Department arriving at the end of the film. Those exteriors were all shot on Riverside Drive, but no apartment was shot. Yes, there were apartments there, but not the one you see in the movie—that only existed on the set back in Europe. Mario Bava was not there, but I remember Dario and Daria, the cameraman Romano Albani, and also Lamberto Bava, who was working as Dario's assistant."[3]

Lustig has vivid memories of the Central Park sequence. "That shoot lasted all night," he reports. "We had to rent just about every piece of lighting equipment from all the equipment houses in town, to illuminate all the buildings adjacent to the park! You can do that kind of lighting nowadays with one large, basic light, but we didn't have that kind of equipment available to us then. It was a big, big production, with tons of union crew all around. The camera was locked off, with a glass matte of the moon in various stages of eclipse, positioned between the buildings. They would shoot one matte, then replace it in the frame with another. It took an entire night to get that one shot! I can remember Dario's brother—Claudio, the producer—going nuts. Dario and Daria were sitting on a park bench, and he turned to me and said, 'I love working at night—I love it!'

"They filmed the actor [Sacha Pitoëff] carrying a bag that contained some kind of moving mechanism," Lustig continues, "to make it look like it was full of cats. He walked into the lake, pushed the bag underwater, and fell in. At that point, some phony, mechanical rats were attached to him for close-ups. When the guy at the hamburger stand runs over the lake, apparently coming to his rescue, that actor was actually running on a plexiglass bridge under the water; it made it look like he was actually running across the surface of the lake. All of the stuff with live rats was shot back in Europe."

Argento himself cites the rat sequence as a tribute to Lamberto Bava's gifts as an assistant director. "Lamberto was great! He was the strongest assistant director . . . very cruel. The best I ever had. He would say, 'If you don't do this, I'll kill you!' I remember a story from the time when we killed the gimp in the park. We shot only the close-up in Rome; we had shot everything else before in New York. When we were in Rome, this actor [Sacha Pitoëff] was drinking all the time, and never acting very well; it was very disappointing. We were shooting the scene where the butcher runs across and kills him with the knife. It was Take One, Take Two, Take Three . . . and Lamberto was grumbling, 'This cocksfucker [sic] . . . !' I told him, 'Lamberto, he's terrible; we may have to get a stuntman to do this, because this actor is just too drunk.' Lamberto told me, 'Dario, leave the set for a while. Go to the bar or something, leave this to me.' I went to a bar in the middle of the square, and as I was sitting there, I heard 'Aaaaaarrrrrggggh!' I ran back to the set and Lamberto was standing over the actor, telling him, 'This is going to be the last shot of the picture!' and he hit him as hard as he could on the head. The man was screaming for real! It was good, it was good . . ."[4]

3 William Lustig, interviewed by the author, April 21, 1998.

BOOK dealer Kazanian is attacked—first by cats, and then by rats.

Roy Bava has his own memories of this sequence: "Dario and Mario hated the small size of the rats for the Central Park sequence, so they did some research and found out that there was a breed known as the Chinese Fighting Rat (or something like that), which were big and vicious. They decided that this was the rat species they wanted, so they imported 1,500 of them from Asia! They were huge with slim noses. I was on the set that day with French actor Sacha Pitoëff. There was Lamberto, Dario and Mario holding the rats by their tails between their fingers ready to let them drop on Pitoëff's body. The details were done at INCIR–De Paolis, as well as the underwater scene. It took ages to get a response from Pitoëff, so in the end, Lamberto told everyone to leave the set. And then they heard this enormous scream from Pitoëff, but Lamberto refused to tell anyone how he managed it. It was better not to ask! Some of the rats escaped and then, one day, Dario met Marco Bellocchio in the courtyard. He was in the studio filming Salto nel vuoto and he said, 'You know, this place really must do something about its rat problem—they are everywhere!' Dario pretended he knew nothing and agreed with him. It turned out that the Chinese rats had mated with the local population and bred a strain of super rat that took De Paolis years to exterminate!" [5]

For the shot in which Mark discovers the cavernous sanctum of Mater Tenebrarum, bursting through a door framed between a pair of enormous gnarled sculptures, Bava sculpted tiny models of the stone sentries and reflected them on angled glass into the viewfinder. After looking through the camera, he remained unconvinced by the shot. Andrea Piazzesi, who was present during the execution of this effect, recalled Bava's solution: "He said that the sculptures looked somehow false, as if they were hovering just off the ground. Then, to everyone's surprise, Mario found a few brown paper bags, which he crumpled up and arranged in two piles along the studio floor. It filled the gaps perfectly, creating the illusion of the sculptures resting on the ground. It was impossible to tell where the matte stopped and the bags began!"

Another Bava matte painting of pivotal importance depicted a pair of ferocious, cat-like eyes peering forth from the darkness. They flash onscreen, very briefly, underlined by a musical sting, as Rose is pursued by a demonic assailant. The effect is unmistakably Bavian, recalling the balefully staring eyes on the painting of Otto von Kleist in Baron Blood.

When Argento was briefly hospitalized during the production, second unit photography continued in his absence. Some of this was entrusted to Mario, who filmed the sinister slow zooms into the apartment's air vents as Mark is overcome with noxious fumes. These shots recall similar images in Terrore nello spazio, when the air is sucked out of the derelict alien spacecraft through the compression vents in its walls.

Bava has often been erroneously credited with the execution of the sequence in which Rose descends into the submerged ballroom below the basement floor of her apartment building. In fact, the sequence contains no optical or in camera effects whatsoever. The ballroom set was furnished inside a dry aquarium set at DePaolis, which was then filled with sea water. The sequence was photographed by Gianlorenzo Battaglia, who had started his career as a camera assistant on Bava's Il rosso segno della follia, and later distinguished himself in underwater photography—which he provided for Ecologia del delitto, among many other films. Battaglia worked alone, and later with actress Irene Miracle, filming the sequence in accordance with Argento's storyboards. If one watches the sequence carefully, it becomes apparent that the two inserted close-ups of Miracle's hand retrieving her keys from the carpet were not shot underwater at all. Considering their illusory aspect, Bava may have had something to do with the filming of these close-up inserts.

Commentary

The only collaboration of the two greatest names in Italian horror, Inferno is hypnotic, powerfully imagined and choreographed, with a visual beauty that burns with demonic intensity. It is also a very slow-moving, entrancing picture; even when one fast-forwards through the film on video, it moves with dreamy deliberation.

Thematically, Inferno is very much in the tradition of the 1943 Val Lewton production The Seventh Victim, in which a young woman's search for her missing sister in New York City, gradually uncovers her sibling's secret alliance with a Satanic cult. [6] Inferno aims to recreate The Seventh Victim's New York City, in which a seemingly normal world is discovered, on closer look, to be thoroughly contaminated by the malignance of evil—note the scene in which Mark meets Carol, who rapidly covers the meat she's cutting in the kitchen as if to conceal a hideous secret (could it be prime cuts of Rose's body?)—but this requires a subtlety that is at odds with Argento's more important stylistic purpose. That purpose is to visually depict the different ways in which men and women perceive the world around them.

More than once, the film's dialogue points to women as being the primary consumers of occult literature, and by extension, the purveyors of all worldly misfortune. "Some people think of these books as sheer fantasy," Kazanian tells Rose. "Others believe every word. Women are usually the worst readers of such stuff—or the best, if you prefer. They want so very badly to believe." Accordingly, all of the film's evil symbols are female or feline, and the film's wildest color gel lighting is manifest only when a scene is built around the supernatural intuitions and curiosities of a female character. When Mark or Kazanian or Varelli take center stage, the lighting becomes flatter, more earthy—natural, as opposed to supernatural. This supposedly fundamental difference between men and women is pointedly addressed in the scene between Sara and Carlo, when her conversation prompts him to smirkingly disavow any belief in "spooks and that sort of thing."

ROSE is assaulted and guillotined by demonic hands—a role played by her mischievous director.

4 Dario Argento, interviewed by Alan Jones, January 2001.

5 Roy Bava, interviewed by Alan Jones, April 2003.

6 Kim Hunter, the star of The Seventh Victim, was subsequently cast by Argento in his American film debut, Two Evil Eyes (1990).

MARK comes face-to-face with Mater Tenebrarum (Veronica Lazar), whose stand-in provides a false mirror image in this Mario Bava trick shot.

"Well, what do you believe in?" Sara demands, almost spitefully.

"Only what I can see and touch," Carlo says, smugly. A moment later, he is seeing his murderer and feeling a knife lodged in his neck.

The film also suggests that women with artistic sensibilities—poets and musicians—are more disposed to supernatural influence, because their sensibilities are creative rather than procreative. (After accusing Rose of having strange habits, Prof. Arnold's nurse laughs, almost condescendingly, "Poetry—a pastime especially suited to women!") In Argento's mythos, creativity allies women to the Three Mothers, whom Varelli's text describes as "so-called mothers . . . [who] are actually wicked stepmothers, incapable of creating life . . ." The sexual barrier is even evoked by Mater Tenebrarum at the end of this film as she jeers Mark: "Haven't you understood? Mater Suspiriorum! Mater Lachrimarum! Mater Tenebrarum—but men call us by a single name . . . a name that strikes terror into every heart . . . They call us Death!"

It could be said that Inferno is the story of a man's discovery of his female side. Mark—a student of musicology, and thus predisposed to "sensitivity"—arrives in Rome to investigate the disappearance of his sister, but instead of finding an answer to that question, he discovers the answers his sister was seeking . . . and is baffled, and ultimately awakened, by them. When he bungles into Prof. Arnold's apartment after intuitively exploring the area beneath the soles of his shoes, the pseudonymous Varelli greets him with, "You found the way down, I see. And now I suppose you know who I am."

"No, I don't," answers the hapless hero, who has not even been able to read more than scraps of the letter that brought him to Rome. But as he later flees the blazing building, surviving his literal brush with Death, Mark exits into a whole world of saturated colors that have never touched him before—the magic that is all around us, to borrow a celebrated line from Suspiria.

At times, one wishes that Argento was as sensitive to matters of logic as he is to the worlds of magic and color. As with many other Argento films, there is a consistent failure of internal logic about Inferno, which is an effect that he courted deliberately, instructing his actors to react in scenes only as they would not normally react. While intriguing in theory, it tends to dilutes the film's overall potency in terms of execution. Even if one accepts a story in which characters willingly lower themselves into watery holes in cellar floors or torn-up floors teeming with ants, the details sometimes reveal a screenwriter not paying enough attention to his own mythos. "Is that story just made up, or is there some truth to it?" Rose asks Kazanian, but in a later scene, we see that the book's own Foreword (which Rose must have read) emphasizes, "This is neither fictional nor a work of the Imagination." It renders her whole visit to the antique dealer pointless, except to gratuitously introduce him and his macabre little shop.

Argento also fails to observe some of the most basic cinematic rituals—for example, identifying his characters. In the Biblioteca Filosofica, Sara hears someone whisper her name . . . which would be dramatically permissible if the viewer had previously been told her name; consequently, the viewer does not know what the whisperer is saying. Likewise, when Sara retreats to her apartment with the sportswriter, she calls him Carlo before they have made their introductions . . . which somehow never get made.

Some points of fascination are slyly concealed just below the surface of the narrative. For example, the addresses of the New York City apartment building and the Biblioteca share the same number—49—whose only significance would appear to be that it was also the year of Gurdjieff's death. Other important points, buried in the dialogue, are not adequately stressed on the soundtrack—at least not in the dubbed English version. For instance, the opening narration by Varelli (dubbed by Brett Morrison, whose distinctive voice graced many an Italian peplum film in the '50s and '60s) overwhelms the viewer with too much information too soon, and its cadence is so complementary to Keith Emerson's piano score that one almost listens to the narration musically, rather than to absorb its meaning. Varelli's mention that the Three Mothers are also known by another "wicked yet terrifying name" tends to go unnoticed, depriving the film's finale of the opportunity to resolve this mystery, which would appear to be a significant measure of its purpose. Also, unless someone is hanging on every spoken word in the film, it is unlikely they will understand Mater Tenebrarum when she tells Mark, "It's all going to burn down, just like before." But in this case, the ambiguity is useful—is she referring to the way her house previously fell, before it was rebuilt by Varelli, or is she referring to the blaze that consumed the Tanz Akademie at the end of Suspiria?

An indirect sequel to Suspiria, Inferno contains several references to the previous film—not as elements that previously happened, but as signposts of ritual. They begin to manifest during Sara's rainy taxi ride to the Biblioteca Filosofica, which in terms of its exaggerated color palette and editing is nearly identical to Susy Banyon's (Jessica Harper's) opening taxi ride in Suspiria; in fact, the Freiberg and Rome taxis are both piloted through the rain by the same cabbie (Fulvio Mingozzi). As if the decor of Rose's New York building was not sufficiently similar to Freiberg's Tanz Akademie, the concierge is played by Alida Valli (dubbed by Carolyn De Fonseca), who was in residence as Miss Tanner (a role which Valli dubbed herself) in Suspiria. The earlier film's flesh-eating dog is complemented here with flesh-eating cats, its Black Forest is complemented by Central Park, and both narratives depend entirely on relocated artists and students who become engrossed in the mystery of their new residence, penetrate its secrets, and are punished by the very information they seek—natural curiosity crushed out by supernatural death. A metaphor, perhaps, for the risk taken by artists who would dare to look upon the face of their Muse.

The performances are competent, but largely decorative—one is struck, for example, by Irene Miracle's flawless manicure in the opening shots—which is perfectly in keeping with Argento's preference of mise en scène over characterization. The characters are largely two-dimensional, and when they speak, Argento's discomfort with English and his obliviousness to American humor are sometimes painfully apparent. (When Sara asks Carlo if he's ever heard of "The Three Sisters," he answers, "You mean those black singers?"). For all its grandiosity and pretentiousness, the film also contains some very basic, inside humor, such as the moment when Mark and Kazanian are passed by two pedestrians during their sidewalk conversation—those pedestrians are assistant directors Andrea Piazzesi and Lamberto Bava. Nevertheless, when the film shuts its mouth and moves forward, at a somnambulent pace, into the unknown, few horror films are quite as harrowing and spellbinding.

ITALIAN due-foglia.

Summary

Despite an impossibly loose narrative and its characters' often illogical behavior, Inferno is an absorbing mood piece and one of the most stylistically inventive horror films of the 1980s. After the horrendous, career-thwarting problems that beset Mario Bava during the 1970s, Inferno was a blessing that allowed him to sail his career to port on a grace note—a major motion picture for 20th Century-Fox, a film that resonated with his own signature touches and proved, beyond a doubt, that his own humble efforts had left a lasting impression on the next generation of Italian filmmakers.

It would seem that some of the bad luck that attached itself to Bava's later years also rubbed off on Inferno. The film encountered some unexpected resistance to three brief shots prior to its release in foreign markets. When Mark successfully cuts an opening in the floor of Rose's apartment, a cat enters the apartment and darts through the hole. Moments later, as Mark makes his way through the crawlspace, the scene cuts away three times to shots of the cat devouring a mouse. The third shot ends with the mouse's severed leg falling from the cat's mouth. As Andrea Piazzesi notes, "It's a fact of everyday life that cats eat mice, and everyone is grateful for this. But when you show it on the screen in a movie, suddenly it becomes a scandal!" The cutaways were censored in literally every world market in which the film played, and the sequence remained incomplete until the film's belated arrival on American video. In England, a shot of Kazanian brutally slamming a (stuffed) cat's head against a tabletop, knocking it unconscious, was also deemed unpresentable.

The film's difficulties continued after it was submitted to 20th Century-Fox. The Fox executives who green-lighted the film in 1979 were no longer in office when Argento delivered his final cut. The new regime was unenthusiastic about the picture and declined to release it in the United States. Argento fought very hard to change their minds, but without success. The Internet Movie Database lists a US premiere date of April 2, 1980, but if true, this was a limited booking and not indicative of an actual release. Supporting this view is the fact that no US posters for the film appear to exist. So intensely did American fans of Suspiria await the release of Inferno that, when it appeared in a 16 mm film catalogue sometime in the early 1980s, it was eagerly pounced upon. One of these excited customers was Chris Steinbrunner, the author of two excellent reference works, Cinema of the Fantastic and The Encyclopedia of Mystery and Detection, who organized a party around the unofficial "US premiere" of the film in his Manhattan apartment. Unfortunately, the party came to an early end when the print delivered turned out to be a 1953 Fox release of the same title, starring Robert Ryan and Rhonda Fleming!

Dario Argento's Inferno did not have its actual US premiere until October 1986, when Fox released it straight to home video on their subsidiary Key Video label. Though the packaging listed a running time of only 83 minutes, the Key Video release was intact, complete with the mousing scene forbidden in so many other countries.

Last Days

"There is only one possible conclusion to a man's life, and Death is the only subject that punishes those who are bold enough to contemplate it."
—Mario Bava

LAST PROJECTS

AFTER COMPLETING his work on Inferno, Mario Bava returned to the mostly uneventful life he had been living before. Effectively retired, he occasionally advised young colleagues on the art and science of special effects, but most of all he continued to read—especially science fiction, because the international popularity of George Lucas' Star Wars, Steven Spielberg's Close Encounters of the Third Kind (both 1977) and Ridley Scott's Alien (1979) had convinced him that the time was right for an Italian science fiction revival. Indeed, these films had been such boxoffice smashes in Italy that a number of the older Italian sci-fi pictures had been dusted-off for quick reissue, including Antonio Margheriti's I criminali della galassia [1965], Pietro Francisci's 2+5: Missione Hydra [1966], and Bava's own Terrore nello spazio.

◀ BAVA strikes a medieval iconic pose, haloed by a lighting scrim, on the set of ECOLOGIA DEL DELITTO.

Thanks to the local success of these films, Italian producers were becoming more receptive to science fiction proposals. In 1977, for example, Luigi Cozzi was able to mount Starcrash (released 1979), an adaptation of the "Stella Starr" comic strip starring British model/actress Caroline Munro, which he directed under the pseudonym "Lewis Coates." The special effects for this film were provided by Bava's "honorary nephew" Armando Valcauda, who in an era of highly expensive effects photography, was proving himself an able successor to his "dear uncle's" brand of economical and imaginative camera trickery. Twenty years later, the special effects seen in major productions are beginning to look so dated that George Lucas felt compelled to "update" his Star Wars Trilogy with additional CGI (computer generated imagery) when preparing their theatrical re-release in 1997, while Valcauda's work—admittedly not in the same league—has lost none of its original, naïve, handmade charm.

Bava's problem with finding similar opportunities was not that his ideas were unworkable, but that he was now of retirement age, not terribly motivated, and had not directed a successful picture in nearly a decade. Furthermore, the men and women who had been his colleagues for the past forty years were either retired, dead, or in a different league, so these contacts were now of little use to him.

Bava's work crisis had effected noticeable changes in his overall personal character and habits. The few photographs taken of Bava during this period show a man who looks much older than 65 years of age. When Martin Scorsese arranged to meet him during a trip to Rome, he came away from the encounter convinced that Bava was "like 80." He was no longer the humorous, bazzica-loving connoisseur of food and wine described by his colleagues of the 1960s. Bava appears quite healthy and normal in photos taken during the filming of Cani arrabbiati in 1974, but a shot of Bava taken on the set of Inferno, only five years later, shows him looking gaunt, with dark circles under his eyes, his belt drawn to its tightest notch. When he wasn't working and living amid the camaraderie of his crew, he lost all appetite and seemed to shrivel as he abstained from all earthly pleasures save reading and smoking.

Bava had also developed the bitterness of a creative artist who believes that his career has accomplished nothing. In 1979, he told an interviewer: "I'm convinced that everything I've done is just so much bullshit. I'm an artisan. A romantic artisan, the kind you don't find any more. I made films like I was making chairs . . . As far as their aesthetics are concerned, when I look at one of my films, I feel like throwing up. In my films, you hear dialogue like, 'I am an unconscious psychic.'" [1]

An astounding self-portrait dating from this period shows a wizened Bava, working as a sculptor, using a mallet and chisel to chip a large, triangular block out of one of his own grotesquely swollen testicles.

During this period, Mario found himself inhabiting a situation which mirrored that of his father Eugenio, twenty years earlier. His son Lamberto was about to become a film director in his own right.

BERNICE STEGERS isn't the type to let something like decapitation stop a beautiful relationship in Lamberto Bava's directorial debut MACABRO.

In 1979, writer–director Giuseppe "Pupi" Avati and his brother Antonio had an idea for a new horror script, inspired by a 1965 newspaper account of a New Orleans woman who had been discovered preserving her decapitated lover's head in a refrigerator. The question was, What to do with the idea? After directing two horror films that were among the most frightening of the decade—La casa dalle finestre che ridono/The House With the Laughing Windows (1976) and Zeder/Revenge of the Dead (1983)—Avati suddenly announced, "I don't want to be categorized as a director of thrillers or horror films," and withdrew from the genre. There had also been a personal reason for this retreat: Avati admitted to finding it difficult to live with the horrific scenarios that his imagination was dredging up.

"That whole project started off by chance," Lamberto recounts of his directorial debut, Macabro/Frozen Terror (1980). "I received a call from Pupi Avati, whom I didn't know at the time, and he asked me if I would like to make a film with him. I assumed that he was asking me to assist him, but then it slowly dawned on me that he was asking me to direct this film!" (Lamberto and Avati were not personally acquainted, but Lamberto had previously served as assistant director to Mario Lanfranchi on the 1974 film Il bacio, which Avati had co-written.) "We sat down at a desk together and wrote the script 'Avati-style'—very quickly." While writing the screenplay with the Avatis, Lamberto independently came across another newspaper account that influenced him: "I read about a distraught mother who had taken her dead baby into the garden to play, until the police were alerted," he told interviewers Mike Childs and Alan Jones. "It was the psychology of this sort of obsession that I wanted to deal with in the film." [2]

When the script was completed, Lamberto gave a copy to Mario, seeking his advice. Bava liked the script, but he refused to counsel his son in any way, or to visit the set while he was working. "I'm not saying anything," his father told him, "because this is your picture. I'll see your movie when you finish it, and not before." [3]

Like La Venere d'Ille, Macabro was shot in 16 mm, filmed partly on location in New Orleans (which at the time had enticed other Italian horror filmmakers to shoot there, including Lucio Fulci) and in the Roman house of the film's producer. Lamberto worked with a small ensemble cast consisting of Bernice Stegers (a British actress who had received much attention for her appearance in Fellini's La città delle donne/The City of Women), Stanko Molnar, Veronica Zinny, and Roberto Posse. Lamberto's relationship with Dario Argento was tapped for a blurb that was prominently featured in the film's promotional campaign, which proclaimed that Macabro was "The Film That Frightened Dario Argento, Master of Terror!"

About two months before its official release, in February 1980, Lamberto screened a print of Macabro for his father. "He only saw the film when it was completely finished," Lamberto said. "After the screening, he said something to me that I will never forget. He said, 'Maestro, now I can rest in peace!'"

Macabro was released to Roman theaters on April 17, 1980.

Eight days later, Mario Bava ceased to exist outside the realm of his art.

Fortunately, Mario Bava's last weeks of life were creative and optimistic. While Lamberto was directing Macabro, Mario was inspired by talks with Fulvio Lucisano to make some production sketches for their project, Il vagabondo dello spazio, which was ultimately never made. It was during this fallow period that he happened to bump into Dardano Sacchetti.

"We met one day by chance," the screenwriter remembers. "Mario had been trying unsuccessfully to make Il vagabondo dello spazio for a couple of years, and he really wanted to make a science fiction film, so he asked me if I had any ideas. I had a rough idea and wrote about five or six pages, which he liked and showed to Fulvio Lucisano. Lucisano was in contact with Roger Corman at that time, so he sent him the project. Corman approved it, and Lucisano suggested we start the screenplay." [4]

The script was entitled Anomalia ("Anomaly"), a literary title that would never have survived in the event of an American release through Corman's New World Pictures. (One of the science fiction projects green-lighted by New World in 1980—Mindwarp: An Infinity of Terror—was ultimately retitled Galaxy of Terror for general release in 1981. However, the story of Anomalia was beautifully geared to Bava's unique grasp of mystical subjects, otherworldly atmosphere, and visual effects.

SPANISH one-sheet poster art by Francisco Fernandez Zarza Jano—endorsement by Dario Argento.

Sacchetti: "The 'anomaly' was at the center of the universe. A team of astronauts goes to find out what is wrong and they discover a wall. The wall is just like the Great Wall of China, dividing the universe in half. All along the wall there are raised engravings of figures, like the Gothic figures of demons and devils and people sick and suffering—and there's a door. The astronauts pass through the door and enter into a world of darkness, a world full of spirits, ghosts, and demons. When the astronauts flee, the figures adorning the wall come to life and pursue them, invading the universe!"

The mind boggles, and the mouth waters, to imagine the kind of movie Bava could have made from such a fantastic premise. Sacchetti wrote the first draft, which Corman is said to have returned with his enthusiastic approval and a few marginal notes. "Mario died a few days later, so the film was never made. After that, Corman was no longer interested in co-producing the film, and [Lucisano] had no intention of producing a science fiction film by himself."

Anomalia eventually was made, in a manner of speaking. Sacchetti's synopsis reads like a science fiction metaphor for one of his own later horror scripts: Demoni/Demons, which Lamberto Bava directed for producer Dario Argento in 1985. In this film, set in the walled city of Berlin, the audience attending a midnight horror show at the Metropol theater find themselves trapped inside, as the monsters onscreen rip their way out into reality, killing some and infecting others with a virulent contagion that turns its victims into demons. (Sacchetti takes credit only for the first, superior half of the film, disowning the second half that was the contribution of Argento's favorite screenwriter, Franco Ferrini.) When Demoni was released in the summer of 1985, it became Italy's highest grossing film of the year and made Lamberto Bava a wealthier and more successful filmmaker than his father had ever been. [5] With the similarity of Anomalia and Demoni in mind, it is tempting to see Lamberto's professional turning point as a kind of oltre tomba gift from Mario.

While Dardano Sacchetti was busy writing Anomalia, Bava became involved in yet another science fiction project. Anticipating renewed interest in science fiction with the forthcoming release of the Star Wars sequel The Empire Strikes Back, producers Italo Zingarelli and Roberto Palaggi approached Bava to direct a movie called Star Express—which also went by the more enticing Italian title Il pianeta degli ermafroditi ("Planet of the Hermaphrodites"). Lamberto Bava describes it as "a science fiction film that was also a kind of thriller . . . It took place in an unknown universe [on another planet], and there were astronauts . . . The thriller aspect was that one of the astronauts had something that would eventually save a planet from destruction." [6] Roy Bava particularly remembers Mario working on "a wonderful drawing of a landslide on an alien planet, and all around the landslide there were the wrecks of spaceships of the strangest shapes; the atmosphere suggested a ghost town in the Old West. It was like the outpost of the stars."

As Bava's ideas for Star Express began to crystallize, Fate teased him one last time when another older project, Radici di paura, was suddenly green-lighted by Turi Vasile of Laser

1 Dante Matelli, L'espresso, May 1979.

2 Mike Childs, and Alan Jones "Macabre," Cinefantastique 11:1, 1980, 8.

3 Lamberto Bava, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

4 All Sacchetti quotes pertaining to Anomalia are from Dardano Sacchetti, Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre interview transcript, 2000.

5 Curiously, New World Pictures had nothing to do with the American theatrical release (which was distributed by Ascot Entertainment Group), but when the film first came to home video, it did so under the New World banner.

6 Lamberto Bava.

CONCEPTUAL SKETCH (pencil, ink, and colored pen) by Mario Bava for the unmade sci-fi adventure STAR EXPRESS.

Film. "It was going to be a movie about living plants—like Day of the Triffids, you know?" remembers Luigi Cozzi. "He was going to do that for Laser Film, a good company, the same company responsible for Schock. The producer of Schock, Turi Vasile, was also the producer of my film Alien Contamination [1980], so he was close with Mario and he also knew the people at Laser. While we were preparing Alien Contamination, two blocks away was the Laser office and he met Mario there and they would often talk. It was just going into preproduction."

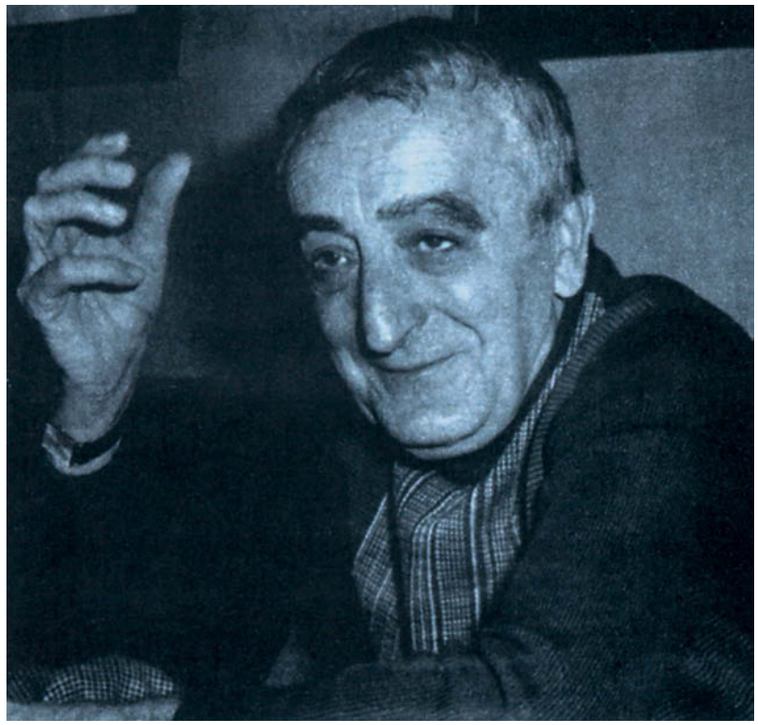
Due to his age, Bava was required by the production's insurers to have a complete physical examination before he could be permitted to direct. Bava did not tell his doctor about the recurring cramps he had been feeling in his legs and feet (which he attributed to smoking too much) but no matter: he was given a clean bill of health. For the first time in three years, Mario Bava was going to direct a new feature film.

Lamberto and his family visited Mario's house on the afternoon of Friday, April 24, on their way to a weekend outing at the beach house of their friend, Carlo Tuzii. Lamberto: "I remember saying goodbye to my father as I was getting into my car. He said, 'See you on Monday'—and then I never saw him again. That was the last time I saw him alive. Even though it was many years ago, it still feels like yesterday."

Mario Bava died—absorbed into the mystery he had spent so much of his life pondering—in the early morning hours of April 25, 1980, at the age of 65.

Roy Bava: "I had seen him on Friday and he was in great shape, both physically and mentally. We had a lot of fun—told a lot of jokes, as usual. I went with Lamberto and [his wife] Rosanna to spend the weekend at Carlo Tuzii's house in Sperlonga, a house on the sea close to Rome. The ex-husband of my aunt Elena called, and he told Rosanna that something had happened. She told Lamberto that Mario had suffered a heart attack and was very ill; we all had to go home right away. As we were heading back to Rome in the car, Lamberto suddenly said, 'Look, I don't want to get to Rome and find out that he's dead. If he's dead, I want to know now.' Rosanna pulled over to the side of the road and she told us that, yes, Mario was dead."

Without saying anything, Lamberto stepped outside the car and spent some time alone at the side of the road, as the Rome-bound traffic sped by in the night.



"Mario died on a Saturday night," Roy continues, "and it was the only Saturday out of 10,000 when I wasn't at home with my grandparents, because I always spent the weekends with them at their house. What my grandmother remembered is, she went to sleep . . . Mario usually stayed up very late to read, and he complained that he had an upset stomach, so he went down to get a bicarbonate from the kitchen. Then he came to bed and went to sleep and my grandmother found out, when she woke up, that he had died. It was very sudden. He must have had the heart attack while he was sleeping."

Through much of their marriage, Mario's wife Iole suffered from heart palpitations and she had tormented him with a morbid fantasy that her excessive weight might someday induce her to have a heart attack. As Andrea Piazzesi puts it bluntly, "She was the kind of person who thought she was having a heart attack constantly, until the other person had the heart attack." Iole apparently spent much of her life envisioning her own death, and Mario came to share this morbidity with her, to the extent of expressing, exploring, enshrining it in his work. Echoes of Iole can be found everywhere in Bava's filmography: jovial, bed-ridden Aunt Ethel dropping dead in La ragazza che sapeva troppo . . . dead, vindictive Mildred haunting her husband in Il rosso segno della follia . . . the skeleton of Elena in her bridal gown, hidden away from the world in a cloistered room in Lisa and the Devil . . . the twinned women of La maschera del demonio and La Venere d'Ille, half Madonna and half monster. The funereal atmosphere of his films, the way that they entwine fear and death with sexuality, romance, and nostalgia, form an oblique love letter from Bava to his wife. Now the dead lover at the heart of Bava's filmography was revealed to be Mario himself, and Iole would have to live with the memory of that irony.

As Lamberto Bava later pointed out to Alfredo Leone, Mario died on the day which Italians celebrate as "Liberation Day"—an appropriate exit for a man who, first of all, had been born as the first World War was declared, and who, secondly, had been a devoted but less-than-happy husband.

"I think it was the best way for him [to go]," Lamberto says, "since he died still young, full of strength and life. He was the sort of man who would have suffered a great deal in old age, I think. He died as he lived—'without pestering anyone,' as he would have put it."

MARIO BAVA photographed during a 1975 PHOTON interview.*

"The last time we met, I asked him, 'Where would you like to go after you die?'" remembers Daria Nicolodi. "Obviously, we weren't expecting him to die, because of a heart attack you die suddenly . . . but part of him was a Greek part that was always attracted to thoughts of Death, which is very near to the Mediterranean culture, this constant thought. He wasn't thinking any negative thoughts about himself, because he was so full of projects. Anyway, he told me that he would like to disappear into the desert like Simon Magus, who vanished into the desert with a prostitute, a woman he found in a bordello, whom he was convinced was the personification of Sophia, the incarnation of Divine Wisdom. It's a strange idea, but definitely good . . . We also talked about how gardening was beautiful, like a kind of alchemy, and I mentioned that I had never done it myself, in reality. He encouraged me to try—and a flower grew. It was the first flower that I had planted myself—I don't know the name in English, a red flower—and my first idea was to bring it to him. It was then that I learned he had died. The family let me sit with him for half an hour. He was buried with my flower."

Andrea Piazzesi was another who came to the house to pay his respects. "We heard that Mario had died and we ran to the house. Who should open the door for us but a nun . . . with the same exact face as Mario! Mario had a sister who was a nun, and she looks like him. For a moment, it looked very funny because, well, Mario was such a nice person, we didn't want to believe that he was dead. So, for a moment, we hoped that it really was Mario playing a trick on us! And he was the kind of person who would play such a trick, you know?"

Mario Bava was interred at the Prima Porta necropolis in Flaminio, an hour's drive north of Rome. "There weren't many people present at his funeral," recalls Daria Nicolodi. "There were very few people from the film community—only a producer [Italo Zingarelli], Lamberto, Dario Argento, and myself were there as representatives. His sister arrived with forty nuns. Mario, however, wasn't very religious."

His sister alone represented the women of the Bava family at the funeral. Iole Bava was too distressed to attend her husband's funeral; neither did their daughter Elena go, nor did Mario's much-adored granddaughter Georgia, who was away at a boarding school in Dublin, Ireland. Georgia's alma mater—St. Raphaela's Secondary School for the handmaidens of the Sacred Heart of Jesus, in Stillorgan County—may seem an odd and distant choice of school, but as she explains: "That school was chosen simply because I had gone to the Handmaidens of the Sacred Heart of Jesus Institute in Rome since I was 5 years old. The teachers were nuns of the same order as Mario's sister. When the time came for me to go to secondary school, I wanted to learn English, but in England this order had only a convent, not a school—and I did not want to become a nun myself! So it was decided that I would go to Ireland, where the order had a school." Before Georgia left Rome, Mario sat down with her and told her how lucky she was to have this opportunity, and he made her promise him that she would learn to speak English. He confessed that his own failure to master this second language was one of his greatest personal regrets. If he could live his life over again, he told her, he would learn English and perhaps move to America.

The relationship between Georgia and her grandfather was so close that the family kept the news of Mario's death a secret from her until she returned to Rome from school at the end of June, two months later.

"She was far away and had no relatives around," Roy explains, "so they waited for her to come back before telling her. She told me later that she had an intuition of what had happened, while she was in Dublin. She knew that something had happened to Mario, because he used to call her maybe once every ten days. He would call to see how she was feeling, if everything was all right, and suddenly, the calls stopped coming. So she had a feeling."

"I did have the feeling that something had happened," Georgia elaborates. "I thought maybe to Mario, maybe and more possibly to Iole, my grandmother, but never, in any case, that I would not see either of them for the rest of my life . . . I imagined someone must have been in hospital. Mother Margareth, one of the head nuns of my school (an enlightened woman whom I really liked), took me aside one day, just before school ended, and told me that life cannot always be the way we'd like it to be, that people we loved will always keep loving us from above. I did not want to ask what she meant; I did not want to know . . . I only had the certainty it was Mario, when I saw my dad at the airport, his eyes still red and wet . . ."

Mario Bava's funeral was small and intimate, in keeping with the wishes of his family. He had worked with virtually everyone in the Italian film industry, and surely more people would have attended had the news of his passing been released. One of Bava's many friends who passed the day unknowingly was his former producer and friend, Alfredo Leone.

"I'll never forget the day I heard that Mario had died," Leone says. "I met a fellow in a production office in Rome, and it came up in conversation that he had worked with Carlo Rambaldi. I said, 'Oh, Carlo! Mario Bava and I used Carlo on several of our pictures together!" And his expression changed and he said, 'Oh, Mario Bava, yes . . . I was so sorry to hear that he died.' I said, 'What?' He said, 'Yes, about three weeks ago.' It knocked the wind out of me. I went numb. The more I thought about it, I felt grateful that we had ended on good terms, that we had our reconciliation, but I also kicked myself because we didn't make use of it to continue working together. And now that chance was gone."

The press was not informed of Bava's passing until April 29, when—ironically—the front page of every newspaper in the world announced the death of the world's most famous film director, the recently knighted Sir Alfred Hitchcock. Hitchcock's passing effectively eclipsed any mention of Bava's death in the newspapers, which "the Italian Hitchcock" might have taken as a great personal favor. Furthermore, when the American show business newspaper Variety finally got around to reporting Bava's death, their eulogy gave him short shrift and credited him with movies not identified with their proper American release titles, but with rough translations of the Italian originals—movie titles which had never appeared on any screen.

Less than a week later, on May 1, American director Henry Levin—who had co-directed Le meraviglie di Aladino with Mario Bava, and followed that assignment by co-directing The Wonderful World of the Brothers Grimm (1962) with Hungarian director and animator George Pal—also died of a heart attack. The level of coincidence became macabre when, on the very next day, May 2, Pal himself also succumbed to cardiac arrest. The director of such films as The Time Machine (1960), 7 Faces of Dr. Lao (1964) and Doc Savage, the Man of Bronze (1975), Pal had spent the majority of his last decade, like Bava, trying unsuccessfully to get a number of promising science fiction projects off his sketchpad and onto the screen.

Three months later, on August 1, British film director Terence Fisher—whose 1958 Hammer film Dracula/Horror of Dracula had been the Italian boxoffice success responsible for jump-starting the moribund horror genre in Italy, making the financing of Bava's La maschera del demonio possible—died in England. He had spent the last seven years of his life similarly inactive, looking ahead to films he would never make.

In a span of only three months, four of the most important names in cinematic horror and fantasy—Hitchcock, Pal, Fisher and Bava—were no longer of this earth.

Daria Nicolodi penned a touching memoir of Mario Bava which appeared, two months after his death, in the Italian magazine L'Europeo 26 (June 24, 1980). She wrote movingly about his importance as an artist, as a personality, and as a friend:

"In my opinion, no cinematic culture can be complete when so many people remain unfamiliar with the works of Bava. Among these, I include those newspaper critics who dismissed him with three worn-out words—'modest,' 'artisan,' and 'pioneer'—and never condescended to see Bava's films themselves, sending their second-stringers instead. For me, and many others more important than I, it was educational beyond words to work with this 60-year-old gentleman, as animated as a boy, and rather like a fairy godfather, in that he was able to maintain a perfect command of his set, with no more forceful trait than his own gentleness.

"Once in a while, during the break between Schock and La Venere d'Ille, I would visit him—never for very long—and he would describe to me incredible lighting tricks, lightning bolts made from stripes of phosphorous and sheets of blue glass, 3-dimensional miniatures, fires . . . all episodes from a younger era, evoking from the abyss of time an impression of untold secrets about the miracle of cinematography.

DARIA NICOLODI as she appears in Lamberto Bava's film LE FOTO DI GIOIA.

"He behaved with a friendly simplicity, trying amuse us all—workmen, technicians, actors—like children with toys: and everything moved along so quickly, we were sometimes afraid that his efforts wouldn't succeed. We all felt like children—like amazed children, but at the same time, full of liking and admiration for this conscientious, attentive, older child in whose creation we were all involved.

"If Bava is still far from achieving a position of respect, it is doubtful that his genius will be forgotten because, like no other in the play of light and shadow, here everything was the doing of one mysterious Maestro. New devices, special effects achieving any number of objectives, all kinds of crazy tricks continually sprung from Bava, who was motivated by an indefatigable search for perfection and often worked with very little means or assistance. An inborn acumen, a deep familiarity with the laws of optics, and a tremendous intensity of concentration resulted in original and unique achievements. Some of the things I'm reminded of are the cardboard cutouts that, in his golden hands, became the dreadful shadow figures of Schock, or his gigantic glass paintings of New York for Dario Argento's Inferno, or the spectre of Death from Operazione paura, which looked like a little girl with blonde hair."

One month after Bava's death, the French leftist newspaper Libération published an interview which Bava had granted back in the spring of 1977. Perhaps because he understood himself to be addressing a different audience in this interview, Bava spoke about his work in an unusually sober, unembarrassed, even intellectual fashion.

"The whips, the masks, and the knives you see in my films allow me to have some fun with the idea of death, the amusement of conveying the smell and taste of it," he said. "The Beyond—which I don't see as any sort of consolation, which is a complete unknown, which allows us to continue to live—is such an enigma that we would rather not ponder its possible consequences . . . The monsters in my films don't exist; they are the twisted visions of people on the brink of mental illness and sexual aberration, who are striving for sanity . . . Barbara Steele had the perfect look to be a necrophilic star, but not to be a damsel in distress. The cinema's great murderers have never been able to escape themselves. You remember Lon Chaney Jr. and his tragic attachment to his father; Bela Lugosi, who slept in a coffin; and Boris Karloff, whose health I probably ruined when we were making I tre volti della paura together, not being a very good nursemaid . . . Generally, my films don't reflect an outgrowth of the tradition. They stand independently of a technocratic society founded on progress and science; they appeal to the devotées of the Inexplicable, who find delirium stimulating and therapeutic. Look at the American counterculture, hooked on drugs. Today, they say the counterculture no longer exists, but this is only because it has become so fashionable and, with astonishing speed, has become the culture itself. On the other hand, my films are not scientific and reflect no particular belief in science. They are more closely allied to romanticism and preoccupied with the mysteries of nature (much like the ecologists), with visions and religious epiphanies, with sects . . . The girl's frigidity in La ragazza che sapeva troppo, the incest in La maschera del demonio, and the masochism in La frusta e il corpo are, to me, very reminiscent of Greek mythology. I'm very Greek for an Italian—heretic, rather than Catholic. It's my dream to someday attain the esoteric knowledge of Basilides, Valentinus, Carpocrates, or that marvelous vagabond Simon Magus, whose constant companion was a woman from a brothel in Tyre, in whom he recognized the reincarnation of Sophia—the Divine Wisdom predating God." [7]

Basilides, Valentinius, Carpocrates, and Simon Magus were all figureheads of Gnosticism in the Alexandria of the second century, A.D. Bava's familiarity with these names shows that his reading had a reach far exceeding Russian and pulp fiction, and also proves that the mysticism of his films was not just decorative, but rooted in deep and serious study of alternative faiths. The last part of this quote is also intriguing because it shows that Bava identified with "that marvelous vagabond" Simon Magus, who was in fact the basis for the character of Simon Wagstaff in the Kilgore Trout novel Venus on the Half-Shell, which Bava had intended to film as Il vagabondo della spazio.

Naturally, the impact of Mario's death was most devastating to his son, Lamberto. "You have to realize, he was not only my father, but also my best friend," he explains. "After his death, I did nothing for a year but try to deal with my emotions. The death of one's father is a painful ordeal for anyone; but to lose a talented and considerate father is a greater ordeal still."

Though critically well-received and somewhat profitable, Macabro did not result automatically in a directorial career for Lamberto Bava. The grieving son did as his father had done after his own directorial debut, by returning to the safe haven of work that was most familiar to him—working as Dario Argento's assistant director on Tenebrae (1982), in which he also made a short onscreen cameo as an elevator repairman. Lamberto returned to directing in 1983 with La casa con la scala nel buio/A Blade in the Dark, a sometimes effective giallo that starred Andrea Occhipinti as a film composer scoring a horror picture at a friend's apartment house, which happens to be stalked by a transvestite serial killer (played by Lamberto's assistant, Michele Soavi).

Next, Lamberto travelled to Miami, Florida to direct the first of two films starring model Michael Sopkiw, Oceano rosso/Devilfish (1984), about attacks on swimmers by a prehistoric strain of carnivorous fish. The second, an action film titled Blastfighter (1984), was filmed in Atlanta, Georgia. Both jobs were taken for the money, and Lamberto had no illusions about their quality. I spoke to him by telephone when he was on location in Atlanta, and when I asked if these films were going to be good, he laughed self-deprecatingly and said, "Noooooo." For both films, he adopted the sentimental pseudonym, "John Old Jr."

Lamberto's career took a startling change in fortune with his next picture, Demoni/Demons, based on a script by Dardano Sacchetti that was a sort of earthbound rewrite of the unfilmed script Anomalia. Produced by Dario Argento and shot partially in (then West) Berlin, the film—about a virulent virus, communicated by a horror film at a midnight screening, that turns its audience into vicious demons—surprised everyone by becoming the top-grossing Italian feature of 1985. The film's success raised Lamberto's star as a filmmaker to such an extent that his next movie, Morirai a mezzanotte/You'll Die at Midnight (1986, another of his "Noooooo" pictures), was released with the curious legend, "Lamberto Bava Presents . . . a film by John Old Jr." In 1986—the centenary of Eugenio Bava's birth—Lamberto directed a sequel to his great success, Demoni 2: L'incubo ritorna/Demons 2: The Nightmare Continues, which marked the addition to his crew of his son Fabrizio as second assistant director.

As it became increasingly difficult for Italian directors to fund theatrical features, Lamberto moved into television, where he shot some dramatic segments (called Turno di notte) for Dario Argento's short-lived television show Giallo, followed by a number of mostly weak-tea, but still elegantly designed horror films in 1987. One of these pictures, La casa dell'ogro/The Ogre, received limited theatrical release under the title Demoni 3. (Michele Soavi's La chiesa was undertaken as Demoni 3 before deciding to dissociate itself from the franchise. Finally, Umberto Lenzi directed the official Demoni 3 in 1991.) In 1987, Lamberto directed a quartet of TV-movies for the Italian showcase Brivido giallo: Una notte al cimetero/Graveyard Disturbance, Per sempre/The Changeling 2: The Return, La casa del ogro/House of the Ogre, and A cena col vampiro/Dinner With a Vampire. Each of these films was robustly designed by Massimo Antonello Geleng (a former art director for Fellini, subsequently allied to Michele Soavi and Dario Argento), but only Per sempre stood out, demonstrating greater directorial confidence and subtlety than Lamberto had shown before. The following year, Lamberto joined forces with Andrea Piazzesi to form ANFRI S.r.l., a production company under which banner he directed four horror/suspense films for the proposed Reteitalia TV-movie series Alta tensione. These included Testimone oculare ("Eyewitness"), Il principe del terrore ("The Master of Terror"), and two outstanding pictures that represent his finest solo work to date, Il gioko[8] ("School of Fear") and—a film of particular interest—L'uomo che non voleva morire ("The Man Who Didn't Want to Die"), based on the Giorgio Scerbanenco story which Mario had unsuccessfully tried to film in the early 1970s.

7 Levin Safao, Libération, May 5, 1980.

"Mario wrote a script together with Rafael Azcona," Lamberto remembers. "It was supposed to be a big movie, but it didn't get made. Many years later, I took the unfilmed script and made a TV movie out of it."

Azcona, a novelist and screenwriter since the late 1950s, is best remembered for writing the Marco Ferreri films Una storia moderna/The Conjugal Bed and La donna scimmia/The Ape Woman (both 1963), La Grande Bouffe (1973), and Ciao maschio/Bye Bye Monkey (1978), and Fernando Trueba's Belle Époque (1992). The unrelenting, darkly ironic quality of Azcona's work makes it most regrettable that his collaboration with Mario was never realized. Working from a script by Gianfranco Clerici (Lucio Fulci's Non si sevizia un paperino/Don't Torture the Duckling, Ruggero Deodato's Cannibal Holocaust), Lamberto rose to the occasion and produced an excellent, hard-hitting crime thriller worthy of comparison to Cani arrabbiati. Unfortunately, the Alta tenzione series never made it to air, and the four films that ANFRI produced for it, including L'uomo che non voleva morire and Il gioko, were given scant television release at best.

Lamberto's next project found him moving onto hallowed ground: a color remake—in name only, really—of La maschera del demonio (1988), scripted by Massimo De Rita. The Reteitalia production was more faithful to Gogol's "Viy" than Mario DARIO ARGENTO, Lamberto Bava, and cameraman Gianlorenzo Battaglia film the air vent sequence of DEMONI with actress Fiore Argento.

Bava's version had been, but critical reaction to the film was harsh, overlooking the power of some well-staged horror sequences involving the special makeup effects artistry of Sergio Stivaletti.

The commercial failure of these ventures, coupled with Lamberto's opting out of the Demoni franchise, created obstacles in his career and he worked in commercial and industrial films until 1991, when he succeeded in pitching an original script (co-written with Teodoro Agrimi) to P.A.C.: Corpo mosaico/Body Puzzle (1991). Thanks to the casting of Joanna Pacula and Tomas Arana, this ferocious giallo succeeded in scoring international theatrical distribution—a first for Lamberto since Demoni 2—though the family luck returned to form when American prints credited the film's direction to "Larry Louis." Corpo mosaico also encountered post-production problems when the family of composer Carl Orff objected to its use of Orff's "Carmina Burana" and demanded its removal, which took some of the bite out of its horror sequences.

Lamberto Bava regained his popular niche with Fantaghirò/Cave of the Golden Rose (1991), a winning, three-hour television fantasy inspired by the writings of Italo Calvino that scored enormous ratings. Its success prompted six epic-length sequels, again bringing Lamberto greater wealth and success than his father had ever known. Starring Alessandra Martines and Kim Rossi-Stuart, Fantaghirò scored enormous ratings and proved popular throughout Europe, especially in Germany, prompting four epic-length sequels that Lamberto directed between 1992 and 1996. During this time, and after, he branched out into other sword-and-sorcery epics for Italian television, including Desideria e l'anello del drago/The Dragon's Ring (1994), Sorellina e il principe del sogno (1996, with Christopher Lee), La principessa e il povero/The Princess and the Pauper (1997, with Anna Falchi and Max von Sydow), and the miniseries Caraibi/Pirates of the Caribbean (1998, with Mario Adorf and Anna Falchi), which was inspired by the Disneyland ride and subsequently inspired Disney's own big-budget film version in 2003, starring Johnny Depp.

Now divorced from his second wife Rosanna, Lamberto Bava divides his time today between homes in Rome and Cuba. As this book goes to press, Bava is making his long-awaited return to the horror genre with two new features: The Torturer (2005) and Ghost Son (2006). While The Torturer, shot on digital video, is described as a savage horror film about entrapment and tests of cruelty in the vein of the American hit Saw (2004), Ghost Son—co-scripted by Bava and Silvia Ranfagni—is about a widow (Laura Harring) who gives birth to a child that is the demonic reincarnation of her late husband, a more explicit return to themes previously explored in Schock. Italian critic Lorenzo Codelli, who saw both films at the 2006 Puchon International Film Festival in South Korea, praised Lamberto's latest offerings: "The Torturer is a modest but amusing DV movie, with a lot of gore and some black humor," he told me. "And I liked Ghost Son very much, one of his best efforts. The script might be a mix of déja vus, but the direction is really subtle, the scope camerawork superb, and all the performances well above standards. Korean audiences were thrilled by the movie."

As incredible as it may seem, Lamberto Bava's forty-plus year career in the cinema now embraces a longer time span and a greater number of films than were ever signed by Mario Bava. Despite this, his work continues to be overshadowed by his father's legacy and he is naturally aware of this fact. "Whenever my work is mentioned, I am always remembered as the son of Bava," he acknowledges. "This used to irritate me, and I fought against it, wanting to be myself, but now I accept it—I accept who I am—and I take every reminiscence of my father as a very great compliment."

In a sense, Lamberto has achieved something in his own career that his father was never able to do. With over thirty films to his credit, he is recognized as an important commercial filmmaker in his own country, as well as internationally. He is also a respected screenwriter and producer, which has empowered him to continue working as a director, and he is widely considered as one of the best assistant directors in the history of Italian cinema. Like Mario, Lamberto rejects any suggestion that he is an artist; he doesn't see himself as working on the same level as his favorite directors (Ridley Scott, David Cronenberg, and Joe Dante, to name a few), but his career has been busy, fruitful, lucrative, and satisfying. It is also worth noting that Lamberto has managed to find a niche in the crowded realm of Italian fantasy that is allied to the work of his father and grandfather, yet completely his own. His fairy tale miniseries—which show the influence of Ridley Scott's Legend (1985)—are a unique contribution to a family legacy that is now well into its second century. If critical appreciation has eluded Lamberto Bava, this is because it has been his aim to entertain audiences rather than please critics, and because his best and most serious work has not been widely seen.

THE NEXT Generation: Georgia Bava poses with her son, Mario.

After working as an architect in Venice for more than a decade, Elena Bava returned to Rome with her husband, whom she married at the age of 27. "She lived away from Rome for a few years, until she was 32 or 33," says her niece Georgia. "Then she and her husband bought a house near my grandparents, so she could be nearer to her family—to her father, mostly. She and her husband divorced the same year that Mario died."

In 1980, deeply affected by the death of her father, Elena abandoned her work in architecture and came to terms with her loss by embracing the traditional family business of sculpture. Today, she sculpts primarily in bronze, but also works in Fiberglas and terracotta. Her work has been exhibited several times at the La Pigna gallery in Rome and at the Atelier der Anderen-Art in Basel, and they can be seen and purchased through her website at http://web.tiscali.it/etiab/index.htm.

Several months after returning home from Dublin and being told of her grandfather's death, 15-year-old Georgia Bava resumed her education at a school in Rome. It was there, on October 25, 1980, that she met and befriended Alberto Maria Brusco, the young man who would become her husband twelve years later, in October 1992. Alberto never met Mario Bava in the flesh, but Georgia arranged an introduction: "I remember, soon after we met, ditching school with 8 There is no such word as "gioko" in the Italian language; the word is here deliberately misspelled—from "gioco" (meaning "joke"), in the manner of Stephen King's Pet Sematary—as an indication of the children at the heart of its story.

BAVA—The New Generation: Fabrizio "Roy" Bava on the set of Dario Argento's IL CARTAIO.

Alberto, taking the number 201 bus and taking him to the cemetery, because I wanted them to meet." After completing secondary school in Rome, she went to college in Paris at La Sorbonne for a year, where she learned French, and completed her education in Rome at the University La Sapienza, majoring in Art History. One year before she graduated, Georgia began working part time for a prominent Roman auction house specializing in fine art, and she has continued to work in this field, she laughs, "since 1989—as they say on good whiskeys!" Although interested in the cinema, her great personal passions are early 20th century art and literature, particularly the abstract paintings of Wassily Kandinsky and the writings of James Joyce, which she discovered while attending school in Dublin. She did flirt with a career in film production, when Lamberto hired her to work as his continuity girl on some television commercials, but she didn't enjoy the boredom of the set experience and happily resumed her life and career in the real world. On July 15, 1995, Georgia and Alberto Brusco became the parents of a daughter named Martina, followed on March 31, 1998, by a son—whom they named Mario.

As is rapidly becoming common knowledge, Georgia's younger brother has continued in the footsteps of his forefathers. "I had many different careers in mind," says Roy Bava, "but I was really crazy about films and the on-set atmosphere. All movies, not just horror. Mario was always giving Georgia and me pocket money to go to the movies. I always liked watching them and decided to become involved. I remember Mario advising me to find a serious job; he wanted me to become a lawyer or a surgeon—but, at the same time, he was always asking me to help him out! Lamberto would never invite me on the set of Inferno; he was very busy and didn't want to worry about keeping his eye on a 7-year-old kid. But Mario always took me with him. He'd say, 'You sit there—watch and learn.' The same thing happened with Lamberto: he'd wake up at the same time as Mario, ready to go to school and when they left together, he would say to Lamberto, 'Why are you going to school? They're not teaching you anything special. Come to the set with me instead.' Mario did tell me to do what I believed in, what I liked in life, and I've done that."[9]

At the age of 18, after finishing high school, Roy spent three weeks on the set of Demoni in a more serious "watch and learn" capacity, and then graduated to the official position of second assistant on Demoni 2. Though he was still very young and inexperienced, not quite ready to fully embrace a career, things began to happen for him. After Demoni 2, that film's producer Dario Argento started the preproduction of his next feature, Opera. "Dario called me to ask if I wanted to be his third AD, so I started on that with Michele Soavi for a few weeks," Roy recalls. "Then Lamberto started his own series of TV movies—Graveyard Disturbance, etc.—so I left Opera. Lamberto told me, if I really was convinced the film industry was for me, that I should go and work with him on those. By this time, I had already done five movies with him as a trainee volunteer—I had also worked on the Giallo TV show (my father directed the 'Turno di Notte' segments)—so I asked Dario if I could leave, that it would be best [meaning more experience], and he graciously agreed."

After that series of films ended, Roy continued his education and also served two years of compulsory national service in the Italian army. In 1993, he completed his education at the University of California at Los Angeles, where he perfected his English. "What many people don't know," he reveals, "is that I wrote the very first draft of La chiesa/The Church in LA at UCLA. No one knows that or wants to remember. Lamberto was supposed to direct Demoni 3, which became La chiesa. What's in the movie that came from me was the whole opening with the Knights Templar. After six months, Lamberto dropped out because of scheduling conflicts, and told Dario to let Michele Soavi do it."

Roy later assisted his father on the ambitious Fantaghirò miniseries. "We produced 200 minutes of TV, in costume, on location and with special effects in less than eight weeks," he says with pride. "That is when you're the most creative: when you're up against it." More recently, he has branched out to assist other directors, including Vanna Paoli (Accidental Detective, 2000), Guido Chiesa (Il partigiano Johnny/Johnny the Partisan, 2000), and Dario Argento (Il cartaio/The Card Player, 2004). Roy's affiliation with Argento finds the First Family of Italian Fantasy Cinema now entrenched in its fourth generation.

"I've worked with many directors, but the only two I ever really wanted to work for were Dario and [Bernardo] Bertolucci," Roy admits. "So, when Dario called me, I was thrilled. I later found out that he had called me many times before, but I was always away on other movies. The same thing happened with Roberto Begnini; he wanted me for Pinocchio, but apparently could never contact me; I didn't even know he had tried! I didn't know anything about Il cartaio because I haven't been in Rome for the past year, really. I knew about Occhiali neri ["Black Sunglasses," another planned Argento project] mainly because Dario and Lamberto always get together at Christmas. It's a tradition. I'm always meeting Dario on a family basis, so he never mentioned movies to me, apart from the ones he had recently seen and liked. It never ever got around to, 'Why don't you come and work for me?' or 'Why don't you ever ask me to work with you?' Then, out of the blue, he called me. I asked when we had to start and he said, 'Monday.' There was so much to do! The first time I met Dario for this movie, we met in Tomaso Calevi's office, and I was expecting to go though the schedule. But no! I was whisked off to Franco Ferrini's house to help alter the script. I was really impressed by that, as I didn't expect to become so creatively involved so quickly! But [Dario] really valued my opinion and that was a great feeling. One of his greatest qualities is that he gets you so involved and inspired you want to do the best for him."

Asked to describe what he found most exhilarating about working with Argento, Roy says, "There are so many things about him, but mainly, he's a true genius . . . I can't tell you how many times we've had hour-long phone conversations after a hard day on location. He's this mine field of ideas, creativity and possibilities, and he loves talking them all through to energize and get you on the same page as himself. That's the best way of working and I appreciate that so much. As a person, I see Dario as part of my family. Working with him in such close quarters, I feel our emotional connection in a way that goes beyond the work ethic. That's important to me and it makes my job feel less like work. The worst part is that he's not easy to work with. He changes so mercurially . . . but that can be fun, in a weird way. Many people in his crew, who he has worked with before, know they must be as elastic as possible with him. Anyone who has rigid views and working methods and looks at the clock are not the best people to surround him. He's an organic director and this poses many problems. I struggle to try and make people understand him, and that takes a lot of effort. Sometimes we aren't rowing in the same direction and it's my job to make sure everyone is pulling their weight. You can't work with Dario with your handbrake on; you have to go with the flow. He told me once that fun was something you had at the seaside and on holiday—not while you're making a film! It's stressful, but you know that going in . . . I had similar difficulties with my father. [Sometimes I would wonder] 'Is he mad at me because I'm his son and I've let him down, or is he just mad at my job description?' It's a hard call sometimes. It's usually because he's pissed off with someone else and you are in the closest range; it's nothing personal. I'm Dario's shield. Confrontation is always the best way, though; don't let things simmer. Dario knows it's my job to assist him in bringing his vision to the screen and fights come with the territory. We are comfortable with each other and that's important."

Roy also cites an interesting example to show how close his creative bond with Argento has already become: "I won't do second unit directing now, if I'm the first AD. It's too hard. But the other day, we had three hours to achieve twelve shots because traffic had caused some equipment delays. So we filmed different scenes back-to-back, together. At one point, we called 'Action' at exactly the same time. I would only do that for Dario—not even for my father!"

Roy's ease at communicating in English helped Il cartaio to become the most naturally and convincingly spoken of Argento's many attempts at English-language filmmaking, and the film itself turned out to be Argento's most effective effort since Lamberto Bava was serving as his assistant in the early 1980s. Roy is presently regarded as one of the top three assistant directors in the Italian film industry, but he downplays any suggestion that he should become a director in his own right, as Eugenio, Mario, and Lamberto did before him. "Perhaps I will become a full time director one day," he allows, "but the only things I've been offered so far have been TV movies. I prefer film and want to be part of a meaningful production. I'm always asked to be the Italian First AD on any big American movies that come to Italy. I turned down Gangs of New York because I didn't want to be in the situation of arguing with the American AD crew. That's not challenging to me at all. Often, saying you are a director in Italy means that you are really unemployed. I can't afford that. It's not your film debut that's the problem, anyway. Most people have one film in them, but what about the second and third, when artistic exhaustion sets in? I don't want to put myself in that position. It's a tough profession."

In addition to inheriting Mario's personal library, Roy also inherited his grandfather's devotion to reading. "I have a passion for literature and that came from Mario," he confirms. "He read so much, often a book a day. His thirst for knowledge was contagious. Often, after a long, hard day's shooting, he would stay up until 3:00 in the morning—reading. It relaxed him and nurtured his soul. When I worked on a film with the rock star Luciano Ligabue, it was a tough movie, filmed at night in the summer. But even though I didn't finish until 5:00 in the morning, I would still need to read for a few hours to calm myself down. That's Mario's fault!"

Roy lives in Rome in a church under the second largest dome in the city. A spiral staircase of forty-two steps leads up to the apartment that Mario secured for his grandson when Roy was still a child, in 1974. In the living room, surrounded by some of the original frescos which the entire Bava family helped to restore, hang two pieces of framed art by Mario Bava. One depicts the temptation of St. Anthony, and the other is an original drawing that reflects how Mario saw the protagonist of a book he had daydreamed about optioning and turning into a movie: The Hobbit.

It seems that Roy Bava has lived well by the three rules for happiness once proposed to him by his grandfather. Not yet 40, he has already travelled widely, been married and divorced, and isn't at home often enough to keep a pet. His appearance in the Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre documentary shows him to be articulate, charismatic, and undaunted by the prospect of public appearances. His grandfather would be very proud of his talent, his personal charm, and his lack of personal or professional inhibition.

Mario Bava's wife, Iole, survived her husband by more than a decade. According to Roy, whenever he visited his grandmother in the years after Mario's passing, she broke into tears at the sight of him, crying, "You look so much like your grandfather!" She died on July 7, 1994, at the age of 79.

"It happened very suddenly," describes Georgia Bava. "She wasn't sick at all. She was alone and had a very high temperature, and she thought something might be wrong with her heart. She called my father and my aunt and asked them to meet her at the hospital. By the time they arrived, she was dead. The official cause was given as meningitis." [10]

Mario and Iole were not buried together, nor close to one another. Mario's repository (lot 4951) at Prima Porta has two distinguishing characteristics. The first is a medallion-shaped bas relief displayed to the left of his name that depicts Eusebius Sophronius Hieronymus (347 – 420 A.D.), the Biblical translator canonized as St. Jerome. Georgia Bava remembers that the piece occupied a place of pride on the balcony of her grandparents' home at Via Valgardena 3 for as long as she can remember, but she never questioned it and its provenance has been forgotten. The artist of the carving was possibly Eugenio Bava, who was of course known as a sculptor of Saintly subjects. Its relevance to Mario may be purely sentimental, or a nod to his passion for collecting books, as Hieronymus was later named by the Roman Catholic Church as the patron Saint of translators, librarians and encyclopedists. Hieronymus was also responsible for a quotation suggestive of Bava's own work credo: Be ever engaged, so that, whenever the Devil calls, he may find you occupied.

The second point of distinction is that the repository is not adorned with the traditional photographic plate. In death, Mario was indulged by his family with the anonymity he always craved.

9 Roy Bava interviewed by Alan Jones, April 2003. All quotes from Roy Bava in this section are from this interview.

10 Georgia Bava, interview by the author, June 21, 1999.

MARIO
BAVA
30·7·1914 • 25·

BURIAL site at Prima Porta cemetery, in Flaminio.

Mario Bava Lives

THE DEATH of Mario Bava coincided with what many have described as the death of the Italian cinema.

Screenwriter Ernesto Gastaldi traces the turn of the tide to 1978, when his friend Peppo Sacchi emerged victorious in a trial that brought an end to the public television monopoly in Italy. At that moment, Gastaldi remembers, "I said that our cinema was coming to an end. We never had a very strong industry; our producers were better gamblers than businessmen. [In the wake of that trial], an incredible number of TV stations started showing films for free. We were flooded with free movies, and of course, no one will spend money on what they can have for free. After a few years, after all of the Italian movies had been shown on television, many of the stations failed and a private monopoly was formed by Berlusconi. Then there began a race between the public and private monopolies to buy up all the American films, soap operas, and sitcoms. This left our production rate near zero. Our films were no longer being dubbed in the US; instead, we dubbed all of [the US] productions. There used to be a tax on dubbing, so that the money earned in Italy by American distributors also had to be spent here. Our government was corrupted—I don't know by whom (your guess is as good as mine)—and this dubbing tax eventually disappeared, along with the rules. We used to make 300 films per year, but this diminished to only 60 or 70 per year, most of them Articolo 28s [government-funded low-budget fare] . . . usually shit. The great old producers died or retired, and the new ones didn't like to take risks, taking their projects to public or private television and asking for money. If someone gave them 3 million lire, they made a film for 2.5 million. Quality became irrelevant."

Actor John Steiner, who had worked in Italy almost exclusively for the better part of twenty years, remembers the sea change in the Italian film industry at this time:

"I actually left Rome in '78, and came back periodically, but I didn't actually go back to work until about 1982. I went to live in London, and during '78 and '79, I really didn't do anything in Italy. The reason for that was, it really was the beginning of the end. The old Italian movies were based in an Italian distribution deal which usually covered the costs of the movie; if they got a deal for the rest of the world, they could make some jam on top of that. Usually, those rights included television rights sold to the United States. In 1972, that was stopped by President Nixon; in other words, in America, you could no longer write off a tax loss by investing in a movie made in Italy, which usually would come back and get sold to American television. That really hurt the Italian film industry, and I think this was the problem with people like Bava. Dario Argento continued to make movies after that, but people on Bava's level got very badly hurt, because there just wasn't the money to make those kinds of movies any more. I know that he died shortly after making Schock—what was it, two years after?—and I think his death was probably brought on by lack of work and disappointment.

"The movie business was changing profoundly, and that's really what made up my mind to reconsider about being an actor. I could see it was getting harder and harder to make a living. Then, in 1982, the video market suddenly sprang up and I started working like crazy, from 1982 up to '85. In '86, again, the video market fell out, Cannon went broke and the mini-majors got into real trouble. The idea was, you could put together a low-budget picture at a cost of about $600–700,000, and expect to make about $5–6,000,000 on foreign sales. You could calculate down to the last market, within about $10,000. And that all literally crumbled and disappeared. They were just churning these things out, and the studios got wise to the video market and raised the price, cut down the inventory, and took over the distribution of video throughout the whole world. I can remember that there were really productive distribution companies in Germany and Italy and France that were later squeezed out. It was in 1986 that I said to myself, 'I can't make the living that I used to,' you know? Plus, I think I'd got to an age where I wasn't really interested in being an actor any more. I think that just naturally happens."

Today, John Steiner resides with his wife and children in Sherman Oaks, California, where he makes his living selling real estate. When I interviewed him for this book, he expressed astonishment at the increasing popularity of the Italian cult cinema. "I am personally thrilled—it's very flattering—absolutely amazed at the depth of the cult following that these movies have," he told me. "Even in my present business, I will have a client call me up and say, 'Gosh, you know, when my brother heard that John Steiner was my real estate agent, he asked me to ask you . . . '"

"What was Lucio Fulci really like?" I interjected.

"Exactly!" Steiner laughed. "And the interesting thing is, they are all 25 years old! There's this enormous culture of Italian B-movies, and I'm absolutely bowled over by it."

When I began researching this book in 1975, Mario Bava and the Italian B-cinema were still alive though not exactly healthy. Bava's films disappeared after their brief theatrical bookings and those of us who were marked by them, whether we encountered them in theaters or on late night television, could replay them only in memory. Today—thanks largely to the efforts of Alfredo Leone—the majority of Bava's once-elusive catalogue is now available on VHS and DVD, and beautifully restored 35 mm prints of most of Bava's films have been struck for repertory bookings and retrospective screenings. The renewed availability of his work, the freedom extended to film buffs and scholars to examine it at their leisure—frame-by-frame, if desired—has resulted in a widespread rediscovery of Mario Bava, as well as a serious critical reassessment of his contribution to cinema.

AN IMPISH Bava smiles on the set of ECOLOGIA DEL DELITTO in 1971.

Of those who preceded him as specialists in the horror genre—Tod Browning in the 1920s and '30s, James Whale in the 1930s, Jacques Tourneur in the 1940s, and Terence Fisher in the 1950s, to pick the truly emblematic names—they are all remembered, but for the most part (with the exception of Tourneur, whose touch was evident in M. Night Shyamalan's 1999 success The Sixth Sense), the active influence of these filmmakers has begun to run dry. When the films of Browning, Whale, and Fisher do inspire contemporary directors, the resulting works tend to be nostalgic rather than progressive. In the decades which have passed since Bava's death—since Friday the 13th, since the advent of home video—there have been surprisingly few positive or stable innovations in the horror genre beyond his example.

In his own directorial career, Joe Dante—one of the first American critics to pay his respects to Bava's work—has continued to acknowledge Bava as a major source of inspiration, notably in the saturated color lighting schemes of his "It's A Good Life" episode in Twilight Zone: The Movie (1983) and Gremlins (1984). His 1985 Twilight Zone episode "Shadow Man" featured a boogeyman character explicitly modelled on Baron von Kleist from Baron Blood.

LOOKING quite dapper with an umbrella, flowers, and white gloves, circa 1950.

CLOWNING on the set of a 1940s production.

The number of hommages have proliferated with each passing year. Pedro Almodóvar's Matador (1986) opens with the shocking image of a character masturbating to televised images from Sei donne per l'assassino. Martin Scorsese has acknowledged that Melissa Graps, the ghost-child of Operazione paura, provided his inspiration for the climax of his controversial film The Last Temptation of Christ (1988), in which Satan appears to Christ in the likeness of a young girl.

The work of director Tim Burton contains even more overt references to Bava. Batman (1989) contains a brief shot of a mechanical door labelled "Bay 4" whose stylized writing can also be read as "Bava," and in Mars Attacks! (1996), the manager of a Las Vegas casino (played by football great Jim Brown) is named Mr. Bava. In Sleepy Hollow (1999), Burton paid explicit reference to La maschera del demonio in a black-and-white dream sequence featuring Lisa Marie as a witch who emerges from an Iron Maiden with her face riddled with holes. Burton's latest works, the live action adaptation of Roald Dahl's Charlie and the Chocolate Factory and the original stop-motion-animation feature Corpse Bride (both 2005), show that Bava's influence continues to be a guiding light in his creative endeavors. Charlie and the Chocolate Factory is a veritable textbook of cinematic quotations, ranging from House of Wax (1953) and Ben-Hur (1959) to Tomb of Ligeia (1965) and 2001: A Space Odyssey (1968). In the film's Inventing Room sequence, Bava's Terrore nello spazio is paid explicit hommage in terms of the room's art direction, which greatly resembles the interior of the derelict alien spacecraft. Production designer Alex McDowell told Entertainment Weekly magazine that Burton screened some of Bava's films for him during pre-production for inspirational purposes. Corpse Bride, co-directed by Burton and Mike Johnson, goes well beyond decorative influence with an original screenplay (by Caroline Thompson, with John August and Pamela Pettler) about a young bridegroom-to-be who accidentally places his betrothed's wedding band on the skeletal finger of maiden's corpse, reviving her to claim her entitlements—a macabre twist on the Prosper Mérimée story that was the basis of Bava's final film, La Venere d'Ille.

In Quentin Tarantino's Pulp Fiction (1994), "Bava" is a particularly potent brand of heroin sold by Eric Stoltz. In 1997, when Tarantino formed Rolling Thunder Pictures—a branch of Miramax Entertainment devoted to reviving some of his favorite overlooked films for theatrical release—Blood and Black Lace was among the first titles announced in the series. Unfortunately, usable 35 mm English elements could not be located and the re-release never took place. Also in 1994, Evil Dead director Sam Raimi (an avowed Bava fanatic) revived the long-dormant peplum genre by co-producing Hercules: The Legendary Journeys, a syndicated television series lensed in New Zealand. In one of the best episodes of the first season, the show remade Ercole al centro della terra as Hercules (Kevin Sorbo) descended into Hell to recover a lost friend, encountering a good deal of Bavian smoke, mirrors, and colored filters along the way.

Since MTV debuted in the early 1980s, rock videos have taken considerable sustenance from Bava's image bank—mystical, cipher-like women, multicolored fog, mannequins, switchblades unfolding in blue light—but this was perhaps a second-hand influence, as the similarly stylized films of Dario Argento came to home video first and became very popular among young people for their flashy visuals and rock-oriented soundtracks. Bava's particular influence was first observed in Laura Branigan's 1983 video "Solitaire," directed by William Friedkin, which featured the singer as a woman pursued by a white-masked stalker modelled on the killer in Sei donne per l'assassino. (Friedkin, speaking to the press at the Turin Film Festival in November 2003, singled out Mario Bava and Dario Argento as his favorite Italian filmmakers.) In 1998, the punk/rap group The Beastie Boys paid even more overt hommage to Bava in the video for their song, "Body Movin'," which utilized clips from Diabolik and recreated its dazzling Pop Art panache.

The Bava renaissance came to a head in 2000, when Image Entertainment launched "The Mario Bava Collection," a series of letterboxed releases on VHS and DVD that made Bava's films available, for the first time in America, in their original director's cuts. The success of this fully annotated series was such that other video companies around the world followed Image's example, including VCI Home Entertainment with their extraordinary multi-lingual DVDs of Blood and Black Lace and The Whip and the Body, and Fantoma with their breathtaking widescreen presentation of Hercules in the Haunted World. More recently, the Italian soundtrack label Digitmovies initiated "The Mario Bava Original Soundtrack Anthology," a welcome and long-overdue project making available on CD the previously unreleased Bava scores of Roberto Nicolosi, Carlo Rustichelli, Stelvio Cipriani, and others.

During his lifetime, when his work was not so accessible, Bava's films were often belittled as exercises in style over content—ironically, at the same point in history when the world of art was abandoning the literal for the colorful abstractions of Pablo Picasso, Jackson Pollack, and Robert Rauschenberg; when popular music began moving away from traditional song structure toward the improvisational explorations of Miles Davis, Ravi Shankar, and the Grateful Dead; and when some of the leading lights of contemporary world literature were Vladimir Nabokov, Alain Robbe-Grillet, Anthony Burgess, John Barth, and Thomas Pynchon—all acclaimed less for the stories they told than for the uniquely personal ways in which they told them. Bava deserved a measure of the critical respect accorded to his contemporaries, but didn't receive it because his work was habitually retitled, re-edited, re-voiced, re-scored, and subjected to every other indignity that could be visited upon a motion picture—but, even moreso, because he found the ideal vehicle for his self-expression in a ghettoized film genre that no prominent film critic of his era took seriously.

"I've often thought that if Bava's films had been released in America in Italian, with English subtitles, he would have been recognized earlier as one of the world's great directors," Quentin Tarantino has said, and he may have a point. Only now that his work has been restored to its original form and made available in a format capable of showing it to its best advantage, has Bava become properly recognized as one of the horror genre's chief figures. The "Horror" category of Amazon.com—the internet's leading video retailer—includes Mario Bava on a short list of eleven filmmakers designated as "Horror Masters." In the last few years alone, Leonard Maltin's Movie & Video Guide has also reassessed much of Bava's filmography, replacing its formerly dismissive ("★" or "BOMB") capsule reviews with 3-star accolades.

The flood of Bava titles on home video resulted in an unprecedented level of notoriety for the late director, as well as a fresh flood of hommages and imitations. In the 22nd episode of the popular Japanese animated series Pokémon, "Kacy and the ESP" [US: "Abra and the Psychic Showdown"], one of the characters is a little blonde-haired girl with a luminous white ball—a configuration of horror that also appears in Wellson Chin's Hong Kong horror film Tamagotchi (1997) and William Malone's Fear Dot Com (2002). Indeed, the entire "J-Horror" or Japanese horror movement of the early 21st century revolves around the central image of a dead girl's ghost—something that did not exist in the vocabulary of horror cinema prior to Bava's Operazione paura. Alejandro Amenábar's The Others (2002) features a memorable recreation of the "family at the window" shot from "I wurdalak," and former cinematographer Ernest Dickerson's Bones (2001) is so thoroughly indebted to Bava's visual concepts, particularly those expressed in La frusta e il corpo and Baron Blood, that New Line Entertainment's DVD release included a short documentary acknowledging these parallels. A 2002 British television commercial for Nokia Electronics depicted a tube station passenger seemingly unnerved by his urban environs, who was ultimately shown to be terrified by a scene from Black Sabbath's "The Drop of Water" playing on his tiny handheld TV—an advertisement which not only incorporated Bava footage, but also Bava's conceit (from Il rosso segno della follia) of explaining the terror of a given moment with a clip from one of his old movies.

BRINGING a litter of basset hound puppies to the set of a 1940s production.

Taking Bava's influence to an altogether higher level was Roman Coppola's directorial debut CQ (2001), a film about the making of a movie loosely patterned on Diabolik in the Rome of the 1960s. Coppola's hommages to Diabolik managed to be loving without being directly imitative, and his film succeeded in bringing to the screen some dazzling, innovative visual ideas rooted in the simpler special effects grammar of Bava's era. What made Coppola's film so special is that it did not simply drop Bava's name or quote memorable images from his films; it celebrated the very process of making Diabolik and took the surprising step of incorporating aspects of Bava's own life story into his semi-autobiographical protagonist, Paul Ballard (Jeremy Davies). Ballard is a second-unit director working in Paris who is called upon to rescue a science fiction film abandoned by its director (Gérard Dépardieu). Fictionalizing the story of how Bava took over the direction of I vampiri, Coppola gave Paul a talent for devising colorful matte and in-camera special effects and set him the task of finishing the assignment thrust upon him in only two days. Most importantly, CQ delivered a brand of special effects (courtesy of Gene Warren) which had not been seen on the big screen in decades—naïve, even nonsensical but nonetheless visionary effects, like snowfall on the moon—so that one was ultimately as impressed by its own original artistic sense as by the Bavian sensibility it so ably recreated.

In 2004, Lamberto Bava paid his own hommage to Diabolik with a music video for the Italian rock artist Tiromancino. "Diabolik: Amore impossibile" is a four-minute video that opens with Diabolik (Daniel McVicar) relaxing at home, when Eva Kant (Claudia Gerini) proposes a new heist to him. A speedy drive in their black Jaguar takes them to a museum where they overcome a familiar-looking security guard (a cameo by John Phillip Law) and rob a diamond-studded patroness of the arts. After celebrating their success in a bed showered with cash, Eva absconds with the spoils and picks up her true love Tiromancino, leaving Diabolik behind to curse his misfortune. It's a delightful little film, its direction almost indistinguishable from the direction of the feature film that has now become a cult classic.

Perhaps the ultimate proof of Bava's posthumous celebrity came in October 2001, when it was announced that Harmon Kaslow's Kismet Entertainment Group and Alfredo Leone's International Media Films had formed a new company—Kismet Classics—to market the remake rights to thirteen Mario Bava films. While it is a pleasure to discover that Bava's oeuvre is now considered financially meaningful, the notion of remaking Bava's films without Bava is, on one level, absurd. The storylines of his films were not the secret to their success, and the idea of remaking them with studied, big-budgeted elaborations of Bava's economical effects would betray the very values that his work represents—those of originality, technical expertise, and economy. Still more preposterous is the notion of ascribing any value to some of these remake rights, as some of Bava's most important titles—Black Sunday and Black Sabbath, for example—were based on literary material that was in public domain at the time, while some of the others (Cani arrabbiati, for example) could not be bothered to definitively list their proper literary sources in the first place. These reservations aside, there is also the counter-argument that, if any remakes of Bava's films are actually produced, they can only help to confirm his place in the hierarchy of horror film history, and to qualify his original versions as bona fide classics of the form.

KEEPING watch as Corrado Bartoloni operates under the black drape of the De Brie, on the set of LE BARBIERE DI SIVIGLIA.

Since the first American Mario Bava retrospective at San Francisco's Roxie Theater in April 1993, Bava has arguably been the subject of more retrospectives and festivals in the United States in the following decade than any other film director. In the two-year period of 2002–03 alone, major Bava retrospectives were mounted in Los Angeles, San Francisco, New York City, Chicago, Dallas, New Orleans, and Cleveland. In San Francisco, Black Sunday was re-screened at the Yerba Buena Center for the Arts in the wake of their main retrospective as part of a series called "Ten Perfect Moments—A Decade of Film" honoring the "most artistically satisfying" films presented by the YBCA in ten years of screenings. Abroad, Bava's work was also treated to a comprehensive retrospective at London's British Film Institute during their 1998–99 season, and Terrore nello spazio was one of a select group of science fiction films screened at the Cannes Film Festival in 2000 in a sidebar entitled "Le Cinéma Rêve le Futur."

That Mario Bava should receive so much renewed attention and acclaim in an era of $100,000,000 motion pictures and 10-minute closing credits crawls is more than mere nostalgia; it's a cri de coeur from those of us who can remember when cinema was deserving of being called the Seventh Art. Bava's current popularity shows us, from an unexpected quarter, how today's sprawling cinema is starved for culture and wanting for authority. The way his films harp on the theme of greed makes one wonder if Mario Bava didn't feel the future of his chosen art form breathing down his neck. Active in the film business since "the days before specialization," Bava was skilled at direction, cinematography, special effects, editing, art direction, makeup, wardrobe, and scoring pictures with library music—he didn't need millions of dollars and a crew of hundreds to make himself proficient at only one of these tasks. It was his multiplicity of talent, his ability to disguise a meager budget, and his thorough grounding in all realms of art (painting, literature, music) and all the departments of his craft that qualified him to walk onto a film set . . . and improvise. The cinema may have been Orson Welles' train set, but it was Mario Bava's paint and canvas, his magic wand and crystal ball, his confessional.

When I last interviewed Samuel Z. Arkoff, he remarked on Bava's importance to American International Pictures and to the horror genre in general: "We were very fond of Bava. I spread the word about Bava, myself, for many years. His home country was not all that hot on horror pictures. Had he lived or worked in the US or the UK, Bava might have become as well-known as Hitchcock, at least as a prominent horror director. In many ways, I think he was the equal of Hitchcock. He had a real feel for it. At his best, Bava was first class."

Roger Corman agrees. As he told an interviewer in the Sky TV documentary Mario Bava Operazione paura (2004): "There is an old statement: 'A prophet is not without honor, save in his own country.' I think Bava was a brilliant artist, a true artist, and his work was universal; it reflected a European sensibility, but it also resonated with the American audience. I think he would have been a major success, had he come to Hollywood. Bava's legacy is one of brilliant filmmaking under difficult conditions. His genius—and I think it was genius—stands as an inspiration to those who came after him, that, whatever the conditions, one can do excellent work. It has influenced many people. It's still with us."

If there is an element of tragedy in Bava's story, it is in the nature of a post-mortem: though he was a figlio d'arte, a true child of the cinema, Bava's kind would not fit easily into the big business cinema of today, which values lavish spending more than the creative stretching of a dollar, and committee thinking over creative autonomy. Even in his own time, the few remaining areas of the film business in which Bava could thrive were actively shrinking under his feet, as his career devolved into a series of retreat maneuvers to ensure his creative freedom and authority.

Beyond this, Bava's story is not one of tragedy but of triumph—a triumph over meager budgets, lack of equipment, actors who could not speak each other's languages, and the aesthetic prejudices of a country he refused to leave. As Alfredo Leone notes in the Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre documentary, "The Italians [appreciate films about] wine, women, and song . . . love and laughter, happiness, family unity. Bava's pictures do not portray that. Horror, murder, thriller. The Italian mentality doesn't accept that, although it's a serious part of life." The record shows that Bava was singularly responsible for bringing horror, science fiction, and fantasy—the ability to dream—back to the postwar Italian cinema. His fellow countrymen didn't exactly clamor for it, but as the examples of George Lucas and Steven Spielberg show us, the Italian film industry might have survived—even flourished—if they had.

Today, a quarter century after Bava's death, the Italian popular cinema is showing heartening signs of a possible renaissance. Dario Argento has announced that he is finally ready to film the long-awaited finale of his "Three Mothers" trilogy that began with Suspiria and Inferno, and Lamberto Bava and Michele Soavi are likewise returning to feature filmmaking after long furloughs in television and advertising.

This time of renewed hope follows close on the heels of the 2004 Venice Film Festival, which hosted a program of films under the umbrella title "Italian Kings of the B's: Secret History of Italian Cinema 1949-81." Hosted by Quentin Tarantino and Joe Dante, this retrospective of newly restored films by Lucio Fulci, Sergio Martino, Fernando Di Leo, and others was initially met with great ire and controversy from Italian critics who objected to the introduction of so-called "trash cinema" at the festival. However, the retrospective turned out to be a great success, attracting large numbers eager to celebrate these directors and their stars, and to see the films that inspired Tarantino's Pulp Fiction and Kill Bill. In early 2006, Venice Film Festival director Marco Muller took the "Secret History" to London, where it ran to great acclaim at the Tate Modern throughout January and early February.

The work of Mario Bava was not included in "Italian Kings of the B's" because it is now so widely available and no longer obscure. Nevertheless, the example of Mario Bava represents the very soul of such a retrospective; his work, which stands at the very vanguard of Italy's once-secret film history, its once-undiscovered cinema, explains the need for such a retrospective.

Whenever a reel of obscure Italian genre film is projected, and an audience sits in the dark, giddy with expectation, they remember where it all began, where their hopes for such material were first raised—and in that moment, Mario Bava lives.

MARIO BAVA, head to toe, captured in an introspective moment on the set of LISA AND THE DEVIL.

Appendices

1045 Storyboards
1061 Eugenio Bava Chronology
1063 Mario Bava Filmography
1069 Mario Bava Videography
1077 Mario Bava Discography
1085 References
1089 Acknowledgments
1093 Patrons

MARIO BAVA self-portrait circa 1955.

STORYBOARDS

1046 Odissea
1054 Baby Kong
1059 La Venere d'Ille

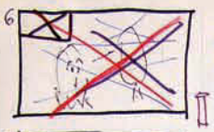
Ulisse e i compagni entrano nella grotta (di questo C.L. serviranno vari tagli fino alla bevuta del latte) Per intercalarli con le stesse scene in M.P.P.
N.B. da questo punto di vista bisognerà girare tutte le scene dei C.L. della sequenza.

Carrello a seguire Ulisse c C. che avanzano nella grotta guardandosi intorno meravigliati passano davanti a oggetti giganteschi, ne rac= colgono uno.
Ulisse venendo in P.P. guarda in giro poi in alto.
Vedono il letto gigantesco. Stacco

Pan. sulla volta della caverna fino ad inqua= drare gli strani cristalli rocciosi verde marino e blu dai quali proviene una luce morzata e irreale.



P.P. di Ulisse che da guardare in alto è attratto dal vocio dei compagni e guarda F.C., sorride (perchè vede Elpenore che beve latte) e esce di campo verso S.M.

Ulisse entra in campo dove Elpenore issato sulle spalle di un compagno sta bevendo il latte e dice: E' dolce... fresco... profumato!
Euriloco si volta verso Ulisse e gli si avvicina

Carrello avanti a inquadrare in P.P.P. il dialogo dei due da "Prendiamo i formaggi ecc." fino a "E' troppo tardi per scappare. E' lui il nostro ospite ecc." e guardano verso l'entrata della grotta.

ODISSEA

THE POLYPHEMUS sequence, with Bava's own handwritten notes.

Visi che si voltano a guardare.

Elpenore che stava porgendo del latte a un compagno si ferma e anche loro guardano

Medesima inq.della 1 ma più ravvicinata le greggi irrompono nella caverna e vanno nell'ovile a destra M.

Medesima inq.della 1 . Le greggi stanno entrando Ulisse con alcuni compagni vanno verso a vedere altri rimangono fuori

M.P.P. di Ulisse Euriloco e alcuni C. che muovendosi lentamente verso destra guardano le pecore che entrano in un vano oscuro in parte e parte nel recinto sulle pecore un boato improvviso (c'è la legna che incomincia a cadere

Un enorme carico di legna piomba all'ingres della caverna rimbalzando da tutti i lati mentre l'ombra si intravede sulla soglia dell'entrata

P.P. legna che cade. Alcuni tronchi schizzano verso S.Macchina uscendo di campo

Ulisse e C. saltano di lato per evitare i tronchi

I compagni che erano rimasti vicino al latte guardano sempre più allibiti mentre vengono oscurati da un'ombra che si muove (forse quello cade ne latte?)

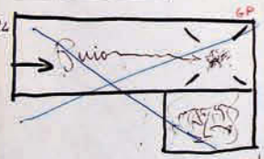
il fondo della caverna dove sono quelli del latte; l'effetto di luce dell'entrata della caverna si oscura e poi muovendosi lascia vedere un'enorme ombra di uomo

Ulisse guarda verso il fondo della grotta quando una mano enorme entra in campo dietro di loro e afferra il masso.
Loro si voltano di scatto e si gettano a terra.



P.P. di Ulisse e C. che dopo aver rotolato guardano in alto a S.M.

Zoom da P.P.P. mano . Lento zoom indietro a scoprire masso (senza mai vedere il corpo)
Il masso è trascinato verso l'apertura e la chiude combaciandosi perfettamente solo all'ultimo sprazzo di luce si panoramicherà verso destra a intravedere per un attimo l'enorme sagoma di Polifemo che piomberà subito nel buio, perchè il masso ha chiuso l'apertura.

Vari P.P.P. di tutti nel buio fondo che guardano smarriti intorno mentre si sentono i tremoli colpi dei passi di Polifemo

Pan.nel buio si intravede solo qualcosa che ci fa vedere che la Macchina è in movimento fino a inquadrare un punto rossastro che aumenta di intensità.
Zoom avanti in P.P.P. scopriamo che è brace che diventa sempre più luminosa (mentre nel sonoro si sente il soffio potente di Polifemo) (ad un tratto le fiamme divampano)

STACCO

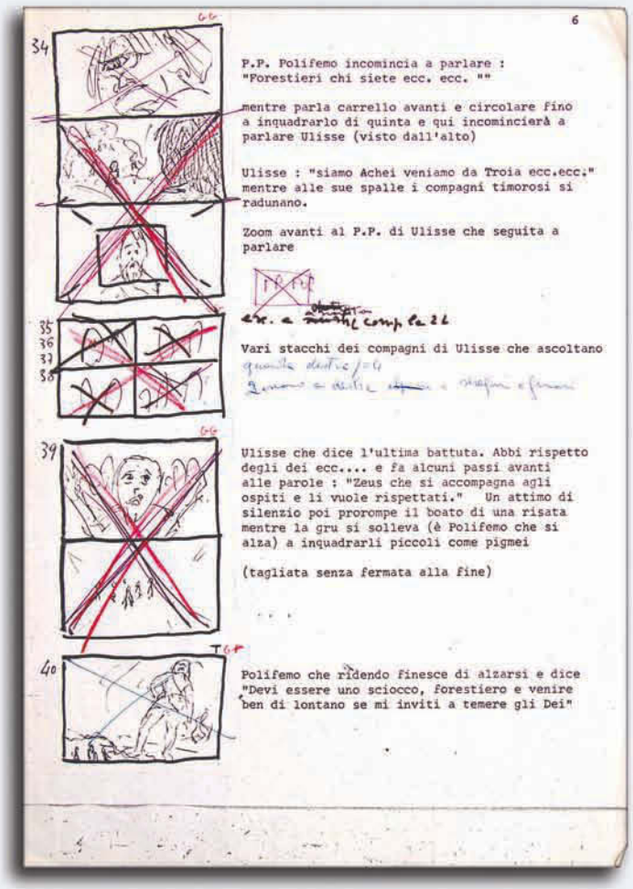
DA FIAMME ZOOM INDIETRO E CARR.
a inquadrare l'enorme sagoma di Polifemo inginocchiato stagliata contro le fiamme

N.B. da questo momento tutta la sequenza sarà fotografata gibigianata

Vari P.P. dei nostri che guardano con varie espressioni l'enorme sagoma di Polifemo.
Sui loro volti i bagliori delle fiamme

Come la 1
La grotta intera. Polifemo enorme stagliato contro il fuoco. In P.P. gli ometti e sullo sfondo gli altri

Ulisse che guarda affascinato. Euriloco lo vuol tirare indietro - ma fanno un rumore forse cade qualcosa



Zoom su Polifemo che si volta di scatto al rumore sentito e guarda torvo

Zoom a P.P.P.

Zoom da C.L. dall'alto a MPP di Ulisse di nuovo indietro e pan.a Sin. Zoom avanti su altri. Zoom indietro e avanti a D e indietro di nuovo al campo lungo.

6

34

P.P. Polifemo incomincia a parlare :
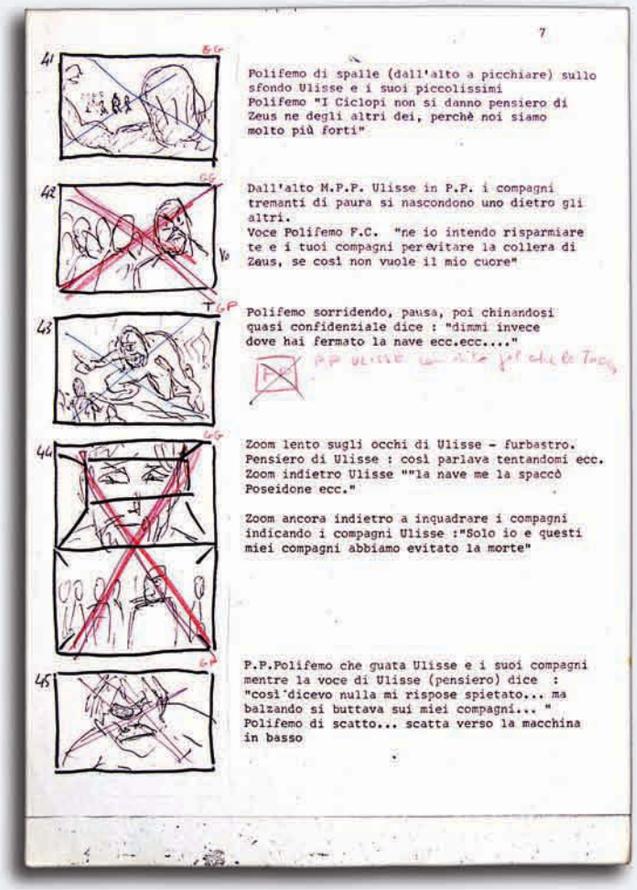
"Forestieri chi siete ecc. ecc. "" mentre parla carrello avanti e circolare fino a inquadrarlo di quinta e qui incomincierà a parlare Ulisse (visto dall'alto)

Ulisse : "siamo Achei veniamo da Troia ecc.ecc." mentre alle sue spalle i compagni timorosi si radunano.

Zoom avanti al P.P. di Ulisse che seguita a parlare

35 36 37 38

Vari stacchi dei compagni di Ulisse che ascoltano



39

Ulisse che dice l'ultima battuta. Abbi rispetto degli dei ecc.... e fa alcuni passi avanti alle parole : "Zeus che si accompagna agli ospiti e li vuole rispettati." Un attimo di silenzio poi prorompe il boato di una risata mentre la gru si solleva (è Polifemo che si alza) a inquadrarli piccoli come pigmei

(tagliata senza fermata alla fine)

40

Polifemo che ridendo finesce di alzarsi e dice "Devi essere uno sciocco, forestiero e venire ben di lontano se mi inviti a temere gli Dei"

7

41

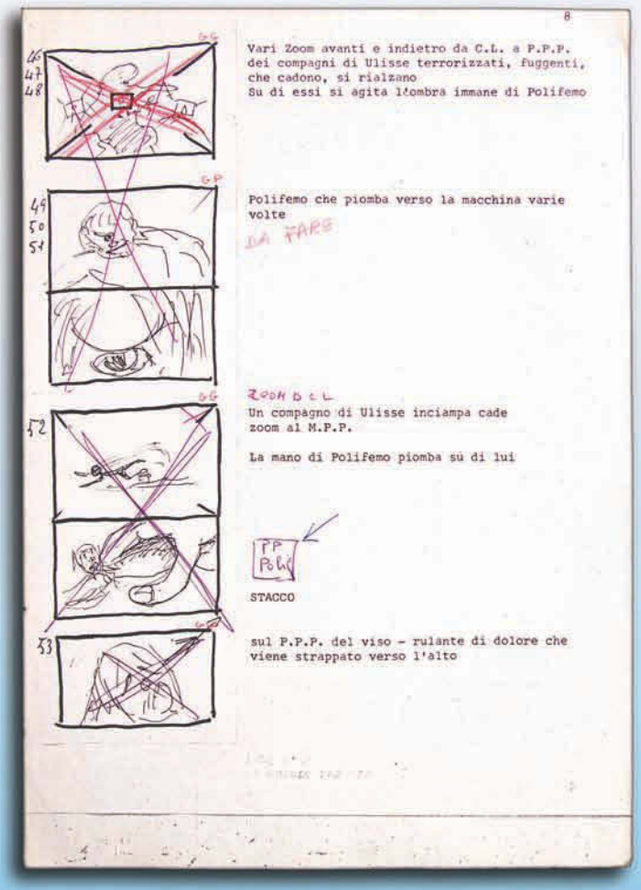
Polifemo di spalle (dall'alto a picchiare) sullo sfondo Ulisse e i suoi piccolissimi
Polifemo "I Ciclopi non si danno pensiero di Zeus ne degli altri dei, perchè noi siamo molto più forti"

42

Dall'alto M.P.P. Ulisse in P.P. i compagni tremanti di paura si nascondono uno dietro gli altri.
Voce Polifemo F.C. "ne io intendo risparmiare te e i tuoi compagni per evitare la collera di Zeus, se così non vuole il mio cuore"

43

Polifemo sorridendo, pausa, poi chinandosi quasi confidenziale dice : "dimmi invece dove hai fermato la nave ecc.ecc...."



44

Zoom lento sugli occhi di Ulisse - furbastro. Pensiero di Ulisse : così parlava tentandomi ecc. Zoom indietro Ulisse ""la nave me la spaccò Poseidone ecc."

Zoom ancora indietro a inquadrare i compagni indicando i compagni Ulisse :"Solo io e questi miei compagni abbiamo evitato la morte"

45

P.P.Polifemo che guata Ulisse e i suoi compagni mentre la voce di Ulisse (pensiero) dice : "così dicevo nulla mi rispose spietato... ma balzando si buttava sui miei compagni... " Polifemo di scatto... scatta verso la macchina in basso

8

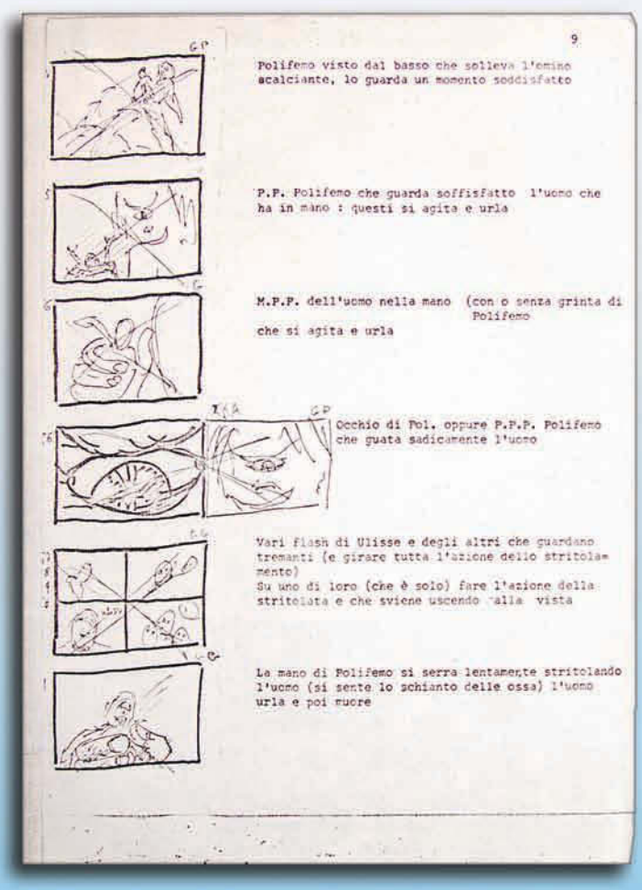
45 47 48

Vari Zoom avanti e indietro da C.L. a P.P.P. dei compagni di Ulisse terrorizzati, fuggenti, che cadono, si rialzano
Su di essi si agita l'ombra immane di Polifemo

49 50 51

Polifemo che piomba verso la macchina varie volte

52



Un compagno di Ulisse inciampa cade zoom al M.P.P.

La mano di Polifemo piomba su di lui

STACCO

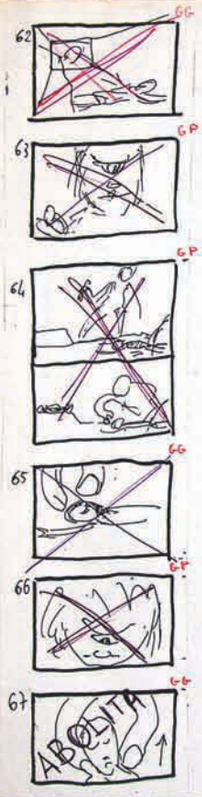
53 sul P.P.P. del viso - rulante di dolore che viene strappato verso l'alto

9

Polifemo visto dal basso che solleva l'omino scalciante, lo guarda un momento soddisfatto



P.P. Polifemo che guarda soffisfatto l'uomo che ha in mano : questi si agita e urla

M.P.P. dell'uomo nella mano (con o senza grinta di Polifemo che si agita e urla

Occhio di Pol. oppure P.P.P. Polifemo che guata sadicamente l'uomo

Vari flash di Ulisse e degli altri che guardano tremanti (e girare tutta l'azione dello stritolamento)
Su uno di loro (che è solo) fare l'azione della stritolata e che sviene uscendo alla vista

La mano di Polifemo si serra lentamente stritolando l'uomo (si sente lo schianto delle ossa) l'uomo urla e poi muore il compagno che era solo sviene e cadendo si scopre alla vista

Polifemo abbassando la mano con l'uomo si volta a guardare e sorride chinandosi un pò in avanti

C.L.Polifemo guarda chinandosi un po in avanti l'uomo svenuto in P.P. . Depone l'uomo che aveva in mano su di un masso e si china a guardare e poi a prendere con due dita l'uomo svenuto

M.P.P. dell'uomo svenuto le dita enormi di Polifemo lo rivoltano con delicatezza

P.P. di Polifemo che guarda in giù perplesso sembra quasi dolente che sia svenuto poi fa un movimento col corpo

le due dita tirano su l'uomo svenuto

Vari flash di Ulisse e compagni che guardano ansiosi e seguono con lo sguardo il movimento in alto

Polifemo annusa l'uomo svenuto. Si guarda intorno (si capisce che è preoccupato che non sia buono da mangiare) poi lo porta all'orecchio e sentendo forse battere il cuore esplode in una tremenda risata - quindi gli sbatte la testa contro un sasso come un uccelletto

Reazione di Ulisse e compagni

Polifemo si siede di spalle a noi e incomincia a divorare i due. Sempre di spalle noteremo i vari movimenti di strappamento (come un pollo) ecc.ecc. Qualche pezzo lo avvicina al fuoco e poi lo porta alla bocca; quindi forbendosi pulisce il letto dei resti e si corica

Pan.lenta l'orrore dipinto sui compagni di Ulisse

Poi.si corica e comincia a russare

Con carrello in curva a scoprire dietro un masso
Filetore : E adesso a chi toccherà
Eraclio : a nessun altro per ora...si è coricato ... è sazio. Guardatelo dorme con l'occhio aperto....
Intanto altri compagni si sono raggruppati dietro guardano

M.P.P. di Polifemo che dorme con l'occhio sbarrato

P.P.P. di Ulisse, la fronte aggrottata, ha deciso, si passa una mano sul viso come a scacciarne gli orrori visti. Poi l'abbassa con decisione PAN. la segue. La mano serra con forza l'impugnatura della spada, un attimo di attesa, e la spada è sfoderata e a punta in avanti;il carrello la precede andando ad inquadrare il volto teso di Ulisse che cammina verso Polifemo. Ad un tratto una mano si posa sulla sua spalla

Pan. a schiaffo a inquadrare Eraclio : non ci riuscirai Ulisse

Ulisse : almeno tentare

Da P.P.Eraclio che inizia : "E la tua furberia Ulisse ecc.
Carrello indietro a scoprire Ulisse
I compagni si avvicinano

Ulisse risponde : hai ragione ecc.
Eraclio dice : non ci resta che pregare.Piomba in ginocchio imitato da tutti : O Zeus potente .... la macchina si avvicina alle teste nella polvere poi lungo il corpo di Ulisse la spada rimessa nel fodero la pan. segue al volto di Ulisse che guarda in alto

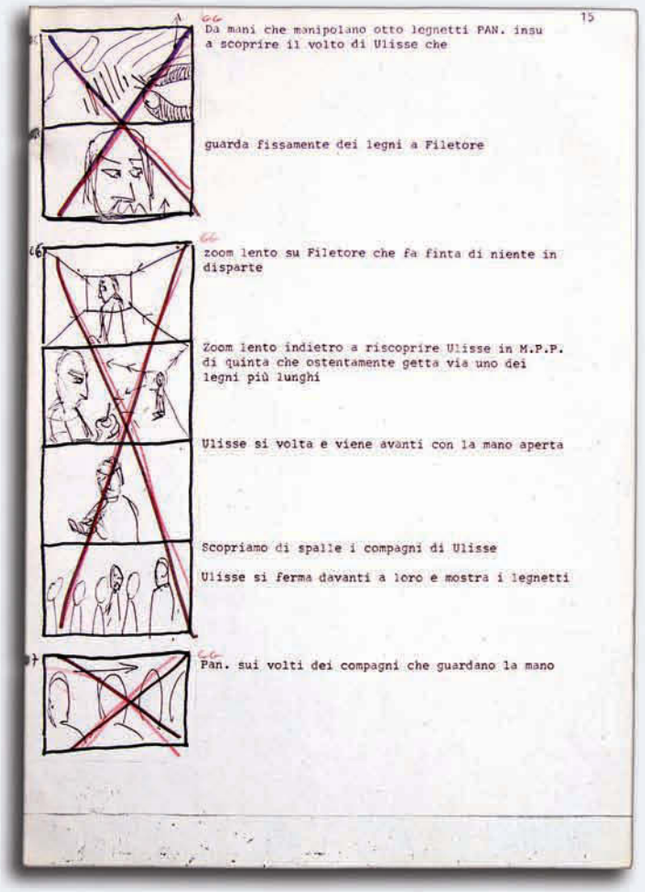
dissolvenza in panoramica

fino ad inquadrare i cristalli della volta della grotta
I cristalli a poco a poca diventano luminosi per la luce del giorno nascente - Urla - belati - Pan. a schiaffo già

Pan. a schiaffo da Nero a inquadrare Filetore che dice :
altri due ne ha divorati ecc.
Sullo sfondo la grotta



tutta la scena della lista da pag. 46 a pag.50 dove Ulisse ordina di pulire il ramo, e lo trasportano vicino al fuoco

14

pag. 51

Sequenza preparazione ramo, punta, fuoco ecc.

15

Da mani che manipolano otto legnetti PAN. insu a scoprire il volto di Ulisse che guarda fissamente dei legni a Filetore zoom lento su Filetore che fa finta di niente in disparte

Zoom lento indietro a riscoprire Ulisse in M.P.P. di quinta che ostentamente getta via uno dei legni più lunghi

Ulisse si volta e viene avanti con la mano aperta

Scopriamo di spalle i compagni di Ulisse

Ulisse si ferma davanti a loro e mostra i legnetti

Pan. sui volti dei compagni che guardano la mano

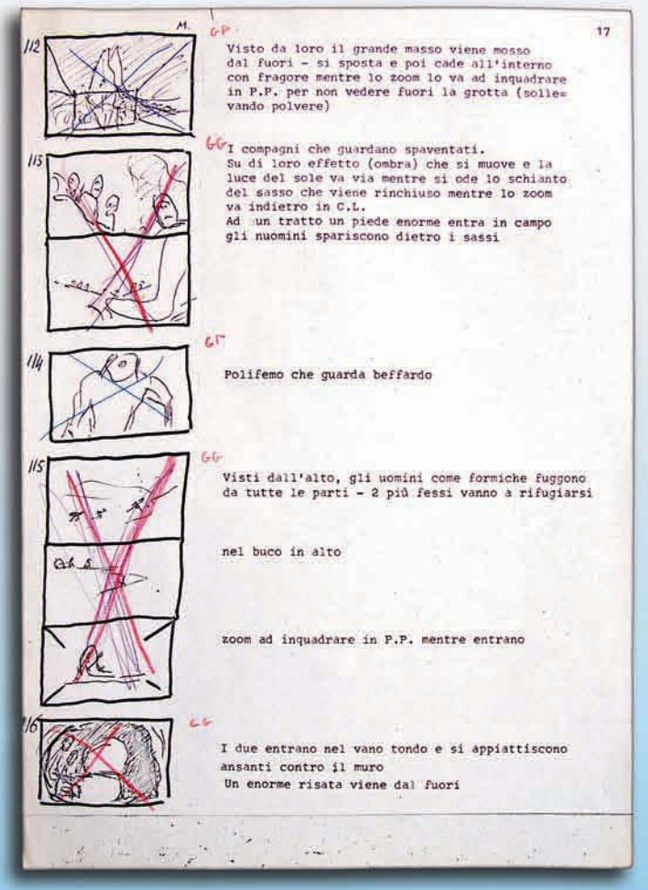
16 da P.P.P. pugno Ulisse zoom indietro a scoprire le mani dei compagni che si avvicinano quando la voce di Filetore F.C.:

"mettici anche la mia sorte nel gruppo":

Filetore da guardare verso Ulisse si china a raccogliere il legnetto e preceduto in carr. e Pan. raggiunge il gruppo



Filetore passa dietro Ulisse di modo che noi vediamo l'espressione di simpatia sul volto di questi

e pan. a seguire la mano che posa il bastoncino nella mano di Ulisse. Rimangono le mani di Ulisse che mescolano e mostrano poi il pugno con i bastoncini che sporgono tutti uguali

e mentre le mani dei compagni rientrando in campo coprono tutto zoom avanti

il gruppo visto dal basso ritirano le mani con lo zeppo

P.D. Ulisse che fissa in silenzio avanti a se Zmoom lento indietro a M.C.L. - uno alla volta entrano in campo accanto a lui : Euriloco, Elpenore, Eraclio, Filetore ogni uno che entra, lo zoom lo va ad inquadrare in P.P.P. e torna indietro ogni volta. Finito questa manfrina si odono i belati delle pecore che arrivano. Si voltano di scatto

17

Visto da loro il grande masso viene mosso dal fuori - si sposta e poi cade all'interno con fragore mentre lo zoom lo va ad inquadrare in P.P. per non vedere fuori la grotta (sollevando polvere)

I compagni che guardano spaventati.
Su di loro effetto (ombra) che si muove e la luce del sole va via mentre si ode lo schianto del sasso che viene rinchiuso mentre lo zoom va indietro in C.L.
Ad un tratto un piede enorme entra in campo gli nuomini spariscono dietro i sassi

Polifemo che guarda beffardo

Visti dall'alto, gli uomini come formiche fuggono da tutte le parti - 2 più fessi vanno a rifugiarsi

nel buco in alto

zoom ad inquadrare in P.P. mentre entrano

I due entrano nel vano tondo e si appiattiscono ansanti contro il muro
Un enorme risata viene dal fuori

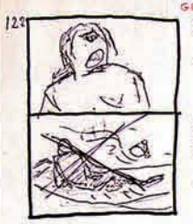
M.P.P. dei due che guardano verso ansanti e tremebondi

inquadratura eguale alla 116
I due di lato sullo sfondo l'apertura
Lungo silenzio poi con uno "schianto musicale" la faccia i Polifemo appare di colpo nel vano

Come la 117 i due si appiattiscono ancora di più contro il muro e scivolano di lato lungo la parete facendo cadere quello che vi è appeso. Poi si fermano di colpo urlando

La mano enorme di Polifemo sta entrando dall'apertura e inesorabile avanza verso di loro
Finchè tutto piomba nel buio perchè il corpo ostruisce l'apertura

Urla tremende sul buio

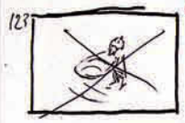


Voce Ulisse "E il mostro ancora una volta fece il suo orribile pasto"

da P.P. pelle capra dalla quale sgorga il vino

panoramica in giù

a una ciotola enorme che si riempie

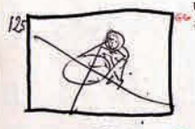


Da P.P.Polifemo che si pulisce la bocca con la lingua, sbadiglia, ecc.ecc.

Zoom indietro a scoprire che è sul letto

Sta per sdraiarsi, quando laggiù in fondo entra in campo Ulisse che porta un'enorme ciotola

Ulisse dice una battuta



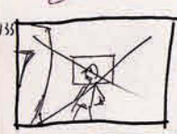
Ulisse in M.C.L. che dice battuta

"tieni...tieni...Ciclope, ora che hai ecc. "

Polifemo che lo guarda e si alza a sedere e dice sospettoso "chi mi assicura che tu non mi vuoi ingannare?....bevi tu prima"

Ulisse immerge la testa nel vino facendo vedere che beve

i compagni di Ulisse guardano tremebondi



Ulisse che porge la coppa a Polifemo che allunga una mano per prenderla l'enorme mano di Polifemo che sta per prendere la ciotola dalle mani di Ulisse

Polifemo porta in campo la ciotola dopo aver guardato a lungo e beve lentamente schioccando la lingua e dice
"" E' buono. Dammene ancora ecc. che io possa farti il dono che spetta agli ospiti. ""

Zoom su
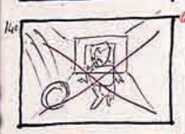
Ulisse che guarda Polifemo bere poi alla battuta "dammene ancora" fa un cenno verso i compagni
(in campo c'è una gamba di Polifemo)

I compagni di Ulisse portano un'altra coppa

Polifemo che segue con lo sguardo la camminata del vino



I due che portano la ciotola la danno a Ulisse ritirandosi subito.
Ulisse si volta e porge la coppa verso l'alto entra la mano di Polifemo che la prende

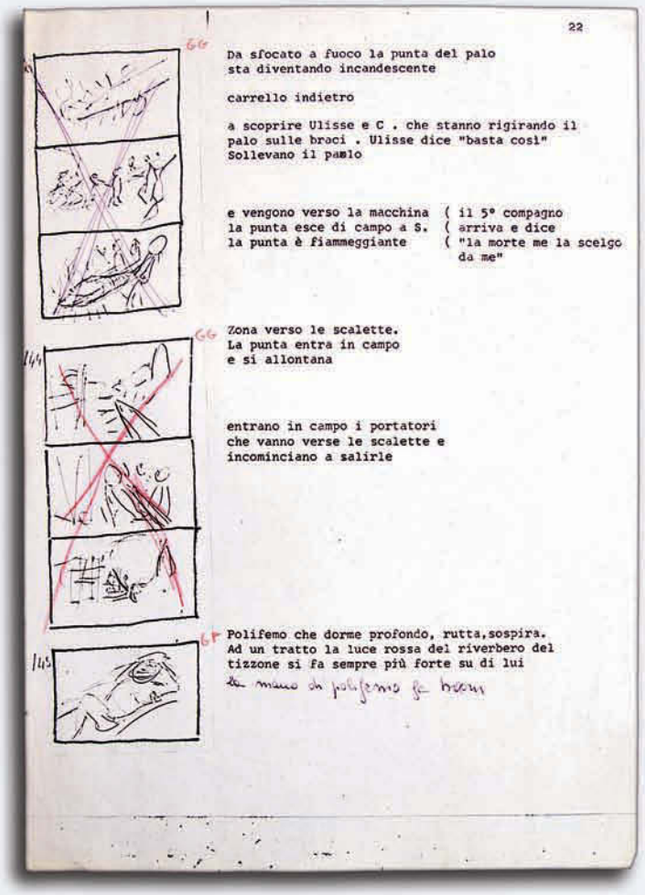
Polifemo beve C.L. di quinta i compagni di Ulisse nascosti
e getta la ciotola verso Ulisse

C.L. Ulisse dall'alto la ciotola piomba verso di lui. Voce F.C. "Il tuo nome straniero!"
Lento zoom verso Ulisse che dice "Ciclope... tu mi domandi il nome ecc. "
Zoom ancora sui P.P. " Nessuno è il nome mio"



Pan. sui compagni su di loro la frase di Ulisse "Nessuno mi chiamano la madre e il padre e anche i compagni.
Su di loro sbotta la risata di Polifemo

Polifemo ride si ricompone e dice :
"Nessuno me lo mangerò per ultimo... dopo i tuoi compagni... Sarà questo il mio dono"
Ride già brillo e si stende per dormire.

Zoom dvanti al P.P.P. che sfoca completamente

22

GG
Da sfocato a fuoco la punta del palo sta diventando incandescente

carrello indietro

a scoprire Ulisse e C . che stanno rigirando il palo sulle braci . Ulisse dice "basta così" Sollevano il palo

e vengono verso la macchina (il 5° compagno la punta esce di campo a S. (arriva e dice la punta è fiammeggiante ("la morte me la scelgo da me"

GG
Zona verso le scalette.
La punta entra in campo
e si allontana

entrano in campo i portatori che vanno verse le scalette e incominciano a salirle

GP
Polifemo che dorme profondo, rutta, sospira.
Ad un tratto la luce rossa del riverbero del tizzone si fa sempre più forte su di lui la mano di polifemo fa braci

23

GG
Il ramo portato dai cinque che avanzano

e in PAN. scopriamo in P.P. di quinta il faccione di Polifemo.
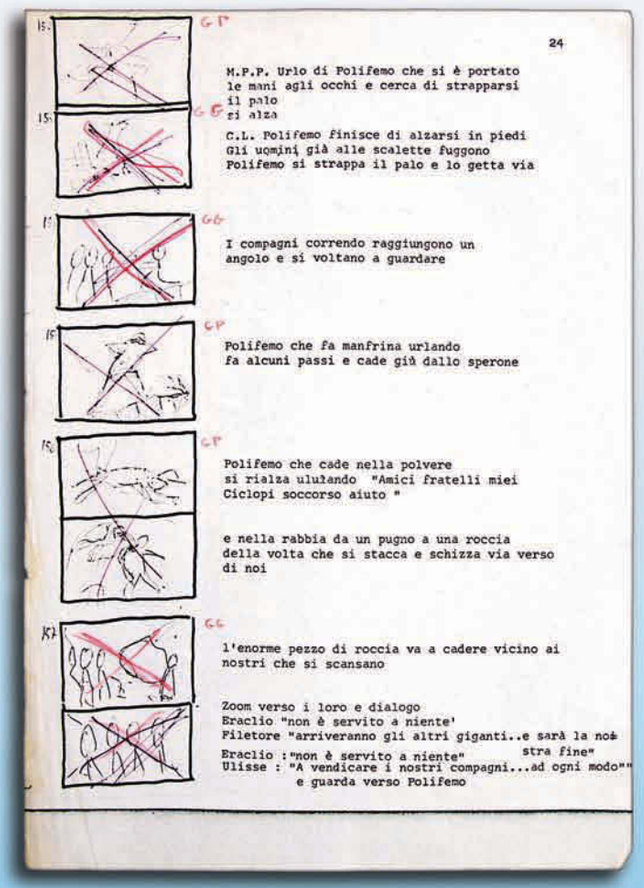
Gli uomini passano sullo sfondo



GG
C.L. gli uomini si arrampicano passandosi il ramo.
Ad un tratto Polifemo ha un sussulto nel sonno. Gli uomini si congelano poi Polifemo riprende a russare

GG
M.P.P. degli uomini che giungono
finalmente al posto esatto.
Ulisse temerariamente va più
vicino a Polifemo
Zoom su Ulisse che prende la mira

GP
Come visto da Ulisse il trave ancora rosseggiante che viene puntato in dire= zione dell'occhio

GG
Ulisse che prende la mira e

La punta infuocata che punta verso l'obbiettivo in P.P. Ulisse dietro i compagni che la reggono GG Ulisse dice : "Ora!" e il palo viene abbassato a empire l'obbiettivo

24

GP
M.P.P. Urlo di Polifemo che si è portato le mani agli occhi e cerca di strapparsi il palo
GG ri alza
C.L. Polifemo finisce di alzarsi in piedi
Gli uomini già alle scalette fuggono
Polifemo si strappa il palo e lo getta via

GG
I compagni correndo raggiungono un angolo e si voltano a guardare

GP
Polifemo che fa manfrina urlando fa alcuni passi e cade giù dallo sperone

GP
Polifemo che cade nella polvere si rialza ululando "Amici fratelli miei Ciclopi soccorso aiuto "

e nella rabbia da un pugno a una roccia della volta che si stacca e schizza via verso di noi

GG
l'enorme pezzo di roccia va a cadere vicino ai nostri che si scansano

Zoom verso i loro e dialogo
Eraclio "non è servito a niente'
Filetore "arriveranno gli altri giganti..e sarà la nos
Eraclio :"non è servito a niente" stra fine" Ulisse : "A vendicare i nostri compagni...ad ogni modo""
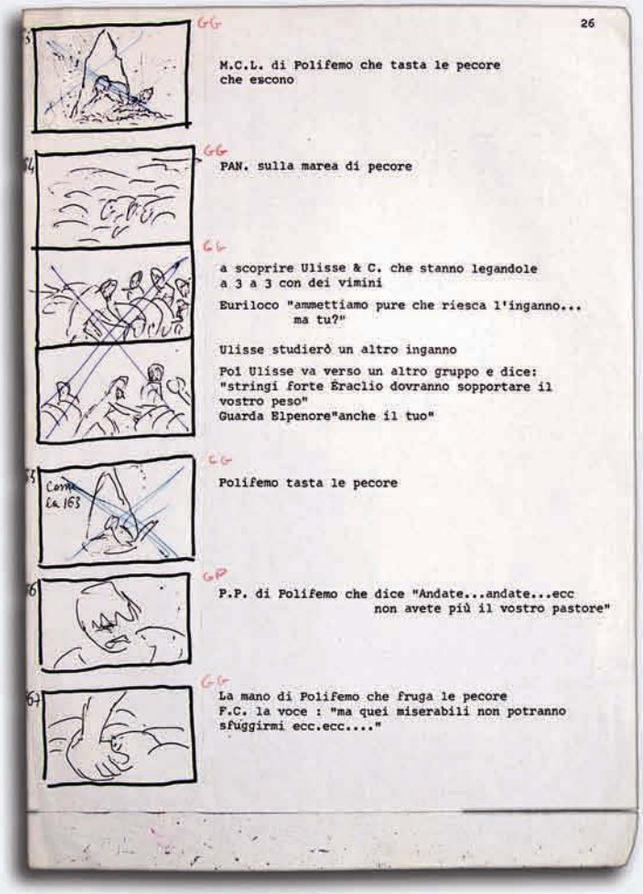
e guarda verso Polifemo

25

GP
Polifemo cerca l'ingresso ma non lo trova.
Si accascia : "Fratelli Ciclopi...aiuto"
Si ode uno scalpiccio e poi una voce:
"Cosa c'è Polifemo che ti da tanta pena?
Perchè ci svegli dal sonno?"



GP
Ulisse e i suoi compagni muti in tensione.
Voce F.C. del Ciclope : "Qualcuno ti ruba le bestie c'è qualcuno che vuole ucciderti?"

GP
Polifemo contorto, piangente sembra un bambino :
"Nessuno .... mi vuole uccidere"

GP
Voce Ciclope F.C. "Se Nessuno dunque ti fa violenza il male ti viene dal grande Zeus e noi non possiamo aiutarti. Ma tu raccomandati al padre tuo Poseidone sovrano!"
,
Zoom lentissimo sia a isolare gli occhi di
Ulisse che brillano ridarelli e si voltano a guardare verso l'alto

MGG
i cristalli delle volte si illuminano

MGG
PAN. in basso a scoprire il C.L. della caverna. Polifemo è seduto all'ingresso
e con le mani tasta le pecore che passano

26

M.C.L. di Polifemo che tasta le pecore
che escono

PAN. sulla marea di pecore

a scoprire Ulisse & C. che stanno legandole
a 3 a 3 con dei vimini

Euriloco "ammettiamo pure che riesca l'inganno... ma tu?"

Ulisse studierò un altro inganno

Poi Ulisse va verso un altro gruppo e dice:
"stringi forte Eraclio dovranno sopportare il vostro peso"
Guarda Elpenore"anche il tuo"

Polifemo tasta le pecore

P.P. di Polifemo che dice "Andate...andate...ecc non avete più il vostro pastore"

La mano di Polifemo che fruga le pecore
F.C. la voce : "ma quei miserabili non potranno sfuggirmi ecc.ecc...."

27

I compagni di Ulisse

Legati sotto il ventre dell'animale (finto)

sfuggono a Polifemo

forse la mano una volta o due passerà davanti

fra loro e l'obbiettivo zampe di pecore

P.P. di un grosso Ariete

in carrello cammina

Ad un tratto l'enorme mano di
Polifemo cala su di lui e accarezzandole voce F.C. Polifemo "Ariete caro, ecc. e ora sei l'ultimo"

mentre parla Zoom
in P.P.P. dell'Ariete

28

M.P.P. dal basso di Polifemo che dice
"tu certo rimpiangi l'occhio del padrone ecc..."
solleva il capo e "ma io ti dico che non è ancora sfuggito alla morte

Voce Pol. F.C. ""Oh se tu avessi il mio senti= mento ecc.""

PAN.lungo il pelo dell'Ariete a scoprire Ulisse.
La mano di Polifemo accarezzando quasi tocca la mano di Ulisse che ratto la leva

P.P.P. Polifemo quasi piangente dice :
"Oh se tu avessi il mio sentimento.....

per sfuggirmi"

La mano di Polifemo si riabbassa
e la voce F.C. dice
"Va"

La testa di Ulisse in mezzo al pelo che schizza via di campo.

BABY KONG

THE COMPLETE storyboards Bava created for this unproduced film.

6
Seguendo il movimento della precedente Erick scivola fuori al lato della macchina (mentre la Zoom Torino al PP) finito rosso si alza di scatto fa un balzo in avanti e si mette a correre (PIGLIA UNA MITRA)
MINIATURA - TELAIO
DAL BASSO (come visto da Erick) le gambe del Lobotomico si alza e scatta la sua violenta nell'intento di affrontare il prof Bellavista, ch fa alcuni passi all'indietro fino all'inizio della scalinata
MINIATURA - DAL BASSO - ETHAN ? DAL
PP Erick varie espressioni di odio e furia
(TELAIO)
Il professore guarda in giro sorpreso (e mentre la Zoom si avvicina al PP) facendo una espressione guardando distrattamente verso la direzione di Erick
come la 5
Erick PP ch si blocca subito da inseguire (come nella 5) ma guardando a fianco in fondo, muove subito volentieri la testa ga il colpo. La Zoom scatta indietro e vediamo ch si Matthias che tira per il cappotto mentre lotta fuori a valanga.

11
PP del Professore che guarda calmo a fondo inquadrato con l'indice fa cadere la cenere della sigaretta.
VARIE ESPRESSIONI CHE TERMINANO CON (RIFERIMENTO ALLA LOTTA DI MUSICA) 12
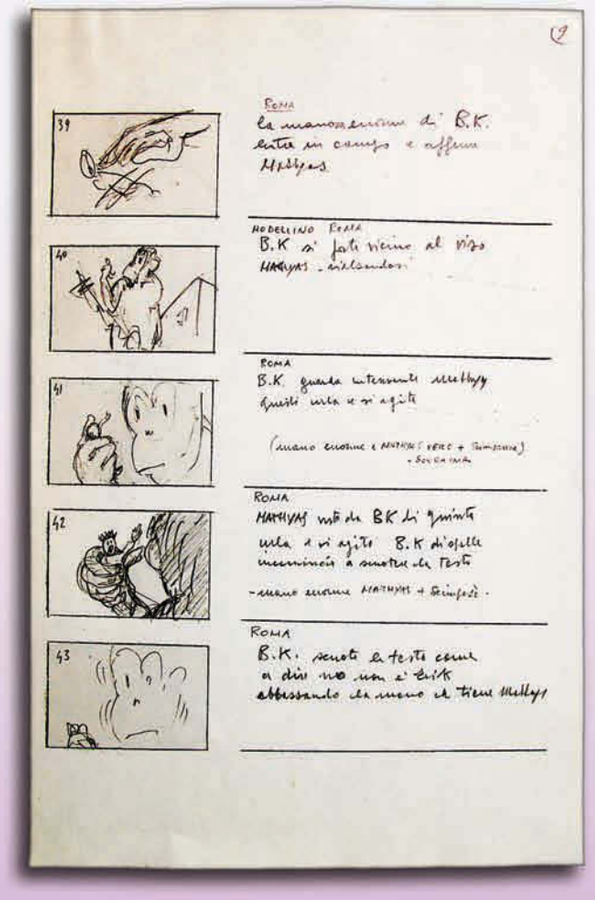
PP ERICK CHE LOTTA
13
PP MATHIAS CHE LOTTA
14
(TELAIO)
Il professore che scende calmo le scalette e arriva in PP
(mentre il rumore delle botte smette)
IL PRIMO PEZZO SERVIRÀ DA INTERCALARE ALLA LOTTA
15-11
Giunto in PP il Prof guarda.
(Interessato e inquisitorio segnetto)
Poi di mezzo il Prof di quelli dirà:
CHE FAI QUI? ecc.ecc.
FAR DIRE ANCHE LA BATTUTA DELLA 18: Già...

16
Erick tenuto fermo da Matthias
Qui è interrotta la dormona della 15
17/16
Erick: Nessuno si muove e spaventi di mia iniziativa... Solo la morte fara noi...
18/16
Prof: Già... che ci fanno qui... e Accenna al dialogo dei ragazzi FC. in basso ch ha fa scattare
19/16
Erick Disperatamente urla: Baby... Baby King... sono io...
20/16
GROTTA PICCOLA - PENNA -
Baby King Barbarossa guarda si alza di scatto e va verso un aperture della grotta e tenta di aprirsi un varco MARCANDO Riguardi simbolo ch sia piccola solo i movimenti saranno un po' rallentati (60 fot.) Compare dentro la mia dentro di Erick: Baby King sono venuto a prenderti ... Baby ... Baby King...



21
Erick sta urlando disperato: Baby... !!
MATHIAS accede il capo da terra e Erick una grande ira invade MATHIAS si INFURIA e stende Erick... Erick scende e cade a terra.
Zoom indietro
22
PP del Prof. che interessato alle grida e che sente misteriosi boati sottomessi e colpi sordi. Poi alla fine dirà: Bisogna tirare il meccanismo... interrotto chiudere di fretta fate
GROTTA PICCOLA PENNA
23
Baby King sempre più infuriato continuerà a sempre l'aperture
40 fot
24
(TELAIO)
Il Prof in PP si guarda intorno Tronoso sentendo aumentare i colpi e i gridi. Matthias sta tirando il cavallo con Erick steso in mezzo.

6
25
GROTTA PICCOLA ROMA
Baby Kong si muove nel spiazzo un
Passo e esce all'esterno
40 Fot
26
ROMA e ROMA come sopra
Improvviso all'82' incastro nelle ragnatele
Matthyas lascia cadere a Terra B.K
e esce (prendendo un cavallo Dora) e chiude la porta di ferro con un chiavistello.
27
(Questa scena fa semplicemente vedere
Baby che gira tutto all'interno con l'effetto di luce della porta che si chiude e il rumore metallico delle sbarre
e del chiavistello.
ROMA - DAL VERO -
Esterno montagna roccioso
Baby s'arrampica verso l'alto al suo stesso dimostra l'altezza
40 Fot
28
ROMA
Controcampo a precedente il professore dalla scala viene verso d'angolo del laboratorio Francesco sente i rumori e, forte e seguito da Matthyas stanno per dire qualcosa ma si bloccano inorriditi e restano

7
29
ROMA
MODELLINO STUDIO
Baby Kong fa per uscire e immediatamente scavalcando il laboratorio. Quando vede i due, fa un urlone mostruoso con una mano e col pugno sfondando l'angolo della casa (simile come forma 30
ROMA
PP Baby contro cielo
guarda singhiozzando verso i due 31
ROMA
i due come visti da Baby
visti a prospettiva con il 9 % di modo che siano deformati
sono sovrastanti dal Torrione
32
ROMA
Dopo occhi di Baby Zoom allargo al M.PP Baby fa il movimento in avanti 33
MODELLINO ROMA
Baby avanza e schiaccia il tetto della prima casa (e quello che succede) facendo crollare ogni cosa

8
34
ROMA
Il Professore fugge verso l'angolo destro di Em - MATTHYAS resta all'interno e tenta di mentre da sopra la M.P. precipita massi mentre Trave e polvere
si vede fuoriuscire un urlo di MATTHYAS
(SOVRAIMPRESSIONE TESTI: BLOCCATO NELLE RAGNATELE)
PP B.K. che guarda di qua e là
35
MODELLINO e SOVRAIMPRESSIONE (a STUDIO) TECNICA ROMA
Il prof. correndo disperatamente arriva a raggiungere la porta del laboratorio mentre B.K. si batte il petto e altro inaccessibile.
36
ROMA
P.A. del Professore che chiude la porta
P.S. urla di MATTHYAS che rimbalzano dentro
37
ROMA (con tutto il disegno in angolo di visione)
Matthyas caduto tra macerie che gli impediscono di muoversi urla guardando in alto
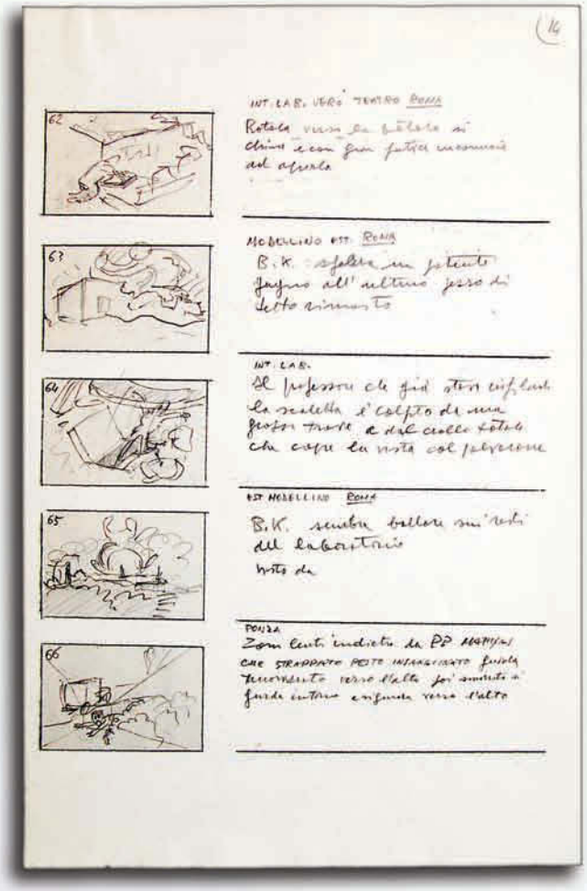
38
MODELLINO ROMA
Baby Kong enorme
e guarda verso di Em (PP di B.K.)
poi si china per prenderlo



9
39
ROMA
La manona enorme di B.K.
entra in campo e afferra
Matthyas
40
MODELLINO ROMA
B.K si porta vicino al viso
MATTHYAS - inferocito
41
ROMA
B.K guarda interessato Matthyas
questi urla e si agita (mano enorme e MATTHYAS reale + Trasparenza)
- SOVRAIMP.
42
ROMA
MATTHYAS visto da B.K di spalle urla e si agita B.K di profilo incominciò a mordere la testa
- mano enorme MATTHYAS + trasparenza - 43
ROMA
B.K. scosta la testa come a dire no non si fa
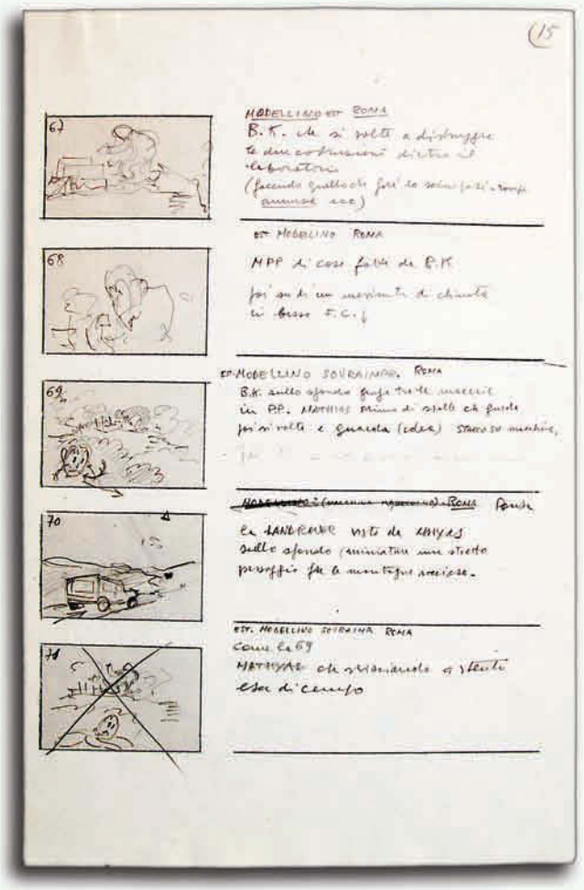
abbassando la mano di fronte Matthyas



10
44
MODELLINO ROMA
B.K. fatica con movimenti studiati faticosi volendo sopra il Laboratorio
45
MODELLINO ROMA
Parabola discendente del PUPAZZO MECC. MENTRE da sopra il tetto del Laboratorio a F.C.
46
PENZA - (CONTROFIGURA) (FIGHT) alla LANDMOTOR
47
ROMA INT. LAB. VECC TEATRO
48
MODELLINO INT LABORATORIO ROMA
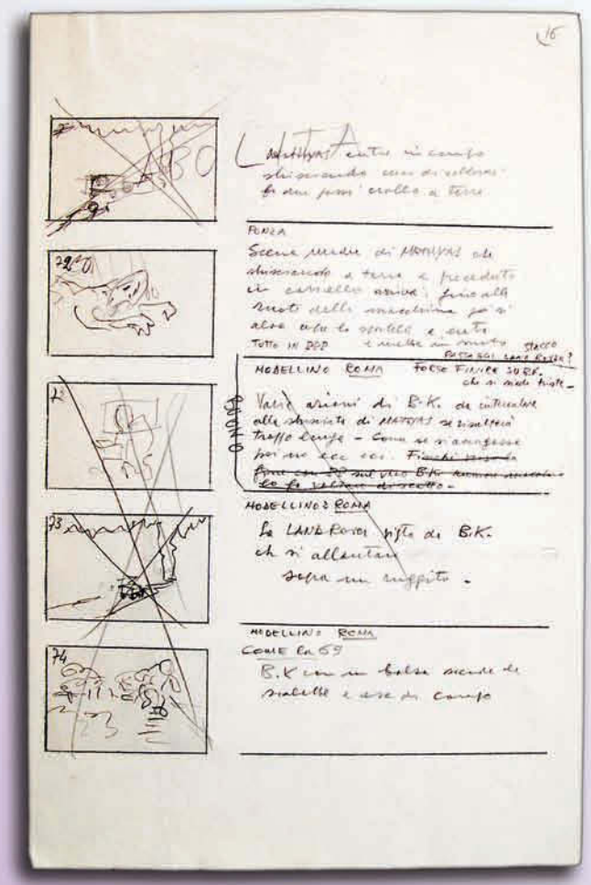
Zoom rapido da C.L. Laboratorio come visto dal Professore a PP finestra dalle quali sta fuoriuscendo dentro il muso enorme di B.K.



11
LAB. TEATRO ROMA
Il professore C.L. Laboratorio come visto da B.K. dall'alto Cento,
49
50
Zoom in avvicinamento sul Prof Tremante che fa un'espressione di sollievo finale
51
MODELLINO INT. LABORAT.
Il muso di B.K. si sta
sbriciando dalla finestra
52
EST. MODELLINO ROMA
ALL'esterno B.K. che a Libra della finestra e muso cercando a fatica una nuova presa di questi fa di colpo la retromarcia cadendo.
53
INT. LABORATORIO TEATRO ROMA VERO
Da finestra (Zoom Rapido) e CL la mano enorme di B.K. schizza verso il professore ch a sua volta (CONTROFIGURA) schizza via per un pelo mentre il muso della finestra crolla

12
54
INT. LAB. TEATRO ROMA
Il professore finisce alla BOTOLA e muove febbrilmente a raffica per aprirla. Mentre dietro di lui il braccio di B.K. sbatte da tutti da parti incendiando finalmente tutto
TAVOLI E SEDIE IN BALSA
55
INT. LAB. TEATRO ROMA
In PP Botola e mezzo di mezzano ad aprirla il prof. s'alza a fondo indietro e schizza fottendo verso MDP mentre la mano enorme di B.K. si abbatte dove era lui
56
INT. LAB. TEATRO ROMA
Il Prof. entra in C. a tuffo e va a fuggire sotto un Tavolo di metallo sul quale sono degli enormi vasi di vetro.
57
La mano di B.K entra in C. dall'alto cerca e poi batte un forte colpo del tavolo, i vasi vanno in frantumi il Tavolo si piega
? (forse meno da cercare e non trovare per non infilare contraltare)

13
Quando il muso di B.K. si abbatte sulla botola = addosso
47
MODELLINO EST. ROMA
B.K. Lira indietro il braccio di scatto
58
ROMA
si fionda e si lecca la mano si incazzato
59
MODELLINO EST. ROMA
e comincia a mettere colpi violenti sul Tetto che si sfonda
60
(o MODELLINO)
INT LABORATORIO TEATRO ROMA (VERO)
61
INT. LAB. ROMA
Enormi falcoidi o travi cadono sul tavolo già contorto dove si era rifugiato il professore, quasi esce di campo

14
INT. LAB. VERO' TEATRO ROMA
Rotaia vuota da bilico si chiude con gran fragore metallico ad effetto
MODELLINO EST. ROMA
B.K. solleva un potente pugno all'ultimo piano di tetto rimasto
INT. LAB.
Il professore che gia' stava riflettendo la scaletta s'colpito da una grossa trave e dal crollo totale che copre la vista col polverone
EST MODELLINO ROMA
B.K. sembra ballare sui resti del laboratorio visto da
PONZA
Zoom lento indietro da PP MATTIAS che STRAPPATO POSTO INTRAVEDUTO fumo terrorizzato verso d'alto poi smesso a fondo inferno enfumo verso d'alto

15
MODELLINO EST ROMA
B.K. che si volta a distruggere le due costruzioni dietro il laboratorio (facendo qualche cosa' le solite cose)
EST MODELLINO ROMA
MPP di cose fatte da B.K.
poi su di un movimento di camera in basso F.C.
EST MODELLINO SOVRAIMPR. ROMA
B.K. sullo sfondo finge tutte macerie in PP. MATTIAS stanco di vedere ch fonde poi si volta e guarda (edera) stanco su mentre, ESTERNO MODELLINO ROMA
la LANDROVER vista da MATTIAS sullo sfondo (animation non stretto proseguo fa la mentre ameisse.
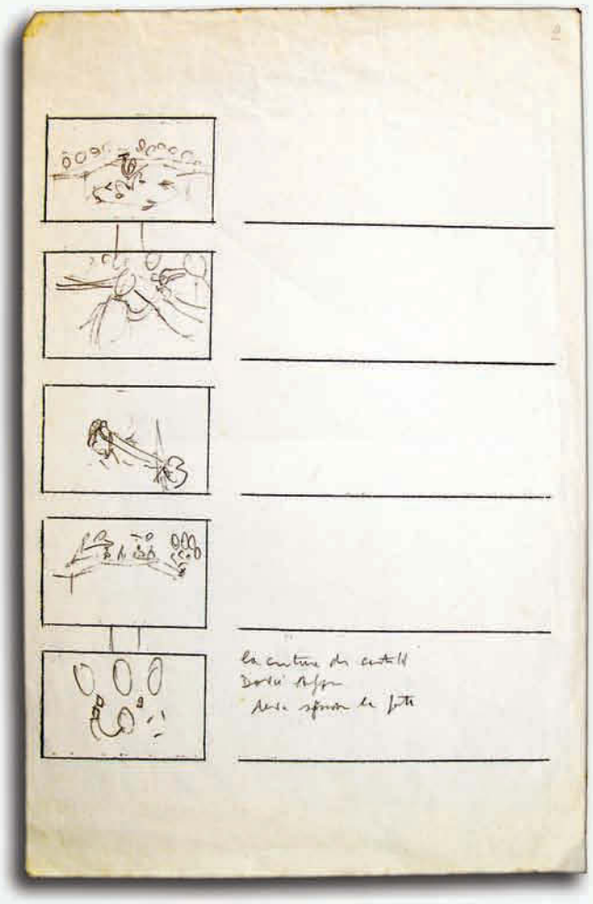
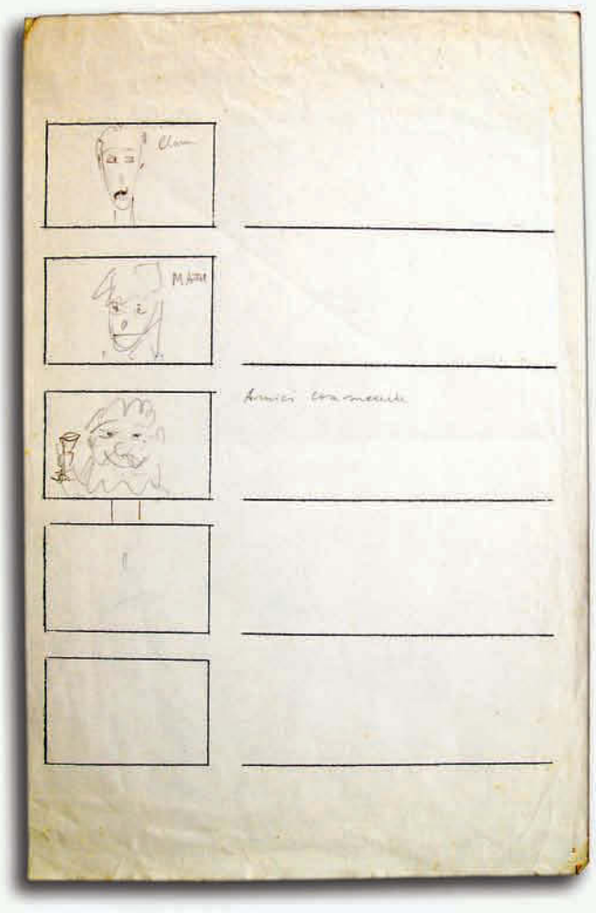
EST. MODELLINO ESTERNA ROMA
come la 69
MATTIAS che stanziando si volta
esce di campo



16
MODELLINO ROMA
Varie azioni di B.K. da intervallare alla stanchezza di MATTIAS se possibile traffico lungo - Come se si avvicinasse poi ecc ecc. Finche
MODELLINO 2 ROMA
la LANDROVER piena di B.K. che si allontana sopra un rialzato.
MODELLINO ROMA
come la 69
B.K con in bocca scende di scalette e esce di campo



17
MODELLINO 2 ROMA
la macchina e seguita da cani
B.K entra in campo e la rincorre
- la macchina esce all'aperture.
MODELLINO 2 ROMA
la macchina cane sulle statue verso dove B.K ha preso stesso.
PONZA
STRADA VERA
LANDROVER che si allontana (VERA)
MODELLINO 2 ROMA
M.P.P. di B.K. che fonde
incarecchiandosi e cane

LA VENERE D'ILLE

THEFT of the bride's garter during the wedding party.
The child in this sequence was played by Mario's grandson, Fabrizio "Roy" Bava.

EUGENIO BAVA CHRONOLOGY

In telling the story of the life and career of Mario Bava, it has also been necessary for me to tell the previously untold story of the life and work of Mario's father and mentor, Francesco Eugenio Bava. If allowing only for the countless title sequences that Eugenio and his Istituto LUCE colleagues created for Italian films over a period of thirty-five years, what is known of his work is grievously incomplete. Perhaps this outline, sketchy as it is, will inspire others to further research about this great artisan and pioneer of the Italian cinema.

1886 Born in Sanremo, March 31.

1900-01 Father, Giovanni, dies.

1905 Assists a Pathé Frères film crew by sculpting a fireplace. First job in the cinema.

1908 Marries Emma Ficini-Carpita.

1909 Founds San Remo Film.
Maggio—mese dei fiori ("May—Month of Flowers"). San Remo Film.

1910 Terremoto fatale ("Fatal Earthquake"). San Remo Film.

1911 Daughter, Elena, born on October 9.

1913 Quo Vadis? Historical drama. Dir: Enrico Guazzoni. DP/spfx: EB.
Cabiria. Historical drama. Dir: Giovanni Pastrone.

1914 Son, Mario, born on July 30.

1916 Hired by Arturo Ambrosio of Ambrosio Film. Family moves to Turin.
Cenere ("Ashes"). Melodrama. Ambrosio Film. Dir: Febo Mari.

1919 L'amante della luna ("The Moon Lover"). A Melodrama in Two Episodes: "L'amante della luna" and "Il viandante." Ambrosio Film, Turin. Dir: Achille Consalvi. Screenplay: Based on a novel by Paul DeKock. DP: Achille Bianchi [EB, according to another source]. Cast: Lucy di San Germano, Cav. Roberto Villani, etc.
Champagne caprice. Melodrama. Ambrosio Film, Turin. Dir: Achille Consalvi. SP: Roberto Omegna. DP: Achille Bianchi, EB. Cast: Maria Roasio, Umberto Scalpellini.

1920 La farfalla della morte ("The Butterfly of Death"). Melodrama. Ambrosio Film, Turin. Dir and SP: F. G. Viancini & Arturo Ambrosio Jr. DP: Fernando [Eugenio] Bava. Cast: Maria Roasio, Cav. Roberto Villani.

1921 Le ultime avventure di Galaor. [Alternate title: L'ultima impresa di Galaor; reissued in 1923 as Galaor tra i leoni] Historical adventure. Do-Re-Mi Film, Rome. Dir: Mario Restivo [EB?]. SP and DP: EB. Cast: Alfredo Boccolini, Tatiana Gorka, Armando Novi, Decio Iacobacci.

1924 Galaor contro Galaor. Historical adventure. Fert, Turin. Dir: Eugenio Perego [EB]. DP: Sergio Goddio. Cast: Alfredo Boccolini.

1925 Films documentary about Giovane Fascisti tour of Far East, title unknown.
Named head of Istituto LUCE's Optical and Special Effects Department, where he and his co-workers design the mail titles of nearly every Italian feature released for the next three decades.

1933 L'intelligenza del fioro ("The Intelligence of Flora"). Scientific documentary. Istituto LUCE. Dir: Roberto Omegna (and EB, uncredited). DP: EB.

1936 Nei giardini del mare ("In the Garden of the Sea"). Scientific documentary. Istituto LUCE. Dir: Roberto Omegna (and EB, uncredited). DP: EB.
Sguardo al fondo marina ("Look at the Bottom of the Sea") Scientific documentary. Istituto LUCE. Dir: Roberto Omegna (and EB, uncredited). DP: EB.

1937 Bolle di sapone. Scientific documentary. Istituto LUCE. Dir: Roberto Omegna and EB. DP: EB.

1939 La cavaletta ("The Little Cavalla"). Scientific documentary. Istituto LUCE. Dir: Roberto Omegna and EB. DP: EB.
L'axolotl, il curioso anfibio messicano ("The Axolotl, a Curious Mexican Amphibian"). Scientific documentary. Istituto LUCE. Dir: Roberto Omegna and EB. DP: EB.

1941 L'Islam. Religious documentary. Istituto LUCE. Dir: Vittorio Gallo and EB. DP: EB.

1942 Morfologia del fiore ("Metamorphosis of Flowers"). Scientific documentary. Istituto LUCE. Dir: Roberto Omegna and EB. DP: EB.

Undated known Omegna/Bava works from the Istituto LUCE period:
L'occhio ("The Eye"), I fiori ("The Flowers"), and Mosca delle olive (dacus oleae rossi) ed il suo endofago ("The Olive Flies").

1948 La macchina ammazzacattivi. Dir: Roberto Rossellini. Spfx: EB.

1951 Amor non ho! Però... però... Dir: Giorgio Bianchi. DP: Mario Bava. Spfx: EB.

1957 Sigfrido. Mythological adventure. Dir: Giacomo Gentilomo. Spfx consultant: EB.

1959 Caltiki il mostro immortale/Caltiki the Immortal Monster. Horror/Science fiction. Galatea. Dir: "Robert Hamton" [Riccardo Freda and Mario Bava]. Spfx consultant: EB.
Retires from Istituto LUCE.

1960 La maschera del demonio/Black Sunday. Horror. Galatea/Jolly. Dir: Mario Bava. Spfx/sculpture: EB.
Il ladro di Bagdad/The Thief of Baghdad. Fantasy. Galatea. Dir: Arthur Lubin. Spfx: EB, Mario Bava (uncredited).

1961 Maciste contro il vampiro/Goliath and the Vampires. Horror/fantasy. Dir: Giacomo Gentilomo. Spfx: EB, Mario Bava (uncredited).

1963 Perseo l'invincible/Medusa Against the Son of Hercules. Mythological adventure. Dir: Alberto de Martino. Technical advisor: EB. Spfx: Mario Bava, Carlo Rambaldi.
I tre volti della paura/Black Sabbath. Horror. Galatea/American International. Dir: Mario Bava. Wax sculptures: EB.

1965 Terrore nello spazio/Planet of the Vampires. Science fiction. American International/Italian International. Dir: Mario Bava. Spfx consultant: EB.
Wife Emma dies after a long battle with cancer.

1966 Dies after being struck by automobile on Via Gregorio VII, September 9.

◀ THE DEAD medium that Eugenio Bava sculpted in wax in I TRE VOLTI DELLA PAURA.

MARIO BAVA and Pietro Francisci (seated) co-direct a scene from LE FATICHE DI ERCOLE.

Mario Bava Filmography

While the following filmography is more complete than others which have preceded it, I offer it knowing only too well how incomplete it must be. For a well-connected, respected workaholic like Bava, it is impossible to accept that he held only two jobs during 1957, one of the biggest "boom" years in the history of Italian film production, or that he had nothing to show for his efforts in the year 1969—but this is the extent of the activity my research has been able to uncover. Mario's son Lamberto, who assisted his father on feature film assignments, rarely if ever assisted him on his side-jobs and did not keep track of them. The dates below represent the years in which the following titles were released, and do not always reflect the years in which Bava actually worked on these titles.

1932–38
During this period, MB worked as his father's assistant in the optical effects department at the Istituto Nazionale LUCE, where his duties included main title design, animation, special trick photography, and the supervision of the department in his father's absence.

1935
L'occhio (Roberto Omegna & Eugenio Bava, S - a*)

1937
Scipione l'africano (Carmine Gallone, FF - t*)

1938
Il dottor Antonio (Enrico Guazzoni, FF - ca*)
La principessa Tarakanova (Fyodor Otsep & Mario Soldati, FF - ca*)
Giuseppe Verdi (Carmine Gallone, FF - ca*)
Inventiamo l'amore (Camillo Mastrocinque, FF - ca*)

1939
Il tacchino prepotente (Roberto Rossellini, S - dp/t)
La vispa Teresa (Roberto Rossellini, S - dp/t)
Il socio invisibile (Roberto Roberti, FF - ap*)

1940
Ecco la felicità! (Marcel L'Herbier, FF - ca*)
Istituto LUCE newsreels

1941
La compagna della teppa (Corrado D'Errico, FF - ca*)
Uomini sul fondo (Francesco De Robertis, FF - ap/sfx)
La corona di ferro (Alessandro Blasetti, FF - ap/sfx*?)

1942
Capitan Tempesta (Corrado D'Errico, FF - ca)
La nave bianca (Francesco De Robertis, FF - ca/sfx)
Alfa tau! (Francesco De Robertis, FF - ap/sfx)

1943
•Uomini e cieli (Francesco De Robertis, FF - ap/sfx)
Le avventure di Annabella (Leo Menardi, FF - dp) Sant'Elena, piccola isola (Renato Simoni & Umberto Scarpelli, FF - dp)

1946
Montecassino nel cerchio di fuoco (Arturo Gemmiti, FF - ap*)
Donne belle nella pittura italiana (Raffaele Saitto, S - dp)
Paolo Veronese, pittore della gioia e del fasto (Raffaele Saitto, S - dp)
L'orecchio (S - d/dp/sfx/e)
Il barbiere di Siviglia (Mario Costa, FF - ca*)

KEY

S - short
FF - feature film
MS - mini-series
TV - television commercial a - actor

ad - assistant director
ap - additional photography ca - camera assistant co - camera operator cod - co-director (always uncredited)
d - director
dp - director of photography
e - editor sfx - special effects sp - screenplay
t - title design
* - uncredited
• - not mentioned in main text
? - unconfirmed

1947
Elisir d'amore (Mario Costa, FF - dp)
Il mito di Giorgine (Raffaele Saito, S - dp)
Cristo in Gerusalemme (Pietro Francisci, S - dp)
Musica nel cielo (Pietro Francisci, S - dp)
Passagio del mare (Pietro Francisci, S - dp)
La resurrezione (Pietro Francisci, S - dp)
Anfiteatro Flavio (S - d/dp/sfx/e)
Santa notte (S - d/dp/sfx/e)
Leggenda sinfonica (cod w/ Riccardo Melani, S - dp)
Natale al campo 119 (Pietro Francisci, FF - dp)

1948
Una lezione di geometria (Leonardo Sinisgalli & Virgilio Sabel, S - dp/sfx)
Follie per l'opera (Mario Costa, FF - dp)
•L'auto nel tempo (Fernando Pisani, S - dp)
•Il trucco nel tempo (Elio Picconi, S - dp)
I pagliacci (amore tragico) (Mario Costa, FF - dp/sfx)

1949
Antonio de Padova (Pietro Francisci, FF - dp/sfx)
Variazioni sinfoniche (S - d/dp/sfx/e)
Le porte d'oro (Riccardo Melani, S - dp)
Il demoniaco nell'arte (Carlo Castelli Gattinara, S - dp)
Fantasie di statuine (Telloli, S - dp/sfx)
Porcellana nell'arte (Telloli, S - dp)
Il vangelo del Beato Angelico (Telloli, S - dp)
Arte nella porcellana (N. Pasqualini, S - dp)

1950
Miss Italia (Duilio Coletti, FF - dp)
Il leone di Amalfi (Pietro Francisci, FF - dp/sfx)
È arrivato il cavalieri! (Mario Monicelli & Steno, FF - dp/sfx)
L'amore nell'arte (S - d/dp/sfx/e)
•Canzone di primavera (Mario Costa, FF - dp/sfx)
Disastri della guerra (Luciano Emmer, S - dp)
La festa di Sant Isidoro (Luciano Emmer, S - dp)
•Il pittore di trastavere: Bartolomeo Pinelli (G. Bagnani, S - dp)
I nuraghi (Marino Girolami, S - dp)
L'ospedale del delitto (Luigi Comencini, S - dp)
Sulle orme di Esculapio (Augusto Petrone, S - dp)
Quel bandito sono io! (Mario Soldati, FF - dp/sfx)
Vita da cani (Steno, FF - dp)

1951
•La leggenda della croce (Giuseppe Massani, S - dp)
•Il pittore della primavera (Giuseppe Massani, S - dp)
Guardie e ladri (Mario Monicelli & Steno, FF - dp)
Amor non ho, però... però... (Giorgio Bianchi, FF - dp/sfx)
La famiglia Passaguai (Aldo Fabrizi, FF - dp/sfx)

1952
La famiglia Passaguai fa fortuna (Aldo Fabrizi, FF - dp/sfx)
Papa diventa Mamà (Aldo Fabrizi, FF - dp/sfx)
Gli eroi della domenica (Mario Camerini, FF - dp)
Una croce senza nome (Tullio Covaz, FF - ap?)

1953
Spartaco (Riccardo Freda, FF - ap/sfx*)
Perdonami! (Mario Costa, FF - dp)
Il viale della speranza (Dino Risi, FF - dp/sfx)
Balocchi e profumi (Natale Montillo & F. M. De Bernardi, FF - dp)
Villa Borghese (Gianni Franciolini, FF - dp)

1954
Terza liceo (Luciano Emmer, FF - dp)
Cose da pazzi (G. W. Pabst, FF - dp/sfx)
Graziella (Giorgio Bianchi, FF - dp)
Attila il flagello di dio (Pietro Francisci, FF - ap/sfx?)
Ulisse (Mario Camerini, FF - ap/sfx?)
Hanno rubato un tram (Mario Bonnard, FF - dp/sfx)
Teodora imperatrice di Bisanzio (Riccardo Freda, FF - ap/sfx*)

1955
Buonanotte... avvocato! (Giorgio Bianchi, FF - dp)
Non ch'e amore più grande (Giorgio Bianchi, FF - dp)
Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova (Steno, FF - dp/sfx)
La donna più bella del mondo (Robert Z. Leonard, FF - dp/sfx)
Da qui all'eredità (Riccardo Freda, FF - ap/sfx*)
Beatrice Cenci (Riccardo Freda, FF - ap/sfx*)

1956
Mio figlio Nerone (Steno, FF - dp/sfx)
Orlando e i paladini di francia (Pietro Francisci, FF - cod/dp/sfx)
Alto Lazio pittoresco (Fernando Pisani, S - dp)
Copiando la natura (Viviana Pasqualini, S - dp/sfx)

1957
I vampiri (Riccardo Freda, FF - cod/dp/sfx)

1958
Le fatiche di Ercole (Pietro Francisci, FF - cod/dp/sfx)
Città di notte (Leopoldo Trieste, FF - cod/dp)
La morte viene dello spazio (FF - d [credited to Paolo Heusch] /dp/sfx)
Totò a Parigi (Camillo Mastrocinque, FF - ap/sfx*)
Totò nella luna (Steno, FF - ap/sfx*)
Nel segno di Roma (Guido Brignone, FF - ap/sfx*)

1959
Ercole e la regina di Lidia (Pietro Francisci, FF - cod/dp/sfx)
Agi Murad il diavolo bianco (Riccardo Freda, FF - dp/sfx)
Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei (Mario Bonnard, FF - ap/sfx?)
Caltiki il mostro immortale ("Robert Hamton" [Riccardo Freda], FF - cod/dp/sfx)
La battaglia di Maratona (Jacques Tourneur, FF - cod/dp/sfx)

1960
La maschera del demonio (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Morgan il pirata (Andre de Toth, FF - ap/sfx*)
Esther and the King (Raoul Walsh, FF - cod/dp/sfx)
Il giganti della Tessaglia (Riccardo Freda, FF - ap/sfx*)

1961
L'ultimo dei vichinghi (Giacomo Gentilomo, FF - cod/ap/sfx*)
Il ladro di Bagdad (Arthur Lubin, FF - ap/sfx*)
Le meraviglie di Aladino (Henry Levin, FF - cod/dp/sfx)
Maciste contro il vampiro (Giacomo Gentilomo, FF - ap/sfx?)
Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan (FF - ap/sfx*)
Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide (Vittorio Cottafavi, FF - ap/sfx*)
Ercole al centro della terra (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Il gladiatore invincibile (Alberto De Martino, FF - ap/sfx*)
Gli invasori (FF - d/dp/sfx)

1962
Maciste all'inferno (Riccardo Freda, FF - ap/sfx*)
I Normanni (Giuseppe Vari, FF - ap/sfx*)
Sette spade del vendicatore (Riccardo Freda, FF - ap/sfx*)
Perseo l'invincibile (Alberto De Martino, FF - ap/sfx*)

1963
La ragazza che sapeva troppo (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Oro per i cesari (Andre de Toth, Riccardo Freda and Sabatino Ciuffini - FF, ap/sfx*)
I tre volti della paura (FF - d/dp/sfx)
La frusta e il corpo (FF - d/dp/sfx)

1964
Sei donne per l'assassino (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Ercole l'invincibile (Al Wordl, FF - ap/sfx*)
Evil Eye (FF - d/dp/sfx/a)
Maciste e la regina di Samar (Giacomo Gentilomo, FF - ap/sfx*)
La strada per Fort Alamo (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Dunwich (unproduced, pre-production only)

1965
12 bambole biondo (pre-production only)
Minnesota Clay (Sergio Corbucci, FF - ap/sfx*)
Sfida dei giganti (Maurizio Lucidi, FF - co-d/sfx*)
Terrore nello spazio (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Ringo del Nebraska (Antonio Roman, FF - cod/ap/sfx*)
Roma contro Roma (Giuseppe Vari, FF - ap/sfx*)

1966
I coltelli del vendicatore (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Operazione paura (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Le spie vengono dal semifreddo (FF - d/dp/sfx/a)
Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs (FF - d/dp/sfx/a)
Cry Nightmare (pre-production only)

1967
Dick Smart 2.007 (pre-production only)

1968
Diabolik (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Odissea (Franco Rossi, MS - cod/dp/sfx)
Le avventure di Ulisse (Franco Rossi, FF - cod/dp/sfx)
Il pistolero segnato a dio (Giorgio Ferroni, FF - ap/sfx*)
Nude... si muore ("Anthony M. Dawson," FF - sp [uncredited])

1970
Il rosso segno della follia (FF - d/dp/sfx/t)
5 bambole per la luna d'agosto (FF - d/dp/sfx/e)
Roy Colt & Winchester Jack (FF - d/dp/sfx)
I futuribili (TV - d/dp/sfx*)
Waterloo (Sergei Bondarchuk, FF - ap/sfx*)
Esso commercials (Franco Rossi, TV - dp/sfx*)

1971
Four Times That Night (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Ecologia del delitto (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Vivisection documentary (d/dp*)
Ciocolatini baci commercials (TV - d/dp/sfx*)

1972
Baron Blood (FF - d/dp/sfx)
The Shadow Guest (pre-production only)
La vita a volte è molto dura, vero Provvidenza? (Giulio Petroni, FF - sfx)

1973
Lisa and the Devil (FF - d/sp)

1974
Last Will and Testament (pre-production only)
L'ospite dalle due (TV guest)

1975
The House of Exorcism ("Micky Lion," FF - cod/dp/sfx)
Moses the Lawgiver (Gianfranco De Bosio, MS - ap/sfx)
Cani arrabbiati (FF - d/a, unreleased)

1976
Moses (Gianfranco De Bosio, FF - ap/sfx)
Bordella (Pupi Avati, FF - sfx advisor)
Baby Kong (unproduced, pre-production only)

1977
Radici di paura (unproduced, pre-production only)
Schock (FF - d/dp/sfx)
Il cavalieri della stelle (unproduced, pre-production only)
Il vagabondo dello spazio (unproduced, pre-production only)

1978
La Venere d'Ille (S - cod w/ Lamberto Bava)

1979
Apocalypse (unproduced, pre-production only)

1980
Inferno (Dario Argento, FF - ap/sfx*)
Anomalia (unproduced, pre-production only)
Star Express (unproduced, pre-production only)

1997
Rabid Dogs (FF - d/a)

2000
Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre. Channel 4 documentary (UK), directed by Garry S. Grant. Cast (in alphabetical order): Samuel Z. Arkoff, Fabrizio Bava, Georgia Bava, Lamberto Bava, Allan Bryce, Tim Burton, John Carpenter, Sean S. Cunningham, Joe Dante, John Phillip Law, Alfredo Leone, Tim Lucas, Ib Melchior, Kim Newman, Daria Nicolodi, Carlo Rambaldi, Carlo Rustichelli, Dardano Sacchetti, John Saxon

2002
Kidnapped (FF - d/a)

2004
Mario Bava Operazione paura. SKY TV documentary (Italy), directed by Gabriele Acerbo and Roberto Pisoni, first aired April 30, 2004. Cast (in alphabetical order): Dario Argento, Fabrizio Bava, Lamberto Bava, Mario Bava, Alberto Bevilacqua, Tim Burton, Roman Coppola, Roger Corman, Callisto Cosulich, Luigi Cozzi, Joe Dante (host), Dino De Laurentiis, Stefano Della Casa, Massimo De Rita, John Landis, John Phillip Law, Alfredo Leone, Tim Lucas, Fulvio Lucisano, Mario Monicelli, Ennio Morricone, Daria Nicolodi, Carlo Rambaldi, Elke Sommer, Barbara Steele, Sergio Stivaletti, Quentin Tarantino

Other Possibilities

As Lamberto Bava once told me about his grandfather Eugenio, "He didn't take credit for his work, but you see his influence everywhere." The same could said of his father Mario's side jobs in the Italian film industry.

Mario Bava was not one to stand around idly. A compulsive worker, he put his free time to use by providing anonymous assistance to other directors. He chose to work anonymously because he did not wish the pleasure he took in working to be perceived by his colleagues as a sign of his failure as a director. In the main text of this book, I have included accounts of those films in which Bava's participation is a certainty—either because someone else present on the set has confirmed it for me, and in some cases where I feel that his creative signature is too obvious to be denied.

Identifying Bava's cinematography is easy, identifying films which he completed for their directors or assistant-directed is impossible, and identifying his unsigned special effects work can be tricky. His special effects pose a special problem because Mario learned everything about this art, this science, this discipline from his father Eugenio Bava, who also passed it on to other apprentices, including Antonio Margheriti. Therefore, it is not always possible to say with confidence that "this trick shot was the work of Mario Bava," because the similarity we see could be a technique that Mario learned from his father, but was not alone in learning from him—as Lamberto says, such influence is visible everywhere. At the same time, a trained eye would not confuse a Margheriti effects shot with the work of Mario Bava; Margheriti built excellent miniature sets, but he had a tendency to spoil their illusion with intruding elements like undercranked water or fire that somehow never looks in correct proportion to its surroundings.

The following list is composed of titles about which I feel varying degrees of suspicion but opted not to include in the main text because, ultimately, I was not wholly confident of their paternity. Of one thing I am certain: regardless of how many "maybes" are on this list, the list of "certainties" that eluded my net—either because those films were never released in America, or because they belonged to a genre outside my expertise, because I saw them in a pan-and-scanned TV print that cropped Bava's contribution offscreen—is probably much longer.

1960

Seddok (l'erede di Satana)/Atom Age Vampire

For as long as the name Mario Bava has been included in American books and fan journals, he has been widely miscredited as the producer of this interesting black-and-white horror thriller, first released in Rome in August 1960. The confusion can be blamed on an animated main title sequence (found only in the American version) that proclaims the picture to be "A Mario Fava Production."

Seddok was produced by Lyons Film, with no executive producer listed, though Elio Ippolito Mellino is listed as production supervisor. Lamberto Bava strongly contests any speculation that his father may have produced the film anonymously: "It was not in my father's character to be a film producer; it would have been one of the very last things he would do."

The special effects of the transformation scenes, which cleverly replace actor Alberto Lupo with a clay likeness that is transformed, frame-by-frame, into the visage of a monster, is attributed in Italian references to Ugo Amadoro—who surely apprenticed to Eugenio Bava, and who was also the credited special effects designer of Ercole e la regina di Samar/Hercules Against the Moon Men, a film which (I believe) contains additional effects work and possibly second unit direction by Bava.

Though I'm confident that Bava had nothing to do with Seddok's production or special effects, as my research made me more familiar with Bava's specific black-and-white photographic techniques, I have become more suspicious of his possible partial involvement in its cinematography. The credited cameraman is Aldo Giordani, who photographed Odissea (including Bava's "Polyphemus" episode)—but, at this stage of his career, Giordani's work (Teseo contro il minotauro/The Minotaur, I Mongoli/The Mongols) was simply not as accomplished as it sometimes is here. It's possible that Bava replaced Giordani for some days of shooting on this picture, or was brought in during post-production to "punch-up" the film with additional photography.

Gli amore di Ercole/
The Loves of Hercules a.k.a. Hercules vs. the Hydra

This Carlo Ludovico Bragaglia film, starring Jayne Mansfield and her husband Mickey Hargitay, is one of the more ridiculous pepla, but it does contain a single location shot of a hillside crested with a superb glass matte painting of an ancient Roman city. The way the attributes of the actual location are skillfully merged with the illusion on the glass suggests the artist was Bava.

1961

Maciste, l'uomo più forte del mondo/
Mole Men Against the Son of Hercules

The camera unit on this Antonio Leonviola peplum consisted of Alvaro Mancori as director of photography and his son Sandro Mancori as camera assistant. Bava worked with Mancori family members on several occasions, and this film does contain some noticeably uncredited matte and effects shots that may reflect Bava's cooperation.

1963

Oro per i Cesari/Gold for the Caesars

After Riccardo Freda and Mario Bava worked together on Sette spade del vendicatore/Seventh Sword, Freda went on to co-direct this excellent peplum, starring Jeffrey Hunter and Mylène Démongeot. Set in 958 A.D., it tells the story of an ambitious, enslaved architect (Hunter) who is given the opportunity to win his freedom by leading pro-consul Gaius Cornelius Maximus (Massimo Girotti) to a vast deposit of gold in the mountains patrolled by the Celts, enemies of Rome, which will allow him to made a successful bid for the throne of the recently fallen emperor. The architect is needed because only he can envision and execute, with slave labor, a dam large enough to stop the flow of water that buries the gold.

Freda reportedly directed the exterior scenes while Andre de Toth and Sabatino Ciuffini shared direction of the studio interiors. The actual division of labor is not so easily perceived in the presence of the film itself, which plays out most of its climactic scenes on a studio-built "exterior" set. The film contains some exterior matte shots that could be the work of Bava (who was otherwise unoccupied during the period of filming), as well as some fairly elaborate scale model recreations of portions of the Cascate delle Marmore—a magnificent falls located in Umbria, not far from Rome—which is the waterfall used for some clever rear-screen projections to depict the final collapse of the dam.

Sandokan, la tigre di Mompracem/Sandokan the Great

Steve Reeves liked to have Mario Bava around when he made his films in Italy, and one scene in this costume adventure, directed by Umberto Lenzi, is staged in a manner that suggests Bava's possible presence behind the camera. A hostage of Sandokan (Reeves) is tied to a tree overnight for safekeeping, but he is found the next morning with a knife planted in his chest. Everything about the staging of this scene is nearly identical to the scene in Bava's 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto/5 Dolls for an August Moon (1970) where the dead body of Marie (Edwige Fenech) is discovered tied to a tree, a knife protruding from her breast. In another odd coincidence, actor Maurice Poli is present as an onlooker in both scenes.

Ercole contro Molock/The Conquest of Mycenae

Directed by Giorgio Ferroni, Ercole contro Molock is a terrifically pulpy pepla in which a series of women are sacrificed to Moloch, the disfigured son of Queen Demetra (Rosalba Neri, playing a woman twice her own age), who ravages their faces and bodies with his sharp talons, for spiting his royal ugliness with their beauty. The glass matte paintings that complete the illusion of ancient Mycenae—and, more particularly, an animated glass matte effect of a darkening cloud over the city—are very likely Bava's work as they share many traits with similar shots in Le fatiche di Ercole. One of the glass mattes seen here first appeared in Ferroni's earlier film La guerra di Troia/The Trojan Horse (1962), starring Steve Reeves. An intriguing coincidence is that two of the cast members of Ercole contro Molock, Michel Lemoine and Jany Clair, were cast together in Bava's next feature in this time period, La strada per Fort Alamo (1964).

Horror/The Blancheville Monster

This Alberto De Martino film contains some maquettes of a castle exterior in the rain that strongly resemble similar work that Bava had previously done for Riccardo Freda's Beatrice Cenci (1956).

1964

Il trionfo di Ercole/The Triumph of Hercules

Marilù Tolo appears in this Alberto De Martino pepla, starring Dan Vadis, which may be how Bava became familiar enough with her skills to want her for the role of Eva Kant in Diabolik (which she did not play). Bava's likeliest contributions to this entertaining adventure would be the upper tiers of the arena where the competitions are staged (these were filled in with glass matte painting) and a series of mattes depicting a ledge over a deep, flaming chasm. Vadis creeps along the ledge at one point (he is standing on a high platform behind the glass matte, viewed through a negative lens to diminish his size further), and the camera pans down the matte to a small (but seemingly large) fire surrounded by a number of foregrounded stalagmites. Later in the film, as Tolo stands on the same precarious ledge, the setup is the same, with the addition of a shot showing the pit from her perspective; this appears to have been achieved by positioning Tolo in front of the matte painting, with bluescreen behind the matte to permit a subsequent optical insert of a flaming, miniature quarry.

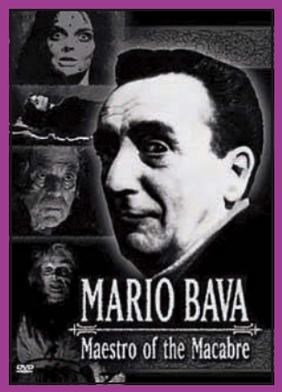
The techniques employed here are very true to Bava's approach, and the brushstrokes are very much like those seen in the mattes of the Medusa's valley in Perseo l'invincibile. The results are a little cruder than one would expect of Bava, which may reflect Bava making do with inadequate time or budget, or another technician following Bava's advice for filming the sequences.

1965

Fantômas se Déchainé!/Fantômas Strikes Back!

The second of André Hunebelle's Fantômas films, unlike its companions in the series, was partially shot in Rome. Viewers attentive to location will notice that some interiors were filmed at the Roma Hilton Hotel, including the same crimson-carpeted staircase seen in Bava's Le spie vengono dal semifreddo/Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs (1966). The two films actually have a good deal in common stylistically, and I particularly suspect that Bava was involved in, if not solely responsible for, the final reel effects shots involving the flying car of Fantômas. If true, this film would mark the only time Bava's work was translated into product for the Corgi miniature car company. The charming, naïve quality of the special effects, involving animated cut-outs and blueback opticals, strongly recalls the climactic hot air balloon sequence of Le spie vengono dal semifreddo. The film was first released in Paris at the end of 1965, with its Roman premiere following a month later. Therefore, it may well account for part of Bava's free time in September – October 1965.

1970

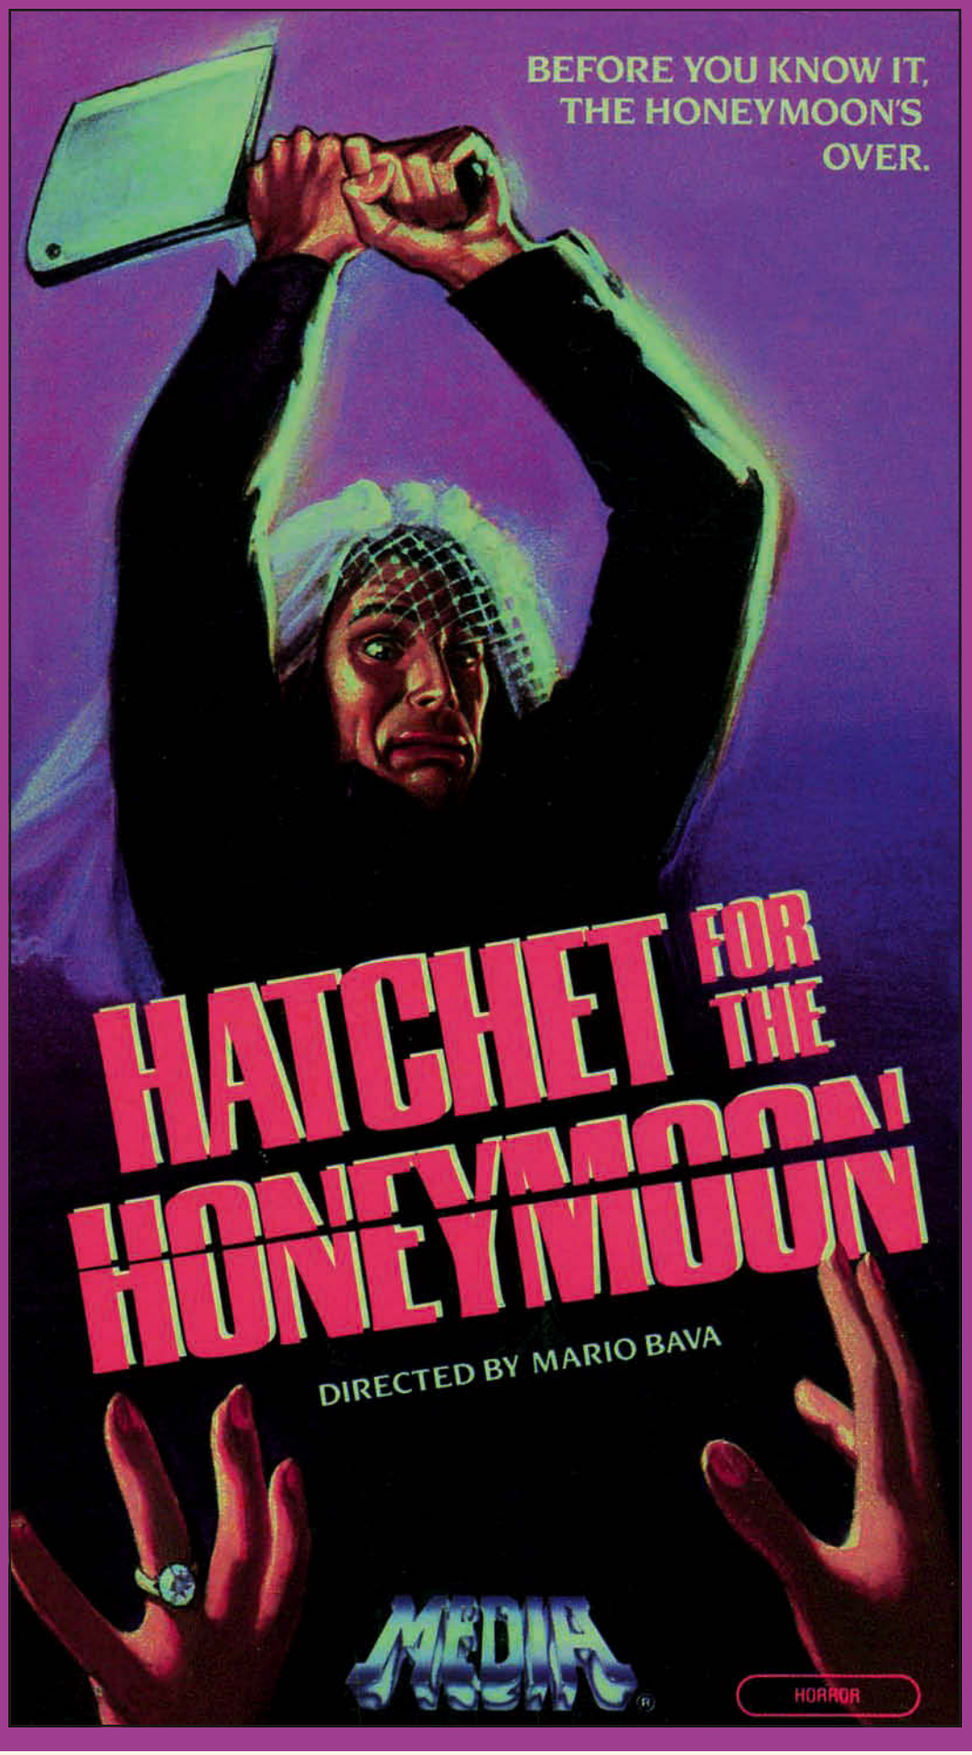


Matalo!

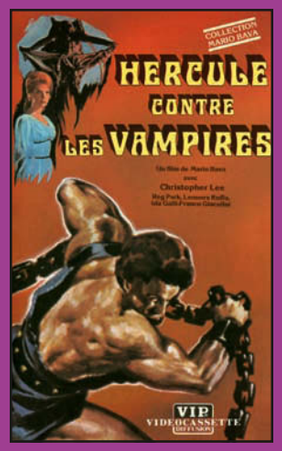
I came very close to including this latter-day Italian Western by Cesare Canevari in the main text, regardless of confirmation—that's how strongly I feel the presence of Bava throughout its running time . . . and I mean from the very first shot. The Bava and Canevari families were friendly. Cesare's sister Serena, after working as Michelangelo Antonioni's script girl on Deserto rosso/Red Desert (1964), had served as Bava's continuity assistant on Terrore nello spazio in 1965. Afterwards, she moved on to work on a series of films with Sergio Leone, but Bava would hire her brother Sergio Canevari—the production designer of Francesco Rosi's Salvatore Giuliano (1962), Gillo Pontecorvo's La battaglia di Algeri/The Battle of Algiers (1965), and Elio Petri's Un tranquillo posto di campagna/A Quiet Place in the Country (1969, a progressively styled ghost story that Bava much admired)—to design his next feature, Ecologia del delitto—immediately after this film was made.

For anyone reasonably acquainted with Mario Bava and his films, the experience of watching Matalo! is an unexpected encounter with a catalogue of Bava's most familiar visual tropes, as well as a sketchbook of cinematographic ideas too far-fetched for him to have undertaken under his own established name. The Italo-Spanish co-production's cinematography is credited to Julio Ortas, who shared a fair number of Bava's closest past professional affiliations, having photographed films for Mario Costa (Il terrore del mantilla rossi, 1963), Franco and Ciccio (I due mafiosi, 1964), and Riccardo Freda (Il magnifico avventuriero, 1963; Giulietta e Romeo, 1964; Genoveffa di Brabante, 1967); he also directed and photographed the second unit of Sergio Leone's Per qualche dollaro in più/For a Few Dollars More (1965). Ortas was credited with continuing to do second unit work throughout the 1960s, but Matalo! is such a peculiar combination of controlled cinematography and out-of-control cinematography that it is hard to know which unit was the supportive one; furthermore, it would not be proper to ascribe only the out-of-control work to Ortas because it is in these moments when the film is most often divinely inspired.

The opening shot in Matalo! is an archetypal Bava zoom into the eye of the sun, light flaring in perfect circles around the orb—a shot appearing in Bava's work as early as his second-unit photography for Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide, and which recurs throughout his oeuvre, as it would again in Ecologia del delitto. When the story reaches Benson City, the setting is introduced with a shot of an empty swing being buffeted by the wind (see Operazione paura, Four Times That Night, Schock), followed by a 180° establishing shot (I sette gladiatori). The interiors, especially during night scenes, make frequent use of luminous blue and amber lighting gels, usually with a dress or a drape or some other red object centered in the composition. After the coach robbery, scenes of Phil's (Luís Davila) gang returning to Benson City are intercut with rapid cutaways to the closeup of a peering eye (Ecologia del delitto), and as Phil sets about concealing the box of gold in a barn, the barrel of a rifle is shown in the fog outside an open window, framed in such a way as to recall the mise-en-scène of Kurt's unexpected murder in La frusta e il corpo. As Ted (Antonio Salines) is tormenting Ray (Lou Castel), there is a subjective shot of Ray that evokes the thirsty man's delirium by executing an inexplicable 360° clockwise rotation (as in the reveal of the undead Prince Vajda in La maschera del demonio). As the tormenting continues, the maniacal Ted delights in multiplying his victim's anguish by peering at him through a faceted crystal ball ornament—and the camera shows us the fractured image that Ted sees (Mio figlio Nerone, Il rosso segno della follia). Later, a sense of impending danger is imparted by the strumming of a harp's strings (Sei donne per l'assassino), which we see being sounded by the rifle barrel; when the sound is investigated, the strings appear to have been plucked by a loose curtain rod blown to and fro by the wind (an analogy to the whipping sounds in La frusta e il corpo that turn out to be the sound of a loose vine lashing at a window pane). As the gang's tensions reach a boiling point, the cinematography indulges not only in 360° camera spins (Il tacchino prepotente, La maschera del demonio, Diabolik), but continuous, even accelerated spinning as the camera cranes up to spin—gratuitously—at the level of the rooftops. Even Ray's use of the boomerang carries Bava-like associations harkening back to the knife-throwing in I coltelli del vendicatore, and one of the fundamental themes of Bava's work (the futility of human greed) is restated with ultimate irony in the closing shot of the gang strewn dead around the main street as the ass ambles away with the fortune in gold.

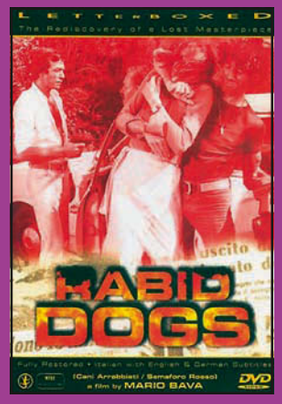


In short, though I feel convinced that Bava was somehow significantly involved in the creation of this film, I was not able to obtain confirmation from Cesare Canevari before this book went to press. But now that the question has been asked, perhaps someday the answer will be known.

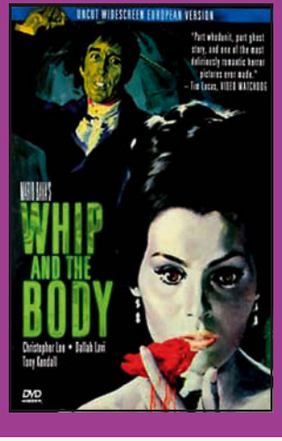


MARIO BAVA
Maestro of the Macabre

EVC
KILL!
BABY
KILL!



COLLECTION MARIO BAVA
LES 5 VISAGES DE LA PEUR
MICHÈLE MERCIER - BORIS KARLOFF - MARK DAMON
VIP VIDEOCASSETTE



CAMERON MITCHELL
EVA BARTON
BLUTIGE SEIDE
THOMAS REINER · LEA KRÜGER
MARY ARDEN · HEIDI STROH · CLAUDE DANTES
REGIE: MARIO BAVA
e·m·s

BEFORE YOU KNOW IT,
THE HONEYMOON'S
OVER.
HATCHET FOR THE HONEYMOON
DIRECTED BY MARIO BAVA MEDIA HORROR

COLLECTION MARIO BAVA
HERCULE CONTRE LES VAMPIRES
Christopher Lee
VIP VIDEOCASSETTE

Les Mille et Une Nuits
COLLECTION MARIO BAVA
VIP

LETTERBOXED
The Rediscovery of a Lost Masterpiece
RABID DOGS
(Cani Arrabbiati / Semaforo Rosso)
a film by MARIO BAVA
DVD

RAROT WIDESCREEN EUROPEAN VERSION
"Part whodunit, part ghost story, and one of the most deliciously romantic horror pictures ever made."
– Tim Lucas, VIDEO WATCHDOG
MARIO BAVA'S
WHIP AND THE BODY
Christopher Lee • Daliah Lavi
Tony Kendall
DVD

Mario Bava Videography

The following is an accounting of Mario Bava's availability on all the different home viewing formats (DVD, VHS, Beta, LaserDisc, even CED Disc and Super 8 mm film), compiled with the assistance of Marc Morris. It is undoubtedly incomplete, particularly where recent releases and the endless "public domain" tape issues of Hercules are concerned, but it is as thorough as we could make it. Many of these titles are obviously no longer in print.

5 Bambole per la luna d'agosto

Australia: Five Dolls for an August Moon, Goldseal (VHS)
Australia: Five Dolls for an August Moon, Sundowner (VHS)
Australia: Five Dolls, Vogue Video (VHS)
Denmark: Five Dolls for an August Moon, Filmlab (VHS)
France: L'Ile d'Epouvante, Vip International (VHS, 1982)
France: L'Ile d'Epouvante, Mad Movies/One Plus One (DVD R2, 1.85:1/16:9 with extras)
Italy: 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, PAC (VHS)
Italy: 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, Center Video (VHS)
Spain: 5 Muñecas para la Luna de Agosto, EV (VHS)
Sweden: 5 dockor i augustimänen, Trix Video (VHS, English with Swedish subtitles)
Switzerland: 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, Star Video (VHS)
UK: Five Dolls for an August Moon, Redemption Video (VHS)
US: 5 Dolls for an August Moon, Image Entertainment (VHS, 1.85:1)
US: 5 Dolls for an August Moon, Image Entertainment (DVD R1, 1.85:1, English/French/Italian soundtracks, liner notes by Tim Lucas, extras)

Agi Murad il diavolo bianco

US: The White Warrior, VCI Home Video (VHS)
US: The White Warrior, VCI Home Video (DVD R0)
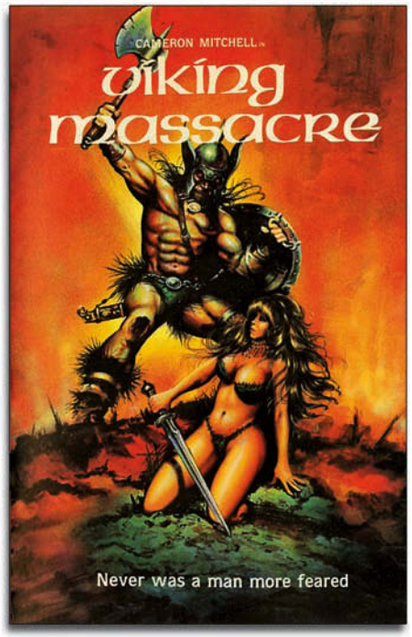
Note: A very strange composite of widescreen and stretched standard screen elements, but worthwhile as the only source to see Bava's widescreen compositions.



Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova

Italy: Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova, Ripley's Home Video (DVD R2, 1.35:1, extras: Italian/French audio options, French/Italian trailers, restored scene, 24-page booklet).

Baron Blood

Australia: Baron Blood, Roadshow Video (VHS)
Denmark: Baron Blood, Irish Video (VHS, English continental version with Danish subtitles)
France: Baron Blood—Le Chambre de la Mort, PolyGram Video (VHS)
France: Baron Vampire, VIP (VHS)
France: Baron Vampire, Mad Movies/One Plus One (DVD R2, 1.33:1 with extras)
French Canada: Baron Vampire, label unknown (VHS)
Germany: Baron Blood, E-M-S/Anolis Entertainment (DVD R2, 1.85:1, extras: Elke Sommer interview, "Il castello dell'oriore" documentary [imported from Italian Raro/Nocturno release] featuring Lamberto Bava, Alberto Pezzotta, Stefano Della Casa, and others, trailers, stills, liner notes, German/Italian subtitles, German/English audio)
Greece: Baron Blood, label unknown (VHS)
Holland: Baron Blood, Paradiso (DVD R2, same as US Image Entertainment release with Dutch subtitles)
Italy: Gli orrori del castello di Norimberga, Lamberto Forni Video (VHS, widescreen)
Italy: Gli orrori del castello di Norimberga, Raro Video/Nocturno (DVD, 1.85:1/16:9, extras: "Il castello dell'oriore" documentary with Lamberto Bava, Alberto Pezzotta, Stefano Della Casa and others, trailers, Italian/English audio, subtitles)
Japan: Baron Blood, Toshiba Video (VHS, English continental version with Japanese subtitles)
Sweden: Baron Blood, Videoklubben (VHS, English continental version with Swedish subtitles)
UK: Baron Blood, Guild Home Video #GH131 (VHS, AIP version)
UK: Baron Blood, Redemption Video (VHS) Note: Continental version.
US: The Torture Chamber of Baron Blood, Thorn EMI HBO Video #TVC3762 (VHS and Beta) Note: AIP version.
US: The Torture Chamber of Baron Blood, HBO Video (VHS) Note: AIP version.
US: The Torture Chamber of Baron Blood, Orion Home Video (LaserDisc with co-feature Circus of Horrors) Note: AIP version.

US: Baron Blood, Elite Entertainment/Video Treasures (VHS, 1.85:1) Note: Continental version.
US: Baron Blood, Elite Entertainment (LaserDisc, 1.85:1, extras, with co-feature Lisa and the Devil) Note: Continental version.
US: Baron Blood, Image Entertainment (DVD R1, 1.85:1, with trailer, liner notes by Tim Lucas) Note: Continental version.

La battaglia di Maratona

France: La Battaille de Marathon, Vip International (VHS, cropped to 1.85:1)
US: The Giant of Marathon, Sinister Cinema (VHS and Beta, 1.85:1 composite of the French image track and the English soundtrack of a cropped print)
US: The Giant of Marathon, Alpha Video (DVD, same as Sinister Cinema VHS)

Black Sabbath

US: Black Sabbath, Orion/Image Entertainment (LaserDisc, AIP version with Black Sunday as co-feature)

Black Sunday

US: Black Sunday, Orion/Image Entertainment (LaserDisc, AIP version with Black Sabbath as co-feature)

Buonanotte... avvocato!

US: Surf Film (VHS, Italian)

Cani arrabbiati

Germany: Rabid Dogs, Lucertola Media (DVD, 1.66:1, Italian with removable English and German subtitles, biographies, poster and stills galleries) Note: Includes reconstructed main title sequence exclusive to this release.
Germany: Wild Dogs, Astro Video (DVD R2) Note: Unauthorized bootleg release.
Germany: Wild Dogs, Marketing Video (DVD R2) Note: According to Alfredo Leone, this is an unauthorized release.
US: Rabid Dogs, Jef Films (DVD R1) Note: Identical to Lucertola Media release, this is reportedly an unauthorized issue.
US: Rabid Dogs/Kidnapped, Anchor Bay Entertainment (DVD R1, 1.78:1/16:9, contains 1997 and 2002 versions of film, Tim Lucas commentary, "End of the Road" featurette with producer Alfredo Leone, other extras)

I coltelli del vendicatore

Canada: Viking Massacre, Pan-Canadian Video Presentations (VHS)
Finland: The Knives of the Avenger, Alfa (VHS)
France: Duel au Coteau, Vip International (VHS)
Germany: Eine Handvoll blanker Messer, Spectrum Video (VHS)
Germany: Rurik der Huene, "Rurik the Great," Arcade Video (VHS)
Germany: Rurik—Mein ist die Rache, "Rurik—Vengeance is Mine," Tyrus Film Video (VHS)
Germany: Rurik der Huene—Eine Handvoll blanker Messer, United Video (VHS)
Germany: Eine Handvoll blanker Messer, E-M-S/Anolis Entertainment (DVD R2 with extras: English, German and Italian audio options, US trailer, German main title, poster gallery, issued in two different slip-covers)
Greece: Knives of the Avenger, label unknown (VHS, English with Greek subtitles)
US: Viking Massacre, Mega Video (VHS)
US: Bladestorm, label unknown (VHS)
US: Knives of the Avenger, Image Entertainment (VHS, 2.35:1)
US: Knives of the Avenger, Image Entertainment (DVD R0, 2.35:1/16:9, liner notes by Tim Lucas, trailer, extras)
US: The Mario Bava Collection Volume 1, Anchor Bay Entertainment (DVD R1 box set, 2.35:1/16:9, with trailers)

The Devil's Commandment

US: The Devil's Commandment, Sinister Cinema (VHS) Note: The source of several knock-off video releases of this re-edited, augmented US version of the classic I vampiri. The 2.35:1 anamorphic source materials are only partly decompressed to a ratio of 1.85:1.
US: The Devil's Commandment, Something Weird Video (VHS)

Diabolik

France: Fatal Mission, American Video (VHS)
Greece: 12 Ekoikheh tou Ehatepman, H Video (VHS, 1.75:1)
US: Danger: Diabolik, Paramount/Gateway (VHS, EP mode)
US: Danger: Diabolik, Paramount Home Video (LaserDisc, widescreen)
US: Danger: Diabolik, Paramount Home Video (DVD R1, with audio commentary by John Phillip Law and Tim Lucas; "From Fumetti to Film" featurette with Stephen R. Bissette, Roman Coppola, Dino De Laurentiis, Ennio Morricone and others; The Beastie Boys' "Body Movin'" rock video with audio commentary by Adam Yauch; more)

Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs

Greece: title unknown, Home Video Hellas (VHS, AIP version in English with Greek subtitles)
US: Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs, Orion Home Video #6617 (VHS, also available in EP)

Ecologia del delitto

Denmark: Bay of Blood, WM Video (VHS, English with Danish subtitles)
France: La Baie Sanglante, American Video (VHS)
France: La Baie Sanglante, Hollywood Video (VHS)
France: La Baie Sanglante, Fil à Film (VHS)
France: La Baie Sanglante, Mad Movies/One Plus One (DVD R2, 1.85:1 with extras)
France: La Baie Sanglante, TFI Video (DVD, 1.85:1)
Germany: Im Blutrausch des Teufels, Divisori (VHS)
Germany: Im Blutrausch des Teufels, Hunter Video (VHS)
Germany: Im Blutrausch des Teufels, Universal Video (VHS, banned photo cover)
Germany: Im Blutrausch des Teufels, Mondial Video (VHS)
Germany: Im Blutrausch des Teufels, Mondial Video (LaserDisc)
Germany: Bay of Blood, label unknown (DVD R2) Note: We have gathered conflicting information on this release, which we've heard is either a bootleg release or a legitimate but anonymous release by a German company called MIB. Neither report could be confirmed.
Germany: Im Blautrausch des Satans, XT (DVD R2 limited edition of 1000 copies with extras, 1.85:1/16:9, trailer, radio spots, slide show)
Germany: Twitch of the Death Nerve, Astro Records & Filmworks (DVD R2) Note: In Germany, the Astro and XT DVDs were officially released as "foreign" discs, because the earlier German VHS release was banned for glorification of violence.
Greece: Bay of Blood, Cronos (VHS)
Holland: Bay of Blood, Paradiso (DVD R2, same as US Image Entertainment release with Dutch subtitles)
Italy: Reazione a catena, Cvr/Gvr (VHS)
Italy: Reazione a catena, General Video (VHS)
Italy: Reazione a catena, Raro Video/Nocturno/Horror Club (DVD R2, 1.85:1 anamorphic with extras: documentary with Lamberto Bava, Dardano Sacchetti, Alberto Pezzotta and others, poster galleries)
Japan: Bay of Blood, Toho Video (Japan, English with Japanese subtitles)

Spain: Bahia de Sangre, Exclusivas 79 (VHS)
UK: Blood Bath, Hokushin Audio Visual #VM75 (VHS and Beta, "Video Nasty")
UK: Twitch of the Death Nerve, Redemption Video (VHS)
US: Bay of Blood, MPI/Gorgon Video (VHS and Beta)
US: Twitch of the Death Nerve, MPI/Gorgon Video #MF3061 (VHS and Beta, repackaged)
US: Bay of Blood, Simitar Entertainment #7654 (DVD R1, 1.66:1) Note: While the sound quality of this unauthorized release is quite acceptable, the picture quality is wretched.
US: Twitch of the Death Nerve, Image Entertainment (VHS, 1.85:1, trailer). Note: Substandard audio quality.
US: Twitch of the Death Nerve, Image Entertainment (DVD R1, 1.85:1/16:9, liner notes by Tim Lucas, trailer, extras). Note: This disc offers the same transfer as the Image VHS. The audio is gratingly defective.

L'elisir d'amore

US: Bel Canto Society, Inc. (VHS)

Ercole al centro della terra

France: Hercule contre les Vampires, Vip International (VHS, 1982)
France: Hercule contre les Vampires, PolyGram Video (VHS)
Germany: Vampire gegen Herakles, Monte Video (VHS)
Germany: Vampire gegen Herakles, Juenger Video (VHS)
Germany: Vampire gegen Herakles, Astro Video (VHS)
Greece: Hercules in the Center of the Earth, Zodiac (VHS)
Italy: Ercole al centro della terra, Ricordi (VHS)
UK: Hercules in the Centre of the Earth, Skyline Video #CLO 009 (VHS)
US: Hercules in the Haunted World, Rhino Video #RNVD1415 (VHS) Note: This is the only home video release of the re-edited, re-scored Woolner Bros. edition, but the image is badly cropped and the color badly faded.
US: Hercules in the Haunted World, Fantoma (DVD R1, Italian version with alternate English track and other extras, liner notes by Tim Lucas) Note: Despite the title given to this release, it includes the Hercules in the Center of the Earth export cut rather than the re-edited, re-scored Woolner Bros. release with Filmation animated titles shown in US theaters. This otherwise outstanding release is lacking the pre-credits sequence with Christopher Lee found on the British Skyline Video VHS release.

Ercole e la regina di Lidia

Germany: Herkules im Reich der Amazonen, "Hercules in the Empire of the Amazons," Concorde (DVD R2, German/French/English audio, 2.35:1/16:9 with co-feature Le fatiche di Ercole) Note: The only letterboxed presentation in English currently available, which lamentably offers only the shortened 1970s reissue cut.
Japan: Ercole e la regina di Lidia, Nippon Columbia (VHS)
UK: Hercules Unchained, Intervision #A-A 0393 (VHS, Beta)
US: Hercules Unchained, Magnetic Home Video (VHS, Beta)
US: Hercules Unchained, Embassy Video #2074 (VHS, Beta)
US: Hercules Unchained, Vid America #7144 (VHS, Beta)
US: Hercules Unchained, Image Entertainment #ID7296VA (LaserDisc)
US: Hercules Unchained, Gemstone Entertainment (DVD)

Ester e il re

France: Esther et le Roi, Initial Distribution Vide (VHS)
US: Esther and the King, Continental Home Video (VHS and Beta, 1989)
US: Esther and the King, 20th Century Fox Home Entertainment (VHS)
US: Esther and the King, Diamond Entertainment (DVD R0, 1.33:1)

La fatiche di Ercole

France: Les Travaux de Hercule, G.C.T.H.V. (DVD, 2.35:1/16:9, with French, Italian and English soundtracks, extras)
Germany: Die unglaublichen Abenteuer des Herkules, Toppic (VHS)
Germany: Die unglaublichen Abenteuer des Herkules, Concorde (DVD R2, German/French/English audio, 2.35:1/16:9). Note: A two-disc set also including Ercole e la regina di Lidia/Hercules Unchained, also letterboxed. Both films reflect the shorter running time of the 1970s double-bill.
Japan: La fatiche di Ercole, Pioneer LDC (DVD, 2.35:1)
UK: Hercules, Intervision #A-A 0389 (VHS and Beta)
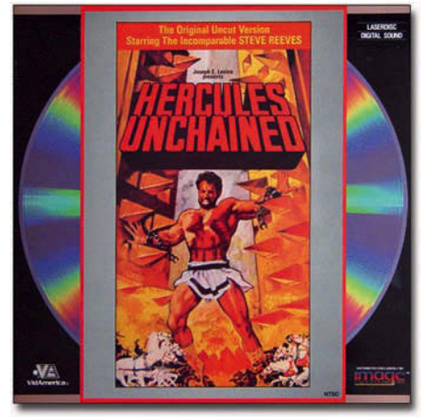
US: Hercules, Embassy Video #2073 (VHS and Beta, original English dub)
US: Hercules, VidAmerica #7143 (VHS and Beta, Levine produced dub)
US: Hercules, Image Entertainment #ID7295VA (LaserDisc, 2.35:1; a new composite of the Levine credits and the original English dub)
US: Hercules, Sterling Entertainment (DVD, original English dub)

Follie per l'opera

US: Bel Canto Society, Inc. (VHS, Italian with subtitles)



Four Times That Night

Denmark: Four Times That Night, Dana Sound (VHS, English with Danish subtitles)
Italy: Quattro volte... quella notte, Fonit Cetra (VHS)
Sweden: Vad hände den natten, Videoklubben (VHS, English with Swedish subtitles)
UK: Four Times That Night, Pagan Films (VHS, English dubbed version) Note: The only official release of the English dubbed version.
US: Quattro volte... quella notte, International Cassandra Video (VHS, widescreen in Italian only)
US: Four Times That Night, Image Entertainment (VHS, 1.85:1, in Italian with English subtitles)
US: Four Times That Night, Image Entertainment (DVD R1, 1.85:1/16:9, in Italian with removable English subtitles, liner notes by Tim Lucas) Note: Though an English dub track exists for the film, which has been released elsewhere in the world, producer Alfredo Leone opted to withhold it from the US release, feeling that the track's poor quality would sour its reception by the viewing public.

La frusta e il corpo

France: Le Corps & le Fouet, Alpi Video Diffusion (VHS)
France: Le Corps & le Fouet, PolyGram Video (VHS)
France: Reves Macabres, Columbus (VHS)
Germany: Der Dämon und die Jungfrau, SK (Sauerland Kunststoffe, VHS). Note: This version had two ratings on the cover ("16" and "18"), but the "FSK 16" sign should be correct. This release is cut, even missing the film's opening credits.
Germany: Der Dämon und die Jungfrau, E-M-S/Anolis Entertainment (DVD R2, 1.85:1/16:9 with extras: audio commentary by Tim Lucas [in English], English and German audio options, trailers, liner notes by Tim Lucas in German, German VHS main titles, US What main titles)
Holland: The Whip and the Flesh, EVC (VHS and Beta, original English language export version, widescreen)
Japan: The Whip and the Body, Toshiba VTS-F269V (VHS, Beta, 1.75:1, English with Japanese subtitles)
Mexico: Allucinacíon, Mexicinema Video Corporation (VHS)
US: What!, Sinister Cinema (VHS)
US: The Whip and the Body, VCI Home Video (VHS, 1.85:1)
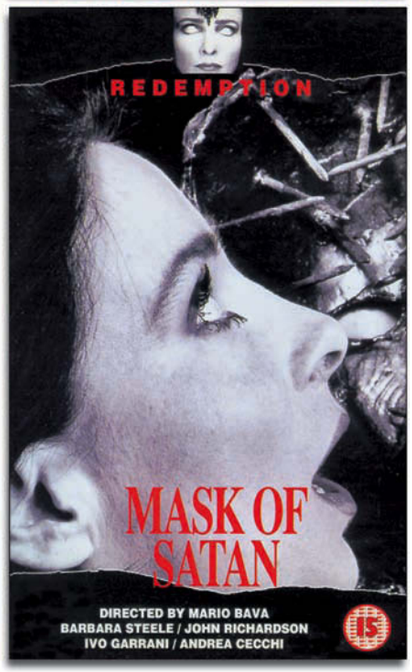
US: The Whip and the Body, VCI Home Video (DVD R0, 1.85:1, with audio commentary by Tim Lucas, liner notes by Jay Fenton, trailers and other extras)
US: The Whip and the Body, Movie Ventures/Miracle Pictures (DVD R0, 1.85:1, DTS sound option)



Graziella

US: Mastro Entertainment Corporation (VHS, Italian)

Guardie e ladri

Italy: Guardie e ladri, Video Movie #DVT06 (DVD)

The House of Exorcism

Australia: The House of Exorcism, Seven Keys (VHS)
Australia: The House of Exorcism, Showcase Video (VHS)
Denmark: House of Exorcism, Irish Video (VHS, English with Danish subtitles)
France: La Maison de l'Exorcisme, Vip International (VHS, 1987)
France: La Maison de l'Exorcisme, PolyGram Video (VHS)
France: La Maison de l'Exorcisme, Collection Ciné-Club (DVD R2)
Germany: Der Teuflische, "The Devilish One," Geiselgasteig (VHS) Note: Standard ratio, cropped and cut Germany: Der Teuflische—Das Haus des Exorzisten, "The Devilish one—The House of the Exorcist," SVC (VHS) Note: Letterboxed and reportedly a different cut to the Geiselgasteig release.
Holland: The House of Exorcism, Paradiso (DVD R2, same as US Image Entertainment release, with Dutch subtitles)
Japan: House of Exorcism, Funai Video (VHS, English with Japanese subtitles)
Spain: La Casa del Esorcismo, Cydis Video (VHS)
Sweden: House of Exorcism, Europafilm (VHS, English with Swedish subtitles)
UK: House of Exorcism, Video Tape Centre #VTC1021 (VHS)
US: House of Exorcism, MPI Video #CG2050 (VHS and Beta)
US: The Devil in the House of Exorcism, MPI/Gorgon Video (VHS)
US: House of Exorcism, Image Entertainment (VHS, 1.85:1, trailer)
US: Lisa and the Devil/House of Exorcism, Image Entertainment (DVD R1, 1.85:1/16:9, audio commentary by Alfredo Leone and Elke Sommer, liner notes by Tim Lucas, trailer and extras)

Inferno

Germany: Horror Infernal, CBS/Fox (VHS)
Germany: Horror Infernal, CBS/Fox (LaserDisc)
UK: Inferno, CBS/Fox #1140-50 (VHS and Beta)
UK: Inferno, CBS/Fox (LaserDisc, stereo)
UK: Inferno, Fox #1140-50 (VHS, stereo)
US: Inferno, Key Video #1140 (VHS and Beta, stereo)
US: Inferno, Anchor Bay Entertainment (VHS, 1.85:1, trailer and extras, stereo)
US: Inferno, Anchor Bay Entertainment (DVD R1, 1.85:1/16:9, stereo surround, interview with Dario Argento, trailer, extras)

Gli invasori

France: La Ruée des Vikings, Vip International (VHS)
France: La Ruée des Vikings, Polygram (VHS)
Germany: Das Königsmal/Iron–Rächer des Nordens, Dynamic Video (VHS)
Germany: Die Rache der Wikinger, Starlight Video (VHS)
Germany: Die Rache der Wikinger, Ascot Elite/Colosseo (DVD R2 PAL, 2.35:1, English, Italian and German audio, German trailer, essential Mario Bava Speaks documentary)
Greece: Erik the Conqueror (VHS, uncompressed anamorphic picture)
Spain: La Furia de los Vikingos, Civsa (VHS)
UK: Erik the Conqueror, Hotline (VHS and Beta, AIP version)
UK: Viking Invaders, Inter-Ocean #IOV 070 (VHS and Beta, Italian cut in English, widescreen)
US: Erik the Conqueror, Sinister Cinema (VHS and Beta, AIP version)
US: The Invaders, Panther Entertainment (VHS, Italian cut in English)
US: Erik the Conqueror, Anchor Bay Entertainment (DVD R1, 2.35:1/16:9, announced for 2007 release)

Il ladro di Bagdad

France: Le Voleur de Bagdad, VIP Diffusion (VHS). Note: The only letterboxed release known, but—as with all VIP and Video Club French VHS releases of the early 1980s, the widescreen framing has been cropped from 2.35:1 to something closer to 1.85:1.
US: The Thief of Baghdad, Embassy Video (VHS, Beta)
US: The Thief of Baghdad, Embassy Video (LaserDisc)

Lisa and the Devil

Denmark: Lisa and the Devil, Breien Film (VHS, English with Danish subtitles)
France: Lisa et le Diable, Mad Movies/One Plus One (DVD R2, 1.85:1 with extras: Revivez la maison de l'exorcisme interview/documentary featuring Lamberto Bava, Roberto Natale and Alberto Pezzotta, poster galleries for Lisa and the Devil and House of Exorcism, and Domino Cass Crad by David Morlet.)
Greece: Lisa and the Devil, Liberty Video (VHS, English with Greek subtitles)
Spain: El Diablo se Lleva los Muertos, Video España (VHS, alternate Spanish cut)
Spain: El Diablo se Lleva los Muertos, Dream Time (VHS, alternate Spanish cut)
Sweden: Lisa and the Devil, Videoklubben (VHS, English language version with Swedish subtitles)
UK: Lisa and the Devil, Guild Video #GH260 (VHS, announced but not released)
UK: Lisa and the Devil, Redemption Video (VHS, 1.85:1)
US: Lisa and the Devil, Elite Entertainment/Video Treasures (VHS, 1.85:1, liner notes by Alfredo Leone)
US: Lisa and the Devil, Elite Entertainment (LaserDisc, 1.85:1, extras, with co-feature Baron Blood)
US: Lisa and the Devil, Image Entertainment (DVD R1, 1.85:1)
US: Lisa and the Devil/House of Exorcism, Image Entertainment (DVD R1, 1.85:1, audio commentary by Alfredo Leone and Elke Sommer, liner notes by Tim Lucas, trailer and extras)

Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre

US: Image Entertainment (DVD R1 with extras, 1.85:1/16:9, trailers)

La maschera del demonio

France: Le Masque du Démon, RCA/Fantastic Video (VHS)
France: Le Masque du Démon, RCA/Fil à Film (VHS)
France: Le Masque du Démon, Mad Movies/One Plus One (DVD with extras)
Germany: Die Stunde Wenn Dracula Kommt, Atlas (16 mm)
Germany: Die Stunde Wenn Dracula Kommt, E-M-S/Anolis Entertainment (DVD R2 with restored scene, audio commentary by Tim Lucas [in English], trailers, interviews, and comic book)
Holland: Black Sunday, Paradiso (DVD R2, same as US Image Entertainment release, with Dutch subtitles, no audio commentary)
Italy: La maschera del demonio, Shendene e Moizzi (VHS)
Italy: La maschera del demonio, Ripley's Home Video (DVD R2, 1.66:1/16:9 anamorphic 2-disc set with extras: photo gallery, bios, Italian and English trailers, bonus documentary Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre, Barbara Steele interview, and more)
Note: This is the only DVD release of this title to date which includes the "lost" scene between Prince Vajda and Katia described in the La maschera del demonio chapter.

Japan: The Mask of Satan, Toshiba
(VHS, English with Japanese subtitles)
Portugal: Black Sunday—A Mascara de Sata, label unknown
(DVD R0, 1.66:1 with trailers)
Spain: La Muchacha que Sabia Demasiado, Videotecnics (VHS)
UK: Black Sunday, Videomedia/Vampix #HVM 1026 (VHS, Beta)
UK: Black Sunday, SC Video Ltd. (VHS, 1986)
UK: Revenge of the Vampire, Derann (Super 8 mm)
UK: The Mask of Satan, Redemption Video (VHS, 1.66:1)
US: Black Sunday, Image Entertainment #ID4948AO
(VHS, 1.66:1 with trailer)
US: Black Sunday, Image Entertainment #ID5942AODVD
(DVD R1, 1.66:1, with liner notes and audio commentary by Tim Lucas, trailers and extras)
Note: The menu screen of this disc is introduced with a sound byte from one of AIP's radio spots, featuring narrator Paul Frees ("The sound you hear is dripping blood! This is the sound of Black Sunday!").
US: The Mario Bava Collection Volume 1,
Anchor Bay Entertainment
(DVD R1, includes both the Mask of Satan and Black Sunday versions, with Tim Lucas commentary and extras from Image Entertainment disc)

Le meraviglie di Aladino
France: Les Mille et une Nuits, Vip International (VHS, 1.85:1)
France: Les Mille et une Nuits, Video Club (VHS, 1.85:1)
Germany: Aladins Wunderlampe, Beverly Video Tape (VHS)
Germany: Aladins Abenteuer, Best Entertainment (DVD R2)
US: The Wonders of Aladdin, Embassy Video (VHS and Beta)
US: The Wonders of Aladdin, Charter Entertainment (VHS)

Minnesota Clay
Japan: Minnesota Clay, Imagica
(DVD R2, widescreen, interview with Piero Piccioni, original US trailer, and alternate American main and end titles)

Mio figlio Nerone
Greece: O Yioç pio o Nerone, Key Video
(VHS, Italian with Greek subtitles)

Morgan il pirato
US: Morgan the Pirate, Embassy Video (VHS and Beta)
US: Morgan the Pirate, Embassy Video
(LaserDisc, same as VHS and Beta)

La morte viene dallo spazio
France: La Morte Vient de l'Espace. Virgin Video
Note: 79m in SECAM; 83m at 24 f.p.s., 5m longer than the US releases
US: The Day the Sky Exploded, Sinister Cinema
(VHS and Beta)
US: The Day the Sky Exploded, Alpha Video (DVD)

Moses (Feature Version)
Germany: Moses, Scotia-UFA-ATB
(Super 8 mm, three reels)
UK: Moses, Channel 5 (VHS)
UK: Moses, CBS Fox Home Video (LaserDisc, two discs)
US: Moses, CBS Fox Home Video (VHS and Beta)
US: Moses, Selectovision (CED Disc, two discs)
US: Moses, LIVE Entertainment #69917 (VHS)

Moses the Lawgiver (Miniseries)
France: Moise, le Dix Commandements, Paramount (DVD)
UK: Moses the Lawgiver, Cannon Video (VHS)

Natale all' campo 119
US: Parade Films (VHS, Italian)

Nude... si muore
US: Schoolgirl Killer, Air Video/Ariel International Releasing
(VHS and Beta, cropped and cut TV print)
Italy: Sieben Jungfrauen für den Teufel, X-Rated Kult
(DVD R2 with German or Italian audio options, English subtitles, original German language B&W version, German trailer, alternate scene)
US: Naked You Die, Dark Sky Films
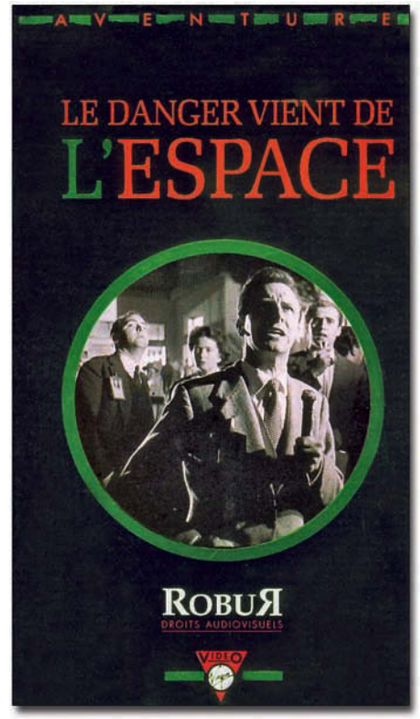
(DVD R1, 2.35:1/16:9 with extras)



Odissea
Germany: Die Odysee, Ascot Elite Home Entertainment GmbH (DVD 3-disc set, 1.33:1, German and Italian audio, with 70m documentary Die Phantastische Reise des Odysseus.
Italy: Odissea, label unknown (VHS, 3 PAL cassettes).
Italy: Odissea, Multimedia San Paolo Srl/20th Century Fox Home Entertainment (distributor) #DV03
(DVD R2, 2-disc set)
Italy: Odissea, Elleu Multimedia
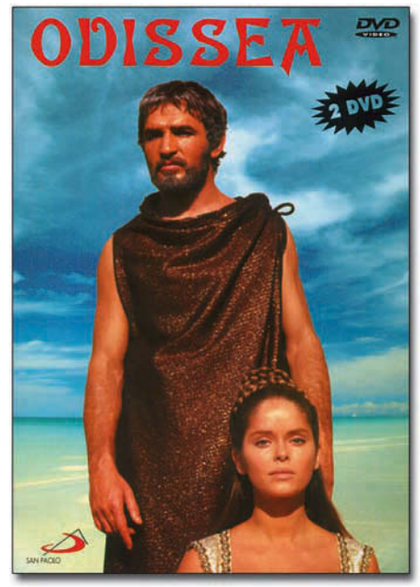
(DVD R2 2-disc set, 1.33:1, extras)



Operazione paura
Australia: Kill Baby Kill, Stomp Visual
(DVD R2, 1.85:1/16:9 with trailer)
Note: The source print used for this release was licensed from Alfredo Leone's International Media and is the same version Image Entertainment declined to release in America owing to substandard quality. The picture quality is darker, coarser, and with occasionally unstable framing, but it is the only authorized English language DVD with correct 1.85:1 framing.
France: Opération Peur, Warner Vision/Neo Publishing
(DVD R2, 1.85:1/16:9, interview with Lamberto Bava by Daniel Gouyette, trailers, filmographies, biographies)
Germany: Die Toten Augen des Dr. Dracula (Part 1, No. 252), Dr. Dracula—Eine Bestie schlägt zu (Part 2, No. 253), UFA ATB (8 mm, one reel each)
Germany: Die Toten Augen, Award Video (VHS)
Germany: Die Toten Augen des Dr. Dracula,
Anolis Entertainment (VHS)
Germany: Die Toten Augen des Dr. Dracula, E-M-S/Anolis Entertainment (DVD R2, 1.66:1, widescreen, extras)
Germany: The Curse of the Living Dead, label unknown
(DVD R2)
Holland: Kill, Baby... Kill!, European Video Corp.
(VHS, 1.66:1, English with Dutch subtitles)
Italy: Operazione paura, Torino (VHS)
US: Kill, Baby... Kill!, VCI Home Entertainment (VHS)
US: Kill, Baby... Kill!, VCI Home Entertainment (DVD R0)
US: Kill, Baby... Kill!, Diamond Entertainment (DVD R0)
US: Blood Bath, Brentwood Entertainment
(DVD R0 2-disc set, contains Kill, Baby... Kill!)
US: Mario Bava's Kill Baby Kill, Dark Sky Films
(DVD R1, 1.85:1/16:9, Tim Lucas commentary, Kill Bava Kill featurette of Lamberto Bava revisiting filming locations—withdrawn)
US: 10 Tales of Terror, Brentwood Entertainment
(DVD R0 5-disc set, contains Kill, Baby... Kill!)
US: The Mario Bava Collection Volume 1, Anchor Bay Entertainment
(DVD R1 box set, 1.85:1/16:9 with trailer)

Orlando e i paladini di Francia
Germany: Roland der Eroberer, USA (VHS), Sailing (VHS)
US: Roland the Mighty, Sinister Cinema (VHS)

I pagliacci (amore tragico)
US: Bel Canto Society, Inc. (VHS, Italian with subtitles)

Il pistolero segnato da Dio
Italy: Il pistolero segnato da Dio, UVI (VHS)

La ragazza che sapeva troppo

France: La Fille qui en Savait Trop, Vip International (VHS)
France: La Fille qui en Savait Trop, Mad Movies/One Plus One (DVD R2, 1.66:1 with extras)
France: La Fille qui en Savait Trop, Collection Ciné-Club (DVD R2)
Italy: La ragazza che sapeva troppo, Fonit Centra (VHS)
US: Evil Eye, Sinister Cinema (VHS and Beta, AIP version)
US: The Girl Who Knew Too Much, Image Entertainment #ID5949AO (VHS, 1.66:1, Italian with English subtitles, trailer)
US: The Girl Who Knew Too Much, Image Entertainment #ID5943AODVD (DVD R1, 1.66:1/16:9, liner notes by Tim Lucas, trailer, extras)
US: The Mario Bava Collection Volume 1, Anchor Bay Entertainment (DVD R1 box set, 1.78:1/16:9, includes the Girl Who Knew Too Much and Evil Eye versions of the film, Tim Lucas commentary, other extras)

Ringo del Nebraska

Germany: Nebraska Jim, UFA Video (VHS)
Spain: Nebraska il Pistolero, Divisa Ediciones (VHS)

Il rosso segno della follia

Finland: Hatchet for a Honeymoon, United Film (VHS, English with Finnish subtitles)
France: Une Hache pour le Lune de Miel, PolyGram Video (VHS)
France: La Baie Sanglante 2, Delta Video Diffusion (VHS)
France: Une Hache pour le Lune de Miel, Mad Movies/One Plus One (DVD R2, 1.33:1 with extras)
Germany: Red Wedding, Media Entertainment (VHS)
Germany: Hatchet for the Honeymoon, Koch Media (DVD R2)
Japan: Hatchet for the Honeymoon, Toei (VHS)
Spain: Una Hacha para la Luna de Miel, Galan Video (VHS)
Sweden: Hatchet for the Honeymoon, Video Invest (VHS)
UK: Hatchet for the Honeymoon, Anchor Bay UK Entertainment (DVD R2, 1.85:1/16:9 anamorphic with extras: trailer, photo gallery, and bonus documentary Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre)
US: Hatchet for the Honeymoon, Media Home Entertainment (VHS, Beta)
US: Hatchet for the Honeymoon, Charter Entertainment (VHS)
US: Hatchet for the Honeymoon, Image Entertainment (VHS, composite print using parts of 35 mm and 16 mm prints, below average)
US: Hatchet for the Honeymoon, Image Entertainment (DVD R1, with liner notes by Tim Lucas, extras, otherwise same as Image Entertainment VHS)
US: Hatchet for the Honeymoon, Madacy Entertainment (DVD R0, double-bill with Anatomy of a Psycho)

Roy Colt e Winchester Jack

US: Roy Colt & Winchester Jack, Image Entertainment (DVD R1, 2.35:1/16:9, liner notes by Tim Lucas)

Schock

Australia: Beyond the Door II, K&C Video (VHS)
Australia: Beyond the Door II, Syme Video (VHS)
France: Cauchemar, MPM Video (VHS)
France: Shock, MPM Video (VHS)
Italy: Schock, Mondadori Video (VHS)
Italy: Schock Transfert-Suspence-Hypnos, Medusa Video (DVD R2, 1.85:1/16:9)
Japan: Shock, Toshiba Video (VHS and Beta, English language with Japanese subtitles)
Japan: Shock, Culture Publishers (VHS, English language with Japanese subtitles)
Japan: Shock, Culture Publishers (DVD R2, English language with Japanese subtitles)
Spain: Shock, Record Vision (VHS)
UK: Shock, Videomedia / Vampix HVM 1019 (VHS, Beta)
UK: Shock, Stablecane Home Video (VHS, 1985)
UK: Beyond the Door II, Hollywood Video (DVD R2)
US: Beyond the Door II, Media Home Entertainment #M251 (VHS, Beta)
US: Shock, Anchor Bay Entertainment (VHS, 1.85:1, trailer and extras)
US: Shock, Anchor Bay Entertainment (DVD R1, 1.85:1/16:9, English and Italian tracks, Lamberto Bava interview, trailers and extras)
US: Drive-In Now Showing Possession & Shock, Anchor Bay Entertainment (same as previous listing, but includes Andrzej Zulawski's Possesion on flip side)

Sei donne per l'assassino

Note: All known VHS copies of this film are cut.
France: 6 Femmes pour l'Assassin, Fil-à-Film (VHS, widescreen)
France: 6 Femmes pour l'Assassin, Miroir l'étrange (VHS, widescreen)
France: Atelier de la Mort, label unknown (VHS, with Blood and Black Lace opening credits)
France: 6 Femmes pour l'Assassin, PolyGram Video #PY 772 (LaserDisc with extra Bava trailers)
French Canada: L'Atelier de la Mort, Propulsion (VHS)
Germany: Blutige Seide, Edition Hände Weg!/Buio Omega (VHS)
Germany: Blutige Seide, Anolis/Edition Hände Weg!/Buio Omega (DVD R2 with special red velvet cover, introduction by Thomas Reiner, audio commentary (in German) by Christian Kessler and Robert Zion, extras, hidden Easter egg [in filmography area] with Bava trailers)
Note: This extraordinary release, the best currently available in English, was sourced from a censored German Technicolor 35 mm print in otherwise breathtaking condition. The censored material (moments of violence) were digitally reinserted, making use of VCI's materials as obtained from the Australian "superstation" SBS. The Bava filmography includes a number of highlighted titles which, when clicked, reveal hidden anamorphic trailers for such titles as Orlando i la paladini di Francia and I vampiri, which contains actual footage of the guillotine prologue not included in the film's final cut.
Greece: Blood and Black Lace, Cronos (VHS)
Italy: Sei donne per l'assassino, Shendene e Moizzi (VHS, 1.66:1)
Italy: Sei donne per l'assassino, Nocturno (DVD R2)
Japan: Six Women for the Murdere, Toshiba (VHS and Beta, 1.66:1; English with Japanese subtitles, cut) Note: The title given here is not the title as it appears on the videocassette packaging, but rather the title as it appears onscreen. The last letter of the last word is not cropped offscreen, but was evidently left off by a careless titles worker.
Japan: Six Women for the Murdere, Toshiba (LaserDisc, same as Toshiba VHS)
Japan: Six Women for the Murderer, Pioneer Entertainment/ New Line Entertainment (DVD, uncut)
Spain: Six Women for the Murdere, Euro (VHS, widescreen, Spanish dub of Italian export print, cut)
Spain: Seis Mujeres para un Asesino, Star's Hunter (VHS)
UK: Blood and Black Lace, Iver Film Services Ltd. (VHS and Beta, widescreen)
UK: Blood and Black Lace, Nouveaux Pictures (VHS, widescreen)
US: Blood and Black Lace, Media Home Entertainment #M715 (VHS, Beta)
US: Blood and Black Lace, The Roan Group (LaserDisc, liner notes by Tim Lucas)
US: Blood and Black Lace, VCI Home Video (VHS, 1.66:1)
US: Blood and Black Lace, VCI Home Video

(DVD R0, 1.66:1, with liner notes and audio commentary by Tim Lucas, Cameron Mitchell interview by David Del Valle, Mary Dawne Arden interview, trailers and extras)
US: Blood and Black Lace, VCI Home Video
(DVD R0, 1.78:1/16:9, two-disc deluxe edition with liner notes and audio commentary by Tim Lucas, Cameron Mitchell interview by David Del Valle, Mary Dawne Arden interview, trailers and extras)

Le sfida dei giganti

US: Hercules the Avenger, BCI Eclipse (VHS)
Note: A terrible copy of a black-and-white print, recorded at the EP or six-hour mode.
US: Hercules the Avenger, Retromedia Entertainment (DVD, 2.35:1/16:9) Note: A superb presentation, double-billed with Hercules and the Black Pirate, the English-dubbed version of Sansone contro il corsaro nero (1964).

Le spie vengono dal semifreddo

Italy: Le spie vengono dal semifreddo, 01 Distribution
(DVD R2, 16.9 anamorphic, Italian 5.1 and 2.0 audio options, trailer)
Italy: Le spie vengono dal semifreddo, 01 Distribution
(DVD R2, 16:9 anamorphic with English subtitles, Italian 2.0 audio only, trailer)

La strada per Fort Alamo

Italy: La strada per Fort Alamo, Shendene e Moizzi
(VHS, cut: 65m)

Terrore nello spazio

Australia: Planet of the Vampires, Video Box Office (VHS)
France: Space Mutants, Collection Frissons/Initial Distribution (VHS)
France: Terror dans l'Espace, PolyGram Video (VHS)
France: Le Terreur vient de l'Espace, Virgin (VHS)
France: La Planete des Vampires, Canal + Video
(DVD R2, 1.85:1/16:9, with interviews with Jean-François Rauger and Jean Pierre Jackson; complete, withdrawn)
Germany: Planet der Vampire, Piccolo
(8 mm, one reel condensation)
Germany: Planet der Vampire, Legend-Universum Film
(DVD R2, 1.85:1/16:9 anamorphic with extras: complete version, English and German audio options, German and US trailers, German 8 mm home movie condensed version)
Greece: Planet of the Vampires, Home Video Hellas (VHS)
Italy: Terrore nello spazio, Domo Video (VHS, widescreen)
Italy: Terrore nello spazio, 01 Distribution (DVD R2, 1.85:1/16:9 anamorphic, complete version with trailer)
Japan: Planet of the Vampires, RCA Columbia Pictures International (VHS and Beta, AIP version, Japanese subtitles)
Spain: Terror en el Espacio, Video Copy (VHS)
UK: Planet of the Vampires, RCA Columbia Pictures International CVT 10723 (VHS and Beta, AIP version)
US: Planet of the Vampires, Thorn EMI HBO Video (VHS and Beta, Kendall Schmidt score)
US: Planet of the Vampires, HBO Video #3671
(VHS, Kendall Schmidt score)
US: Planet of the Vampires, MGM Home Entertainment
(VHS, Kendall Schmidt score)
US: Planet of the Vampires, HBO/Image Entertainment
(LaserDisc with Kendall Schmidt score, with co-feature Queen of Blood)
US: Planet of the Vampires, MGM Home Entertainment
(DVD R1, 1.85:1, Gino Marinuzzi Jr. score restored). Note: An incomplete version, lacking the aftermath of Wess' demise, but also a unique reconstruction of the film involving an overall re-edit and new sound work. See Glenn Erickson's article "Restoring Mario Bava's Planet of the Vampires" in Video Watchdog #76 (October 2001, pp. 36-39 for more details.)

I tre volti della paura

France: Les Trois Visages de la Peur, Vip France (VHS, 1983)
France: Les Trois Visages de la Peur, Iris Television (VHS)
France: Les Trois Visages de la Peur, Proserpine (VHS)
France: Les Trois Visages de la Peur, Mad Movies/One Plus One (DVD R2, 1.85:1/16:9, Italian with French subtitles, with extras)
Germany: Die 3 Gesichter der Furcht, Arena Video, Juenger Video, Astro Video, Edition Haende weg! (VHS).
Note: Arena, Juenger and Astro feature the US running order of the three re-edited episodes, while the Edition Haende weg! release is the only complete version with correct running order and the original ending with Karloff on his horse available on VHS in Germany.
Germany: Die Drei Gesichter der Furcht, E-M-S/Anolis Entertainment (DVD R2, includes Mario Bava, Maestro of the Macabre)
Greece: Black Sabbath, Astro Klassiker (VHS)
Holland: Black Sabbath, Paradiso
(DVD R2, same as US Image Entertainment release, with Dutch subtitles)
Italy: I tre volti della paura, Fonit Cetra (VHS)
Japan: I tre volti della paura, Nikkatsu (VHS)
Spain: Las Tres Caras del Miedo, Videotecnics (VHS)
Sweden: Black Sabbath, US Videomovies (VHS, AIP version)
UK: Black Sabbath, Inter-Ocean Video #IOV 030
(VHS and Beta, widescreen, AIP version)
US: Black Sabbath, Thorn EMI HBO Video
(VHS and Beta, AIP version)
US: Black Sabbath, HBO Video (VHS, AIP version)
US: Black Sabbath, Image Entertainment
(VHS, 1.85:1/16:9, Italian version with English subtitles, with trailer)
US: Black Sabbath, Image Entertainment
(DVD R1, 1.85:1/16:9—Italian cut with removable English subtitles, liner notes by Tim Lucas, trailer, extras)
US: The Mario Bava Collection Volume 1, Anchor Bay Entertainment (DVD R1 box set, 1.78:1/16:9, contains both the Three Faces of Fear and Black Sabbath versions, Tim Lucas commentary, other extras)

L'ultimo dei vichinghi

Denmark: Vikinger Angriber, "Furious Vikings," Næstved Video Distribution (VHS, 1.66:1)
US: The Last of the Vikings, Sinister Cinema (VHS)

I vampiri

Belgium: I Vampiri/The Devil's Commandment
(DVD R2, 2.35:1/16:9, Italian language, Dutch subtitles) Note: Despite the two film titles noted on the packaging, the Devil's Commandment version is not included on this disc.
US: The Devil's Commandment, Sinister Cinema
(VHS, 2.01:1, American version)
US: I vampiri, Image Entertainment
(VHS, 2.35:1, Italian with English subtitles)
US: I vampiri, Image Entertainment
(DVD, 2.35:1/16:9, Italian with removable English subtitles, liner notes by Tim Lucas, extras)

Thanks to the following for their help in compiling this videography: Ian Adams (Australia), Christian Becker (Spain), Francis Brewster (UK), Roberto Curti (Italy), Alwin Dewaele (Belgium/France), Kenneth Eriksen (Denmark), Johan Karlson (Sweden), Keiji (Japan), Stefan Novak (Germany), and Aris Poulopoulos (Greece).

ORIGINAL SOUNDTRACK
Also contains "HATCHET FOR THE HONEYMOON"
Mario Bava's
Black Sabbath
(I TRE VOLTI DELLA PAURA)
Musica di Roberto Nicolosi

Mario Bava Discography

5 bambole per la luna d'agosto (1970)

Italy: 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto. Piero Umiliani. Cinevox Records #MDF 33/45. Stereo 12" LP, 1970.

Tracks: 1. 5 bambole, 2. Luna d'Agosto, 3. Danza Primitiva, 4. Danza Jazz Moon, 5. Danza Citar Free, 6. Notte di Luna, 7. Fantoccio Grottesco, 8. Luna D'Agosto 1971, 9. Bambola Omicida, 10. Interludio Azzuro, 11. Interludio Giallo, 12. 5 bambole Rosa, 13. 5 bambole Azzure, 14. Luna di Pieno Agosto.

This superb recording was released in an extremely limited edition pressing.

Italy: Sirio 2222. Il Balletto di Bronzo. RCA Records. Stereo 12" LP, 1970.

This progressive rock album was the source of the song "Ti risveglierai con me" heard at the film's finale. Not written by Piero Umiliani, the song was written by Gianni Leone and performed by the group's lineup: Marco Cecioni (guitar/vocals), Miky Cupaiolo (bass), Gianchi Stinga (drums). Lino Aiello (guitar). The film's end credits also mention the use of another song from this album, "Neve calda," but it is heard nowhere in the release cut. The album was most recently issued on CD by Phantom Records, but is currently out of print.

Japan: 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto. Piero Umiliani. SLC Incorporated #SLCS-7135. Stereo CD, 1996. Length: 48:54.

Tracks: 1. 5 bambole (3:33), 2. Luna d'Agosto (2:36), 3. Danza Primitiva (2:45), 4. Danza Jazz Moon (2:25), 5. Danza Citar Free (1:35), 6. 5 Bambole per la Luna d'Agosto M6 (2:06), 7. M18 (1:44), 8. M22 (2:53), 9. M5 (1:30), 10. Notte di Luna (2:42), 11. Fantoccio Grottesco (1:00), 12. Luna D'Agosto 1971 (organo solo, 2:34), 13. M17 (1:07), 14. M42 (1:05), 15. Bambola Omicida (2:19), 16. Interludio Azzuro (1:40), 17. Interludio Giallo (1:30), 18. 5 bambole Rosa (organo e ritmi, 2:25), 19. M39 (0:58), 20. Luna di Pieno Agosto (versione coro, 2:26), 21. 5 bambole Azzure (versione cembalo, 3:55), 22. Titoli coda (harpsichord versione, 3:09).

A remixed presentation with eight additional tracks.

Italy: 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto. Piero Umiliani. Cinevox #MDF 33/33. Stereo CD, 1997.

Tracks: Same as SLC Incorporated #SLCS-7135.

Italy: 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto. Piero Umiliani. Cinevox #CINV-343. Stereo CD, 2001. Length: 57:19.

Tracks: 1. Cinque Bambole (Vers. Coro, 3:32), 2. Luna D'Agosto (2:36), 3. Danza Primitiva (2:45), 4. Danza Jazz Moon (2:26), 5. Danza Citar Free (1:36), 6. Notte Di Luna (2:41), 7. Fantoccio Grottesco (1:00), 8. Luna D'Agosto 1971 (Organo Solo, 2:34), 9. Bambola Omicida (2:18), 10. Interludio Azzurro (2:35), 11. Interludio Giallo (1:32), 12. Cinque Bambole Rosa (Organo E Ritmi, 2:23), 13. Cinque Bambole Azzurre (Vers. Cembalo, 03:53), 14. Luna Di Pieno Agosto (2:24), 15. Cinque Bambole Azzurre (Original Main Title, 3:59), 16. Luna D'Agosto (3:03), 17. Cinque Bambole (1:43), 18. Cinque Bambole Rosa (2:53), 19. Luna D'Agosto 1971 (3:50), 20. Cinque Bambole (3:21), 21. Bambola Omicida (1:58), 22. Cinque Bambole (Original End Title, 3:09).

A remastered version of Cinevox's soundtrack album with some retitled and replacement tracks. The definitive release to date.

Baron Blood (1972)

US: See Black Sunday.

Italy: Mario Bava Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume III: Ecologia del delitto / Gli orrore del castello di Norimberga / Cani Arrabbiati. Stelvio Cipriani. Digitmovies #CDDM046. Stereo CD, 2006. Length: 65:28 (Disc 1), 57:33 (Disc 2).

Disc 1 Tracks: 1–21 See Ecologia del delitto.

Disc 1 Tracks: 22–31 See Cani arrabbiati.

Disc 2 Tracks: 1. Gli orrore del castello di Norimberga (Titoli, 4:23), 2. Notturno (1:00), 3. Esplorando il castello (4:00), 4. Il Barone appare e morte del dottore (3:46), 5. Sadico omicidio (2:27), 6. Nella cattedrale (organo solo, 1:06), 7. Ipnosi (organo solo, 1:35), 8. Inseguita (3:55), 9. Eva e Peter (tema d'amore, 2:32), 10. Il Barone e fuga di Eva (4:30), 11. Magica nera (6:19), 12. La bambina e il castello (celesta solo, 1:20), 13. Visitando Mr. Becker (2:04), 14. Macabro maniero (1:56), 15. Gli orrore del castello di Norimberga (suite finale, 11:14), 16. Gli orrore del castello di Norimberga (Titoli di coda, 2:06), 17. Gli orrore del castello di Norimberga (Titoli—take 1 mix senza piano, 2:38).

Black Sunday (1961)

US: Jewels of the Sea. Les Baxter. Capitol Records #T1537. Stereo 12" LP, 1961.

Subtitled "Titillating Orchestrations for Listening and Loving," this album contains 12 tracks of Baxter's trademark exotica music. According to the sleeve notes, "The song 'Jewels of the Sea' was composed originally by Les Baxter as 'Katia's Theme' for the American International picture Black Sunday." This title track is the last cue on Side 2.

US: Black Sabbath. Les Baxter. Bax Records #LB-1000. Monaural 12" LP, c. early 1980s.

Tracks: The Drop of Water (8:50), The Telephone (6:15), The Wurdalak (18:45).

Despite its title, track listings and packaging, this limited edition soundtrack—issued by Tony Thomas Productions (Box 1662, Burbank CA 91507) in association with Bax Music—contains excerpts from Baxter's score for Black Sunday.

US: Mario Bava's Black Sunday. Les Baxter. Bay Cities #CD 3034. Monaural CD, 1992. Length: 59:38.

Tracks: Suite—Black Sunday (33:59), Suite—Baron Blood (25:34).

Disc producers Bruce Kimmel and Alain Silver re-edited the material previously released on the Bax Records Black Sabbath album into a new suite, properly labelled for the first time. Still monaural, but supplemented with a very nice stereo suite of Baxter's previously unreleased music for Baron Blood. CD booklet contains liner notes by Barbara Steele and Tim Lucas.

US: Black Sunday and Baron Blood. Les Baxter. Citadel Records #77110. Monaural CD, 1998. Length: 59:26.

Tracks: 1. Black Sunday (33:54), 2. Baron Blood (25:32).

A reissue of the Bay Cities release with improved sound and slightly different running times for the two tracks.

Caltiki il mostro immortale (1959)

Italy: Mario Bava Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume IV: I vampiri / Caltiki il mostro immortale / Lisa and the Devil. Roberto Nicolosi. Conducted by Carlo Savina. Digitmovies #CDDMO58. Monaural CD, 2006. Length: 46:12 (Disc 1), 44:54 (Disc 2).

Disc 1 Tracks: 1-18 See I vampiri.

Disc 1 Bonus Track: See Lisa and the Devil.

Disc 2 Tracks: 1. Prologo e titoli (2:42), 2. Fuga dal terrore (1:15), 3. Il superstite & Esplorazione delle rovine Maya (2:29), 4. Danza Tam Tam (3:40), 5. Discesa & Esplorazione subacquea (2:14), 6. Seconda immersione & Attacco del mostro (1:44), 7. Caltiki emerge dalle acque & Fuga (1:37), 8. Ultime notizie & Ritorno a casa (2:27), 9. Mutazione cellulare (2:29), 10. Analisi della "cosa" & Aggressione (2:12), 11. Forza oscura (3:41), 12. Il mostro immortale (4:02), 13. Metamorfosi di Caltiki (2:44), 14. Invasione (2:15), 15. Distruzione (2:20), 16. Fuga dalla casa (2:20), 17. L'assedio (2:13), 18. Distruzione di Caltiki (Finale, 1:46).

Cani arrabbiati (1975)

Italy: Mario Bava Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume III: Ecologia del delitto / Gli orrore del castello di Norimberga / Cani Arrabbiati. Stelvio Cipriani. Digitmovies #CDDM046. Stereo CD, 2006. Length: 65:28 (Disc 1), 57:33 (Disc 2).

Disc 1 Tracks: 1–21 See Ecologia del delitto.

Disc 1 Tracks: 22. Cani arrabbiati (Titoli, 2:10), 23. Rapina e fuga (4:08), 24. Radio bossa (1:27), 25. Autostrada (3:09), 26. Fuga nel campo di grano (3:15), 27. Ripresa del viaggio (2:23), 28. Fine di un incubo (3:45), 29. Cani arrabbiati (finale, 2:11), 30. Fuga nel campo di grano (versione alternativa, 2:24), 31. Fine di un incubo (versione alternativa, 3:34).

Disc 2 Tracks: 1–17 See Baron Blood.

Diabolik (1968)

Italy: "Deep Down" b/w "Amore Amore Amore". Christy. Parade Records #PRC 5052. Monaural 45 rpm 7" single, 1968.

One side of this single contains an Italian-language performance of the title song "Deep Down" (sung by Christy). The other side contains an unrelated track from Piero Piccioni's score for the film Un italiano in America.

Italy: Danger: Diabolik. Ennio Morricone. Pallottola Foro #OTHR-1968. Monaural CD, 2001.

This bootleg recording claims to be from Italy, but its use of the American title is a clue to the contrary. Consists of various cues and dialogue lifted from the American VHS release.

Italy: Diabolik / Danger: Diabolik. Ennio Morricone. Sycodelic #SYCO:0011. Stereo/Monaural CD, 2001.

Also a bootleg recording and unlikely to have truly originated from Italy, as labelled. Despite titles that misspell character names, this is the most listenable of the various Diabolik bootlegs, as it upgrades the movie-lifted cues (which were here taken from Paramount Home Video's LaserDisc release) and adds the Parade single (in Italian and taken from a rare Japanese Morricone anthology CD), the English language variant and another Christy/Morricone cue from O.K. Connery, also starring Adolfo Celi. Mystery track 34 is apparently an original composition by the disc producer; it is not heard in Diabolik and has no relationship to the film itself.

Tracks: 1. Deep Down (in English, 03:09), 2. Yes Sir, No Sir (dialogue, 0:23) 3. Charading Chaffeurs in Wait (0:59), 4. Driving Decoys (2:08), 5. Into the Cave (2:53), 6. Diabolik's Hide-out (1:52), 7. The Shower/Deep Down Two (1:25), 8. Logical Suggestion (dialogue, 0:25), 9. Money Orgy (2:09), 10. Criminal/Justice Solution (dialogue, 0:44), 11. Headlines/Organ Freakout 1 (0:33), 12. Valmont's Go-Go Pad (03:38), 13. Dumped by Dimockracy (dialogue, 0:41), 14. Eva's Holy Dress/Deep Down Three (01:33), 15. Diabolik Capture/Conference (dialogue, 0:33), 16. Gunfight at Red Sands (1:33), 17. Eva's Sketchy I.D. (dialogue, 0:59), 18. Metamorphosis/Organ Freakout 2 (0:33), 19. Emerald Bikini/Deep Down 4 (1:28), 20. Doctor Vinear's I.D. Prescription (dialogue, 1:11), 21. Downhill Decoy (0:30), 22. Vinear's X-Out Session/Death/Life (dialogue, 2:51), 23. Jenko's Plan Derails (00:33), 24. Guiness's Gold Bar (dialogue, 0:40), 25. Bubbles/Extracting Au from H20 (1:22), 26. Underwater Wah-Wah (2:51), 27. Now Go!!! (0:41), 28. Eva Alone (dialogue, 0:09), 29. The Pyrite Wink/Deep Down 5 (1:57), 30. Last Laff (0:28), 31. Deep Down (Parade 5052, in Italian, 3:03), 32. O.K. Connery (Parade 5035, 03:03), 33. Valmont (Underworld Don) Philosophises (0:38), 34. Untitled (3:04).

La donna più bella del mondo (1955)

France: Gina Lollobrigida Chante. Vogue Records #EPL-7201. Monaural 7" EP, 1956.

Tracks: 1. D'art et d'amour, 2. Ideale, 3. Nocturne pour orchestre, 4. A la Française, 5. L'Espagnole, 6. Pourquois ne pas m'aimer?

Six cues from the Robert Z. Leonard film, some—but not all—featuring vocals by Lollobrigida. The earliest Bava-related soundtrack, and extremely rare.

Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs (1966)

US: Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs. Various Artists. Tower Records #T-5053. Monaural/Stereo 12" LP, 1966.

This album bears only the slightest resemblance to an actual soundtrack recording. It contains none of the original music found in Bava's La spie vengono dal semifreddo, and only two songs heard in the AIP version. Most of this album is teen-oriented filler, recorded by anonymous studio musicians under the aegis of producers Mike Curb and Bob Summers.

Tracks: 1. Dr. Goldfoot & The Girl Bombs (The Sloopys) 2. Dr. Goldfoot's Igloo (The Mad Doctors) 3. Try My World, Little Girl (Terry Stafford) 4. The Mad Mad Doctor (The Mad Doctors) 5. They Just Don't Make 'Em Like Her Anymore (Bobby Lite) 6. Hidin' from Myself (Paul & The Pack) 7. The Golden Bomb (The Mad Doctors) 8. This I Say (The Candles) 9. The Golden Price (Mad Doctors) 10. Dr. Goldfoot & The Girl Bombs (The Mad Doctors).

Ecologia del delitto (1971)

Italy: "Evelyn Theme" b/w "Mamy Blue". Stelvio Cipriani. CAM Records #CAM-P95. Monaural 45 rpm 7" single, 1971.

Though the sleeve prominently mentions Ecologia del delitto as the source of "Evelyn Theme" (2:31)—"Mamy Blue" (3:35) is apparently unrelated—there is no character named Evelyn in the film. However, there was another Italian horror film released in 1971 entitled La notte che Evelyn uscì dalla tomba, directed by Emiglio Miraglia. This coincidence raises two questions: Was Cipriani's Ecologia score originally written for the Miraglia film but rejected in favor of another by Bruno Nicolai (the credited composer)? Was the Miraglia film perhaps scored with library tracks, and credited Nicolai as the composer of the majority of the cues used? Or is this, in fact, a cue written exclusively for Ecologia del delitto that just happened to be given an arbitrarily chosen title unsanctioned by the composer, à la "The Winsor Concerto"?

Italy: Mario Bava Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume III: Ecologia del delitto / Gli orrore del castello di Norimberga / Cani Arrabbiati. Stelvio Cipriani. Digitmovies #CDDM046. Stereo CD, 2006. Length: 65:28 (Disc 1), 57:33 (Disc 2).

Disc 1 Tracks: 1. Ecologia del delitto (Titoli, 2:03), 2. Evelyn theme (2:18), 3. Due amanti (2:28), 4. Spiato (1:15), 5. Giovani e liberi (2:13), 6. Tribal shake (1:39), 7. Passeggiata al lago (1:51), 8. Shake giradischi (1:50), 9. Slow giradischi (1:00), 10. Un cadavere nel lago (1:29), 11. Inseguimento e uccisione (0:58), 12. Evelyn Theme (1:33), 13. Guidando nella notte (1:04), 14. Ritrovamento dei cadaveri (0:51), 15. Piano diabolico (0:53), 16. Decapitata (2:12), 17. Solitudine di Simone (2:14), 18. Ultimo atto (1:39), 19. Teenagers cha cha cha (2:00), 20. Evelyn Theme (versione alternativa, 2:32), 21. Teenagers cha cha cha (final versione alternativa, 1:42).

Disc 1 Tracks: 22–31 See Cani arrabbiati.

Disc 2 Tracks: See Baron Blood.

Ercole al centro della terra (1961)

Italy: Mario Bava Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume V: Ercole al centro della terra. Armando Trovajoli. Digitmovies #CDDMO72. Monaural CD, 2006. Length: 64:49.

Tracks: 1. Preludio (2:09), 2. Titoli (3:09), 3. Apparizione Di Ercole (1:47), 4. Agguato & Battaglia (1:40), 5. Nel Regno Di Lyco (1:53), 6. Deianira Prigioniera Di Lyco (1:28), 7. Pazzia Di Deianira (2:48), 8. L'Oracolo (2:01), 9. Lotta Di Ercole & Salpando Verso L'Ade (3:22), 10. Risveglio Nell'Ade (1:44), 11. La Mela D'Oro (2:56), 12. Stratagemma Di Ercole & Il Mostro Di Pietra (2:47), 13. Tortura & Distruzione Del Mostro (1:37), 14. Ombre Dell'Ade (1:00), 15. Precipizio Di Fiamme (1:33), 16. Vento Infernale (2:13), 17. Appesi Al Vuoto (3:43), 18. Anima Perduta (2:36), 19. In Mare & Tempesta (2:05), 20. Arrivo Ad Ecalia (1:28), 21. Ercole E Deianira (Tema D'Amore, 2:02), 22. Oscuro Presagio & Uccisione Di Elettra (2:01), 23. Il Potere Maligno Di Lyco (2:12), 24. Deianira Contro Lyco & Amore Di Persefone (1:45), 25. Risveglio Dei Morti Viventi (5:27), 26. Ercole Contro Lyco (1:37), 27. Ercole Contro I Morti Viventi & Il Ritorno (3:03), 28. L'Amore Trionfa (Finale, 1:15), Bonus Track: 29. Ercole Al Centro Della Terra (Intervallo Film, 0:19).

Ercole e la regina di Lidia (1959)

Italy: Ercole e la regina di Lidia. Enzo Masetti. CAM #VSD 5310. Stereo 12" LP, 1958. Length: 37:00.

Tracks: 1. L'avventura comincia (2:13), 2. Titoli (2:24), 3. Anteo, figlio di Gea (3:30), 4. La culla (1:06), 5. In navigazione per la Lidia (1:59), 6. Balletto (2:56), 7. Laerte sulla biga (1:07), 8. Orfeo e il coro dei Marinai (1:48), 9. Nella grotta (1:53), 10. Con te per l'eternità (2:05), 11. Aspettando il levar del sole (1:05), 12. A corte (2:47), 13. La regina di Lidia (1:30), 14. Tempesta (3:07), 15. La furia di Ercole (0:57), 16. Eteocle e polinice duellano (2:38), 17. I cavalieri tebani irrompono (1:23), 18. Finale (2:32).

This soundtrack contains some recycled cues from Le fatiche di Ercole, appearing under new names.

US: "Evening Star". June Valli. Cetra Records. Monaural 45 rpm 7" single, 1960.

The song sung by Jole (Sylva Koscina) as heard in the English-dubbed Warner Bros. release, Hercules Unchained.

Italy: Ercole e la regina di Lidia. Enzo Masetti. Phoenix Records PHCAM-07. Stereo 12" LP, 1986.

Limited edition of 1000 copies. Identical to CAM #VSD 5310, but possibly the first stereo release of this music.

Unknown: Hercules and Hercules Unchained. Soundtrack Library #47. Stereo CD two-disc set, c. late 1990s. Length: 45:12 (Disc 1), 42:00 (Disc 2).

Disc 1 Tracks: See Le fatiche di Ercole.

Disc 2 Tracks: 1. Untitled (11:24), 2. Untitled (11:54), 3. Untitled (9:53), 4. Untitled (8:46).

Italy: The Italian Peplum Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume I: Le fatiche di Ercole / Ercole e la regina di Lidia. Enzo Masetti. Conducted by Carlo Savina. Digitmovies #CDDMO57. Monaural CD, 2006. Length: 73:51 (Disc 1), 53:51 (Disc 2).

Disc 1 Tracks: See Le fatiche di Ercole.

Disc 2 Tracks: 1. L'avventura comincia (2:14), 2. Con te per l'eternità (Titoli, 2:24), 3. Nostalgia (0:46), 4. Anteo, figlio di Gea (2:25), 5. Ercole e Polinice nella grotta (1:05), 6. Le porte dell'Averno (0:44), 7. Dopo il combattimento con la tigre (0:25), 8. La culla (1:03), 9. Il bosco magico (1:07), 10. Ulisse minacciato nel sonno (0:38), 11. In navigazione per la Lidia (2:00), 12. Balletto (film version, 2:56), 13. Entrata delle ancelle (0:58), 14. Laerte sulla biga (1:08), 15. Nella grotta (1:54), 16. In visita alla regina (1:07), 17. Oscuro segreto (0:42), 18. Aspettando il levar del sole (1:06), 19. Chiusura delle porte di Tebe (1:07), 20. A corte (2:47), 21. La regina di Lidia (1:32), 22. Fuga verso la Liberta' (1:31), 23. Rotta verso casa & Tebe assediata (1:08), 24. La furia di Ercole (0:59), 25. La sfida (0:35), 26. Eteocle e Polinice duellano (3:39), 27. I cavalieri tebani irrompono (1:23), 28. Conclusione della battaglia (0:34), 29. Finale (2:33).

Disc 2 Bonus Tracks: 30. Balletto (senza coro, 2:56), 31. Con te per l'eternità (Titoli—mix no choir, 2:26), 32. Balletto (demo, 2:55), 33. Finale (senza coro, 1:45).

Evil Eye (1963)

US: "Karen's Theme" b/w "Julie's Theme". Les Baxter. Test pressing. Monaural 45 rpm 8" acetate, 1964.

This unique test pressing contains a track designated as "'Karen's Theme' from Evil Eye." (A curious discrepancy here: there is no one named Karen in the picture.) The other side features "'Julie's Theme' from Muscle Beach Party," Julie being a character played by Italian actress Luciana Paluzzi. Only one reference copy of this recording is known to exist; it was never released commercially.

Le fatiche di Ercole (1958)

US: Hercules. RCA Victor/Bluebird Records #LBY-1036. Monaural 12" LP, 1959.

Side 1 Tracks: Part 1.

Side 2 Tracks: Part 2.

A children's version of a soundtrack album, this "High Fidelity Sound" recording includes music, dialogue from English-dubbed version of film and narration by actor Conrad Nagel. Two different editions of the album were released, the first distinguished by a gatefold cover.

Italy: Le fatiche di Ercole. Phoenix Records PHCAM-01. Stereo 12" LP, 1984. Length: 41:45.

Tracks: 1. Titoli (1:54), 2. Racconto di Iole (2:24), 3. Il vello d'oro (1:15), 4. Atleti (1:53), 5. Iole dopo la vittoria nel disco (1:01), 6. Pelìa vendica la morte del figlio (1:27), 7. Funerale di Ifito (1:29), 8. Morte di Chisone (1:42), 9. Coro dei Marinai (1:45), 10. Uragano (3:05), 11. L'isola delle amazzoni (1:32), 12. Prigionieri delle amazzoni (1:00), 13. Inseguimento scherzoso (1:00), 14. Il laghetto (2:10), 15. Balletto (1:44), 16. Amore fra giasone e la regina (1:21), 17. Coro di amazzoni e canto di Orfeo (1:45), 18. Battaglia con gli uomini-mostro (1:02), 19. Navigazione e sbarco in colchide (1:29), 20. Ritorno alla nave (1:05), 21. Ritorno a Jolco (1:00), 22. Coro Marinai II (1:47), 23. Appare Ercole (1:05), 24. Pelìa prende la cicuta (1:07), 25. Uragano II (3:05), 26. Ercole distrugge il tempio e finale (1:38).

Limited edition pressing of 1000 numbered copies.

Unknown:

Hercules and Hercules Unchained. Soundtrack Library #47. Stereo CD two-disc set, c. late 1990s. Length: 45:12 (Disc 1), 42:00 (Disc 2).

Disc 1 Tracks: 1. Untitled (10:37), 2. Untitled (12:44), 3. Untitled (10:45), 4. Untitled (11:03).

Disc 2 Tracks: See Ercole e la regina di Lidia.

One might surmise that this bootleg two-disc set offers digital rip-offs of the two Phoenix Records soundtracks, but the running times do not stack up, nor do their running times. Also, the anonymous producers of this set chose to conglomerate the various cues into a smaller number of lengthy "suites."

Italy: The Italian Peplum Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume I: Le fatiche di Ercole / Ercole e la regina di Lidia. Enzo Masetti. Conducted by Carlo Savina. Digitmovies #CDDMO57. Monaural CD, 2006. Length: 73:51 (Disc 1), 53:51 (Disc 2).

Disc 1 Tracks: 1. Titoli (1:59), 2. Apparizione di Iole & Ercola salva Iole (1:52), 3. Racconto di Iole (2:26), 4. Il vello d'oro (1:17), 5. Al tramonto (1:17), 6. Ricordo della strage & Oscura presenza (2:03), 7. Atleti (2:00), 8. Sfida con l'arco (1:07), 9. Iole dopo la vittoria nel disco (1:04), 10. Massacrati dal leone e rabbia di Ercole (0:56), 11. Pelìa vendica la morte del figlio (1:27), 12. Funerale di Ifito (1:10), 13. Gli dei ascoltano Ercole (0:47), 14. Ercole entra nella grotta (0:43), 15. Morte di Chirone (1:45), 16. Verso Iolco (1:42), 17. Ercole e Iole (1:12), 18. Coro dei marinai (1:47), 19. Tristezza di Iole (1:00), 20. Prima dell'uragano (0:22), 21. Uragano (3:07), 22. L'isola delle amazzoni (1:37), 23. Prigionieri delle amazzoni (1:05), 24. Marcetta e alla corte delle amazzoni (1:56), 25. Giasone e la regina & Arrivo di Ercole (0:47), 26. Inseguimento scherzoso (1:03), 27. Il laghetto (film version, 2:12), 28. Messaggero di un segreto (0:29), 29. Balletto (1:46), 30. Amore fra Giasone e la regina (1:25), 31. Ercole recupera i suoi compagni (1:27), 32. Ritorno alla nave (1:06), 33. Coro di amazzoni & Orfeo e il coro di marinai (film version, 3:29), 34. Navigazione e sbarco in Colchide (1:29), 35. Battaglia con gli uomini-mostro (unused, 1:02), 36. Giasone e il vello d'oro (2:46), 37. Ritorno a Iolco (1:00), 38. Ercole inprigionato & Battaglia nel tempio (1:52), 39. Appare Ercole (1:05), 40. Pelìa prende la cicuta (1:09), 41. Ercole distrugge il tempio e finale (film version, 1:39).

Disc 1 Bonus Tracks: 42. Coro marinai (#2, 1:48), 43. Uragano (#2, 3:08), 44. Il laghetto (#2, 2:13), 45. Coro di amazzoni e canto di Orfeo (1:45), 46. Ercole distrugge il tempio e finale (#2, 1:39).

Disc 2 Tracks: See Ercole e la regina di Lidia.

La frusta e il corpo (1963)

Italy: "The Winsor Concerto, Parts 1 & 2". Carlo Rustichelli. CAM #CAM CA-2523. Monaural 45 rpm single, 1963.

This 7" single was pressed in a very limited edition with a picture sleeve depicting Daliah Lavi as Nevenka. It contains the film's main theme, here called "The Winsor Concerto," divided into two parts.

Italy: La frusta e il corpo. Carlo Rustichelli. CAM #CMS 30.132. Monaural 12" LP, 1963.

So rare I've never seen a copy, but a complete soundtrack album was assigned a catalogue number by CAM. It is possible that the album itself was cancelled for release. No track listing available.

Italy: Carlo Rustichelli, ritrato di un autore. Carlo Rustichelli. CAM #CAM 501636-2. Stereo CD, 2001. Length: 58:56.

A marvelous selection of the Maestro's best music, selected by the composer himself. Track 11 is the entire 8:41 "Winsor Concerto" suite, played in its entirety without fades. It was reissued at some point, an identical disc except for the omission of Track 19, "Where Is My Fortune?" from Dai nemici mi guardo io! (1968). Look for the complete version.

Italy: Mario Bava Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume II: La frusta e il corpo / Sei donne per l'assassino. Carlo Rustichelli. Digitmovies #CDDM041. Monaural/Stereo CD, 2005. Length: 61:07 (Disc 1, Monaural), 39:40 (Disc 2, Stereo).

Disc 1 Tracks: 1. Windsor Concerto (Titoli, 1:59), 2. Il ritorno di Kurt (0:47), 3. Windsor Concerto (piano solo, 1:20), 4. Un ospite sgradito (1:21), 5. Windsor Concerto (sulla spiagia, 3:12), 6. Nella notte e uccisione di Kurt (3:38), 7. Il cadavere di Kurt e un'antica vendetta (3:08), 8. La tomba di Kurt e angoscia di Nevenka (3:42), 9. Windsor Concerto (ricordo di Kurt, 2:17), 10. Apparizione di Kurt e incubo dello notte (3:48), 11. "Le impronte erano lì!" e nella cappella (1:52), 12. Diabolica presenza e Nevenka nella cripta (2:15), 13. Windsor Concerto (il fantasma di Kurt, 3:34), 14. Il cadavere di Comte Menliff (2:32), 15. Terrore nella notte (4:14), 16. Nevenka, sepolta viva e il fantasma di Kurt (3:26), 17. Apertura della bara di Kurt e una lama nel buio (2:08), 18. Windsor Concerto (l'ultimo incontro di Kurt e Nevenka, 2:49), 19. Windsor Concerto (finale, 1:54), 20. Windsor Concerto (versione alternativa, 1:35), 21. Windsor Concerto (versioni singolo—medley, 8:41).

Disc 2 Tracks: See Sei donne per l'assassino.

The title of Rustichelli's signature piece, spelled "The Winsor Concerto" on every previous release, is here spelled "The Windsor Concerto."

Inferno (1980)

Italy: "Inferno". Keith Emerson. Cinevox #MDF 130. Stereo 45 rpm 7" single, 1980.

Italy: Inferno. Keith Emerson. Cinevox #MDF 33/138. Stereo 12" LP, 1980.

Side 1 Tracks: 1. Inferno (Main Title Theme, 2:56), 2. Rose's Descent Into The Cellar (4:48), 3. Taxi Ride (Rome, 2:15), 4. The Library (0:57), 5. Sarah in the Library Vaults (1:17), 6. Bookbinder's Delight (1:11), 7. Rose Leaves The Apartment (3:30), 8. Rose Gets It (2:04).

Side 2 Tracks: 1. Elisa's Story (1:10), 2. A Cat Attic Attack (3:13), 3. Kazanian's Tarantella (3:34), 4. Mark's Discovery (1:23), 5. Mater Tenebrarum (2:38), 6. Inferno Finale (2:26), 7. Cigarettes, Ices, Etc. (2:49).

France: Inferno. Keith Emerson. Barclay Records #960027. Stereo 12" LP, 1980.

Tracks: Same as Cinevox #MDF 33/138.

Germany: Inferno. Keith Emerson. Ariola 202079.320, Stereo 12" LP, 1980.

Tracks: Same as Cinevox #MDF 33/138, but packaged in a gatefold cover.

UK: Inferno. Keith Emerson. Atlantic #K50753. Stereo 12" LP, 1980.

Tracks: Same as Cinevox #MDF 33/138.

Other vinyl editions also likely exist.

Italy: Inferno. Keith Emerson. Cinevox Record CD-CIA 5022. Stereo CD, 1989. Length: 36:11.

First compact disc release, consists of same 15 tracks as Cinevox #MDF 33/138.

Japan: Inferno. Keith Emerson. Jimco Records/Cinevox JICK 89035. Stereo CD, 1992.

Tracks: Same as Cinevox #MDF 33/138.

Italy: Inferno. Keith Emerson. Cinevox #MDF 306. Stereo CD, 1998. Length: 47:26.

"The Complete Original Motion Picture Soundtrack Recording."

Tracks: Same as Cinevox #MDF 33/138, but adds Track 16: Inferno (Outtakes suite, 10:13).

Il ladro di Bagdad (1961)

Italy: Il ladro di Bagdad. Carlo Rustichelli. Conducted by Carlo Savina. Phoenix/CAM #PHCAM 10. Stereo 12" LP, 1987.

Side 1 Tracks: Titoli/Main Titles (2:26), 2. Karim Spia nel Cortile/Karim Spies in the Courtyard (1:26), 3. Oznam Avanza/Oznam Advances (1:23), 4. Lo Specchio/The Mirror (1:23), 5. Gamal si Offre a Oznam/Gamal Offers Herself to Oznam (2:24), 6. Karim Fugge/Karim Escapes (1:37), 7. Gamal/Gamal (1:35), 8. Dopo il Raccanto di Karim/After Karim's Tale (1:23), 9. Le Guardie/The Guards (1:28), 10. Tra Quattro Mura/Within the Walls (1:06), 11. Avvertimenti/Warnings (1:05).

Side 2 Tracks: 1. L'avventura Ricomincia/The Adventure Begins Again (2:05), 2. Il Risveglio di Oznam/Oznam's Wake (1:03), 3. Miraggio/The Mirage (1:03), 4. Bivacco/The Bivouac (1:09), 5. Tra Gli Alberi/Among the Trees (1:50), 6. Tranello sulle Rocce/Trap on the Rocks (1:11), 7. Karim cade nel Trabocchetto/Karim Falls Into the Trap (1:04), 8. Il Colloquio/The Talk (1:02), 9. Danza/Dance (4:02), 10. Amina Attende Karim/Amina Waits for Karim (1:45), 11. L'Invito di Karim/Karim's Invitation (1:30), 12. Finale/End Titles (0:30).

This album, with liner notes by Carlo Piazza, was pressed in a "rigorously limited" edition of 1000 numbered copies. The track listings are offered bilingually on the album jacket.

Lisa and the Devil (1973)

Italy: Summer Dreams. Carlo Savina and his orchestra. CAM # CML 174. Stereo 12" LP. Length: 36:12.

This 14-track release in CAM's "Italian Music ibrary" contains the main theme from Lisa and the Devil, under the title "Theme For You" (Track 13).

Italy: Mario Bava Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume IV: I vampiri / Caltiki il mostro immortale / Lisa and the Devil. Carlo Savina. Digitmovies #CDDMO58. Monaural CD, 2006. Length: 46:12 (Disc 1), 44:54 (Disc 2).

Disc 1 Bonus Track: 19. To Mirna (Theme from Lisa and the Devil, Stereo, 2:34).

La maschera del demonio (1960)

Italy: Mario Bava Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume I: La maschera del demonio / La ragazza che sapeva troppo. Roberto Nicolosi. Conducted by Pierluigi Urbini. Digitmovies #CDDMO35, CD, 2005.

Tracks: 1. La leggenda di Asa (Prologo, 1:03), 2. La maschera del demonio (Titoli, 1:57), 3. Macabra sepoltura e apparizione di Katia (2:38), 4. La cripta di notte (1:05), 5. Resurrezione di Katia (1:32), 6. Resurrezione di Javutich (2:51), 7. La carozza nera (1:45), 8. Angoscia e passione (1:13), 9. Kruvajan, morto viviente (1:19), 10. Passaggio segreto (1:29), 11. Apparizione di Javutich (1:05), 12. Katia terrorizzata (1:33), 13. Katia prigioniera di Javutich (1:37).

The first in a projected series of Bava-related soundtrack discs, licensed from the CAM library. Stunning Monaural sound quality, but noticeably lacking Nicolosi's signature composition "Tema di Katia," the original tapes for which could not be located among CAM's holdings. Includes a twelve-page full-color illustrated booklet with liner notes by Claudio Fuiano and Tim Lucas.

Moses the Lawgiver (1975)

Italy: "Tema di Mosè" b/w "Israel". Ennio Morricone. Conducted by Bruno Nicolai. RCA Records TBBO 1082. Stereo 45 rpm 7" single, 1975.

US: Moses. Ennio Morricone. Conducted by Bruno Nicolai. RCA Victor Records #NL31106. Stereo 12" LP, 1976.

Tracks: 1. Moses Theme, 2. Exodus One, 3. Battle and Red Sea, 4. Nocturnal Shouts, 5. Lamentation One, 6. In God's Voice, 7. Israel, 8. Moses' Theme (Journey), 9. Nocturnal Sounds, 10. Exodus Two, 11. The Ten Plagues (Part 1: "The Insects"), 12. Moses Theme (Closing Titles), 13. Lamentation Two.

This excellent, abridged recording of Morricone's moving score appears to have been deliberately sequenced not in the order heard in the film itself, but to produce the best possible listening experience.

UK: Moses. Ennio Morricone. Conducted by Bruno Nicolai. Pye Records #NSPH28503. Stereo 12" LP, 1976.

Tracks: Same as US RCA release.

Netherlands: Moses. Ennio Morricone. Conducted by Bruno Nicolai. RCA Records #TBL 1.1106. Stereo 12" LP, 1977.

Tracks: Same as US RCA release.

Italy: Mosè. Ennio Morricone. Conducted by Bruno Nicolai. RCA Records OST 113. Stereo CD two-disc/cassette set, 1992. Length: 99:16.

An expanded two-disc set containing 25 tracks.

Disc 1 Tracks: 1. Tema di Mosè (4:03), 2. Esodio primo (3:08), 3. Israel (4:59), 4. Nella voce di Dio (4:44), 5. Monodie sovrapposte (3:35), 6. Suonatori di flauto (2:51), 7. Battaglia e Mar Rosso (6:31), 8. Canto notturno (2:17), 9. Suoni notturni (3:57), 10. Lamentazione prima (5:55), 11. Le diece piaghe (Parte 1: gli insetti, 3:30), 12. Tema di Mosè (viaggio, 4:24), 13. Meditazione prima (3:36).

Disc 2 Tracks: 1. Tema di Mosè (Titoli di coda, 4:03), 2. Altri suonatori di flauto (2:14), 3. Le dieci piaghe (Parte 2, 3:15), 4. Salmodia (5:10), 5. Canto di donne (5:02), 6. Esodio secondo (3:06), 7. Urla notturne (2:47), 8. Lamentazione seconda (5:11), 9. Le dieci piaghe (Parte 3, 4:02), 10. Tema di Mosè (rito della Pasqua, 4:29), 11. Le quaglie (2:29), 12. Le dieci piaghe (Parte 4, 3:58).

One of Morricone's most popular scores, individual cues and suites from Moses the Lawgiver can also be found on numerous Morricone anthologies and collections.

Operazione paura (1966)

Although this film attributes its "score" to Carlo Rustichelli, it was entirely composed of library tracks from the CAM music library, only some of which were penned by Rustichelli. (These originated in his earlier work for Bava, La frusta e il corpo and Sei donne per l'assassino.) Other composers whose work is heard in the film are Armando Trovajoli (from Che fine ha fatto Totò Baby?), Roman Vlad (from I vampiri), Angelo Francesco Lavagnino (sources undetermined), and Francesco de Masi (from La lama nel corpo/The Murder Clinic). The de Masi track that closes the film can be heard on CAM's rare 1966 soundtrack album for La lama nel corpo under the title "Verso del speranza."

La ragazza che sapeva troppo (1963)

Italy: Mario Bava Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume I: La maschera del demonio / La ragazza che sapeva troppo. Roberto Nicolosi. Conducted by Pierluigi Urbini. Digitmovies #CDDMO35, CD, 2005.

Tracks: 1–13 See La maschera del demonio.

Tracks: 14. Morte di Edith e Aggressione notturna (2:22), 15. Omicidio a Trinità dei Monti (2:33), 16. Risveglio in ospedale (1:46), 17. "Questo é Roma!" e Ricordo dell'omicido (2:30), 18. Al ristorante e Sospetto di Nora (2:39), 19. Preparando la trappolo e Un'ombra nel buio (4:08), 20. La belezze di Roma (1:12), 21. Mistero notturno (3:22), 22. Un caldo bacio dopo l'incubo (3:04), 23. Un ospite inatteso e I delitti dell'alfabeto (2:03), 24. Terrible scoperta e Angoscia di Nora (3:33), 25. Faccia a faccia con l'assassina (2:16), 26. E se fosse tutto un sogno? (Finale, 2:19).

As with the La maschera del demonio soundtrack cues that occupy half this disc, an important cue is absent from Digitmovies' score for Bava's seminal giallo. Unfortunately, the company was unable to include Adriano Celentano's theme song "Furore" because it does not belong to the CAM archives.

Il rosso segno della follia (1970)

Italy: Mario Bava's Black Sabbath (I tre volti della paura). Sante Maria Romitelli. Conducted by Luigo Zito. RCA Records #OST-138. Stereo CD, 1997. Length: 59:29.

Tracks: 1–16 See I tre volti della paura.

Tracks: 17. La Casa di Mode (2:34), 18. La Luna di Miele (2:32), 19. Ricordi o Incubi? (1:04), 20. Trauma (2:18), 21. Tessere di un Mosaico (1:29), 22. Seconde Nozze (0:52), 23. L'accetta e l'Abito da Sposa (1:38), 24. Il Piccolo Testimone (2:34), 25. Il Party (2:23), 26. Scavare nella Memoria (1:08), 27. Lineamenti di un Assassino (1:16), 28. John Harrington (2:18), 29. Ancora un'altra vittima (1:16), 30. Hatchet Shake (1:29), 31. Il Mosaico é Completo (1:41), 32. Un Accetta per la Luna di Miele (1:16).

Though the cover art specifies this as a Black Sabbath soundtrack, only Tracks 17–32 of this CD present Romitelli's score for Il rosso segno della follia. In almost every case, the cues collected here are different takes to those heard in the film.

Roy Colt e Winchester Jack (1970)

Italy: "Roy Colt". Free Love. Cinevox #MDF-019. Stereo 45 rpm 7" single, 1970.

Italy: Spaghetti Western. Various Artists. Cinevox Records #CIA 5051. Stereo 12" LP.

This compilation album presents only the title track, "Roy Colt" (3:30), in addition to themes from other Italian Westerns.

US: Spaghetti Westerns, Volume One. Various Artists. DRG Records #32905. Stereo CD two-disc set, 1995.

Contains a 4:45 "suite" from the film.

Italy: Roy Colt & Winchester Jack. Piero Umiliani. Cinevox #MDF 331. Stereo CD, 1999. Length: 36:14.

Tracks: 1. Main Titles (1:56), 2. Seq. 2 (3:13), 3. Seq. 3 (2:29), 4. Seq. 4 (3:03), 5. Seq. 5 (2:06), 6. Seq. 6 (2:24), 7. Seq. 7 (2:25), 8. Seq. 8 (3:38), 9. Seq. 9 (2:25), 10. Seq. 10 (2:36), 11. Seq. 11 (3:29), 12. Finale (2:54), 13. Roy Colt (theme song by Free Love, 3:30).

Italy: Cinevox—The History of Soundtrack. Various Artists. Cinevox #CDMDF-346. Stereo CD four-disc set, 2003. Contains Roy Colt & Winchester Jack by Free Love (2:54).

Schock (1977)

Italy: Schock-Transfert-Suspense-Hypnos. I Libra. Cinevox Records #MDF 33/113. Stereo 12" LP, 1977.

Tracks: 1. The Shock (4:08), 2. L'Altalena Rossa (1:28), 3. Transfert I/Hipnos/Transfert II (4:49), 4. La Baia (2:18), 5. La Cantina/The Shock (ripresa, 3:06), 6. Tema di Marco I/II (3:41), 7. L'Incubo (3:33), 8. Transfert III (1:34), 9. Il Fant Suona il Piano (1:56), 10. Transfert IV/Tema di Marco (ripresa, 4:00).

An uneven, dissatisfying documentation of I Libra's score for Bava's final feature film, with tinny production and a running time of less than thirty minutes.

Japan: The Shock. I Libra. Seven Seas/King Records #FML 118. Stereo 12" LP, 1979.

Tracks: Same as Cinevox MDF 33/113, but packaged in a different sleeve.

Italy: Fantafestival Sampler Volume 1. Various Artists. Cinevox Records #CIA 5083. Stereo 12" LP, 1992.

The first of four anthologies of horror and science fiction soundtrack music from Cinevox contains the title track only, which is credited to Walter Martino.

Italy: Lo Squalo, L'Escorcista e altri films della paura. Various Artists. Cinevox Records #CIA 5014. Stereo 12" LP, c. 1990s.

Contains the title track.

Japan: Shock. I Libra. Soundtrack Listeners Communications #SLCS-7155. Stereo CD, 1993. Length: 31:00.

Contains the same playlist as the original album release, with no extra cues, but the sound mix is greatly improved.

Italy: Mario Bava's Schock. I Libra. Cinevox #CDMDF350. Stereo CD, 2000.

Tracks: Same as SLC #SLCS-7155, but with different cover art and superior sound quality.

Italy: Cinevox—The History of Soundtrack. Various Artists. Cinevox #CDMDF-346. Stereo CD four-disc set, 2003.

This overview of the label's soundtrack releases includes the title track "Shock" (4:07).

Sei donne per l'assassino (1964)

Italy: La bellezza d'Ippolita. Carlo Rustichelli. CAM Records #CAM CEP 4579. Monaural 45 rpm 7" EP, 1962.

The cha-cha accompaniment heard during the modelling show at Cristiana Haute Couture was originally composed by Rustichelli for this film, starring Gina Lollobrigida and directed by Giancarlo Zagni. This rare EP contained six cues from the film, one of which is undoubtedly the recycled cue.

Italy: "L'Atelier" b/w "Defile". Carlo Rustichelli. CAM Records #CAM CA-2559. Monaural 45 rpm 7" single, 1964.

This 7" single was pressed in a very limited edition with a picture sleeve depicting Ariana Gorini in the clutches of the killer, about to be struck with the clawed glove. Side A contains the main theme, "L'Atelier," and Side B contains "Defile," the suspense theme. Extremely hard to find, this single is THE jewel of Italian soundtrack releases. Contrary to the listing on Soundtrack Collector (www.soundtrackcollector.com), no complete soundtrack album is known to exist; the catalogue number they ascribe to an LP belongs to this single.

Italy: Mario Bava Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume II: La frusta e il corpo / Sei donne per l'assassino. Carlo Rustichelli. Digitmovies #CDDM041. Monaural/Stereo CD, 2005. Length: 61:07 (Disc 1, Monaural), 39:40 (Disc 2, Stereo).

Disc 1 Tracks: See La frusta e il corpo.

Disc 2 Tracks: 1. Atelier (Titoli, 2:11), 2. Inseguimento e morte di Isabella (2:30), 3. Nascondendo il cadavere (0:31), 4. Atelier (riprisa, 2:38), 5. Brutale aggressione (1:26), 6. L'indagine continua (1:08), 7. Terrore nella casa di moda (1:33), 8. Sospetti (1:24), 9. Attesa ossessiva (1:05), 10. Il killer colpisce ancora (3:28), 11. Defilè (2:58), 12. Assassinio (0:52), 13. Nuovi sospetti (1:47), 14. Attacco notturno (1:50), 15. Verso la verità (3:12), 16. Il volto dell'assassino (finale, 2:10), 17. Atelier (singolo Side A—Monaural, 2:11), 18. Defilè (singolo Side B—Monaural, 2:58), 19. Atelier (versione alterativa in stereo, 2:10).

Le spie vengono dal semifreddo (1966)

Italy: "Bang Bang Kissene". Franco Franchi. Ester Records. Monaural 45 rpm 7" single, 1966.

Terrore nello spazio (1965)

Italy: Fantafestival Sampler Volume 2. Various Artists. Cinevox Records #CIA 5084. Stereo 12" LP, 1991.

A long Terrore nello spazio suite (11:00) is included on this 1991 compilation album, which also includes music from Giorgio Ferroni's La notte dei diavoli (his remake of Bava's I wurdalak).

US: The Horror Films Collection. Various Artists. DRG Records #32903. Stereo CD, 1995.

Track 22 is the 11:00 suite.

Italy: Cinevox—The History of Soundtrack. Various Artists. Cinevox #CDMDF-346. Stereo CD, 2003.

A four-disc box set overview of the label's soundtrack releases, including a 2:40 title cue from Terrore nello spazio.

Italy: Terrore nello spazio. Gino Marinucci Jr. Digitmovies #CDDMO07. Stereo CD, 2003. Length: 32:44.

Tracks: 1. Main Titles (1:14), 2. Ship Landed on Planet Aura/Crazy Crew (2:33), 3. Astronaut Lands on the Surface (0:54), 4. A Very Strange Planet (1:42), 5. Exploring Aura/Dead Crewman Found (4:54), 6. Another Macabre Discovery/Ship's Abandoned Bridge (1:27), 7. The Living Dead (1:15), 8. Inside the Starship (1:06), 9. Evil Spirits (0:46), 10. A New Victim/Tiona Attacked by the Living Dead (0:46), 11. The Relic Ship/Aboard the Relic Ship (2:01), 12. "Where Are They?"/Tiona's Nightmare (1:23), 13. "I Know They're Dead"/Empty Grave (1:18), 14. Time Bombs (0:39), 15. The Living Dead Appears (1:04), 16. Battle on Planet Aura (1:30), 17. "You Are Both of Them!" (1:30), 18. "A Young, Primitive World..." (finale 0:38), 19. End Titles (0:53).

The complete original soundtrack, issued without the 11:00 suite (the components of which are nevertheless found here).

I tre volti della paura (1963)

Italy: Mario Bava's Black Sabbath (I tre volti della paura). Roberto Nicolosi. Conducted by Luigi Zito. RCA Records #OST-138. Stereo CD, 1997. Length: 59:29.

Tracks: 1. Black Sabbath (1:58), 2. Il Telefono (1:23), 3. Rosy e Mary (1:40), 4. Frank (1:20), 5. Wurdalak (1:18), 6. Vladimiro e Sdenksa (2:06), 7. Inizia la Strage (0:56), 8. Il Vecchio Gorka (1:55), 9. Nessuno si Salvara (1:40), 10. Vampiro! (1:20), 11. La Maledizione (1:48), 12. Il Volto della paura (3:24), 13. Sangue Viennese (2:16), 14. La Goccia d'Acqua (2:24), 15. L'Infermiera e l'Annello (1:44), 16. Il Cadavere di Miss Perkins (1:47).

Tracks: 17–32 See Il rosso segno della follia.

"Mario Bava's Black Sabbath (I tre volti della paura)" is the title as it appears on the front of the disc; the spine of the CD reads "Il rosso segno della follia di S.M. Romitelli/I tre volti della paura di Roberto Nicolosi." A bravura sampling of Nicolosi's fine score, and solid evidence of how much Les Baxter derived from it while composing his replacement score. Only Tracks 1–16 are from I tre volti della paura; the remaining tracks are from Il rosso segno della follia, scored by Sante Maria Romitelli.

I vampiri (1957)

Italy: Mario Bava Original Soundtracks Anthology Volume IV: I vampiri / Caltiki il mostro immortale / Lisa and the Devil. Roman Vlad. Digitmovies #CDDMO58. Monaural CD, 2006. Length: 46:12 (Disc 1), 44:54 (Disc 2).

Disc 1 Tracks: 1. I vampiri (Titoli, 1:35), 2. Cadavere nella senna & Ultime notizie (1:33), 3. Nuova vittima (1:19), 4. Pierre d Giselle (1:28), 5. Prigioniero della droga (1:15), 6. Sulle tracce di berthier (2:36), 7. Ricatto e uccisione (2:35), 8. Tragica notizia & Funerale (2:22), 9. Chi giace nella bara & Passaggio segreto (2:29), 10. Rapimento & Appartamento vuoto (3:25), 11. Valzer (1:18), 12. Un vecchio disco che suona (piano, 6:39), 13. Identità rivelata & Diabolica trasfusione (3:03), 14. La misteriosa duchessa (1:37), 15. Notte da incubi (2:52), 16. Ispezione di polizia & Morte della duchessa (3:03), 17. Fine di un incubo (1:32), 18. Pierre e Giselle (ripresa) & Finale (2:08).

Disc 1 Bonus Track 19. See Lisa and the Devil.

Disc 2 Tracks: See Caltiki il mostro immortale.

Addendum

Italy: Murder for Pleasure—Giallo and Thriller Themes. Various. Gato Nero Records #BC001. Monaural CD, 1997. Length: 60:48.

This is a bootleg disc, reportedly of British origin despite its avowed Roman heritage, that collects music from various Italian gialli as collected from video sources. The disc's 28 cues includes samples from Mario Bava's 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto, Ecologia del delitto (two cues), Sei donne per l'assassino and Il rosso segno della follia. The PAL sourcing of the material results in unwelcome changes of pitch. The disc itself is labelled "NOT FOR SALE—Promotional Use Only."

References

Interviews

Mary Dawne Arden—2000 – 2002; email and telephone
Dario Argento—January 2001; interviewed via Alan Jones
Samuel Z. Arkoff—April 10, 1986 and August 15, 1989; telephone
Marcello Avallone—interviewed via Luigi Boscaino, 1999
Don Backy (Aldo Caponi)—October 21–23, 2002; email
Elena Bava (Mario's sister)—correspondence
Georgia Bava—various, 1985 – 2002; telephone and email
Lamberto Bava—various, 1980 – 2002; telephone and email
Roy (Fabrizio) Bava—various, 1993 – 2002; telephone—and April 2003 interviewed via Alan Jones
Norma Bengell—January 2001; email
William Berger—1992, interviewed via Peter Blumenstock
Laura Betti—April 23, 1985; correspondence and May 14, 1990; telephone
Erika Blanc—telephone (comments translated by her daughter)
Peter Blumenstock—October 29, 2002; telephone
Gianna Maria Canale—September 28, 1996; correspondence
Anthony Carras—November 8, 2000; telephone
Luigi Cozzi—August 22, 1989; telephone
Dante Di Paolo—June 13, 2006; telephone
Gabriella & Germana Dominici—1992; telephone
Mimsy Farmer—November 2002; interviewed via Kit J. Gavin
Stephen Forsyth—May 17, 2002; email and May – November 30, 2002; telephone Riccardo Freda—1984 – 1985; correspondence and telephone
Ivo Garrani—June 21, 2001; interviewed by Luca Rea
Tudor Gates—July 29, 2002; email
Marcello Gatti—August 8, 1999; interviewed via Luca Rea
Ernesto Gastaldi—various, 1997 – 2002; email
Daniela Giordano—December 12–17, 1997; email
Armando Govoni—1998, email via Ernesto Gastaldi
Brett Halsey—August 25, 2002; telephone and August 28 – September 13, 2002; email
Richard Harrison—May 12, 2000, July 2, 2001; telephone, email
Louis M. "Deke" Heyward—August 15, 1989; telephone and September 1, 2001 – February 26, 2002; email
Martin Kitrosser—May 19 – July 6, 2002; email
Daliah Lavi—October 7–11, 2000; telephone
John Phillip Law—October 10, 1993; August 2004, both in person
Christopher Lee—correspondence
Alfredo Leone—various, 1984 – 2002; telephone and email
Fulvio Lucisano—August 18 – 21, 1989; telephone
William Lustig—April 21, 1998; telephone
Sergio Martino—1995; interviewed via Peter Blumenstock
Aristide Massaccesi—1995; interviewed via Peter Blumenstock
Harriet White Medin—various, February 2, 1986 – 2001; telephone and in person
Ib J. Melchior—October 10, 1993; in person
Cameron Mitchell—January 23, 1989; telephone
Luigi Montefiori—November 2002; interviewed via Kit J. Gavin
Daria Nicolodi—1990; telephone
Alan Ormsby—December 2, 2004; telephone
Irene Papas—November 2002; interviewed via Kit J. Gavin
Reg Park—May 13, 2001; email
Andrea Piazzesi—February 27, 1984; telephone
Luciano Pigozzi—October 22, 1996; telephone
Maurice Poli—November 15, 2002; interviewed via Kit J. Gavin
Vincent Price—July 13, 1975; in person
Thomas Reiner—September 2000; interviewed via Uwe Huber
Carlo Rustichelli—May 1999; interviewed via Daniela Catelli
John Saxon—June 1993; in person
Rosalba Scavia—January 2003; interviewed by Kit J. Gavin
Michele Soavi—1984, telephone
John Steiner—May 13, 2000; telephone
Armando Valcauda—correspondence
Mel Welles—June 7, 2001; telephone and email
Richard Wyler—September 29, 1996; telephone

◀ MARIO BAVA consults his shooting script on the set of LA MASCHERA DEL DEMONIO.

Selected Bibliography

Abruzzese, Alberto, et al.: La città del cinema—produzione e lavoro nel cinema italiano 1930–70 (Rome, Italy: Napoleone, 1979)

Bartok, Eva: Worth Living For (New York NY: University Books, 1959)

Barzini, Luigi: The Italians (New York NY: Bantam Books, 1965)

Baxter, John: Science Fiction in the Cinema (New York NY: Paperback Library, 1970)

Betti, Liliana: Fellini: An Intimate Portrait (New York NY: Little, Brown & Company, 1979).

Burgess, Anthony: The Eve of Saint Venus (New York NY: W. W. Norton & Company, 1970)

Burgess, Anthony: Moses: A Narrative (New York NY: Stonehill Press, 1976)

Carr, Hayes: Wide Screen Movies (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 1988)

Cary, John: Spectacular: The Story of Epic Films (Secaucus NJ: Castle Books, 1974)

Citti and Poppi: Dizionario del cinema italiano, I Film 2 (Rome, Italy: Gremese Editore, 1991)

Clarens, Carlos: An Illustrated History of the Horror Film (New York NY: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1967)

Clooney, Rosemary: Girl Singer: An Autobiography (New York NY: Doubleday & Co., 1999)

Collins, Joan: Second Act (New York NY: St. Martin's Press, 1996)

Cook, David A.: A History of Narrative Film (New York NY: W. W. Norton & Company, 1981)

Cozzi, Luigi: Il cinema dei mostri (Rome, Italy: Fanucci Editore, 1987)

Cozzi, Luigi: Il Cinema Gotico e Fantastico Italiano Vol 1—Mario Bava, I Mille Volte Della Paura (Rome, Italy: Mondo Ignoto/ Profondo Rosso, 2001)

de Coulteray, George: Sadism in the Movies (New York NY: Medical Press/Castle Books, 1965)

de Maupassant, Guy (trans. Arnold Kellett): The Dark Side (New York NY: Carroll & Graf Publishers, 1989)

Eisner, Lotte H.: Fritz Lang (New York NY: Da Capo Press, 1976),

Elley, Derek: The Epic Film (London, Boston, Melbourne and Henley: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1984)

Fabrizi, Aldo: Trilogia (Rome, Italy: Edizione Centro Espressioni Cinematografiche, 1995)

Faldini and Fofi: L'avventurosa storia del cinema italiano—raccontata dai suoi protagonisti (Milan, Italy: Feltrinelli Edizione, 1980).

Frayling, Christopher: Sergio Leone: Something To Do With Death (Gordonsville VA: Faber & Faber, 2000)

Frayling, Christopher: Spaghetti Westerns: Cowboys and Europeans from Karl May to Sergio Leone (London, UK: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1981)

Freda, Riccardo: Divoratori di celluloide—50 anni di memorie cinematografiche e non (Milan, Italy: Emme Edizione–Il Formichiere, 1981)

Freud, Sigmund: Beyond the Pleasure Principle (New York NY: Bantam Books,1959)

Freud, Sigmund: The Interpretation of Dreams (New York NY: Avon Books, 1965)

Eyman, Scott: Ernst Lubitsch: Laughter in Paradise (New York NY: Simon & Schuster, 1993)

Fujiwara, Chris: Jacques Tourneur, The Cinema of Nightfall (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 1998)

Gallagher, Tag: The Adventures of Roberto Rossellini—His Life and Films (New York NY: De Capo Press, 1998)

Gatti, Alessandro, ed.: I Cineoperatore: La storia della cinematografia italiana dal 1941 al 2000 Vol 2 (Rome, Italy: AIC, 2000)

Gogol, Nikolai: Mirgorod (Moscow, USSR: Foreign Languages Publishing House, undated)

Grant, John: Encyclopedia of Walt Disney's Animated Characters (New York NY: Harper and Row, 1987)

Guralnick, Peter: Careless Love—The Unmaking of Elvis Presley (Boston MA: Little, Brown & Company, 1999)

Harding, Bertita: Age Cannot Wither: The Story of Duse and D'Annunzio (Philadelphia PA: Lippincott, 1947)

Hardy, Phil, ed.: The Aurum Film Encyclopedia: Horror (London, UK: Aurum Press, 1985)

Hardy, Phil, ed.: The Aurum Film Encyclopedia: Science Fiction (London, UK: Aurum Press, 1984)

Hardy, Phil, ed.: The Aurum Film Encyclopedia: Westerns (London, UK: Aurum Press, 1983)

Harvith, Susan and John: Karl Struss: Man With a Camera (Bloomfield Hills MI: Cranbrook Academy of Art Museum, 1976)

Howarth, Troy: The Haunted World of Mario Bava (London, UK: FAB Press, 2002)

Lee, Christopher: Tall, Dark and Gruesome (London, UK: Victor Gollancz, 1997; rev. Baltimore MD: Midnight Marquee Press, 1998)

Levi-Strauss, Claude: The Scope of Anthropology (London, UK: Jonathan Cape, 1967)
Jarratt, Vernon: The Italian Cinema (London, UK: The Falcon Press, 1951)
Jones, Alan: Mondo Argento (London, UK: Midnight Media, 1996)
Katz, Ephraim: The Film Encyclopedia (New York NY: Harper Collins Publishers, 1990)
Kneale, Nigel: The Quatermass Experiment (London, UK: Arrow Books, 1979)
LeClaire, Chris: Worlds to Conquer: An Authorized Biography of Steve Reeves (South Chatham MA: Monomoy Books, 1999)
Leutrat, J. Louis, ed.: Collection Grand Écran Petit Écran 1: Mario Bava (Paris, France: Cinematheque Française/Éditions du Céfal, 1994)
Lippi and Codelli: Fant'italia (Trieste, Italy: XIV Festival Internazionale del Film Fantascienza, 1976)
Magarshack, David: Gogol, A Life (New York: Grove Press, 1957)
Mank, Gregory William: Hollywood Cauldron (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 1994)
Martin, John: The Seduction of the Gullible: The Curious History of the British "Video Nasty" Phenomenon (London, UK: Procrustes Press, 1993)
Martinet, Pascal: Mario Bava (Paris, France: Edilig, 1984)
Martini and Della Casa, eds.: Freda (Bergamo, Italy: Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografia Cineteca Nazionale, 1993)
McDonagh, Maitland: Broken Mirrors, Broken Minds: The Dark Dreams of Dario Argento (London: Sun Tavern Fields, 1991; rev. New York NY: Citadel Press, 1994)
Moore Jr., Milton T.: Steve Reeves: One of a Kind (Dallas TX: Milton T. Moore Jr., 1983)
Newman, Kim, ed.: The BFI Companion to Horror (London, UK: Cassell/British Film Institute, 1996)
O'Brien, Geoffrey: The Phantom Empire: Movies in the Mind of the 20th Century (New York NY: W. W. Norton & Company, 1993)
Oumano, Ellen: Film Forum: Thirty-five Top Filmmakers Discuss Their Craft (New York NY: St. Martin's Press, 1986)
Palmerini and Mistretta: Spaghetti Nightmares (Key West FL: Fantasma Books, 1996)
Palmerini and Mistretta: Spaghetti Nightmares (Rome, Italy: M&P Edizione, 1996)
Pattison, Barrie: The Seal of Dracula (New York NY: Bounty Books, 1975)
Peary, Danny: Cult Movies (New York NY: Delta/Dell Publishing Co. Inc., 1981)
Pezzotta, Alberto: Mario Bava (Milan, Italy: Editrice il Castoro, 1995; rev. 1997)
Pirie, David: The Vampire Cinema (New York NY: Crescent Books, 1977)
Piselli and Morrocchi, eds.: Bizarre Sinema! Horror all'italiana 1957–1979 (Firenze, Italy: Glittering Images, 1996)
Pohle Jr. and Hart: The Films of Christopher Lee (Metuchen NJ: The Scarecrow Press, 1986)
Ponzi, Maurizio: The Films of Gina Lollobrigida (Secaucus NJ: Citadel Press, 1982)
Quinn, Anthony (with Daniel Paisner): One Man Tango (New York NY: Harper Collins, 1995)
Raymond, Alex: Flash Gordon 1: Mongo, The Planet of Doom (Princeton WI: Kitchen Sink Press, 1990)
Sabatier, Jean-Marie: Les Classiques du Cinéma Fantastique (Paris, France: Balland, 1973)
Siciliano, Enzo: Pasolini (New York NY: Random House, 1982)
Silver and Ursini: The Vampire Film (South Brunswick NJ: A. S. Barnes, 1975; rev. New York NY: Limelight Editions, 1993)
Skal, David J.: Hollywood Gothic (New York NY: W. W. Norton & Company, 1990)
Skotak, Robert: Ib Melchior Man of Imagination (Baltimore MD: Midnight Marquee Press, 2000)
Spoto, Donald: The Art of Alfred Hitchcock (Garden City, NY: Dolphin/Doubleday, 1976)
Stewart, John: Italian Film: A Who's Who (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 1994)
Sullivan, Jack, ed.: The Penguin Encyclopedia of Horror and the Supernatural (New York NY: Viking, 1986)
Swanson, Gloria: Swanson on Swanson (New York NY: Pocket Books, 1981)
Thompson and Christie, eds.: Scorsese on Scorsese (London, UK: Faber & Faber, 1989)
Tolstoy, Leo: Hadji-Murad (New York NY: Dodd, Mead and Co., 1912)
Trout, Kilgore (Philip Jose Farmer): Venus on the Half-Shell (New York NY: Dell Publishing Co. Inc., 1975)
Venturini, Simone: Galatea S.p.A. (1952–1965) storia di una casa di produzione cinematografica (Rome, Italy: Associazione Italiana per le Richerche di Storia del Cinema, 2001)
Waugh, Hillary: The Shadow Guest (New York NY: Dell Publishing Co. Inc., 1972)
Warren, Bill: Keep Watching the Skies! (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 1997)
Weaver, Tom: Attack of the Monster Movie Makers (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 1994)
Weaver, Tom: Eye on Science Fiction, (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 2003)
Weaver, Tom: Science Fiction Stars and Horror Heroes (Jefferson NC: McFarland & Co., 1991)
Wolf, Leonard: Leonard Wolf's The Annotated Dracula, (New York NY: Clarkson Potter, 1975)
Wormser, Richard: Thief of Baghdad (New York NY: Dell Publishing Co. Inc., 1961)

Magazines

Boxoffice, Castle of Frankenstein, Cinefantastique, Classic Physique, Ciné-Zine-Zone, Continental Film Review, Cult Movies, L'Ecran Fantastique Fiche C.E.R.C., Entertainment Weekly, Esquire, European Trash Cinema, L'Europeo, Famous Monsters of Filmland, Fangoria, Film Dope, Films & Filming, Flesh and Blood, Hollywood, Horror, The Jack Kirby Collector, La Lettura, Mad Movies, Midi-Minuit Fantastique, Monthly Film Bulletin, Motion Magazine, Nocturno Dossier, Pacific Coast Viking, Photon, Playboy, Positif, Présence du Cinema, Spaghetti Cinema, Terror Fantastic, TV Guide, Vampirella, Variety, Video Watchdog.

Acknowledgments

THIS BOOK would be nothing more than a daydream, were it not for the many friends I have made around the world in the many years this project has been my introduction and passport.

I would like to thank, first and foremost, Mario's family—his son and assistant Lamberto Bava, his late sister Elena Bava (Mother Superior of the Ancelle del Sacro Cuore, who passed away in early 2007), and his grandchildren Georgia Bava and Fabrizio "Roy" Bava—for their memories, cooperation, trust, and extraordinary patience with this project and its widely scattered author.

I am deeply honored that the late Riccardo Freda, Mario Bava's mentor and father of the Italian gothic horror movement, and Martin Scorsese, the outstanding Italian-American director of our time, both understood the need for this book and agreed to endorse my research with prefatory statements. The assistance of Kent Jones in obtaining the Introduction from Mr. Scorsese is also much appreciated.

MARIO BAVA self portrait, 1970s.

Acknowledgments

I am grateful to the more-than-one-hundred people whose statements and recollections have helped to inform this work: Mary Dawne Arden, Dario Argento, Samuel Z. Arkoff, Marcello Avallone, Don Backy, Corrado Bartoloni, Norma Bengell, William Berger, Laura Betti, Alberto Bevilacqua, Erika Blanc, Peter Blumenstock, Penny Brown, Samson Burke, Tim Burton, Gianna Maria Canale, Anthony Carras, Roger Corman, Callisto Cosulich, Luigi Cozzi, Joe Dante, Ennio De Concini, Massimo De Rita, Catherine Deneuve, Ruggero Deodato, Dante Di Paolo, Gabriella Dominici, Germana Dominici, Nicoletta Elmi, Corràdo Farina, Mimsy Farmer, Philip Jose & Betty Farmer, Fiorenzo Fiorentini, Stephen Forsyth, Riccardo Freda, Cesare Frugoni, Edy Galleani, Christophe Gans, Ivo Garrani, Ernesto Gastaldi, Tudor Gates, Marcello Gatti, Daniela Giordano, Armando Govoni, Brett Halsey, Richard Harrison, Louis M. "Deke" Heyward, Martin Kitrosser, Lea Lander, Dagmar Lassander, Daliah Lavi, John Phillip Law, Christopher Lee, Michel Lemoine, Alfredo Leone, Fulvio Lucisano, William Lustig, Giuseppe Maccari, Antonio Margheriti, Eduoardo Margheriti, Elsa Martinelli, Sergio Martino, Aristide Massaccesi, Gabriele Mayer, the dear Harriet White Medin, Ib J. Melchior, Cameron Mitchell, Lucia Modugno, Luigi Montefiori, Roberto Natale, Daria Nicolodi, Alan Ormsby, Filippo Ottoni, Irene Papas, Alessandro Parenzo, Reg Park, Renato Pestriniero, Andrea Piazzesi, Luciano Pigozzi (a.k.a. "Alan Collins"), Maurice Poli, Vincent Price, Franco Prosperi, Carlo Rambaldi, Steve Reeves, Thomas Reiner, Antonio Rinaldi, Renato Rossini (a.k.a. "Howard Ross" a.k.a. "Red Ross"), Tony Russel, Carlo Rustichelli, Dardano Sacchetti, John Saxon, Rosalba Scavia, Martin Scorsese, Mario Silvestri, Brigitte Skay, Michele Soavi, Elke Sommer, Jean Sorel, Charles Southwood, Barbara Steele, Anthony Steffen, John Steiner, Barry Sullivan, Duccio Tessari, Jacques Tourneur, Goffredo "Freddy" Unger, Armando Valcauda, Emilio Varriano, Mel Welles, Richard Wyler, and Bernardino Zapponi. I interviewed many of these people (several of whom have since passed away) personally, while others were interviewed on my behalf by friends in faraway places. Still others are quoted herein from other published sources, but it seems only fair to include them here as part of this book's brain trust. The information and insights shared by all is equally appreciated.

The vast majority of these interviews were conducted in only one or two sessions. However, there were also cases in which my interviewees stuck with me as valued friends, involved in the gestation of this work over a period of decades. On this score, I would like to single out Joe Dante, Ernesto Gastaldi, John Phillip Law, Alfredo Leone, and the late Harriet Medin and Deke Heyward for special acknowledgment. Particular thanks are also extended to Stephen Forsyth for his personal encouragement of a more recent vintage, and the gift he made to this book of an original Photoshop collage composed of cutting room trims that he was given during the production of Il rosso segno della follia/Hatchet For the Honeymoon.

For the duration of this project, my correspondence with Lorenzo Codelli has been my lifeline to Italian cinema. He has been a true and constant friend in his offerings of help, news and information. My most enduring research associate and sounding board during this long voyage, Lorenzo assisted me in compiling the Eugenio Bava chronology, and was also this book's first reader; he made many excellent editorial suggestions, and I will always be appreciative.

Like my subject, I am a homebody uncomfortable with travel and unfamiliar surroundings—a fact that has sometimes compelled me to rely on distant friends like Daniela Catelli. Heaven sent Daniela to me; there is no other explanation. One day, she turned up in my email box offering help and friendship and, despite sometimes trying conditions, she has never failed to keep that promise. She translated many Italian texts and video materials for this book, including Mario Bava's original Viy treatment, his complete L'Ospite dalle due interview, the reminiscences of Mario's sister Elena, and much more. She also took my questions to composer Carlo Rustichelli at his Roman penthouse, where the Maestro treated her to a live piano performance of "The Winsor Concerto" from La frusta e il corpo, which he played from memory. I am greatly indebted to Daniela for her ready willingness to help and the unflagging warmth of her camaraderie.

Alan Jones has been another important ally over the years. He contributed two supreme gifts to this book in its final years of preparation. While I labored for the better part of three decades in Ohio, carrying out most of my research at long distance via telephone, fax and computer, Alan won a dream assignment in 2000 to conduct interviews for a Channel 4 television documentary, which was eventually called Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre. I provided Alan with all of the addresses and phone numbers he needed, and in just a few whirlwind weeks, he was able to shake the hands of all the colleagues and family members I had never met and visit all the key places I had never been. He also found time to come here to Cincinnati to interview me for the program. Once his work was finished, he provided me with the unedited transcripts of all the interviews he had conducted—thus availing my research of interviews with some people I hadn't succeeded in contacting, and follow-ups with those I had. Secondly, after several of my own attempts to interview Dario Argento had fallen through, Alan prevailed upon his own friendship with Dario to complete the task. I'm beholden to Alan for his kindness and generosity, all motivated by his boundless enthusiasm for Italian horror and its Maestri.

Another of this book's primary interviewers was Kit J. Gavin of Diabolik Film Research, who interviewed Lea Lander, Elsa Martinelli, Maurice Poli, Jean Sorel, Rosalba Scavia and Brigitte Skay on my behalf, and also forwarded some helpful comments from his interviews with Mimsy Farmer and Penny Brown. Kit not only interviewed these people, but also transcribed and translated their comments. He also provided various contact addresses, phone/fax numbers, and important biographical data about other European actors discussed herein. I also wish to extend my thanks to Mike Baronas, Kit's partner in another book venture, who provided us with some much-needed digital photographs of archival materials and generously allowed this project to share barracks with his and Kit's work on some important interview dates.

Other research associates who conducted interviews exclusively for this book were Uwe Huber, who interviewed Thomas Reiner and sent other crucial information that led me to interviews I later conducted on my own; Robert Monell, who put me in touch with Richard Wyler and shared relevant quotes from his own interview with Charles Southwood; Luca Rea, who interviewed Ivo Garrani and translated a recent television interview with Bava's former camera operator Corrado Bartoloni for my use, as well as locating copies of some elusive films and newsreels; and Andrea Carpentieri, who forwarded comments from his friend, 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto star Edy Galleani. My thanks to them, and to Luigi Boscaino, who interviewed Marcello Avallone for a Video Watchdog retrospective on Riccardo Freda's L'orribile segreto dal Dr. Hichcock/The Horrible Dr. Hichcock in 1999, which yielded information I have incorporated here, as well.

In addition to being an interviewee of this book, Peter Blumenstock provided me with rare photographs from Cani arrabbiati and helped to compile the Bava discography, which can be found in this book's Appendices. I would also like to thank Peter for giving me the undreamed-of opportunity of collaborating with Mario Bava, in a sense, by inviting me to write the English subtitles of Lucertola Media's DVD release of Rabid Dogs in 1997. I'm also beholden to Marc Morris, who assisted me in compiling the Mario Bava Videography.

Stephen R. Bissette first wrote to me in 1985 in response to a two-part Bava article I published in Fangoria, and has been a profound helpmate, sounding board, and confidant over the years. Steve is one of those people always on the lookout for books, tapes, magazines, newspaper clippings—anything that might be of use to his friends' various projects. His materials have helped to broaden the net of my research and my mind, educating me in unfamiliar fields like stage lighting, and bringing to my attention seemingly unrelated films like The Queen of Spades (1949) and Freud (1962), which may have influenced Bava's work. He also provided the rare Carnage newspaper clipping found herein, proving that he was collecting data for this book even before I conceived of writing it. Of equal importance is everything that Steve taught my wife Donna and me about publishing, which planted the seeds of Video Watchdog magazine, thus giving us the tools that made this book possible.

When my friend John Bender told me that he and his wife Karen Emmerich would be travelling to Rome in the summer of 1999, he made a point of asking if there was anything he could do for me while they were there. Not knowing if I would ever reach Rome myself, I asked John—if it was at all possible—to locate and photograph Mario Bava's final resting place. Armed with my nebulous directions, and only after great difficulty, John and Karen achieved the impossible. I am obliged to them for so perfectly accommodating the needs of this book on their vacation. With his friend John Nudge, John was also extremely helpful in adding information to the pages devoted to Ennio Morricone's score for Diabolik.

One of this project's earliest supporters was Steve Jarvis, one of those amazing people who seem to casually know more about the cinema than most of those who make their living writing about it. Steve and I conducted an intense, off-and-on, Bava-related correspondence during the first ten years of this project. He shared information, challenged my perspectives, even arranged for some foreign articles and interviews to be translated. He read the earliest material I wrote for this book and will know, better than anyone, what this book has gained by ripening on the vine for so long. Steve's knowledge and research pointed me in numerous directions where I would never have thought to look otherwise, and over the years, he has never failed to send me a Christmas card with an extra handwritten note expressing his continued belief that I would someday make good on the promise of completing this book. It will give me special pleasure to finally ship him a copy.

This book may seem unwieldy, but it was far less manageable in manuscript form. Imagine, if you will, the challenge of making this book consistent, of ensuring that all its production dates were correct and identical throughout, of checking Italian film titles for spelling. I am deeply indebted to Joe Dante, Lorenzo Codelli, John Charles, Richard Harland Smith, and Tom Weaver for reading the book in its rawest state and offering their helpful notes and corrections.

Crucial assistance came to bear on the visual dimension of this book from Charlie Largent, Simonida Perica Uth (moje sestra) and Matthew Bradshaw, who worked independently on the digital restoration of the thousand-plus stills and paper materials reproduced herein. You have to do this work, or know the condition the original materials were in, to fully appreciate how painstaking it can be. Suffice to say, some of the materials were literally falling apart. Charlie, Simonida and Matt treated this book like their Sistine Chapel ceiling, and their craftsmanship deserves all possible praise.

Special acknowledgment is also due to my fellow reviewers at Video Watchdog magazine—Anthony Ambrogio, John Charles, Bill Cooke, Shane M. Dallmann, Charlie Largent, Kim Newman, Richard Harland Smith, Brett Taylor, Nathaniel Thompson, Rebecca & Sam Umland, and Douglas E. Winter. Each of them has rallied behind me and assumed a good deal of my monthly burden, so that I could devote all possible time and energy to the completion of this manuscript. Time to work is the greatest gift of all, and this book would still be years away from completion if not for their particular support.

Many others have generously assisted the progress of this book with the provision of 16 mm prints, videotapes, interview leads, paper materials, photos, articles, quotes, or other information which might otherwise have escaped my notice, long-term encouragement and—considering the number of years I have invested in this effort—even the refreshment of memory. In these categories, I am indebted to Gabriele Acerbo, Cathy Atwood, Kim Aubry, Lucas Balbo, Holger Bals, Mme. Barsanti of Lyre Cinematographique (Paris), Gian Piero Brunetta, Joe Busam, Nick Clooney, David Colton, Joe Dante, Guillermo del Toro, David Del Valle, Frédéric Durand, Glenn Erickson, Jay Fenton, Harris Forusz, Julian Grainger, Rob Hambrecht, Lars von Hegnet, Henrik Hemlin, Eric Hoffman, Paul Hutchings, Paul M. Jensen, Christian Kessler, Richard Klemensen, Russ Lanier, Craig Ledbetter, Michael Lennick, Frédéric Albert Levy, Mirek Lipinski, Mike MacCollum, Eric Mache, Maitland McDonagh, Mike Mariano, Jean-Claude Morlot, Stefan Novak, José Luís Silva Ortiz, Chris Ostermeier, Nancy Parke-Taylor, Michel Parry, Jan Perry, the late Wayne Perry, Renato Pestriniero, Alain Petit, Alberto Pezzotta, Roberto Pisoni, Simone Romano, Wade Sanders, the late Thomas Scofield, Gavin Smith, Olaf Strecker, the late Steve Swires, Gary Teetzel, Tony Timpone, the late Mark Upchurch, Robert and Simonida Uth, Bart van der Put, Fábio Vellozo, Donnie Waddell, Marc Walkow, Bill Warren, Miles Wood, Michael O. Yaccarino, and after all this time, undoubtedly others whose names I should have taken better care to record.

A word of separate thanks is owed to the late Frederick S. Clarke, editor emeritus of Cinefantastique, the first person who encouraged me to write something about Mario Bava, and who also instilled in me the criteria of "definitive" research.

And then there are the late friends to whom this book is dedicated, who spent much of their lives daydreaming of it with me, but who did not live to see this dream realized. Carlos Sylva, whom I never met, devoted much of his short but adventurous life to rescuing the films of Mario Bava from oblivion. During one of our few transatlantic phone calls, Carlos told me the hair-raising story of the day he found the 35 mm camera negative of Bava's Four Times That Night covered in mushrooms. After hearing that chilling account, which brought home to me just how close to extinction Bava's filmic legacy might be, I told Carlos that I would like to interview him for this book about his adventures in preserving Bava's work for future generations. He was a young man; I thought we had all the time in the world, and I missed that opportunity. While I cannot presume to tell Carlos' story, suffice to say, if you ever see a pristine print of Blood and Black Lace, Knives of the Avenger, Four Times That Night, or Lisa and the Devil, you can thank Carlos Sylva. That much I know.

I never met Bill Kelley in person, but we were close friends by telephone for the better part of twenty years. Throughout that time, Bill was a valued research associate on this project, sending me videocassettes of relevant films that turned up on Florida television stations and sharing stories with me. A close friend of actor Christopher Lee, Bill was instrumental in arranging my interview-by-letter with Lee, and obtaining answers to later questions whenever they spoke. Several times over the years, Bill mentioned that he had once interviewed actor Barry Sullivan in 1975 about working with Mario Bava on Planet of the Vampires, and was hopeful of finding the misplaced document. Literally within one week of his passing, the transcript arrived in my mailbox and became the last substantial interview material added to this book.

Christopher Sven Dietrich interviewed the elusive Barbara Steele for this project, translated the original Italian dialogue of La maschera del demonio (his favorite film) and I tre volti della paura for my use (long before either film was available subtitled in this country), as well as two recently published interviews with Ennio De Concini and Massimo De Rita, and arranged for me to speak by telephone to the daughters of actor Arturo Dominici. In 1980, long before we met, it was Chris who first informed me by letter of Bava's untimely death. In addition to informing and encouraging this book for more than two decades, Chris shared rare poster art and photographs, and not least of all, he provided me with a place to stay when I visited Los Angeles for a Mario Bava retrospective in 1993. I've never known anyone who was a bigger Bava fan than Chris, and it grieves me that he missed seeing this book realized by only a couple of years.

Of the many people who involved themselves in the furthering of this project, none was more helpful or actively collaborative than Alan Upchurch. Back in 1985, like Steve Bissette, Alan wrote an appreciative letter in response to my Fangoria overview of Bava's career. It was the enthusiasm and unusual scholarly grounding apparent in his side of our early correspondence that brought my mission with this book into its fullest focus. My association with Alan opened many unimagined avenues in my research and greatly expanded the frontiers of this study. Alan translated the original dialogue from I tre volti della paura's "The Telephone" episode (which was censored for the English-language version Black Sabbath) for this book, more than a decade before the Italian version was subtitled on DVD, and he was also my most invaluable research associate, converting foreign standard cassettes of rare films and bringing to my attention numerous obscure clippings that would otherwise have escaped my notice. The majority of the illustrations in this book are culled from his impressive collection of international posters, stills, and pressbooks for Italian productions.

In 1993, the year before his death from AIDS, Alan was the prime mover behind the first retrospectives of Mario Bava's films ever held in the United States, at San Francisco's Roxie Cinema (April 17–18), at New York City's Film Forum (July 23 – August 5), and at Los Angeles' Director's Guild Theater (October 8–10). It was not until the first of these events—quite late in this book's gestation—that I first saw Mario Bava's films in a theatrical setting; it was a profoundly moving experience. When Alan died, he bequeathed his collection of stills and paper materials to me, which he always intended to be used as illustrations for this book, as well as his multi-standard VCR, so that I could complete my research for this book without obstacles. When he was here, no one was more effective than Alan at goading me toward the finish line. Since his death, the things he entrusted to me have continued to be his voice, and my most effective encouragement. He once told me that he would haunt me until I finished this book; now that I have done so, I hope he will continue.

My wife Donna—my partner in this and all Video Watchdog ventures—has been a witness to this endeavor every step of a very long way. The promise of this book has hovered like the North Star over the first thirty-two years of our marriage; it was my brainchild, but our pregnancy, and it was she who took the greatest pains in bringing it to term. After all, this book was my passion and that passion carried me through; Donna's passion for this book was her wish to see my passion realized and justified. Over the decades, she has saved these pages from the jaws of oblivion more than once, rescuing them from hard drive crashes and file corruptions, and also gently steering me back on course whenever I gave in to depression and told myself that this project could never be finished. When early samples were rejected by several mainstream publishers, we weathered those disappointments together. It was always Donna's belief in this project—or, more to the point, her belief in me—that kept it moving forward, against all odds. In the end, it was her expertise with desktop publishing, learned over a seventeen-year period with our magazine, that made this book possible, much as our magazine has cultivated and organized the audience that now exists for this book and makes it commercially feasible. To put it succinctly, this book is as much Donna's achievement as it is mine—it's my words and research, her design, my dedication, her willpower, our baby. In many ways, the years that were spent transforming my manuscript into this book were sheer hell, and not a hell either of us could have endured in solitude, or working so closely with anyone else. To thank her for her role in all this would be like thanking her for loving me, but my appreciation and admiration and love for her is boundless.

Over the years, Donna and I have received—truly—countless letters and phone calls of encouragement and remarkable patience from Video Watchdog readers aware of this developing project. With this in mind, I would like to thank, finally, anyone who ever wrote or called to inquire about this book's progress, or to encourage me toward this achievement—especially those who supported it by pre-ordering a copy. Mario Bava—All the Colors of the Dark is a dream in which we all have shared—one from which it sometimes seemed we might never awaken—and it's my hope that all the people involved in this endeavor, however peripherally, will find it as happily concluded as the relationships founded upon it are happily ongoing.

Tim Lucas
Cincinnati, Ohio
1975 – 2007

PATRONS

It goes without saying that a book of this size, scope, and presentation is not for the average reader and thus falls outside the commercial considerations of most publishing companies. That this book exists at all is due not only to our commitment, but to the financial and emotional investments of the following people, who pre-ordered this book and waited patiently and trustingly for production to be carried out. We thank them all for their faith, forbearance, and encouragement, as should all future readers of this book. Without their support, Mario Bava—All the Colors of the Dark as it stands, would have remained an impossible dream.

— Tim & Donna Lucas

Joshua Abelon
Bill Ackerman
Barney Adams
Larry Adams
Georg Adler
Martin Ain
Bruce Akiyama
Carlos Thomaz Albornoz
Bill Alexander
Wayne Alexander
Nadeem Ali
Stephen Allanson
Michael Allen
Matt Allison
Bill Amazzini
Steven Anderson
Per Andersson
Frank Andrews
Wolfgang Angst
Joey Anstett
Shane Antisdel
Norbert Aping
Alejandro Arboleda
Nick Aretakis
Mark Ashby
Rafe Atkinson
Matthias Auberger
Kim Aubry
Dave Aulph
Peter Avellino
Daniel Azevedo
Tatsuro Baba
Jorge Badenes Braulio
Edi Bagnoli
Matthew Bailey
Simon Baker
Mike Ballew
Holger Bals
Ronald Bandar
Brett Bargar
Jason Barkin
Jason Barnett
Jonathan R. Barnett
Robert P. Barone
David Barraclough
Christopher Barry
Michael Barry
Karl G. Bauer
Jeff Baughman
Jean-Marc Baurit
J. R. Beauchamp
Jason Bechard
Peter Beckman
Andrew J. Beckmann
Marco Bellini
Jerry S. Benner
Alan Bennett
Kathy McCord Bennett
Neil Bennett
Garry Benore
Howard Berger
James Bernard
(In Memoriam)
Olivier Billiottet
Dave Billman
John Black
Matthew Blake
Thomas Bleich
Bill Boehlke
David Bolinger Jr.
Ernie Bolmey
Theodore H. Boothe
Martin Borg
Alan Boshier
Victor Boston
John Bottiglieri
Mark Bowen
Steve Bowen
James Bowers
Michael Bowhay
Gordon Braden
Matthew Bradford
Mike & Liz Bradford
Matthew Bradley
Shaun Brady
Derek Brandt
Eric Brandt
Todd Brashear
David Breakfield
Ole Petter Brekke
Ryan Brennan
Randy Broecker
Martin Brooks
Michael Brooks
Anthony Brown
Timothy Browning
Mark Bryan
Keith Buckley
John Bulevich
Richard D. Bunt
James C. Buresh
Gary Burke
Crispin Burnham
William Burns
Mark Burson
Joe Busam
Tod Buttery
Markus Buttstaedt
Michael Calleo
John Paul Calpin
Ramsey Campbell
Robert Canipe
Eduardo Cano Jr.
Dennis Capicik
Victor Caravello
John Carraro
Graeme Carroll
Martin Carter
Paul Wade Carter
Brooks Caruthers
Donald Casali
Bob Cashill
Gian Luca Castoldi
Paganelli
Robert Chamberlain
Normand Champoux
Kenneth Chin
Marios Chirtou
Fred Chodkowski
Phil Churchill
Sal Ciavarello
Dean Cilfone
Randolph Cirilo
Collin Clark
David Clark
Jeff Clark
Peter Clasen
James Clatterbaugh
Brett Clement
Jeff Clement
Larry Clesceri
Jeffrey Cleveringa
John Clymer
Darrell Cole
Ian Collazo
Manuel Colombier
David Colton
David Comtois
Jeff Conner
Wade Connick
William Connolly
David A. Cook
Thomas Costello IV
Eric Cotenas
Georges Coune
Ralph Coviello
Daniel Craft
Jim Craine
James Creamer
James Cross
Matthew Crossman
Nigel Curl
Niklas Dahlman
Kevin A. Shaw &
Tina Dailey
Jonathan Daniels
Les Daniels
William D'Annucci
Dennis Darst
Richard Davidson
Brooks Davis
John A. Davis
Mitch Davis
Russell E. Davis
Jon Davison
Mike Davison
Bryan Dawkins
John de Klein
Roberto De Luca
David Deal
Scott DeGrave
Brendan Deininger
Michael DelFay
Joel DeLoach
Fabrice Depin
Stéphane Derdérian
William DeSanna
Cyril Descans
Marshall Deutelbaum
Robert Deveau
Brooke Devine
John DeVito Jr.
John Devlin
Torsten Dewi
Adriano Di Gaspero
Eerik Dickinson
Christopher Sven Dietrich
Robert DiMucci
Jean-Pierre Dionnet
Bob DiProspero
Reinhard Dirmeier
John Dodd
William Dodd
Jan Doense
Harald Dolezal
Michael Donnelly
John S. Douglas
Wyatt Doyle
Richard Drachtman
Michael Draine
Miller Drake
John W. Duke III
Richard Dulik
Frank Dumais
Robert Dunlop
G. M. Durrant
Wallace Eckton
Robert Edwards
John Egan
Brian Ehlert
Chris Eichler
Ofer Eliaz
Ambra Elmer
Nave El-Modigi
Jan Elvsen
Robert W. Engesser
Kenneth English
Lawrence Erenberg
Rexford A. Erickson
Joel Evans
John Exshaw
Jean-Christophe Eymard
Eric Eyster
Enrico Faccini
Brian Fass
Joel Fenster
Jay Fenton
Henry B. Fera
Marco Ferretti
David Finn
Andrew Fitzpatrick
Arthur A. Fleisher III
Tom Flener
Nigel Fletcher
Nicholas Flora
Brian Flynn
Fogelson Library
Russell Folks
Frank G. Fort
Christopher Fountas
Chris Fox
Tom Foxmarnick
Lee Franceschi
Carsten Frank
Sam H. Franklin
Linda Franz
Dave Fredriksen
John French
Jeffrey Frentzen
Kevin Frith
Roy Frumkes
Curtis Fukuda
Raymond Funamoto
Hiroyasu Funazumi
Frank Furseth
David Gaither
Dean Galanis
Robert A. Gallucci
Todd Garbarini
David Garcia
Robert Gard
Dave Garrett
Seth Garrett
Shawn Garrett
Mario & Roderick Gauci
Lou Gaul
Kit Gavin
Marc Gayan
Didier Gertsch
Tommy Gibbons
Heath Gibney
Gary Giddins
Mario Giguere
Antony Ginnane
Lawrence R. Gladwin
Scott Gladwin
Mark Glassy
Thomas S. Glidden
George Godwin
Aaron Goldberg
Mark Goldblatt
Lance Goldenberg
Christopher Goldrup
Paul Goltz
German Gomez
Mitch Gonzales
John Gonzalez
Dan Gosse
Michael Gottuso
Bob Goughan
Daniel Gouyette
David Green
Erik Greenman
David Gregory
Bryon Grey
Ian Grogan
Jason Cosino Grosso
Victor Guanowsky
Jerry Guanzon
Steve Guariento
Robert Guest
Bobby Guthrie
Richard C. Gwynn
Mark Hadzega
Robert Hale
Michael K. Hall
David Hammond
Chris Handling
Tim Hannigan
William Hansen
Bruce Hanson
Richard Hardbattle
Sammy Harkham
Gordon Harmer
Doug Harr
Chris Harris
Christopher Harris
Dean Harris
Mark Hash
Christopher Hasler
Terrence E. Haterius
Brian Hathaway
Kevin Hausenfluke
Les Havard
Ted Haycraft
Mark Hebden
Alan Hedgecock
Jonathan Hedges
Henrik Hemlin
Carsten Henkelmann
Paul Henning
Jean Baptiste Herment
Paul Herndon
Bernd Herzogenrath
Brent Hester
Marc Edward Heuck
John Heyer
Michael J. Hieb
Derek Hill
Jeff Hill
Greg Hillabrand
Scott Hocking
David Hogan
Harvey L. Holmes III
Lars Erik Holmquist
I. M. Hoogland
Brian Horowitz
Paul Horsley
Matt Hosseinzadeh
Tom Hotka
Chris Houghton
John Howie Jr.
Mike Howlett
Ira Hozinsky
Da-Shih Hu
David Hubbard
Kelly Hudson
Jonathan Hufford
Philip L. Hughes
Daniel Humenick
Paul Hutchings
Robert D. Hutchinson
Katsumi Ishikuma
John A. Jachrimo
Clarence Jackson
David Jackson
Wes Jackson
David Jacobs
Kjetil Færøyvik Jansen
Greg Javer
Sammy Jeanbart
Eric Lund
Paul Jensen
Jeffry Johnson
Joseph C. Johnson
Paul Anthony Johnson
Steven Johnson
Adrian Jones
Graham Jones
Kelley Jones
Stephen Jones
Mathias Jonsson
Herve Josse
Sam Juliano
Timothy Kallinis
Robert Kaltz
Richard Kandalic
Josh Kanin
Julian Karchmer
Johan Karlsson
Jeffrey W. Katz
Jamie Kaufman
Joseph Kaufman
Doug Keesey
Roger J. Keightley
Brian KenKnight
Glenn Kenny
Neil Kerr
William Kerrigan
Samuel Emil Kierzenblat
Kevin Killian
David Killough
Bruce Kimmel
Charles King
Dave King
Elizabeth Kingsley
Paul Kinnear
Kalle Pekka Kinnunen
Asle Helge Kiran
Steve Kirkham
Robert & Ruth Kiss
A. L. Kitaj
Pablo Kjolseth
Ronald Klem
Hermann Kleyboecker
Wilhelm Kloesch
Sergio Ribeiro Kneipp
Gary Knox
Jim Knusch
Michael Kohr
Rahn Kollander
Oskari Korenius
Andreas Kortmann
Dave Kosanke
Jari Kovalainen
Rick Kraemer
Charles Kramer
David Kraus
Michael Kreft
Tobias Kuehlewein
Armand Kunz
Dave Kurzman
Christopher Lackner
David & Laura Lady
J. D. Lafrance
Benjamin Lamb
Frankco J. G. Lamerikx
Viggo A. Lammer
Dennis Lancaster
Bryan V. Land
Nicolas Landraud
Richard Landwehr
Michael Lang
Volker Lange
Marty Langford
Stephen Langton
Russ Lanier
Charlie Largent
Martin H. Larsen
David Lass
Adam Le Borgne
Mike Lebbing

Michael LeBlanc
Philippe Lecuyer
Craig Ledbetter
Mike Lester
Clint Leugner
Frédéric Albert Lévy
Charles Lindsay
John Linton
Miroslaw Lipinski
William Livingston
Dennis Locantore
Tim Lockwood
Richard Longmore
Tobias Lotz
Philippe Lowinski
Wayne Luellen
Richard Lumley
Daniel Lundh
Mike MacCollum
Steven MacDiarmid
Scott A. MacGregor
Ryan MacMichael
Joseph Maddrey
Notker Mahr
Michael T. Mai
Chester Malon
Scott Mann
Ron Mansfield
Gregg Marchese
Lasse Marhaug
Michael Mariano
Anthony Mark
Jeff Markin
Gary Marsh
Rick Marshall
John Martin
Keith Martin
Perry Martin
Scott Martin
Susan Martin
Oscar Martinez
Neil Martinson
Mark Martucci
Peter T. Massaro
Sven Mattes
Primo Mazzoni
Justin McAllister
Mike McAndrew
Bob McCann
Chris McCann
Greg McCarthy
Nicholas McCarthy
Greg McClellan
John McClintock
Sean McCloy
Maitland McDonagh
Terence McDonald
Matt McGarrity
Paul McGlynn
Jeff McKay
Mac George McKay
Stuart McKenna
John McMasters
Kelly McMillan
Robert McMinn
Esteban Medaglia
David Meddick
Erich Mees III
Joe Mendez Jr.
Matthew Menges
Jason Meredith
Robert Merk
Gregory Meshman
Philippe Met
Kai Meyer
Richard Miami
Michael Miggins
Gary Militzer
Austin Miller
Mark A. Miller
Douglas Mills
Ralph Mindicino
Mathieu Minel
Jason Minnix
Michael Minogue
Greg Mohr
Fábio Vellozo Jardim Monteiro
Augusto Morales
John Moran
Chris Morrison
Motdue
Alexandre Mourreau
Matt Moxey
Sam Moyer
Thure Munkholm
Luis Munoz
Tim Murphy
Mark Murray
Michael H. Muzerall
Doug Myrland
David Nanian
Ken Nash
Joel Alan Nassan
Mark Natalie
Napoleon Naval
David Neabore
Erik Nelson
Fyfe Nelson
Mark Nelson
John Nemec
Darren Nemeth
Jim Nemeth
Jim Nester
Clive Newman
Raymond Ng
Nick Nicolaou
Scott Nicolosi
Timothy Niedert
Alexander Nikolaev
Jorgen Nilsson
Shingo Nishimura
Terry Nixon
Mike Noble
Chris Nolte
Christopher Norris
Guiskard Stephan Oberparleiter
Daniel O'Brien
Joey O'Bryan
Mike O'Connor
Patrick O'Donnell
Dan O'Gara
James O'Hagan
Raymond Oliveri
Tommy Olsson
Michael T. Ondrusek
James O'Neill
Kevin O'Neill
Akira Onishi
Bart Oosterhoorn
Christian Ostermeier
M. Oudejans
Jonathan Overholts
Thomas J. Overly
Richard Owen
Anne Oyama
Bryn Packard
Pablo Pappano
Joseph Parda
Kevin Parichan
Charles Park Jr.
Richard Parker
AJ Parkinson
Tom Parrott
Pete Pascuzzi
Jason Passons
Bibi Pasternack
Louis A. Paul
Robert L. Paul
Brad Payne
Douglas Payne
David Pelc
Vincent Pereira
Jason Perry
Jordan C. Perry
Werner Petermann
Sandy Petersen
John D. Peterson
Richard Peterson
Matthew Pettengill
Steve Pettengill
Joe Pettit
John Phelps
Steve Phillips
William Picard
Scott Piktel
Jeff Pimper
Thomas M. Pitzer
Chris Poggiali
Philip Poggiali
James Poling
John J. Polonia
Jeff Popovic
Craig Popplewell
Jeff Porosky
Mark P. Porsche
Gary Prange
Jack Pretty
Raymond Price
Robert Price
Carlos Primati
Gerard T. Priori
Christopher Providence
Wolfgang Puhl
Erick Purkhiser
Dan Pydynkowski
Francesc Quilis i Gomez
Lawrence Raffel
Timo Raita
Frank Raitter
Timothy Ramzyk
Carl Rathjen
Ian Rawlinson
Gil Ray
Joshua Reader
Keith Reamer
Jonathan Redman
Nick Redman
Nolan Reese
Chris & Elli Reid
Grady Reid
Charles Floyd Rhodes
Gary Rhodes
Frank K. Ricciardelli
Franck Richard
Sean Richardson
David Richer
Jeremy Richey
Craig Ridenour
Ray Ridley
Parker Riggs
Scott Rinicker
Arthur Riscen Jr.
Glenn Rivera
Morgan Roberts
Denny Robertson
Sandy Robertson
Todd S. Robertson
Kevin Robinson
Mark Robinson
Thomas Robinson
Mark Rodman
Carlos Rodriguez
Elizabeth & John Casson, Margaret & Inocencio Rodriguez
James Rodriguez
Paul Roen
Simon Rogers
Timothy I. Rogerson
James Roman
Michael Romano
Jean-Claude Romer
Paul Rosano
Brian Rosenquist
Rodney Ross
Thomas Rostock
Filippo Rostoni
Douglas A. Roy
Ulrich Ruedel
Scott Gerald Ruhl
F. Paul Russell III
George P. Ryan
Jeffrey Allen Rydell
Henrik Rytter
Luca Sabbatini
Marco Sabbatini
Nicky Sallade
L. Samuel
Hernan Sanchez
Javier Sanchez
David Sanjek
Michael Sansone
Bob Sargent
Kevin Sartori
Masaki Sato
Tyson Sawyer
George Schelling
Mark Schemanske
Florian Schiffmann
Harold Schmidt
Kevin Schmidt
Gregor Schneider
Raymond Scholer
Frank Schult
Steven Schulte
Douglas Schultz
Sean Schwaller
Thomas Scofield
Casey Scott
Jeff Segal
Sven-Erik Seldahl
Nicholas Selepes
David Shaw
Mick Sheehy
Joel Shepard
Justin Sheppherd
Dale Sherman
Peter Shigalkowski
Toshiyuki Shigeta
Kazunori Shimizu
Danny Shipka
Ken Shipley
John Short
Tom Shumaker
Andreas Siebert
Michael Silberman
Ira Silverberg
Brian Simmons
Tony Simonelli
Torben Simonsen
M. J. Simpson
Stephen Simpson
Peter Sjovall
Dylan Skolnick
Branislav Slantchev
Anthony F. Smith
Clive Smith
David H. Smith
David Meier Smith
Dwain Smith
Kyle Smith
Dan Snoke
Ben Snow
Greg Sonier
Maurice W. Southworth
Wade Sowers
Jason Spear
Monty Sprock
Bump Stadelman
Jeff Stafford
Eli Stagner
Richard Stammer
Mike Steele
James M. Steffen
Cary Stegall
John C. Stell
Dan Stelmach
Joel Stelt
John Stevenson
Kerry Stevenson
Lloyd Stires
Martin Stockdale
Tom Stockman
Andy Stout
Spencer Strack
Olaf Strecker
Eystein Strommen
Randy Strother
Yoshikazu Sugaya
Erik Sulev
Donald Sullivan
Larry Summerson
Peter Svensson
Michael Swart
Kevin Sweeney
Dan Sweet
Gunnar Syren
Ronald Tacelli
Archie Tait
Kim Takeuchi
Naoki Takuno
John Talley-Jones
Larry Tauber
Gary Teetzel
John Tener
Bruno Terrier
Daniel G. Tervoort
Ernest Terwilliger
Tom Thacker
Bill Thomas
Lois Thomas
Ronald H. Thomas
Steven J. Thomas
Lang Thompson
Ted C. Thompson
Todd Thompson
Anthony Thorne
Matthew Timpson
Bruce Tinkel
Keith Tisdale
Oliver Tocanne
William Todd
Pete Tombs
Manny Torres
Russell Torrie
Todd Toussaint
Robert Trebes
Rock Troutt
Lee Tsiantis
Curtis Tsui
Tim Tucker
Juho-Antti Tuhkanen
Jay Turner
Jamie Tuttle
Barbara Tyger
Meredith Usher
Pertti Vaananen
Ken Valenzano
Pascal Valiquette
Bart Van Der Put
Jan Van Heerde
Henry Veggian
Douglas Venable
Darrin Venticinque
Mark Verheiden
Carlos Villar Cordova
Bob Villard
Dick Vincent
Paul Vineyard
Jari Virtanen
Thomas Vohl
Neil Vokes
John Voytas, MD
Richard Waara
Eiko Wachholz
Kenneth Wagaman
Shane Wahlund
Chris Walas
Carlos Walraven
Lloyd C. Walraven
Charles Ward
Mike Ward
Karl Warneryd
Bill Warren
Terry James Warrick
Karl Wasmuth
Mike Wathen
Tom Watkins
Nathan Watson
Terry Wawro
Tom Weaver
Mark L. Webb
Peter Webb
John Weber
Lee Webster
Christopher Weedman
Mike Weigand
Matthew Weisman
Hagen Weiss
Russ Weissenburger
David West
Stuart West
Francine Whitney
Ron Wilber
Adam Williams
Daniel Shane Williams
Dylan Williams
Jason Williams
Lee Williams
Robert Williams
Scott A. Wilson
Frank Windelband
Douglas Winter
Robert Withey
Matthew Witt
Corey Wolverton
Miles Wood
Arthur J. Workman Jr.
Pat Wray
Walter Wrobel
James Wu
Reinhard Wulf
Mike Young
Barry Yuen
Stephan Zabka
Jan Zacek
Jeff Zahnen
Miklos Zarka
Mark Zimmer
Scott Zimmerman

INDICES

1098 Title Index
1108 Name Index
1125 Photo Credits

Title Index

Pages for illustrated entries appear in bold.

1,000 chilometri al minuto (1939) 215.
12 bambole biondo (unproduced) 634.
1900. See Novecento.
2+5: Missione Hydra (1966) 239, 393, 1023.
2001: A Space Odyssey (1968) 673.
5 bambole per la luna d'agosto (1970) 27, 99, 157, 159, 429, 461, 524, 587, 635, 751, 806, 808, 809–825, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 827, 834, 836, 838, 849, 850, 855, 862, 866, 879, 893, 914, 932, 942, 955, 994.
5 Dolls for an August Moon. See 5 bambole per la luna d'agosto.
8½. See Otto e mezzo.

A

A . . . come Assassino (1966) 450, 461.
A Meia-Noite Leverei Sua Alma (1964) 26.
The ABC Murders (1966) 461.
Abitanti del mare 54.
The Abominable Dr. Phibes (1971) 867.
Adios Sabata. See Indio Black.
The Adventures of Ulysses. See Le avventure di Ulisse.
Agi Murad il diavolo bianco (1959) 240, 243–250, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 251, 259, 443, 644, 905.
Alexander the Great (TV pilot) 277.
Alfa tau! (1942) 78.
Alfred Hitchcock Presents (TV series) 872.
Alien (1979) 600, 616, 621, 631, 1023.
All Quiet on the Western Front (1930) 276, 562, 589.
Allarme dal cielo (1965) 513.
Alone Against Rome. See Solo contro Roma.
Alta Tensione. See Brivido giallo.
Alto Lazio pittoresco (1956) 155.
L'amante della luna (1919) 51.
L'amante del vampiro (1960) 24, 292, 308, 310, 473.
The Amazing Dr. G. See I due mafiosi contro Goldginger.
American Psycho (2000) 793.
Amor non ho! . . . però, però . . . (1951) 110–111, 111.
Gli amore di Ercole (1960) 1066.
L'amore nell'arte (1950) 91.
L'amore primitivo (1963) 705.
. . . And God Said to Cain. See . . . E Dio disse a Caino.
Andrea—Wie ein Blatt auf Nackter Haut (1968) 919.
Andrei Rublyov (1969) 1007.
Anfiteatro Flavio (1947) 91.
Annie Hall (1977) 18, 937.
Anomalia (script) 286, 1025, 1029.
Anonimo veneziano (1970) 884.
The Anonymous Venetian. See Anonimo veneziano.
L'Anticristo (1974) 926.
Antonio da Padova (1949) 96–98, 97, 141.
Apache Drums (1951) 590.
Apocalypse (unfinished project) 1010.
Aquila nera (1946) 86, 120.
Arriva Dorellik (1967) 259, 755.
Arrivano i titani (1961) 384, 400, 403, 404, 635.
The Art of Alfred Hitchcock (book) 1006.
Arte nella porcellana (1949) 102.
Ashes. See Cenere.
L'assedio di Siracusa (1959) 237.
Assignment Outer Space. See Space Men.
Assignment Terror. See El Hombre que Vino de Ummo.
The Astounding She-Monster (1958) 320.
At Midnight I'll Take Your Soul. See A Meia-Noite Leverei Sua Alma.
L'Atlantide (1961) 394.
Atlas in the Land of the Cyclops. See Maciste nella terra dei Ciclopi.
Atom Age Vampire. See Seddok (L'erede di Satana).
Attack and Retreat. See Italiani brava gente.
Attack of the Normans. See I Normanni.
Attila. See Attila, il flagello di dio.
Attila, il flagello di dio (1954) 140–142.
El Aullido del Diavolo (1988) 869.
The Avengers (1998) 687.
L'avventura di Annabella (1943) 79.
Le avventure di Giacomo Casanova (1955) 111, 145, 145–149, 146, 147, 148, 149, 161, 384, 478, 485, 543.
Le avventure di Ulisse (1969) 762, 763, 771, 774–775, 775.

B

Baby Kong (unproduced) 775, 972–973, 975.
Il bacio di una morta (1949) 121.
Il bacio (1974) 976, 1024.
Balocchi e profumi (1953) 130.
The Band Wagon (1953) 203.
Barbarella (1968) 725, 726, 741, 742.
Il barbiere di Siviglia (1946) 85.
Barn of the Naked Dead (1973) 18.
Baron Blood (1972) 83, 268, 283, 327, 458, 466, 561, 562, 591, 655, 657, 671, 676, 680, 719, 802, 807, 818, 825, 844, 853, 854, 859, 870, 871–893, 872, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 881, 882, 883, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 895, 906, 907, 909, 910, 913, 918, 919, 921, 929, 936, 947, 968, 984, 1017, 1037, 1039.
El Baron del Terror (1961) 326.
Batman (1966 TV series) 723, 735.
Batman (1989) 1038.

La battaglia di Maratona (1959) 11, 16, 163, 199, 201, 230, 267–277, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 285, 301, 333, 340, 354, 520, 562, 588, 635, 889.
Battle of the Worlds. See Il pianeta degli uomini spenti.
Battleship Potemkin. See Bronenosets Potyamkin.
Bay of Blood 848, 855, 868. See also Ecologia del delitto.
Beach Party (1963) 309.
Beatrice Cenci (1956) 126, 172.
Beautiful but Dangerous. See La donna più bella del mondo.
Beauty and the Beast. See La Belle et le Bête.
A Bell From Hell. See La Campaña del Infierno.
Belle de Jour (1967) 533.
La Belle et le Bête (1946) 306, 318, 319, 678.
Ben-Hur (1959) 125, 352.
Ben-Hur: A Tale of the Christ (1925) 52, 178.
Beyond the Darkness. See Buio omega.
Beyond the Door. See Chi sei?.
Beyond the Door II. See Schock.
Beyond the Door III (1989) 993.
Beyond the Pleasure Principle (book) 680.
The Bicycle Thief. See Ladri di biciclette.
Bikini Beach (1964) 505, 511.
The Bird With the Crystal Plumage. See L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo.
The Black Eagle. See Aquila nera.
Black Narcissus (1947) 21.
Black Sabbath 693, 701, 707, 889, 1039, 1040. See also I tre volti della paura: Variants.
Black Sunday. See La maschera del demonio: Variants.
A Blade in the Dark. See La casa con la scala nel buio.
The Blancheville Monster. See Horror.
Blastfighter (1984) 1029.
Die Blaue Hand (1967) 552.
Blithe Spirit (1945) 780.
The Blob (1958) 256.
Blood and Black Lace 29, 549, 558, 711, 712, 786, 868, 949, 1038. See also Sei donne per l'assassino.
Blood Brides. See Il rosso segno della follia.
Blood Demon. See Die Schlangengrube und das Pendel.
Blood Simple (1984) 463.
Bloody Pit of Horror. See Il boia scarlatto.
Blue Velvet (1987) 18.
Bluebeard (1972) 868.
Body Puzzle. See Corpo mosaico.
Il boia scarlatto (1965) 24, 186, 326, 664, 782.
Bolle di sapone (1932-37) 54.
Bones (2001) 1039.
The Book of Imaginary Beings (book) 864.
Bordella (1976) 976.
The Brainiac. See El Baron del Terror.
Bride of Frankenstein (1935) 319.
Brivado giallo (TV movie series, 1987)
La casa del ogro 1029.
A cena col vampiro 1029.
Per sempre 1029.
Una notte al cimetero 1029.
Bronenosets Potyamkin (1925) 248.
The Brood (1979) 21.
The Brothers Karamazov (novel) 291.
Bruiser (2000) 823.
Buffalo Bill—L'eroe del Far West (1964) 582.
Buio omega (1980) 901.
Buonanotte . . . avvocato! (1955) 143–144, 144.
Il buono, il brutto, il cattivo (1966) 828, 838.
Burial Ground. See Le notti del terrore.

C

C'era una volta il West (1968) 641, 828, 859, 915.
C'è Sartana...vendi la pistola e comprati la bara (1970) 829.
Cabiria (1913) 42, 42–45, 43, 44, 45, 374, 378, 621.
Caltiki il mostro immortale (1959) 11, 16, 17, 201, 216, 252, 253–265, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 264, 266, 277, 287, 292, 296, 319, 330, 340, 357, 397, 502, 511, 574, 585, 640, 650, 707, 770, 813, 843, 917, 996.
Caltiki the Immortal Monster. See Caltiki il mostro immortale.
La Campaña del Infierno (1973) 779.
Cani arrabbiati (1975) 18, 29, 458, 459, 555, 817, 859, 860, 879, 931, 933, 940, 941–957, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 950, 951, 952, 953, 955, 956, 957, 977, 984, 1007, 1024, 1030, 1040.
Variants:
Kidnapped (2002) 860, 953–955.
Rabid Dogs (1975) 951–953.
Semaforo rosso (1975) 950–951.
Wild Dogs (1975) 953.
Cannibal Holocaust (1980) 976.
Capitan Tempesta (1942) 70–71, 71.
Caraibi (1998) 1031.
The Card Player. See Il cartaio.
Carmela, la sartina di Montesanto (1916) 449.
Carnage 848, 860. See also Ecologia del delitto (1971).
Carry On Nurse (1959) 316.
Il cartaio (2004) 30, 1032, 1033.
La casa con la scala nel buio (1983) 686, 1029.
La casa dalle finestre che ridono (1976) 1024.
La casa del ogro (1987) 1029.
Casanova (1976) 962, 976.
Il castello dei morti vivi (1964) 569, 575–577, 576, 577, 701.
Il castello della paura (1973) 802.
Castle of Blood. See Danza macabra.
Castle of the Living Dead. See Il castello dei morti vivi.
A Cat in the Brain. See Un gatto nel cervello.
The Cat o' NineTails. See Il gatto a nove code.
Cat People (1942) 918.
Il cavaliere misterioso (1947) 120.
I cavalieri delle stelle (unproduced) 997, 997–998.
Cave of the Golden Rose. See Fantaghirò.
Cenere (1916) 48, 49, 110.
Champagne caprige (1919) 51, 54.
The Changeling 2: The Return. See Brivado giallo: Per sempre.
Charlie and the Chocolate Factory (2005) 1038.
Che? (1972) 869.
Chi sei? (1974) 926.
Lo chiamovano Trinità (1971) 841.
La chiesa (1989) 1032.
The Church. See La chiesa.
Ciccio perdona . . . io no! (1968) 828.
Il cinema di meraviglie (1945) 515.
Cinque tombe per un medium (1966) 664, 676.
Cioccolatini Baci (TV commercials) 869.
La ciociara (1960) 135.
La città del cinema (book) 860.
Città di notte (1958) 210–211, 211, 761.
Les Classiques du Cinema Fantastique (book) 24.
Cleopatra (1963) 477.
The Clockwork Testament or Enderby's End (book) 968.
Close Encounters of the Third Kind (1977) 1023.
Code of Silence (1957) 436.
Colosus and the Headhunters. See Maciste contro I cacciatore di teste.
I coltelli del vendicatore (1966) 157, 221, 366, 422, 429, 524, 585, 642, 643–659, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 669, 678, 692, 715, 725, 740, 751, 789, 797, 866.
La comedie du Bonheur (1942) 69.
The Comedy of Terrors (1964) 468, 511.
The Commander (1988) 832.
La commare secca (1962) 450.
La compagna della teppa (1941) 70, 71.
Compañeros (1970) 829.
Conan the Barbarian (1982) 658.
The Conqueror Worm. See Witchfinder General.
The Conquest of Mycenae. See Ercole contro Molock.
Conquest of Space (1955) 215.
Conquest of the Normans. See I Normanni.
Contempt. See Le Mépris.
Conversation Piece. See Gruppo di famiglia in un interno.
Copiando la natura (1956) 155.
Le Corbeau (1943) 546.
La corona di ferro (1941) 75, 75–77, 76, 77, 122.
Corpo mosaico (1991) 669, 1031.
Corpse Bride (2005) 1038.
La Corrupcion de Chris Miller (1973) 779.
The Corruption of Chris Miller. See La Corrupcion de Chris Miller.
Cose da pazzi (1954) 134, 134–136, 135, 140.
Count Yorga—Vampire (1970) 872.
CQ (2001) 755, 1039.
Creature From the Black Lagoon (1954) 387.
Creature With the Blue Hand. See Die Blaue Hand.
The Creeping Unknown. See The Quatermass Xperiment.
I criminali della galassia (1965) 600, 878, 1023.
The Crimson Ghost (1946 serial) 265.
La cripta e l'incubo (1964) 326, 668.
Cristo a Gerusalemme (1947) 88.
Una croce senza nome (1952) 134.
The Crusaders. See La Gerusalemme liberata.
Cry Nightmare (script) 460, 557, 712, 712–716, 716, 725, 813, 850, 910. See also Nude . . . si muore.
The Curse of Frankenstein (1957) 287.
The Curse of the Crying Woman. See La Maldición de la Llorona.
The Cursed Medallion. See Il medaglione insanguinato.

D

Da qui all'eredità (1955) 126, 172.
Da uomo a uomo (1966) 727.
Dalle tre alle tre e mezza (story) 483.
Dall'uovo alla gallina 54.
The Damned (1961) 502.
The Dance of Death (poem) 921.
Danger: Diabolik. See Diabolik.
Dangerous Obsession. See Il miele del diavolo.
Danza macabra (1964) 407, 593, 878.
Daughter of Horror. See Dementia.
Dawn of the Mummy (1980) 1010.
The Day the Sky Exploded. See La morte viene dallo spazio.
De Profundis (book) 983.
Death Rides a Horse. See Da uomo a uomo.
Death Smiles on the Murderer. See La morte sorride all'assassino.
Deep Red. See Profondo rosso.
Delirium. See Le foto di Gioia.
Dementia (1955) 919.
Dementia 13 (1963) 18.
The Demon Planet. See Terrore nello spazio.
Demon Witch Child. See La Endemoniada.
Demoni (1985) 30, 324, 503, 1029, 1030, 1032.
Demoni 2 (1986) 877, 1029, 1032.
Demoni 3 (1991) 1029, 1032. See also La casa del ogro.
Demonia (1990) 832.
Il demoniaco nell'arte (1949) 93.
Il demonio (1964) 522, 526.
Demons. See Demoni.
Demons 2: The Nightmare Continues. See Demoni 2.
Desideria e l'anello del drago (1994) 1031.
Detour (1945) 955.
Deviation (1971) 858, 885.
Devilfish. See Oceano rosso.
The Devil's Backbone. See El Espinazo del Diablo.
The Devil's Commandment. See I vampiri: Variants.
Diabolik (1968) 16, 341, 362, 424, 457, 458, 484, 572, 613, 627, 660, 686, 697, 715, 716, 720, 721–755, 723, 724, 725, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 733, 734, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 758, 761, 764, 765, 775, 783, 789, 797, 798, 804, 805, 806, 813, 825, 834, 836, 842, 850, 852, 878, 882, 893, 909, 923, 929, 942, 955, 1038, 1039.
I diafanoidi vengono da Marte (1964) 600.
Diamonds Are Forever (1971) 752.
Diary of Forbidden Dreams. See Che?.
The Dick Cavett Show (TV show) 968.
Dick Smart 2.007 (1967) 689, 690.
Die, Monster, Die! (1965) 511, 600, 681.
Dinner With a Vampire. See Brivado giallo : A cena col vampiro.
Dio perdona . . . io no! (1967) 828.
Disastri della guerra (1950) 102, 132.
Divorce Italian Style. See Divorzio all'italiana.
Divorzio all'italiana (1961) 21, 461.
Django (1966) 828, 905.
Django, Kill!. See Se sei vivo spara.
La dolce vita (1960) 211, 394, 453, 778.
Don Cesare di Bazan (1942) 70, 77, 120.
Don Cesare di Bazan (1947) 442.
La donna più bella del mondo (1955) 420, 454, 591, 96, 149, 149–155, 150, 151, 152, 154, 157, 158, 161, 187, 496, 542, 709, 930.
Donne belle nella pittura italiana (1946) 84.
Don't Look Now (1973) 686, 701.
A doppia faccia (1969) 121.
The Double (novel) 291.
Double Face. See A doppia faccia.
Dr. Frankenstein's Castle of Freaks. See Il castello della paura.
Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine (1965) 690, 691, 698, 701, 706.
Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs. See Le spie vengono dal semifreddo: Variants.
Dr. Goldfoot e il nostro Agente 00¼. See Dr. Goldfoot and the Bikini Machine.
Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (1931) 178.
Dr. No (1962) 735.
Dr. Phibes Rises Again (1972) 867.
Dracula (1931) 319, 507, 872.
Dracula (1958) 283, 327. See also Horror of Dracula.
Dracula (novel) 315, 501, 680.
Dracula A.D. 1972 (1971) 307, 872.
Dracula Cha-Cha-Cha (song) 189.
Dracula's Daughter (1936) 319.
A Dragonfly for Each Corpse. See Una Libélula para cada muerto.
The Dragon's Blood. See Sigfrido.
The Dragon's Ring. See Desideria e l'anello del drago.
The Drop of Water. See I tre volti della paura: Episodes: La goccia d'acqua.
I due mafiosi contro Goldginger (1965) 691.
Variants:
The Amazing Dr. G 691.
Due occhi diabolici (1990) 566, 1017.
The Dunwich Horror (1970) 707.

E

È arrivato il cavaliere! (1950) 107, 107–108.
. . . E Dio disse a Caino (1969) 828.
Ecco la felicità! (1940) 69.
Ecologia del delitto (1971) 21, 26, 54, 82, 210, 322, 427, 429, 539, 556, 561, 563, 566, 614, 655, 676, 687, 706, 715, 717, 789, 802, 813, 825, 835, 846, 847–869, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 878, 879, 884, 889, 890, 892, 912, 921, 922, 933, 934, 942, 951, 955, 973, 977, 995, 1017, 1023.
USA Release:
Twitch of the Death Nerve 24, 847, 848, 860–862, 868, 885.
L'elisir d'amore (1947) 86, 86–88, 87, 89.
La Endemoniada (1974) 926.
Enemy From Space. See Quatermass 2.
Equador (song) 105.
Era una foglia . . . (unfinished project) 901.
Ercole al centro della terra (1961) 74, 77, 115, 138, 215, 231, 237, 309, 344, 362, 366, 383, 388, 389–411, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 422, 426, 428, 429, 434, 436, 437, 438, 458, 478, 511, 521, 522, 525, 529, 537, 572, 574, 575, 576, 582, 588, 591, 617, 626, 655, 671, 750, 804, 825, 841, 1014, 1038.
Variants:
Hercules in the Center of the Earth 387, 406, 407, 408, 409.
Hercules in the Haunted World 324, 341, 389, 406, 407, 408, 409, 485, 558, 606, 711, 775, 1038.
Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide (1961) 237, 373, 374, 381, 381–387, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 389, 390, 394, 399, 407, 410, 622, 623.
Variants:
Hercules and the Captive Women 294, 374, 384, 387, 407.
Hercules Conquers Atlantis 350, 374, 387, 395, 407, 387.
Ercole contro Molock (1963) 1066.
Ercole e la regina di Lidia (1959) 97, 122, 138, 177, 204, 222, 224, 225–239, 227, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 241, 246, 249, 272, 349, 373, 376, 381, 385, 405, 511, 915.
Variants:
Hercules Unchained 163, 207, 209, 226, 228, 239, 241, 251, 277, 353, 395, 907, 972.
Ercole l'invincibile (1964) 568, 569, 570, 570–572, 571.
Ercole sfida Sansone (1963) 237.
Erik il vichingo (1965) 644.
Erik the Conqueror. See Gli invasori: Variants.
Erik the Viking. See Erik il vichingo.
Gli eroi della domenica (1952) 117, 138.
Escape From Reality. See Natale al campo 119.
Esmeralda Bay (1989) 832.
Esotica, erotika, psicotika (1970) 805.
El Espinazo del Diablo (2001) 687.
Esther and the King (1960) 97, 230, 272, 292, 329, 335–345, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 343, 344, 345, 353, 373, 393, 422, 457, 496, 734, 909.
Estratto dagli archivi segreti della polizia di una capitale europea 858, 905.
The Eve of Saint Venus (novel) 1002.
Evil Eye. See La ragazza che sapeva troppo.
The Exorcist (1973) 852, 909, 925, 926, 927, 931, 935, 938.
Eye in the Labyrinth. See L'occhio nel labirinto.
Eyes Without a Face. See Les Yeux sans Visage.
Eyewitness. See Testimone oculare.

F

Fabiola (1949) 106, 122, 440.
The Fall of the House of Usher (1960) 317.
La famiglia Passaguai (1951) 112, 112–117, 114, 283.
La famiglia Passaguai fa fortuna (1952) 112–117, 113, 113–117, 902.
La Famille du Wurdalak (story) 482, 501.
Il fanciullo del West (1942) 582.
Fantaghirò (1991-96) 30, 669, 903, 1031, 1032.
Fantasia sottomarina (1938) 66.
Fantasie di statuine (1949) 102.
Fantastic Voyage (1966) 255.
Fantômas (1964) 319, 723.

Fantômas contre Scotland Yard (1967) 319.
Fantômas se déchaîne (1965) 319, 1067.
Fantômas Strikes Back. See Fantômas se déchaîne.
La farfalla della morte (1920) 51.
Le fatiche di Ercole (1958) 11, 42, 153, 157, 163, 190, 191–193, 192, 193, 194, 195, 199, 200, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 216, 225, 226, 228, 231, 233, 235, 239, 242, 250, 272, 277, 353, 356, 373, 392, 405, 486, 487, 501, 572, 655, 761, 891, 907, 915, 945, 1062.
Faust (1923) 318.
Fear Dot Com (2002) 687, 1039.
Femina ridens (1969) 771, 805, 858.
La festa di Sant'Isidoro (1950) 102, 132.
Il figlio di D'Artagnan (1950) 120.
Il figlio di Spartacus (1963) 593.
A Fistful of Dollars. See Per un pugno di dollari.
A Fistful of Dynamite. See Giù la testa.
A Fistful of Lead. See C'è Sartana...vendi la pistola e comprati la bara.
Flash Gordon (1980) 231.
The Fly (1958) 494.
The Fly (1986) 18.
Follia omicida (1980) 121.
Follie per l'opera (1948) 89, 89–90, 90, 94, 178.
For a Few Dollars More. See Per qualche dollaro in più.
Forbidden Planet (1956) 605, 622, 674.
Forme plantoniche 54.
Le foto di Gioia (1987) 1004, 1028.
Four Flies on Grey Velvet. See Quattro mosche di velluto grigio.
Four Times That Night (1971) 31, 158, 283, 777, 778, 779, 789, 791, 794, 795–807, 796, 798, 799, 800, 802, 803, 805, 806, 807, 809, 810, 813, 831, 832, 836, 841, 853, 855, 872, 881.
Frankenstein (1931) 319.
Frankenstein Created Woman (1967) 673.
Frankenstein's Bloody Terror. See La Marca del Hombre Lobo.
Frankenstein's Daughter (1958) 320.
Frenzy (1972) 867, 1006.
Freud (1962) 683, 684.
Friday the 13th (1980) 21, 26, 850, 868, 869.
Frozen Terror. See Macabro.
La frusta e il corpo (1963) 16, 21, 23, 82, 96, 137, 148, 157, 186, 220, 247, 275, 311, 322, 393, 396, 429, 444, 450, 458, 491, 495, 497, 516, 517–539, 518, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 541, 542, 558, 566, 567, 575, 615, 640, 652, 663, 672, 673, 676, 706, 709, 715, 750, 774, 804, 818, 819, 825, 872, 878, 968, 994, 995, 996, 1029, 1039.
  Variants:
    Night Is the Phantom 470, 518, 537, 539.
    What 538.
I futuribili (TV commercials) 842, 842–843.

G

Galaor contro Galaor (1924) 51, 513.
Galaor tra i leoni. See L'ultima avventura di Galaor.
Galaxy of Terror (1981) 1025.
Gammera the Invincible (1965) 659.
The Gardener (book) 984.
Il gatto a nove code (1971) 848, 849, 878.
Un gatto nel cervello (1990) 832.
The Gay Swordsman. See Il cavaliere misterioso.
La Gerusalemme liberata (1911) 41.
Ghost Son (2006) 1031.
The Ghost. See Lo spettro.
Giallo (TV show) 1029, 1032.
The Giant of Marathon. See La battaglia di Maratona.
The Giant of Metropolis. See Il gigante di Metropolis.
The Giants of Thessaly. See I giganti della Tessaglia.
Il gigante di Metropolis (1961) 400.
I giganti della Tessaglia (1960) 456.
I giganti della Tessaglia (Gli argonauti) (1960) 347, 348, 348–350, 394, 396.
I giochi del diavolo: storie fantastiche dell'800 (1978-80 TV series) 1002.
Il gioko (1988) 1030.
The Girl Who Knew Too Much. See La ragazza che sapeva troppo.
Giù la testa (1971) 839.
Giulietta degli spiriti (1965) 683, 684.
Giulietta e Romeo (1964) 877.
Il gladiatore invincibile (1961) 412, 413–415, 415, 438.
Gladiators 7. See I sette gladiatori.
Go for Broke! (1951) 121.
God Forgives . . . I Don't. See Dio perdona . . . io no!.
The Godfather Part III (1990) 832.
Gold for the Caesars. See Oro per i Cesari.
Goliath and the Barbarians. See Il terrore dei Barbari.
Goliath and the Dragon. See La vendetta di Ercole.
Goliath and the Dragon (unproduced) 387, 414.
Goliath and the Vampires. See Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan.
The Good, the Bad and the Ugly. See Il buono, il brutto, il cattivo.
The Grapes of Death. See Les Raisins de la Mort.
Graveyard Disturbance. See Brivado giallo: Una notte al cimetero.
Graveyard Disturbance (TV movie) 1032.
Graziella (1954) 136, 136–138, 137, 384, 530.
Gremlins (1984) 1037.
The Grim Reaper. See La commare secca.
Gruppo di famiglia in un interno (1974) 967.
Guardie e ladri (1951) 103, 108, 108–110, 109, 145, 724.

H

Hanno rubato un tram (1954) 142, 142–143, 143, 838, 902.
Happy Birthday to Me (1981) 566.
Hatchet for the Honeymoon. See Il rosso segno della follia.
The Haunted Palace (1963) 26, 256.
The Haunting of Hill House (novel) 676.
The Haunting of Morella (1990) 326.
Henry and Janet (unproduced). See Last Will and Testament.
Hercules. See Le fatiche di Ercole.
Hercules Against the Moon Men. See Maciste e la regina di Samar.
Hercules and the Captive Women. See Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide: Variants.
Hercules Conquers Atlantis. See Ercole alla conquista di Atlantide: Variants.
Hercules in the Center of the Earth. See Ercole al centro della terra: Variants.
Hercules in the Haunted World. See Ercole al centro della terra: Variants.
Hercules in the Valley of Woe. See Maciste contro Ercole nella valle dei guai.
Hercules, Prisoner of Evil. See Ursus il terrore dei Kirghizi.
Hercules Recycled (1997) 239.
Hercules, Samson and Ulysses. See Ercole sfida Sansone.
Hercules the Avenger. See La sfida dei giganti.
Hercules Unchained. See Ercole e la regina di Lidia.
Hercules vs. the Hydra. See Gli amore di Ercole.
Hercules: The Legendary Journeys (TV series) 1038.
Hexen bis aufs Blut Gequaelt. See Mark of the Devil.
The Hideous Sun Demon (1959) 187.
High School. See Terza liceo.
Histoires Extraordinaires (1967) 24, 614, 684, 869.
  Episodes:
    Toby Dammit 684–686, 685, 686, 686–687, 834.
The Hobbit (book) 1033.
Hobson's Choice (1954) 1014.
Hollywood Boulevard (1975) 26.
El Hombre que Vino de Ummo (1968) 872.
The Horrible Dr. Hichcock. See L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock.
Horror (1963) 782, 1067.
Horror Castle. See La vergine di Norimberga.
Horror of Dracula (1958) 313. See also Dracula (1958).
House By the River (1950) 530.
House of Dracula (1945) 319.
The House of Exorcism (1975) 18, 459, 877, 908, 913, 914, 924, 925–939, 926, 927, 928, 929, 930, 931, 932, 934, 936, 937, 938, 942, 948, 953, 993.
House of the Ogre. See Brivado giallo: La casa del ogro.
House of Wax (1953) 171, 172, 174, 182, 287, 889.
The House on Skull Mountain (1974) 187.
The House With the Laughing Windows. See La casa dalle finestre che ridono.
How to Kill 400 Duponts. See Arriva Dorellik.
The Humanoid. See L'umanoide.

I

I Still Know What You Did Last Summer (1998) 21.
I Walked With a Zombie (1943) 918.
L'iguana dalla lingua di fuoco (1971) 858.
The Iguana With the Tongue of Fire. See L'iguana dalla lingua di fuoco.
Ilya Muromets (1956) 442.

In Search of Dracula (1974) 871.
In the Vault (story) 900.
Indio Black (1971) 829.
Inferno (1980) 26, 377, 614, 630, 907, 993, 1004, 1008, 1009–1019, 1010, 1011, 1012, 1013, 1014, 1015, 1016, 1017, 1018, 1019, 1023, 1024, 1029, 1032.
The Innocents (1961) 918.
Insetti nocivi 54.
L'intelligenza dei fiori (1933) 54.
The Interpretation of Dreams (book) 675.
The Invaders. See Gli invasori: Variants.
Invaders From Mars (1953) 420.
Invasion of the Body Snatchers (1956) 502.
Gli invasori (1961) 19, 90, 137, 142, 151, 294, 350, 366, 381, 392, 393, 405, 416, 417–431, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 428, 429, 430, 431, 448, 457, 458, 515, 549, 558, 582, 587, 589, 597, 625, 640, 644, 649, 654, 678, 709, 742.
Variants:
Erik the Conqueror 424–428.
The Invaders 424–428.
The Invincible Gladiator. See Il gladiatore invincibile.
L'ira di Dio (1968) 832.
The Iron Crown. See La corona di ferro.
La isla de la muerte (1966) 437.
Island of the Doomed. See La isla de la muerte.
It Happened in the Park. See Villa Borghese.
It! The Terror From Beyond Space (1958) 600, 631.
Italiani brava gente (1965) 515.

J

Jail Bait (1954) 197.
Jesus of Nazareth (miniseries 1977) 962.
Joko, invoca Dio . . . e muori! (1968) 881.
Journey Beneath the Desert. See L'Atlantide.
Journey to the Center of the Earth (1959) 394.
Judex (1917–18 Silent serial) 722.
Juliet of the Spirits. See Giulietta degli spiriti.
Jungle Holocaust. See Ultimo mondo cannibale.

K

Kasyan From the Beautiful Lands (story) 291.
Keoma (1976) 838.
Kidnapped. See Cani arrabbiati: Variants.
Kill, Baby . . . Kill! 850. See also Operazione paura.
King Kong (1976) 972, 975.
King Kong vs. Godzilla (1962) 812.
King Size Canary (1947) 863.
The Kingdom (1994 miniseries) 687.
Kiss of a Dead Woman. See Il bacio di una morta.
Knives of the Avenger. See I coltelli del vendicatore.
Kojak (TV series) 906.
Kundun (1997) 566.

L

Ladri di biciclette (1948) 378.
Il ladro di Bagdad (1961) 201, 246, 269, 274, 347, 348, 353–359, 354, 356, 357, 358, 359, 361, 363, 368, 378, 387, 392, 527, 593.
Lady Frankenstein (1971) 437.
La lama nel corpo (1966) 529, 668, 673, 681, 817.
Variants:
Revenge of the Living Dead 681.
The Last Days of Pompeii. See Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei.
The Last House on the Left (1972) 861, 868.
The Last Man on Earth. See L'ultimo uomo della terra.
Last of the Vikings. See L'ultimo dei vichinghi.
The Last Survivor. See Ultimo mondo cannibale.
The Last Temptation of Christ (1988) 687, 1038.
Last Will and Testament 932, 933, 942.
The Laughing Women. See Femina ridens.
Legend (1985) 1031.
Leggenda sinfonica (1947) 91.
Le legioni di Cleopatra (1960) 413.
Legions of the Nile. See Le legioni di Cleopatra.
Il leone di Amalfi (1950) 107, 107–117, 141.
Il leone di Damasco (1942) 70.
Leonor (1975) 685.
The Leopard Man (1943) 319, 889.
Una lezione di geometria (1948) 97, 97–98, 215, 801.
Una Libélula para cada muerto (1973) 859.
The Libertine. See La matriarca.
Libido (1966) 177.
The Lickerish Quartet. See Esotica, erotika, psicotika.
Lifeboat (1944) 957.
Lisa and the Devil (1973) 18, 77, 79, 82, 169, 199, 248, 283, 286, 312, 340, 458, 459, 460, 461, 486, 641, 677, 680, 706, 751, 781, 841, 887, 888, 894, 895–923, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 906, 907, 908, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 916, 917, 918, 920, 925, 926, 927, 929, 932, 933, 934, 937, 938, 943, 955, 957, 968, 997, 1007, 1027, 1041.
Variants:
El Diablo se Lleva los Muertos 922–923.
The Little Shop of Horrors (1959) 436.
The Long Hair of Death. See I lunghi capelli della morte.
A Long Ride From Hell. See Vivo per la tue morte.
The Long Ships (1964) 644.
Lost in Space (TV series) 872.
Loves of a Clown. See I pagliacci (amore tragico).
The Loves of Count Iorga. See Count Yorga—Vampire.
The Loves of Hercules. See Gli amore di Ercole.
Luci del varietà (1950) 104.
I lunghi capelli della morte (1964) 322, 673, 717.
Lust for a Vampire (1971) 715.
Lycanthropus (1961) 215, 523, 524, 715.

M

M (1931) 683.
Macabro (1980) 30, 1024, 1025, 1029.
La macchina ammazzacattivi (1948) 55.
Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan (1961) 373, 377, 378, 378–381, 379, 380, 441.
Maciste all'inferno (1925) 60, 75, 397.
Maciste all'inferno (1962) 432–442, 433, 434, 434–437, 435–442, 436–442.
Maciste contro Ercole nella valle dei guai (1961) 434.
Maciste contro I cacciatore di teste (1960) 434.
Maciste contro il vampiro (1961) 352, 372, 373, 374, 374–378, 375, 376, 377, 572.
Maciste contro Maciste (1923) 513.
Maciste e la regina di Samar (1964) 569, 572, 572–575, 573, 574, 1014.
Maciste imperatore (1924) 60.
Maciste in Hell. See Maciste all'inferno.
Maciste, l'uomo più forte del mondo (1961) 571, 1066.
Maciste nella gabbia dei leoni (1926) 60.
Maciste nella terra dei Ciclopi (1961) 374.
Maciste nella valle dei Re (1960) 374, 382, 420.
Mad About the Opera. See Follie per l'opera.
Maggio—mese dei fiori (1909) 41.
The Magnificent Strangers (novel) 832.
La Maldición de la Llorona (1961) 26.
Malenka (1967) 681.
Variants:
Fangs of the Living Dead 681.
Man and Boy. See L'uomo e il bambino (unproduced).
The Man Who Didn't Want to Die. See L'uomo che non voleva morire.
Maniac (1980) 1015.
Mannekäng i rött (1958) 543, 544, 889.
La Mansión de la Niebla (1972) 438.
Marathon Man (1976) 686.
La Marca del Hombre Lobo (1967) 872.
Marco Polo (1962) 378.
Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre (2000) 26, 326, 1033, 1041.
Mario Bava Operazione Paura (2004) 26.
The Mario Bava Original Soundtrack Anthology (soundtrack) 1038.
Mark of the Devil (1969) 860.
La maschera del demonio (1960) 7, 16, 22, 23, 24, 26, 29, 65, 70, 77, 79, 82, 83, 115, 117, 139, 141, 144, 158, 163, 178, 180, 184, 186, 199, 201, 216, 227, 239, 258, 261, 277, 279, 280, 281–327, 284, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 293, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 308, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 320, 321, 323, 325, 326, 329, 335, 342, 344, 347, 349, 353, 362, 366, 377, 392, 399, 401, 403, 405, 407, 409, 422, 429, 433, 435, 447, 448, 449, 452, 454, 458, 462, 501, 502, 511, 515, 519, 520, 522, 529, 532, 542, 552, 561, 564, 565, 574, 587, 616, 624, 626, 630, 640, 641, 664, 667, 676, 678, 679, 680, 681, 683, 707, 709, 773, 775, 804, 810, 813, 841, 843, 862, 868, 882, 888, 889, 919, 920, 954, 984, 1005, 1007, 1015, 1027, 1028, 1029, 1038.
Variants:
Black Sunday (AIP version) 249, 265, 298,

307, 308–313, 316, 316–318, 317–318, 389, 424, 449, 487, 494, 509, 510, 519, 606, 624, 682, 707, 786, 884, 888, 889, 1040.
Black Sunday (Leone version) 327.
La Máscara del Demonio (Spanish) 282, 315.
La maschera del demonio (Lamberto Bava version) 324, 1030.
The Mask of Satan 309, 310, 313, 315, 317, 327, 775.
Revenge of the Vampire 317, 626, 324.
La maschera di cera. See House of Wax.
The Mask of Satan. See La maschera del demonio: Variants.
The Masque of the Red Death (1964) 26.
Master of Terror. See Il principe del terrore.
Master of the World (1961) 414.
Matador (1986) 565, 1038.
Matalo! (1970) 1067.
La matriarca (1969) 805.
The Maze (1953) 256.
McHale's Navy (1963) 493.
Il medaglione insanguinato (1975) 860.
The Medusa Against the Son of Hercules. See Perseo l'invincibile: Variants.
Le Mépris (1963) 565.
Le meraviglie di Aladino (1961) 131, 143, 248, 353, 360, 361–371, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 384, 394, 400, 409, 423, 458, 486, 549, 650, 670, 724, 734, 785, 910, 915, 969, 994, 1028.
Le meravigliose avventure di Guerrin Meschino (1951) 141.
Il miele del diavolo (1986) 832.
Mill of the Stone Women. See Il mulino delle donne pietra.
Minnesota Clay (1964) 452, 582, 593, 594, 595, 596, 635, 640, 905.
The Minotaur. See Teseo contro il Minotauro.
Mio figlio Nerone (1956) 155, 155–160, 155–167, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 167, 184, 203, 213, 242, 384, 429, 511, 915.
I miserabili (1947) 120.
Les Miserables. See I miserabili.
Miss Italia (1950) 98, 98–100, 99, 100, 128.
Miss Italy, My Beautiful Daughter. See Miss Italia.
Missile to the Moon (1958) 872.
Il mito di Giorgione (1947) 84.
Mole Men Against the Son of Hercules. See Maciste, l'uomo più forte del mondo.
I mongoli (1961) 380, 644.
The Mongols. See I mongoli.
Monsieur Verdoux (1947) 789.
Montecassino nel cerchio di fuoco (1946) 83, 215.
Morgan il pirata (1960) 201, 269, 294, 328, 329–333, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 353, 889.
Morgan the Pirate. See Morgan il pirata.
Morirai a mezzanotte (1986) 1029.
La morte sorride all'assassino (1973) 26.
La morte viene dal pianeta Aytin (1967) 600.
La morte viene dallo spazio (1958) 79, 117, 163, 177, 212, 213–223, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 223, 234, 254, 257, 258, 259, 265, 287, 384, 394, 478, 523, 527, 543, 574, 599, 622, 650, 652.
Moses (1976) 971–972.
Moses the Lawgiver (1975) 79, 177, 524, 958, 960, 961–971, 962, 963, 964, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971, 972, 976, 977, 1004.
Moses: A Narrative (book) 962.
Il mostro di Frankenstein (1920) 75, 171.
Mr. George (story) 981.
Il mulino delle donne di pietra (1960) 246, 310.
The Mummy's Curse (1944) 320.
The Murder Clinic. See La lama nel corpo.
Murder Mansion. See La Mansión de la Niebla.
Murder Obsession. See Follia omicida.
Musica nel cielo (1947) 88.
My Son the Hero. See Arrivano i titani.
Mystery Science Theater 3000 (TV series) 239, 755.

N

The Name of the Game Is Kill (1968) 24.
Natale al campo 119 (1947) 88, 88–89, 210, 364, 877.
La nave bianca (1942) 77–79, 78.
Nel segno di Roma (1959) 156, 237, 242–243, 243, 251, 333, 454.
Variants:
Sign of the Gladiator 243.
Nero's Mistress. See Mio figlio Nerone.
Next!. See Lo strano vizio della signora Wardh.
The Night Evelyn Came Out of the Grave. See La notte che Evelyn uscì dalla tomba.
Night Hair Child (1971) 859, 981, 997.
Night Is the Phantom. See La frusta e il corpo: Variants.
Night of the Devils. See La notte dei diavoli.
Night of the Living Dead (1968) 502, 626.
Night of the Silvery Moon (1954) 413.
Le Noche de Walpurgis (1970) 872.
Non c'è amore più grande (1955) 145.
I Normanni (1962) 223, 433, 434, 437, 437–438.
Nosferatu (1922) 318, 988.
La notte che Evelyn uscì dalla tomba (1971) 878.
La notte dei diavoli (1972) 483, 878.
Una notte di 21 ore (story) 602–605, 631.
Le notti del terrore (1981) 668.
Novecento (1977) 967.
Nuda per Satana (1974) 24, 614, 686.
Nude . . . si muore (1968) 460, 499, 557, 710, 711–719, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 782, 789, 915.
Nude for Satan. See Nuda per Satana.
I nuraghi (1950) 102.

O

L'occhio (1935) 54.
L'occhio nel labirinto (1971) 515.
Oceano rosso (1984) 1029.
Odissea (1968) 140, 220, 246, 309, 366, 515, 650, 763–775, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 772, 773, 774, 779, 869, 938, 962, 968, 970, 971.
Odore di carne (unproduced project) 848.
Oggi a me . . . domani a te! (1968) 832.
The Ogre. See La casa dell'ogro.
Once Upon a Time in the West. See C'era una volta il West.
Un'ondata di piacere (1975) 976.
One On Top of the Other. See Una sull'altra.
Opera (1987) 1004, 1032.
Operation Cross Eagles (1969) 872.
Operazione paura (1966) 21, 24, 30, 32, 33, 37, 45, 89, 136, 137, 159, 184, 220, 322, 324, 362, 386, 405, 422, 461, 495, 528, 556, 558, 574, 597, 662, 663–687, 664, 665, 666, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 684, 686, 689, 719, 738, 761, 797, 806, 825, 829, 866, 878, 883, 893, 899, 902, 910, 919, 930, 969, 994, 1004, 1005, 1029, 1038, 1039.
Variants:
Curse of the Living Dead 681, 682.
Orgy of the Living Dead. See Operazione paura: Variants: Curse of the Living Dead.
Orlando e i paladini di Francia (1956) 70, 161, 161–164, 162, 163, 761.
Oro per i Cesari (1963) 443, 1066.
Orphée (1949) 678.
Orpheus. See Orphée.
L'orrecchio (1946) 54, 84–85, 91, 125, 215.
L'orribile segreto del Dr. Hichcock (1962) 258, 348, 441, 497, 522, 529, 571.
L'ospedale del delitto (1950) 102, 167.
L'ospite dalle due (TV show) 621, 772, 938–939, 939.
L'ossessa (1974) 926.
The Others (2002) 1039.
Otto e mezzo (1963) 322.
The Outlaw (1943) 310, 641.

P

I pagliacci (amore tragico) (1948) 94, 94–96, 95, 96, 542.
Pajama Party (1964) 609.
Paolo Veronese, pittore della gioia e del fatto (1946) 84.
Papà diventa Mamma (1952) 112–117, 115–117, 116.
Passaggio del mar (1947) 88.
The Patsy (1964) 509.
Il peccato degli anni verdi (1959) 211.
Peeping Tom (1960) 18.
Per qualche dollaro in più (1965) 852, 853.
Per un pugno di dollari (1964) 414, 581, 587, 596, 634, 828.
Perdonami! (1953) 127, 127–128, 128, 221.
Perseo l'invincibile (1963) 468, 472, 473–479, 477, 478, 517.
Variants:
The Medusa Against the Son of Hercules 473, 479.
Peter Ibbetson (1935) 677.
Il pianeta degli uomini spenti (1961) 600.
Il pianeta errante (1964) 600.
Pietà per chi cade (1953) 902.
Un pioniere del cinema scientifico Roberto Omegna 1876–1948 54.
Pirates of the Caribbean. See Caraibi.
A Pistol for Ringo. See Una pistola per Ringo.
Una pistola per Ringo (1965) 635.
Il pistolero segnato da Dio (1968) 571, 756, 757–761, 758, 759, 760.

Pit and the Pendulum (1961) 26, 326, 463, 518, 519.
Planet of the Vampires. See Terrore nello spazio.
Planet on the Prowl. See Il pianeta errante.
The Playgirls and the Vampire. See L'ultima preda del vampiro.
Pokémon (animated series) 1039.
Pokémon (TV series) 687.
La polizia chiede aiuto (1974) 860, 951.
Porcellana nell'arte (1949) 102.
Le porte d'oro (1949) 102.
The Portrait of Dorian Gray (novel) 779.
The Possessed (novel) 901.
Prelude à l'apres-midi d'un faune (1937) 66.
Primitive Love. See L'amore primitivo.
The Princess and the Pauper. See La principessa e il povero.
Il principe del terrore (1988) 1030.
La principessa e il povero (1997) 1031.
The Prisoner (1967–68 TV Series) 687.
Profondo rosso (1975) 463, 519, 685, 811, 825, 982, 991, 1011.
Psycho (1960) 449, 453, 531, 848, 851.
Pulp Fiction (1994) 511, 957, 1038.

Q

Quando Alice ruppe lo specchio (1988) 832.
Quante volte . . . quella notte. See Four Times That Night.
Quatermass 2 (1957) 215, 255.
Quatermass and the Pit (1958 Teleplay) 189.
Quatermass and the Pit (1968) 673.
The Quatermass Experiment (1953 Teleplay) 255.
The Quatermass Experiment (1954) 255.
The Quatermass Xperiment (1955) 215, 255, 259.
Quattro mosche di velluto grigio (1971) 1011.
The Queen of Sheba. See La regina di Saba.
Quel bandito sono io! (1950) 100–102, 101, 223.
Quo vadis (1924) 52.
Quo vadis (1951) 106, 413.
Quo vadis? (1913) 41, 41–42.

R

Rabid Dogs. See Cani arrabbiati: Variants.
Radici di paura (unproduced) 977, 1025.
Raffles (1940) 724.
La ragazza che sapeva troppo (1963) 14, 23, 26, 132, 155, 322, 341, 366, 446, 447–471, 449, 450, 451, 452, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 461, 462, 463, 464, 466, 467, 469, 470, 471, 481, 485, 542, 550, 630, 646, 680, 701, 714, 789, 791, 806, 810, 811, 855, 878, 900, 902, 919, 946, 955, 984, 1011, 1027, 1029.
Variants:
Evil Eye 460, 464–471, 465, 471, 473, 484, 485, 486, 487, 494, 496, 511, 521, 707, 714, 919.
Les Raisins de la Mort (1978) 26.
Rashomon (1950) 797, 801, 806.
The Raven (1963) 26.
The Red Shoes (1948) 237, 21.
La regina di Saba (1952) 141.
Repulsion (1965) 996.
Reservoir Dogs (1992) 957.
Le resurrezione (1947) 88.
The Return of Ringo. See Il ritorno di Ringo.
Revenge of the Blood Beast (1966) 326.
Revenge of the Dead. See Zeder.
Revenge of the Vampire. See La maschera del demonio: Variants.
Ride in the Whirlwind (1965) 645.
Ringo del Nebraska (1966) 415, 597, 632, 633–641, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 645, 646, 670, 817, 828, 949.
Il ritorno di Ringo (1965) 635.
The Road to Fort Alamo 659. See also La strada per Fort Alamo.
Roland the Mighty. See Orlando e i paladini di Francia.
Roma contro Roma (1964) 512, 513–515, 514, 515.
Roman Holiday (1953) 468.
Rome Against Rome (UK release) 514. See also Roma contro Roma.
Romeo and Juliet. See Giulietta e Romeo.
Rosalba, la fanciulla di Pompei (1952) 130.
Il rosso segno della follia (1970) 20, 21, 322, 463, 486, 519, 684, 706, 752, 776, 777–793, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 795, 797, 810, 812, 847, 849, 850, 855, 862, 869, 910, 969, 995, 1017, 1027, 1039.
Route 66 (TV Series) 509.
Roy Colt & Winchester Jack (1970) 613, 817, 826, 827–842, 828, 829, 830, 831, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 839, 840, 847, 851, 884, 1005.
Il ruscello di Ripasottile (1941) 67.

S

Saffo, venere di Lesbo (1960) 237.
The Saga of the Viking Women and Their Voyage to the Waters of the Great Sea Serpent (1957) 417, 420.
Samson and the 7 Miracles of the World 487. See also Maciste alla corte del Gran Khan.
Sandokan, la tigre di Mompracem (1963) 1066.
Sandokan the Great. See Sandokan, la tigre di Mompracem.
Santa notte (1947) 91.
Sant'Elena, piccola isola (1943) 79, 378.
Santo y Blue Demon en el Mundo de los Muertos (1970) 411.
Sapore di carne (unproduced project) 848.
Sapphire (1959) 292.
Savage Gringo. See Ringo del Nebraska.
Scanners (1981) 442.
The Scarlet Claw (1944) 667.
Scarlet Friday (unproduced) 707.
Lo sceicco bianco (1952) 211.
Der Schatz im Silbersee (1962) 582.
Die Schlangengrube und das Pendel (1967) 326.
Schock (1977) 117, 159, 459, 478, 613, 676, 806, 825, 848, 860, 956, 973, 974, 975–997, 976, 978, 979, 980, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 992, 994, 995, 996, 1002, 1003, 1004, 1007, 1026, 1028, 1029, 1031, 1036.
The School for Virgins. See La scuola della vergine.
School of Fear. See Il gioko.
Scipio Africanus. See Scipione l'Africano.
Scipione l'Africano (1937) 59.
Scream (1996) 566.
La scuola della vergine (1966) 779.
Se sei vivo spara (1967) 828.
Seddok (L'erede di Satana) (1960) 230, 245, 482, 515, 1066.
See Naples Then Die. See Vedi Napoli e puoi muori.
Sei donne per l'assassino (1964) 16, 21, 26, 82, 96, 99, 105, 127, 132, 162, 220, 243, 324, 345, 352, 366, 457, 471, 484, 485, 486, 497, 500, 528, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 570, 572, 583, 597, 626, 634, 645, 654, 663, 667, 669, 706, 710, 714, 715, 716, 717, 774, 775, 782, 804, 806, 810, 811, 813, 823, 825, 834, 850, 851, 855, 866, 882, 889, 943, 947, 1011, 1038.
Seizure (1975) 18.
Semaforo rosso. See Cani arrabbiati: Variants.
Senso (1954) 921.
I sette gladiatori (1962) 414, 433, 434, 438–440, 438–442, 439–442, 440–442.
I sette nani alla riscossa (1951) 110.
Le sette spade del vendicatore (1962) 433, 440, 441, 442, 443.
Seven Dwarfs to the Rescue. See I sette nani alla riscossa.
Seven Footprints to Satan (novel) 901.
The Seven Samurai 646. See also Shichininin no samurai.
Seventh Sword. See Sette spade del vendicatore.
The Seventh Victim (1943) 1017.
The Sexorcist. See L'ossessa.
La sfida dei giganti (1965) 410–411, 411, 572.
The Shadow Guest (novel) 922–923, 923, 943, 977, 979–981, 980, 981, 982.
Shane (1953) 646, 656, 657.
The She-Beast. See Revenge of the Blood Beast.
Shichininin no samurai (1954) 438. See also The Seven Samurai.
The Shining (1980) 687.
Shivers (1975) 503.
The Siege of Syracuse. See L'assedio di Siracusa.
Sigfrido (1957) 55, 263, 264, 350, 375, 475, 476.
Sign of the Gladiator. See Nel segno di Roma: Variants.
Sign of the Pagan (1954) 140.
La signora del tutti (1934) 851.
Una signora dell'Ovest (1942) 581.
Silverado (1985) 463.
Simbad e il califfo di Bagdad (1973) 239.
La sindrome di Stendhal (1996) 460, 919.
The Sins of Rome. See Spartaco.
Six Feet Under (TV series) 793.
The Sixth Sense (1999) 1037.
Sky Above Heaven. See Allarme dal cielo.
Slaughter Hotel (1971) 861.
The Slave. See Il figlio di Spartacus.
Sleepy Hollow (1999) 326, 1038.
Snow Devils. See La morte viene dal pianeta Aytin.
Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs (1937) 319, 320.

Il socio invisibile (1939) 69.
Solo Ante del Terror (1981) 779.
Solo contro Roma (1962) 440.
Solo per te, Lucia (1952) 90.
Sometimes Life Is Hard—Right, Providence?. See La vita a volte è molto dura, vero Provvidenza?.
Son of D'Artagnan. See Il figlio di D'Artagnan.
Son of Frankenstein (1939) 313.
Son of Hercules in the Land of Darkness. See Ercole l'invincibile.
Son of Samson. See Maciste nella valle dei Re.
El Sonido Prehistórico (1965) 681.
Sorellina e il principe del sogno (1996) 1031.
The Sound of Horror 686. See also El Sonido Prehistórico.
The Space Bum. See Il vagabondo dello spazio (unproduced).
Space Men (1960) 223, 295, 543, 599.
Spartaco (1953) 11, 118, 121, 121–126, 122, 123, 124, 125, 157, 352, 515, 877.
Lo spettro (1963) 258, 497, 571, 673, 877.
Le spie vengono dal semifreddo (1966) 370, 506, 688, 689–707, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 698, 699, 700, 703, 704, 706, 715, 734, 789, 893.
Variants:
Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs 689, 690, 693, 695, 697, 701–707, 705, 706, 707, 708, 797, 838, 884.
Spirits of the Dead. See Histoires Extraordinaires.
Star Express (unproduced) 1025, 1026.
Star Pilot. See 2+5 Missione Hydra.
Star Riders. See Il cavalieri delle stelle (unproduced).
Star Trek (TV series) 600.
Star Wars (1977) 997, 1023.
Starcrash (1979) 998, 1023.
The Stendhal Syndrome. See La sindrome di Stendhal.
Sting of Death (1966) 317.
La strada (1954) 140.
La strada che porta lontano (1954 student film) 450.
La strada per Fort Alamo (1964) 366, 556, 572, 578, 580, 581–591, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 590, 591, 592, 596, 597, 640, 646, 821, 828, 878.
Lo strano vizio della signora Wardh (1971) 529, 779.
La strega in amore (1966) 186.
Streghe (1989) 687.
Sulle orme di Esculapio (1950) 102.
Sullivan's Travels (1941) 467.
Summer Dreams (album) 917.
Superman's Pal, Jimmy Olsen (comic) 325.
Suspicion (1941) 861.
Suspiria (1977) 26, 377, 405, 461, 983, 991, 1011, 1019.
Svezia, inferno e paradiso (1968) 821.
Sweden Heven and Hell. See Svezia, inferno e paradiso.
The Sword and the Dragon. See Ilya Muromets.

T

Il tacchino prepotente (1939) 67, 70, 291.
The Tales of Hoffmann (1951) 679.
Tales of Terror (1962) 496.
Tamagotchi (1997) 687, 1039.
The Taming of Dorothy. See Quel bandito sono io!.
Targets (1968) 508.
Tarzan's Fight for Life (1958) 434.
Il telefono. See I tre volti della paura: Episodes.
The Telephone. See I tre volti della paura: Episodes: Il telefono.
Tempi duri per i vampiri (1959) 110, 189, 215.
The Tempter. See L'Anticristo.
The Ten Commandments (1956) 966.
Ten Little Indians (novel) 812, 819, 932.
Ten Little Niggers (novel). See Ten Little Indians (novel).
The Tenant (1976) 686.
Tenebrae (1982) 462, 565, 686, 811, 988, 997, 1029.
Teodora imperatrice di Bisanzio (1954) 70, 126, 172, 248, 515.
Teorema (1968) 778.
Terremoto fatale (1910) 41.
Terror at the Opera. See Opera.
Terror Creatures From the Grave. See Cinque tombe per un medium.
Terror in the Crypt. See La cripta e l'incubo.
Il terrore dei Barbari (1959) 249, 250.
Terrore nello spazio (1965) 23, 44, 206, 239, 321, 340, 400, 551, 556, 578, 583, 585, 597, 598, 599–631, 600, 601, 602, 604, 605, 607, 608, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 633, 641, 646, 652, 675, 686, 689, 698, 707, 733, 740, 750, 761, 804, 805, 813, 820, 824, 825, 836, 843, 909, 984, 992, 1017, 1023, 1038, 1040.
Terza liceo (1954) 132–134, 133.
Il terzo occhio (1966) 669, 900.
Teseo contro il Minotauro (1961) 414.
Testimone oculare (1988) 1030.
Theater of Blood (1973) 868.
Theatre of Death (1966) 539.
Theodora, Slave Empress. See Teodora imperatrice di Bisanzio.
These Are the Damned. See The Damned.
They Call Me Trinity. See Lo chiamovano Trinità.
They Came From Within. See Shivers.
The Thief of Bagdad (1940) 354.
The Thief of Baghdad. See Il ladro di Bagdad.
The Thing From Another World (1951) 605.
This Wine of Love. See L'elisir d'amore.
Three Women (1977) 919.
Thriller (TV series) 981.
Thrilling (1965) 748.
THX 1138 (1971) 923.
Tigris (1913) 722.
The Time Tunnel (TV series) 872.
Toby Dammit. See Histoires Extraordinaires.
Today We Kill, Tomorrow We Die. See Oggi a me . . . domani a te!.
Together (1970) 868.
The Torture Chamber of Dr. Sadism. See Die Schlangengrube und das Pendel.
The Torturer (2005) 1031.
Totò a colori (1952) 145.
Totò a Parigi (1958) 223.
Totò all'inferno (1954) 436.
Totò Diabolicus (1962) 484.
Totò nella luna (1958) 223, 599.
Touch of Death. See Quando Alice ruppe lo specchio.
Tragic Ceremony in Villa Alexander. See Estratto dagli archivi segreti della polizia: di una capitale europea.
Trauma (1993) 519.
Tre passi nel delirio. See Histoires Extraordinaires.
Tre tigri contro tre tigri (1977) 999.
I tre volti della paura (1963) 16, 95, 115, 137, 201, 245, 286, 297, 322, 366, 392, 403, 453, 457, 458, 460, 463, 480, 481–511, 482, 503, 509, 510, 517, 520, 521, 529, 530, 541, 546, 558, 563, 566, 590, 608, 624, 626, 630, 635, 650, 664, 676, 681, 687, 693, 699, 719, 731, 758, 780, 785, 789, 793, 811, 862, 866, 878, 882, 889, 902, 910, 994, 995, 1010, 1011, 1029, 1060.
Episodes:
La goccia d'acqua 457, 460, 482, 484, 486, 492, 493, 493–497, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 503, 504, 505, 506, 509, 529, 530, 630, 676, 687, 862, 902, 910, 1039.
Il telefono 201, 366, 453, 463, 482, 483, 484, 485, 485–493, 486, 487, 488, 489, 491, 541, 542, 563, 701, 785, 866, 910.
I wurdalak 286, 458, 482, 484, 494, 497–503, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 529, 624, 626, 668, 676, 680, 789, 886, 1039.
Variants:
Black Sabbath 470, 482, 485, 487–493, 491, 492, 493, 497, 503, 503–511, 504, 505, 506, 509, 510, 511.
The Treasure of Silver Lake. See Der Schatz im Silbersee.
Il trionfo di Ercole (1964) 1067.
Trionfo di Maciste (1961) 434.
The Triumph of Hercules. See Il trionfo di Ercole.
Triumph of the Son of Hercules. See Trionfo di Maciste.
Turno di notte (TV segments) 1029.
Tutti i colori del buio (1972) 529.
Twilight Zone: The Movie (1983) 1037.
Twin Peaks (TV series) 687.
Twin Peaks Fire Walk With Me (1992) 687.
Twitch of the Death Nerve. See Ecologia del delitto: USA Release.
Two Evil Eyes. See Due occhi diabolici.
Two Pistols for a Coward. See Il pistolero segnato da Dio.
Two Weeks in Another Town (1962) 16, 685.
Two Women. See La ciociara.

U

L'uccello dalle piume di cristallo (1970) 26, 557, 810, 811, 848, 878, 941, 1011.
Ulisse (1954) 138–140, 139, 140, 141, 287, 724, 769.
L'ultima avventura di Galaor (1921) 51.
L'ultima impresa di Galaor. See L'ultima avventura di Galaor.
L'ultima preda del vampiro (1960) 174, 668, 679.

Gli ultimi giorni di Pompei (1959) 250, 250–251, 251, 271, 387, 593.
Gli ultimi giorni di Pompeii (1908) 54, 42.
L'ultimo dei vichinghi (1961) 347, 350–353, 417, 422, 437, 572, 142, 346, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 392, 422, 428, 640, 644.
Ultimo mondo cannibale (1977) 976.
L'ultimo uomo della terra (1963) 503, 877.
Ulysses. See Ulisse.
L'umanoide (1979) 1010.
Una sull'altra (1969) 723.
Uncle Was a Vampire. See Tempi duri per i vampiri.
Unscripted (2005 TV series) 457.
Uomini sul fondo (1941) 73, 73–75, 74.
L'uomo che non voleva morire (1988) 1030.
L'uomo che non voleva morire (short story) 932.
L'uomo e il bambino (unproduced) 933–934, 942.
L'uomo topo (unproduced) 977.
Ursus il terrore dei Kirghizi (1964) 411.

V

Il vagabondo dello spazio (unproduced) 997, 998–999, 1010, 1025, 1029.
La vampira indiana (1913) 583.
The Vampire and the Ballerina. See L'amante del vampiro.
Les Vampires (1915–16) 185, 722.
I vampiri (1957) 11, 16, 21, 23, 24, 25, 90, 95, 103, 141, 170, 171–189, 173, 174, 176, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 184, 185, 186, 189, 191, 200, 210, 213, 219, 223, 260, 263, 291, 316, 441, 486, 612, 673, 677, 755, 785, 816, 843, 893, 910, 917, 938, 968, 996, 1020, 1039.
  Variants:
    The Devil's Commandment 171, 172, 187, 188, 189.
    Lust of the Vampire 172, 187, 188.
Vampyr (1932) 919.
Il vangelo del Beato Angelica (1949) 102.
Variazioni sinfoniche (1949) 91.
Variety Lights. See Luci del varietà.
Vedi Napoli e poi muori (1951) 121.
La vendetta di Ercole (1960) 382, 393.
La vendetta di Lady Morgan (1966) 668.
La Venere d'Ille (1978) 18, 680, 973, 994, 997, 1001, 1001–1007, 1002, 1003, 1004, 1005, 1006, 1009, 1024, 1027, 1028, 1038.
Vengeance. See Joko, invoca Dio . . . e muori!.
Venus on the Half-Shell (novel) 998, 1029.
La vergine di Norimberga (1963) 543, 717, 872.
Vertigo (1958) 981.
Il viale della speranza (1953) 128–130, 129, 210.
The Vikings (1958) 350, 417, 420, 644.
Villa Borghese (1953) 131, 131–132, 132, 364, 365.
Village of the Damned (1960) 667.
La vispa Teresa (1939) 67, 68, 69, 862, 867.
La vita a volte è molto dura, vero Provvidenza? (1972) 893.
Vita da cani (1950) 103, 103–105, 104, 107, 108, 177, 486.
La vita dei topolini bianchi 54.
La vita delle farfalle (1911) 54.
I vitelloni (1953) 211.
Vivo per la tue morte (1968) 246.
Viy (story) 16, 282, 284–285.
La voce del silenzio (1953) 134.
Voyage to the Bottom of the Sea (1961) 215.

W

War of the Planets. See I diafanoidi vengono da Marte.
War of the Satellites (1958) 215.
War of the Zombies. See Roma contro Roma.
The Warrior Empress. See Saffo, venere di Lesbo.
Waves of Lust. See Un'ondata di piacere.
We Have Always Lived in the Castle (novel) 993.
Werewolf in a Girl's Dormitory. See Lycanthropus.
The Werewolf versus the Vampire Woman. See Le Noche de Walpurgis.
Wes Craven's New Nightmare (1994) 563.
What. See La frusta e il corpo: Variants.
What Have They Done to Your Daughters?. See La polizia chiede aiuto.
What the Peeper Saw. See Night Hair Child.
What?. See Che?.
The Whip and the Body 29, 1038. See also La frusta e il corpo.
The White Sheik. See Lo sceicco bianco.
The White Warrior. See Agi Murad il diavolo bianco.
White Zombie (1932) 319.
Who Goes There? (novel) 605.
Wild Dogs. See Cani arrabbiati: Variants.
Wild, Wild Planet. See I criminali della galassia.
The Witch in Love. See La strega in amore.
Witch Story. See Streghe.
Witchfinder General (1968) 317, 502.
The Wizard of Oz (1939) 320.
The Woman in Black (novel) 687.
The Wonders of Aladdin. See Le meraviglie di Aladino.
The Wrath of God. See L'ira di Dio.
I wurdalak. See I tre volti della paura: Episodes.
The Wurdalak. See I tre volti della paura: Episodes: I wurdalak.

X

X the Unknown (1956) 255.

Y

Les Yeux sans Visage (1959) 907, 918, 921.
You'll Die at Midnight. See Morirai a mezzanotte.
The Young, the Evil and the Savage. See Nude . . . si muore.

Z

Zeder (1983) 1024.

Name Index

Pages for illustrated entries appear in bold.

20th Century-Fox 336, 1010, 1011, 1019.

A

Abadaz, José Ignacio 778.
ACI (Alleanza Cinematografica Italiana) 79.
Ackerman, Forest J 701.
Adam, Noëlle 362, 363, 366, 367.
Addessi, Giovanni 211.
Addobbatti, Giuseppe 664, 666.
  bio 670.
Adelphia Cinematografica 330.
Adelphia Compagnia Cinematografica 434.
Adrian, Max 100.
Agostini, Marisa 810, 828.
Agrama, Frank 972, 1010.
Agren, Janet 893.
Aguayo, José Fernandez 594.
Aikens, Van 375.
AIP (American International Pictures) 16, 23, 26, 155, 206, 207, 243, 249, 250, 265, 274, 281, 295, 298, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 325, 357, 375, 381, 382, 387, 389, 392, 414, 424, 425, 426, 427, 443, 449, 453, 454, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 481, 484, 486, 487, 491, 494, 499, 506, 511, 514, 538, 558, 584, 600, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 616, 618, 624, 625, 626, 641, 664, 671, 673, 675, 681, 684, 690, 691, 692, 693, 695, 697, 698, 699, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 709, 712, 719, 779, 797, 860, 867, 872, 873, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 891, 893, 922, 935, 997, 998, 1040.
Albani, Romano 1010.
Alberti, Giuseppe 942, 976.
Alberti, Otto 764.
Albertini, Adalberto "Bitto" 440.
Alda, Alan 930.
Alda, Robert 151, 437, 471, 925, 926, 927, 930, 931, 932, 934.
  bio 930.
Aldebran, Giuseppe 810.
Alekan, Henri 306.
Alessandroni, Alessandro 746, 749, 774, 810, 821.
Alexandra Produzioni Cinematografiche 348.
Alexia Cinematografica 796.
Alfa Film XXXVII 112.
Alfonsi, Lidia 192, 200, 203, 248, 331, 482, 484, 486, 487, 489, 491, 891.
  bio 200.
Aliprandi, Marcello 1002.
Allain, Marcel 185, 721.
Allard, Georges 17, 218, 222, 238, 344.
Allen, David 942.
Allen, Irwin 872.
Allen, Woody 18.
Allied Artists 881, 884, 927, 935, 938.
Almirante, Ernesto 109.
Almirante, Luigi 99.
Almodóvar, Pedro 565.
Alonso, Chelo 242.
Alstrom, Dawne 942.
Altan, Laura (pseud.). See Efrikian, Laura.
Altariba, Beatrice 442.
Altieri, Mario 764.
Altman, Robert 919.
Amadoro, Ugo 515, 574.
Amatulli, Dante 712.
Amber, Audrey (pseud.). See Ambesi, Adriana.
Ambesi, Adriana 410.
Ambrosio, Arturo 48, 49.
Ambrosio Jr., Arturo 48, 51.
Ambrosio Film 42, 48, 49, 53, 54.
American Cinematheque 455, 538, 822, 954.
Amidei, Sergio 132.
Ammonini, Mario 362, 369.
Anchisano, Giuliano 644.
Anchor Bay Entertainment 888, 994.
Anchóriz, Leo 414, 415, 473, 474.
Ancillai, Fausto 482, 486.
Anconetani, Marcello 778.
Andersen, Susy 480, 482, 500, 502, 510, 514, 515, 943.
  bio 499.
André, Victor 254.
André, Vittorio
  bio 261.
Andrei, Franco 600.
Andreoni, Rosanna 848.
Andress, Ursula 147.
Andrews, Dana 549.
Andrews, Mark Sir (pseud.). See Serandrei, Mario.
ANFRI S.r.l. 1029.
Angelucci, Gianfranco 938.
Angiolillo, Luciana 383.
Aniston, Jennifer 906.
Annamode 712, 796.
Annuale, Armando 172.
Annunziata, Nino 162.
Antoinette, Queen Marie 53.
Antonelli, Ennio 575, 690.
Antonelli, Laura 690, 696, 697, 702, 706.
  born 697.
Antonini, Gabriele 192, 206, 226, 234, 378, 442.
  bio 200.
Antonioni, Michelangelo 23, 242, 381, 478, 509, 709, 723, 884, 995, 1011.
Anty, Nadia 542, 557.
Api Film 121.
Aquila Film 53.
Aranda, Angel 250, 600, 602, 607, 611, 618, 619, 628, 629.
  bio 613.
Arata, Ubaldo 59, 60, 67, 397.

Archivio Nazionale Cinematografico della Resistenz 69.
Arden, Mary 540, 542, 546, 547, 550, 552, 553, 554, 555, 557, 560, 565.
bio 552.
Ardisson, Giorgio 351, 352, 390, 391, 392, 393, 395, 398, 400, 405, 417, 418, 428, 429, 742, 854.
bio 421.
Ardisson, Viktor 900.
Ardow, Dean 518, 582.
Arena, Maurizio 131, 132.
Argento, Asia 982, 1004.
Argento, Claudio 1010, 1011, 1015.
Argento, Dario 26, 30, 68, 163, 173, 186, 219, 261, 371, 377, 405, 455, 457, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 471, 487, 492, 496, 500, 519, 542, 551, 557, 558, 566, 590, 614, 630, 685, 686, 697, 719, 801, 807, 810, 811, 812, 816, 822, 825, 834, 835, 848, 854, 869, 873, 878, 903, 907, 919, 941, 952, 976, 982, 983, 986, 988, 991, 992, 995, 997, 1004, 1010, 1011, 1013, 1014, 1015, 1017, 1018, 1019, 1024, 1025, 1027, 1029, 1030, 1032, 1033, 1036, 1038.
bio 810.
Argento, Fiore 1030.
Argento, Salvatore 371, 810, 848, 1013.
Arkoff, Samuel Z. 207, 243, 308, 309, 310, 313, 382, 387, 414, 424, 426, 443, 449, 467, 481, 487, 504, 505, 506, 508, 511, 558, 605, 606, 626, 673, 690, 691, 692, 697, 701, 704, 707, 712, 884, 885, 887, 893, 921, 922, 935, 997, 1040.
Arkush, Allan 26.
Armstrong, Michael 860.
Arriaga, Simón 594.
Artisti Associati 94.
Ascani, Eugenio 644.
Asher, Jack 21, 405, 511.
Asher, Jane 26.
Askins, Monroe 420.
Aspach, Elisa 778.
Assenza, Giovanni 644.
Associated Television 962.
Astoria Film 131.
Astro Records & Filmworks 953.
ATA (Artisti Tecnici Associati) 98, 107.
ATC Studios 542.
Atenea Films S.L. 414, 434.
Atlantis 570.
Attenni, Giuliana 160.
Aubry, Kim 755.
Auger, Claudine 322, 556, 848, 853, 859, 863, 879, 973.
bio 851.
Augustín 251.
Augustus 758.
Aureli, Andrea 962.
Aureli, Giorgio 600, 614, 690.
Austin, John Frazier (character) 682.
Autuori, Margherita 131.
Avallone, Marcello 348.
Avalon, Frankie 690, 696.
Avati, Antonio 1024.
Avati, Pupi 946, 976, 1024.
Avco-Embassy Pictures 972.
Avery, Tex 863.
Avila, Enrique 438.
Avram, Chris 848, 850, 852.
bio 853.
Azcona, Rafael 933, 1030.
Azzini, Nedo 910, 927.

B

B. L. Vision 842.
Babbitt, Art 320.
Bacciucchi, Eros 251.
Bach, Barbara 764, 765, 770, 1011.
Backy, Don (pseud.) 941, 945, 946, 948, 949, 951, 954, 957, 984. See also Caponi, Aldo.
bio 945–946.
Badel, Pierre 1002.
Badeschi, Franca 439.
Badessi, Giancarlo 962.
Bairn, William A. 872, 883.
Baistrocchi, Angelo 75.
Bakalyan, Richard 142.
Baker, Rick 972.
Baldassare, Raf 390, 418, 437.
Baldini, Renato 244, 336.
bio 340.
Balducci, Franco 764.
Bale, Christian 793.
Baledón, Rafael 26.
Ballard, J. G. 605.
Ballasio, Antonella 942.
Ballesteros, Antonio López 250, 634.
Il Balletto di Bronzo (band) 810, 820, 822.
Balpêtre, Antoine 172, 180, 181, 185.
bio 177.
Balsamo, Ignazio 268.
Banai, Haim 962.
Banov, Secula 243.
Baracco, Adriano 722, 724, 725.
Baratto, Luisa 761.
Barbieri, Francesco "Franco" 848, 849, 976, 977, 982.
Barbini, Luigi 410.
Barboni, Enzo G. 250, 841.
Bardot, Brigitte 155, 157, 159, 160.
Barilla, Giuseppe 542, 546.
Barlocchi, Guido 793.
Barlocci, Guido 778.
Baroni, Maria 226.
Barrett, Liz (pseud.). See Baratto, Luisa.
Barriano, Emilio 778.
Barron, Louis and Bebe 622.
Barrymore, John Drew 513, 514, 515.
Barsanti, Alberto 268.
Barth, John 1038.
Bartok, Dennis 954.
Bartok, Eva 542, 555, 556, 557, 566, 567.
bio 555–556.
Bartoloni, Corrado 90, 91, 110, 117, 130, 134, 136, 148, 172, 180, 187, 192, 198, 211, 214, 234, 282, 1040.
Barton, Jeannette 573.
Barzini, Luigi 542, 567, 866.
Basedow, Rainer 796.
Bashi, Haim 962.
Basile, Pier Luigi 962.
Bassan, Giuseppe 1010, 1014.
Bastien, Yvonne 605, 632, 634, 635, 636, 637, 640.
Bates, Ted 842.
Battaglia, Gianlorenzo 810, 828, 848, 872, 1017, 1030.
Battaglia, Rik 161, 163, 248, 295, 336, 343, 496, 943.
bio 339.
Battistella, Antonio 354.
Battistrada, Lucio Manlio 999.
Batzella, Luigi 24, 686.
Bava, Caterina (grandmother) 38.
Bava, Elena (daughter) 40, 61, 84, 164, 167, 708, 780, 823, 853, 923, 1009, 1026, 1027, 1031.
Bava, Elena (sister) 39, 41, 47, 48, 51, 53, 54, 55, 56, 58, 59, 82, 83, 159, 166, 449, 643, 831, 931.
Bava, Emma Ficini-Carpita (mother) 39, 40, 41, 47, 50, 56, 59, 85, 609, 643, 708.
bio 40.
Bava, Fabrizio 1002. See also Bava, Roy (grandson).
Bava, Fiamma Giovagnoli (daughter-in-law) 371, 609, 719, 757, 922.
Bava, Francesco Eugenio (father) 15, 16, 26, 30, 34, 36, 37–45, 38, 40, 41, 46, 50, 53, 55, 67, 71, 110, 111, 130, 138, 140, 142, 157, 166, 179, 181, 186, 263, 264, 282, 295, 302, 303, 305, 315, 321, 330, 343, 349, 350, 356, 371, 375, 377, 390, 397, 449, 473, 475, 496, 497, 498, 503, 526, 542, 574, 600, 608, 620, 621, 625, 643, 706, 708, 709, 719, 786, 787, 853, 902, 994, 1024, 1029, 1033, 1060.
bio 38.
death 708–709.
"Nonna" Caterina (Eugenio's grandmother) 38, 56.
sculptures 11, 15, 708–709.
Bava, Georgia (granddaughter) 57, 59, 166, 167, 434, 467, 494, 609, 848, 902, 903, 904, 922, 923, 969, 970, 1009, 1027, 1031, 1032, 1033.
memories of grandfather 922–923.
Bava, Giovanni (grandfather) 38.
Bava, Iole Sergio (wife) 57, 58, 59, 61, 82, 84, 164, 166, 167, 425, 448, 692, 787, 903–905, 904, 923, 1027, 1033.
bio 58.
Bava, Lamberto (son) 16, 18, 29, 30, 33, 38, 39, 40, 45, 48, 50, 53, 56, 82, 83, 84, 85, 153, 161, 164, 166, 167, 243, 263, 282, 283, 291, 297, 301, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 330, 371, 424, 482, 493, 494, 495, 506, 521, 525, 555, 590, 591, 600, 609, 614, 615, 618, 634, 635, 636, 644, 645, 654, 664, 668, 669, 670, 686, 690, 692, 709, 715, 719, 722, 724, 726, 738, 742, 757, 764, 771, 775, 778, 779, 782, 785, 786, 796, 806, 811, 812, 817, 828, 833, 838, 843, 848, 854, 860, 872, 873, 877, 878, 896, 900, 901, 903, 905, 908, 914, 923, 931, 933, 942, 943, 946, 948, 949, 950, 951, 953, 954, 972, 976, 977, 981, 982, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 991, 993, 994, 996, 997, 998, 999, 1001, 1002, 1003, 1004, 1005, 1010, 1011, 1013, 1014, 1015, 1016, 1019, 1024, 1025, 1026, 1027, 1029, 1030, 1031, 1032, 1033, 1039, 1041.
bio 82.
directing career 1029–1031.
divorce 922.
pseudonyms
Old Jr., John 1029.
Bava, Luigi (uncle) 38.

Bava, Luisa (aunt) 38.
Bava, Manin (aunt) 38.
Bava, Mario 14, 35, 46, 48, 56, 58, 59, 62, 66, 67, 68, 70, 71, 73, 80, 82, 84, 87, 91, 92, 98, 114, 142, 147, 164, 167, 168, 176, 201, 202, 205, 211, 278, 282, 283, 295, 298, 337, 342, 422, 424, 452, 454, 455, 466, 484, 491, 497, 498, 504, 505, 520, 521, 547, 556, 608, 612, 734, 738, 741, 742, 743, 800, 837, 873, 876, 879, 881, 885, 896, 904, 908, 909, 913, 920, 939, 943, 956, 957, 969, 996, 1006, 1010, 1017, 1020, 1023, 1027, 1036, 1037, 1038, 1039, 1040, 1041, 1062, 1084.
aspect ratios 23.
becomes camera assistant 59.
becomes father's assistant 58.
"body count" movies 21.
born 47.
burial site 1034.
card playing 11.
co-directing with Alfredo Leone 930.
co-directing with Lamberto Bava 986.
color, use of 21.
commercial work 842–843, 869.
critical appreciation 23.
death 1026–1027.
depression 692.
directing style 912.
dislike of being photographed 283.
fan encounters 700–701, 707.
fears 848.
film festival 29.
films on video 26.
first screen appearance 54.
first special effects credit 101.
food preferences 1006.
giallo, development of 449, 450, 453, 457, 458, 461, 463, 466, 471.
improvisation 296.
influence 24–26.
influence on other directors 435.
interest in horror subjects 18.
invited to work in America 424.
joins AIC 96.
knowledge of stock footage 79.
marriage 923.
nervous exhaustion 433, 434, 709.
pets
Centingar Clelium "Centi" 449, 551, 847, 848, 895, 896, 1009.
Isotta 1009. practical jokes 55–56.
propaganda newsreel forgery 71.
pseudonyms
Baja, Mario 214.
Foam, John 254, 258.
Foam, Marie 254, 258.
Hold, John 644, 652.
Lion, Mickey 926, 930, 931.
Old, John M. 518, 521, 538, 582, 587.
reading habits 247, 291.
reconciliation with Alfredo Leone 936.
residences 923.
resisting becoming a director 282.
screen treatment for "Il Vij" 285–287.
superstitions 883.
travel 926.
trick photography 380, 413, 415, 440, 443.
unrealized projects 976–977.
wartime activities 73, 81–82.
water glass, use of 138, 242, 333, 461, 462, 671, 914, 969, 989.
wedding 59.
WWII influence on films 82–83.
zoom lens, use of 258, 261, 301.
Bava, Mariuccia (aunt) 38, 51.
Bava, Rosanna Rocchi 1026, 1031.
Bava, Roy (grandson) 30, 56, 82, 91, 103, 158, 167, 320, 454, 494, 525, 631, 686, 757, 758, 811, 848, 902, 903, 922, 923, 927, 942, 954, 969, 972, 977, 991, 996, 997, 1005, 1014, 1016, 1025, 1026, 1027, 1029, 1032, 1033. career 1032–1033.
memories of grandfather 922–923.
Bavaria Film TV 764.
Baxter, John 753.
Baxter, Les 299, 313, 314, 315, 318, 323, 327, 381, 448, 466, 467, 468, 482, 492, 493, 497, 503, 508, 509, 624, 625, 690, 701, 705, 706, 872, 887, 888, 891.
Bazzoni, Camillo 246.
The Beastie Boys 1038.
Beatty, Robert 100, 101, 102.
Beaumont, Charles 256.
Bechi, Gino 89.
Beckman, Peter 322.
Begley, Ed 707.
Belinsky, Constantin 472, 559.
Bell, David 29.
Bellero, Carlo 75.
Belli, Marisa 390, 394, 410.
Bellisario, Fabio 141.
Bellocchio, Marco 1017.
Bellomia, Sandro 1002.
Belotti Film 582.
Benedetti, Grazi 634.
Bengell, Norma (pseud.) 340, 556, 600, 611, 612, 613, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 622, 628, 909.
bio 612.
Benguell, Norma. See Bengell, Norma (pseud.).
Bennet, Colleen 226.
Benucci, Emilio 942.
Benussi, Femi 778, 782, 783.
Bergamini, Sergio 764.
Bergamo, Edoardo 355.
Berger, William 751, 810, 816, 819, 820, 854.
bio 816–817.
Beri, Bernabe Barta 439.
Bernard, Black 254.
Bernard, Edmond 764.
Bernard, James 313.
Bernard, Jean-Jacques 1002.
Bernardi, Nero 254.
Bernède, Arthur 722.
Berni, Mara 143.
Berry, Julyan 518.
Bert, Kirk (pseud.). See Cevenini, Alberto.
Berta, Giuseppe 390, 418.
Berti, Marina 764, 770, 962.
Bertolucci, Bernardo 136, 450, 453, 496, 614, 668, 670, 709, 723, 745, 783, 810, 852, 877, 907, 967, 1032.
Berval, Anne 214.
Bester, Kyra 764.
Beswick(e), Martine 294, 976.
Betti, Laura 265, 322, 676, 752, 778, 779, 780, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 791, 847, 848, 851, 852, 855, 856, 860, 912.
bio 778, 852.
Betti, Liliana 684, 686.
Bettoja, Franca 437.
Bevilacqua, Alberto 482, 484, 498, 509, 600, 608, 1010.
Bezzi, Vittorio 634.
BGA 712.
Bianchi, Andrea 981.
Bianchi, Giorgio 110, 136, 143, 145, 210.
Bianchi, Mario 810, 818.
Bianchi, Tino 282.
Biancoli, Oreste 378, 381, 418, 420, 434.
Biffignandi, A. 212, 221, 232.
Billitteri, Salvatore 265, 309, 448, 487, 600, 608.
Bindi, Clara 282.
Bini, Patrizia 211.
Biondi, Lidia 722.
Bisogni, Mirko 75.
Bistolfi, Emo 473, 474, 475.
Bixio Sam 828.
Bizet, Georges 1002.
Bladh, Hilding 543, 544.
Blaisdell, Paul 387.
Blanc, Erika 45, 495, 556, 663, 664, 665, 668, 669, 670, 671, 678, 680, 681, 817, 829, 859, 900.
bio 669.
Blanda 796.
Blasetti, Alessandro 75, 106, 117, 122.
Blish, James 255.
Block, Irving 420.
Bluhdorn, Charles G. 728.
Blumenstock, Peter 26, 53, 942, 949, 950, 951, 952, 953, 957.
Blysdael, Johnny 226.
Boccaccini, Guido 848, 854, 856, 858.
Boccolini, Alfredo 51.
Bochner, Lloyd 707.
Bogart, Frank 872.
Boiardo, Matteo Maria 161.
Boido, Federico "Rico" 600, 613, 722, 733, 828, 829, 836, 943.
Boita, Peter 962.
Bolchi, Sandro 842.
Bolzoni, Adriano 594, 634.
Bona, Giampiero 764.
Bonanni, Mauro 942, 954.
Bonfatti, Liliana 129.
Bongini, Giulio 161.
Boni, Luisella 415.
Bonicelli, Vittorio 763, 764, 962.
Bonifazi, Nadia 722.
Bonnani, Roberto 848, 854, 858.
Bonnard, Mario 90, 117, 142, 143, 177, 250, 495, 613.
Bonos, Luigi 448.
Bonos, Vittorio 362.
Boorman, John 755.
Boratto, Caterina 722.
Borges, Jorge Luís 864.
Borghese, Luigi 972, 973.
Borgiotti, Anita 418.
Bosch, Dieter 942.
Boschetto, Bruno 778.
Bosco, Mauro 810, 822, 828, 836.
Bosé, Lucia 86, 121, 219, 801.
Bosetti, Giulio 331, 442, 443.
Bosic, Andrea 435, 722, 733.
Bottar, Frank 712.

Bottin, Armando 724.
Boyd, Rick (pseud.). See Boido, Federico "Rico".
Boysen, Rolf 764.
Bracken, Eddie 797.
Braga, Antonio Sarzi 390.
Braña, Frank 634.
Brancucci, Maria Christina 722, 746, 748.
Brandi, Walter 292.
Branigan, Laura 1038.
Braun, Eva 82.
Brauner, Artur 543.
Brazzi, Rossano 237.
Brebbia, Luciano 390.
Bregni, Mario 810, 812, 827, 828.
Bregni, Pietro 810.
Brennan, Joseph Payne 255.
Brennan, Rose 712.
Breschi, Arrigo 542.
Breton, Michèle 764, 770.
Bretonne, René 124.
Briganti, Paolo (pseud.). See Parenzo, Alessandro.
Brignone, Guido 75, 121, 206, 242.
Brini, Ercole 791.
Brisbane, Jane 582.
Briskin, Jerry 872.
Broglio, Sandro 976.
Bronzi, Francesco 482.
Brooks, Louise 134.
Brown, Eleonora 712, 715, 716, 717.
Brown, Penny 843.
Brown, Reynold 316, 323, 376, 380, 425, 509, 510, 514, 626.
Browning, Tod 21, 24, 872.
Brühl, Heidi 831, 832.
Brun, Giuseppe 869.
Brusati, Franco 117.
Bruschini, Antonio 483.
Brusci, Ines 644.
Brusco, Alberto Maria (son-in-law) 1031, 1032.
Brusco, Mario (great grandson) 1031, 1032.
Brusco, Martina (great granddaughter) 1032.
Bryanston Films 927, 933, 942, 948.
Brynner, Yul 829.
Buchanan, Robert (pseud.) 336, 341, 448, 457, 465, 722, 734. See also Williams, Walter.
Bulgarelli, Enzo 872.
Bulgarelli, Stefano 872, 883.
Bumbalo, Victor 682.
Burgess, Anthony 962, 966, 968, 971, 1002, 1038.
Burke, Samson 764, 772, 773, 774.
  bio 772.
Burton, Lee 828.
Burton, Richard 868.
Burton, Robert 1002.
Burton, Tim 24, 326, 327, 1038.
Burton, Tony 644.
Bussières, Raymond 362.
Byron, Kathleen 413.

C

Cacciolati, Anita 872.
Cacciottolo, Tonino 390, 418.
Caen, Michel 23, 173, 409.
Cahiers du Cinema 567.
Caiano, Mario 515, 615, 644.
Calamai, Clara 69.
Calcata 664, 667, 668.
Calderoni, Rita 686.
Caldonazzo, Renato 407.
Calevi, Tomaso 1033.
Calhoun, Rory 378.
Calisti, Calisto 796.
Calo, Carlo 571.
Calvet, Corinne 146.
Calvino, Italo 1031.
Calvo, Aldo 87.
Camaso, Claudio (pseud.). See Volonté, Claudio.
Camerini, Mario 117, 127, 138, 450.
Campa, Miranda 172, 268.
Campana, Angela 999.
Campanini, Carlo 89, 99, 142, 146.
Campbell, John W. 605.
Campogalliani, Carlo 249, 374, 515.
Canale, Gianna Maria 86, 118, 120, 121, 122, 125, 126, 157, 172, 173, 174, 176, 177, 178, 179, 182, 184, 185, 189, 192, 200, 204, 206, 210, 227, 242, 248, 260, 348, 375, 379, 575, 585, 801.
  bio 121.
Canale Monterano 482, 502, 668.
Canalejas, Losé 634.
Candelli, Stelio 600.
Candiani, Carla 70.
Canet, Francisco 594.
Canevari, Serena 600, 614.
Canevari, Sergio 848, 849.
Caniglia, Maria 90.
Cannarosso, Franco 130.
Caño, Manuel 778, 782, 783, 785, 786, 791, 810.
  bio 779.
Cantáfora, Antonio 872, 874, 877, 883, 892, 930.
I Cantori Moderni (band) 749.
Capitani, Roberto 352.
Caponi, Aldo 941, 942, 943, 944, 945, 950, 951, 952, 955, 956, 957, 984. See also Backy, Don (pseud.).
  bio 945.
Capponi, Oscar 828.
Caprioglio, Deborah 324.
Caprioli, Vittorio 143.
Caracciolo, Giuseppe 73, 74, 75, 77, 78, 79.
Cardiff, Jack 21, 644.
Cardone, Alberto 362, 819, 832.
Carey, Roland 348, 350.
Carla, Avelino 778.
Carlini, Carlo 134, 237, 384.
Carlo Ponti Cinematografica 103.
Carloni, Pietro 109.
Carmineo, Giuliano 829.
Carmosino, Mara 557.
Carnera, Primo 226, 230.
  bio 230.
Caro, Cathia 348.
Carpentieri, Luigi 172, 348, 378, 434, 436, 441, 455, 520, 571, 669.
Carpi, Fabio 764.
Carr, Robert E. 394.
Carrara, Fulvio 192, 226.
Carras, Anthony 505.
Carriba, Mario 942.
Carrión, Jesús Navarro 634.
Carroll, Barbara 250.
Carse, Robert 333.
Carsetti, Gastone 634, 690, 698.
Carter, Peter 634.
Caruso, Salvatore 664, 690, 722, 796.
Caruso, Vana 282.
Casadei, Maceo 57.
Casale, Marisa 371.
Casaro, Renato 748, 751.
Casas, Antonio 594, 597.
Cascate di Montegelato 162, 204, 233, 359, 394, 761.
Casini, Galliano 94.
Castellano, Franco 690, 692.
Castellari, Enzo G. 838.
Castelli, Alfredo 18.
Castello di Balsorano 436, 570, 577.
Castello di Borghese 292, 434.
Castilla Cooperativa Cinematográfica 600, 605, 634, 635.
Castle of Frankenstein 24, 26, 520.
Cataina, Franco 443.
Catelli, Daniela 285, 558.
Catenacci, Luciano 405, 597, 664, 668, 669, 670, 671.
Caterini, Lina 418, 482, 542.
Catozzo, Leo 138.
Caulandre, Jérome 23, 470.
Cavagna, Giuseppe 151.
Cavalieri, Lina 151, 153, 155.
Cavallo, Secondina 362.
Cavorgna, Marina 796.
Cecchetto, Renato 942.
Cecchi, Dario 764.
Cegani, Elisa 75, 76, 475.
Cei–Incom 136, 145.
Celano, Guido 375, 377.
Celentano, Adriano 448, 462, 464, 471.
  bio 464.
Celeste, Nino 1002.
Celi, Adolfo 88, 722, 731, 752, 754, 852, 945.
  bio 731.
Centofanti, Sandro 991, 992.
Centro Cinematografico del Ministero della Marina 77.
Cerusico, Enzo 542.
  bio 551.
Cervi, Antonio "Tonino" 377, 723, 724, 801, 832.
Cervi, Gino 75, 106.
Cestiè, Renato 848, 973.
  bio 854.
Cevenini, Alberto 572, 582, 590, 594, 596, 600, 613.
  bio 585.
CFPC (Comptoir Français de Productions Cinématographiques) 145, 570.
Chachia, Governor Amor 367.
Chaliapin, Feodor 1010.
Chamarat, Georges 355.
Chambers, Marilyn 868.
Chanel, Hélène 378, 379, 381, 435, 436.
Chaney, Lon 869.
Chaplin, Charles 841.
Checchi, Andrea 143, 144, 282, 286, 288, 289, 291, 295, 296, 340, 366, 418, 421, 422, 428, 431, 467, 513, 514, 984.
  bio 294.
Checchi, Enrico 448, 467.
Chekhov, Anton 482.
Cheney, James 223.
Chiantoni, Renato 962.
Chiari, Mario 111, 268.

Chignone 355.
Childs, Mike 1024.
Chiu, Lai-Chit 378.
Chiusi, Sergio 942.
Christian, Paul (pseud.). See Hubschmid, Paul.
Christie, Agatha 449, 461, 706, 812, 813, 819.
Christine, Katia 869.
Christine, Virginia 320.
Christophe, Françoise 418, 421.
Christy (pseud.). See Brancucci, Maria Christina.
Ciampi, Yves 513.
Cianciano 482.
Cianelli, Lewis E. 664.
Cianfriglia, Giovanni 192, 202, 377, 410, 411, 758, 761.
Ciani, Sergio 226, 235, 246, 268, 272, 354, 572, 573, 574.
Cianni, Eloisa 131.
Cifariello, Antonio 131.
Cinecittà 16, 30, 61, 66, 71, 75, 77, 81, 90, 98, 100, 106, 107, 129, 130, 142, 201, 204, 214, 226, 250, 264, 268, 276, 336, 341, 342, 348, 362, 374, 390, 394, 418, 424, 434, 474, 477, 478, 482, 487, 502, 503, 509, 514, 515, 539, 570, 571, 591, 600, 612, 616, 617, 619, 620, 690, 698, 724, 726, 753, 798, 828, 836, 839, 860, 949, 962, 969, 998, 999.
Cinefantastique 24, 600.
Cinefin 515.
Cinemaproduzioni Astoria 242.
Cinematografica Mambretti 128.
Cinépix Film Properties, Inc. 807.
Cineproduzione Associate 242.
Cinerex Associates 1015.
Cineriz 117, 514, 570.
Cinevision 841, 872, 881, 893.
Cinieri, Cosimo 962.
Cinieri, Francesco 962.
Cino del Duca 434.
Cinquini, Renato 615, 634.
Cinquini, Roberto 172, 180, 518, 526.
Ciorciolini, Marcello 828.
Cipriani, Stelvio 509, 779, 848, 858, 859, 872, 884, 885, 887, 942, 949, 950, 951, 953, 954, 955, 1038.
bio 857.
Ciriello, Averardo 623, 672, 673.
Cittini, Alberto 926, 927.
Ciuffini, Sabatino 443.
Clair, Jany 556, 572, 573, 574, 575, 582, 583, 585, 586, 640.
bio 584–585.
Clarens, Carlos 23, 323.
Clark, Ken 571, 572, 578, 582, 583, 585, 586, 588, 590, 632, 634, 635, 636, 640.
bio 584.
Clarke, Arthur C. 922.
Clayton, Jack 918.
Clement, Charles 96.
Clerici, Gianfranco 1030.
Climax Films 254.
Cliver, Al 976.
Clooney, George 457.
Clooney, Rosemary 455, 550.
Clucher, E. B. (pseud.). See Barboni, Enzo G.
Coburn, James 839.
Coccia, Simone 69.
Cocks, Jay 888.
Cocteau, Jean 67, 134, 306, 421, 485, 586, 672, 678, 851.
Codelli, Lorenzo 1010, 1031.
Codignola, Luciano 764.
Cokic, Husein 764.
Colangeli, Otello 214, 220, 478, 644, 652, 712, 796.
Colasanti, Veniero 138.
Coleman, Leo 418.
Coletti, Duilio 99.
Colin Jr., David 976, 977, 979, 980, 983, 985, 990, 993, 996.
bio 984.
Colizzi, Giuseppe 828.
Colizzi, M. 548.
Collins, Alan (pseud.). See Pigozzi, Luciano.
Collins, Joan 336, 337, 339, 341, 342, 343, 345.
bio 339.
Collodi, Grazia 390.
Colombini, Willy 192.
Coltellacci, Giulio 192, 198.
Columbia–Ceiad 142.
Columbini, Willy 226.
Combs, Richard 936.
Comencini, Luigi 102.
Compagnia di San Paolo 69.
Compagnie Cinématographique de France 330.
Comptoir Français du Film Production 374, 434, 582, 585.
Consalvi, Achille 51.
Consorzio Spartacus 121.
Constantini, Romeo 796.
Contardi, Livia 418, 582.
Contardi, Priscilla 542.
Conte, Richard 872.
Conti, Edoardo Giorgio 473.
Continental Film Review 723.
Continenza, Alessandro "Sandro" 158, 214, 215, 223, 384, 390, 399, 438.
Contini, L. 764.
Continiello, Ubaldo 1002.
Conversi, Fabio 1002.
Conversi, Spartaco 192.
Cooper, Priscilla 582.
Copercines Cooperative Cinematografica 474.
Coppola, Francis 18, 832.
Coppola, Roman 755, 1039.
Corazzari, Bruno 828.
Corbucci, Bruno 438.
Corbucci, Sergio 177, 250, 269, 366, 374, 377, 448, 452, 455, 478, 499, 582, 591, 593, 594, 613, 615, 634, 640, 670, 801, 828, 905, 908, 943, 946, 999.
Corey, Brigitte 414, 415.
Corey, Isabelle 350.
Corman, Roger 26, 155, 215, 256, 317, 322, 325, 384, 387, 417, 462, 463, 470, 481, 482, 486, 487, 499, 505, 506, 511, 518, 519, 526, 577, 609, 626, 631, 641, 675, 719, 998, 1025, 1041.
Coronet 448.
Corrà, Teodoro 810, 815, 816, 817, 819, 828, 834, 841.
Corradi, Nelly 85, 86, 97.
Cortese, Valentina 448, 455, 457, 469, 470.
bio 455.
Cortona, Sergio 644.
Coscia, Marcello 214, 215, 282, 287.
Costa, Mario 65, 85, 86, 87, 89, 90, 94, 95, 96, 97, 104, 127, 128, 221, 235, 555, 582, 902.
Costello, Paul 976.
Cosulich, Callisto 600, 608.
Cottafavi, Vittorio 237, 350, 382, 384, 385, 386, 396, 585.
bio 382.
Cotten, Joseph 872, 873, 875, 876, 877, 881, 883, 888, 893, 906, 907.
bio 876.
Cotten, Patricia Medina 873, 883.
Coubert, Shana/Chana 448, 450.
Covaz, Tullio 134.
Cowie, Peter 510.
Cozzi, Luigi 180, 209, 231, 257, 265, 324, 449, 619, 631, 659, 691, 700, 701, 707, 716, 729, 738, 790, 806, 810, 811, 838, 842, 843, 901, 972, 976, 995, 997, 998, 1004, 1023, 1026.
bio 700.
Craig, H. A. L. 926, 930.
Crandall, Reed 359.
Craven, Wes 455, 563, 566, 861, 868.
Craveri, Mario 77.
Crescenzi, Gianluigi 764.
Crimi, Marisa 268.
Crippled Dick Hot Wax 949, 952.
Crisanti, Andrea 796, 804.
Cristaldi, Franco 155.
bio 155.
Criterion Film 418.
Crocitti, Vincenzo 828.
Cronenberg, David 18, 21, 323, 503, 1031.
Crosby, Floyd 511.
CSC 582, 600.
Cucciolla, Riccardo 942, 945, 946, 947, 948, 950, 952, 954, 955.
bio 945.
Cunha, Richard 872.
Cunningham, Sean S. 26, 850, 868.
Curci, Loris 854.
Curcio, Dino 131.
Curtis, Tony 350, 419.
Cushing, Peter 283, 792, 906, 907.
Czartjarwitz, Aline 277.

D

Da Forno, Elena 722.
D'Alberti, Delia 573.
Dalí, Fabienne 322, 597, 664, 666, 668, 679, 878.
bio 669.
D'Aloisio, Gianni 192, 226.
D'Amato, Joe (pseud.) 26, 53, 397, 499, 654, 818, 853, 854, 860, 901, 909, 941, 943, 946, 995. See also Massaccesi, Aristide.
Damon, Mark 482, 484, 500, 712, 715, 719.
bio 499.
Dana, Rodd 778.
D'Ancora, Maurizio 79.
Danforth, Jim 972.
D'Angelo, Carlo 172, 181, 185, 226.
bio 177.
Daniels, Jonathan 172, 187.
Dannay, Frederic 933, 942.
Danning, Sybil 868.
D'Annunzio, Gabriele 48, 52, 55.
Danova, Cesare 130.
Dante, Joe 23, 24, 26, 29, 30, 323, 538, 549, 588, 696, 876, 1031, 1037, 1041.

Dantes, Claude 542, 555.
D'Antime, Myriann 942.
Dario, Erika 942, 947, 948, 950, 954, 956.
Davies, Jeremy 755.
Davis, Bette 906, 907.
Davis, Luther 362, 363.
Davis, Miles 917, 1038.
Davis, Richard 626.
Dawson, Anthony M. 712.
Day, Josette 319.
De Angelis, Guido and Maurizio 838.
de Beauregard, Georges 542, 547.
De Bernardi, F. M. 130.
De Blasi, Virgilio 456, 712.
De Blasio, Giuseppi "Joe" 711, 712, 910, 932, 933, 934, 942, 949.
De Bosio, Gianfranco 962, 965, 966, 967, 968, 969, 970, 971.
bio 961.
De Carellis, Aldo 712.
de Chomón, Segundo 39, 41, 42, 45, 60, 61, 397.
bio 39.
De Concini, Ennio 117, 139, 140, 161, 164, 192, 193, 205, 226, 230, 250, 268, 270, 274, 282, 287, 295, 336, 377, 378, 381, 384, 434, 448, 452, 474, 552, 868, 945.
bio 117.
de Curtis, Antonio. See Totò (pseud.).
De Curtis, Diana 1002.
De Federico, Francesco 1002.
De Felice, Lionello 117.
De Filippo, Eduardo 131.
De Filippo, Peppino 89, 100, 112, 113, 162.
De Fonseca, Carolyn 518, 764, 775, 1019.
De Funès, Louis 319.
De Giorgi, Elsa 79.
De la Regilia, Manuel 634.
de Lamartine, Alphonse 136.
De Lane Lea, William 214.
De Laurentiis, Dino 16, 98, 99, 123, 138, 231, 246, 303, 376, 378, 394, 399, 509, 686, 716, 719, 722, 724, 725, 726, 727, 729, 733, 734, 737, 738, 742, 745, 746, 748, 754, 755, 763, 764, 765, 769, 771, 783, 784, 803, 810, 834, 842, 848, 849, 882, 972, 973, 975.
bio 724.
De Leo, Lia 146.
De Luca, Lorella 161.
de Luna, Alvaro 594.
De Martino, Alberto 55, 162, 415, 438, 472, 473, 474, 477, 517, 577, 652, 731, 782, 833, 835, 907, 926, 945.
bio 414.
De Masi, Francesco 672, 673.
de Maupassant, Guy 482, 483, 499, 501, 922, 977, 994, 995.
De Nardo, Gustavo 420, 448, 455, 459, 482, 496, 518, 521, 527, 582, 585, 590, 878, 942, 946.
bio 457.
De Nardo, Mario 810, 812, 827, 828.
de Nerval, Gérard 1002.
De Nobili, Leo 828.
de Quincy, Thomas 983.
de Reys, Gilles 900.
De Rita, Massimo 226, 234, 245, 254, 258, 265, 268, 274, 277, 282, 295, 301, 324, 336, 418, 448.
De Robertis, Francesco 65, 73, 74, 77, 78, 513.
De Rosa, Frank 712.
De Rossi, Massimo 796, 804.
De Ryte, Max (pseud.). See De Rita, Massimo.
de Sabata, Eliana 448, 452.
De Santis, Gino 130, 245.
De Santis, Giuseppe 79, 515, 581, 615, 644.
De Sica, Vittorio 88, 89, 131, 132, 135, 149, 155, 157, 159, 265, 294, 362, 365, 367, 368, 382, 400, 496, 515, 523, 525, 651, 706, 709, 724, 748, 764, 833, 852, 877.
bio 364.
De Stefani, Alessandro 127.
De Teffè, Antonio. See Steffen, Anthony (pseud.).
de Toth, Andre 16, 171, 200, 201, 269, 287, 331, 333, 336, 351, 384, 392, 443, 644, 889.
bio 330.
De Vico, Pietro 112, 129.
De Witt, Elina 778.
Dear Film 127, 143, 145, 935.
Dear Studios 810.
Degas, Brian 712, 715, 716, 722, 725, 735.
Degni, Lou 237, 382. See also Forest, Mark (pseud.).
bio 382.
Dehek, Madeleine 594.
del Brocco, Giancarlo 600.
Del Cer, Franco 690.
Del Frate, Marisa 226, 235.
Del Frate, Patricia 594.
Del Frate, Renato
bio 162.
Del Poggio, Carla 135.
del Prato, Marcello 268.
del Toro, Guillermo 687.
Del Valle, David 323, 954.
Delamare, Rosine 362.
Delbo, Jean-Jacques 214, 418.
Deledda, Grazia 48.
Delfio Film 796.
Delgado, Marcel 387.
Della Casa, Stefano 434.
Della Rovere, Patrizia 226.
Della Valle, Vittorio 83.
Delle Piane, Carlo 109, 112.
Delli Colli, Franco 362.
Delli Colli, Tonino 108, 145, 146, 332, 356, 361, 362.
Dell'Orco, Alessandro "Sandro" 664, 667, 668, 1002.
dell'Orso, Edda 749, 774, 915, 917.
Delon, Alain 726, 761, 869.
Delon, Nathalie 868.
DeMille, Cecil B. 197, 199.
Demme, Jonathan 462.
Demongeot, Mylène 268, 269, 271, 272, 274, 275.
bio 271.
Deneuve, Catherine 728, 729, 731, 735, 996.
Dénizot, Vincenzo C. 722.
Deodato, Ruggero 976, 984, 985, 1004, 1010.
DePaolis Studios 836.
Derleth, August 981.
D'Errico, Corrado 70.
DeSeta, Enrico 374, 690, 691, 865, 972.
Desfassiaux, Maurice 69.
Desideri, Danilo 226.
Desideri, Giorgio 362, 644.
Deu Casas, Jaime 778.
Dewaele, Alwin 950.
DeWitt, Louis 420.
Dexter, Wilson 582.
Di Bella, Fausto 962, 1001, 1002, 1004.
Di Benedetto, Gianni 448, 455, 457, 712.
bio 457.
Di Leo, Fernando 1041.
di Nardo, Gustavo 872.
Di Palma, Carlo 995.
Di Palma, Dario 478.
Di Paolo, Dante 378, 379, 380, 448, 455, 456, 457, 461, 542, 550.
bio 455.
Dialina, Rika 482, 501.
Diamante, Sacerio 644.
Diamanti, Saverio 600, 614, 644, 664, 690.
Diana Film 131, 132.
Dickerson, Ernest 530.
Dietrich, Christopher Sven 274, 311, 322.
DIFNE 712.
Digitmovies 528, 558, 1038.
Dino De Laurentiis Cinematografica 374, 722, 764.
Dinocittà 571, 722, 724, 738, 741, 764, 796, 798.
Dionisio, Silvia 712, 976.
Diotallevi, Walter 942.
Dizionario del cinema italiano 251.
Dmytryk, Edward 868.
Do-Re-Mi Film 51.
Dolen, Jim 448, 455, 458.
Dolfi, Fiorella 79.
Dominguez, Luis 369.
Dominici, Arturo 7, 77, 192, 199, 200, 239, 242, 243, 254, 261, 268, 272, 279, 282, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 305, 306, 307, 315, 319, 354, 356, 377, 405, 407, 437, 454, 474, 502, 640, 670.
bio 201.
Dominici, Franca 664, 670.
Dominici, Germana 282, 294, 299.
bio 295.
Dominick, Arthur (pseud.). See Dominici, Arturo.
Donati, Ermanno 172, 348, 378, 434, 436, 441, 455, 571, 669.
Donen, Mario 722.
Donnini, Giulio 722, 764.
Dorelli, Johnny 755.
Doria, Bianca Maria 764.
Doria, Enzo 418.
Dorigo, Angelo 450.
Doro, Mino 390, 405, 513.
Doro, Virginia 448.
D'Orsini, Dina 130.
Dostoevsky, Fyodor 291, 901.
Douglas, Kirk 126, 138, 139, 140, 350, 417, 419, 522, 572.
Dover, Nyta 103, 112.
Dowling, Constance 89, 100.
Draco, Ely 390, 394.
Drain, Hans 318.
Dreyer, Carl 919.
dubbing tax 100.
Duca, Nadia (pseud.). See Ducassé, Nadine.
Duca, Nadine (pseud.) 348, 349. See also Ducassé, Nadine.
Ducas, Nadia (pseud.). See Ducassé, Nadine.
Ducas, Nadine (pseud.). See Ducassé, Nadine.
Ducassé, Nadine 456. See also Duca, Nadine and Sanders, Nadia (pseuds.).
Dunning, John 807.

Duranti, Doris 70.
Durgnat, Raymond 23, 292, 470.
Durina, Gabriele 942.
Duse, Carlo 70.
Duse, Eleonora 48, 49, 55, 110, 496.

E

Eastman, George (pseud.). See Montefiori, Luigi.
Eastwood, Clint 724, 761, 828, 833, 839.
L'Ecran Fantastique 24.
Efrikian, Laura 383.
Egan, Richard 336, 337, 338, 340, 345.
bio 339.
Eisenstein, Sergei 248.
Ekberg, Anita 242, 243, 251.
Ekland, Britt 981.
ELDA (English Language Dubbers Association) 207, 208, 209, 228, 309, 396, 514, 775.
Elder, Bill 255.
Elios Film Studios 582, 594, 634, 758, 848, 1010.
Elite Entertainment 888, 913, 938.
Elkins, Michael 336, 342.
Elley, Derek 122, 126, 237.
Elliott, J. Arthur 872, 879, 893.
Ellis, Bret Easton 793.
Elmi, Nicoletta 848, 854, 872, 877, 878, 892, 893.
bio 854.
Emal 236.
Emerson, Keith 992, 1010.
Emmanuele. Luigi 250.
Emmepi Cinematografici 482, 542.
Emmer, Luciano 102, 132, 133, 134.
Engel 407.
Englander, Melba 962.
ENIC (Ente Nazionale Industrie Cinematografich) 75, 128.
Era Film 79.
Erchov, Constantin 324.
Erickson, Glenn 316, 625, 754.
Escher, M. C. 674, 677.
Escribano, Antonio Jiménez 594.
Esdra, Micaela 664, 666, 676.
Eser, Wilibald 872, 883.
Estudios Ballestreros 474.
Euro American Productions 872.
L'Europeo 1028.
Europix 668, 681, 682.
Evans, Gil 917.
Excelsa Film 88, 107, 110.

F

Fabbri, Diego 158.
Fabbri, Marisa 942, 947.
Fabian 690, 693, 695, 696, 698, 699, 701, 705.
bio 696.
Fabrizi, Aldo 11, 16, 88, 97, 103, 104, 108, 109, 110, 112, 113, 114, 116, 117, 134, 135, 142, 143, 144, 340, 362, 366, 399, 706, 838, 902, 983.
bio 103.
Facchetti, Adriana 362, 448.
Fairbanks, Douglas 335, 354.
Fajardo, Eduardo 896, 901, 914.
bio 908–909.
Famous Monsters of Filmland 23, 701.
Fangoria 877.
Fantasi, Andrea 192, 226.
Fantasia, Franco 268, 764.
Fantoma 1038.
Fantoni, Cesare 161, 226, 228.
Fantoni, Sergio 97, 211, 226, 268, 269, 272, 275, 336, 338, 339, 340, 345.
bio 228.
Farina, Corràdo 724, 818.
Farmer, Bette 999.
Farmer, Mimsy 878, 922.
Farmer, Philip José. See Trout, Kilgore (pseud.).
Farnese, Alberto 348, 362.
Fava, Otello 226, 482, 722.
Fawcett, Charles 172.
Fax, Peg 518.
Fazio, Giuseppe 722.
Fea, Anna Maria 336.
Fehmiu, Bekim 764, 765, 767, 769, 770, 773, 774, 775.
Feliciani, Mario 375.
Fellini, Federico 23, 24, 68, 104, 130, 140, 160, 211, 233, 237, 305, 322, 341, 349, 366, 384, 393, 394, 421, 422, 437, 453, 496, 522, 550, 551, 553, 577, 614, 627, 631, 664, 670, 681, 684, 685, 686, 696, 709, 724, 734, 750, 778, 834, 852, 883, 907, 915, 938, 962, 976, 987, 995, 1024.
Fenech, Edwige 808, 810, 812, 814, 815, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825.
bio 816.
Fenton, Jay 395.
Fentone, Steve 801.
Ferguson, Mike 801.
Ferida, Luisa 76.
Ferla, Enzo 778.
Fernandez, Peter 207, 208, 265, 309, 600, 629.
Ferrari, Mario 962.
Ferrero, Anna Maria 131.
Ferrero, Sergio 764.
Ferri, Liana 151.
Ferrigno, Lou 209, 231.
Ferrini, Francesco 942, 946.
Ferroni 942.
Ferroni, Giorgio 177, 201, 246, 310, 324, 387, 483, 487, 524, 582, 586, 670, 730, 758, 761, 878.
bio 758.
Ferry, Jean 122.
Fert Film 51.
Ferzetti, Gabriele 146, 147.
Feuillade, Louis 185, 449, 562, 722.
Ficini-Carpita, Emma. See Bava, Emma Ficini-Carpita (mother).
Ficini-Carpita family 39.
Field, Frank 518.
Fiermonte, Enzo 764, 962.
Figueroa, José Mallorqui 473.
Filipini, Rino 71.
Filippini, Ugo 411.
Filippone, Piero 158, 644.
Film Columbus 414, 434.
Film Dope 30.
Film Horreur 683.
Film, Lux 192.
Film Ventures International 993.
Filmar 242, 348.
Filmation Associates 387, 408, 560.
Films & Filming 470, 510, 626, 752, 753.
Les Films Marceau 155.
Filmways 935.
Fineschi, Onelia 94, 96.
Finkelman, Wayne 942.
Fiore, Maria 136, 137, 562, 571, 945.
bio 137.
Fiorelli, Aldo 96, 97, 192, 226.
Fiorentini, Fiorenzo 108, 141.
Fiorito, Antonietta 690.
Fischer, Madeline 214.
Fisher, Terence 21, 24, 102, 172, 283, 393, 409, 556, 673, 1028, 1037.
Flash Gordon (comic strip) 230, 231.
Fleetwood, James 1010.
Fleischer, Richard 123, 255, 309, 350, 417, 455, 487, 499, 500, 644, 947.
Flemyng, Robert 441.
Flesh & Blood 950.
Florescu, Radu 871, 872.
Floyd, Calvin 871.
Foà, Arnoldo 145.
Foam, John (pseud.). See Bava, Mario: pseudonyms.
Foam, Marie (pseud.). See Bava, Mario: pseudonyms.
Fondato, Marcello 482, 484, 485, 542, 546, 561, 566, 731.
Fonolux 390.
Fontana, Enrico 418, 482.
Foray, June 249.
Ford, Montgomery (pseud.). See Halsey, Brett.
Forest, Jean-Claude 725, 727.
Forest, Mark (pseud.) 237, 374, 377, 382, 387, 414, 436. See also Degni, Lou.
Forsyth, Stephen 684, 776, 778, 779, 781, 782, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 793, 810, 987.
bio 781.
Fortini, Romana 600, 615, 627, 634, 652, 664, 689, 722.
Fortunia Film 143.
Fosco, Piero (pseud.). See Pastrone, Giovanni.
Foster, Alan Dean 631.
Fotre, Vincent G. 872, 873, 883.
Franca, Franco 1002.
Franchi, Franco 690, 695, 705.
bio 696–697.
Francinor-PIP 518.
Franciolini, Gianni 131, 132.
Francis, Freddie 303.
Francisci, Mario 96.
Francisci, Pietro 11, 65, 70, 88, 89, 96, 97, 99, 103, 107, 108, 139, 140, 141, 142, 157, 161, 163, 164, 191, 192, 193, 197, 198, 202, 206, 209, 213, 226, 230, 233, 236, 237, 239, 241, 243, 249, 257, 364, 382, 384, 393, 515, 572, 731, 770, 877, 1023, 1062.
Francisco Film 434.
Franco and Ciccio 689, 690, 691, 692, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 707, 764, 795, 828, 1004.
Franco, Francisco 783.
Franco, Fulvia 146, 226.
Franco, Jess 670, 779, 817, 832.
Franco London Film 594.
Franju, Georges 501, 562, 582, 681, 770, 907, 918, 921.
Frank, Mark 24, 976.

Frascà, Bruno 896, 926.
Fraschetti, Silvio 192, 198.
Frassica 228.
Frassinetti, Augusto 268, 270, 354.
Fraticelli, Franco 594, 1010.
Frattini, Gaio 161, 192, 193.
Frayling, Christopher 581.
Freda, Franco 172, 848.
Freda, Jacqueline "Rusty" 210, 379.
Freda, Riccardo 10, 16, 65, 70, 77, 85, 86, 90, 117, 120, 121, 122, 123, 125, 126, 134, 157, 158, 172, 176, 177, 178, 181, 182, 185, 187, 188, 189, 191, 200, 202, 210, 215, 220, 237, 241, 242, 243, 248, 257, 259, 263, 292, 294, 319, 322, 331, 340, 348, 352, 366, 378, 379, 380, 384, 394, 420, 434, 436, 437, 440, 441, 442, 443, 455, 456, 497, 499, 515, 517, 520, 521, 529, 537, 552, 571, 585, 644, 645, 650, 652, 673, 733, 770, 771, 781, 801, 804, 806, 807, 814, 823, 835, 838, 841, 852, 858, 868, 877, 905, 909, 996, 1011. See also Hampton, Robert and Hamton, Robert (pseuds.).
bio 120.
Freda, Richard 172.
I [The] Free Love (band) 838.
Frees, Paul 208, 243, 494, 542, 560.
bio 560.
Fregonese, Hugo 381.
Frense, Michael 942.
Freud, Sigmund 675.
Freund, Karl 95, 181, 500, 562.
Frezza, Giovanni 686.
Friedkin, William 1038.
Fripp, Robert 992.
Frontiere, Dominic 243.
Frugoni, Cesare 942, 943, 977.
Fuchs, Gianni 387.
Fuentes, Carlos 186.
Fuentes, Toni 594.
Fuest, Robert 867.
Fujiwara, Chris 273.
FUL Films 664.
Fulci, Lucio 147, 174, 223, 322, 471, 521, 590, 659, 696, 723, 782, 818, 828, 832, 854, 860, 908, 910, 945, 946, 984, 1003, 1004, 1024, 1030, 1036, 1041.
Furia, Giacomo 147.
Furnari, Salvatore 383, 384.
Fury, Ed 373.
Fusari, Bianca Maria 129.
Fusch, Barbara 226.
Futuramic Releasing 538.

G

G. V. Produzione 758.
Gabel, Scilla 185, 244, 245, 246, 247, 272, 764, 766, 770.
bio 246.
Gabrini, Misa 226.
Gagliardo, Giovanna 1002.
Gagni, Mario 443.
Galaor 51.
Galassi, Angiolo 172, 181, 182, 184, 189.
Galatea 16, 144, 192, 198, 210, 226, 234, 236, 239, 254, 258, 260, 268, 272, 274, 277, 282, 292, 296, 309, 329, 335, 336, 340, 348, 350, 365, 381, 393, 401, 418, 424, 434, 437, 448, 449, 464, 481, 482, 511, 513, 514, 515, 709.
Gall, Justine 810.
Gallagher, Tag 68, 71.
Gallea, Arturo 90.
Galleani, Ely 751, 810, 813, 816, 818, 819, 820, 823, 879, 994.
bio 818.
Galletti, Giovanna 362, 664, 669, 671.
bio 670.
Galli, Ida 390, 393, 395, 405, 513, 515, 518, 521, 522, 524. See also Oberon, Isli (pseud.).
bio 393.
Galliano, Cataldo 251.
Gallitti, Alberto 962.
Gallus Productions 374.
Galter, Irene 146.
Galter, Sam (pseud.) 214. See also Landry, Gérard.
Gans, Christophe 755.
Garbini, Amato 600.
Garbo, Greta 134, 151, 555, 943, 956.
Garboli, Cesare 1002.
Gargiullo, Giorgio 828, 835, 838.
bio 835.
Garko, Gianni 483, 521, 724.
Garrani, Ivo 161, 163, 192, 199, 202, 204, 207, 214, 216, 219, 220, 268, 272, 275, 282, 293, 295, 303, 331, 384, 387, 585.
bio 163, 294.
Garrett, Eleanora 542.
Garrone, Riccardo 755.
Garroni, Andrew 1015.
Gasparri, Rodolfo 684, 839.
Gassman, Vittorio 107, 120, 151.
Gastaldi, Ernesto 177, 216, 275, 294, 308, 441, 450, 461, 473, 497, 517, 518, 519, 523, 526, 529, 530, 536, 539, 554, 615, 634, 709, 779, 835, 997, 1035.
bio 517.
Gates, Tudor 711, 712, 715, 716, 722, 725, 735, 746.
Gatti, Marcello 330, 362, 367, 962, 969, 970, 972.
Gattinara, Carlo Castelli 93.
Gattinara, Enrico Castelli 93.
Gavin, Kit J. 393, 970.
GE.S.I. (Gestione Studios Internazionale) 89, 149.
Gec, Jovan 244.
Geissler, Dieter 872.
Gemma, Giuliano 400, 635, 644.
Gemmiti, Arturo 83, 215.
Gennari, Giorgio 722.
Gentilomo, Giacomo 55, 248, 263, 295, 347, 373, 392, 417, 420, 428, 475, 572, 584, 640, 644, 724, 1014.
bio 350.
Gerard, Lawrence 712.
Gerini, Claudia 1039.
Germani, Gaia 390, 393, 399, 405, 407, 410, 575, 576.
Germi, Pietro 21, 199, 220, 221, 260.
Gervasi, Frank 151.
Getty III, J. Paul 197.
Gherardi, Piero 722, 729, 734.
Giacobini, Franco 390, 398, 400, 404, 405, 406, 418, 426.
bio 393.
Giacosi, Luigi 79.
Giambartolomei, Guido 214.
Giandalia, Roberto 644.
Giannuzzi, Rita 135.
Gicca, Enzo 410.
Gide, André 674.
Giger, H. R. 631.
Gigli, Beniamino 90.
Gimeno, Antonio 600, 615.
Giombini, Marcello 644, 654.
Giordani, Aldo 764, 771.
Giordano, Daniela 778, 794, 796, 798, 799, 801, 801–802, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807.
bio 801.
Giordano, Franco 443.
Giorgi, Eleonora 1010.
Giorgio, Luigi 214.
Giorsi, Mario 390, 418.
Giovannini, Giorgio 143, 226, 233, 282, 301, 336, 400, 411, 418, 448, 455, 460, 462, 463, 482, 486, 494, 515, 544, 600, 617.
Giovannini, Stefanella 764.
Girolami, Marino 102, 828.
Girolami, Romolo 594.
Girotti, Mario 131, 362, 365.
bio 365.
Girotti, Massimo 75, 76, 88, 89, 106, 118, 121, 122, 123, 126, 365, 802, 872, 873, 884, 886, 888, 893.
bio 877.
Giuffré, Aldo 108.
Giuliano, Renato 192.
Giussani, Angela and Luciana 484, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 733, 749, 752, 755.
bio 722.
Giusti, Marco 843.
Giustini, Carlo 96, 126.
Giustini, Massimo 1002.
Giustini, Maurizio 664, 671, 764.
Given, Eddie H. 434.
Glenn, John 220.
Globus, Ken 962.
Glomer Film 242.
Gloria, Leda 131.
Gobbi, Tito 86, 87, 89, 90, 94, 95.
Goblin 991.
Godi, Franco 869.
Gogol, Nikolai Vasilyevich 16, 115, 247, 282, 284, 285, 291, 320, 324, 657, 922.
Gökcan, Ibrahim 304.
Goldstein, Bert 172.
Gomez, Macario 192, 240, 266.
Gonneau, George 208, 228, 243, 249, 265, 309, 313, 316.
Gora, Claudio 722.
Gorassini, Annie 722.
Gordon, Joyce 309.
Gordon, Richard 498.
Gori, Lallo 690, 705, 796.
Gorini, Ariana 542, 546, 551, 552, 564.
Gottlieb, Franz Josef 543.
Govedarica, Vojislav 764.
Govoni, Armando 216, 275, 295, 296, 297, 300, 301, 305, 309, 418, 448, 463, 465, 482, 542, 547, 582, 709.
Gozlino, Paolo 254, 724.
GQ 749.
Grad, Geneviève 437.
Gradoli, Antonio 582, 585, 588, 634, 635.
Gradwell, Anthony 582, 634.
Grafton, Sue 461.
Grainger, Julian 483.

Grand Mufti Abderrahim Khalil 367.
Grani, Tina Loriedo 282, 411, 418, 448, 482, 542, 664, 668.
Grant, Bernard 309, 479.
Grant, Walter 226, 268.
Grappelli, Stephane 838.
Grateful Dead 1038.
Graziosi, Giorgio 161.
Grcev, Kreso 243.
Greco, Cosetta 117, 129.
Greene, Lorne 635.
Greganti, Roberta 755.
Gregorini, Barbara. See Bach, Barbara.
Grey, Dick 518.
Grieco, Cristina 542.
Grieg, Edvard 315.
Griffith, D. W. 45, 51, 58.
Griffiths, Rachel 793.
Grimaldi, Eva 324.
Grimaldi, Giovanni 438, 828.
Grimaldi, Hugo 387, 390, 407.
Grosz, George 839.
Guarini, Alfredo 851.
Guarini, Maurizio 991.
Guarracino, Umberto 397.
Guazzoni, Enrico 41, 106.
Gueltzo, Nina 952.
Guerra, Luigi Antonio 942.
Guerra, Mario 473, 478.
Guerra, Ugo 158, 474, 482, 517, 518, 520, 529, 764.
Guerrini, Mino 174, 448, 452, 453, 669, 900, 907.
Guerrini, Orso Maria 764.
Guida, Wandisa 172, 184, 185, 189, 486, 612, 816.
  bio 177.
Guidelli, Giovanni 324.
Guralnick, Peter 560.
Guthridge, John 962.
Guy, Maddelena 543, 872.

H

Haller, Daniel 505, 526, 600, 625, 707.
Haller, Juergen 942.
Hallmark Releasing Corp. 860, 861, 868.
Halsey, Brett 200, 441, 442, 443, 725, 794, 796, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 807, 817, 826, 828, 829, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 841.
  bio 801.
Hambling, Gerry 962.
Hamilton, David 518.
Hamilton, Margaret 319.
Hampton, Robert (pseud.) 258. See also Freda, Riccardo.
Hamton, Robert (pseud.) 254. See also Freda, Riccardo.
Hansel, Arthur 553, 554.
Hanson, Curtis 707.
Hape Film Gmbh & Co. 796.
Hararet, Haya 394.
Harding, Bertita 49.
Hardy, Martin 518.
Hardy, Phil 21, 664.
Hargitay, Mickey 373, 487, 664, 705.
Harker, Gordon 100.
Harlequin International Pictures 597.
Harper, Jessica 983, 1019.
Harris, Brad 373.
Harrison, Loretta 414.
Harrison, Richard 295, 387, 414, 415, 438, 439, 440, 473, 474, 475, 477, 478, 479, 487, 758.
  bio 414.
Hart, John 479, 664, 674.
Hart, Susan 610, 612, 613.
  bio 610.
Hartford, James 690.
Hartmann, Edmund L. 667.
Harvey, Dennis 954.
Havard, Dafydd 448.
Hawkwood, John 712.
Hayes, R. M. 394.
Heinlein, Robert 922.
Hemlin, Henrik 917.
Hemmings, David 463.
Hemric, Guy 690, 706.
Henson, Jim 821.
Herlin, Jacques 518, 730, 962, 964, 968.
  bio 523.
Herrero, Jesús Maria 778.
Hersent, Philippe 268, 437, 513.
Herter, Gérard 244, 246, 247, 254, 256, 257, 259, 260, 261, 265, 582, 585, 764, 770.
Heston, Charlton 125.
Heusch, Paolo 117, 127, 129, 214, 215, 216, 517, 523, 543, 715, 910.
Heyward, Louis M. "Deke" 491, 600, 606, 608, 609, 610, 612, 618, 619, 646, 690, 692, 693, 696, 697, 698, 699, 701, 707, 810.
  bio 608.
Hickman, Dwayne 690.
Hickox, Douglas 868.
Higgins III, George 309.
Hill, Susan 687.
Hill, Terence (pseud.). See Girotti, Mario.
Hilliard, Ryan 1010.
Hillinger, Wolfgang 722.
Hilton, George 829.
Hinwood, Peter 764.
Hinz, Michael 796, 802.
Hirohito, Emperor 55.
Hitchcock, Alfred 58, 59, 127, 128, 283, 316, 420, 424, 449, 450, 460, 481, 497, 519, 529, 530, 542, 543, 544, 564, 584, 680, 848, 851, 861, 867, 888, 907, 951, 957, 981, 1006, 1028, 1040, 1041.
Hitler, Adolf 71, 82.
Hoffmann, E. T. A. 1002.
Hogan, Percy 962.
Hold, John (pseud.). See Bava, Mario: pseudonymns.
Holden, Gloria 319.
Holiday, Ronny and Joy 172, 188.
Holt, Seth 723, 724.
Honoré, Jean-Pierre 573.
Honthaner, Ron 172, 187, 188, 189.
Honthauer, Ron (pseud.). See Honthaner, Ron.
Horror (magazine) 18.
Hoven, Adrian 860.
Howard, Thomas 355, 356.
Hubschmid, Paul 214, 215.
  bio 216.
Hughes, Howard 105, 149.
Hugo, Robert 518.
Hunebelle, André 723, 725.
Hurtado, A. 594.
Hutchison, David 752, 753.
Hyams, Joe 912, 926, 934.

I

Iaia, Piero Ermanno 891.
IDS (International Dubbing Studios) 396, 407.
Iles, Francis 861.
Image Entertainment 29, 189, 209, 317, 659, 799, 807, 819, 820, 829, 877, 888, 913, 938, 1038.
Imperial Film 142.
Imperialciné 390.
INCIM (Industrie Cinematografiche Milanesi) 132.
INCIR–De Paolis Studios 374, 414, 434, 828, 1010.
Incontrera, Annabella 375.
INDIEF (Internazionale Nembo Distribuzione Importazione Esportazione Film) 664.
Indovina, Franco 764.
Ingrassia, Ciccio 690, 695, 696.
  bio 696.
Inkijinoff, Valerij 378.
Innocenti, Adriana 1002.
Innocenzi, Carlo 381.
Interlenghi, Franco 145.
International Classics 1011.
International Media Corporation 942.
International Media Films 1039.
Intersound Productions 1010.
Invernizi, Franca 198, 511.
Ipalé, Aharon 962.
Iris Film 145.
Iron Butterfly 858.
Istituto LUCE 336, 348.
Itala Film 94.
Italgamma Film 161.
Italian International 243, 309, 600, 605, 634, 690, 691, 701, 707, 999.
Ivezic, Ilija 764.

J

Jackson, Shirley 676, 992, 993.
Jacoby, Georg 52.
Jadran Film 764.
Jagarinac, Sime 764.
Jaguar Films 594.
James, Henry 1002.
Jannarelli, Angelo 83.
Jannings, Emil 52.
Jano, Francisco Fernandez Zarza 20, 916, 1025.
Jarratt, Vernon 97.
Jasset, Victorin 722.
Jeffries, Lang 441.
Jensen, Paul M. 24.
Jimeno, Antonio 634.
Johnson, Richard 754, 962, 971.
Jolly Film 282, 374, 418.
Jones, Alan 371, 471, 687, 755, 759, 811, 1017, 1024, 1025, 1033.
Jones, Dickie 142.
Jones, Paul 467.
Jumbo Cinematografica 872.

Juptner, Friedrich 872.
Just, Philip (pseud.). See Sanjust, Filippo.
Juva, Antonio Mambretti Sonzogno 99, 100.

K

Kallis, Albert 465.
Kamel, Joe 594.
Kappa, Dino 991, 992.
Karloff, Boris 481, 482, 484, 487, 498, 499, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 520, 692, 701, 707, 790, 869.
bio 500.
Karloff, Evelyn 509.
Karlsen, John 435.
Kaslow, Harmon 942.
Katz, Ephraim 336.
Kaufman, Robert 690, 692, 707.
bio 692.
Kaufmann, Christine 250, 251.
Kay, Richard 207.
Kayam, Oshra El 962.
Keaton, Buster 609.
Kelleng, Edward Febo 722.
Kelley, Bill 611.
Kelley, James 981.
Kendall, Tony (pseud.) 518, 521, 522, 526, 534.
bio 521.
Kennedy, John F. 547.
Kent, Jean 100, 101.
Kessler, Christian 819.
Kessler Twins, Ellen and Alice 418, 420, 421, 422, 426, 429.
bio 421.
Ketoff, Paolo 600.
Kettridge, P. 483.
Kezich, Tuilio 153.
Kiefer, Warren (pseud.). See Sabatini, Lorenzo.
Kilgore, Bob 681.
Kilpatrick, Shirley 320.
King, Bob 518.
King, Stephen 255, 981.
Kingham, Bernard J. 962.
Kinski, Klaus 943, 945.
Kirby, Jack 325.
Kirk, Phyllis 889.
Kismet Classics 1039.
Kismet Entertainment Group 942, 1039.
Kitrosser, Martin 868.
Kneale, Nigel 189, 215, 255, 687.
Knight, Arthur 93.
Koch, Carl 581.
Koerner, Diana 552.
Kohn, Galia 962.
Korda, Alexander 330, 354, 370.
Koscina, Sylva 110, 189, 192, 197, 198, 199, 200, 203, 209, 226, 227, 228, 231, 235, 237, 248, 259, 272, 484, 571, 894, 896, 898, 901, 902, 906, 908, 913, 922, 934, 938.
bio 199, 907–908.
Kouraviliev, Leonid 324.
Kovacic, Branko 764.
Kraus, Peter 421.
Kresel, Lee 309, 316.
bio 265.
Kronos Film 134.
Kropatchov, Gueorgui 324.
Kruger, Hardy 981.
Krugher, Lea 542, 547, 553, 554, 565, 943. See also Lander, Lea (pseud.).
Kubrick, Stanley 89, 122, 126, 243, 246, 348, 352, 561, 673, 687.
Kunkera, Zelyko 796.
Kurz, Massimo 145.
Kurz, Ron 868.
Kuveiller, Luigi 463, 590.

L

Labella, Vincenzo 961, 962.
Lagrange, Valérie 331.
Lahaie, Brigitte 26.
Lancaster, Burt 161, 268, 417, 572, 654, 905, 910, 958, 962, 963, 965, 966, 967, 968, 970, 972.
bio 967.
Lancaster, William 962, 967, 968.
bio 968.
Lanchester, Elsa 319.
Lander, Lea (pseud.) 554, 555, 556, 557, 940, 942, 943, 944, 946, 947, 948, 949, 950, 951, 953, 956. See also Krugher, Lea.
bio 554.
Landi, Aldo Bufi 127.
Landry, Gérard 215, 220.
Lane, John Francis 962.
Lane, Mara 146.
Lanfranchi, Mario 842, 1024.
Lang, Fritz 45, 51, 55, 100, 200, 219, 263, 294, 495, 530, 683.
Lang, Sam 872, 879, 881, 893.
Langley, Noel 100.
Lanza, Mario 201.
Larraz, José 858.
Larsen, Keith 872.
Laser Film S.r.l. 976, 977.
Lassander, Dagmar 778, 779, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 791, 919.
bio 781.
Lattuada, Alberto 104, 135.
Laura Film 107.
Laureri, Maurizio 828.
Lavagnino, Angelo Francesco 89, 163, 336, 342, 355, 362, 369, 577, 673, 915.
LaVerne, Lucille 320.
Lavi, Daliah 148, 311, 322, 444, 495, 518, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 534, 535, 537, 566, 582, 877, 912, 996.
bio 522.
Lavia, Gabriele 1010.
Lavinio 810.
Law, John Phillip 660, 720, 722, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 733, 734, 735, 736, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 747, 752, 753, 754, 755, 764, 1039.
bio 727.
Lawrence, Charles K. 415, 634.
Lawrence, D. H. 1010.
Lawrence, Max (pseud.). See Catenacci, Luciano.
Laydu, Claude 140.
Lazaga, Pedro 438.
Lazar, Veronica 1008, 1010, 1018.
Lazzazera, Assanta 192.
Leblanc, Maurice 721.
LeClaire, Chris 241, 353.
Lee, Bill 243.
Lee, Christopher 110, 137, 148, 189, 297, 307, 390, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 399, 402, 404, 405, 406, 484, 502, 509, 518, 520, 521, 523, 524, 525, 526, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 535, 537, 539, 543, 575, 576, 577, 593, 707, 730, 750, 792, 862, 871, 872, 906, 1031.
bio 392.
Lee, Manfred B. 933, 942.
Lee, Margaret 689, 755.
Lees, Tamara 100, 101, 102, 103, 104, 127, 132, 150, 151.
bio 102.
Lega, Augusto J. 634.
Lehar, Franz 901.
Lehar, Sophie 901.
Leib, Vladimir 764.
Leigh, Janet 418, 848, 945.
Leite, Barbara 99.
Lemoine, Michel 582, 583, 585, 586, 589.
bio 585–586.
Lennick, Michael 220, 303.
Lentini, Massimo 976.
Lenzi, Umberto 455, 554, 669, 697, 733, 772, 823, 833, 860, 909, 949, 985, 1029.
Leon, Kelly 542.
Leonard, Robert Z. 16, 65, 150, 151.
Leoncavallo, Ruggero 90, 94, 95.
bio 94.
Leone, Alfredo 18, 29, 210, 283, 327, 471, 509, 659, 796, 797, 802, 803, 804, 805, 807, 809, 810, 822, 842, 859, 860, 872, 873, 876, 877, 879, 881, 882, 883, 884, 887, 888, 889, 891, 893, 895, 896, 899, 902, 904, 905, 906, 907, 909, 910, 911, 912, 913, 914, 915, 917, 918, 920, 921, 922, 925, 926, 927, 929, 930, 931, 932, 933, 934, 935, 936, 937, 938, 942, 948, 949, 953, 954, 957, 1027, 1028, 1037, 1039, 1041.
bio 796.
Leone Film 518.
Leone, Gianni 822.
Leone International Productions 872, 896.
Leone, Kathy 872, 882, 896, 930.
Leone, Madeline 904.
Leone, Michael 796, 931.
Leone, Sergio 69, 82, 142, 143, 200, 242, 250, 287, 332, 340, 377, 384, 414, 452, 486, 527, 581, 583, 587, 588, 589, 593, 596, 613, 634, 641, 646, 719, 745, 746, 810, 825, 828, 835, 838, 841, 852, 853, 915.
Leone, Vincenzo 42. See also Roberti, Roberto (pseud.).
Leonetti, Dino 722.
Leoni, Guido 796.
Leoni, Pino 1010, 1013.
LeRoy, Mervyn 106.
Leroy, Philippe 441, 575.
Lester, Mark 981.
Lester, Richard 707.
Lettieri, Al 947, 948.
Levin, Henry 361, 362, 363, 366, 370, 394, 724, 732, 834, 1028.
Levine, Joseph E. 207, 209, 237, 239, 249, 250, 251, 277, 330, 333, 353, 355, 362, 368, 369, 443, 972.
bio 206.
Levy, Carole 757.
Lewis, Al 172, 189.

Lewis, Jerry 509.
Lewis, Sinclair 96.
L'Herbier, Marcel 69.
Liberati, Alberto 644.
Libération (newspaper) 976, 1029.
I Libra (band) 976, 991–993, 996.
Lido, Pini 448.
Liekov, Didi 962.
Lienas, Silvia 778.
Lindvall, Angela 755.
Link, André 807.
Lion, Mickey (pseud.). See Bava, Mario: pseudonyms.
Lipinski, Miroslaw 805.
Lissa (pseud.). See Pichelli, Elissa.
Llimera, Veronica 778, 789.
Löb, Karl 561.
Lodi, Rodolfo 1010.
Lodoli, Luigi 1010.
Lolli, Franco 384, 390, 478.
Lollobrigida, Gina 16, 86, 89, 90, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 103, 104, 105, 106, 110, 111, 120, 121, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 155, 206, 319, 340, 496, 558, 562, 627, 709, 764, 801, 906.
bio 86.
Lollobrigida, Guido 828.
bio 835.
Lombardi, Carlo 268.
Lombardi, Rodolfo 66, 67, 121, 126.
Lombardo, Goffredo 173.
Loncar, Miodrag 764.
London, Barbara 172.
Long, Malisa 712.
Lopez, Sylvia 122, 226, 227, 228, 229, 231, 233, 440.
bio 228.
Loren, Sophia 106, 140, 141, 295, 340, 399, 400, 523, 627, 801, 945.
bio 246.
Lorenzon, Livio 414, 415, 439, 440.
Loti, Gianni 226, 268.
Louise, Tina 237.
Lovcen Film 242.
Lovecraft, H. P. 21, 181, 256, 326, 511, 600, 707, 900, 922.
Loyola Films 942.
Loyola, Roberto 942, 943, 948, 949.
Lualdi, Antonella 127, 145.
Luang, Ham-Chou 379.
Lubin, Arthur 16, 246, 269, 274, 353, 355, 359, 363.
Lubitsch, Ernst 541.
Lucas, George 923, 1023.
Lucas, Tim 24, 323, 942, 952.
Lucentini, Franco 483.
Lucerlini, Sante 796.
Lucertola Media 29, 949, 952, 953.
Lucidi, Enrico 796.
Lucidi, Maurizio 261, 333, 362, 384, 410, 854, 946.
Lucisano, Fulvio 243, 308, 387, 425, 600, 605, 606, 609, 610, 611, 616, 619, 620, 625, 626, 634, 635, 636, 646, 690, 691, 692, 698, 705, 922, 996, 998, 999, 1010, 1025.
Lugosi, Bela 869.
Lulli, Folco 242, 243, 336, 340, 418, 640.
bio 422.
Lulli, Franca 976.
Lulli, Piero 420, 422, 634, 635, 636, 637, 640, 664, 670, 829.
bio 640.
Luotto, Gene 644, 796, 848.
Luova, Ludmilla 712, 717, 719.
Lupo, Alberto 268.
Luppi, Fausto 910.
Lustig, William 1014, 1015.
Lux Compagnie Cinématographique de France 192, 214, 226, 242, 268, 362.
Lux de France 140, 348.
Lux Film 75, 86, 97, 98, 100, 102, 103, 108, 138, 139, 140, 198, 214, 226, 242, 254, 259, 329, 330, 353, 362, 363, 434, 724.
Luxardo, Elda 810.
Luxardo, Elio 173, 496.
Luzi, Enrico 135.
Lydecker, Howard and Theodore 265.
Lynch, David 18, 664, 687.

M

Macario, Erminio 113.
Macasoli, Antonio 251.
Maccari, Giuseppe 319, 355, 976, 995.
Macellari, Liliana 962.
Maciste 374, 377, 382, 397, 574, 772.
Maculani, Giulio 872.
Maesso, José G. 594, 896, 899, 909, 922, 932, 933.
bio 905.
Mafai, Giulia 828.
Maffai, Giuliani 810.
Magarshack, David 284.
Maggio, Dante 127.
Magnaghi, Natale 536.
Magnani, Anna 79.
Magni, Lucia 857.
Magrini, Bona 282, 390.
Magritte, Rene 750.
Magus, Simon 1027, 1029.
Maiuri, Dino 722.
Majano, Anton Giulio 127, 230, 245, 341, 482, 515, 771, 945.
Majestic Film 242.
Malandruco, Angelo 214.
Malatesta, Guido 812, 817.
Malenotti, Maleno 150, 151.
Maltin, Leonard 1039.
Mancini, Mario 226, 482, 594.
Mancinotti, Gisela 172.
Mancori, Alvaro 377, 570, 571, 584, 640, 758. See also Wordl, Al (pseud.).
Mancori Film 570.
Mancori, Guglielmo 571, 634, 640, 949.
Mancori, Sandro 571, 758.
Mangano, Silvana 138, 140, 158, 287, 399, 724.
Manni, Ettore 134, 140, 383, 437, 513, 942, 954.
bio 384.
Mannino, Franco 172, 443.
Manno, Dante 512.
Mansfield, Jayne 705, 795, 799.
Manunza, Masino 276.
Manzari, Pino 942.
Marais, Jean 134, 319, 421, 723.
Marandi, Evi 600, 607, 611, 613, 618, 619.
Maranzana, Mario 1002, 1004, 1005.
Marchal, Georges 126, 242, 243, 248, 382.
Marchetti, Nino 226.
Marchi, Virgilio 77.
Marciani, Danilo 594.
Marco, José 414, 415, 439.
Margadonna, Ettore 130.
Margheriti, Antonio 163, 177, 223, 261, 295, 322, 340, 363, 366, 384, 387, 407, 411, 421, 452, 458, 460, 487, 499, 500, 520, 525, 539, 549, 551, 557, 558, 586, 593, 599, 615, 650, 652, 673, 697, 698, 712, 715, 716, 717, 719, 782, 828, 832, 835, 853, 854, 872, 877, 881, 887, 915, 995, 1023.
bio 542.
Mari, Febo 48.
Mari, Fiorelli 214.
Marianne Production 722.
Marie, Lisa 326.
Marin, Luciano 348, 350, 383, 384.
Marinucci, Luciana 722, 729.
Marinuzzi Jr., Gino 386, 600, 618, 621, 623, 624, 625, 626, 992.
bio 622.
Mario Bava (book by Pascal Martinet) 29.
Mario Bava (booklet) 24.
Mario, E. A. 130.
Marko, Val 712.
Marlowe, Scott 142.
Marotta, Giuseppe 153.
Marshall, Edison 350.
Martín, Diana 594, 597.
Martin, José Manuel 594.
Martín, Leonardo 896, 899.
Martinelli, Elsa 723, 724.
Martinet, Pascal 29, 820, 900.
Martini, Emanuela 434.
Martino, Bruno 189.
Martino, Luciano 151, 177, 322, 473, 517, 518, 521, 522, 523, 526, 816, 819, 941.
Martino, Sergio 471, 525, 529, 536, 539, 542, 873, 876, 941, 942, 943, 1004, 1041.
Martino, Walter 985, 991, 992.
Marton, Andrew 549.
Martuffi, Guido 192.
Marussig Productions 933.
Maryl, Mara 536.
Marzelli, Giorgio 434.
Marzulli, Claudio 390.
Mas, Antonia 778.
Mascii, Jean 358, 430.
Masciocchi, Raffaele 348, 442.
Masetti, Enzo 192, 198, 206, 226, 235.
Masina, Giulietta 143, 684, 686.
Masing, Esther 712, 719.
Maslansky, Paul 576.
Massaccesi, Aristide. See D'Amato, Joe (pseud.).
Mastelloni, Leopoldo 1010.
Mastrocinque, Camillo 326.
Mastroianni, Marcello 103, 104, 105, 106, 117, 120, 129, 259, 260, 341, 459, 466, 600, 1004.
Mataix 624.
Matelli, Dante 349.
Matheson, Richard 481, 519.
Mattei, Giuseppe 600, 686.
Mattera, Gino 192, 226.
Matteucci, Neda 448.
Mattoli, Mario 215.
Mattsson, Arne 543, 544, 889.

Maulini, Giorgio 899.
Mauriat, Paul 896, 917.
May Jr., Don 938.
Mayer, Gabriele 600, 618, 722.
Mayer, Sartoria 848.
Mayniel, Juliette 764, 768, 770.
McCarthy, Frank 749.
McCloskey, Leigh 1010, 1012, 1015, 1018.
McHarry, Charles 299.
McLee, Joseph 848.
McNally, Raymond 871, 872.
McNamara, Richard 214, 219, 479.
McQueen, Steve 256.
McVicar, Daniel 1039.
Mecacci, Piero 712, 778.
Medallion Pictures Corporation 436.
Medici, Nona 764.
Medin, Gastone 89, 496, 549.
Medin, Harriet White 106, 272, 331, 336, 340, 341, 343, 365, 420, 482, 494, 496, 497, 511, 518, 521, 522, 524, 527, 529, 537, 542, 549.
bio 496–497.
Meersman, Peter 214.
Mehemet, Sukri 942, 952.
Melani, Riccardo 91, 102.
Melaranci, Sandro 828.
Melato, Mariangela 962.
Melchior, Ib J. 600, 606, 607, 608, 610, 611, 612, 613, 617, 619, 621, 628, 630.
bio 606.
Melecco, Marta 448.
Méliès, Georges 39, 138, 155, 214.
Mell, Marisa 660, 720, 722, 723, 728, 729, 730, 731, 733, 734, 735, 736, 739, 740, 742, 745, 747, 750, 752, 753, 754, 909, 910.
bio 730.
Mella, Eloy 440, 478.
Melnati, Umberto 99.
Meloni, Edith 810, 816, 822, 855.
Memè, Teodorico 644.
Menardi, Luigi 77, 79.
Méndez, Guillermo 594.
Menzies, William Cameron 214, 256.
Mercier, Michèle 183, 322, 362, 366, 463, 480, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 491, 510, 563, 866.
bio 366, 486.
Mercuri, Paolo 301.
Mercury Films 778.
Mérimée, Prosper 1001, 1002, 1038.
Merivale, John 254, 258, 259.
bio 259.
Merlini, Mario 214.
Merritt, A. 901.
Mertes, Marion 872.
Mestral, Armand 331.
Metheus Film 570.
Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer 348, 362, 778.
Metty, Russell 95.
Metzger, Radley 797, 805.
MGM Home Entertainment 317.
Michaëlis, Dario 172, 173, 178, 180, 181, 184, 214, 219.
bio 177.
Michettoni, Ennio 722.
Midi-Minuit Fantastique 23, 173, 409, 470, 520, 538, 539, 683, 707, 723.
Migliorini, Romano 664, 667, 676, 683, 899.
Milian, Tomas 893.
Milland, Ray 876.
Miller, Frederick "Fritz" 926.
Miller, Marvin 249.
Miller, Victor 868.
Milne, Tom 23, 309, 324, 677, 822, 823, 868.
Milo, Sandra 223.
Minasian, Steve 860, 868.
Minerva Film 59, 88, 107, 110.
Mingozzi, Fulvio 1010.
Minnelli, Vincente 16, 203, 454, 522, 611, 685.
Mioni, Fabrizio 161, 162, 192, 204, 205.
bio 200.
Mirabile, Alfredo 542.
Miracle, Irene 1010, 1011, 1012, 1014, 1015, 1017, 1019.
Miraglia, Emilio P. 878.
Miramax Entertainment 1038.
Miranda, Isa 828, 835, 837, 848, 851, 907.
bio 835.
Mirandi, Evi 622, 630.
Mitchell, Cameron 18, 125, 331, 346, 350, 351, 352, 353, 366, 417, 418, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 426, 428, 429, 437, 542, 547, 548, 549, 551, 555, 557, 560, 562, 566, 567, 571, 585, 593, 594, 595, 597, 642, 644, 645, 646, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 659, 692, 709, 785.
bio 350–351, 654.
Mitchell, Elisa 642, 644.
Mitchell, Gordon 374, 377, 436.
Mitri, Tiberio 722, 764.
Moccia, Giuseppe 690, 692.
Mocky, Jean-Pierre 136, 137.
Moctezuma, Juan Lopez 554.
Modica, Gianni 942.
Modugno, Lucia 448, 458, 722.
Moffa, Paolo 79, 376.
Mogherini, Flavio 97, 108, 129, 138, 143, 192, 198, 203, 204, 226, 227, 233, 301, 354, 361, 362, 367, 515, 722, 734, 738.
bio 97.
Molino Rojo, Antonio 439.
Moll, Georgia (pseud.) 354, 357, 359. See also Moll, Giorgia.
Moll, Giorgia 155, 244, 248. See also Moll, Georgia (pseud.).
bio 246.
Momplet, Antonio 414, 415.
Monachia Film 542.
Moncada, Santiago 778, 779, 780, 787, 790.
Mondello, Luigi 351, 352.
Monego, Tito 18.
Monell, Robert 758, 833, 861.
Monelli, Silvia 938.
Monicelli, Mario 65, 89, 100, 103, 108, 110, 127, 151, 200, 221, 294, 586, 724, 734, 817, 995.
bio 103.
Monico, Rita 748.
Monlini, Giorgio 896, 899.
Monster Bis 586.
Montari, Elvira 449.
Montefiori, Luigi 941, 942, 943, 946, 948, 950, 951, 952, 956. See also Eastman, George (pseud.).
bio 946.
Monteforte, Corràdo 764.
Montenero, Paola 848, 858.
bio 854.
Monthly Film Bulletin 23, 220, 258, 309, 317, 409, 428, 470, 510, 537, 561, 626, 677, 753, 792, 822, 868, 936.
Monti, Milly 482, 493, 496.
bio 495.
Montillo, Natale 130.
Montini, Cardinal 591.
Montresor, Beni 172, 174, 176, 182, 187, 214, 219, 223.
bio 176.
Moore, Mike 644.
Morales, Mario 594, 600.
Moravia, Alberto 149, 155, 341, 454, 523, 778.
Morelli, Rina 75.
Morgan, Michele 106.
Morgia, Piero 828.
Morigi, Franco 448.
Morini, A. 653, 657.
Moroni, Mario 796, 799.
Morotti, Ada 764.
Morricone, Ennio 635, 641, 722, 746, 748, 749, 754, 755, 774, 825, 838, 859, 962, 971.
bio 745–746.
Morris, Kirk 377, 432, 435, 436.
bio 434.
Morris, Oswald 158.
Morrison, Brett 207, 208, 249, 265, 309, 426.
Morrone, Dina 962.
Morse, Terry O. 207.
Morucci, Filippo 94, 95.
Moss, Lou 542, 560, 561.
Moutier, Norbert 587.
Moz 762.
MPAA (Motion Picture Association of America) 860, 861, 888.
Mulé, Francesco 690, 722, 734.
bio 697.
Muller, Federico 690.
Muller, Frederick 701.
Muller, Jacques 764.
Müller, Paul 172, 178, 180, 181, 182, 242, 893, 962, 968.
bio 177.
Munro, Caroline 1023.
Murgia, Tiberio 448.
Murnau, F. W. 95, 318, 401, 494, 988.
Murphy, Jim 518.
Musa, Gilda 977.
Mussolini, Benito 51, 52, 53, 55, 59, 61, 71, 73, 74, 75, 78, 81, 82, 83, 99, 106, 724, 901, 995.
Mussolini, Bruno 52, 53.
Mussolini, Vittorio 52, 53, 59, 66, 79.
Musy, Mario 778.

N

Nabokov, Vladimir 1038.
Nano 31.
Narzisi, Gianni 418.
Naschy, Paul 26, 869, 872.
Nasser, Gamal-Abdel 698.
Natale, Germano 1010, 1013.
Natale, Paola 712.
Natale, Roberto 664, 667, 676, 683, 896, 899, 1004.
Natanson, Joseph 237, 355, 356, 374.
Nathan, Peggy 448.

Nathanson, Joseph
bio 237.
Natili, Giovanna 400.
National Film Theatre 26.
Nazarov, Amo Bek 324.
Nazional Music 418.
Nebiolo, Carlo 60.
Neill, Roy William 667.
Nelli, Piero 1002.
Nepo, Constantin 764.
Neri, Monica 390, 393, 394.
Neri, Rosalba 336, 341, 345, 393, 394.
bio 341.
Nero, Franco 669, 828, 900.
Nevola, Edoardo 414.
New Line Entertainment 1039.
New Realm Distribution 862, 868.
New World Pictures 26, 1025.
Ney, Richard 99.
Nicholas, Robert (pseud.). See Nicolosi, Roberto.
Nicholson, James H. 207, 243, 308, 309, 387, 414, 424, 426, 443, 467, 481, 504, 505, 506, 508, 511, 558, 605, 606, 610, 612, 625, 626, 690, 691, 692, 701, 712, 884.
Nicholson, Loretta 414.
Nicolai, Bruno 746, 748, 764, 774, 962.
Nicolodi, Daria 613, 912, 975, 976, 977, 978, 981, 982, 983, 984, 985, 986, 987, 988, 989, 990, 996, 997, 1002, 1003, 1004, 1006, 1010, 1011, 1015, 1027, 1028.
bio 982, 1007.
Nicolosi, Roberto 254, 258, 268, 282, 313, 314, 315, 327, 336, 342, 343, 399, 418, 427, 448, 464, 482, 486, 492, 503, 509, 528, 1038.
bio 248.
Nicotra, Franco 136.
Nike Cinematografica 570.
Ninchi, Ave 109, 110, 112, 113, 116.
Ninchi, Carlo 70, 107, 121.
Nistri, Giuliano 320.
Nocturno 973.
Nohra, Audrey 722.
Noonan, Tommy 597.
Novakovic, Duje 764.
Novarese, Nino Vittorio 453.
Nucci, Laura 764.
Nuccorini, Pietro 192, 226.
Nuova Linea Cinematografica 848.
Nusciak, Loredana 438, 440.
Nuvolari, Tazio 55.
Nuvoletti, Giovanni 848, 854, 856.
Nykvist, Sven 543.

O

O'Bannon, Dan 631.
Oberon, Isli (pseud.) 518, 521, 522, 535.
See also Galli, Ida.
O'Connor, Donald 353, 360, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 370, 400.
bio 363.
O'Dea, Denis 336, 345.
bio 339.
Olca, Antonio Perez 600.
Old, John M. (pseud.). See Bava, Mario: pseudonyms.
Oliver, Robert H. 802.
Olivieri, Alfonsa 872.
Olivieri, Enrico 282, 303, 306, 307.
bio 295.
Oliviero, Nino 634.
Oltre il Cielo (magazine) 603.
Omegna, Roberto 54, 69, 715, 853.
bio 53.
Omnia Deutsche Film Export 390.
Onorato, Glauco 482, 501.
bio 500.
Ophuls, Max 851.
Oppo, Ottavio 336.
Orano, Alessio 312, 894, 895, 896, 903, 914, 917, 997.
L'Orchestra Cinefonica Italiana 362.
Ormsby, Alan 682.
Oro Film 96, 107.
Orr, Corinne 309.
Orso Film 145.
ORTF (Office de Radiodiffusion Télévision Française) 764.
Ortiz, Angel 634.
Ortolani, Riz 464, 577.
OSCAR Film (Organizzazione Sociale Cinematografica Artistica Rome) 192.
Oscar, John 518.
Ostenda, Ombretta 336.
Ottoni, Filippo 779, 848, 849, 854, 864.

P

Pabst, G. W. 65, 134, 135, 136, 138, 140, 141.
PAC (Produzioni Atlas Consorziate) 810, 828.
Pacini, Rafaello 268.
Pagano, Bartolomeo 42, 51, 52, 60, 378, 397.
Paget, Debra 341, 387.
Painter, Chuck 722, 735.
Pajer, Ivica 764.
Pal, George 1028.
Palaggi, Roberto 1025.
Palance, Jack 140, 829.
Palermini, Piero 135.
Pallenberg, Rospo 754, 755.
Palli, Enzo Gicca 582.
Pallottini, Riccardo 378, 380.
Palmara, Mimmo 163, 192, 226, 228, 242, 383, 764, 997.
bio 163.
Palmer, Renzo 722.
Palombi, Franco 390.
Paluzzi, Luciana 801.
bio 200.
Pamphili, Mirella 664, 665, 670.
Pan Latina Films 778.
Panda Cinematografica 374, 378, 434.
Paniagua, Cecilio 896, 908, 909, 917, 930.
Paoloni, Paolo 1010.
Paoluzzi, Luciana 192.
Papa, Fernanda 1002.
Papas, Irene 140, 764, 765, 775, 962, 967, 968, 970.
bio 770.
Papiri, Robert 712.
Paramount Pictures Corporation 722, 764.
Parapetti, Mario 139.
Parco dei Mostri 570, 577.
Parenzo, Alessandro 942, 943, 976, 977, 982.
Parisi, Vince 933.
Park, Reg 309, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 395, 396, 398, 399, 400, 401, 403, 404, 405, 407, 410, 775.
bio 382.
Parker, John 919.
Parker, Katty 712.
Parolini, Gianfranco 819, 829.
Parrish, Mitchell 226, 236.
Parry, Michel 537.
Parsons, Louella O. 309.
Pasolini, Pier Paolo 687, 709, 734, 745, 764, 778, 783.
Pasquale, Fortunato 778.
Pasqualini, N. 102.
Pasqualini, Viviana 155.
Passante, Mario 282, 305.
Pastrone, Giovanni 42, 45.
Patané, Saro 644, 645.
Pathé Cinema. See Pathé Frères.
Pathé Frères 38.
Patrizi, Massimo 542.
Paul, Andreina 582.
Pavan, Elisabetta 390.
Pavese, Luigi 110, 112, 113, 115.
Pavese, Nino 198.
Payne, A. 223.
Pearl, Gay 254, 357, 359.
Peary, Danny 323.
Peck, Gregory 134.
Pedinotti, Aldo 390.
Pedrini, Olga 828.
Peliculas Ibarra y Cia S.A. 778.
Pellati, Teresa 145.
Peña, Julio 594.
Peña, Manuel 594.
Pennisi, Carlo 991.
Peppercorn-Wormser 935.
Perego, Didi. See Sullivan, Didi (pseud.).
Perego, Eugenio 51.
Perkins, Anthony 906.
Pernice, Gino 594.
Perozzi, Tito 192.
Péririer, François 131.
Pesce, Franco 828.
Pesche, Sergio 70.
Pestriniero, Renato 600, 603, 605, 606, 607, 620, 625, 630, 631.
bio 603.
Petacci, Claretta 82.
Petacci, Emilio 172.
Petit, Pascal 796, 802, 805.
Petitucci, Simona 942.
Petri, Elio 750, 779, 982, 995.
Petri, Mario 384.
Petri, Sylvana 872.
Petrini, Olga 764.
Petrone, Augusto 102.
Petroni, Giulio 893.
Pevarello, Osiride 828.
Pezzotta, Alberto 864.
Phillipe, Gérard 131.
Philos, Demos 582.
Photon 24, 976.
Piatelli 722.
Piazzesi, Andrea 167, 390, 425, 903, 904, 947, 1006, 1010, 1014, 1017, 1019, 1027, 1029.
Piazzi, Achille 236, 381, 382, 383, 387, 389, 390, 393, 400, 407, 410, 425, 582, 588.
Piazzi Produzione Cinematografica 582.
Pica, Tina 136, 144.
Picasso, Lamberto 89.

Picasso, Pablo 1038.
Piccioni, Piero 594.
Piccolamini, Elisabetta 869.
Piccoli, Michel 722, 731, 732, 741, 754, 802.
bio 731.
Pichelli, Elissa 644, 649, 650, 651, 655.
Pierce, Jack 869.
Pierfederici, Antonio 282, 286, 291.
Pieroni, Ania 1010.
Pierotti, Piero 151, 273, 418, 420, 434, 817.
Pierreux, Jacqueline 480, 482, 492, 493, 494, 498, 510, 529, 566.
bio 495.
Pigozzi, Luciano 95, 420, 518, 523, 524, 525, 526, 533, 535, 542, 543, 549, 552, 554, 575, 576, 577, 709, 712, 715, 716, 717, 719, 730, 778, 782, 791, 872, 873, 877, 878, 882, 886, 889, 893.
bio 523.
Pini, Aldo 192, 226, 336, 338.
Piovanelli, Antonio 962.
Piovani, Pina 109.
Piovano, A. 192, 193.
Piovano, Mario 516.
Pipolo 690.
Pirandello, Luigi 507.
Pirie, David 577.
Pisani, Fernando 155.
Pisani, Mario 192.
Pisani, Nando 664, 669, 671.
Pischiutta, Adriano 371.
Pistilli, Luigi "Gigi" 848, 852, 853, 856, 859, 863, 973.
bio 852.
Pitagora, Paola 938.
Pitani, Daniele 254.
Pitoëff, Sacha 1010, 1014, 1015, 1016.
Placido, Michele 962.
Plaza Film 410.
Podestà, Rosanna 109, 110, 138, 363, 441, 543, 872.
Poe, Edgar Allan 675, 684, 685, 922, 996.
Poe, James 323.
Pogany, Cristiano 121.
Pogány, Gábor 119, 121, 123, 125, 126, 134, 135, 515, 868.
Poggi, Nando 594.
Poitevin, Robby 634.
Polanski, Roman 664, 686, 791, 869.
Poli, Afro 94, 95, 96, 192.
Poli, Maurice 524, 810, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 823, 879, 893, 942, 943, 944, 945, 946, 947, 948, 949, 951, 955.
bio 817.
Pollack, Channing 562.
Pollack, Jackson 1038.
Polletin, Luciano 644, 649, 650, 651.
Polselli, Renato 24, 308, 310, 517.
Pompei 418.
Ponson du Terrail, Victor-Alexis 721.
Pont Royal Film TV 1002.
Ponti, Carlo 97, 98, 100, 138, 399, 400, 724, 734, 927.
Ponti–De Laurentiis Cinematografica 108.
Ponzi, Maurizio 153.
Pope Paolo VI 591.
Popovic, Mavid 244.
Popovic, Nikola 244.
Porel, Marc 1002, 1004.
bio 1003.
Portalupi, Piero 83.
Positif 538, 860.
Powell, Don 712.
Powell, Michael 18, 21.
Prandi, Francesco 755.
Prato, Giancarlo 764.
Presle, Micheline 131.
Pressburger, Emeric 21.
Price, Charles 582.
Price, Vincent 26, 146, 322, 326, 366, 414, 505, 511, 519, 551, 555, 688, 690, 691, 692, 694, 695, 696, 700, 701, 702, 703, 801, 867, 876, 889.
bio 695.
Primavera, Nanda 151.
Procusa Films 242.
Produzione Atlas Cinematografica 812, 827, 832.
Prora Film 86.
Prosperi, Francesco 418.
Prosperi, Franco 362, 363, 366, 390, 424, 448, 452, 538, 582, 590, 591, 614, 689.
Prosperi, Mario 764.
Protor Film 582.
Ptushko, Aleksandr 324.
Puente, Jesús 778, 785, 791.
Pupillo, Massimo 186, 322, 326, 664, 668, 910.
Purcell, Roy 764, 770.
Purcell, Victor 172, 187.
Purdom, Edmond 351.
Puri, Luigi 390.
Putnam, David B. 796, 797.
Putzu, Arnaldo 25, 156, 170, 186.
Pynchon, Thomas 1038.

Q

Quaglio, José 962.
Quattrini, Paola 192.
Quayle, Anthony 962, 965, 967, 969, 970, 971.
Queen, Ellery 933, 942, 947, 954.
Quesada, Milo 448, 469, 482, 483, 491.
bio 487.
Questi, Giulio 828, 1002.
Quinn, Anthony 139, 140, 141, 597.

R

Rabin, Jack 420.
Raffaelli, Giuliano 542, 549, 551, 573.
Raguse, Claud 582.
Raho, Humi 872.
Raho, Umberto 877, 962, 968.
RAI-2 1002.
RAI-Radiotelevisione Italiana 764, 962.
Raimi, Sam 1038.
Rainis, Claudio (pseud.). See Randall, Dick.
Ralli, Giovanna 112, 131, 132.
Rambaldi, Carlo 55, 205, 283, 349, 350, 356, 361, 367, 368, 377, 414, 474, 475, 478, 600, 620, 621, 631, 697, 722, 727, 764, 771, 772, 779, 837, 848, 856, 857, 868, 872, 874, 882, 887, 893, 938, 969, 972, 976, 1028.
bio 263.
Ramirez, Soledad Lopez 778.
Ranalli, Anna 475.
Rancati 418.
Randall, Dick 796, 797, 798, 799, 801, 802, 804, 805, 810, 835, 855.
bio 795.
Randall, Robert (pseud.). See Randall, Dick.
Ranfagni, Silvia 1031.
Ranieri, Giuseppe 390.
Rank Film 112.
Ranucci, Roberto 810.
Rapper, Irving 455, 456.
Rascel, Renato 110, 111, 189, 484, 697.
Raskin, Milton 243.
Rassimov, Ivan 600, 613, 615, 616, 618, 628, 878, 909, 976, 984.
bio 984.
Rassimov, Rada 676, 844, 872, 878, 879, 883, 891, 892, 909, 984, 985.
bio 878.
Rauschenberg, Robert 1038.
Ravaioli, Isarco 722.
Raymond, Alex 230, 231, 233.
RCIP (Releasing Corp. of Independent Producers) 187.
Rea, Luca 449, 450.
Réa, Robert 1002.
Reali, Carlo 591, 779, 848, 856, 858, 863, 872, 934, 942, 948, 949, 954.
Recupito, Mario 976.
Redi, Isabella 133.
Reeve, Michael 577.
Reeves, Michael 317, 322, 326, 502, 577, 654, 669.
bio 577.
Reeves, Steve 16, 122, 190, 192, 196, 197, 198, 199, 201, 202, 203, 205, 206, 207, 209, 213, 223, 224, 225, 226, 228, 229, 230, 231, 233, 234, 235, 236, 241, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 265, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 275, 277, 319, 329, 330, 331, 333, 350, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 359, 373, 377, 378, 382, 384, 385, 387, 389, 392, 400, 414, 434, 443, 452, 487, 501, 551, 572, 588, 593, 697, 817, 823, 945, 1004.
bio 197–198.
Reflex camera system 45.
Regina Film 192.
Regionale 134, 161, 374, 434, 570, 634, 644.
Regnoli, Piero 172, 174, 180, 473, 668, 679.
Reid, Milton 362, 364, 365.
bio 366.
Reina, Sylvano 362, 363.
Reiner, Lia 902.
Reiner, Thomas 485, 542, 547, 548, 549, 551, 557, 560, 562.
bio 551.
Reinl, Harald 326, 543, 582.
Remiddi, Patrizia 130.
Renda, Nino 482, 486.
Rennahan, Ray 148.
Rennie, Michael 712, 714, 719.
Renown Pictures 100.
Ressel, Franco 362, 410, 418, 448, 457, 542, 549.
bio 366.
Rey, Fernando 250, 691.
Rhems, J. V. 172, 187.
Rialto Film 121, 582.
Ricceri, Luciano 764.
Ricci, Luciano 441, 577.

Ricci, Tonino Teodoro 418.
Richardson, John 22, 282, 286, 288, 290, 291, 292, 299, 300, 301, 306, 307, 309, 310, 311, 315, 319, 775.
bio 294.
Riesgo, José 594.
Righi, Massimo 482, 542, 551, 563, 600, 613, 627, 761.
bio 500.
Rigutini, Rosario 1010.
Rimoldi, Adriano 70.
Rinaldi, Antonio 301, 591, 600, 614, 627, 628, 644, 664, 672, 690, 722, 734, 751, 778, 791, 796, 810, 812, 819, 823, 828, 836, 841, 855, 872, 879, 909.
bio 591.
Risi, Dino 117, 128, 130, 134.
Rispoli, Luciano 938.
Riva, Montserrat 778.
Rivière, Georges 594, 597, 872.
Rizzo, Alfredo 115.
Rizzoli Film 117, 127.
Robbe-Grillet, Alain 1038.
Robbins, Harold 797.
Robert, Etienne-Gaspard 21, 988.
Roberti, Roberto (pseud.) 42, 69. See also Leone, Vincenzo.
Roberts, William 438.
Robertson (pseud.). See Robert, Etienne-Gaspard.
Robinson, Joe 418.
Rocca, Daniela 254, 268, 269, 272, 336, 340, 341, 342, 343, 345, 437, 496, 511.
bio 260, 340, 341.
Rocchi, Rosanna 976, 1002.
Rodann, Ziva 348.
Rodensky, Shmuel 962.
Rodin, Pierre-Auguste 42, 55.
Rodrigo, Joaquín 896, 915, 917, 918, 921.
Rogers, Noel 962.
Rojas, Alfonso 594, 634.
Rojo, Ethel 594.
Rollin, Jean 26.
Rolling Thunder Pictures 1038.
Román, Antonio 597, 600, 605, 606, 608, 633, 634, 635, 640, 641.
bio 635.
Roman, Leticia 322, 446, 448, 450, 451, 453, 454, 456, 459, 460, 461, 463, 464, 465, 466, 469, 470.
bio 453–454.
Rome, Sydne 869.
Romero, George A. 823.
Romitelli, Sante 778.
Roncaioli, Angelo 942.
Rondi, Brunello 522.
Ronée, Helena 810, 816, 817, 821.
Rosati, Anna Maria 848, 850, 853, 862, 863.
Rosenbaum, Henry 707.
Rosenbaum, Maurice 265.
Rosetti, Franco 214.
Rosi, Francesco 982.
Rosmino, Gian Paolo 192, 226, 268.
Rosmino, Gigliola 201.
Ross, Anthony 594.
Ross, Carl 796.
Ross, Charles 796, 799.
Ross, Diana 691.
Ross, Howard (pseud.). See Rossini, Renato.
Ross, Red (pseud.). See Rossini, Renato.
Rossellini, Roberto 66–79, 73, 77, 78, 178, 291, 381, 485, 496, 523, 669, 670, 709, 734, 778, 835, 862, 877, 1001.
bio 66.
Rossetti, Bartolomeo 133.
Rossi, Anton Germano 112.
Rossi, Franco 90, 586, 650, 727, 764, 765, 770, 771, 774, 869, 970.
bio 764.
Rossi, Luciano 764.
Rossi, Luisa 99.
Rossi-Stuart, Giacomo 30, 214, 254, 261, 644, 650, 651, 654, 664, 665, 666, 668, 669, 674, 675, 676, 677, 680.
bio 219.
Rossini, Renato 634, 635, 636, 810, 816, 817, 819, 823, 914.
bio 817.
Rosson, Hal 138, 139, 141.
Rota, Nino 102, 104, 105, 719.
Rotunno, Giuseppe 685.
Roux, Alain 214.
Rovatti, Riccardo 942.
Rovere, Gina 192.
Rovere, Luigi 221.
Roxy Film 896.
Roxy Theater 793.
Royal Film 127.
Rozin, Spela 571.
Rubens, Paola (pseud.). See Montenero, Paola.
Rubini, Giulia 131, 521.
Rubío, Antonio 439.
Ruccione, Mario 104.
Rud, Anthony Melville 255.
Rudolph, Alan 18.
Ruffo, Eleonora (Leonora) 393.
Ruffo, Leonora 375, 390, 392, 405, 408.
Ruggeri, Ruggero 79.
Ruggiero, Gene 357, 362, 368.
Rusoff, Lou 309, 316, 414, 613.
Rusoff, Ted 518, 697.
Russel, Tony 514.
Russell, Ray 511, 707.
Russo, N. W. 778.
Russo, Renzo 764.
Rustichelli, Carlo 127, 143, 214, 221, 254, 258, 349, 354, 355, 400, 518, 527, 542, 558, 564, 565, 622, 664, 672, 673, 761, 764, 774, 884, 992, 1038.
bio 221.
Rutherford, Margaret 100.

S

S.A.P. 130.
Saban Enterprises International 755.
Sabatello, Dario 148.
Sabatier, Jean-Marie 24.
Sabatini, Lorenzo 393, 577.
Sabbatini, Enrico 848, 962.
Sabel, Valeria 796, 801, 872.
Sabel, Virgilio 97, 214, 215, 801.
Sacchetti, Dardano 286, 521, 848, 849, 865, 922, 976, 977, 981, 982, 1025, 1029.
Sacchi, Fabrizia 942, 954.
Sacchi, Peppo 1035.
Safa Paladino 962, 969.
Saitto, Raffaele 84, 97.
Sakara, Michele 136.
Salerno, Enrico Maria 330, 384, 387, 884, 985.
Salerno, Nicola 974, 976, 985, 987.
Salgani, Emilio 70.
Salkow, Sidney 877.
Salmon, Godfrey 1010.
Salo, Mario 397.
Salt, Waldo 797.
Salter, Hans J. 313.
Salvia, Rafael J. 600, 606.
San Remo Film 40, 41.
San Roman, Manuel 600, 614.
Sancho, Fernando 594, 597, 635.
Sanders, Nadia (pseud.) 550. See also Ducassé, Nadine.
Sanders, Nadine (pseud.). See Ducassé, Nadine.
Sandri, Gia 410.
Sanipoli, Vittorio 122.
Sanjust, Filippo 248, 254, 256, 258, 330, 354.
Santi, Angelo 724.
Santi, Lionello "Nello" 16, 192, 193, 198, 207, 210, 236, 258, 268, 272, 277, 282, 286, 296, 336, 337, 340, 342, 381, 418, 434, 437, 449, 511, 709, 945.
bio 515.
Santoli, Euclide 192, 336, 448.
Santoni, Espartaco 896, 900, 912.
bio 909.
Sanz, Paco 634.
Sarafian, Richard C. 142.
Sasso, Ugo 226, 571.
Sassoli, Dina 70.
Sauvat, Louis 582.
Savalas, Telly 894, 896, 897, 898, 900, 901, 902, 904, 905, 906, 907, 909, 910, 911, 912, 914, 917, 920, 921, 922, 934, 936, 938.
bio 905–906.
Savina, Carlo 192, 226, 336, 362, 712, 716, 719, 896, 915–918, 917.
bio 915.
Savini, Sergio 644.
Savona, Leopoldo 243, 644, 645, 651.
bio 644.
Saxon, John 446, 448, 451, 454, 455, 456, 462, 464, 465, 468, 470, 686.
bio 454.
Scaccia, Mario 442.
Scala, Delia 103.
Scalera Film 59, 73, 77, 79, 89, 172, 254, 282, 330, 378.
Scalera, Michele 59, 66.
Scardamaglia, Elio 517, 518, 521, 668, 817.
Scarpelli, Marco 223, 438.
Scarpelli, Umberto 79, 400.
Scavia, Rosalba 600, 607, 615, 653, 664, 670, 690, 697, 712, 722, 796, 804.
Scavuzzo, Giuseppe 872.
Scerbanenco, Giorgio 932, 1030.
Schermi Riuniti 410.
Schiaffino, Rosanna 161.
Schimmel, Herbert D. 668.
Schimmel, Stuart B. 668.
Schipa, Tito 89.
Schivazappa, Piero 764, 771, 779, 805, 858.
Schmidt, Kendall 600, 624.
Schneider, Samuel 258.
Schubert, Emilio 448.
Schüfftan, Eugen 44, 140, 204.
Schüfftan process 45.

Schwarzenegger, Arnold 410.
Sciarretta, Ulderico 634.
Sciolette, Giorgio 722.
Sciotti, Enzo 867.
Scorsese, Martin 12, 21, 203, 333, 566, 664, 679, 687, 952, 955, 1024, 1038.
Scotese, Giuseppe Maria 786.
Scott, Gordon 372, 375, 377, 378, 381, 414, 434, 436, 582.
bio 376–377.
Scott, Ridley 600, 616, 617, 621, 631, 1023, 1031.
Scotti, Ottavio 518.
bio 526.
Scotti, Tino 108, 112.
Sellers, Peter 877.
Seltzer, Dov 962.
Senitskaya, Katia 324.
Sensani, Gino 77.
Serafin, Enzo 352.
Serandrei, Mario 74, 77, 106, 160, 192, 198, 213, 226, 254, 258, 268, 277, 282, 287, 307, 336, 342, 390, 404, 418, 448, 464, 482, 484, 508, 526, 542, 564, 576, 582, 590, 591, 615, 627, 863.
Seratrice, Vincenzo 90.
Serena Film 145, 570.
Sergio, Iole. See Bava, Iole Sergio (wife).
Serra, Liliana 828.
Serrolonga, Giorgio 764.
Severini, Leonardo 378, 379.
Sevigny, Chloe 793.
Seville Studios 414, 434.
Sforza, Fabrizio 903.
Shankar, Ravi 1038.
Shannon, Frank 689.
Shelley, Barbara 155.
Shelley, Norman 100.
Sheridan, Nicolette 906.
Sherwood, Robert 309.
Shiloach, Joseph 962.
Shusett, Ronald 631.
Shyamalan, M. Night 1037.
Siciliano, Mario 570.
Sider Film 644, 645, 651.
Sidis 600.
Siegel, Don 629.
Sienkiewicz, Henryk 41.
Sigma Cinevog 131.
Sijöström, Rijk 172, 180.
Silenti, Vira 435.
Silkovsky, Ronald 707.
Silva, Carmen 926, 929, 931, 932.
Silvani, Aldo 89.
Silver, Alain 24, 976.
Silvestri, Mario 617, 621.
Silvestri, Umberto 75.
Simeoni, Sandro 464, 713.
Simi, Carlo 594.
Siminberghi, Gino 86.
Simon, Michel 106.
Simonelli, Gianni 712.
Simonelli, Giorgio 828.
Simoni, Piera 129.
Simoni, Renato 79.
Sinclair, Ronald 505, 690, 693, 701.
bio 506.
Sinimberghi, Gino 94, 152.
Sinisgalli, Leonardo 97.
Sirk, Douglas 140.
Skal, David J. 507.
Skay, Brigitte 796, 802, 848, 852, 854, 855, 856, 857.
bio 853.
Skofic, Milko 105.
Skotak, Robert 618, 625.
Sloopys, The 690.
Smith, Dick 442.
Smith, Paul L. 962.
Smith, Richard Harland 684.
Smith, Sally 712, 716, 719.
Snyder, F. G. (or Howard) 483.
Soavi, Michele 294, 946, 987, 990, 1029, 1032, 1041.
Società Ambrosiana Cinematografica 374.
Societé Cinématographique Lyre 242, 348, 418, 434, 482.
Soderbergh, Steven 457.
Solares, Gilberto Martinez 411.
Solaro, Gianni 410, 418.
Soldati, Mario 100, 102, 177, 183, 223, 295, 339, 450, 709, 778, 907.
Soligo 334.
Sommer, Elke 200, 248, 668, 719, 781, 872, 873, 874, 876, 877, 885, 888, 893, 895, 896, 897, 898, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 909, 910, 911, 912, 914, 915, 918, 920, 921, 924, 925, 926, 927, 930, 931, 932, 934, 948.
bio 876.
Sonego, Rodolfo 156, 158.
Sordi, Alberto 143, 155, 157, 158, 160.
Sorel, Jean 723, 724, 725, 750.
Sorgini, Giulio 842, 843.
Soria, Giovanna 89, 151.
Sorrentino, Alberto 442.
Southwood, Charles 826, 828, 829, 830, 834, 835, 837.
bio 832.
Souvant, Jacques 764.
Souvestre, Pierre 184, 721.
SPA Cinematografica 374, 390.
Spada, Silvano 764.
Spagnoli, Alberto 478, 976, 995.
Spagnulo, Gianna 971.
Spain, Fay 383, 387.
bio 384.
Spectacular Films Co. 855.
Spera Cinematografica 950.
Spera, Miriam 942.
Spiegel, Sam 149.
Spoto, Donald 1006.
Stacey, John 448.
Stahl, John M. 542.
Stallone, Sylvester 209.
Stamp, Terence 685, 778.
Stanislawski, Jacques 575.
Stapleton, Vivian 712, 719.
Star-Ciné Winchester 841.
Starevich, Ladislas 67, 324.
Steckel, Leonard 764.
Steel, Alan (pseud.). See Ciani, Sergio.
Steele, Barbara 7, 16, 22, 23, 26, 177, 180, 227, 259, 280, 282, 284, 287, 289, 290, 292, 293, 294, 295, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 303, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 326, 340, 341, 348, 392, 407, 421, 441, 454, 487, 501, 503, 519, 522, 525, 615, 622, 676, 696, 697, 745, 804, 824, 877, 910, 912, 954, 993, 995, 1029.
bio 292.
Stefanelli, Marco 758, 761.
Stefanelli, Simonetta 962.
Stefano, G. D. 580.
Stefano, Joseph 544.
Steffen, Anthony (pseud.) 211, 756, 758, 759, 761.
Steffen, Paul 359.
Stegani, Giorgio 324.
Stegers, Bernice 1024.
Steinbrunner, Chris 1019.
Steiner, John 976, 978, 982, 983, 985, 987, 988, 989, 991, 996, 997, 1036.
bio 984.
Steiner, Marco 962.
Stella, Luciano. See Kendall, Tony (pseud.).
Stendhal (Marie Henri Beyle) 460, 919.
Steno (pseud.) 65, 79, 89, 100, 108, 110, 145, 147, 148, 149, 155, 157, 160, 189, 215, 223, 259, 392, 393, 399, 438, 478, 484, 485, 539, 613, 697, 724, 755, 764, 818. See also Vanzina, Stefano.
bio 103.
Sterbini, Roberto 779, 976.
Stevenson, Robert Louis 954, 984, 1002.
Stewart, Evelyn (pseud.). See Galli, Ida.
Stoker, Bram 173, 283, 315, 498, 501, 680, 871.
Stone, Oliver 18.
Storaro, Vittorio 136, 438.
Stravinski, Igor 926.
Strino, Maria 67.
Stroh, Heidi 547, 557.
Strucchi, Stefano 362, 363.
Struss, Karl 95, 139, 141, 157, 178.
Stuart, G. R. 254.
Sturgen, Bulle 877.
Sturges, John 438.
Sturges, Preston 466.
Sturkie, Dan 309, 396, 518, 537, 764, 775.
bio 309.
Styner, Jerry 690, 706.
Sullivan, Barry 585, 599, 600, 601, 602, 605, 610, 611, 612, 613, 615, 616, 618, 619, 620, 622, 625, 628.
bio 610.
Sullivan, Didi (pseud.) 254, 256, 257, 259, 261.
Sullivan, John 523.
Summers, Montague 403.
Super International Pictures 712.
The Supremes (band) 691.
Sutherland, Donald 575, 577.
Sutro, John 100.
Svob, Hrvoje 764.
Swanson, Gloria 155, 156, 157, 158, 160, 167.
Swenson, Bo 993.
Sylva, Carlos 29, 938.
Sylvani, Iole 112.
Sylvester, Robert 315.

T

Tagliaconi, Giulio 268.
Tagliavini, Ferruccio 85.
Tahi, Moa(na) 688, 690, 697.
Tajo, Italo 86.
Talshir, Amos 962.

Tamberlani, Nando 383, 573.
Tamburella, Paolo William 110.
Tancredi, Italo 336.
Tani, Yoko 378, 381.
Tarantino, Quentin 511, 952, 954, 957, 1038, 1039, 1041.
Tarkovsky, Andrei 1007.
Tattoli, Elda 226.
Tavazzi, Alberto 644.
Tavazzi, Massimo 192.
Taylor, Don 872.
Taylor, Robert 723, 727.
Tcherina, Ludmilla 121, 123, 125.
Tecisa 896.
Ted Bates Agency 842.
Tedesco, Anita 268.
Telefilm 242.
telefono bianca 52.
Telloli 102.
Tenser, Tony 791.
Terra, Renato 282, 634, 644.
Terror Fantastic 860.
Terry-Thomas 722, 732, 737, 754, 755.
bio 732.
Terzano, Massimo 59, 60, 66, 67, 69, 70, 73, 75, 79, 85, 91, 94, 157, 397, 787.
born 60.
Terzano, Ubaldo 91, 134, 162, 192, 198, 205, 214, 226, 234, 243, 268, 282, 296, 298, 301, 303, 336, 390, 397, 418, 448, 463, 482, 486, 511, 518, 542, 561, 582, 588, 590, 591, 614, 627.
Terzieff, Laurent 962, 964, 967, 970.
Tessari, Duccio 205, 250, 251, 269, 362, 363, 374, 378, 384, 390, 400, 403, 634.
Testa, Eugenio 75.
Teti, Federico 192.
Tevis, Peter 745.
Third, Bud 582.
Thomas, Organo 764, 771.
Thomas, Vincent 582.
Throne, Malachi 735.
Thulin, Ingrid 962, 967.
Thunderbird Films 538.
Tiberius Film 348.
Tichy, Gérard 438, 778, 782.
Tieri, Aroldo 89, 90.
Tiezzi, Augusto 89.
Tigano Lo Faro 418, 644, 722.
Tigielle 33 828.
Tilli, Maria Luisa 976.
Tinti, Gabriele 336, 441, 442, 896, 899, 902, 910, 912, 913.
bio 340, 909.
Tiromancino 1039.
Titanus 100, 155, 172, 268, 348, 518, 594, 976.
Titanus Appia Studios 172, 226, 282, 336, 664.
Titanus Farnesina Studios 448.
Titanus Studios 192, 254, 330, 348, 362, 434, 482, 487, 644.
Titanus–L'Athena Cinematografica 172.
Titra Sound Corporation 207, 208, 209, 219, 243, 250, 265, 309, 426, 448, 487, 497, 600, 625.
Tocchi, Maurizio 764.
Tocci, Franco 870, 872, 874, 882, 887, 892, 893, 942.
Tofani, Carlo 796.
Tognazzi, Ugo 223.
Toliolo, Eduardo 438.
Tolnay, Akos 245.
Tolo, Marilù 728, 730, 827, 828, 830, 835.
bio 833.
Tolstoi, Alexei Constantinovich 482, 501.
"Tolstoy, Ivan" 482.
Tolstoy, Leo 244, 247, 291.
Tomaino, Titti 448.
Tomassi, Paolo 192.
Tomei, Giulio 764.
Tomolillo, Francesco 136.
Tonti, Aldo 139, 577.
Tontini, Renato 172, 173, 182.
Top Film 542, 547, 557.
Tor Caldara 157, 164, 394, 417, 520, 524, 529, 635, 650, 651, 810, 837, 896.
Tordi, Pietro 348, 350, 594.
Torrisi, Pietro 724, 828.
Tosi, Virgilio 54.
Totò (pseud.) 103, 108, 109, 110, 112, 160, 162, 193, 201, 215, 216, 223, 248, 484, 697, 706.
bio 108.
Tourneur, Jacques 11, 16, 267, 268, 273, 274, 319, 468, 562, 588, 610, 681, 889, 918, 1037.
bio 268.
Tourneur, Maurice 177, 267.
Tovoli, Luciano 461.
Tozzi, Fausto 352, 362, 644, 650, 655, 657, 764.
Trani, Eligio 362.
Trani, Emilio 542, 553.
Transocean-Film 242.
Trasatti, Luciano 242, 441.
Travers, Leo 582.
Trentino, Vittorio 542.
Tresserra, José M. 778.
Tressler, Dieter 872, 877.
Trevelyan, John 537.
Trieste, Leopoldo 54, 210, 211, 571, 651, 764, 848, 851, 856, 859.
bio 852.
Trionfalcine 136.
Trout, Kilgore (pseud.) 998–999, 1029.
Trovajoli, Armando 248, 390, 400, 406, 408, 411, 622, 672, 673.
bio 399.
Tubbs, William C. 108, 110.
Tucci, Vanda 942.
Tuckahoe, Paul 362, 363.
Tulli, Marco 362.
Turco, Enzo 131.
Turgenev, Ivan 291, 922.
Turner, Elizabeth 976.
Tuzii, Carlo 1002, 1026.
Twist, John 336.

U

UFA (Universum Film Aktien Gensellschasft) 94.
Ullman, Elwood 691.
Ulmer, Edgar G. 140, 237, 340, 384, 394, 955.
Ultra Film—Sicilia Cinematografica 594.
Umetelli, Enrico 134.
Umiliani, Piero 582, 587, 810, 813, 814, 821, 822, 825, 828, 838, 841, 858.
bio 586.
Ungaro, Francesca 542, 545, 546, 552.
Unger, Freddy 123, 545, 552, 563, 573, 574, 727, 733, 742.
bio 549.
Unger, Goffredo. See Unger, Freddy.
Unidis 282, 374, 418, 542.
University Associates 778.
Upchurch, Alan 29.
Urbini, Pier Luigi 214, 268, 282, 313, 418.
Urbisaglia, Serse 436.
Ursini, James 24, 976.
Ustinov, Peter 106.

V

Vadim, Roger 159, 457, 727, 728, 731, 962.
Vadis, Dan 571, 572.
Vailati, Bruno 226, 268, 270, 274, 276, 277, 354.
bio 226, 353.
Valcarenghi 17, 252, 255.
Valcauda, Armando 305, 707, 790, 848, 996, 998, 999, 1010, 1023.
Valenti, Marisa 226, 985.
Valenti, Osvaldo 76.
Valenti, Ugo 985.
Valeri, Franca 131.
Valeri, Marcella 764.
Valeri, Valerio 662, 664, 670, 671, 672, 675, 678, 680, 687, 719.
Valli, Alida 103, 132, 211, 381, 896, 900, 906, 907, 911, 921, 1010, 1019.
bio 907.
Valli, June 226, 236.
Vallone, Raf 117, 127.
Valturri, Pat 712.
van Gogh, Vincent 511.
Van Sloan, Edward 507.
Vance, Mila 582.
Vanin, Flavia 764.
Vanin, Nello 764.
Vanorio, Francesco 848, 849, 976.
Vanzina, Stefano 79, 100, 103, 158. See also Steno (pseud.).
Varga, Daniele 226, 268.
Vargas, Daniel 254.
Vargas, Daniele 354.
Vari, Giuseppe 223, 260, 343, 384, 437, 513, 613, 835.
Variety 23, 52, 367, 370, 536, 553, 560, 561, 612, 659, 682, 686, 717, 723, 763, 765, 807, 860, 861, 888, 906, 922, 943, 951, 954, 972, 973, 1028.
Variety Film 414, 434.
Varley, Natalya 324.
Varni, Paul 962.
Varriale, Gabrielle 89.
Varriano, Emilio 778, 810, 819, 828, 848, 872, 879, 909, 930, 942, 953.
Vasile, Turi 976, 977.
VCI Home Entertainment 33, 539, 1038.
Velchi, Franco 722.
Verdi, Giuseppe 1010.
Verley, Renaud 764, 766, 770.
Vernon, Anne 151.
Verton, Huguette 796.
Véry, Paul 362.
Véry, Pierre 363.
Vessel, Edy 355, 356, 357.
Viale Libio 649.

Viancini, F. G. 51.
Vianello, Maria Teresa 441.
Viarisio, Enrico 135.
Vicario, Marco 362, 441.
Vich, Vaclav 77, 348.
Vidal, Henri 106, 140.
Vides Cinematografica 155.
Vides S.p.a. 976.
Vides Studios 410, 985.
Villa, Claudio 221.
Villa Frascati 856, 896, 930.
Villa Lancelotti 664, 668.
Villa Mamzolin 177.
Villa Sciarra 542.
Villaggio, Paolo 999.
Villefranca, Carlos 594.
Villeni, Fernando 578, 600, 605, 618.
Vincent, Yves 122.
Visconti, Luchino 60, 74, 228, 248, 294, 526, 591, 664, 681, 697, 764, 877, 907, 921, 967, 1003.
Visone, Antonio 712.
Vitalazzi, Rocco 375.
Vivaldi, Gianna 664, 669, 670.
Vlad, Roman 172, 189, 258, 672, 673.
  bio 183.
Vlady, Marina 147, 149.
Vodopivec, Frano 243.
Vohrer, Alfred 543, 561.
Volonté, Claudio 848, 853, 862, 863.
  bio 853.
Volonté, Gian Maria 384, 853.
Volta, Ornella 143, 305, 367, 448, 565, 609, 737, 855, 860, 900.
von Fürstenberg, Ira 810, 816, 818, 819, 820.
  bio 816.
von Oertzen, Jaspar 764.
von Scheffer, Thassilo 893.
von Treuberg, Franz 896.
Vonnegut Jr., Kurt 998, 999.
Vox Film 518.

W

Wachsberger, Nat 998.
Wagner, Lisa 644.
Wagner, Richard 315.
Walker, Ricardo 778.
Wallace, Edgar 449, 450, 543, 549, 557, 561, 583, 730, 780, 810.
Walsh, Dermot 413.
Walsh, Raoul 16, 65, 329, 336, 337, 339, 340, 342, 345, 348, 353, 354.
  bio 335–336.
Wang, George 690, 697, 700.
Ward, Luca 755.
Warjansky, Yassi 962.
Warner Bros. 448, 474, 482.
Warren, Bill 265.
Waugh, Hillary 922, 979, 981.
Weaver, Tom 215, 505, 612, 618, 802.
Webb, Jerry 336.
Weird Tales 255.
Welles, Mel 177, 309, 341, 351, 500, 518, 537, 560, 562, 614, 764, 775, 778, 786, 876, 878, 909.
  bio 436–437.
Welles, Orson 73, 95, 221, 263, 558, 654, 684, 701, 876, 909, 935, 984, 1040.
Wells, H. G. 1002.
Wendall, Tony 582, 587.
White, Harriet. See Medin, Harriet White.
white telephone movies. See telefono bianca.
Wien Film 872, 873.
Wilde, Oscar 779.
Williams, Walter 448, 457, 734. See also Buchanan, Robert (pseud.).
  bio 341.
Williamson, Al 225, 231.
Wilson, Ray 198, 225, 226.
Wise, Herbert (pseud.). See Ricci, Luciano.
Witherspoon, Reese 793.
Witney, William 414.
Wizett, S. 576.
Wohl, Barbara 172, 188.
Wolf, Leonard 403.
Wolff, Frank 522.
Wolkowicz, Emilia 438.
Wood Jr., Edward D. 197.
Wood, Ken (pseud.). See Cianfriglia, Giovanni.
Wood, Rex 254.
Wood, Robin 792.
Wood, Wallace 255.
Woolner, Bernard 324, 387, 407, 558, 719.
Woolner, Betty 711, 716, 719.
Woolner, Lawrence 324, 387, 407, 558, 711, 712, 716, 719, 810, 910.
Wordl, Al (pseud.) 569. See also Mancori, Alvaro.
Wordsworth, Richard 259.
World, Al (pseud.). See Mancori, Alvaro.
Wormser, Richard 359.
Wyler, John. See Ciani, Sergio.
Wyler, Richard 689, 758, 761.
Wynorski, Jim 326.

Y

Yaru, Marina 686.
Yates, George Worthing 387.
Yates, Richard G. 538.
York, Susannah 323.
Young, Brendan 670.
Youry, Jean-Claude 1002.

Z

Zaccariello, Giuseppe 778, 779, 812, 816, 848, 849, 852, 854, 855, 856, 858.
  bio 779.
Zachar, Josef (pseud.). See Zaccariello, Giuseppe.
Zamperla, Nazzareno 439.
Zanfroni, Simone 594.
Zannino, F. 127, 128.
Zanolli, Angelo 226, 435.
Zapponi, Bernardino 26, 681, 684, 685, 962.
Zarfati, Giancarlo 112.
Zecca, Ferdinand 39.
Zefferelli, Franco 962.
Zeglio, Primo 331, 332.
Zeppieri, Massimo 214.
Zeus Film 86.
Zimber, Dick 887.
Zingarelli, Italo 413, 414, 415, 438, 473, 1025, 1027.
Zuccherofino, Maura 942.
Zuccoli, Frank 712.
Zulini, Patrizia 778, 848.
Zurli, Luigi 351.

PHOTO CREDITS

All of the photo and poster illustrations within this book appear through the courtesy of the Alan Upchurch and Tim Lucas Collections, with the exception of: Archivio Storico del Cinema (61, 72, 78, 79, 88a, 129, 130, 132, 133a-b, 134, 136, 137, 144), Lucas Balbo/Artschiv (1006-1007), Mike Baronas (1031), Elena Bava (38-40b, 46, 47, 50, 53, 54, 708), Georgia Bava (57-59, 64, 82-84, 164-66, 896, 1037), Lamberto Bava (34-36, 40a, 55, 56, 62, 66, 68-71, 73, 76b, 80, 87, 91, 92, 167, 168, 278, 282, 283, 452, 556b, 565, 614, 848, 876, 879, 884, 885, 943, 989, 1003, 1004b, 1026, 1036, 1038-1040, 1045-1059, 1088), Peter Blumenstock Collection (944-952, 955-957), Cappa Productions (12), Daniela Catelli (558), Stephen R. Bissette Collection (723-725, 860), David Del Valle/The Del Valle Archive (504, 1062), Christopher Sven Dietrich Collection (197, 201, 202, 205), Kip Doto Collection (475), Karen Emmerich (1034), Stephen Forsyth (790), Ernesto Gastaldi (518a), Marcello Gatti (968b), Brett Halsey Collection (800, 831), Alan Jones (1032), John Phillip Law Collection (726, 728, 729, 735, 738, 741, 743), Kismet Entertainment Group (953), Alfredo Leone Collection (872-874a, 880-881, 904, 905, 908-911, 913, 920, 1041), La Lyre Cinematografica (280, 286b, 287, 289-291, 306, 312, 313), Harriet Medin Collection (496, 522b), Ib J. Melchior Collection (612), Fábio Vellozo Jardim Monteiro Collection (760), Marc Morris Collection (972), Renato Pestriniero Collection (603), Luciano Pigozzi Collection (882), Carlo Rambaldi (856), Armando Valcauda (996-997), Miles Wood Collection (756-759). All of these illustrations have been reproduced with the permission of these owners, archivists, and collectors. Grazie a tutti!

About the Author

TIM LUCAS is a novelist, critic, and film historian whose work reflects a lifelong preoccupation with fantasy and horror. His articles, interviews, reviews, and essays have appeared in Sight & Sound, Film Comment, Cahiers du Cinema, Fangoria, Cinefantastique, American Cinematographer, Heavy Metal, Cinefex, Spin, and many other publications.

In 1985, he introduced "Video Watchdog" as a monthly column; in 1990, he and his wife Donna launched Video Watchdog as a magazine in its own right. This award-winning monthly review of fantastic cinema defined the way home video releases are reviewed and stands out as one of the most original and influential publications of its kind.

Also in 1985, he edited Signet Books' Your Movie Guide to Tapes and Discs paperback series, writing the introductions for all twelve books and personally authoring the Movie Classics, Horror, Science Fiction & Fantasy, and Mystery & Suspense volumes. These were followed by The Video Watchdog Book (1992, a collection of magazine columns and articles) and guest chapters written for The BFI Companion to Horror, The Shape of Rage: The Films of David Cronenberg, Obsession: The Films of Jess Franco, Fangoria's Best Horror Films, and Horror: Another 100 Best Books.

His debut novel, Throat Sprockets (1994), now considered a cult classic, has been included in several surveys of the finest contemporary horror fiction. The Book of Renfield: A Gospel of Dracula, a work of dark Victoriana written in the style of Bram Stoker, followed in 2005. "A superb storyteller, Lucas mimics Stoker's style so well that it's hard to distinguish his own writing from passages interpolated from Dracula," praised Publishers Weekly.

An experienced audiovisual commentator, Lucas has recorded numerous DVD audio commentaries and appeared in several film-related programs, including A&E's Biography and the 2000 documentary Mario Bava Maestro of the Macabre. He also wrote the English dialogue for Mario Bava's Rabid Dogs, the first film to be released exclusively in the DVD format. His popular weblog Video WatchBlog won the Rondo Hatton Classic Horror Award for Best Website of 2006.

The work of a lifetime, Mario Bava—All the Colors of the Dark is the culmination of a project first undertaken by Lucas in 1975. He resides in Cincinnati, Ohio.

MARIO BAVA's personal calling card.

MARIO BAVA

"THE KING OF ITALIAN HORROR!"
Dave Kehr, The New York Times

"THE SUPREME VISUAL POET of the Italian gothic cinema."
The Penguin Encyclopedia of Horror and the Supernatural

"IN MANY WAYS, I THINK BAVA WAS THE EQUAL OF HITCHCOCK.
At his best, Bava was First Class."
Samuel Z. Arkoff, legendary producer

"ONE OF THE LEADING ARTISTS IN THE HORROR GENRE.
Bava's work operates almost exclusively on the level of cinematic style."
Phil Hardy, The Aurum Film Encyclopedia: Horror

"I'M A BIG MARIO BAVA FAN—he was one of my first heroes. My use of color is totally stolen from Bava, even though I know I'll never be as good as him!"
Quentin Tarantino, Director of PULP FICTION and KILL BILL

"BAVA HAD A DESIGN SENSE THAT BYPASSED YOUR MIND AND WENT STRAIGHT INTO YOUR SOUL. I've seen Black Sunday I don't know how many times, but if you asked me what the story was about, I couldn't tell you. That's what I love about Bava: I can't remember one single story!"
Tim Burton, Director of BATMAN and EDWARD SCISSORHANDS

"I THINK BAVA WAS A BRILLIANT ARTIST, a true artist, and his work was universal. His genius stands as an inspiration to the filmmakers who came after him."
Roger Corman, legendary producer and director

ALL THE COLORS OF THE DARK

"AUTHOR TIM LUCAS delves deep . . . sumptuously illustrated . . .
THE BE-ALL AND END-ALL on one of the most influential horror-movie directors!"
Playboy

"A FINE BOOK . . . Tim Lucas has devoted himself to getting the word out about Bava's greatness, to making sure his films are preserved and available on tape and DVD. This book is the pinnacle of his efforts."
Martin Scorsese, Director of THE DEPARTED and GOODFELLAS

"IT'S ABSOLUTELY MIND-BOGGLING! I don't know what Mario Bava would have made of all this, but wherever he is, he must be blushing Technicolor crimson . . . and very proud."
Joe Dante, Director of GREMLINS and THE HOWLING

"IF FAIRY TALES are the stage upon which we play out our inner turmoil, as Bruno Bettelheim believed, then Mario Bava must be commended for creating the most operatic, lavish productions of the Id, parading our darkest fears in impossibly rich hues and sensual textures. No one knew the circles of Hell like Bava, and in Tim Lucas we have found our perfect Virgil."
Guillermo del Toro, Director of PAN'S LABYRINTH and HELLBOY

ISBN 0-9633756-1-X